Like many of its British counterparts, the vast majority of Ghost's business is export, of which America and Japan represent around half of its sales volume (Europe, Australia, the Caribbean, and the Middle East make up the rest). Sarne began selling her designs in New York through high-end department and specialty stores in 1987, and Ghost's winning of the British Apparel Export award in 1992 gave the company a much higher profile. The following year, 1993, Sarne began showing her collections in New York.

According to Sarne, her philosophy of creating clothes (which she describes as "by women, for women,") is the key to the considerable success of the Ghost label and its appeal to a wide-ranging age group. The revolutionary nature of each Ghost collection, which means existing pieces can be added to each season, is another appealing feature of the company's designs and may be the key to dressing in the 1990s. "It's a unique product and very feminine," says Sarne of the Ghost label. "It also has a very 'antipower dressing' stance—a look I believe will only increase in importance as the decade progresses."

Sarne and Ghost were very busy in the mid- and late 1990s. A London store was opened in 1994, followed by a 3,500-foot flagship store three years later. Sarne expanded her design range to include knitwear, eyewear (through a license with Oliver Goldsmith), and shoes. In 1998 came new boutiques in Paris, Amsterdam, and Los Angeles, with future plans for a New York store.

Ghost, fall 2001 collection. © AP/Wide World Photos/Fashion Wire Daily.

Sarne's lovely, hardly-there viscose dresses have remained a favorite for women around the world, but especially in California. To mark the opening of her Los Angeles shop, Sarne threw a festive bash well attended by the area's glitterati. Though the company's roots are still firmly planted in the UK, Sarne much admires her American clientèle. "Our clothing is perfect for the L.A. climate and the L.A. mentality," Sarne told Women's Wear Daily in June 1998. In New York, stores like Neiman Marcus, Henri Bendel, and Barneys do a brisk business selling Ghost designs, but as Sarne explained, "People in New York think they're trendier and sharper, but our best sales have always been in L.A."

So just who wears Ghost designs? As Sarne told Shane Watson of London Life, from the This is London website in 1999, "I can find any woman a Ghost outfit that will make her look wonderful. Guaranteed, any shape, any size, any age." In 2000 Sarne admirers had a new way to wear Ghost, with the debut of a signature fragrance, with another women's scent planned for the next year or so. Back in London, Sarne and her new head designer, Amy Roberts, showed a winning collection of dresses and separates in February 2001. Women's Wear Daily commented (23 February 2001), "This collection should definitely give the label a boost."

—Catherine Woram; updated by Nelly Rhodes

GIANNELLI, Danilo

See CALUGI E GIANNELLI

GIBB, Bill

British designer

Born: William Elphinstone Gibb in Fraserburgh, Scotland, 23 January 1943. Education: Studied in Fraserburgh until 1960; studied at St. Martin's School of Art, London, 1962–66, Royal College of Art, London, 1966–68. Career: Founder/partner, Alice Paul clothing boutique, London, 1967–69; freelance designer, working for Baccarat, London, 1969–72; founder/chairman Bill Gibb Fashion Group, London, 1972–88; opened first shop, in Bond Street, London, 1975. Exhibitions: British Design, Musée du Louvre, Paris, 1971; Fashion: An Anthology, Victoria and Albert Museum, London, 1971; Bill Gibb: Ten Years, Albert Hall, London, 1977. Collections: Bath Costume Museum, Avon; Leeds Museum, Yorkshire; Victoria and Albert Museum, London; Royal Ontario Museum, Toronto. Awards: Vogue Designer of the Year, 1970; ITV Best Fashion Show award, London, 1979. Fellow, Society of Industrial Artists and Designers, London, 1975. Died: 3 January 1988, in London.

PUBLICATIONS

By GIBB:

Articles

"Getting Going Again," in The Designer (London), May 1981.

On GIBB:

Books

Howell, Georgina, editor, In Vogue, Sixty Years of Celebrities and Fashion, London, 1975; New York, 1976.

Carter, Ernestine, The Changing World of Fashion, London, 1977.

Bond, David, The Guinness Guide to 20th Century Fashion, Enfield, Middlesex, 1981.

Glynn, Prudence, Sixty Years of Faces and Fashion, London, 1983.

Sparke, Penny, et al., Design Source Book, London, 1986.

Bill Gibb: A Tribute to the Fashion Designer of the '70s, Aberdeen, Scotland, 1990.

Articles

"Top of the Bill," in The Sunday Times Magazine (London), 8 May 1977.

Ebbetts, L., "The Fall and Rise of Bill Gibb," in The Daily Mirror (London), 12 October 1978.

Boyd, Ann, "Gibb's Comeback," in The Observer (London), 22 October 1978.

"Bill Gibb Comes Back with Flowers," in Art & Design (London), November 1985.

"Obituary: Bill Gibb," in the Daily Telegraph (London), 4 January 1988.

"Bill Gibb, 44, Fashion Designer for the Famous," in Chicago Tribune, 7 January 1988.

O'Dwyer, Tom, "Bill Gibb—An Appreciation," in Fashion Weekly (London), 14 January 1988.

Rancer, Katherine, "Bill Gibb: 1943–1988," in Vogue (London), March 1988.

* * *

Arriving in London at the age of 19 from northern Scotland, Bill Gibb was already obsessed with the dream of a career in fashion. He trained at St. Martin's School of Art, then at the Royal College under the aegis of Professor Janey Ironside. An unprecedented flow of new talent was to emerge from the college in the early 1960s. For the next three years Gibb worked for Baccarat, the prestigious London fashion house, before setting up his own company in 1972 with a complete team, including designers, cutter, and business manager. By 1975 he was in retail.

In the early 1970s unconventionality was the order of the day and Gibb was one of several young designers in the British wholesale market whose work reflected this trend. He responded to the new predilection for romantic and ethnic clothes, inspired by the folk costumes of Europe or the Near East and displaying, too, a feeling of nostalgia for the dress of an earlier historical age, with his full-length skirts and billowing slashed sleeves.

Gibb's was a career of considerable variety and change, "I strove for the top and achieved it within ten years," he said. He believed consummately in his "rare gift...to design beautiful clothes" which would appeal to the sensuality of women. This talent led him through a series of outlets from the personal customer to department stores, from boutiques to newspaper and magazine fashion features, to the opening of his first shop in London's Bond Street in 1975, and was to earn him an international reputation for unique special occasion clothes.

Always an individualist, Gibb was faithful to his own design principles, which relied on the enterprising and ingenious use of textures, weaves, and patterns in fabrics and knitting. Boldly inventive to the point of abandon at times, he mixed and matched materials and colors. His mood was romantic and far out: the effects often larger than life and always unmistakably his own. "I feel," he had said, "rather than dictate. I create a mood." Gibb wanted to create coordinates that gave women choice and pleasure to assemble in the "Gibb style," and with homage to the ethnic feeling of the day, he mixed florals with geometrics, tartans with checks, and produced sunray pleated, beaded and fringed separates, all of which became very popular.

Gibb's output during the 1970s was of such a consistently high standard, it verged on couture. He was probably best known for his evening gowns, fabulous concoctions in floaty and exotic fabrics embellished with appliqués or heavily embroidered nets and lace, silks, brocades, and chiffon panels. In this vein was his 1976 hooded cape, a favorite shape, and voluminous smocks, and kimonos with colored braid trims.

Gibb confessed to a strong feeling for knitwear, which he attributed to his Celtic roots, and he certainly produced some very fine knitted garments, reflecting an interest in soft, thinner fabrics, layered upon themselves, which originated with the Italian school of designers, commented (23 February 2001), "This collection should definitely give the label a boost."

—Catherine Woram; updated by Nelly Rhodes

GIANNELLI, Danilo

See CALUGI E GIANNELLI

GIBB, Bill

British designer

Born: William Elphinstone Gibb in Fraserburgh, Scotland, 23 January 1943. Education: Studied in Fraserburgh until 1960; studied at St. Martin's School of Art, London, 1962–66, Royal College of Art, London, 1966–68. Career: Founder/partner, Alice Paul clothing boutique, London, 1967–69; freelance designer, working for Baccarat, London, 1969–72; founder/chairman Bill Gibb Fashion Group, London, 1972–88; opened first shop, in Bond Street, London, 1975. Exhibitions: British Design, Musée du Louvre, Paris, 1971; Fashion: An Anthology, Victoria and Albert Museum, London, 1971; Bill Gibb: Ten Years, Albert Hall, London, 1977. Collections: Bath Costume Museum, Avon; Leeds Museum, Yorkshire; Victoria and Albert Museum, London; Royal Ontario Museum, Toronto. Awards: Vogue Designer of the Year, 1970; ITV Best Fashion Show award, London, 1979. Fellow, Society of Industrial Artists and Designers, London, 1975. Died: 3 January 1988, in London.

PUBLICATIONS

By GIBB:

Articles

"Getting Going Again," in The Designer (London), May 1981.

On GIBB:

Books

Howell, Georgina, editor, In Vogue, Sixty Years of Celebrities and Fashion, London, 1975; New York, 1976.

Carter, Ernestine, The Changing World of Fashion, London, 1977.

Bond, David, The Guinness Guide to 20th Century Fashion, Enfield, Middlesex, 1981.

Glynn, Prudence, Sixty Years of Faces and Fashion, London, 1983.

Sparke, Penny, et al., Design Source Book, London, 1986.

Bill Gibb: A Tribute to the Fashion Designer of the '70s, Aberdeen, Scotland, 1990.

Articles

"Top of the Bill," in The Sunday Times Magazine (London), 8 May 1977.

Ebbetts, L., "The Fall and Rise of Bill Gibb," in The Daily Mirror (London), 12 October 1978.

Boyd, Ann, "Gibb's Comeback," in The Observer (London), 22 October 1978.

"Bill Gibb Comes Back with Flowers," in Art & Design (London), November 1985.

"Obituary: Bill Gibb," in the Daily Telegraph (London), 4 January 1988.

"Bill Gibb, 44, Fashion Designer for the Famous," in Chicago Tribune, 7 January 1988.

O'Dwyer, Tom, "Bill Gibb—An Appreciation," in Fashion Weekly (London), 14 January 1988.

Rancer, Katherine, "Bill Gibb: 1943–1988," in Vogue (London), March 1988.

* * *

Arriving in London at the age of 19 from northern Scotland, Bill Gibb was already obsessed with the dream of a career in fashion. He trained at St. Martin's School of Art, then at the Royal College under the aegis of Professor Janey Ironside. An unprecedented flow of new talent was to emerge from the college in the early 1960s. For the next three years Gibb worked for Baccarat, the prestigious London fashion house, before setting up his own company in 1972 with a complete team, including designers, cutter, and business manager. By 1975 he was in retail.

In the early 1970s unconventionality was the order of the day and Gibb was one of several young designers in the British wholesale market whose work reflected this trend. He responded to the new predilection for romantic and ethnic clothes, inspired by the folk costumes of Europe or the Near East and displaying, too, a feeling of nostalgia for the dress of an earlier historical age, with his full-length skirts and billowing slashed sleeves.

Gibb's was a career of considerable variety and change, "I strove for the top and achieved it within ten years," he said. He believed consummately in his "rare gift...to design beautiful clothes" which would appeal to the sensuality of women. This talent led him through a series of outlets from the personal customer to department stores, from boutiques to newspaper and magazine fashion features, to the opening of his first shop in London's Bond Street in 1975, and was to earn him an international reputation for unique special occasion clothes.

Always an individualist, Gibb was faithful to his own design principles, which relied on the enterprising and ingenious use of textures, weaves, and patterns in fabrics and knitting. Boldly inventive to the point of abandon at times, he mixed and matched materials and colors. His mood was romantic and far out: the effects often larger than life and always unmistakably his own. "I feel," he had said, "rather than dictate. I create a mood." Gibb wanted to create coordinates that gave women choice and pleasure to assemble in the "Gibb style," and with homage to the ethnic feeling of the day, he mixed florals with geometrics, tartans with checks, and produced sunray pleated, beaded and fringed separates, all of which became very popular.

Gibb's output during the 1970s was of such a consistently high standard, it verged on couture. He was probably best known for his evening gowns, fabulous concoctions in floaty and exotic fabrics embellished with appliqués or heavily embroidered nets and lace, silks, brocades, and chiffon panels. In this vein was his 1976 hooded cape, a favorite shape, and voluminous smocks, and kimonos with colored braid trims.

Gibb confessed to a strong feeling for knitwear, which he attributed to his Celtic roots, and he certainly produced some very fine knitted garments, reflecting an interest in soft, thinner fabrics, layered upon themselves, which originated with the Italian school of designers, notably the Missoni family. He also made some beautifully elaborate outfits in printed wool, often Liberty fabrics. By the mid-1970s Gibb was creating stunning leather clothes, using the softest of skins for coats and jackets with wide collars and plumes.

Throughout most of the 1970s Gibb ran a small wholesale business, but was forced into liquidation. A brief period of financial support followed, but it is doubtful whether he enjoyed the restrictions and deadlines implicit in such an arrangement. The mid-1980s saw a brief recovery and, with a renewed collaboration with the knitwear designer Kaffe Fassett, Gibb showed a collection at the London Fashion Week in 1985. His clothing was roundly applauded, with critics dubbing him the “the master of the decorative,” praising his “simply cut, richly colored knitted suits and throws,” and what was characterized as his “fairytale exercises in the baroque, the beaded, and the burnished.”

Gibb will best be remembered for his flights of fancy, and his unique contribution to 20th-century fashion. As Vogue said in 1962, in a feature called “Fresh Air in the Rag Trade,” for “the first time the young people who work in the rag trade are making clothes which are relevant to the way they live...ours is the first generation that can express itself on its own terms.” Bill Gibb was very much a product of his time, a free spirit. He died at the very young age of 44, in January 1988, from bowel cancer.

—Elian McCready

GIGLI, Romeo

Italian designer

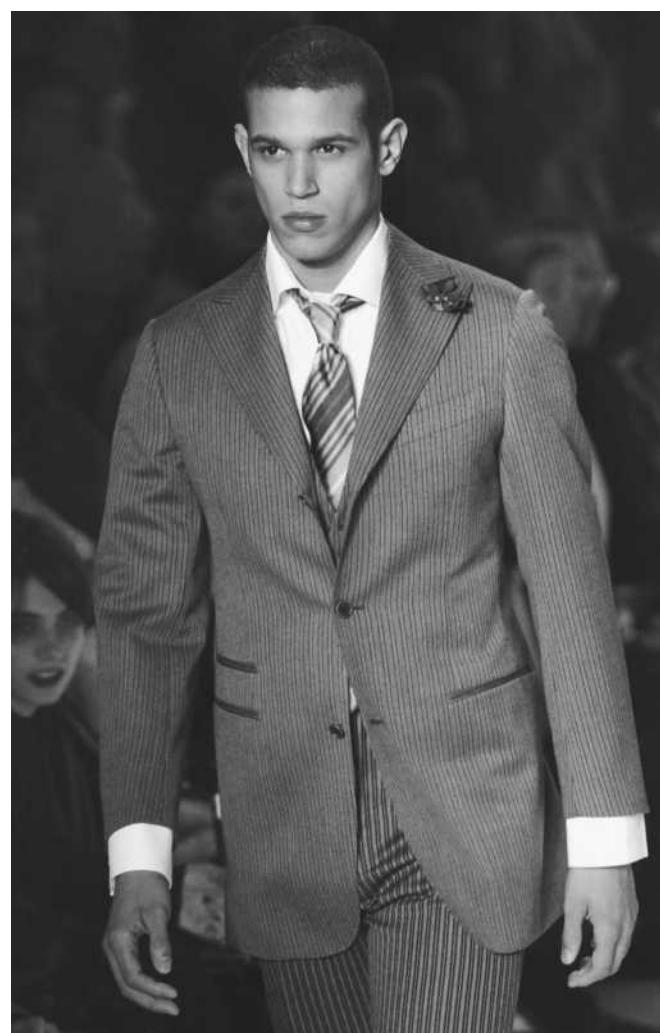

Born: Castelbolognese, Faenza, Italy, 12 December 1949. Education: Studied architecture; has traveled the world extensively. Family: Married; children: Diletta. Career: First collection for Quickstep by Luciano Papini; small collection of handknits, 1972; designer, Dimitri Couture, New York, 1979; Romeo Gigli label, from 1981; first showing, 1982; designer, Romeo Gigli for Zamasport, from 1984; distribution agreement with Takashimaya, 1987; opened Corso Como boutique, Milan, 1988; collaboration with Ermenegildo Zegna Group, from 1989; Romeo di Romeo Gigli, women's fragrance launched and Paris store opened, 1989; lower-priced G. Gigli sportswear line introduced and New York store opened, 1990; formation of NUNO to distribute G. Gigli line, 1992; made limited edition handmade rugs for Christopher Farr, 1993; signature line of jeans, 1996; Awards: Accademia del Profumo award [for fragrance packaging], 1990; Woolmark award, 1990; American Fragrance Foundation award [fragrance packaging], 1991. Address: Via Fumagalli, 6–20143 Milan, Italy. Website: www.romeogigli.it.

PUBLICATIONS

On GIGLI:

Books

Martin, Richard, and Harold Koda, Orientalism: Visions of the East in Western Dress (exhibition catalogue), New York 1994.

Romeo Gigli, fall/winter 2001 collection: wool suit. © AP/Wide World Photos.

Stegemeyer, Anne, Who's Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.

Articles

Kellett, Caroline, “Cue: New Talent, Take Two: Romeo Gigli,” in Vogue (London), March 1986.

“Ferre and Gigli: Architects of a Modern Style,” in Elle (London), October 1986.

Cocks, Jay, “The Color of New Blood: Some Snazzy Duds from Three Upstarts,” in Time, 10 November 1986.

Morena, Daniela, “The Solitary Chic of Romeo Gigli,” in Interview (New York), December 1987.

“In diretta da Milano: I virtuosi difetti di Gigli,” in Donna (Milan), February 1988.

Brubach, Holly, “The Master of Understatement,” in Vogue, May 1988.

“Designer Focus: Romeo Gigli,” in Cosmopolitan (London), August 1988.

“Opinions: Romeo Gigli,” in Donna, September 1988.

notably the Missoni family. He also made some beautifully elaborate outfits in printed wool, often Liberty fabrics. By the mid-1970s Gibb was creating stunning leather clothes, using the softest of skins for coats and jackets with wide collars and plumes.

Throughout most of the 1970s Gibb ran a small wholesale business, but was forced into liquidation. A brief period of financial support followed, but it is doubtful whether he enjoyed the restrictions and deadlines implicit in such an arrangement. The mid-1980s saw a brief recovery and, with a renewed collaboration with the knitwear designer Kaffe Fassett, Gibb showed a collection at the London Fashion Week in 1985. His clothing was roundly applauded, with critics dubbing him the “the master of the decorative,” praising his “simply cut, richly colored knitted suits and throws,” and what was characterized as his “fairytale exercises in the baroque, the beaded, and the burnished.”

Gibb will best be remembered for his flights of fancy, and his unique contribution to 20th-century fashion. As Vogue said in 1962, in a feature called “Fresh Air in the Rag Trade,” for “the first time the young people who work in the rag trade are making clothes which are relevant to the way they live...ours is the first generation that can express itself on its own terms.” Bill Gibb was very much a product of his time, a free spirit. He died at the very young age of 44, in January 1988, from bowel cancer.

—Elian McCready

GIGLI, Romeo

Italian designer

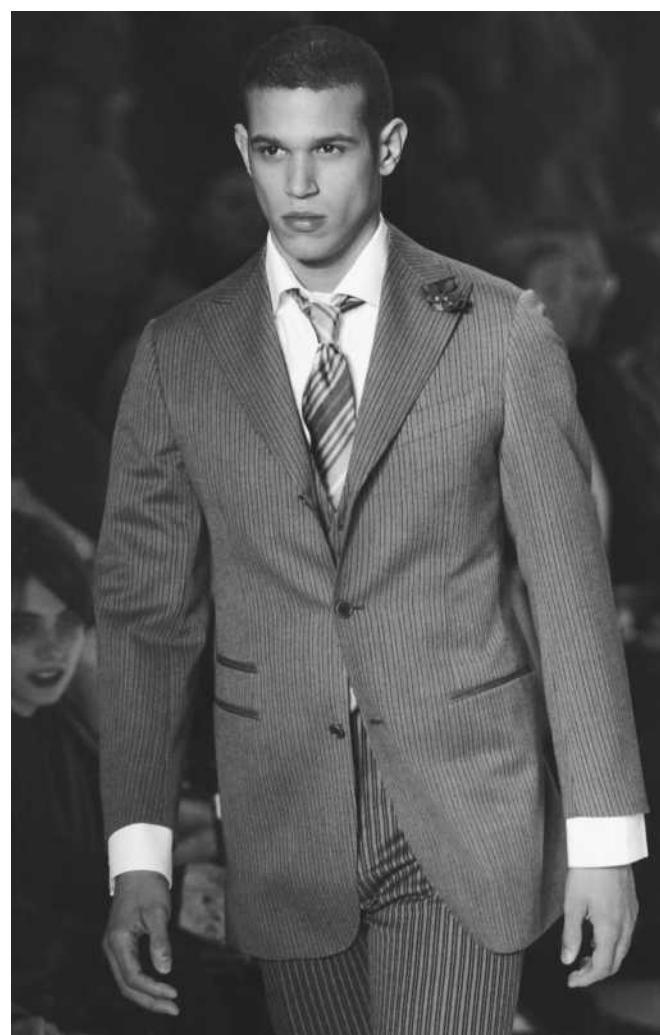

Born: Castelbolognese, Faenza, Italy, 12 December 1949. Education: Studied architecture; has traveled the world extensively. Family: Married; children: Diletta. Career: First collection for Quickstep by Luciano Papini; small collection of handknits, 1972; designer, Dimitri Couture, New York, 1979; Romeo Gigli label, from 1981; first showing, 1982; designer, Romeo Gigli for Zamasport, from 1984; distribution agreement with Takashimaya, 1987; opened Corso Como boutique, Milan, 1988; collaboration with Ermenegildo Zegna Group, from 1989; Romeo di Romeo Gigli, women's fragrance launched and Paris store opened, 1989; lower-priced G. Gigli sportswear line introduced and New York store opened, 1990; formation of NUNO to distribute G. Gigli line, 1992; made limited edition handmade rugs for Christopher Farr, 1993; signature line of jeans, 1996; Awards: Accademia del Profumo award [for fragrance packaging], 1990; Woolmark award, 1990; American Fragrance Foundation award [fragrance packaging], 1991. Address: Via Fumagalli, 6–20143 Milan, Italy. Website: www.romeogigli.it.

PUBLICATIONS

On GIGLI:

Books

Martin, Richard, and Harold Koda, Orientalism: Visions of the East in Western Dress (exhibition catalogue), New York 1994.

Romeo Gigli, fall/winter 2001 collection: wool suit. © AP/Wide World Photos.

Stegemeyer, Anne, Who's Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.

Articles

Kellett, Caroline, “Cue: New Talent, Take Two: Romeo Gigli,” in Vogue (London), March 1986.

“Ferre and Gigli: Architects of a Modern Style,” in Elle (London), October 1986.

Cocks, Jay, “The Color of New Blood: Some Snazzy Duds from Three Upstarts,” in Time, 10 November 1986.

Morena, Daniela, “The Solitary Chic of Romeo Gigli,” in Interview (New York), December 1987.

“In diretta da Milano: I virtuosi difetti di Gigli,” in Donna (Milan), February 1988.

Brubach, Holly, “The Master of Understatement,” in Vogue, May 1988.

“Designer Focus: Romeo Gigli,” in Cosmopolitan (London), August 1988.

“Opinions: Romeo Gigli,” in Donna, September 1988.

- Gross, Michael, "Romeo, Romeo: The Monk of Milan," in New York, 5 December 1988.
- Thim, Dennis, "Romeo and Paris: A New Love Story," in WWd, 22 March 1989.
- "Gigli's Genius," in International Textiles (London), May 1989.
- Rafferty, Diane, "The Empress' New Clothes," in Connoisseur (New York), July 1989.
- Petkanas, Christopher, "Romeo, Romeo," in Harper's Bazaar, August 1989.
- Pringle, Colombe, "Au pays de Romeo," in Vogue (Paris), August 1989.
- Alexander, Hilary, "Romeo's Affairs," in Women's Journal (London), October 1989.
- "The Designers Talk Passion, Whimsy, and Picassos," in ARTnews (New York), September 1990.
- Lesser, Guy, "Milan: One Night Art Extravaganzas," in ARTnews, September 1990.
- Gerrie, Anthea, "Designer Profile: Romeo Gigli," in Clothes Show (London), March 1992.
- Buckley, Richard, "Romeo's Imbroglio," in Mirabella (New York), March 1992.
- Spindler, Amy M., "Lagerfeld Tones Down the Look at Chanel," in the New York Times, 21 March 1995.
- Menkes, Suzy, "Gender-Bending: Milan Shows Reopen Familiar Debate," in the International Herald Tribune, 11 March 1997.
- Allen, Derek, "Romeo Gigli: Alchemist Par Excellence," available online at Yes Please, www.yesplease.it, January 1999.
- "Romeo Gigli," [profile], available online at Moda Online, www.modaonline.it, 7 September 2001.

* * *

Romeo Gigli produces clothes that are always subtle and sophisticated. He blends a spectrum of muted colors with a fluid sense of cut and drape to give a feeling of balance and harmony to all his designs, perhaps as a result of his architectural training. His prime influences are fine art and travel, both apparent in the Renaissance luxury of the fabrics he uses and the mix of cultural influences discernible in their shaping and decoration. A soft sculptural beauty pervades both his day and eveningwear, with a talent for shaping clothes to the body in an elegantly flattering way without ever clinging too tightly or restrictively.

His womenswear encapsulates these qualities and has been very influential, having taken its cue from the elastic fluidity of dancewear to produce garments that are soft and feminine. Although Gigli's clothes are obviously designed for the busy modern woman, they are never merely a series of mix-and-match separates, nor indeed are they as ostentatious as the work of some of his Italian counterparts. His use of stretch fabrics and rich warm woollen suiting have inspired many imitators with their purity of cut and sensuous, body-skimming fit. The classical virtues of the body which pervade Gigli's work give a feeling of an evolutionary process to fashion, rather than a slavish following of seasonal dictates, and it is perhaps this innate classicism that gives his clothes a timeless air.

Some Gigli garments, like his richly enveloping embroidered coats, seem destined to become treasured collectors' items, passed on like heirlooms rather than falling victim to the fickleness often associated with fashion. His use of detailing is subtle and uncluttered, as in the minimal silhouette of the Empire line dresses and ballet-styled wrap tops introduced and popularized during the mid-1980s. When decoration is used it follows his restrained ideals of iridescent beauty—golden thread embroidered around the edge of a soft bolero jacket, evoking a feeling of the East, dull amber gold beads making a shimmering glow of fringing from waist to floor, or thousands of glittering gunmetal blue beads on a cocoon-like evening dress.

Romeo Gigli, fall/winter 2001 ready-to-wear collection. © AP/Wide World Photos.

If Gigli's strength is perhaps his gently romantic womenswear, his menswear is nonetheless notable for the same kind of muted colours and sinuous cut, giving it a feeling of luxury without any obvious show of wealth. Suiting is again unstructured, working with the shape of the body rather than against it. His jackets are often high-buttoned, with an extra sense of depth and texture given to their rich wools by the subtle range of mossy greens, dull aubergine and bitter chocolate browns used to stripe the fabric. It is this kind of color sense which, combined with clever mixing of shiny and matte fabrics, marks all his work. Even his most formal menswear has an effortless elegance and a fluidity of cut, which have made it unfailingly popular with discerning male customers.

Gigli has followed the increasingly popular notion of the diffusion range with the more practical daywear basics of his G. Gigli line, launched in 1990. Here the silhouette is bulkier, with rich berry chenilles and sage and golden corduroys being used to produce a collection of classic zip-style cardigans, hooded tops, trousers, and soft leggings for men and women. Although less ethereally beautiful than much of his main collection, there is still the same signature use of contrasting fabrics and muted colors to produce a very tactile appeal through texture and shade.

An intelligent balance of all elements of design and choice of textiles makes Gigli's work uniquely sophisticated and beautiful. His subtlety of touch and soft sculptural forms have influenced all levels of design from the High Street up, and his work has continued to develop along his self-assigned tenets of harmony and balance, always retaining a feeling of sensuous luxury.

While Gigli continued to debut collections in Paris, he returned to the Milan catwalk in 1997 after an absence of seven years. Critics approved of his women's line featuring three-piece pantsuits, skirts, and knit dresses and his men's collection of retooled jackets, shoes and ties. As always, his use of fabric and texture drew the most praise. Suzy Menkes, who had sung Gigli's praises after his first Paris showing years before, enthused, "But the joy of the show was in its opening coats in fabrics that seemed to draw their rich colors and lattice or tapestry textures from the artistic soul of Italy."

By the 21st century the Gigli name could be found on an increasing number of products, from ties, shoes, and eyewear to fabrics and handmade rugs for Christopher Farr. The limited edition kilims featured wool from Kurdish sheep, and were handmade on looms in Turkey. Gigli continues to be propelled by his beliefs in intrinsic beauty; as he told Derek Allen in a 1999 interview for the Italian website Yes Please, "All the pieces I create must be beautiful in character, and that means they must possess beauty outside the context of the overall project. If I remove a piece from the collection and it doesn't function in alternative contexts, then it lacks the necessary sense of balance." For Gigli, balance and beauty go hand in hand.

—Rebecca Arnold; updated by Nelly Rhodes

GIRBAUD, Marithé & François

French designer team

Born: Marithé Bachellerie—Lyon, France, 1942; François Girbaud—Mazamet, France, 1945. Joint Career: Business formed in 1965; showed first collection, 1968, first boutique selling Girbaud-designed jeans opened, Paris, 1969; Halles Capone boutique opened in Paris, from 1972; first U.S. shop, Nantucket Island, Massachusetts, 1984; Jeaneration 21 line introduced, 1993; HiTech/HiTouch line developed, 1993; other lines included Complements for women, Closed for men, Reproductions for children, Complete Look accessories, Kelian-Girbaud shoes, Maillaparty, Compagnie des Montagnes et des Forêts, 11342, and Millesimes; launched promotional campaign for X-yoke shorts called the Cool Front featuring in-store refrigerator displays, 1996; moved men's jeanswear license from V.F. Corporation to I.C.

Marithé & François Girbaud, fall 2000 collection. © AP/Wide World Photos/Fashion Wire Daily.

Isaacs & Company, 1997; added women's jeanswear license to Isaacs line, 1998; introduced Freedom Jeans for women, a variant on cargo pants, 1998; introduced Denim Tool Belts, 1999; sponsored College Rock Tour 2001, a fashion show and concert series, 2001. Address: 8 rue Babylone, Paris 75007, France.

PUBLICATIONS

On the GIRBAUDS:

Books

Stegemeyer, Anne, Who's Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.

Articles

La Ferla, Ruth, "François & Marithé Girbaud: Beyond Fashion," in the Daily News Record, 20 September 1982.

Daria, Irene, "After the Switch: The Girbauds," in WWD, 21 December 1984.

Walsleben, Elizabeth C., "The Girbauds' Design is in Their Jeans," in California Apparel News (Los Angeles), 11–17 July 1986.
Daily News Record (New York), 11 February 1987.

Gigli has followed the increasingly popular notion of the diffusion range with the more practical daywear basics of his G. Gigli line, launched in 1990. Here the silhouette is bulkier, with rich berry chenilles and sage and golden corduroys being used to produce a collection of classic zip-style cardigans, hooded tops, trousers, and soft leggings for men and women. Although less ethereally beautiful than much of his main collection, there is still the same signature use of contrasting fabrics and muted colors to produce a very tactile appeal through texture and shade.

An intelligent balance of all elements of design and choice of textiles makes Gigli's work uniquely sophisticated and beautiful. His subtlety of touch and soft sculptural forms have influenced all levels of design from the High Street up, and his work has continued to develop along his self-assigned tenets of harmony and balance, always retaining a feeling of sensuous luxury.

While Gigli continued to debut collections in Paris, he returned to the Milan catwalk in 1997 after an absence of seven years. Critics approved of his women's line featuring three-piece pantsuits, skirts, and knit dresses and his men's collection of retooled jackets, shoes and ties. As always, his use of fabric and texture drew the most praise. Suzy Menkes, who had sung Gigli's praises after his first Paris showing years before, enthused, "But the joy of the show was in its opening coats in fabrics that seemed to draw their rich colors and lattice or tapestry textures from the artistic soul of Italy."

By the 21st century the Gigli name could be found on an increasing number of products, from ties, shoes, and eyewear to fabrics and handmade rugs for Christopher Farr. The limited edition kilims featured wool from Kurdish sheep, and were handmade on looms in Turkey. Gigli continues to be propelled by his beliefs in intrinsic beauty; as he told Derek Allen in a 1999 interview for the Italian website Yes Please, "All the pieces I create must be beautiful in character, and that means they must possess beauty outside the context of the overall project. If I remove a piece from the collection and it doesn't function in alternative contexts, then it lacks the necessary sense of balance." For Gigli, balance and beauty go hand in hand.

—Rebecca Arnold; updated by Nelly Rhodes

GIRBAUD, Marithé & François

French designer team

Born: Marithé Bachellerie—Lyon, France, 1942; François Girbaud—Mazamet, France, 1945. Joint Career: Business formed in 1965; showed first collection, 1968, first boutique selling Girbaud-designed jeans opened, Paris, 1969; Halles Capone boutique opened in Paris, from 1972; first U.S. shop, Nantucket Island, Massachusetts, 1984; Jeaneration 21 line introduced, 1993; HiTech/HiTouch line developed, 1993; other lines included Complements for women, Closed for men, Reproductions for children, Complete Look accessories, Kelian-Girbaud shoes, Maillaparty, Compagnie des Montagnes et des Forêts, 11342, and Millesimes; launched promotional campaign for X-yoke shorts called the Cool Front featuring in-store refrigerator displays, 1996; moved men's jeanswear license from V.F. Corporation to I.C.

Marithé & François Girbaud, fall 2000 collection. © AP/Wide World Photos/Fashion Wire Daily.

Isaacs & Company, 1997; added women's jeanswear license to Isaacs line, 1998; introduced Freedom Jeans for women, a variant on cargo pants, 1998; introduced Denim Tool Belts, 1999; sponsored College Rock Tour 2001, a fashion show and concert series, 2001. Address: 8 rue Babylone, Paris 75007, France.

PUBLICATIONS

On the GIRBAUDS:

Books

Stegemeyer, Anne, Who's Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.

Articles

La Ferla, Ruth, "François & Marithé Girbaud: Beyond Fashion," in the Daily News Record, 20 September 1982.

Daria, Irene, "After the Switch: The Girbauds," in WWD, 21 December 1984.

Walsleben, Elizabeth C., "The Girbauds' Design is in Their Jeans," in California Apparel News (Los Angeles), 11–17 July 1986.
Daily News Record (New York), 11 February 1987.

- Bloomfield, Judy, "Girbaud: Keeping It Simple," in WWD, 3 February 1988.
- Martin, Richard, "Wordrobe: The Messages of Word and Image in Textile and Apparel Design of the 1980s," Textile and Text, 12 January–February 1989.
- _____, "The Eleventh Little Middle Ages: Signs and Chivalry in the Reconstitution of Medieval Dress in the 1980s," Textile and Text, 12 March 1990.
- Vasilopoulos, Vicki, "The World According to Marithé and François," in the Daily News Record 3 May 1993.
- Spevack, Rachel, "A Cold Front Moving In," in the Daily News Record, 8 April 1996.
- Socha, Miles, "Girbauds' Freedom," in WWD, 26 March 1998.
- Curan, Catherine, "I.C. Isaacs Hopes Girbaud License Can Stem Flow of Red Ink," in the Daily News Record, 7 December 1998.
- Socha, Miles, "Gladstone's Plan for a New Girbaud," in WWD, 4 February 1999.
- Malone, Scott, "Girbaud Jeans: On the Rise," in WWD, 3 February 2000.
- Cunningham, Thomas, "I.C. Isaacs Breathes New Life into Girbaud," in the Daily News Record, 5 June 2000.

* * *

Marithé and François Girbaud have created fashion that emanates from the street; reveling in design problems of cylinders, mutation, and reversibility; and bringing high-style aspirations to casual materials and effects. Their proclivity to oversizing seems akin to Japanese design and Middle Eastern and East Asian peasant garb, as their futurist vocabulary of tubes and metamorphosis can seem a highly conceptual eventuality worthy of Marinetti or Balla, but also functions as fluid streetwear. Their deconstructivist bent, exposing the elements of garment manufacture, parallels Karl Lagerfeld at Chanel, but their medium is a more accessible casual wear—almost hip-hop homeboy style in New York or the carefree flair of a weekend in Paris. In the casual jeans-based look the Girbauds have created and recreated, they have consistently been the most innovative, experimental, concept-driven designers.

The Girbauds have, in fact, commanded the avant-garde position in casualwear, customarily characterized by stasis, in the manner of high-fashion designers such as Jean-Paul Gaultier or Issey Miyake, thriving on conceptual development and change yet never failing to represent the irrefutable leadership position in the field. Ruth La Ferla, of the Daily News Record, called François Girbaud "three parts fashion technician, one part theoretician," yet the Girbauds have also been savvy interpreters, bringing out Ninja-inspired pantaloons with ankle snaps, rugged survival wear, and sophisticated 1940s and 1950s revival-wear. Beginning in retailing, the Girbauds were as street smart as they were conceptually witty and ingenious. François Girbaud told Irene Daria of Women's Wear Daily, in December 1984, "We design from the streets. We start at the bottom and move up."

Their streets are global. Roomy drawstring trousers, loose shirts worn over the waist, and other styles evade traditional European and American notions of fit. The Amerasian collection for summer 1984—featuring Moudjahadin outfits with drawstring jackets and wide tubular trousers inspired by the Middle East and Afghanistan as well as boxy jackets inspired by China—typifies the eclectic, globetrotting ethos of the Girbauds' design. For summer 1985, the Jet Laggers collection showed no straggling or fatigue: trousers called

Marithé & François Girbaud, fall 2000 collection. © AP/Wide World Photos/Fashion Wire Daily.

Kaboul/Champs Elysées could be worn in the Middle East or in Paris in their amplitude, cargo pockets adding to the engorged size, with a rustic combination of buttons and drawstrings. For fall 1986, big dhoti trousers and exotic cumberbands and kilto-pants with voluminous tops and tapered legs combined East and West, exercise and boudoir. Yet the virtuoso accomplishment of the Girbauds is their repertory of trouser options for men and women, international in possibilities and strikingly original and inventive in realization.

The Girbauds have also been aware of the history of Western dress. In menswear, their high-waisted Hollywood style for fall 1987 evoked the glamor era of movies in the 1940s. Their interest has also been in materials, from quilting and fabric-backed leather to a soft, stone-washed denim. Another conceptual element of the Girbaud style is the didactic display of the garment's construction, one Momento Due jacket revealing its pattern components, other garments inscribed with all their wearing options. In addition to the language of clothing, the Girbauds have played with language itself, vocabulary, hieroglyphs, and alphabets appearing again and again in the collection.

When interviewed, the designers like to suggest their work is a perfect synthesis of their childhood preoccupations, she with creating doll clothes, he with American pop culture, films, and military outfits.

There is truth to this proposition, yet it also is unlikely that these two designers who began as retailers are only pursuing personal desires. The casual clothing they have created is imbued with heritage, even if this legacy is working clothing, brought to the present in technical and even futuristic ways. In the evident conceptualism of their clothing (and in their bridge lines), they have expanded the market of casual clothing beyond the young, so their clothes are as appropriate to the market for persons in their 30s and 40s as they are to the primary market for jeans of teens or in their 20s.

The Girbauds face many competitors in stylish casual wear for the young; they command the market for an abiding casual style for an older market, which has been increasing. In a July 1986 article, the California Apparel News reported, “In an industry where fashion changes with each season, the Girbauds’ clothes have kept the image of comfort while growing in style and versatility to become ‘concept dressing’.”

Innovation has remained a keystone of the Girbauds’ line each season. Their fall 2001 collection combined futuristic and prairie touches, which, according to Women’s Wear Daily (WWD), unexpectedly worked well together. Although both WWD and the Daily News Record commented on the Girbauds’ relative conservatism and simplicity in this collection, they noted the inclusion of items more typical of their work, such as down-filled shirts and navy boiled-wool jackets with exposed seams in orange. These nicely complemented the simpler direction in their jeanswear, critics said.

François Girbaud expressed his frustration with the retro trends in jeanswear design at the turn of the century. He told WWD in a December 2000 interview, “I do not believe in that 1970s look. It is like opening up a book about the ’70s and taking something from it—we already did that when we were there.”

Fabric innovation, of which the Girbauds were always proponents, has continued with projects such as Blue Eternal, a treated denim that holds its color after multiple trips to the laundry, as well as the development of a detergent to revive denim. In their designs, the Girbauds have often used synthetic fibers to emulate natural fibers—sometimes in combination with actual natural fibers—resulting in more flexibility of design. Synthetics, for example, can be fused or heated and not just saddle-stitched.

In the late 1990s and early 2000s, the Girbauds’ designs were emblematic of “utilitarian chic.” Shirts and jeans featured many pockets and were made of wrinkle-resistant fabrics or were permanently wrinkled. An example of the latter was a vest twisted to look like a Sharpei’s skin, as described by the Philippine publication Business World in November 2000. The Freedom cargo pant featured pockets for cell phones, personal digital assistants (PDAs), and pagers; an anorak had a front zipper allowing for a baby carrier; a utility bag with pockets was sold under the Denim Tool Belt brand.

According to the Daily News Record in June 2000, one of the Girbauds’ bestsellers is the shuttle, a carpenter pant with Velcro straps. Popular basic items include Brand X jeans with crisscross hip stitching and the Cowboy, which features a twist at the top of the front pocket, making it easier to insert and remove items. Complementing these basics are the Girbauds’ newer, more experimental items, which include a stretch gabardine and nylon “climbing” pant with a belt buckle that the wearer can lock with a plastic key. Additionally, their European Sporcity brand serves as their couture sportswear line on the Continent.

From a business point of view, the Girbaud jeanswear line has suffered ups and downs in the U.S. market. With its first licensee, V.F. Corporation, the Girbaud brand reached an estimated $250 million in annual volume in 1992, but after a too-quick expansion and overexposure, sales fell to less than a tenth of its previous high. In 1997 the men’s license was transferred to a new manufacturer, I.C. Isaacs & Company, which added the women’s license a year later. Isaacs struggled financially in the late 1990s and early 2000s, leading it to shed some of its brands, but the Girbaud line has remained a bright spot.

Women’s clothing is seen as a business segment with significant growth potential in the U.S., where it accounts for between 15 percent and 20 percent of sales volume for the Girbaud lines, compared to about 70 percent in Europe. In general, Isaacs is working to limit distribution in order to prevent the too-fast growth that occurred in the early and mid-1990s.

The Girbauds enjoy breaking away from what other designers are doing in an attempt to create, rather than follow, fashion trends. Their designs always emphasize utility but can be far out of the mainstream in terms of style. As François told Women’s Wear Daily (14 December 2000), “Our work is sometimes a little crazy—sometimes we are on the bull’s-eye of fashion and sometimes we are not.”

—Richard Martin; updated by Karen Raugust

GIOMBELLI, Arnoldo and Donatella

See GENNY SpA

GIVENCHY, Hubert de

French designer

Born: Hubert James Marcel Taffin de Givenchy, in Beauvais, 21 February 1927. Education: Studied at the Collège Félix-Fauré, Beauvais and Montalembert; École Nationale Supérieure des Beaux Arts, Paris; Faculty of Law, University of Paris. Career: Worked in Paris for Lucien Lelong, 1945–46; for Piguet, 1946–48; for Jacques Fath, 1948–49; for Schiaparelli, 1949–51; established Maison Givenchy, 1952; president, Société Givenchy Couture and Société des Parfums Givenchy, from 1954; sold company to LVMH, 1988; presented last show and retired, 1995; John Galliano hired as house designer, 1995; replaced by Alexander McQueen, 1996; Hong Kong flagship opened, 1999; opened new Paris showroom, 2000; Julien Macdonald signed as artistic director, 2001; fragrances include De, 1957; L’Interdit, 1957; Givenchy III, 1970; L’Eau de Givenchy, 1980; Vetyver; Ysatis, 1984; Xeryus, 1986; Amarige, 1991; Fleur d’Interdit, 1994; Organza, 1996; Amarige Extravagance, 1998; Hot Couture, 2000. Exhibitions: Givenchy: 30 Years, Fashion Institute of Technology, New York, 1982; Givenchy: 40 Years of Creation, Palais Galliera, Paris, 1991. Address: 3 avenue George V, 75008 Paris, France. Website: www.givenchy.com.

PUBLICATIONS

On GIVENCHY:

Books

Lynam, Ruth, ed., Paris Fashion: The Great Designers and Their Creations, London, 1972.

There is truth to this proposition, yet it also is unlikely that these two designers who began as retailers are only pursuing personal desires. The casual clothing they have created is imbued with heritage, even if this legacy is working clothing, brought to the present in technical and even futuristic ways. In the evident conceptualism of their clothing (and in their bridge lines), they have expanded the market of casual clothing beyond the young, so their clothes are as appropriate to the market for persons in their 30s and 40s as they are to the primary market for jeans of teens or in their 20s.

The Girbauds face many competitors in stylish casual wear for the young; they command the market for an abiding casual style for an older market, which has been increasing. In a July 1986 article, the California Apparel News reported, “In an industry where fashion changes with each season, the Girbauds’ clothes have kept the image of comfort while growing in style and versatility to become ‘concept dressing’.”

Innovation has remained a keystone of the Girbauds’ line each season. Their fall 2001 collection combined futuristic and prairie touches, which, according to Women’s Wear Daily (WWD), unexpectedly worked well together. Although both WWD and the Daily News Record commented on the Girbauds’ relative conservatism and simplicity in this collection, they noted the inclusion of items more typical of their work, such as down-filled shirts and navy boiled-wool jackets with exposed seams in orange. These nicely complemented the simpler direction in their jeanswear, critics said.

François Girbaud expressed his frustration with the retro trends in jeanswear design at the turn of the century. He told WWD in a December 2000 interview, “I do not believe in that 1970s look. It is like opening up a book about the ’70s and taking something from it—we already did that when we were there.”

Fabric innovation, of which the Girbauds were always proponents, has continued with projects such as Blue Eternal, a treated denim that holds its color after multiple trips to the laundry, as well as the development of a detergent to revive denim. In their designs, the Girbauds have often used synthetic fibers to emulate natural fibers—sometimes in combination with actual natural fibers—resulting in more flexibility of design. Synthetics, for example, can be fused or heated and not just saddle-stitched.

In the late 1990s and early 2000s, the Girbauds’ designs were emblematic of “utilitarian chic.” Shirts and jeans featured many pockets and were made of wrinkle-resistant fabrics or were permanently wrinkled. An example of the latter was a vest twisted to look like a Sharpei’s skin, as described by the Philippine publication Business World in November 2000. The Freedom cargo pant featured pockets for cell phones, personal digital assistants (PDAs), and pagers; an anorak had a front zipper allowing for a baby carrier; a utility bag with pockets was sold under the Denim Tool Belt brand.

According to the Daily News Record in June 2000, one of the Girbauds’ bestsellers is the shuttle, a carpenter pant with Velcro straps. Popular basic items include Brand X jeans with crisscross hip stitching and the Cowboy, which features a twist at the top of the front pocket, making it easier to insert and remove items. Complementing these basics are the Girbauds’ newer, more experimental items, which include a stretch gabardine and nylon “climbing” pant with a belt buckle that the wearer can lock with a plastic key. Additionally, their European Sporcity brand serves as their couture sportswear line on the Continent.

From a business point of view, the Girbaud jeanswear line has suffered ups and downs in the U.S. market. With its first licensee, V.F. Corporation, the Girbaud brand reached an estimated $250 million in annual volume in 1992, but after a too-quick expansion and overexposure, sales fell to less than a tenth of its previous high. In 1997 the men’s license was transferred to a new manufacturer, I.C. Isaacs & Company, which added the women’s license a year later. Isaacs struggled financially in the late 1990s and early 2000s, leading it to shed some of its brands, but the Girbaud line has remained a bright spot.

Women’s clothing is seen as a business segment with significant growth potential in the U.S., where it accounts for between 15 percent and 20 percent of sales volume for the Girbaud lines, compared to about 70 percent in Europe. In general, Isaacs is working to limit distribution in order to prevent the too-fast growth that occurred in the early and mid-1990s.

The Girbauds enjoy breaking away from what other designers are doing in an attempt to create, rather than follow, fashion trends. Their designs always emphasize utility but can be far out of the mainstream in terms of style. As François told Women’s Wear Daily (14 December 2000), “Our work is sometimes a little crazy—sometimes we are on the bull’s-eye of fashion and sometimes we are not.”

—Richard Martin; updated by Karen Raugust

GIOMBELLI, Arnoldo and Donatella

See GENNY SpA

GIVENCHY, Hubert de

French designer

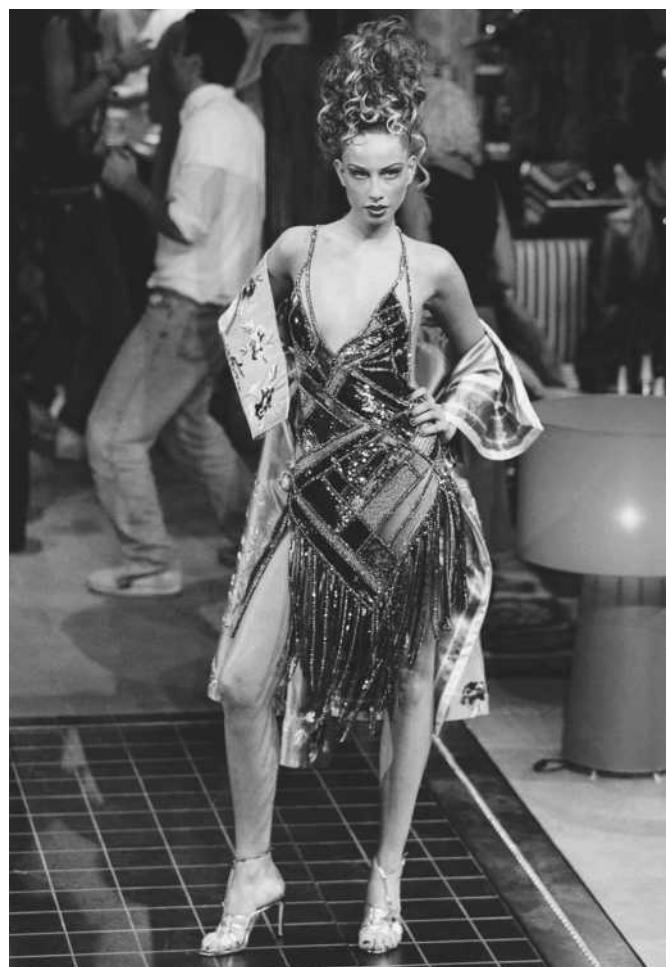

Born: Hubert James Marcel Taffin de Givenchy, in Beauvais, 21 February 1927. Education: Studied at the Collège Félix-Fauré, Beauvais and Montalembert; École Nationale Supérieure des Beaux Arts, Paris; Faculty of Law, University of Paris. Career: Worked in Paris for Lucien Lelong, 1945–46; for Piguet, 1946–48; for Jacques Fath, 1948–49; for Schiaparelli, 1949–51; established Maison Givenchy, 1952; president, Société Givenchy Couture and Société des Parfums Givenchy, from 1954; sold company to LVMH, 1988; presented last show and retired, 1995; John Galliano hired as house designer, 1995; replaced by Alexander McQueen, 1996; Hong Kong flagship opened, 1999; opened new Paris showroom, 2000; Julien Macdonald signed as artistic director, 2001; fragrances include De, 1957; L’Interdit, 1957; Givenchy III, 1970; L’Eau de Givenchy, 1980; Vetyver; Ysatis, 1984; Xeryus, 1986; Amarige, 1991; Fleur d’Interdit, 1994; Organza, 1996; Amarige Extravagance, 1998; Hot Couture, 2000. Exhibitions: Givenchy: 30 Years, Fashion Institute of Technology, New York, 1982; Givenchy: 40 Years of Creation, Palais Galliera, Paris, 1991. Address: 3 avenue George V, 75008 Paris, France. Website: www.givenchy.com.

PUBLICATIONS

On GIVENCHY:

Books

Lynam, Ruth, ed., Paris Fashion: The Great Designers and Their Creations, London, 1972.

Hubert de Givenchy, fall/winter 2000–01 haute couture collection: spangled decollete dress designed by Alexander McQueen. © AFP/CORBIS.

Fashion Institute of Technology, Givenchy: 30 Years [exhibition catalogue], New York, 1982.

Milbank, Caroline Rennolds, Couture: The Great Designers, New York, 1985.

Leese, Elizabeth, Costume Design in the Movies, New York, 1991. Givenchy: 40 Years of Creation [exhibition catalogue], with texts by Catherine Join-Dieterle, Susan Train and Marie-Jose Lepicard, Paris, 1991.

Martin, Richard, and Harold Koda, Bloom, New York, 1995.

Mainiece, Violeta, Apropos Givenchy, Paris, 1998.

Mohry, Françoise, The Givenchy Style, Paris, 1998.

Articles

“Givenchy: 30 ans de couture,” in Textile Suisse (Lausanne), April 1982.

“Givenchy Bucol,” in Vogue (Paris), February 1985.

Arroyuelo, Javier, “La haute couture: Givenchy,” in Vogue (Paris), March 1985.

“Le point sur les collections: Givenchy,” in L’Officiel (Paris), September 1986.

- Menkes, Suzy, “Strong Chanel Holds Up Couture’s Falling Walls,” in the International Herald Tribune (Paris), 21 March 1995.
- Denbigh, Dorie, “The Muse and the Master (Audrey Hepburn and Fashion Designer Hubert de Givenchy),” in Time, 17 April 1995.
- “Moving Day in Paris: It Was an Emotional Farewell to Givenchy...,” in WWD, 12 July 1995.
- Laushway, Esther, “Givenchy to Galliano,” in Europe, October 1995.
- Min, Janet, “A Cut Above,” in People, 15 January 1996.
- “Givenchy: The Lady and the Tramp,” in WWD, 13 March 1997.
- Singer, Natasha, “Comrade McQueen Takes Moscow,” in WWD, 10 December 1997.
- Daswani, Khavita, “Givenchy Continues to Conquer Asia,” in DNR, 24 November 1999.
- Weisman, Katherine, “Shaking Things Up at Givenchy,” in WWD, 10 January 2000.
- Naughton, Julie, “Givenchy: The Fashion of Fragrance,” in WWD, 22 September 2000.
- Givhan, Robin, “Givenchy’s Loss, Gucci’s Gain; Designer Alexander McQueen Leaves LVMH,” in the Washington Post, 5 December 2000.
- Socha, Miles, “Givenchy Cancels Big Show,” in WWD, 19 January 2001.
- Menkes, Suzy, “Welsh Wizard Julien Macdonald Takes Over at Givenchy,” in the International Hearld Tribune, 15 March 2001.
- Socha, Miles, “Julien de Givenchy,” in WWD, 16 March 2001.
- “Grace Note, Club Gear and Futurism—Alexander McQueen Said a Graceful Farewell to Givenchy,” in WWD, 19 March 2001.
- Socha, Miles, “Givenchy’s Clean Slate: Restoring the Elegance to a Venerable House,” in WWD, 5 July 2001.
- Frankel, Susannah, “In the Shadow of Greatness,” in the Indepedent, 15 August 2001.

* * *

In 1992 Hubert de Givenchy celebrated his 40th anniversary as a couturier. Givenchy chose his vocation at the age of ten, and as a youngster admired the designs of Elsa Schiaparelli and Madame Grès. Later, after stints with Jacques Fath, Robert Piguet, and Lucien Lelong, he spent four years working for Schiaparelli, during which he designed the clothes sold in her boutique, many of them separates, an American idea new to Paris in the early 1950s, for which Givenchy gained a following.

Although he is now appropriately acclaimed as a classicist and traditionalist, it was as an enfant terrible of sorts that Givenchy burst upon the couture scene in 1952, just weeks before his 25th birthday. He had a novel collection based on separates, in which even eveningwear was conceptualized as a series of interchangeable pieces. Also noteworthy in this first collection was his generous use of white cotton shirting, which had an economic as well as an aesthetic rationale: the shirting was as inexpensive as it was fresh-looking. The Bettina blouse Givenchy used in later years as his signature was part of this cotton group, and it has reappeared on and off in more simplified and refined incarnations.

Again and again in Givenchy’s early years as a couturier, his designs appealed to young women, and the most famous of them was Audrey Hepburn, the actress whose rise to fame paralleled his own. Givenchy created the clothes worn by Hepburn in several of her most beloved roles, starting with Sabrina (1954) for which Edith Head won the Oscar for costume design and Givenchy received no credit at all. Although Head designed some of Hepburn’s Sabrina wardrobe, the Audrey Hepburn, with William Holden, in a publicity still from the film Sabrina (1954) wearing a gown designed by Hubert de Givenchy.

© Bettmann/CORBIS.

Hubert de Givenchy being applauded by his models at the last show before his retirement, the spring/summer 1996 ready-to-wear collection.
© AP/Wide World Photos.

very soigné black tailleur and hat in which Sabrina returned from Paris, and the strapless white organdie gown embroidered with black and white flowers (which was the envy of every young woman who saw the film), were both from Givenchy's collection.

Givenchy's designs were the clothes that transformed Hepburn from charming gamine to paragon of chic sophistication. Similar transformations were at the heart of Love in the Afternoon (1957), Funny Face (1957), and Breakfast at Tiffany's (1961). By 1963, when Charade appeared, the gamine had finally grown into the sophisticate, and "the world's youngest couturier" had become the most elegant of classical couturiers. Hepburn remained Givenchy's muse for almost 40 years, the quintessential Givenchy client, even flying into Paris from Switzerland to sit in the front row for his collections until shortly before her death.

Givenchy shared the ideal of creating a perfect, simple dress from a single line with his idol, Balenciaga. When the two men finally met by accident in 1953, they developed a relationship that was perhaps unique in the annals of couture, with Balenciaga giving Givenchy unprecedented access not only to his sketches, but also to his fittings and his workrooms. Starting in 1959, after Givenchy moved to Avenue George V, almost across the street from Balenciaga, they conferred daily, critiquing each other's sketches and collections. Their aesthetic affinity was such that when Balenciaga closed his couture salon, he referred his most valued clients to Givenchy.

Because of the emphasis on line rather than decoration, Givenchy's designs were easy to adapt, endearing him to the many American manufacturers who interpreted them. Givenchy himself helped to make his clothes accessible to a much wider market in the early prelicensing years, designing junior sportswear to be made by American manufacturers with American fabrics, for Seventeen and Glamour magazines. The caption for Glamour's December 1955 cover, featuring a Givenchy sweater, spoke directly to the appeal of his designs: "The Givenchy marks young chic...meant for long, lean people in pipestem skirts...for when they want to look casual in a worldly way."

In the 1990s Givenchy continued designing fashions that make a woman look beautiful; his œuvre bespeaks restraint and refinement, with gradual transitions from one season and style to the next. Although Givenchy still produced cotton separates, including some with Matisse-inspired patterns in his 40th anniversary collection, his designs have matured along with his original clientèle. Givenchy's creations begin with the fabric; his forte is choosing or developing Europe's most luxurious yet tasteful fabrics and embroideries in an expansive range of colors. From these he creates exquisite couture clothes complementing the lifestyles of a clientèle which has included several of the world's most elegant women. He is known for deceptively simple day dresses, superbly tailored suits, coats that are marvels of line and volume, sumptuous cocktail dresses or suits, extravagant evening dresses that are nevertheless eminently wearable, and hats revealing his sense of whimsy and fantasy.

Givenchy showed his last couture collection in July 1995, amid a crowd of fashion's most respected and well-known designers, all present to pay homage to the departing master. Nudged out of his own empire by LVMH, who brought in wild-child John Galliano, Givenchy was not bowed. "You have to know when to stop," he was quoted in People magazine, "that's wisdom." After leaving his design house, Givenchy worked on an exhibit about Balenciaga, and had been commissioned to help restore the magnificent gardens of Versailles.

Givenchy by Galliano was not a success, and the British badboy was abruptly replaced by Alexander McQueen. Though McQueen managed to last five years, until late 2000, he was unhappy and his designs often did not fit Givenchy any better than Galliano's had. McQueen's last hurrah with Givenchy, however, was a brilliant success. Women's Wear Daily (19 March 2001) commented, "McQueen passed on his final chance to throw a fashion tantrum chez Givenchy. Instead, he showed beautiful, elegant clothes... McQueen's work is ultimately about tailoring, and he showed one great look after another...."

Welshman Julien Macdonald was the next to come through Givenchy's revolving door, hired in 2001 as McQueen took up with LVMH rival Gucci, who had invested in McQueen's independent design label. Macdonald, a professed admirer of Givenchy, poured over archival designs as inspiration for his first showing in July 2001. Macdonald described his collection to Women's Wear Daily (5 July 2001) as "Victorian dressing interpreted through the eyes of Helmut Newton." More importantly perhaps for the venerable house was Macdonald's stance as pupil, "I'm listening to everybody... people have been here for 20 years. I can listen to them and I can learn. Givenchy has huge potential; if it's handled right, it could be one of the biggest fashion brands."

—Arlene C. Cooper; updated by Nelly Rhodes

GODLEY, Georgina

British designer

Born: London, 11 April 1955. Education: Putney High School, London; Thames Valley Grammar School, London; Wimbledon School of Art; Brighton Polytechnic; Chelsea School of Art. Family: Married Sebastian Conran, 1988; sons: Samuel, Maximillian. Career: Worked as art restorer, illustrator, mannequin maker, freelance designer, late 1970s; designer, Brown's, London and Paris, 1979–80; designer/partner, with Scott Crolla, Crolla menswear boutique, London, 1980–85; women's collection added, 1984; director/sole designer, Georgina Godley Ltd., with own label collections, from 1986; presently lecturer, St. Martin's School of Art and School of Fashion and Textiles; member, British Fashion Council Designer Committee. Collections: Victoria and Albert Museum, London; Bath Costume

Museum, Bath, England. Address: 42 Bassett Road, London W10 6JL, England.

PUBLICATIONS

On GODLEY:

Books

McDermott, Catherine, Street Style: British Design in the 1980s (exhibition catalogue), London 1987.

De La Haye, Amy, The Cutting Edge: Fifty Years of British Fashion, 1947–1997, New York, 1997.

Debrett's People of Today, London, 2001.

Articles

"Cue: Talking to New Designers," in Vogue (London), November 1981.

"Scott Crolla & Georgina Godley of Crolla," in Vogue (London), November 1982.

Buckley, Richard, "Crolla's Counter Couture," in the magazine supplement to DNR, January 1985.

Brampton, Sally, "Fashion Wallahs," in Vanity Fair (London), April 1985.

Reed, Paula, "Spirit of Godleyness," in the Sunday Correspondent (London), 8 October 1989.

Sharkey, Alix, "On the Trail of the Elusive 'X' Factor," in The Guardian (London), 30 April 1990.

Stead, Deborah, "Georgina Godley," in the New York Times, 2 July 1990.

MacSweeney, Eve, "London After Dark," in Harper's Bazaar (New York), November 1990.

"Architecture: A New Twist in Fashion," in the Independent, 27 November 1998.

"Is Fashion Art?" in the Irish Times, 8 July 1999.

"Dark, Sexy & Cool," in ART 4D, September 2000.

"Reaching the Other Side," in Cabinet Maker, 20 October 2000.

"Georgina Godley" online at the Fashion Page, www.fashionz.co.uk, 9 June 2001.

* * *

High-minded, serious, and intellectual in her approach to fashion design, Georgina Godley began her fashion career in the early 1980s in partnership with designer Scott Crolla. They emerged in a period when most of the important designers were making unisex, androgynous clothing. Gender barriers were being broken down, as the difference between clothing for men and women seemed old-fashioned and no longer relevant. The media had latched on to this trend with its enthusiastic hyping of role swapping pop stars like Annie Lennox and trendy male/female design partnerships like Bodysuit and Richmond/Cornejo, who were making clothes that anybody could wear. In opposition Georgina Godley returned to the idea of womanliness and the female form. She used floral-patterned chintz or sections of transparent gauze over breasts and referred to female fertility symbols in her advertising, such as a bridal figure gazing adoringly at the male phallus. She also plundered a traditional female submissiveness and medieval imagery in her research.

In many ways Godley has worked against fashion but, rather than taking an aggressively feminist antifashion stance, she has been aesthetic in her reaction. Her first collection without Crolla was designs have matured along with his original clientèle. Givenchy's creations begin with the fabric; his forte is choosing or developing Europe's most luxurious yet tasteful fabrics and embroideries in an expansive range of colors. From these he creates exquisite couture clothes complementing the lifestyles of a clientèle which has included several of the world's most elegant women. He is known for deceptively simple day dresses, superbly tailored suits, coats that are marvels of line and volume, sumptuous cocktail dresses or suits, extravagant evening dresses that are nevertheless eminently wearable, and hats revealing his sense of whimsy and fantasy.

Givenchy showed his last couture collection in July 1995, amid a crowd of fashion's most respected and well-known designers, all present to pay homage to the departing master. Nudged out of his own empire by LVMH, who brought in wild-child John Galliano, Givenchy was not bowed. "You have to know when to stop," he was quoted in People magazine, "that's wisdom." After leaving his design house, Givenchy worked on an exhibit about Balenciaga, and had been commissioned to help restore the magnificent gardens of Versailles.

Givenchy by Galliano was not a success, and the British badboy was abruptly replaced by Alexander McQueen. Though McQueen managed to last five years, until late 2000, he was unhappy and his designs often did not fit Givenchy any better than Galliano's had. McQueen's last hurrah with Givenchy, however, was a brilliant success. Women's Wear Daily (19 March 2001) commented, "McQueen passed on his final chance to throw a fashion tantrum chez Givenchy. Instead, he showed beautiful, elegant clothes... McQueen's work is ultimately about tailoring, and he showed one great look after another...."

Welshman Julien Macdonald was the next to come through Givenchy's revolving door, hired in 2001 as McQueen took up with LVMH rival Gucci, who had invested in McQueen's independent design label. Macdonald, a professed admirer of Givenchy, poured over archival designs as inspiration for his first showing in July 2001. Macdonald described his collection to Women's Wear Daily (5 July 2001) as "Victorian dressing interpreted through the eyes of Helmut Newton." More importantly perhaps for the venerable house was Macdonald's stance as pupil, "I'm listening to everybody... people have been here for 20 years. I can listen to them and I can learn. Givenchy has huge potential; if it's handled right, it could be one of the biggest fashion brands."

—Arlene C. Cooper; updated by Nelly Rhodes

GODLEY, Georgina

British designer

Born: London, 11 April 1955. Education: Putney High School, London; Thames Valley Grammar School, London; Wimbledon School of Art; Brighton Polytechnic; Chelsea School of Art. Family: Married Sebastian Conran, 1988; sons: Samuel, Maximillian. Career: Worked as art restorer, illustrator, mannequin maker, freelance designer, late 1970s; designer, Brown's, London and Paris, 1979–80; designer/partner, with Scott Crolla, Crolla menswear boutique, London, 1980–85; women's collection added, 1984; director/sole designer, Georgina Godley Ltd., with own label collections, from 1986; presently lecturer, St. Martin's School of Art and School of Fashion and Textiles; member, British Fashion Council Designer Committee. Collections: Victoria and Albert Museum, London; Bath Costume

Museum, Bath, England. Address: 42 Bassett Road, London W10 6JL, England.

PUBLICATIONS

On GODLEY:

Books

McDermott, Catherine, Street Style: British Design in the 1980s (exhibition catalogue), London 1987.

De La Haye, Amy, The Cutting Edge: Fifty Years of British Fashion, 1947–1997, New York, 1997.

Debrett's People of Today, London, 2001.

Articles

"Cue: Talking to New Designers," in Vogue (London), November 1981.

"Scott Crolla & Georgina Godley of Crolla," in Vogue (London), November 1982.

Buckley, Richard, "Crolla's Counter Couture," in the magazine supplement to DNR, January 1985.

Brampton, Sally, "Fashion Wallahs," in Vanity Fair (London), April 1985.

Reed, Paula, "Spirit of Godleyness," in the Sunday Correspondent (London), 8 October 1989.

Sharkey, Alix, "On the Trail of the Elusive 'X' Factor," in The Guardian (London), 30 April 1990.

Stead, Deborah, "Georgina Godley," in the New York Times, 2 July 1990.

MacSweeney, Eve, "London After Dark," in Harper's Bazaar (New York), November 1990.

"Architecture: A New Twist in Fashion," in the Independent, 27 November 1998.

"Is Fashion Art?" in the Irish Times, 8 July 1999.

"Dark, Sexy & Cool," in ART 4D, September 2000.

"Reaching the Other Side," in Cabinet Maker, 20 October 2000.

"Georgina Godley" online at the Fashion Page, www.fashionz.co.uk, 9 June 2001.

* * *

High-minded, serious, and intellectual in her approach to fashion design, Georgina Godley began her fashion career in the early 1980s in partnership with designer Scott Crolla. They emerged in a period when most of the important designers were making unisex, androgynous clothing. Gender barriers were being broken down, as the difference between clothing for men and women seemed old-fashioned and no longer relevant. The media had latched on to this trend with its enthusiastic hyping of role swapping pop stars like Annie Lennox and trendy male/female design partnerships like Bodysuit and Richmond/Cornejo, who were making clothes that anybody could wear. In opposition Georgina Godley returned to the idea of womanliness and the female form. She used floral-patterned chintz or sections of transparent gauze over breasts and referred to female fertility symbols in her advertising, such as a bridal figure gazing adoringly at the male phallus. She also plundered a traditional female submissiveness and medieval imagery in her research.

In many ways Godley has worked against fashion but, rather than taking an aggressively feminist antifashion stance, she has been aesthetic in her reaction. Her first collection without Crolla was entitled Body and Soul. Featuring a body dress, a soul dress, and a muscle dress, the collection celebrated the female form by exaggerating its proportions. Using fabric to drape, pad, pull, and stretch over the body, the results were often distortive and faintly erotic. The aim was simply to exemplify the beauty of a woman's body.

Never a commercial designer, Godley is primitive yet sophisticated: primitive in that she emphasizes and magnifies the primary female form; sophisticated in the fact that the result is often desexed by a high seriousness. The clothing is usually impractical, designed to be collected rather than worn: a clinging, thin white cotton jersey dress inset with organza panels for maximum bodily exposure and a curved wire hem; shaped underwear dresses in which elements of corsetry distort curvaceousness; a pregnancy dress, padded to make the wearer look pregnant; a pair of hoof-bottomed trousers; and an infamous wedding dress with cutouts for the breasts.

Godley is similar in context to her contemporary, Azzedine Alaïa, but whereas Alaïa's clothes are erotic and sexy in their contouring of the body, Godley's clothes are womanly. Alaïa's clothes create a curvaceous shape by reacting with the body; Godley's often have their exaggerated shapes constructed onto the clothes.

Whether Godley can be termed a fashion designer is arguable because her clothes have often reacted against contemporary trends. Her work is designed for the connoisseur of specialist clothing, rather than mass public acceptance.

When Tom Dixon began directing design at Habitat, a retail chain, in 1998, he formed a team of hot new stylists, including Mathew Hillon, Ross Menuez, and Godley. Their immediate focus was the "Dark & Sexy Home," an application of art to domestics. Early in 2000, Staffordshire University reported on Godley's switch from fashion design for the likes of Paul Smith and Jasper and Joseph Conran to ceramics. As head of home accessories for Habitat, she critiqued crafts and design at the MA Ceramics Show 2000 in terms of contribution to a style-driven, label-conscious market. In her opinion, "Today's buying public is hungry for quality and design, they now want to invest in something that's good and special."

Key to her career shift is the challenge of British excellence and its global impact on design. Godley noted that she and other artisans were influenced by Jonathan Ive's transformation of Apple computers with a unique blend of function and innovation. She lauded student efforts with the comment that "Almost every item I've seen could go straight into production."

—Kevin Almond; updated by Mary Ellen Snodgrass

GRÈS, Madame

French designer

Born: Germain "Alix" Barton in Paris, 30 November 1903. Education: Studied painting and sculpture, Paris. Family: Married Serge Czerefkov, late 1930s; daughter: Anne. Career: Served three-month apprenticeship with Premet, Paris, 1930; made and sold toiles using the name Alix Barton, Paris, 1930s; designer, Maison Alix (not her own house), 1934–40; sold rights to the name Alix and adopted Grès, from husband's surname, 1940; director, Grès Couture, from 1942; accessory line introduced, 1976; ready-to-wear line introduced, 1980; retired, 1988; perfumes include Cabochard, 1959, Grès pour Homme, 1965, Qui Pro Quo, 1976, Eau de Grès, 1980, Alix, 1981, Grès Nonsieu, 1982, and Cabotine de Grès, 1990. Exhibition: Madame

Grès, Metropolitan Museum of Art, New York, 1994. Awards: Named Chevalier de la Légion d'Honneur, 1947; Dé d'Or award, 1976; New York University Creative Leadership in the Arts award, 1978. Died: 24 November 1993, in the South of France (not made public until December 1994).

PUBLICATIONS

On GRÈS:

Books

Perkins, Alice K., Paris Couturiers and Milliners, New York, 1949. Lynam, Ruth, editor, Couture: An Illustrated History of the Great Paris Designers and Their Creations, New York, 1972.

Milbank, Caroline Rennolds, Couture: The Great Designers, New York, 1985.

Guillen, Pierre-Yves, and Claude, Jacqueline, The Golden Thimble: French Haute Couture, Paris, 1990.

Steele, Valerie, Women of Fashion: Twentieth-Century Designers, New York, 1991.

Petit Précis de Mode: Collections du Musée de la Mode, Marseilles, 1992.

Martin, Richard, and Harold Koda, Madame Grès, Metropolitan Museum of Art (exhibition catalogue), New York, 1994.

Stegemeyer, Anne, Who's Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.

Articles

"Grès Grey Eminence," in Realities (San José, California), July 1965.

"Mme. Grès," in Current Biography (New York), January 1980.

"Mme. Grès, Hélène de Paris," in Jardin des Modes (Paris), December/January 1980–81.

Villiers le Moy, Pascale, "The Timeless Fashions of Madame Grès," in Connoisseur, August 1982.

Sciaky, Françoise, "Lovely Grès," in American Fabrics and Fashions (New York), No. 128, 1983.

"Mme. Grès for the People," in Connoisseur, January 1985.

Cooper, Arlene, "How Madame Grès Sculpts with Fabric," in Threads (Newtown, Connecticut), April/May 1987.

Aillaud, Charlotte, "Timeless Style of the Parisian Couturiere," in Architectural Digest, September 1988.

Bernasconi, Silvana, "Madame Grès," in Vogue (Italy), March 1994.

"The Ionic Woman," in Harper's Bazaar (New York), September 1994.

Auchincloss, Eve, "Eminence Grès," in Town & Country (New York), September 1994.

"New York: Grès Gardens," in WWD, 1 November 1994.

Benaim, Laurence, "La Mort confisquée de Madame Grès," in Le Monde (Paris), 13 December 1994.

Deeny, Godfrey, "The Strange, Secret Death of Madame Grès," in WWD, 14 December 1994.

Spindler, Amy M., "Surprising the Fashion World, to the Last," in the New York Times, 14 December 1994.

Mulvagh, Jane, "Grès Eminence," in Vogue (London), May 1995.

* * *

According to many who attended, the Madame Grès showings were exquisite anguish. With alterations up to the last minute by the entitled Body and Soul. Featuring a body dress, a soul dress, and a muscle dress, the collection celebrated the female form by exaggerating its proportions. Using fabric to drape, pad, pull, and stretch over the body, the results were often distortive and faintly erotic. The aim was simply to exemplify the beauty of a woman's body.

Never a commercial designer, Godley is primitive yet sophisticated: primitive in that she emphasizes and magnifies the primary female form; sophisticated in the fact that the result is often desexed by a high seriousness. The clothing is usually impractical, designed to be collected rather than worn: a clinging, thin white cotton jersey dress inset with organza panels for maximum bodily exposure and a curved wire hem; shaped underwear dresses in which elements of corsetry distort curvaceousness; a pregnancy dress, padded to make the wearer look pregnant; a pair of hoof-bottomed trousers; and an infamous wedding dress with cutouts for the breasts.

Godley is similar in context to her contemporary, Azzedine Alaïa, but whereas Alaïa's clothes are erotic and sexy in their contouring of the body, Godley's clothes are womanly. Alaïa's clothes create a curvaceous shape by reacting with the body; Godley's often have their exaggerated shapes constructed onto the clothes.

Whether Godley can be termed a fashion designer is arguable because her clothes have often reacted against contemporary trends. Her work is designed for the connoisseur of specialist clothing, rather than mass public acceptance.

When Tom Dixon began directing design at Habitat, a retail chain, in 1998, he formed a team of hot new stylists, including Mathew Hillon, Ross Menuez, and Godley. Their immediate focus was the "Dark & Sexy Home," an application of art to domestics. Early in 2000, Staffordshire University reported on Godley's switch from fashion design for the likes of Paul Smith and Jasper and Joseph Conran to ceramics. As head of home accessories for Habitat, she critiqued crafts and design at the MA Ceramics Show 2000 in terms of contribution to a style-driven, label-conscious market. In her opinion, "Today's buying public is hungry for quality and design, they now want to invest in something that's good and special."

Key to her career shift is the challenge of British excellence and its global impact on design. Godley noted that she and other artisans were influenced by Jonathan Ive's transformation of Apple computers with a unique blend of function and innovation. She lauded student efforts with the comment that "Almost every item I've seen could go straight into production."

—Kevin Almond; updated by Mary Ellen Snodgrass

GRÈS, Madame

French designer

Born: Germain "Alix" Barton in Paris, 30 November 1903. Education: Studied painting and sculpture, Paris. Family: Married Serge Czerefkov, late 1930s; daughter: Anne. Career: Served three-month apprenticeship with Premet, Paris, 1930; made and sold toiles using the name Alix Barton, Paris, 1930s; designer, Maison Alix (not her own house), 1934–40; sold rights to the name Alix and adopted Grès, from husband's surname, 1940; director, Grès Couture, from 1942; accessory line introduced, 1976; ready-to-wear line introduced, 1980; retired, 1988; perfumes include Cabochard, 1959, Grès pour Homme, 1965, Qui Pro Quo, 1976, Eau de Grès, 1980, Alix, 1981, Grès Nonsieu, 1982, and Cabotine de Grès, 1990. Exhibition: Madame

Grès, Metropolitan Museum of Art, New York, 1994. Awards: Named Chevalier de la Légion d'Honneur, 1947; Dé d'Or award, 1976; New York University Creative Leadership in the Arts award, 1978. Died: 24 November 1993, in the South of France (not made public until December 1994).

PUBLICATIONS

On GRÈS:

Books

Perkins, Alice K., Paris Couturiers and Milliners, New York, 1949. Lynam, Ruth, editor, Couture: An Illustrated History of the Great Paris Designers and Their Creations, New York, 1972.

Milbank, Caroline Rennolds, Couture: The Great Designers, New York, 1985.

Guillen, Pierre-Yves, and Claude, Jacqueline, The Golden Thimble: French Haute Couture, Paris, 1990.

Steele, Valerie, Women of Fashion: Twentieth-Century Designers, New York, 1991.

Petit Précis de Mode: Collections du Musée de la Mode, Marseilles, 1992.

Martin, Richard, and Harold Koda, Madame Grès, Metropolitan Museum of Art (exhibition catalogue), New York, 1994.

Stegemeyer, Anne, Who's Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.

Articles

"Grès Grey Eminence," in Realities (San José, California), July 1965.

"Mme. Grès," in Current Biography (New York), January 1980.

"Mme. Grès, Hélène de Paris," in Jardin des Modes (Paris), December/January 1980–81.

Villiers le Moy, Pascale, "The Timeless Fashions of Madame Grès," in Connoisseur, August 1982.

Sciaky, Françoise, "Lovely Grès," in American Fabrics and Fashions (New York), No. 128, 1983.

"Mme. Grès for the People," in Connoisseur, January 1985.

Cooper, Arlene, "How Madame Grès Sculpts with Fabric," in Threads (Newtown, Connecticut), April/May 1987.

Aillaud, Charlotte, "Timeless Style of the Parisian Couturiere," in Architectural Digest, September 1988.

Bernasconi, Silvana, "Madame Grès," in Vogue (Italy), March 1994.

"The Ionic Woman," in Harper's Bazaar (New York), September 1994.

Auchincloss, Eve, "Eminence Grès," in Town & Country (New York), September 1994.

"New York: Grès Gardens," in WWD, 1 November 1994.

Benaim, Laurence, "La Mort confisquée de Madame Grès," in Le Monde (Paris), 13 December 1994.

Deeny, Godfrey, "The Strange, Secret Death of Madame Grès," in WWD, 14 December 1994.

Spindler, Amy M., "Surprising the Fashion World, to the Last," in the New York Times, 14 December 1994.

Mulvagh, Jane, "Grès Eminence," in Vogue (London), May 1995.

* * *

According to many who attended, the Madame Grès showings were exquisite anguish. With alterations up to the last minute by the designer, models would be delayed, garments could appear trailing strings, and long intervals might occur between the display of individual garments. At the very end, a flurry of models in flowing draped jersey evening dresses would come out on the runway in rapid succession, an abrupt finale to a halting presentation. Known for designing with the immediacy of draping with cloth, Grès was the self-committed and consummate artist, never the agreeable couturière. Her white salon bespoke her austerity in engineering and her clarity in grace.

Design by Madame Grès, 1946. © Genevieve Naylor/CORBIS.

Grès shunned the promotional grace and personal identification of many fashion designers, insisting instead on rigorous attention to the clothing. First a sculptor, Grès depended upon sculptural insight even as she, in her most famous and signature form, brought the Louvre's statue of the Nike of Samothrace to life in clothing form. Grès' draped and pleated silk jerseys flattered the body with the minimalist and rationalist radicalism of 1930s design, but provided a classical serenity as well. The real achievement of the draped dresses was not their idyllic evocation, but their integrity. They were a unified construction, composed of joined fabric panels continuously top to bottom, fullest in the swirling flutes of the skirt, tucked at the waist, elegantly pinched through the bodice, and surmounted at the neckline—often one-shouldered—with the same materials resolved into three-dimensional twists. Grès was creating no mere lookalike to classical statuary, but a characteristically modern enterprise to impart the body within clothing.

Grès, however, was never a one-dress designer. Her 1934 black Cellophane dress with a black-seal-lined cape (photographed by Hoyningen-Heuné) is, as Vogue described, a scarab, but with the cling of bias cut. Following a trip to the Far East in 1936, Grès created a brocaded “Temple of Heaven” dress, inspired by Javanese dancing costumes. Throughout the 1930s, she took inspiration from North Africa and Egypt; in the 1940s, after managing to keep her business alive through most of the war, Grès became interested in tailoring and created some of the most disciplined suit tailoring for daywear in the 1940s and 1950s.

By the 1960s and 1970s, Grès was translating the planarity of regional costume into a simplified origami of flat planes, ingeniously manipulated on the body to achieve a minimalism akin to sportswear. Ironically, she who exemplified the persistence of couture treated the great dress with the modernist lightness of sportswear, and she who held out so long against ready-to-wear turned with a convert’s passion to its possibilities in the 1980s, when she was in her late 80s. The personalizing finesse of a plait or wrap to close or shape a garment was as characteristic of Grès as of Halston or McCordell; her ergodynamics brought fullness to the chest simply by canting sleeves backward so the wearer inevitably created a swelling fullness in the front as arms forced the sleeves forward, creating a pouch of air at the chest.

For evening, Grès practiced a continuous antithesis of body disclosure and hiding the body within cloth. Even the Grecian “slave” dress, as some of the clients called it, seemed to be as bare as possible with alarming apertures to flesh. But the Grès draped dress, despite its fluid exterior, was securely corseted and structured within, allowing for apertures of skins to seem revealing while at the same time giving the wearer the assurance that the dress would not shift on the body. Conversely, more or less unstructured caftans, clinging geometries of cloth, could cover the wearer so completely as to resemble dress of the Islamic world, but in these instances the softness of structure complemented the apparent suppleness.

Never was a Grès garment, whether revealing or concealing, less than enchanting. The slight asymmetry of a wrap determined by one dart, the fall of a suit button to a seaming line, or the wrap of a draped dress to a torque of shaping through the torso, was an invention and an enchantment in Grès’ inventive sculptural vocabulary. History, most notably through photographers such as Hoyningen-Heuné and Willy Maywald, recorded the sensuous skills of Madame Grès chiefly in memorable black-and-white images, but the truth of her achievement came in garden and painterly colors of aubergine, magenta, cerise, and royal blue, along with a spectrum of fertile browns. Her draped Grecian slaves and goddesses were often in a white of neoclassicism, but an optical white that tended, with exposure to light, to yellow over time. Grès’ streamlined architecture of clothing was the pure white of dreaming, of languorous physical beauty, and apparel perfect in comfort and image.

—Richard Martin

GRIFFE, Jacques

French designer

Born: Near Carcassonne, France, in 1917. Education: Apprenticed with local tailor at age 16, later with the dressmaker Mirra, in Toulouse. Military Service: Completed required military service, 1936; served in World War II and was imprisoned for 18 months. Career: Employed at the house of Vionnet, 1936–39; opened own salon in rue Gaillon, 1941; with backing from Robert Perrier, opened Jacques Griffe Evaluation, in rue du Faubourg Saint-Honoré, 1947; contributed styles to Vogue Patterns, 1950–68. Fragrances: Enthusiasme, Grifonnage, and Mistigri. Retired in 1968. Exhibitions: Elégance and Crédit: 1945–1977, Musée de la Mode et du Costume, Palais Galliera, Paris, 1977. Collections: Fashion Institute of Technology, New York; Costume Institute of the Metropolitan Museum of Art, New York; Musée de la Mode et du Costume, Palais Galliera, Paris.

PUBLICATIONS

On GRIFFE:

Books

- Perkins, Alice K., Paris Couturiers and Milliners, New York, 1949.
Bertin, Célia, Haute Couture, Paris, 1956; as Paris à la Mode, New York & London, 1956.
Pickens, Mary Brooks, and Dora Loues Miller, Dressmakers of France, New York, 1956.
Delpierre, Madeleine, Elegance and Creation: 1945–77 (exhibition catalogue), Paris, 1977.
Milbank, Caroline Rennolds, Couture: The Great Designers, New York, 1985.

Articles

- Martin, Richard, “Zeitgeist Becomes Form,” in Artforum, March 1997.

* * *

One of the few designers capable of taking an idea from concept to realization, Jacques Griffe sketched, draped, cut, and sewed. He was taught sewing and encouraged towards haute couture by his mother, who placed him with the local tailor. Although he found the work tedious, he later recognized it as the foundation for perfecting his craft. His skills were expanded when he learned dressmaking at the house of Mirra, and he came to Paris with the proficiency needed for haute couture. His placement at the house of Vionnet exposed him to unique ways of cutting, and the belief that draping cloth would relate to and enhance the female body. He would adapt this philosophy for his own creativity. Temporarily delayed by World War II, during which time he served his country and was taken prisoner, he was prepared to open his own house at war’s end.

Vionnet gave him one of her dolls as encouragement solely to drape new models. Since he was equally able to sketch, he did both. Unlike his mentor, he was more of a colorist. He chose conservative colors—grey, brown, black, and checks in alpaca, wool jersey, crêpe, and broadcloth for suits and coats. Seen in them is the hand of a creative construction, composed of joined fabric panels continuously top to bottom, fullest in the swirling flutes of the skirt, tucked at the waist, elegantly pinched through the bodice, and surmounted at the neckline—often one-shouldered—with the same materials resolved into three-dimensional twists. Grès was creating no mere lookalike to classical statuary, but a characteristically modern enterprise to impart the body within clothing.

Grès, however, was never a one-dress designer. Her 1934 black Cellophane dress with a black-seal-lined cape (photographed by Hoyningen-Heuné) is, as Vogue described, a scarab, but with the cling of bias cut. Following a trip to the Far East in 1936, Grès created a brocaded “Temple of Heaven” dress, inspired by Javanese dancing costumes. Throughout the 1930s, she took inspiration from North Africa and Egypt; in the 1940s, after managing to keep her business alive through most of the war, Grès became interested in tailoring and created some of the most disciplined suit tailoring for daywear in the 1940s and 1950s.

By the 1960s and 1970s, Grès was translating the planarity of regional costume into a simplified origami of flat planes, ingeniously manipulated on the body to achieve a minimalism akin to sportswear. Ironically, she who exemplified the persistence of couture treated the great dress with the modernist lightness of sportswear, and she who held out so long against ready-to-wear turned with a convert’s passion to its possibilities in the 1980s, when she was in her late 80s. The personalizing finesse of a plait or wrap to close or shape a garment was as characteristic of Grès as of Halston or McCordell; her ergodynamics brought fullness to the chest simply by canting sleeves backward so the wearer inevitably created a swelling fullness in the front as arms forced the sleeves forward, creating a pouch of air at the chest.

For evening, Grès practiced a continuous antithesis of body disclosure and hiding the body within cloth. Even the Grecian “slave” dress, as some of the clients called it, seemed to be as bare as possible with alarming apertures to flesh. But the Grès draped dress, despite its fluid exterior, was securely corseted and structured within, allowing for apertures of skins to seem revealing while at the same time giving the wearer the assurance that the dress would not shift on the body. Conversely, more or less unstructured caftans, clinging geometries of cloth, could cover the wearer so completely as to resemble dress of the Islamic world, but in these instances the softness of structure complemented the apparent suppleness.

Never was a Grès garment, whether revealing or concealing, less than enchanting. The slight asymmetry of a wrap determined by one dart, the fall of a suit button to a seaming line, or the wrap of a draped dress to a torque of shaping through the torso, was an invention and an enchantment in Grès’ inventive sculptural vocabulary. History, most notably through photographers such as Hoyningen-Heuné and Willy Maywald, recorded the sensuous skills of Madame Grès chiefly in memorable black-and-white images, but the truth of her achievement came in garden and painterly colors of aubergine, magenta, cerise, and royal blue, along with a spectrum of fertile browns. Her draped Grecian slaves and goddesses were often in a white of neoclassicism, but an optical white that tended, with exposure to light, to yellow over time. Grès’ streamlined architecture of clothing was the pure white of dreaming, of languorous physical beauty, and apparel perfect in comfort and image.

—Richard Martin

GRIFFE, Jacques

French designer

Born: Near Carcassonne, France, in 1917. Education: Apprenticed with local tailor at age 16, later with the dressmaker Mirra, in Toulouse. Military Service: Completed required military service, 1936; served in World War II and was imprisoned for 18 months. Career: Employed at the house of Vionnet, 1936–39; opened own salon in rue Gaillon, 1941; with backing from Robert Perrier, opened Jacques Griffe Evaluation, in rue du Faubourg Saint-Honoré, 1947; contributed styles to Vogue Patterns, 1950–68. Fragrances: Enthusiasme, Grifonnage, and Mistigri. Retired in 1968. Exhibitions: Elégance and Crédit: 1945–1977, Musée de la Mode et du Costume, Palais Galliera, Paris, 1977. Collections: Fashion Institute of Technology, New York; Costume Institute of the Metropolitan Museum of Art, New York; Musée de la Mode et du Costume, Palais Galliera, Paris.

PUBLICATIONS

On GRIFFE:

Books

- Perkins, Alice K., Paris Couturiers and Milliners, New York, 1949.
Bertin, Célia, Haute Couture, Paris, 1956; as Paris à la Mode, New York & London, 1956.
Pickens, Mary Brooks, and Dora Loues Miller, Dressmakers of France, New York, 1956.
Delpierre, Madeleine, Elegance and Creation: 1945–77 (exhibition catalogue), Paris, 1977.
Milbank, Caroline Rennolds, Couture: The Great Designers, New York, 1985.

Articles

- Martin, Richard, “Zeitgeist Becomes Form,” in Artforum, March 1997.

* * *

One of the few designers capable of taking an idea from concept to realization, Jacques Griffe sketched, draped, cut, and sewed. He was taught sewing and encouraged towards haute couture by his mother, who placed him with the local tailor. Although he found the work tedious, he later recognized it as the foundation for perfecting his craft. His skills were expanded when he learned dressmaking at the house of Mirra, and he came to Paris with the proficiency needed for haute couture. His placement at the house of Vionnet exposed him to unique ways of cutting, and the belief that draping cloth would relate to and enhance the female body. He would adapt this philosophy for his own creativity. Temporarily delayed by World War II, during which time he served his country and was taken prisoner, he was prepared to open his own house at war’s end.

Vionnet gave him one of her dolls as encouragement solely to drape new models. Since he was equally able to sketch, he did both. Unlike his mentor, he was more of a colorist. He chose conservative colors—grey, brown, black, and checks in alpaca, wool jersey, crêpe, and broadcloth for suits and coats. Seen in them is the hand of a creative tailor—he was the first to introduce the boxy jacket, tunic, and cone-shaped coat of the 1950s. Aesthetically pleasing lines were imposed by his cut onto darts and seams used for fitting between the waist and shoulders. Decorative curved welt seams ending in an arrow were often used.

His day and afternoon dresses were softer than his suits. Sleeves were often kimono cut; bodices often blouson. Asymmetrical clothing ended in drapes, scarves, or bows at neck or hips. Pleating was used for insets of sunburst panels or for entire dresses. Polka dots were his favorite print. Evening dresses were also soft, supple, and feminine. Colors were pink, mauve, apricot, chartreuse, yellow, bright blue, navy, or black in chiffon, lamé, moiré, faille, satin, tulle, lace, taffeta, velvet, or brocade. High-waisted or camisole bodices had halter, strapless, or shepherdess necklines. Gowns were sheaths, or had extremely elaborate full skirts, floor or ballet length that ended in harem or flounced hem. Skirt decorations were either Shirred, bands graduated in size, repeated swirled ruffles, or petal-like panels of pleating.

Griffe retired in 1968, and though his skill as a designer was second to none, he has, unfortunately, been largely forgotten in the 21st century.

—Betty Kirke; updated by Sydonie Benét

GRUPPO GFT

Italian fashion manufacturer

Founded: Established in Turin, 1887, as Donato Levi e Figli for production of men's off-the-rack clothing. Company History: Company purchased in 1925 by the Rivetti family who formed Gruppo Finanziario Tessile in 1930; GFT USA established, 1971; GFT Mode Canada established; 1983; manufacturers for Abboud, Armani, Dior, Fezza, Montana, Ungaro, Valentino, and others; also publisher of Il libro del sarto, 1987; L'abito della rivoluzione, 1987; Giornale delle nuove mode di Francia e d'Inghilterra, 1988; Apparel Arts, 1989; Ready-Made Fashion: An Historical Profile of the Clothing Industry in Great Britain, France and Germany, 1990; Women and Modernity: Fashions, Images, Female Strategies in Germany from the Beginning of the Century to the 1930s, 1991; Pagine e tavole del costume antico e moderno, 1992; company sold to Giovanni Agnelli's Gemina, 1994; Gemina restructured, Holding di Partecipazioni Industriali (HDI) becomes new parent of GFT, 1997; acquired Valentino house, 1998; bought Joseph Abboud, 2000. Company Address: Corso Emilia 6, 10152 Turin, Italy.

PUBLICATIONS

On GRUPPO GFT:

Articles

- “Protectionism Ill Fits Apparel,” in Chicago Tribune, 13 December 1986.
- Trachtenberg, Jeffrey A., “Designers Are Made as Well as Born,” in Forbes, 11 July 1988.

Rosenbaum, Andrew, “Italy’s Fashion Trillionaire,” in Avenue (New York), September 1988.

Nardoza, Edward, “GFT Gets Set for the 1990s,” in the Daily News Record (New York), 31 May 1991.

Howard, Robert, “The Designer Organization: Italy’s GFT Goes Global,” in the Harvard Business Review (Massachusetts) September/October 1991.

Bannon, Lisa, “Apparel Maker for Top Labels to Sell Big Stake,” in the Wall Street Journal (New York), 6 April 1993.

Profile, “Holding di Partecipazioni Industriali SpA,” online at Hoover’s Online, www.hoovers.com, 11 January 2001.

* * *

Before being sold in 1994 to Gemina, one of several companies owned by the legendary Giovanni Agnelli, Gruppo GFT (Gruppo Finanziario Tessile, or Textile Financial Group) was the world’s largest manufacturer of designer clothing, competing at the highest end of the fashion business with ready-to-wear designer collections, one step below made-to-order haute couture. Its success is rooted in its unparalleled history, cutting edge technologies, well-organized labor practices and thorough understanding of fashion as an expression of contemporary culture. Innovative and flexible in an ever changing market, GFT single-handedly revolutionized the way artistic clothing was conceived, manufactured, marketed, and distributed. Its heart was on the pulse of social trends and needs, keeping it way ahead of its competitors.

GFT’s involvement in contemporary fashion went way beyond the business world. The company was deeply committed to publishing rare treatises on the history of costume, organizing exhibitions with accompanying catalogues, and working with major contemporary artists. The exhibitions organized by Gruppo GFT, usually in conjunction with international events such as the Florentine Pitti Uomo shows, have been a symbolic expression of this world and of GFT’s relationship with contemporary creativity. Exhibitions have featured the work of Frank O. Gehry (1986); Arata Isozaki (1986–87); and Giulio Paolini (1988); GFT sponsored major exhibitions of the work of Claes Oldenburg, Coosje van Bruggen, and Aldo Rossi, who also designed corporate headquarters in Turin, Italy. And in the 1990s, GFT helped to support the Rebecca Horn show at the Guggenheim Museum in New York.

Before 1887, most clothing was produced by cottage industry tailors who produced a small range of styles for local clients. In that year, however, in the Piedmont region of Italy, Donato Levi e Figli produced one of the first prototypes of a suit made to standardized measurements. In 1925 the Rivetti family purchased Donato Levi and Sons and created Finanziario Tessile (Fites), and by 1930 Gruppo Finanziario Tessile (GFT) was established as an organization to produce and market ready-made clothing. The company flourished in the period after World War II; while the rest of the world was still producing clothes in small cottage industry workshops, GFT laid the foundations for mass-produced clothing and created a vast new market for this ready-made clothes.

The democratic, mass-market and homogeneous styles of the 1960s gave way in the 1970s to a new era of increased individualization to which GFT responded immediately. It entered the more upscale market by catering to a stable of looks and added exclusive prêt-à-porter collections by some of Europe’s leading fashion designers to its tailor—he was the first to introduce the boxy jacket, tunic, and cone-shaped coat of the 1950s. Aesthetically pleasing lines were imposed by his cut onto darts and seams used for fitting between the waist and shoulders. Decorative curved welt seams ending in an arrow were often used.

His day and afternoon dresses were softer than his suits. Sleeves were often kimono cut; bodices often blouson. Asymmetrical clothing ended in drapes, scarves, or bows at neck or hips. Pleating was used for insets of sunburst panels or for entire dresses. Polka dots were his favorite print. Evening dresses were also soft, supple, and feminine. Colors were pink, mauve, apricot, chartreuse, yellow, bright blue, navy, or black in chiffon, lamé, moiré, faille, satin, tulle, lace, taffeta, velvet, or brocade. High-waisted or camisole bodices had halter, strapless, or shepherdess necklines. Gowns were sheaths, or had extremely elaborate full skirts, floor or ballet length that ended in harem or flounced hem. Skirt decorations were either Shirred, bands graduated in size, repeated swirled ruffles, or petal-like panels of pleating.

Griffe retired in 1968, and though his skill as a designer was second to none, he has, unfortunately, been largely forgotten in the 21st century.

—Betty Kirke; updated by Sydonie Benét

GRUPPO GFT

Italian fashion manufacturer

Founded: Established in Turin, 1887, as Donato Levi e Figli for production of men's off-the-rack clothing. Company History: Company purchased in 1925 by the Rivetti family who formed Gruppo Finanziario Tessile in 1930; GFT USA established, 1971; GFT Mode Canada established; 1983; manufacturers for Abboud, Armani, Dior, Fezza, Montana, Ungaro, Valentino, and others; also publisher of Il libro del sarto, 1987; L'abito della rivoluzione, 1987; Giornale delle nuove mode di Francia e d'Inghilterra, 1988; Apparel Arts, 1989; Ready-Made Fashion: An Historical Profile of the Clothing Industry in Great Britain, France and Germany, 1990; Women and Modernity: Fashions, Images, Female Strategies in Germany from the Beginning of the Century to the 1930s, 1991; Pagine e tavole del costume antico e moderno, 1992; company sold to Giovanni Agnelli's Gemina, 1994; Gemina restructured, Holding di Partecipazioni Industriali (HDI) becomes new parent of GFT, 1997; acquired Valentino house, 1998; bought Joseph Abboud, 2000. Company Address: Corso Emilia 6, 10152 Turin, Italy.

PUBLICATIONS

On GRUPPO GFT:

Articles

- “Protectionism Ill Fits Apparel,” in Chicago Tribune, 13 December 1986.
- Trachtenberg, Jeffrey A., “Designers Are Made as Well as Born,” in Forbes, 11 July 1988.

Rosenbaum, Andrew, “Italy’s Fashion Trillionaire,” in Avenue (New York), September 1988.

Nardoza, Edward, “GFT Gets Set for the 1990s,” in the Daily News Record (New York), 31 May 1991.

Howard, Robert, “The Designer Organization: Italy’s GFT Goes Global,” in the Harvard Business Review (Massachusetts) September/October 1991.

Bannon, Lisa, “Apparel Maker for Top Labels to Sell Big Stake,” in the Wall Street Journal (New York), 6 April 1993.

Profile, “Holding di Partecipazioni Industriali SpA,” online at Hoover’s Online, www.hoovers.com, 11 January 2001.

* * *

Before being sold in 1994 to Gemina, one of several companies owned by the legendary Giovanni Agnelli, Gruppo GFT (Gruppo Finanziario Tessile, or Textile Financial Group) was the world’s largest manufacturer of designer clothing, competing at the highest end of the fashion business with ready-to-wear designer collections, one step below made-to-order haute couture. Its success is rooted in its unparalleled history, cutting edge technologies, well-organized labor practices and thorough understanding of fashion as an expression of contemporary culture. Innovative and flexible in an ever changing market, GFT single-handedly revolutionized the way artistic clothing was conceived, manufactured, marketed, and distributed. Its heart was on the pulse of social trends and needs, keeping it way ahead of its competitors.

GFT’s involvement in contemporary fashion went way beyond the business world. The company was deeply committed to publishing rare treatises on the history of costume, organizing exhibitions with accompanying catalogues, and working with major contemporary artists. The exhibitions organized by Gruppo GFT, usually in conjunction with international events such as the Florentine Pitti Uomo shows, have been a symbolic expression of this world and of GFT’s relationship with contemporary creativity. Exhibitions have featured the work of Frank O. Gehry (1986); Arata Isozaki (1986–87); and Giulio Paolini (1988); GFT sponsored major exhibitions of the work of Claes Oldenburg, Coosje van Bruggen, and Aldo Rossi, who also designed corporate headquarters in Turin, Italy. And in the 1990s, GFT helped to support the Rebecca Horn show at the Guggenheim Museum in New York.

Before 1887, most clothing was produced by cottage industry tailors who produced a small range of styles for local clients. In that year, however, in the Piedmont region of Italy, Donato Levi e Figli produced one of the first prototypes of a suit made to standardized measurements. In 1925 the Rivetti family purchased Donato Levi and Sons and created Finanziario Tessile (Fites), and by 1930 Gruppo Finanziario Tessile (GFT) was established as an organization to produce and market ready-made clothing. The company flourished in the period after World War II; while the rest of the world was still producing clothes in small cottage industry workshops, GFT laid the foundations for mass-produced clothing and created a vast new market for this ready-made clothes.

The democratic, mass-market and homogeneous styles of the 1960s gave way in the 1970s to a new era of increased individualization to which GFT responded immediately. It entered the more upscale market by catering to a stable of looks and added exclusive prêt-à-porter collections by some of Europe’s leading fashion designers to its mass production activities. GFT's core group has consisted of Valentino, Armani, Ungaro, Fezza, and Claude Montana. GFT grew intellectually in their craft through their exchanges with its designers. Marco Rivetti, chief executive officer of GFT until 1994, commented that the company learned much from its fashion artists: "From Armani, a great deal about the construction of jackets, from Valentino, the design of shirts and the use of silk." These designers were, in turn, drawn to GFT's commitment to quality workmanship, openness to new systems of production, and superb distribution system.

GFT's ability to operate in a global market immensely benefitted the designers. Armani's classicism was less classic and more sporty for the GFT-USA lines; Giorgio Armani, Mani by Giorgio Armani, Valentino Boutique, Valentino Night, Valentino Uomo, and others were all adaptations of the European lines produced and marketed by the American division.

Since 1987 GFT collaborated with American designer Joseph Abboud, recognizing his world market appeal. In the following years, the company signed Andrew Fezza, Joan Helpern, and Calvin Klein, designers who were truly representative of our time, with the artistic sensibility of understated elegance accessible to a variety of markets.

In 1993 GFT had 46 companies worldwide, 18 manufacturing plants, and some 10,000 employees. The following year the company was acquired by Gemina, one of a stable of companies owned by the Agnelli family, due in part to financial problems from mismanagement. Ironically, another scandal somewhat tarnished GFT's struggling image in 1995, this time involving a number of its parent company Gemina's top executives. GFT weathered the storm and sought to regain its standing as the leading manufacturer of designer clothing in Italy.

In 1997 Gemina announced it would divide its industrial, apparel, and publishing businesses. GFT's corporate parent was christened Holding di Partecipazioni Industriali SpA (HDI) and the new holding company would concentrate more fully on fashion, in an attempt to regain GFT's supremacy and to challenge its closest rival in the luxury market, LVMH (Moët Hennessy Louis Vuitton SA). True to its word, HDI bought the Valentino couture business in 1998 as its founders considered retirement, adding a new brand to the company's fold. GFT, however, suffered two major setbacks: first, the loss of Ungaro's contracts in 1998, and second, all of Armani's licensing and production in 2000.

As Armani moved to control its own manufacturing and licensing, GFT and HDI countered by buying another leading design house, Joseph Abboud, for $65 million. Though GFT already licensed much of Abboud's product line—at a time when LVMH was buying Celine, Gucci, Pucci, and entering a joint venture with Prada to buy Fendi—buying Abboud's label and licensing rights outright was a sound investment.

GFT's mandate and goals have remained the same as they were in 1887—to create fashion for the truly contemporary world, to pay attention to detail, to produce efficiently, and to create the market and deliver the goods on time. The company met its goals by immersing itself in the history of the fashion arts and in the interrelation of the genre and other contemporary artforms. GFT's vision changed the way designers worked, without disturbing the integrity or soul of their creations.

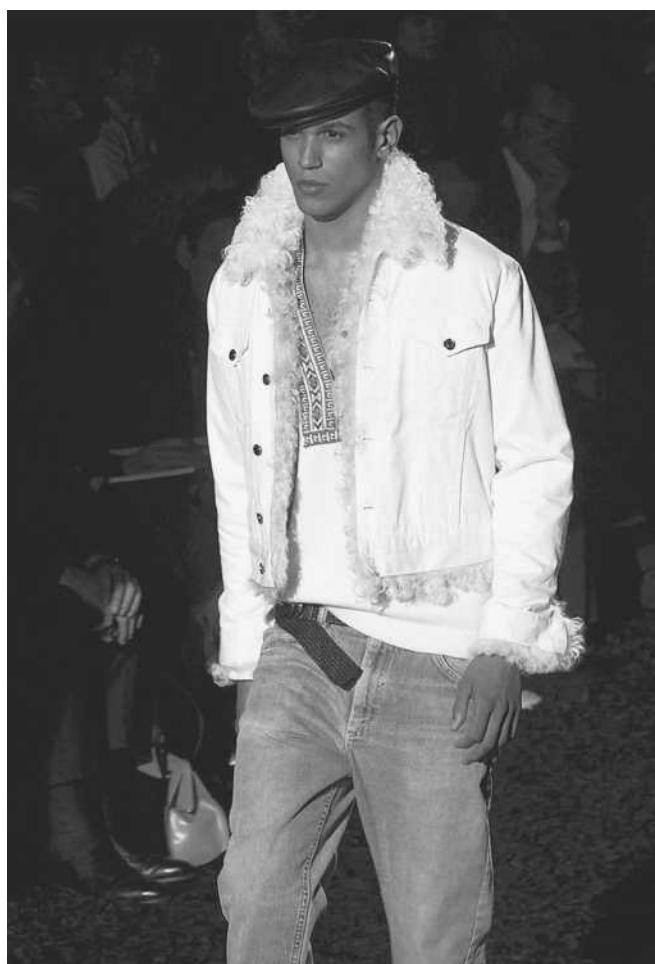

—Marianne T. Carlano; updated by Nelly Rhodes

GUCCI

Italian fashion and accessories house

Founded: in Florence, Italy, as saddlery shop by Guccio Gucci (1881–1953), 1906, after family millinery business failed. Company History:

Became retailer of accessories, 1923; Gucci shops opened in Florence, 1923; boutiques open in Rome, 1938; firm renamed Società Anonima Guccio Gucci, 1939; stores opened in Milan, 1951; renamed Guccio Gucci Srl, 1945; New York boutique opened, 1953; opened in Paris, 1963; shop opened in Hong Kong and Gucci Parfums formed, 1975 (renamed Gucci Parfums SpA, 1982); company renamed Guccio Gucci SpA, 1982; appointed Dawn Mello creative director, 1989; Tom Ford joined company, 1990; acquired by Investcorp, 1993; Mello departed and Ford named creative director, 1994; deaths of Maurizio and Paolo Gucci, 1995; listed on the NYSE, 1995; rival Prada bought stake, 1998; sold stake to LVMH, 1999; Pinault Printemps Redoute acquired major stake and fought off LVMH, 1999; Alexander McQueen defected from LVMH to Gucci, 2000; hired Stella McCartney to create her own line, 2000; designer Nicolas Ghesquière came to firm with acquisition of Balenciaga, 2001. Exhibitions: Costume Archive, Metropolitan Museum, New mass production activities. GFT's core group has consisted of Valentino, Armani, Ungaro, Fezza, and Claude Montana. GFT grew intellectually in their craft through their exchanges with its designers. Marco Rivetti, chief executive officer of GFT until 1994, commented that the company learned much from its fashion artists: "From Armani, a great deal about the construction of jackets, from Valentino, the design of shirts and the use of silk." These designers were, in turn, drawn to GFT's commitment to quality workmanship, openness to new systems of production, and superb distribution system.

Gucci, autumn/winter 2001–02 ready-to-wear collection designed by Tom Ford. © AFP/CORBIS.

GFT's ability to operate in a global market immensely benefitted the designers. Armani's classicism was less classic and more sporty for the GFT-USA lines; Giorgio Armani, Mani by Giorgio Armani, Valentino Boutique, Valentino Night, Valentino Uomo, and others were all adaptations of the European lines produced and marketed by the American division.

Since 1987 GFT collaborated with American designer Joseph Abboud, recognizing his world market appeal. In the following years, the company signed Andrew Fezza, Joan Helpern, and Calvin Klein, designers who were truly representative of our time, with the artistic sensibility of understated elegance accessible to a variety of markets.

In 1993 GFT had 46 companies worldwide, 18 manufacturing plants, and some 10,000 employees. The following year the company was acquired by Gemina, one of a stable of companies owned by the Agnelli family, due in part to financial problems from mismanagement. Ironically, another scandal somewhat tarnished GFT's struggling image in 1995, this time involving a number of its parent company Gemina's top executives. GFT weathered the storm and sought to regain its standing as the leading manufacturer of designer clothing in Italy.

In 1997 Gemina announced it would divide its industrial, apparel, and publishing businesses. GFT's corporate parent was christened Holding di Partecipazioni Industriali SpA (HDI) and the new holding company would concentrate more fully on fashion, in an attempt to regain GFT's supremacy and to challenge its closest rival in the luxury market, LVMH (Moët Hennessy Louis Vuitton SA). True to its word, HDI bought the Valentino couture business in 1998 as its founders considered retirement, adding a new brand to the company's fold. GFT, however, suffered two major setbacks: first, the loss of Ungaro's contracts in 1998, and second, all of Armani's licensing and production in 2000.

As Armani moved to control its own manufacturing and licensing, GFT and HDI countered by buying another leading design house, Joseph Abboud, for $65 million. Though GFT already licensed much of Abboud's product line—at a time when LVMH was buying Celine, Gucci, Pucci, and entering a joint venture with Prada to buy Fendi—buying Abboud's label and licensing rights outright was a sound investment.

GFT's mandate and goals have remained the same as they were in 1887—to create fashion for the truly contemporary world, to pay attention to detail, to produce efficiently, and to create the market and deliver the goods on time. The company met its goals by immersing itself in the history of the fashion arts and in the interrelation of the genre and other contemporary artforms. GFT's vision changed the way designers worked, without disturbing the integrity or soul of their creations.

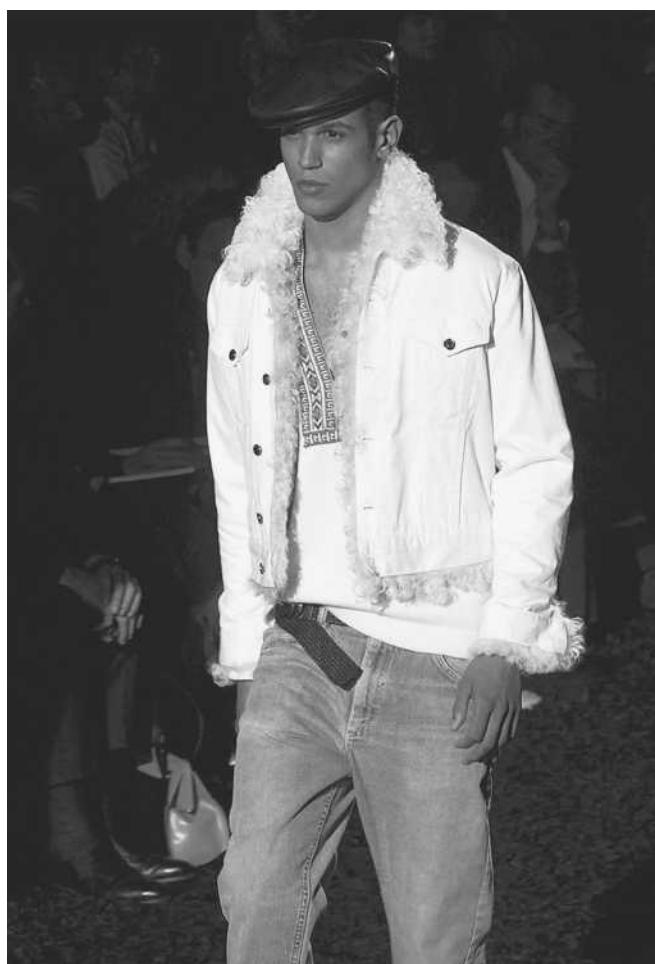

—Marianne T. Carlano; updated by Nelly Rhodes

GUCCI

Italian fashion and accessories house

Founded: in Florence, Italy, as saddlery shop by Guccio Gucci (1881–1953), 1906, after family millinery business failed. Company History:

Became retailer of accessories, 1923; Gucci shops opened in Florence, 1923; boutiques open in Rome, 1938; firm renamed Società Anonima Guccio Gucci, 1939; stores opened in Milan, 1951; renamed Guccio Gucci Srl, 1945; New York boutique opened, 1953; opened in Paris, 1963; shop opened in Hong Kong and Gucci Parfums formed, 1975 (renamed Gucci Parfums SpA, 1982); company renamed Guccio Gucci SpA, 1982; appointed Dawn Mello creative director, 1989; Tom Ford joined company, 1990; acquired by Investcorp, 1993; Mello departed and Ford named creative director, 1994; deaths of Maurizio and Paolo Gucci, 1995; listed on the NYSE, 1995; rival Prada bought stake, 1998; sold stake to LVMH, 1999; Pinault Printemps Redoute acquired major stake and fought off LVMH, 1999; Alexander McQueen defected from LVMH to Gucci, 2000; hired Stella McCartney to create her own line, 2000; designer Nicolas Ghesquière came to firm with acquisition of Balenciaga, 2001. Exhibitions: Costume Archive, Metropolitan Museum, New

Gucci, autumn/winter 2001–02 ready-to-wear collection designed by Tom Ford. © AFP/CORBIS.

York. Awards: National Italian-American Foundation Special Achievement award, 2001 [de Sole]. Company Address: 73 Via Tornabuoni 50100, Florence, Italy. Company Website: www.gucci.com.

PUBLICATIONS

On GUCCI:

Books

- Swann, June, Shoes, London, 1982.
 Alfonsi, Maria-Vittoria, Leaders in Fashion: I grandi personaggi della moda, Bologna, 1983.
 McKnight, Gerald, Gucci: A House Divided, New York, 1987.
 Forden, Sara Gay, The House of Gucci, New York, 2000.

Articles

- Crittendon, Ann, "Knock-Offs Aside, Gucci's Blooming," in the New York Times, 25 June 1978.
 "Artisans & Art: Gucci," in Fortune, 23 July 1984.
 "Gucci, Taking Control," in WWD, 9 January 1987.

Gucci, fall/winter 2001–02 collection: velvet baby doll dress. © AP/Wide World Photos.

McKnight, Gerald, "Gucci: Hell for Leather," in the Sunday Times Magazine, (London), 6 September 1987.

Wolman, Karen, "Can an Outsider Fill Aldo Gucci's Loafers?," in Business Week, 30 November 1987.

"Gucci's Empire Splits a Seam," in Time, 20 June 1988.

"Aldo Gucci," in the New York Times, 21 January 1989.

McKnight, Gerald, "Aldo Gucci," [obituary] in The Independent, 23 January 1990.

Rossant, John, "Can Maurizio Gucci Bring the Glamor Back?" in Business Week, 5 February 1990.

Jerenski, Laura, "Watch Your Step, Cousin Paolo," in Forbes, 15 October 1990.

Howell, Georgina, "Gucci Again," in Vogue, December 1990.

Dudar, Helen, "Reversal of Fortune: Dawn Mello Gets Gucci Back on Its Feet," in Working Woman, April 1991.

Friedman, Arthur, "Aldo Gucci Dies at 84," in WWD, 29 May 1992.

Costin, Glyn, "Dawn Mello Revamping Gucci," in WWD, 29 May 1992.

Infantino, Vivian, "Ford Drives Gucci into Faster Fashion Lane," in Footwear News, 14 November 1994.

Spindler, Amy M., "A Retreat from Retro Glamor," in the New York Times, 7 March 1995.

"Paolo Gucci," [obituary] in the Economist, 28 October 1995.

Infantino, Vivian, "Tom Ford: The Driving Force Behind Gucci's Revved-Up Performance," in Footwear News, 4 December 1995.

Min, Janice, "Couture de Force: Gucci is Once Again Chichi Thanks to the Savvy Designs of Tom Ford," in People, 4 March 1996.

Conti, Samantha, "Prada Buys Five-Percent Gucci Stake," in WWD, 8 June 1998.

Luscombe, Belinda, "Catfight on the Catwalk," in Time, 22 June 1998.

Rawsthorn, Alice, "Prada Move Puts Gucci on Defensive," in the Financial Times, 7 July 1998.

Weisman, Katherine, "It's Getting Serious: LVMH Buys Prada's 9.5-Percent Stake in Gucci," in WWD, 13 January 1999.

Menkes, Suzy, "Gucci Buys House of YSL for $1-Billion," in the International Herald Tribune, 16 November 1999.

Givhan, Robin, "Givenchy's Loss, Gucci's Gain—Designer Alexander McQueen Leaves LVMH," in the Washington Post, 5 December 2000.

"At Yves Saint Laurent, Tom's Triumph," in WWD, 15 March 2001.

Menkes, Suzy, "Gucci Gets Europe's Hottest New Designer," in the International Herald Tribune, 7 July 2001.

* * *

The illustrious name of Gucci began as a mark on leather goods produced in Florentine workshops for the young Guccio Gucci. Inspired by the grandiose luggage transported by wealthy guests to the Ritz Hotel in London, where Gucci worked in the kitchens, the young Italian returned to his native country where he began making leather luggage.

The characteristic double-G motif printed on the canvas was introduced after World War II due to a shortage of leather. Its bold red and green bands on suitcases, bags, satchels, wallets, and purses have become one of the most copied trademarks in the world, along with France's Louis Vuitton. The Florence-based company grew to international proportions in the postwar period, expanding its range to include clothing, fragrances, household items such as decanters and glasses painted with the distinctive red and green bands, scarves, and a slew of other accessories. It was this indiscriminate expansion that ultimately proved to be detrimental to the name of Gucci for, as Yves Saint Laurent's director Pierre Bergé once said, "A name is like a cigarette—the more you puff on it the less you have left."

Added to this overexposure was the proliferation of Gucci imitations which reputedly cost the company a fortune in legal fees, along with infamous conflicts between the volatile members of the Gucci clan. All were detrimental to the high profile image the company needed to maintain. There were, however, many Gucci items that became status symbols in their own right—such as the Gucci loafer with its unmistakable gilt snaffle trim which, according to the New York Times was what carried the company to fortune. Biographer Gerald McKnight notes in his book Gucci: A House Divided, (New York, 1987) that the loafer even became the subject of well-worn jokes in the 1970s when the name Gucci became as well known as household items such as the Hoover and cellophane tape.

Having lost a great deal of the prestigious aura that is a vital element to the success of a luxury brand, the house of Gucci suffered bad press during the 1980s, as journalists hungered after stories of bitter rivalry between family members and their legal battles. It was an American woman, Dawn Mello, who restored the luxurious image of Gucci when, in 1989, she was appointed executive vice-president and creative director of the company. Under her control, the existing Gucci lines were edited and refined, and fewer, more select new items introduced.

Mello provided a clever combination of just the right balance of historical relevance and a real sense of modernity which restored Gucci to its former glory as a "must have" name. She was helped by designer Tom Ford who came to Gucci in 1990. Three years later, in 1993, the Gucci clog was a sell-out item among the fashion cognoscenti and became the most copied shoe style of the season. Gucci was once again established as a purveyor of luxury goods but also as a serious contender in the high fashion stakes. This same year, the firm was acquired by Investcorp, and the following year relocated its headquarters from Milan to Florence. Mello however, left to rejoin Bergdorf Goodman in New York, and Ford was named Gucci's creative director.

Ford proved a good fit for Gucci, his collections took the house back to its must-have status. Along the way came corporate intrigue, when rival Prada suddenly acquired a chunk of Gucci in 1998, only to turn around and sell to archrival LVMH in 1999. The events sparked a takeover attempt, with Gucci narrowly escaping due to white knight François Pinault, whose Pinault Printemps Redoute bought in to Gucci. Pinault and Gucci CEO Domenico de Sole soon gave LVMH a run for its money in the bid to become the world's largest luxury firm. Though LVMH was ahead, Gucci was a force to be reckoned with and pursued the same targets as LVMH, such as Fendi in 1999. LVMH, partnered with Prada, prevailed; with Prada eventually selling its stake to LVMH. Gucci itself then went on a buying spree, acquiring stakes in Boucheron, Sergio Rossi, and Bottega Veneta.

By the end of the 20th century, Gucci had become a global competitor and flexed its muscle with the acquisition of Yves Saint Laurent and Balenciaga. Tom Ford, widely considered Europe's top designer by this time, took the design reins at YSL in addition to his Gucci responsibilities, and the Balenciaga buy brought hot new designer, Nicolas Ghesquière into the fold. Alexander McQuuen, who had defected from LVMH, and Stella McCartney, another sensation, had also joined Gucci. With four of the fashion world's most acclaimed designers under its roof, Gucci was sure to take the catwalk by storm.

—Catherine Woram; updated by Owen James

Gucci, spring/summer 2002 ready-to-wear collection. © Reuters
NewMedia Inc./CORBIS.

GUESS, INC.

American fashion house

Founded: by Georges, Maurice, Armand, and Paul Marciano, 1981.
Company History: Signed license for knitwear, 1982; sold half ownership to Jordache, 1983; brothers regained ownership, 1988; signed license with Revlon for signature fragrance, 1990; Rodeo Drive store opened and eyewear line added, 1992; Georges sold his stake to brothers, 1993; launched golf apparel line and entered home furnishings, 1994–95; went public, 1996; brought apparel licensing back in-house, 1999; opened Baby Guess, Guess Kids, and Guess Home stores, 2000; launched G Brand line, 2001. Company Address: 1444 S. Alameda Street, Los Angeles, CA 90021, U.S.A.
Company Website: www.guess.com.

a slew of other accessories. It was this indiscriminate expansion that ultimately proved to be detrimental to the name of Gucci for, as Yves Saint Laurent's director Pierre Bergé once said, "A name is like a cigarette—the more you puff on it the less you have left."

Added to this overexposure was the proliferation of Gucci imitations which reputedly cost the company a fortune in legal fees, along with infamous conflicts between the volatile members of the Gucci clan. All were detrimental to the high profile image the company needed to maintain. There were, however, many Gucci items that became status symbols in their own right—such as the Gucci loafer with its unmistakable gilt snaffle trim which, according to the New York Times was what carried the company to fortune. Biographer Gerald McKnight notes in his book Gucci: A House Divided, (New York, 1987) that the loafer even became the subject of well-worn jokes in the 1970s when the name Gucci became as well known as household items such as the Hoover and cellophane tape.

Having lost a great deal of the prestigious aura that is a vital element to the success of a luxury brand, the house of Gucci suffered bad press during the 1980s, as journalists hungered after stories of bitter rivalry between family members and their legal battles. It was an American woman, Dawn Mello, who restored the luxurious image of Gucci when, in 1989, she was appointed executive vice-president and creative director of the company. Under her control, the existing Gucci lines were edited and refined, and fewer, more select new items introduced.

Mello provided a clever combination of just the right balance of historical relevance and a real sense of modernity which restored Gucci to its former glory as a "must have" name. She was helped by designer Tom Ford who came to Gucci in 1990. Three years later, in 1993, the Gucci clog was a sell-out item among the fashion cognoscenti and became the most copied shoe style of the season. Gucci was once again established as a purveyor of luxury goods but also as a serious contender in the high fashion stakes. This same year, the firm was acquired by Investcorp, and the following year relocated its headquarters from Milan to Florence. Mello however, left to rejoin Bergdorf Goodman in New York, and Ford was named Gucci's creative director.

Ford proved a good fit for Gucci, his collections took the house back to its must-have status. Along the way came corporate intrigue, when rival Prada suddenly acquired a chunk of Gucci in 1998, only to turn around and sell to archrival LVMH in 1999. The events sparked a takeover attempt, with Gucci narrowly escaping due to white knight François Pinault, whose Pinault Printemps Redoute bought in to Gucci. Pinault and Gucci CEO Domenico de Sole soon gave LVMH a run for its money in the bid to become the world's largest luxury firm. Though LVMH was ahead, Gucci was a force to be reckoned with and pursued the same targets as LVMH, such as Fendi in 1999. LVMH, partnered with Prada, prevailed; with Prada eventually selling its stake to LVMH. Gucci itself then went on a buying spree, acquiring stakes in Boucheron, Sergio Rossi, and Bottega Veneta.

By the end of the 20th century, Gucci had become a global competitor and flexed its muscle with the acquisition of Yves Saint Laurent and Balenciaga. Tom Ford, widely considered Europe's top designer by this time, took the design reins at YSL in addition to his Gucci responsibilities, and the Balenciaga buy brought hot new designer, Nicolas Ghesquière into the fold. Alexander McQuuen, who had defected from LVMH, and Stella McCartney, another sensation, had also joined Gucci. With four of the fashion world's most acclaimed designers under its roof, Gucci was sure to take the catwalk by storm.

—Catherine Woram; updated by Owen James

Gucci, spring/summer 2002 ready-to-wear collection. © Reuters
NewMedia Inc./CORBIS.

GUESS, INC.

American fashion house

Founded: by Georges, Maurice, Armand, and Paul Marciano, 1981.
Company History: Signed license for knitwear, 1982; sold half ownership to Jordache, 1983; brothers regained ownership, 1988; signed license with Revlon for signature fragrance, 1990; Rodeo Drive store opened and eyewear line added, 1992; Georges sold his stake to brothers, 1993; launched golf apparel line and entered home furnishings, 1994–95; went public, 1996; brought apparel licensing back in-house, 1999; opened Baby Guess, Guess Kids, and Guess Home stores, 2000; launched G Brand line, 2001. Company Address: 1444 S. Alameda Street, Los Angeles, CA 90021, U.S.A.
Company Website: www.guess.com.

PUBLICATIONSOn GUESS, INC.:*Books

Byron, Christopher, Skin Tight: The Bizarre Story of Guess v. Jordache—Glamour, Greed, and Dirty Tricks in the Fashion Industry, New York, 1992.

Articles

Behar, Richard, "Does Guess Have a Friend in the IRS?" in Forbes, 16 November 1987.

Byron, Christopher, "The Great Jeans War," in New York, 24 July 1989.

Welles, Chris, "A 'Blood War' in the Jeans Trade," in Business Week, 13 November 1989.

"Blue Jeans," in Consumer Reports, July 1991.

Marlow, Michael, "Guess at 10: $550 Million and Growing," in WWD, 20 December 1991.

Appelbaum, Cara, "Recession Killers," in Adweek's Marketing Week, 10 February 1992.

Marlow, Michael, "Guess on Rodeo: The Beverly Hills Cowboy," in WWD, 24 November 1992.

Wilson, Marianne, "Guess Ranch Lassos Rodeo Drive," in Chain Store Age Executive, January 1993.

"Guess? Solving Fashion Formula," in Sporting Goods Business, March 1993.

Ryan, Thomas J., "Marchianos Buy a Piece of Gitano," in WWD, 17 March 1993.

Strom, Stephanie, "Guess Names Specialty Store Chief to Lead its Retail Unit," in the New York Times, 31 August 1993.

Foley, Bridget, "The Thrill is Back—A Voracious Appetite for Fashion Emerges," in WWD, 12 August 1996.

Davidson, Kirk, "Guess Ads Cross Line from Fashion Art to Pornography," in Marketing News, 21 October 1996.

Ozzard, Janet, "Thoroughly modern mega brands," in WWD, 31 October 1996.

Malone, Soctt, "Under New Owner, Guess Sport to Push Fashion," in Footwear News, 13 April 1998.

Cunningham, Thomas, "Guess Losses Hit $13.1M in Fourth Quarter," in DNR, 9 March 2001.

Caplan, David Grant, "Guess' New Fashion Plate," in WWD, 24 May 2001.

* * *

It is sometimes hard to see beyond the sexy image projected by Guess, Inc., created by Paul Marciano, one of the four Marciano brothers who founded the Guess empire in 1981. Guess fashions, which began with jeans for men and women, have expanded to include denim-driven collections for all ages, including Baby Guess and Guess Kids.

Criticized for being demeaning to women, the controversial Guess advertisements have created such response that most American men or women can name at least one Guess "girl." Supermodels Claudia Schiffer, Naomi Campbell, and Shana Zadrick were among the small group of Guess models who vaulted to celebrity status. The line evokes a playful, body-conscious attitude. When Guess appeared on the scene in the early 1980s, the designer jeans craze was all but over.

The Marciano brothers, however, created enough of a stir through their powerful advertising to induce a new trend in designer denims.

There is usually a seasonal theme to the Guess collections from year to year, but a longrunning Western tone has permeated the line in some shape or form. Yet it took more than a simple image and basic denim line to make this company so successful; Guess works hard to develop innovative treatments and washes for denim, all the while experimenting with colors other than indigo. It pioneered the use of acid and enzyme washes in its textiles, abrading and brushing denims and twills and using different types of denims, such as ring-spun.

Businesswise, Guess went through a bit of a shake-up in the mid-1980s, when the Nakash brothers of Jordache Enterprises challenged the Marciano brothers in a long legal battle over ownership of Guess. A stronger Guess, Inc. emerged from the fight, larger and more successful than ever before, with forceful entries into the men's and children's areas as well as a foray into a more sophisticated category for women, the Georges Marciano signature line. The Marciano line offers more tailored dressing in the form of skirts, trousers, jackets, and related coordinates. Again, however, this is no ordinary power dressing line—the clothes were cut and fitted closer to the figure of a woman's body. Although the clothes can be worn in the more casual work environment, wearers must be supremely confident women—confident in their sensuality and in their position.

The Guess suffered growing pains in 1993 when Georges wanted to take the mass marketing route and his siblings insisted the label stay more exclusive. Unable to compromise, Georges sold his 38-percent stake in the firm and struck on his own, founding rival Yes brand in 1994. After Georges departure the remaining Marcianos continued to expand the Guess empire, producing golf apparel and home furnishings, in addition to its other licensing agreements for footwear, watches, handbags, eyewear, and fragrances. Guess stores opened throughout the U.S., including shops in vast outlet malls as well.

In 1996 the Marcianos took Guess public and used funds to take the brand into Europe. Yet the debut of designer duds from Tommy Hilfiger, DKNY, and Clavin Klein's CK denim collections gave chase and Guess found itself foundering. Initiating a major restructuring, the firm brought its licensing in-house, refurbished existing stores, and planned new retailers for its Baby Guess, Guess Kids, and Guess Home lines in 1999 and 2000.

Guess suffered losses in late 2000, due to soft department store sales, costs related to revamping its image, and its expansion. Guess bounced back, however, announcing the launch of a new line, G Brand, in 2001 which the firm characterized as "more sophisticated and more detailed" than its other denim collections.

—Lisa Marsh; updated by Owen James

GUILLEMIN, Olivier

French fashion designer

Born: Paris, France, 10 July 1961. Education: Studied art history at the Sorbonne, Paris, 1978–80, and Studio Bercot, 1979–80. Career: Assistant to Thierry Mugler, 1981; assistant to Azzedine Alaïa, 1982; consultant and freelance designer for Woolmark, Claude Montana menswear, 1987–88; launched own line, P.A.P. for women, 1987; label produced under Paco Rabanne, 1991; specializes in ready-to-wear, accessories, fibers and yarns, and fabrics; Président du Comité Français de la Couleur, 1994. Exhibitions: Fashion and Surrealism,

PUBLICATIONSOn GUESS, INC.:*Books

Byron, Christopher, Skin Tight: The Bizarre Story of Guess v. Jordache—Glamour, Greed, and Dirty Tricks in the Fashion Industry, New York, 1992.

Articles

Behar, Richard, "Does Guess Have a Friend in the IRS?" in Forbes, 16 November 1987.

Byron, Christopher, "The Great Jeans War," in New York, 24 July 1989.

Welles, Chris, "A 'Blood War' in the Jeans Trade," in Business Week, 13 November 1989.

"Blue Jeans," in Consumer Reports, July 1991.

Marlow, Michael, "Guess at 10: $550 Million and Growing," in WWD, 20 December 1991.

Appelbaum, Cara, "Recession Killers," in Adweek's Marketing Week, 10 February 1992.

Marlow, Michael, "Guess on Rodeo: The Beverly Hills Cowboy," in WWD, 24 November 1992.

Wilson, Marianne, "Guess Ranch Lassos Rodeo Drive," in Chain Store Age Executive, January 1993.

"Guess? Solving Fashion Formula," in Sporting Goods Business, March 1993.

Ryan, Thomas J., "Marchianos Buy a Piece of Gitano," in WWD, 17 March 1993.

Strom, Stephanie, "Guess Names Specialty Store Chief to Lead its Retail Unit," in the New York Times, 31 August 1993.

Foley, Bridget, "The Thrill is Back—A Voracious Appetite for Fashion Emerges," in WWD, 12 August 1996.

Davidson, Kirk, "Guess Ads Cross Line from Fashion Art to Pornography," in Marketing News, 21 October 1996.

Ozzard, Janet, "Thoroughly modern mega brands," in WWD, 31 October 1996.

Malone, Soctt, "Under New Owner, Guess Sport to Push Fashion," in Footwear News, 13 April 1998.

Cunningham, Thomas, "Guess Losses Hit $13.1M in Fourth Quarter," in DNR, 9 March 2001.

Caplan, David Grant, "Guess' New Fashion Plate," in WWD, 24 May 2001.

* * *

It is sometimes hard to see beyond the sexy image projected by Guess, Inc., created by Paul Marciano, one of the four Marciano brothers who founded the Guess empire in 1981. Guess fashions, which began with jeans for men and women, have expanded to include denim-driven collections for all ages, including Baby Guess and Guess Kids.

Criticized for being demeaning to women, the controversial Guess advertisements have created such response that most American men or women can name at least one Guess "girl." Supermodels Claudia Schiffer, Naomi Campbell, and Shana Zadrick were among the small group of Guess models who vaulted to celebrity status. The line evokes a playful, body-conscious attitude. When Guess appeared on the scene in the early 1980s, the designer jeans craze was all but over.

The Marciano brothers, however, created enough of a stir through their powerful advertising to induce a new trend in designer denims.

There is usually a seasonal theme to the Guess collections from year to year, but a longrunning Western tone has permeated the line in some shape or form. Yet it took more than a simple image and basic denim line to make this company so successful; Guess works hard to develop innovative treatments and washes for denim, all the while experimenting with colors other than indigo. It pioneered the use of acid and enzyme washes in its textiles, abrading and brushing denims and twills and using different types of denims, such as ring-spun.

Businesswise, Guess went through a bit of a shake-up in the mid-1980s, when the Nakash brothers of Jordache Enterprises challenged the Marciano brothers in a long legal battle over ownership of Guess. A stronger Guess, Inc. emerged from the fight, larger and more successful than ever before, with forceful entries into the men's and children's areas as well as a foray into a more sophisticated category for women, the Georges Marciano signature line. The Marciano line offers more tailored dressing in the form of skirts, trousers, jackets, and related coordinates. Again, however, this is no ordinary power dressing line—the clothes were cut and fitted closer to the figure of a woman's body. Although the clothes can be worn in the more casual work environment, wearers must be supremely confident women—confident in their sensuality and in their position.

The Guess suffered growing pains in 1993 when Georges wanted to take the mass marketing route and his siblings insisted the label stay more exclusive. Unable to compromise, Georges sold his 38-percent stake in the firm and struck on his own, founding rival Yes brand in 1994. After Georges departure the remaining Marcianos continued to expand the Guess empire, producing golf apparel and home furnishings, in addition to its other licensing agreements for footwear, watches, handbags, eyewear, and fragrances. Guess stores opened throughout the U.S., including shops in vast outlet malls as well.

In 1996 the Marcianos took Guess public and used funds to take the brand into Europe. Yet the debut of designer duds from Tommy Hilfiger, DKNY, and Clavin Klein's CK denim collections gave chase and Guess found itself foundering. Initiating a major restructuring, the firm brought its licensing in-house, refurbished existing stores, and planned new retailers for its Baby Guess, Guess Kids, and Guess Home lines in 1999 and 2000.

Guess suffered losses in late 2000, due to soft department store sales, costs related to revamping its image, and its expansion. Guess bounced back, however, announcing the launch of a new line, G Brand, in 2001 which the firm characterized as "more sophisticated and more detailed" than its other denim collections.

—Lisa Marsh; updated by Owen James

GUILLEMIN, Olivier

French fashion designer

Born: Paris, France, 10 July 1961. Education: Studied art history at the Sorbonne, Paris, 1978–80, and Studio Bercot, 1979–80. Career: Assistant to Thierry Mugler, 1981; assistant to Azzedine Alaïa, 1982; consultant and freelance designer for Woolmark, Claude Montana menswear, 1987–88; launched own line, P.A.P. for women, 1987; label produced under Paco Rabanne, 1991; specializes in ready-to-wear, accessories, fibers and yarns, and fabrics; Président du Comité Français de la Couleur, 1994. Exhibitions: Fashion and Surrealism, Fashion Institute of Technology, New York, and Victoria and Albert Museum, London, 1984; La Féee Electricité, Musée d'Art Moderne, Paris, 1985; Les Créateurs, Villa Noaille, Hyères, France, 1992; Mode et Liberty, Musée des Arts Décoratifs, Paris, 1993; CONTREX, Musée des Arts Décoratifs, Paris, 1994; Mode et Gitane, Carrousel du Louvre, Paris, 1994; Voyage dans la Matière, Grand Palais, Paris, 1994. Collections: Union Francaise des Arts du Costume, Paris; Musée de la Mode à Marseille, France. Awards: Bourse pour la Création, Ministère de la Culture, 1990; 1er prix de la Création Woolmark, 1990. Address: 177 rue du Temple, 75003 Paris, France.

PUBLICATIONS

On GUILLEMIN:

Articles

- Voight, Rebecca, "Vanity Fairs," in Paris Passion (Paris), October 1990.
- Hepple, Keith, "The Young and the Fun," in DR: The Fashion Business (London), 1 December 1990.
- "Guillemin to design RTW for Paco Rabanne," in WWD, 17 October 1991.
- Hood, Frederique, "Fantastic Meteor," in Elle (New York), March 1992.
- Valmont, Martine, "Les fils de l'été 1995," in Journal du Textile, 29 November 1993.
- Molin Corvo, Roberta, "Vive la recherche!" in Trends: Collezioni (Modena, Italy), Spring/Summer 1995.
- "Yes Minister Meets Ab Fab: The F.O. Has Designs on EU," in M2 Communications, 24 February 1998.
- "China Hosts International Young Designers Contest," in the Xinhua News Agency, 27 March 1999.
- "The Best Deal for Young Fashion," available online at Guillemin, www.scalaire.com/fashion, 9 June 2001.
- "Fashion Cultures Exhibition," online at Intersélection, www.interselection.com, 9 June 2001.

*

I chose the profession of fashion designer because it was the catalyst for my various creative aspirations—commercial, sociological, and technical. I consider myself an experimentalist and it is this reason my path is very varied. The way my career is developing leads me increasingly towards a more forward way of looking at clothes, in unusual fibers, threads, and fabrics, but also at the process of distribution and consumption. I think we are at a turning point in our Western society and that in future years other codes of fashion are going to appear. It is with this in mind that I see my collections, which were elitist at the beginning of my career, becoming increasingly creatively democratic.

—Olivier Guillemin

* * *

Olivier Guillemin designs wearable art for the fashion follower who is looking ahead to the next century. One of a group of hot young Parisian stars, including Sophie Sitbon and Corinne Cobson, Guillemin frequently uses unusual and novel fabrics to surprising effect. His modern, futuristic designs often appear to signal a world where high technology will triumph over nature and the human body. Not unlike the 1960s science fiction looks of Paco Rabanne, with whom Guillemin is associated, these designs address today's postindustrial, satellite-linked global society head-on.

Guillemin demonstrated his stubborn individuality from the beginning by premiering his collections in odd and diverse places, from a gloomy medieval church to an old-fashioned hotel ballroom, or the French Institute of Fashion. In accord with the spirit of his times, he has been allied with other fashion deconstructivists; his designs have been called "absurd and enchanting." He has created garments which seem to have been literally torn apart and then patched back together, or merely draped over the figure, or left ragged and unfinished.

One collection included a frock made from pieces of a dress pattern secured haphazardly with strips of black tape, exposing bits of the model's skin. Others appeared to be exploding, as in his dress of woven paper fabric covered with forbidding spiky cones radiating from the bodice. A backless, gathered, knee-length shift looked like a paint-spattered drop cloth picked up off an atelier floor and draped around an artist's model. He created a jumpsuit with one leg missing; other garments have been shorn into bandage-like strips. As these examples show, Guillemin is not timid about exploiting the limits of what constitutes "clothing" within the fashion arena.

Unusual shapes, materials, and accessories are a Guillemin trademark, such as his black plastic jewelry designs coiling in arabesques around the model's face and body. One collection was comprised mainly of metallic fabrics, including metallic indigo toile suits and long, metallic toile coats. He has toyed with neon-colored fake fur, transparent plastics, and stretch Lycra. His fascination with industrial materials has resulted in long, rubberized apron dresses and black plastic luggage closures used as jacket fasteners. His clothes often seem to refer to a nonspecific, postapocalyptic era, where body covering will be cobbled together from the remains of urban destruction. But his fantastic designs have also been prescient; his use of neon colored fabrics easily predated the trend for those materials by several seasons.

When Guillemin was named ready-to-wear designer for Paco Rabanne in 1991, he expressed the desire to continue working on his own line and to keep the two collections separate. His own lines continued to display the inventiveness, unusual fabrics, and devotion to experimental fiber technologies for which he was already known. And, lest the impression be given that he is only a provocateur, he has also made quite wearable, (though still playful) clothing. Guillemin has demonstrated that both before and during his association with Paco Rabanne, he has not been entirely unwilling to create realistic styles.

Like many of his contemporaries, Guillemin revels in the exposure of the human form. The body is to be peeked at through a red plastic raincoat, peered at through slashed fabric, or simply left starkly nude. His penchant for peekaboo styles was protracted in a most surrealistic selection of garments resembling hedges in a topiary garden. Models paraded in clingy dresses and bodysuits covered with tightly-cut net and tulle patches, giving the impression of a group of cartoonish, mobile shrubbery. In the same show, ruffs of stiff tulle were positioned around the figure like fur, with bare portions of the midriff showing through, creating a look somewhat akin to an oversized poodle. (The finale to this event was a bare-breasted stilt-walker.)

For Paco Rabanne, Guillemin has drawn upon the famous looks of the 1960s with their references to space travel and their use of metallic stretch fabrics. He has even revived Rabanne's famed silvery plastic and metal disk garments. But Guillemin is not simply paying homage to the past; he brought his unique vision to Rabanne with dramatic, well-cut modern garments utilizing the latest advances in microfiber technology. Whether creating his own phantasmagorical styles or updating the venerable but forward-looking designs of Paco Rabanne, Guillemin has remained on the cutting edge.

In February 1998, Guillemin was one of four designers to join 23 of Europe's up-and-coming designers in a 45-minute catwalk showing for London Fashion Week, held at the Natural History Museum to support the UK's presidency of the European Union. The spring/summer collection touted the distinct flair of native design displayed by what Doug Henderson, Minister of Europe, called the "brightest young fashion stars." It was a busy year for Guillemin—in fall of the same year, 1998, he was a feature designer at the Prêt à Porter Paris fair; the next spring, he took part in China's International Young Designers Contest.

In mid-May 2000, Guillemin spoke for the environment by addressing the Fashion Cultures Exhibition in Clichy, France, on "Well-Being Through Today's and Tomorrow's Colors." He earned respect for his choice of clean, organic cotton uncontaminated by fertilizers or pesticides and updated viscose manufactured by a non-polluting method.

—Kathleen Paton; updated by Mary Ellen Snodgrass

H

HALSTON

American designer

Born: Roy Halston Frowick in Des Moines, Iowa, 23 April 1932. Education: Studied at Indiana University, Bloomington, and at the Art Institute of Chicago to 1953. Career: Freelance milliner, Chicago, 1952–53; window dresser, Carson Pirie Scott, Chicago, 1954–57; designer and hats division manager, Lilly Daché, New York, 1958–59;

Halston, spring/summer 1978 made-to-order collection. © Bettmann/CORBIS.

millinery and clothing designer, Bergdorf Goodman, New York, 1959–68; founder/designer, Halston Ltd. couture, New York, 1962–73; with Henry Pollack Inc., established Halston International, ready-to-wear, 1970; established Halston Originals with Ben Shaw, 1972; Halston Ltd. renamed Halston Enterprises, 1973, and company, design services and trademark sold to Norton Simon; menswear and signature fragrance introduced 1975; launched Halston I-12 and Halston Z-14 (for men), 1976; company sold to Esmark, Inc., and Halston III collection initiated for J.C. Penney Company, 1983; company sold to Revlon, 1986; introduced Halston Couture (for women), 1988; acquired by Saudis and renamed Halston Borghese Inc., from 1991; Catalyst, fragrance (for women) launched, 1993; Catalyst for Men, 1994; fragrances sold to French Fragrances Inc., 1996; womenswear licenses bought by Tropic Tex and Randolph Duke signed as designer/creative director, 1996–98; launched bed and bath lines for fall 1997; firm sold to Catterton Group and Kevan Hall named designer, 1998; licensed Halston Signature, 1999; firm sold to Neema Clothing Ltd., 1999; Craig Natiello hired as design director, 1999; fragrances acquired by Elizabeth Arden; new fragrance, Halston Unbound, 2001. Exhibitions: Fashion Institute of Technology, New York, 1991 (retrospective). Awards: Coty American Fashion Critics award, 1962, 1969, 1971, 1972, 1974; placed on Fashion Walk of Fame, New York, 2000. Died: 26 March 1990, in San Francisco. Company Address: Halston International, 530 Seventh Avenue, New York, NY 10018, U.S.A.

PUBLICATIONS

On HALSTON:

Books

- Milbank, Caroline Rennolds, Couture: The Great Designers, New York, 1985.
Gaines, Steven, Simply Halston: The Untold Story, New York, 1991, 1993.
Rottman, Fred and Elaine Gross, Halston: An American Original, New York & London, 1999.
Bluttal, Steven, and Patricia, Halston, London, 2001.

Articles

- “The Private World of Halston,” in Harper’s Bazaar (New York), February 1973.
Bowles, J., “Will Halston Take Over the World?” in Esquire, August 1975.
Lemann, N., “The Halstonization of America,” in Washington Monthly (Washington, D.C.), July 1978.
Belkin, Lisa, “The Prisoner of Seventh Avenue,” in the New York Times Magazine, 15 March 1987.

Halston (center) in 1979, surrounded left to right by Martha Graham, Betty Ford, Elizabeth Taylor, and Liza Minnelli, all wearing gowns designed by him. (At the Third Annual Martha Graham Award, New York.) © Bettmann/CORBIS.

Darnton, Nina, "The Inimitable Halston: The Legendary Designer Breaks the Silence on his Current Dilemma," in Newsweek, 7 August 1989.

Morris, Bernadine, "Halston, Symbol of Fashion in America in the 1970s," [obituary] in the New York Times, 28 March 1990.

"Halston: An American Original," [obituary] in WWD, 28 March 1990.

Mulvagh, Jane, "Halston," [obituary] in the Independent (London), 29 March 1990.

"Hat Man: Halston," [obituary] in U.S. News & World Report, 9 April 1990.

Sporkin, Elizabeth, "The Great Halston," [obituary] in People, 9 April 1990.

Brady, James, "A Prince of the Captivity," in Advertising Age, 16 April 1990.

"Halston," [obituary] in Current Biography, May 1990.

Minnelli, Liza, and Polly Mellen, "Halston: 1932–1990," in Vogue, July 1990.

Gaines, Steven, "The Man Who Sold His Name," in Vanity Fair, September 1991.

"Halston: Modernist Master," in Connoisseur (New York), November 1991.

Hoppe, Karen, "Halston Borghese: Revamping, Retrenching, Revitalized," in Drug & Cosmetic Industry, December 1994.

Born, Pete, "Halston Borghese Seeks a Partner," in WWD, 14 July 1995.

Fine, Jenny B., "Halston Borghese being Sold," in WWD, 19 January 1996.

"French Fragrances Purchasing Four Halston Borghese Scent Brands," in WWD, 13 February 1996.

Lockwood, Lisa, "Halston: Classic Comeback," in WWD, 30 August 1996.

Pagoda, Dianne M., "Halston Taps Duke for Top Design Post," in WWD, 24 September 1996.

D'Innocenzio, Anne, "The Halston Blitz," in WWD, 26 March 1997.

Gault, Ylonda, "...Halston's Back and Trying to Convert Men," in Crain's New York Business, 19 January 1998.

D'Innocenzio, Anne, "Catterton Signs Deal for Halston," in WWD, 28 April 1998.

Gault, Ylonda, "Halston's New Owner Tries to Re-Revive Brand," in Crain's New York Business, 25 May 1998.

Young, Vicki M., "Duke Sues Halston for Breach of Contract," in WWD, 15 July 1998.

- D'Innocenzo, Anne, "Halston in Deal with Sinolink to Produce Its Signature Line," in WWD, 14 May 1999.
- _____, "Halston Rehires Kevan Hall," in WWD, 17 July 1999.
- _____, "Halston Assets Acquired by Neema," in WWD, 6 December 1999.
- McCants, Leonard, "Halston Sets Designer Line for Fall," in WWD, 14 November 2000.
- "Guise and Dolls," in WWD, 24 September 2001.
- Braunstein, Peter, "Obsessed with Halston," in WWD, 12 October 2001.

* * *

The life of Roy Halston Frowick was marked by deeply American directness. He was known internationally, and in a nonchalant elegance that stripped away all that was superfluous in his life and art, Halston was the creation of his own obsessive, workaholic achievements. In the 1970s and early 1980s Halston was not only the supreme American fashion designer, but the quintessential one.

Again and again, Halston would say to the press, as he told Eugenia Sheppard in the New York Post (7 February 1973), "Women make fashion. Designers suggest, but it's what women do with the clothes that does the trick." While this modest disavowal was in part canny public relations, granting to the client or potential client the creativity of dress, Halston believed his statement. He recognized and accounted for the women who would wear the clothing as much as for his own creation and acknowledged a partnership between designer and wearer. One aspect of the partnership was Halston's continuous synergy with important clients, beginning with his millinery work which, after all, started from the top to reconcile personal attitude and physiognomy with apparel.

Later in his career, as he strove to be the "total designer," Halston's personal affection for and connections to clients in show business, design, dance, and public life gave him an intimate and abiding affiliation with the wearer. And when he sought to dress every woman, there was a grounded, natural aspect to Halston that readily reminded the wearer this cryptically simple designer was born in Des Moines, Iowa and raised in Evansville, Indiana.

If Halston ascribed the social function to the wearer, he himself was the consummate creator of the garment in formal terms and his work corresponded to the minimalism in American arts. His geometry of design, employing bias as the three-dimensional element causing the geometry to drape splendidly on the body, was as conceptual as that of Vionnet. Some design problems were played out in paper origami, as he created twisted forms in white paper on a black lacquer tray. Discovering such form, Halston projected it onto the body with absolute integrity, cutting as little as possible, and allowing the simplicity of the two-dimensional design to be felt, even as it assumed form on the body.

Likewise Halston's colors were as selective as Mondrian's, preferring ivory, black, and red, but knowing that fuchsia, electric blue, or deep burgundy could provide accent and emphasis. Of textiles, he worked with cashmere, silk and rayon jerseys, double-faced wools, and Ultrasuede. His machine-washable Ultrasuede shirtwaist, which sold 60,000 copies, was one of the most popular dresses in America in the 1970s—in its utmost simplicity, the same dress could be worn in a multitude of ways to allow each woman to wear it in her own personal style. His rich double-faced wool coats were the luxury of color fields, an art brought to apparel; his athletic looks in bodysuits and sports-inspired dressing were as much an anticipation of the late 1980s American fashion as they were renewals of 1940s and 1950s Claire McCardell. He could dress a Martha Graham dancer as readily as he could create a mass-market dress.

Halston's eveningwear was acclaimed for its glittery, gossamer shimmer, but often unacknowledged for the same principles of simplicity. Working on the bias, Halston caressed the body with spiralling scarfs of form. His one-piece, held-at-the-shoulder "orange-peel" dress was the product of a deft hand, like that of the fruit peeler. His evening jackets were often nothing more than rings of material twisted into cocoon fantasies. As Liza Minnelli has said of Halston, he made one feel comfortable and feel beautiful.

Merging the special chic of a custom business and a vast ambition to dress everyone in the world was Halston's high goal, briefly achieved in the late 1970s and early 1980s. But business changes ignited the American Icarus' wings and he plummeted to earth, having lost most his empire and the ability to do what was most precious to him—designing. His company was bought and sold numerous times before his death in 1990, and in 1992 was acquired by Saudi businessmen who combined it with the Borghese fragrances to become Halston Borghese Inc.

New fragrances bearing the Halston name were introduced in 1994 and 1995, but the name and its legacy languished until the company was dismantled in 1996. French Fragrances Inc. bought the Halston scents; Tropic Tex Apparel bought the remainder of the Halston's products. "We wanted to bring Halston to the next millennium," Carmine Porcelli, Halston's new director of licensing, told WWD (30 August 1996). To support the reintroduction of the Halston brand and image, Tropic Tex launched a major advertising campaign and brought Randolph Duke on board as creative director.

Over the next few years, the Halston name was licensed for beds and linens, scarves, belts, handbags, hosiery, sunglasses, jewelry, timepieces, leather apparel, sleepwear, and foundations. In the capable hands of Duke, Halston Signature womenswear regained much of its cachet—trunk shows at Bergdorf Goodman and Saks Fifth Avenue sold over $200,000-worth of couture in a few days in 1997. A menswear launch, however, was not as successful and the overexposure in licensing caught up with Tropic Tex. After experiencing financial difficulties, Tropic Tex agreed to sell Halston International to the Connecticut-based Catterton Group in April 1998.

Halston's new owners fired Duke and hired Kevan Hall, who had worked there briefly earlier in the year and abruptly left. Yet by 1999 Catterton had sold Halston's assets to Neema Clothing Ltd., which then hired Craig Natiello as design director. A new Halston Signature menswear line debuted in 2001 after a series of delays, and Natiello had settled in with his womenswear designs. Women's Wear Daily (24 September 2001) commented, "After some rough going, designer Craig Natiello seems to be refining his vision at Halston. While still sexy and amply embellished, his spring collection has a newly controlled feeling, expressed in short, delicately beaded layered dresses, printed chiffon gowns and long skirts."

While the Halston brand spun out of control during the designer's lifetime, it was nothing compared to after his death. In the 21st century, however, the name Halston was again conjured up images of elegance and luxury in womenswear was emerging in menswear as well.

—Richard Martin and Sydonie Benét

HAMNETT, Katharine

British designer

Born: Gravesend, 1948. Education: Studied at Cheltenham Ladies College and at St Martin's School of Art, London, 1965–69. Family: Children: Samuel and William. Career: Cofounder, Tuttabanken Sportswear, London, 1970; freelance designer, London, Paris, Rome and Hong Kong, 1970–79; Katharine Hamnett, Ltd. founded, London, 1979; menswear line introduced, 1982; launched "Choose Life" shirts, 1983; flagship London shop and three others opened, 1986; showed spring/summer womenswear collection at the Natural History Museum, 1995; men's business suit collections—the "body" suit, 1996. Awards: International Institute for Cotton Designer of the Year award, 1982; British Fashion Industry Designer of the Year award, 1984; Bath Museum of Costume Dress of the Year award, 1984; Menswear Designer of the Year award, 1984; British Knitting and Clothing Export Council award, 1988. Address: 202 New North Road, London N1 7BJ, England.

PUBLICATIONS

On HAMNETT:

Books

Coleridge, Nicholas, The Fashion Conspiracy, London, 1988.
Stegemeyer, Anne, Who's Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.

Articles

- Hall, Dinah, "Streets Ahead," in You, magazine of the Mail on Sunday (London), 21 August 1983.
 Warner, Marina, "Counter-Couture," in Connoisseur (London), May 1984.
 "Katharine Hamnett: La mode pour sauver le monde," in Elle (Paris), September 1984.
 Etherington-Smith, Meredith, "New Guard/Old Guard: Fashion Designers Katharine Hamnett and Jean Muir," in Ultra, December 1984.
 Buckley, Richard, "Katharine the Great: Miss Hamnett Talks," in DNR: The Magazine (New York), February 1985.
 Polan, Brenda, "Under the Hamnett Influence: 12 Pages of Key Looks for Summer," in Cosmopolitan (London), March 1985.
 Roberts, Yvonne, "The Queen of Radical Chic," in the Sunday Express Magazine (London), 9 March 1986.
 "Designer Reports. Summer 87. London: Katharine Hamnett," in International Textiles (London), December 1986.
 Stan, Adelle-Marie, "Four Designing Women: Donna Karan, Liz Claiborne, Diane von Furstenberg, Katherine Hamnett," in Ms. Magazine (New York), November 1986.
 "Katharine Hamnett Interview," in Art and Design (London), December 1986.
 "Be Bardot Says Hamnett," in the Sunday Times Magazine (London), 1 February 1987.
 Mower, Sarah, "British Style: The Designer Star Katharine Hamnett," in Vogue (London), February 1987.
 Cocks, Jay, "Been There, Seen That, Done That: London's Katherine Hamnett Has a Deft Hand for Funk," in Time, 16 March 1987.
 Cottam, Francis, "Katharine Hamnett," in Unique (Bridgeview, Illinois), No. 3, 1987.

- Rowe, Gillian, "Katharine Hamnett," in The Observer (London), 31 January 1988.
 "Katharine Hamnett Goes It Alone in London," in Fashion Weekly (London), 24 March 1988.
 "Hamnett: Retailing Push for 1989," in Fashion Weekly (London), 5 May 1988.
 Filmer, Deny, "Katharine Hamnett," in Cosmopolitan (London), July 1988.
 Cottam, Francis, "Katharine Hamnett," in Clothes Show (London), November 1988.
 "Perspectives," in Blueprint (London), November 1988.
 Manser, José, "Nigel's Fishing Trip," in Designers' Journal (London), January 1989.
 Hume, Marion, "Hamnett Soars to Designer Stardom," in the Sunday Times (London), 5 March 1989.
 "Euro Hamnett," in Cosmopolitan (London), October 1989.
 "Sex, Money, and Golden Oldies: Katharine Hamnett, Fashion's Fireball," in The Independent (London), 14 October 1989.
 Mathur, Paul, "Hamnett," in Blitz (London), November 1989.
 Mills, Simon, "Katharine Hamnett," in Sky (London), February 1990.
 Polan, Brenda, "Katharine's Cutting Edge," in The Independent (London), 10 March 1991.
 Goodkin, Judy, "Fashion Rebel with a Cause," in the Sunday Times (London), 5 May 1991.
 Hochswender, Woody, "Turn-of-the-Century Chic," in Esquire (New York), October 1995.

* * *

A British designer as much recognized for her political and environmental beliefs as she is for her catwalk collections, Katharine Hamnett designed some of the most plagiarized fashion ideas in the 1980s. Hamnett set up her own company in 1979 after freelancing for various European companies for ten years. Although the designer claims she never intended to become involved in the manufacturing side of the fashion industry, preferring to concentrate solely on design, she was often, as a freelancer, treated badly. In 1979 she produced her own collection under the Katharine Hamnett Ltd. label, of which six jackets were taken by the London fashion retailer, Joseph Ettedgui, and subsequently sold out. Hamnett's early collections utilized parachute silk, cotton jersey, and drill, which she cut as functional unisex styles, based on traditional workwear that became her hallmark and, like many of her designs, spawned a thousand imitations.

Her nomination as British Fashion Industry Designer of the Year in 1984 testified to her influence in the early years of that decade. One of Hamnett's most influential designs was the idea of the slogan t-shirt bearing statements about political and environmental issues in bold print on plain white backgrounds. Perhaps the most famous read "58% Don't Want Pershing," which Hamnett wore when she met Margaret Thatcher at a Downing Street reception in 1984. Like Coco Chanel before her, Hamnett sees imitation as a form of flattery—particularly in the case of her slogan t-shirts which, she says, were meant to be copied to help promote her cause. Another example of Hamnett's obsession with politics was seen in the launch of her own magazine, Tomorrow, in 1985, where the designer attempted to parlay both fashion trends and political views. Unfortunately this combination was not a great success and the magazine folded after the first issue.

By 1986 a change was evident in Hamnett's design as she embraced the theme of sex as power with her Power Dressing collection aimed at postfeminist women. Since then her collections have become decidedly less workwear-oriented, to which critical reactions have been somewhat mixed.

Although the slogan t-shirts are no longer part of her collection, Hamnett's devotion to environmental issues continues to play an important role in her approach to fashion design. One project in which Hamnett became involved is the Green Cotton 2000 campaign, launched in conjunction with the Pesticides Trust in 1990, which aimed to reduce the harmful waste and discharged effluent produced by the textile industry. The power of the media is seen by Hamnett as a vital instrument in her personal campaign for the protection of the environment, and her fashion has provided an ideal vehicle. Hamnett admits she has more publicity than she needs to sell the clothes themselves, and can afford to use her influence as a designer to promote her own causes. However, while undoubtedly a major force in British fashion during the 1980s, along with John Galliano and Vivienne Westwood, her influence as a designer declined somewhat in recent years.

Hamnett's latest commitment, men's fashion, is yet another controversial career move that has not only brought her fame and fortune, but heated debate. Where styles for women were typically form-fitting and revealing to the body, men's styles were always baggy, oversized, and even shapeless. Men's bodies were not the focus; they had fewer options in their wardrobes, and fewer options for what was acceptable. It was Hamnett who changed this trend.

The highly opinionated and edgy British designer expanded her collection to focus primarily on the workplace. Slim suits, tight-fitting sport shirts, body-hugging knits, and chunky loafers—to be worn without socks—were just some of the prime examples from Hamnett's more recent collections. Ties, shoes, eyewear, and accessories also played a big part in her lines. Some say these styles resembled those of the early 1960s, and some say that's where they should have stayed. Although most of what Hamnett designed included pantsuits and jackets, they seemed to lack the professionalism most workplaces required. Allowing a male employee to show up to work in an iridescent, single-breasted slim suit with Lycra was certainly not the standard dress code of many companies.

In 1997, Hamnett escaped the runway scene and had an unforgettable show in Milan. It was a performance of two male models in shiny silk suits, lounge-lizard hats and pointy shoes. To many critic's surprise, the show was a success. Women absolutely loved it; as for the men however, well, that may take some getting used to.

Hamnett's most important contribution to fashion, and the one for which she will best be remembered, was her use of clothing as a vehicle for political and environmental change. Her success as a fashion designer enabled her to ultimately pursue her commitment to these issues.

—Catherine Woram; updated by Diana Idzelis

HARDWICK, Cathy

American designer

Born: Cathaline Kaesuk Sur, in Seoul, Korea, 30 December 1933; immigrated to the U.S., 1952; naturalized, 1959. Education: Studied music in Korea and Japan. Family: Married Anthony Hardwick, 1966 (divorced); four children. Career: Freelance designer and boutique owner, San Francisco, circa 1966–70; knitwear designer, Alvin Duskin, San Francisco, 1960s, and Dranella, Copenhagen; moved to New York, 1960s; sportswear designer, Pranx, New York; designer, Cathy Hardwick 'n' Friends, New York, 1972; president/designer, Cathy Hardwick Ltd., New York, 1975–81, and Cathy Hardwick Design Studio, New York, from 1977; company reorganized, 1988; additionally, sportswear designer for Sears Roebuck and Co., from 1990. Awards: Coty American Fashion Critics award, 1975. Address: 215 West 40th Street, New York, NY 10018, USA.

PUBLICATIONS

On HARDWICK:

Books

Morris, Bernadine, and Barbara Walz, The Fashion Makers, New York, 1978.

Milbank, Caroline Rennolds, New York Fashion: The Evolution of American Style, New York, 1989.

Stegemeyer, Anne, Who's Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.

Articles

O'Sullivan, Joan, "She's a Natural," in Living Today (Wheaton, Illinois), 16 September 1977.

Colborn, Marge, "East Village with Seoul: A Hands On Approach to Fall," in the Detroit News (Michigan), 4 May 1986.

Daria, Irene, "Cathy Hardwick: Craft, Compromise and Creation," in WWD, 3 August 1987.

Klensch, Elsa, "Cathy Harwick—Success with Style," in Vogue (New York), June 1988.

News brief, "Cathy Hardwick Designs Clothes for Sears," Chicago Tribune, 19 December 1990.

Kornbluth, Jesse, "Manhattan Romance," in Architectural Digest, February 1997.

Klensch, Elsa, "Mario Buatta: Fluid Interiors," in Style on CNN (New York), 25 September 1997.

* * *

Cathy Hardwick has designed ready-to-wear for the audience she knows best—the modern career woman with an active lifestyle. There is a certain spirit and success about Hardwick's designs that come from this defining relationship to the clothing and its purpose. Hardwick's collections consistently offer women clothing with ease and simplicity, appealing to the young and young-minded spirit of the confident, self-assured businesswoman. Her clothing is not merely a somber uniform, but rather has an air of wit and sophistication that makes it fun, worn by the stylish young woman who is secure with her life and is moving in a positive direction. "Know your physical type and personal style, and be true to it. Any current look can be adapted in silhouette, scale, and color so it's right for you. You have to feel comfortable. The most fabulous clothes won't work if you're self-conscious," Hardwick said in a February 1978 Harper's Bazaar, article.

Recognized early in her career as a talented young designer involved in creating simplistic, modern clothing, Hardwick began

By 1986 a change was evident in Hamnett's design as she embraced the theme of sex as power with her Power Dressing collection aimed at postfeminist women. Since then her collections have become decidedly less workwear-oriented, to which critical reactions have been somewhat mixed.

Although the slogan t-shirts are no longer part of her collection, Hamnett's devotion to environmental issues continues to play an important role in her approach to fashion design. One project in which Hamnett became involved is the Green Cotton 2000 campaign, launched in conjunction with the Pesticides Trust in 1990, which aimed to reduce the harmful waste and discharged effluent produced by the textile industry. The power of the media is seen by Hamnett as a vital instrument in her personal campaign for the protection of the environment, and her fashion has provided an ideal vehicle. Hamnett admits she has more publicity than she needs to sell the clothes themselves, and can afford to use her influence as a designer to promote her own causes. However, while undoubtedly a major force in British fashion during the 1980s, along with John Galliano and Vivienne Westwood, her influence as a designer declined somewhat in recent years.

Hamnett's latest commitment, men's fashion, is yet another controversial career move that has not only brought her fame and fortune, but heated debate. Where styles for women were typically form-fitting and revealing to the body, men's styles were always baggy, oversized, and even shapeless. Men's bodies were not the focus; they had fewer options in their wardrobes, and fewer options for what was acceptable. It was Hamnett who changed this trend.

The highly opinionated and edgy British designer expanded her collection to focus primarily on the workplace. Slim suits, tight-fitting sport shirts, body-hugging knits, and chunky loafers—to be worn without socks—were just some of the prime examples from Hamnett's more recent collections. Ties, shoes, eyewear, and accessories also played a big part in her lines. Some say these styles resembled those of the early 1960s, and some say that's where they should have stayed. Although most of what Hamnett designed included pantsuits and jackets, they seemed to lack the professionalism most workplaces required. Allowing a male employee to show up to work in an iridescent, single-breasted slim suit with Lycra was certainly not the standard dress code of many companies.

In 1997, Hamnett escaped the runway scene and had an unforgettable show in Milan. It was a performance of two male models in shiny silk suits, lounge-lizard hats and pointy shoes. To many critic's surprise, the show was a success. Women absolutely loved it; as for the men however, well, that may take some getting used to.

Hamnett's most important contribution to fashion, and the one for which she will best be remembered, was her use of clothing as a vehicle for political and environmental change. Her success as a fashion designer enabled her to ultimately pursue her commitment to these issues.

—Catherine Woram; updated by Diana Idzelis

HARDWICK, Cathy

American designer

Born: Cathaline Kaesuk Sur, in Seoul, Korea, 30 December 1933; immigrated to the U.S., 1952; naturalized, 1959. Education: Studied music in Korea and Japan. Family: Married Anthony Hardwick, 1966 (divorced); four children. Career: Freelance designer and boutique owner, San Francisco, circa 1966–70; knitwear designer, Alvin Duskin, San Francisco, 1960s, and Dranella, Copenhagen; moved to New York, 1960s; sportswear designer, Pranx, New York; designer, Cathy Hardwick 'n' Friends, New York, 1972; president/designer, Cathy Hardwick Ltd., New York, 1975–81, and Cathy Hardwick Design Studio, New York, from 1977; company reorganized, 1988; additionally, sportswear designer for Sears Roebuck and Co., from 1990. Awards: Coty American Fashion Critics award, 1975. Address: 215 West 40th Street, New York, NY 10018, USA.

PUBLICATIONS

On HARDWICK:

Books

Morris, Bernadine, and Barbara Walz, The Fashion Makers, New York, 1978.

Milbank, Caroline Rennolds, New York Fashion: The Evolution of American Style, New York, 1989.

Stegemeyer, Anne, Who's Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.

Articles

O'Sullivan, Joan, "She's a Natural," in Living Today (Wheaton, Illinois), 16 September 1977.

Colborn, Marge, "East Village with Seoul: A Hands On Approach to Fall," in the Detroit News (Michigan), 4 May 1986.

Daria, Irene, "Cathy Hardwick: Craft, Compromise and Creation," in WWD, 3 August 1987.

Klensch, Elsa, "Cathy Harwick—Success with Style," in Vogue (New York), June 1988.

News brief, "Cathy Hardwick Designs Clothes for Sears," Chicago Tribune, 19 December 1990.

Kornbluth, Jesse, "Manhattan Romance," in Architectural Digest, February 1997.

Klensch, Elsa, "Mario Buatta: Fluid Interiors," in Style on CNN (New York), 25 September 1997.

* * *

Cathy Hardwick has designed ready-to-wear for the audience she knows best—the modern career woman with an active lifestyle. There is a certain spirit and success about Hardwick's designs that come from this defining relationship to the clothing and its purpose. Hardwick's collections consistently offer women clothing with ease and simplicity, appealing to the young and young-minded spirit of the confident, self-assured businesswoman. Her clothing is not merely a somber uniform, but rather has an air of wit and sophistication that makes it fun, worn by the stylish young woman who is secure with her life and is moving in a positive direction. "Know your physical type and personal style, and be true to it. Any current look can be adapted in silhouette, scale, and color so it's right for you. You have to feel comfortable. The most fabulous clothes won't work if you're self-conscious," Hardwick said in a February 1978 Harper's Bazaar, article.

Recognized early in her career as a talented young designer involved in creating simplistic, modern clothing, Hardwick began designing knitwear for Alvin Duskin in San Francisco in the late 1960s. The designs were well-received and commercially successful. Soon after, she developed her own company and continued to design knitwear as a part of her collections throughout the 1970s and 1980s. She continued to design under her own label in New York, using almost exclusively natural fibers.

Hardwick's design success has been a result of the masterful execution of her pure and basic principles—neutral colors and simplicity of form. By centering her collections around neutral colors and relating the colors of current collections to previous ones, the wearer can develop a wardrobe of pieces that work together. Her designs recognize fashion trends but always retain a clean, simplistic style that is distinctly her own. Hardwick's clothing is associated with the modern woman's ability to go from an effective day at work to an evening out with minimal changes.

A 1980 advertisement for B. Altman and Co. portrayed a Hardwick collection coordinated in different ways to suit the style of the potential wearer. The ad copy read, "Hardwick's...forward-looking collection lets you choose the new length you like, a little or a whole lot shorter. Another fine fashion point you should notice: these separates are all cut and colored (in magenta and black) so you can build your own new-decade pants-set." Such a philosophy of personal style and selection has been apparent in Hardwick's collections throughout her career.

Based on strong, simple shapes reminiscent of traditional Korean clothing, Hardwick's collections hark back to her childhood. She was born to a Korean family of diplomats and financiers including her grandfather, who was an ambassador to France. Her clothing reflects her lifelong exposure to and depth of understanding of the fusion of Eastern and Western styles. The chinoiserie elements in the designs seem to be a part of the total vision and philosophy she has about clothing rather than a motif simply applied to Western fashion. In her first formal show in New York in 1974, Hardwick showed obi style wrapping in the closures of her skirts and trousers along with Oriental prints and accessories. In 1975, she showed the effectiveness of shaping a "Big Dress" with an obi-inspired tie. Earlier Hardwick incorporated frog closures in her mandarin collared jacket for a more direct use of the Eastern look. The mandarin collar and frog closures were used again in her spring 1994 collection on light and easy shaped tops.

Hardwick's style hasn't stopped at fashion. The freelance designer is as true to her passion for individualism in clothing design as she is to individualism within the home. Inspired by interior decorator Mario Buatta, Hardwick transformed her home into a modern masterpiece, which seems to have somehow maintained the simplicity and quaintness of English country living. Convention dominates the five-star apartment, with its 18th-century twist to modern conveniences. What was once a 2,000-square-foot loft became a traditional apartment with rooms overlooking Park Avenue.

Keeping up with the American designer's style of living, however, is the greatest challenge any Hardwick admirer would endure, not to mention Hardwick herself. The apartment is nowhere near being finished, nor will it ever be finished. "Rooms and houses are never finished," Buatta claims, "It's all a work in progress. You always buy new things. You always travel. You always change. After all, it's a living room, not a dead room." And for Hardwick, this means allowing herself to sit back while Buatta takes charge (with Hardwick's permission, of course).

While Hardwick's interest in home furnishings seem to have taken center stage in her life at the moment, fashion design, she says, is still her greatest love. There is no word, however, as to when she plans to continue with her career.

—Dennita Sewell; updated by Diana Idzelis

HARP, Holly

American designer

Born: Buffalo, New York, 24 October 1939. Education: Attended Radcliffe College; studied art and fashion design, North Texas State University. Family: Married Jim Harp, 1965 (divorced, 1975); son: Tommy. Career: Opened first boutique on Sunset Strip, Los Angeles, 1968; opened in-store boutique, Henri Bendel, New York, 1972; developed wholesale collection, 1973. Also designed for Simplicity Patterns, Fieldcrest Linens, and Hollywood films including Cabaret, Sleeper, and She Devil. Died: 24 April 1995.

PUBLICATIONS

On HARP:

Books

- Milinaire, C., and C. Troy, Cheap Chic, New York, 1975.
 Morris, Bernadine, and Barbara Walz, The Fashion Makers, New York, 1978.
 Lobenthal, Joel, Radical Rags: Fashions of the Sixties, New York, 1990.
 Stegemeyer, Anne, Who's Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.

Articles

- "Holly's Harp," in WWD, 7 November 1974.
 "Rainy Day Women?" in People, 21 February 1977.
 Sajbel, Maureen, "The Unsinkable Holly Harp," in WWD, 6 January 1987.
 "Holly Harp," obituary, in WWD, 26 April 1995.
 Lynn, Alison, "Passages," obituary, People, 25 May 1995.

*

I've been designing clothes since the late 1960s. I always try to remind myself that I am dressing a woman's soul as well as her body. Souls and bodies do best when they are relaxed, fluid, and comfortable. They love to play "dress-up." They love a good laugh as well as perfect quiet and softness. I hope my clothes reflect a woman's soul.

—Holly Harp

* * *

Many students are torn between the glamor of stage or film design and high fashion. Holly Harp was able to merge both her love of costume and fashion into a successful professional career that lasted more than 25 years. Harp went with an early instinct after designing sandals on a whim, and returned to college with her sights set on designing knitwear for Alvin Duskin in San Francisco in the late 1960s. The designs were well-received and commercially successful. Soon after, she developed her own company and continued to design knitwear as a part of her collections throughout the 1970s and 1980s. She continued to design under her own label in New York, using almost exclusively natural fibers.

Hardwick's design success has been a result of the masterful execution of her pure and basic principles—neutral colors and simplicity of form. By centering her collections around neutral colors and relating the colors of current collections to previous ones, the wearer can develop a wardrobe of pieces that work together. Her designs recognize fashion trends but always retain a clean, simplistic style that is distinctly her own. Hardwick's clothing is associated with the modern woman's ability to go from an effective day at work to an evening out with minimal changes.

A 1980 advertisement for B. Altman and Co. portrayed a Hardwick collection coordinated in different ways to suit the style of the potential wearer. The ad copy read, "Hardwick's...forward-looking collection lets you choose the new length you like, a little or a whole lot shorter. Another fine fashion point you should notice: these separates are all cut and colored (in magenta and black) so you can build your own new-decade pants-set." Such a philosophy of personal style and selection has been apparent in Hardwick's collections throughout her career.

Based on strong, simple shapes reminiscent of traditional Korean clothing, Hardwick's collections hark back to her childhood. She was born to a Korean family of diplomats and financiers including her grandfather, who was an ambassador to France. Her clothing reflects her lifelong exposure to and depth of understanding of the fusion of Eastern and Western styles. The chinoiserie elements in the designs seem to be a part of the total vision and philosophy she has about clothing rather than a motif simply applied to Western fashion. In her first formal show in New York in 1974, Hardwick showed obi style wrapping in the closures of her skirts and trousers along with Oriental prints and accessories. In 1975, she showed the effectiveness of shaping a "Big Dress" with an obi-inspired tie. Earlier Hardwick incorporated frog closures in her mandarin collared jacket for a more direct use of the Eastern look. The mandarin collar and frog closures were used again in her spring 1994 collection on light and easy shaped tops.

Hardwick's style hasn't stopped at fashion. The freelance designer is as true to her passion for individualism in clothing design as she is to individualism within the home. Inspired by interior decorator Mario Buatta, Hardwick transformed her home into a modern masterpiece, which seems to have somehow maintained the simplicity and quaintness of English country living. Convention dominates the five-star apartment, with its 18th-century twist to modern conveniences. What was once a 2,000-square-foot loft became a traditional apartment with rooms overlooking Park Avenue.

Keeping up with the American designer's style of living, however, is the greatest challenge any Hardwick admirer would endure, not to mention Hardwick herself. The apartment is nowhere near being finished, nor will it ever be finished. "Rooms and houses are never finished," Buatta claims, "It's all a work in progress. You always buy new things. You always travel. You always change. After all, it's a living room, not a dead room." And for Hardwick, this means allowing herself to sit back while Buatta takes charge (with Hardwick's permission, of course).

While Hardwick's interest in home furnishings seem to have taken center stage in her life at the moment, fashion design, she says, is still her greatest love. There is no word, however, as to when she plans to continue with her career.

—Dennita Sewell; updated by Diana Idzelis

HARP, Holly

American designer

Born: Buffalo, New York, 24 October 1939. Education: Attended Radcliffe College; studied art and fashion design, North Texas State University. Family: Married Jim Harp, 1965 (divorced, 1975); son: Tommy. Career: Opened first boutique on Sunset Strip, Los Angeles, 1968; opened in-store boutique, Henri Bendel, New York, 1972; developed wholesale collection, 1973. Also designed for Simplicity Patterns, Fieldcrest Linens, and Hollywood films including Cabaret, Sleeper, and She Devil. Died: 24 April 1995.

PUBLICATIONS

On HARP:

Books

- Milinaire, C., and C. Troy, Cheap Chic, New York, 1975.
 Morris, Bernadine, and Barbara Walz, The Fashion Makers, New York, 1978.
 Lobenthal, Joel, Radical Rags: Fashions of the Sixties, New York, 1990.
 Stegemeyer, Anne, Who's Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.

Articles

- "Holly's Harp," in WWD, 7 November 1974.
 "Rainy Day Women?" in People, 21 February 1977.
 Sajbel, Maureen, "The Unsinkable Holly Harp," in WWD, 6 January 1987.
 "Holly Harp," obituary, in WWD, 26 April 1995.
 Lynn, Alison, "Passages," obituary, People, 25 May 1995.

*

I've been designing clothes since the late 1960s. I always try to remind myself that I am dressing a woman's soul as well as her body. Souls and bodies do best when they are relaxed, fluid, and comfortable. They love to play "dress-up." They love a good laugh as well as perfect quiet and softness. I hope my clothes reflect a woman's soul.

—Holly Harp

* * *

Many students are torn between the glamor of stage or film design and high fashion. Holly Harp was able to merge both her love of costume and fashion into a successful professional career that lasted more than 25 years. Harp went with an early instinct after designing sandals on a whim, and returned to college with her sights set on becoming a designer. She studied in the theatre department and worked on her fashion degree. Her style was dramatic, feminine, and refined.

Harp moved to the West Coast during the height of hippiedom in 1966. San Francisco hippies tended to borrow street styles and recycle clothing salvaged from the local Goodwill, while Los Angeles, where Harp set up shop, was more interested in marketing styles and trends in the form of new designs. The latter was more of a "rich hippie" look. Harp was inspired by the youthful street fashions and was referred to by the Los Angeles Times as the city's "doyenne of feathers and fringe." Her rock star clients had included Janis Joplin and Grace Slick, who loved Harp's wonderful batiks, feathers, and hand-dyed fabrics. Harp's clothes suited the tastes of the youthful population who loved psychedelic colors and melodramatic effects.

It was more than being in the right place at the right time. Harp began to distill her designs into her own personal expression. During the 1970s there was more emphasis on the body. The soft matte jersey Harp experimented with became a signature fabric along with chiffon. There was a continuation of using beadwork, flowers, feathers, and airbrushed designs but with a softer, refined touch. Harp used complicated draping techniques to emphasize feminine qualities rather than the prevailing minimal approach.

Harp became known for making fabulous dresses that attracted the attention of the Hollywood élite. Her customer list reads like a Who's Who: Liza Minelli, Jane Seymour, Lauren Hutton, Bette Midler, Diana Ross, Jane Pauley, and Sally Field were just a few. Her clients also included a long list of famous male customers such as Ryan O'Neal, Jon Voight, and Jack Nicholson, who selected Harp's clothing for the women in their lives. Some Harp originals have appeared in Hollywood films as well. She successfully challenged the glitz Hollywood image with nostalgically beautiful designs.

The ability to create clothing with both romantic and classic qualities carried Harp through the 1980s into the 1990s; by limiting her production and not overextending herself, Harp maintained the integrity of her designs. Whatever bright and trend-setting clothes were in her future, however, were cut short: Holly Harp died of cancer in April of 1995. She was 55.

—Myra Walker; updated by Nelly Rhodes

Norman Hartnell, ca. 1945. © Hulton-Deutsch Collection/CORBIS.

the Royal Victorian Order, 1953; appointed Knight Commander of the Royal Victorian Order, 1977. Died 8 June 1979, in Windsor, Berkshire, England.

PUBLICATIONS

By HARTNELL:

Books

Silver and Gold, London, 1955.
Royal Courts of Fashion, London, 1971.

On HARTNELL:

Books

Brighton Art Gallery, Norman Hartnell (exhibition catalogue), Brighton, 1985.

Kennett, Frances, et al., Norman Hartnell, 1901–1979 (exhibition catalogue), London, 1985.

McDowell, Colin, A Hundred Years of Royal Style, London, 1985.

Milbank, Caroline Rennolds, Couture: The Great Designers, New York, 1985.

Stegemeyer, Anne, Who's Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.

Articles

Wyndham, Francis, "The Pearly King," in Vogue (London), September 1960.

Glynn, Prudence, "Hartnell: The Norman Conquest," in The Times (London), 6 January 1977.

Sinclair, Serena, "For Sir Norman, At Last, a Royal Reward," in the Daily Telegraph (London), 10 January 1977.

HARTNELL, Norman

British designer

Born: London, 12 June 1901. Education: Studied at Magdalen College, Cambridge, 1921–23. Career: Assistant to Court Dressmaker, Mme. Désiré, 1923; opened own dressmaking studio, London, 1923; first Paris showing, 1927; appointed dressmaker to the Royal Family, 1938; designed women's uniforms for the Royal Army Corps and the Red Cross; introduced ready-to-wear lines, from 1942; also designed for Berkertex, from the late 1940s, for Women's Illustrated magazine, 1950–60s, and lingerie line for Saks Fifth Avenue, 1950s; theatrical designer, 1923–60s. Exhibitions: Norman Hartnell, 1901–1979 (retrospective), London, 1985; Norman Hartnell (retrospective), Brighton, 1985; Hartnell: Clothes by the Royal Couturier, 1930s–1960s (retrospective), Bath, 1985–86. Awards: Officier d'Academie, France, 1939; first Royal Warrant received, 1940; Neiman Marcus award, 1947; appointed Member of becoming a designer. She studied in the theatre department and worked on her fashion degree. Her style was dramatic, feminine, and refined.

Harp moved to the West Coast during the height of hippiedom in 1966. San Francisco hippies tended to borrow street styles and recycle clothing salvaged from the local Goodwill, while Los Angeles, where Harp set up shop, was more interested in marketing styles and trends in the form of new designs. The latter was more of a "rich hippie" look. Harp was inspired by the youthful street fashions and was referred to by the Los Angeles Times as the city's "doyenne of feathers and fringe." Her rock star clients had included Janis Joplin and Grace Slick, who loved Harp's wonderful batiks, feathers, and hand-dyed fabrics. Harp's clothes suited the tastes of the youthful population who loved psychedelic colors and melodramatic effects.

It was more than being in the right place at the right time. Harp began to distill her designs into her own personal expression. During the 1970s there was more emphasis on the body. The soft matte jersey Harp experimented with became a signature fabric along with chiffon. There was a continuation of using beadwork, flowers, feathers, and airbrushed designs but with a softer, refined touch. Harp used complicated draping techniques to emphasize feminine qualities rather than the prevailing minimal approach.

Harp became known for making fabulous dresses that attracted the attention of the Hollywood élite. Her customer list reads like a Who's Who: Liza Minelli, Jane Seymour, Lauren Hutton, Bette Midler, Diana Ross, Jane Pauley, and Sally Field were just a few. Her clients also included a long list of famous male customers such as Ryan O'Neal, Jon Voight, and Jack Nicholson, who selected Harp's clothing for the women in their lives. Some Harp originals have appeared in Hollywood films as well. She successfully challenged the glitz Hollywood image with nostalgically beautiful designs.

The ability to create clothing with both romantic and classic qualities carried Harp through the 1980s into the 1990s; by limiting her production and not overextending herself, Harp maintained the integrity of her designs. Whatever bright and trend-setting clothes were in her future, however, were cut short: Holly Harp died of cancer in April of 1995. She was 55.

—Myra Walker; updated by Nelly Rhodes

Norman Hartnell, ca. 1945. © Hulton-Deutsch Collection/CORBIS.

the Royal Victorian Order, 1953; appointed Knight Commander of the Royal Victorian Order, 1977. Died 8 June 1979, in Windsor, Berkshire, England.

PUBLICATIONS

By HARTNELL:

Books

Silver and Gold, London, 1955.
Royal Courts of Fashion, London, 1971.

On HARTNELL:

Books

Brighton Art Gallery, Norman Hartnell (exhibition catalogue), Brighton, 1985.

Kennett, Frances, et al., Norman Hartnell, 1901–1979 (exhibition catalogue), London, 1985.

McDowell, Colin, A Hundred Years of Royal Style, London, 1985.

Milbank, Caroline Rennolds, Couture: The Great Designers, New York, 1985.

Stegemeyer, Anne, Who's Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.

Articles

Wyndham, Francis, "The Pearly King," in Vogue (London), September 1960.

Glynn, Prudence, "Hartnell: The Norman Conquest," in The Times (London), 6 January 1977.

Sinclair, Serena, "For Sir Norman, At Last, a Royal Reward," in the Daily Telegraph (London), 10 January 1977.

HARTNELL, Norman

British designer

Born: London, 12 June 1901. Education: Studied at Magdalen College, Cambridge, 1921–23. Career: Assistant to Court Dressmaker, Mme. Désiré, 1923; opened own dressmaking studio, London, 1923; first Paris showing, 1927; appointed dressmaker to the Royal Family, 1938; designed women's uniforms for the Royal Army Corps and the Red Cross; introduced ready-to-wear lines, from 1942; also designed for Berkertex, from the late 1940s, for Women's Illustrated magazine, 1950–60s, and lingerie line for Saks Fifth Avenue, 1950s; theatrical designer, 1923–60s. Exhibitions: Norman Hartnell, 1901–1979 (retrospective), London, 1985; Norman Hartnell (retrospective), Brighton, 1985; Hartnell: Clothes by the Royal Couturier, 1930s–1960s (retrospective), Bath, 1985–86. Awards: Officier d'Academie, France, 1939; first Royal Warrant received, 1940; Neiman Marcus award, 1947; appointed Member of

- Hessian, Nicky, "Sir Norman Hartnell," in Ritz (London), No. 3, 1977.
- Laurance, Robin, "But Will Sir Norman Arise?" in The Guardian (London), 2 March 1977.
- Scroggle, Jean, "The Norman Conquests," in Homes and Gardens (London), June 1985.
- Hoare, Sarajane, "Relaunch of Ready-to-Wear at Hartnell," in The Observer (London), 9 March 1986.
- McDowell, Colin, "The Rise of the House of Hartnell," in The Guardian (London), 13 March 1986.
- Williams, Antonia, "Hartnell Then and Now," in Vogue (London), August 1986.
- Hume, Marion, "Heart to Hartnell," in Fashion Weekly (London), 15 January 1987.
- Brown, Malcolm, "Trading Places: Peter Moss, Moss Brothers; Manny Silverman, Norman Hartnell," Marketing, 3 December 1987.

* * *

Norman Hartnell began his fashion career working as an assistant to extravagant society couturière Lucile. Through his exposure to this rarefied world of fashion, gossip, decoration, and illicit romance, he was inspired to open his own dressmaking business in 1923, establishing what became one of the best-known and longest-running couture houses in Britain. Situated in the heart of London's Mayfair, the house on Bruton Street always had an air of splendor. A graceful staircase, panelled with mirrors, led up to the splendid salon where gilt mirrors and two giant crystal chandeliers created an air of tranquillity. Seated on their gilt-encrusted chairs, society hostesses, actresses, film stars, debutantes, and royalty watched countless collections float elegantly by.

The early collections shown in both London and Paris quickly established Hartnell's reputation for lavishly embroidered ballgowns in satin and tulle, fur-trimmed suits, and elegantly tailored tweed day ensembles. His first wedding dress fashioned from silver and gold net was a showstopping finale to an early collection and was described as "the eighth wonder of the world" when worn by the bride of Lord Weymouth. Other early commissions included a 1927 wedding dress for romantic novelist and socialite Barbara Cartland, and informal clothes for actress Tallulah Bankhead who scandalized 1920s London with performances both on and off-stage.

Hartnell's clothes often stood apart from fashion, owing a greater allegiance to costume; this was no doubt fueled by his early experience designing theatrical productions while at Cambridge University. He drew inspiration from the saucy French paintings of Watteau and Boucher, purity of line from Italian masters like Botticelli and painters such as Renoir and Tissot for what he described as a touch of "chi chi." Summoned to Buckingham Palace on the succession of King George VI to discuss designs for the coronation dresses of the maids of honor, the King led Hartnell through the hall of Winterhalter portraits. This gave him the inspiration for the crinoline dresses that later become a symbolic royal look for the two monarchs—Queen Elizabeth the Queen Mother and Queen Elizabeth II. The dresses also influenced the silhouette of Dior's New Look of 1947, a line that came to epitomize a postwar return to femininity.

Hartnell was officially appointed dressmaker to the royal family in 1938 and subsequently designed for various royal occasions, eventually being acknowledged for creating a stylistic royal image that remains today. He was responsible for both the wedding dresses of Queen Elizabeth II and Princess Margaret. In 1953 he created the Queen's historic coronation dress, embroidered with the emblems of Great Britain and the Commonwealth. In the late 1990s and early 21st century, the House of Hartnell was still responsible for the personal wardrobe of the Queen Mother.

It could be argued that Hartnell limited himself as a designer by his work for British royalty and aristocracy. He created to promote and protect an establishment, encasing it in a grandiose aura of ornament and glamor, a service honored by a knighthood in 1977. It should be remembered, however, that Hartnell also produced ready-to-wear collections, sold through department stores from 1942 onwards. He also designed for Berkertex and created the uniforms of the British Red Cross and the Women's Royal Army Corps during World War II.

Although Norman Hartnell died in 1979 his legacy was continued in the early 1990s by French couturier Marc Bohan. Bohan designed haute couture and ready-to-wear collections and successfully maintained the Hartnell name for a few years, but the recession of the early 1990s soon took its toll. Norman Hartnell closed its doors in 1992.

—Kevin Almond

HAWES, Elizabeth

American designer

Born: Ridgewood, New Jersey, 16 December 1903. Education: Studied at Vassar College, Poughkeepsie, New York, 1921–25.

Family: Married Ralph Jester in 1930 (divorced, 1934); married Joseph Losey in 1937 (divorced, 1944), son: Gavrik Losey. Career: Worked in Paris as fashion copyist, stylist, journalist, then designed for Nicole Groult, 1925–28; designer and partner, Hawes-Harden, New York, 1928–30; designer, Hawes, Inc., New York, 1930–40; designer, Elizabeth Hawes, Inc., New York, 1948–49; occasional freelance designer, New York and California, 1950–68. Additionally an author, union organizer, and political activist. Exhibitions: Two Modern Artists of Dress: Elizabeth Hawes and Rudi Gernreich, Fashion Institute of Technology, New York, 1967; Brooklyn Museum (retrospective), 1985. Died: 6 September 1971, in New York.

PUBLICATIONS

By HAWES:

Books

- Fashion is Spinach*, New York, 1938.
Men Can Take It, New York, 1939.
Why is a Dress?, New York, 1942.
Good Grooming, Boston, 1942.
Why Women Cry, or Wenches with Wrenches, New York, 1943.
Hurry Up Please, It's Time, New York, 1946.
Anything But Love, New York, 1948.
But Say It Politely, Boston, 1954.
It's Still Spinach, Boston, 1954.

- Hessian, Nicky, "Sir Norman Hartnell," in Ritz (London), No. 3, 1977.
- Laurance, Robin, "But Will Sir Norman Arise?" in The Guardian (London), 2 March 1977.
- Scroggle, Jean, "The Norman Conquests," in Homes and Gardens (London), June 1985.
- Hoare, Sarajane, "Relaunch of Ready-to-Wear at Hartnell," in The Observer (London), 9 March 1986.
- McDowell, Colin, "The Rise of the House of Hartnell," in The Guardian (London), 13 March 1986.
- Williams, Antonia, "Hartnell Then and Now," in Vogue (London), August 1986.
- Hume, Marion, "Heart to Hartnell," in Fashion Weekly (London), 15 January 1987.
- Brown, Malcolm, "Trading Places: Peter Moss, Moss Brothers; Manny Silverman, Norman Hartnell," Marketing, 3 December 1987.

* * *

Norman Hartnell began his fashion career working as an assistant to extravagant society couturière Lucile. Through his exposure to this rarefied world of fashion, gossip, decoration, and illicit romance, he was inspired to open his own dressmaking business in 1923, establishing what became one of the best-known and longest-running couture houses in Britain. Situated in the heart of London's Mayfair, the house on Bruton Street always had an air of splendor. A graceful staircase, panelled with mirrors, led up to the splendid salon where gilt mirrors and two giant crystal chandeliers created an air of tranquillity. Seated on their gilt-encrusted chairs, society hostesses, actresses, film stars, debutantes, and royalty watched countless collections float elegantly by.

The early collections shown in both London and Paris quickly established Hartnell's reputation for lavishly embroidered ballgowns in satin and tulle, fur-trimmed suits, and elegantly tailored tweed day ensembles. His first wedding dress fashioned from silver and gold net was a showstopping finale to an early collection and was described as "the eighth wonder of the world" when worn by the bride of Lord Weymouth. Other early commissions included a 1927 wedding dress for romantic novelist and socialite Barbara Cartland, and informal clothes for actress Tallulah Bankhead who scandalized 1920s London with performances both on and off-stage.

Hartnell's clothes often stood apart from fashion, owing a greater allegiance to costume; this was no doubt fueled by his early experience designing theatrical productions while at Cambridge University. He drew inspiration from the saucy French paintings of Watteau and Boucher, purity of line from Italian masters like Botticelli and painters such as Renoir and Tissot for what he described as a touch of "chi chi." Summoned to Buckingham Palace on the succession of King George VI to discuss designs for the coronation dresses of the maids of honor, the King led Hartnell through the hall of Winterhalter portraits. This gave him the inspiration for the crinoline dresses that later become a symbolic royal look for the two monarchs—Queen Elizabeth the Queen Mother and Queen Elizabeth II. The dresses also influenced the silhouette of Dior's New Look of 1947, a line that came to epitomize a postwar return to femininity.

Hartnell was officially appointed dressmaker to the royal family in 1938 and subsequently designed for various royal occasions, eventually being acknowledged for creating a stylistic royal image that remains today. He was responsible for both the wedding dresses of Queen Elizabeth II and Princess Margaret. In 1953 he created the Queen's historic coronation dress, embroidered with the emblems of Great Britain and the Commonwealth. In the late 1990s and early 21st century, the House of Hartnell was still responsible for the personal wardrobe of the Queen Mother.

It could be argued that Hartnell limited himself as a designer by his work for British royalty and aristocracy. He created to promote and protect an establishment, encasing it in a grandiose aura of ornament and glamor, a service honored by a knighthood in 1977. It should be remembered, however, that Hartnell also produced ready-to-wear collections, sold through department stores from 1942 onwards. He also designed for Berkertex and created the uniforms of the British Red Cross and the Women's Royal Army Corps during World War II.

Although Norman Hartnell died in 1979 his legacy was continued in the early 1990s by French couturier Marc Bohan. Bohan designed haute couture and ready-to-wear collections and successfully maintained the Hartnell name for a few years, but the recession of the early 1990s soon took its toll. Norman Hartnell closed its doors in 1992.

—Kevin Almond

HAWES, Elizabeth

American designer

Born: Ridgewood, New Jersey, 16 December 1903. Education: Studied at Vassar College, Poughkeepsie, New York, 1921–25.

Family: Married Ralph Jester in 1930 (divorced, 1934); married Joseph Losey in 1937 (divorced, 1944), son: Gavrik Losey. Career: Worked in Paris as fashion copyist, stylist, journalist, then designed for Nicole Groult, 1925–28; designer and partner, Hawes-Harden, New York, 1928–30; designer, Hawes, Inc., New York, 1930–40; designer, Elizabeth Hawes, Inc., New York, 1948–49; occasional freelance designer, New York and California, 1950–68. Additionally an author, union organizer, and political activist. Exhibitions: Two Modern Artists of Dress: Elizabeth Hawes and Rudi Gernreich, Fashion Institute of Technology, New York, 1967; Brooklyn Museum (retrospective), 1985. Died: 6 September 1971, in New York.

PUBLICATIONS

By HAWES:

Books

- Fashion is Spinach*, New York, 1938.
Men Can Take It, New York, 1939.
Why is a Dress?, New York, 1942.
Good Grooming, Boston, 1942.
Why Women Cry, or Wenches with Wrenches, New York, 1943.
Hurry Up Please, It's Time, New York, 1946.
Anything But Love, New York, 1948.
But Say It Politely, Boston, 1954.
It's Still Spinach, Boston, 1954.

Articles

Writing as "Parasite," fashion items in the New Yorker, 1927–28.
Columns in PM magazine, 1940–42.

On HAWES:

Books

- New York and Hollywood Fashion: Costume Designs from the Brooklyn Museum Collection*, New York, 1986.
 Berch, Bettina, Radical by Design: The Life and Style of Elizabeth Hawes, New York, 1988.
 Milbank, Caroline Rennolds, New York Fashion: The Evolution of American Style, New York, 1989.
 Steele, Valerie, Women of Fashion, New York, 1991.

Articles

- Obituary, in the New York Times, 8 September 1971.
 Mahoney, Patrick R., "Elizabeth Hawes," in Notable American Women, New York, 1980.
 —, "In and Out of Style," in Vassar Quarterly (New York), Spring 1986.
 Berch, Bettina, "Early Feminist Fashion," in Ms. Magazine, March 1987.
 Jones, Barbara, "Radical by Design (book review)," in The Nation, 6 February 1989.

* * *

Brainy and articulate, Elizabeth Hawes challenged the fashion industry's dictum that stylish clothing must originate only in the salons of a handful of French couturiers, to be worn by a privileged few. Hawes was trained in the French system and from 1928 to 1940 her studio in New York provided custom-made clothing and accessories for a distinguished clientèle. A gifted publicist with a knack for self-promotion, Hawes successfully debunked the myth that beautiful clothes could only be created in Paris and became one of the first American designers to achieve national recognition. She saw no reason, however, why mass-produced clothing should not be equally as distinctive and she became increasingly interested in designing for the wholesale market. It was an unhappy collaboration: Hawes' clothes were both too simple and too forward-looking for most manufacturers. She found her ideas compromised time and time again in the finished product.

In her bestselling 1938 autobiography Fashion is Spinach, Hawes called fashion and the fashion industry parasites on true style. Style, she said, gives the feeling of the period, and changes only as there is a real change in point of view. Fashion, by contrast, changes not in response to events or to public taste or need, but because industry payrolls must be met, magazines published, a myth perpetuated.

Hawes despaired that most men and women were clothing conformists; in her view, clothes should be the expression of personality, of fantasy, and above all of individuality. If a woman occasionally wanted trousers to wear, or a man ruffles, she argued provocatively, why shouldn't they have them? The important thing was to dress to please yourself.

Hawes' iconoclastic theories about clothing were supported by solid academic and practical training. As an undergraduate she studied anatomy and economics before apprenticing herself to the workrooms of Bergdorf Goodman and Nicole Groult, among others. Her fluid bias-cut clothes moved with the body, revealing its natural curves. She believed a successful dress must fuse with the wearer, that line, in relationship to anatomy, was the basis for a beautiful dress. Not surprisingly, the designer Hawes most admired was Madeleine Vionnet.

Those who might not have been familiar with Hawes as a designer knew her as an author and journalist, a witty and astute critic of the fashion system. In her writing Hawes incited men and women to rebel against the status quo to speak up for clothing that suited the way they lived. She explained how the system worked against the consumer, producing shabbily made clothes that fit poorly and which were certainly not intended to last beyond a single season. Hawes disliked seeing women in unbecoming, uncomfortable clothes which cost more than they were worth, all in the name of fashion.

In 1940 Hawes turned her business over to her staff in order to concentrate on applying her theories about design to mass production. In her 1942 treatise, Why is a Dress?, Hawes said that she had come to regret the Paris training which prepared her for the past when the future clearly lay in ready-to-wear. Hawes once again found herself at moral and philosophical odds, however, with the wholesale garment manufacturers. She did not return to designing until 1948, and then only briefly.

Elizabeth Hawes was a visionary and an iconoclast. She was a designer of inventive clothing and a fashion writer whose analytic prose still illuminates the world of Seventh Avenue.

—Whitney Blausen

HEAD, Edith

American film costume designer

Born: Edith Claire Poesner in San Bernadino, California, 28 October 1897. Education: University of California at Los Angeles, B.A.; Stanford University, Palo Alto, California, M.A.; also studied at the Otis Art Institute and Chouinard School, Los Angeles. Family: Married Charles Head in 1923 (divorced, 1923); married Wiard Ihnen in 1940 (died 1979). Career: Instructor in French, Spanish, and art, The Bishop School for Girls (La Jolla, California) and at Hollywood School for Girls, 1923; sketch artist, Paramount Pictures, 1924–27; assistant to Travis Banton, Paramount, 1927–38; Head of Design, Paramount Studios, Hollywood, 1938–66; chief costume designer, Universal Studios, Hollywood, 1967–81. Also author, editor, radio and television commentator. Designed uniforms for the Coast Guard and Pan American Airlines; lecturer, University of Southern California and University of California at Los Angeles. Exhibitions: Romantic and Glamorous Hollywood Design, Metropolitan Museum of Art, New York, 1974; Hollywood Film Costume, Whitworth Art Gallery, Manchester, 1977; Edith Head: A Retrospectacular, presented by Chivas Regal benefitting the Design Industries Foundation Fighting AIDS and the Motion Picture & Television Fund Foundation, 1998. Awards: Academy® award, 1949, 1950, 1951, 1953, 1954, 1960, 1973; Film Designer of the Year award, Mannequins Association, Los Angeles, 1962; Costume Designers Guild award,

Articles

Writing as "Parasite," fashion items in the New Yorker, 1927–28.
Columns in PM magazine, 1940–42.

On HAWES:

Books

- New York and Hollywood Fashion: Costume Designs from the Brooklyn Museum Collection*, New York, 1986.
 Berch, Bettina, Radical by Design: The Life and Style of Elizabeth Hawes, New York, 1988.
 Milbank, Caroline Rennolds, New York Fashion: The Evolution of American Style, New York, 1989.
 Steele, Valerie, Women of Fashion, New York, 1991.

Articles

- Obituary, in the New York Times, 8 September 1971.
 Mahoney, Patrick R., "Elizabeth Hawes," in Notable American Women, New York, 1980.
 —, "In and Out of Style," in Vassar Quarterly (New York), Spring 1986.
 Berch, Bettina, "Early Feminist Fashion," in Ms. Magazine, March 1987.
 Jones, Barbara, "Radical by Design (book review)," in The Nation, 6 February 1989.

* * *

Brainy and articulate, Elizabeth Hawes challenged the fashion industry's dictum that stylish clothing must originate only in the salons of a handful of French couturiers, to be worn by a privileged few. Hawes was trained in the French system and from 1928 to 1940 her studio in New York provided custom-made clothing and accessories for a distinguished clientèle. A gifted publicist with a knack for self-promotion, Hawes successfully debunked the myth that beautiful clothes could only be created in Paris and became one of the first American designers to achieve national recognition. She saw no reason, however, why mass-produced clothing should not be equally as distinctive and she became increasingly interested in designing for the wholesale market. It was an unhappy collaboration: Hawes' clothes were both too simple and too forward-looking for most manufacturers. She found her ideas compromised time and time again in the finished product.

In her bestselling 1938 autobiography Fashion is Spinach, Hawes called fashion and the fashion industry parasites on true style. Style, she said, gives the feeling of the period, and changes only as there is a real change in point of view. Fashion, by contrast, changes not in response to events or to public taste or need, but because industry payrolls must be met, magazines published, a myth perpetuated.

Hawes despaired that most men and women were clothing conformists; in her view, clothes should be the expression of personality, of fantasy, and above all of individuality. If a woman occasionally wanted trousers to wear, or a man ruffles, she argued provocatively, why shouldn't they have them? The important thing was to dress to please yourself.

Hawes' iconoclastic theories about clothing were supported by solid academic and practical training. As an undergraduate she studied anatomy and economics before apprenticing herself to the workrooms of Bergdorf Goodman and Nicole Groult, among others. Her fluid bias-cut clothes moved with the body, revealing its natural curves. She believed a successful dress must fuse with the wearer, that line, in relationship to anatomy, was the basis for a beautiful dress. Not surprisingly, the designer Hawes most admired was Madeleine Vionnet.

Those who might not have been familiar with Hawes as a designer knew her as an author and journalist, a witty and astute critic of the fashion system. In her writing Hawes incited men and women to rebel against the status quo to speak up for clothing that suited the way they lived. She explained how the system worked against the consumer, producing shabbily made clothes that fit poorly and which were certainly not intended to last beyond a single season. Hawes disliked seeing women in unbecoming, uncomfortable clothes which cost more than they were worth, all in the name of fashion.

In 1940 Hawes turned her business over to her staff in order to concentrate on applying her theories about design to mass production. In her 1942 treatise, Why is a Dress?, Hawes said that she had come to regret the Paris training which prepared her for the past when the future clearly lay in ready-to-wear. Hawes once again found herself at moral and philosophical odds, however, with the wholesale garment manufacturers. She did not return to designing until 1948, and then only briefly.

Elizabeth Hawes was a visionary and an iconoclast. She was a designer of inventive clothing and a fashion writer whose analytic prose still illuminates the world of Seventh Avenue.

—Whitney Blausen

HEAD, Edith

American film costume designer

Born: Edith Claire Poesner in San Bernadino, California, 28 October 1897. Education: University of California at Los Angeles, B.A.; Stanford University, Palo Alto, California, M.A.; also studied at the Otis Art Institute and Chouinard School, Los Angeles. Family: Married Charles Head in 1923 (divorced, 1923); married Wiard Ihnen in 1940 (died 1979). Career: Instructor in French, Spanish, and art, The Bishop School for Girls (La Jolla, California) and at Hollywood School for Girls, 1923; sketch artist, Paramount Pictures, 1924–27; assistant to Travis Banton, Paramount, 1927–38; Head of Design, Paramount Studios, Hollywood, 1938–66; chief costume designer, Universal Studios, Hollywood, 1967–81. Also author, editor, radio and television commentator. Designed uniforms for the Coast Guard and Pan American Airlines; lecturer, University of Southern California and University of California at Los Angeles. Exhibitions: Romantic and Glamorous Hollywood Design, Metropolitan Museum of Art, New York, 1974; Hollywood Film Costume, Whitworth Art Gallery, Manchester, 1977; Edith Head: A Retrospectacular, presented by Chivas Regal benefitting the Design Industries Foundation Fighting AIDS and the Motion Picture & Television Fund Foundation, 1998. Awards: Academy® award, 1949, 1950, 1951, 1953, 1954, 1960, 1973; Film Designer of the Year award, Mannequins Association, Los Angeles, 1962; Costume Designers Guild award,

Lana Turner modeling an Edith Head-designed silk pants outfit from the film Love Has Many Faces (1965). Overblouse is covered with crystal beads. © AP/Wide World Photos.

1967. Died: 26 October 1981, in Los Angeles, California. Website: www.edithhead.com (A Retrospectacular Tribute).

PUBLICATIONS

By HEAD:

Books

- The Dress Doctor*, with Jane Ardmore, Boston, 1959.
- How to Dress for Success*, with Joe Hyams, New York, 1967.
- Edith Head's Hollywood*, with Paddy Calistro, New York, 1983.

Articles

- in Silver Screen (New York), September 1946, January 1948.
- in Hollywood Quarterly (Los Angeles), October 1946.
- in Photoplay (New York), October 1948.
- in Good Housekeeping (New York), March 1959.
- in Holiday (New York), January and July 1973, September and November 1974, January, March and September 1975, March 1976.
- in Inter/View (New York), January 1974.
- in Take One (Montreal), October 1976.
- in American Film (Washington, D.C.), May 1978.
- in Cine Revue (Paris), 19 April 1979.

On HEAD:

Books

- Epstein, Beryl Williams, Fashion Is Our Business, Philadelphia, 1945, London, 1947.
- Steen, Mike, Hollywood Speaks: An Oral History, New York, 1974.
- Vreeland, Diana, Romantic and Glamorous Hollywood Design (exhibition catalogue), New York, 1974.
- Chierichetti, David, Hollywood Costume Design, New York and London, 1976.
- McConathy, Dale, Hollywood Costume, New York, 1976.
- Regan, Michael, Hollywood Film Costume (exhibition catalogue), Manchester, 1977.
- Morris, Bernadine, and Barbara Walz, The Fashion Makers, New York, 1978.
- La Vine, W. Robert, In a Glamorous Fashion: The Fabulous Years of Costume Design, New York, 1980, Boston and London, 1981.
- Pritchard, Susan, Film Costume: An Annotated Bibliography, New Jersey and London, 1981.
- New York and Hollywood Fashion: Costume Designs from the Brooklyn Museum Collection*, New York, 1986.
- Acker, Ally, Reel Women: Pioneers of the Cinema, New York, 1991.
- Stegemeyer, Anne, Who's Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.

Articles

- Hollywood, Molly, "Film Colony, New York Battle to Set Styles," in the Los Angeles Examiner, 21 September 1941.
- Scallion, Virginia, "Meet the Woman Who Dresses the Stars," in the California Stylist, July 1954.
- "Dialogue on Film: Edith Head," in American Film, May 1978.
- "Edith Head, Designer of Hollywood Glamor," in the Los Angeles Times, 27 October 1981.
- McCarthy, Todd, "Edith Head Dies at 82; Costumes Subordinate to Story, Character," Variety, 28 October 1981.
- Dolan, Judith, "A Head for Design," in Stanford Magazine (Stanford, California), 1991.
- Locayo, Richard, "Inside Hollywood! Women, Sex, & Power," People, Spring 1991.
- Spoto, Donald, "Edith Head," Architectural Digest, April 1992.

* * *

As head of design for Paramount Pictures, Edith Head was the last great designer to work under contract to a major film studio. Head's first significant assignment was to create the wardrobe for silent film star Clara Bow in Wings (1927). Her last was costuming Steve Martin in the 1940ish mock noir film, Dead Men Don't Wear Plaid (1982). In a career spanning 60 years, Head was responsible for the on-screen persona of such stars as Mae West, Dorothy Lamour, Bob Hope, Barbara Stanwyck, Ginger Rogers, Olivia de Haviland, Gloria Swanson, Grace Kelly, and Elizabeth Taylor.

Head had no formal training in design and she took care to work within what she saw as her limitations. She might never be considered a couturier, but she could—and did—become a taste-maker. Thus while contemporaries Erté and Adrian came to be known for gowns which epitomized fantasy and glamor, Edith Head made herself known for designing beautiful and flattering clothes which the movie-going public could easily imagine wearing.

Edith Head surrounded by some of the 700 costumes she designed during her career, 1967. © AP/Wide World Photos.

Head's wardrobe for Barbara Stanwyck in The Lady Eve (1941) advanced her growing reputation as a designer particularly attuned to the psyche of the average woman. Stanwyck had most often been cast in roles which required she look plain. Her on-screen transformation to a woman of style thrilled audiences as much as it thrilled Stanwyck herself. The star had Edith Head written into her contract, and the studio publicity department saw to it that the name Edith Head became synonymous with home-grown American fashion.

Beginning in 1945, Head had a featured spot on Art Linkletter's radio program "House Party," giving advice on matters of dress to the listening audience. When the show moved to television in 1952, Head moved with it. On live television, she would perform an impromptu verbal and visual makeover on members of the studio audience, sometimes using some element of her own clothing to suggest a more effective personal presentation. Head had a keen intellect, and when she brought her gift of analysis to the human figure, she created a look to flatter the wearer and fit the occasion. This was one of her great strengths as a costumier and it was a skill which could benefit anyone.

In her film work, Head was known as a "director's designer" whose interpretation of a character became the visual embodiment of the directorial thought process. Olivia de Haviland's subtly ill-fitting costumes for the opening scenes of The Heiress, or Gloria Swanson's clothes for Sunset Boulevard, with their simultaneous references to the 1920s and the 1950s, remain superb examples of characterization. Head often said that even without a soundtrack the story of The Heiress could be understood through its costumes.

One of the most challenging problems for any theatrical designer is so-called "modern dress." A motion picture may be shot up to two years before it is shown to the public but clothing must not betray this fact by seeming dated. If so versatile a designer may be said to have a trademark, Head's would be a clean and simple line with a minimum of detail, in a subdued palette. Head produced timeless classics which never competed with the performer and never took focus from the storyline. It was all, she said, "a matter of camouflage and magic."

—Whitney Blausen; updated by Nelly Rhodes

HECHTER, Daniel

French designer

Born: Paris, 30 July 1938. Education: Completed trade school education, 1956. Family: Married Marika Hechter; married Jennifer Chambon, 1980; children: Carinne. Military Service: Served in the French Army, 1958–60. Career: Delivery boy, Paris ready-to-wear firm, 1956; formed own design studio, 1956; salesman, then designer, Pierre d'Alby, Paris, 1960–62; founder and designer, the Hechter Group, from 1962; added children's line, 1965; introduced menswear, 1968; active sportswear and home furnishings lines introduced, 1970; added accessory range, 1976; launched furniture collection, 1983; offered first men's fragrance, 1989; created DH 621 men's line, 1994; added second men's fragrance, 1996. Address: 4 Ter, Avenue Hoche, 75008 Paris, France. Website: www.hechtermontres.com.

PUBLICATIONS

By HECHTER:

Books

Le Boss, Paris, 2000.

On HECHTER:

Books

Stegemeyer, Anne, Who's Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.

Articles

Moor, Johnathan, "The Americanization of Daniel Hechter," in DNR, 21 January 1980.

_____, "Daniel Hechter: Taking it Easy...With Enthusiasm," in DNR, 18 August 1980.

Wood, Mary Ann, "Daniel Hechter: Bringing High Fashion Down to Earth," in Fashion Retailer N.E., November 1980.

Highe, Jackie, "Decision Makers: The Fashion Dictators," in Living (London), 13 July 1983.

"Court Orders Removal of Anti-Hechter Posters," in WWD, 4 December 1988.

D'Aulnay, Sophie, "Daniel Hechter: Coming to America—Again," in DNR, 12 July 1993.

_____, "The Directional Daniel Hechter," in DNR, 25 January 1996.

"Lapidus: Fantasy Becomes Fragrance" in European Cosmetic Markets, 1 April 1997.

"Celebrities in Switzerland: Daniel Hechter," available online at switzerland.isyours.com, Micheloud & Co., 6 June 2001.

"Daniel Hechter," available online at www.hechtermontres.com, 6 June 2001.

* * *

Daniel Hechter was one of the first designers to recognize the commercial viability of lifestyle dressing and has marketed the concept with enormous success, today exporting to some 47 countries and licensing goods in the U.S., South America, Europe, Australia, and Canada. In many ways, he provided the inspiration for the 1980s' explosion of lifestyle concepts in retailing.

Hechter identified his particular market as including the young, sometimes married with children, upwardly mobile 20- to 30-somethings, who may not have the income to finance the designer lifestyle and fashionable appearance to which they aspire. As a mass market designer, it is essential to be able to perceive what is right for the moment, particularly when dealing with the fickle youth-oriented market. Hechter's taste and style have often been directed by the unpredictable forces of pop, club, and street culture, and his business rapidly prospered because of his adaptability and speed.

Born into a family who owned a ready-to-wear company, Hechter was brought up in an environment sympathetic to fashion. He worked for designer Pierre d'Alby from 1958 before opening his own house in 1962 with friend Armand Orustein. The company opened with a womenswear collection that captured the developing need of the 1960s—young, fun, and sometimes throwaway. He produced sweatshirts, maxi coats, trouser suits, smoking jackets, gabardine raincoats, and boot top-length divided skirts. His casual jersey and ribbed duffle coats and greatcoats emphasized his skills for sophisticated unisex outerwear, sporty yet wearable and stylish.

The business grew to incorporate many areas of fashion and clothing design, producing shoes, sunglasses, school uniforms, corporate wear, and tennis and ski clothes. He also moved into designing for the home, broadening his lifestyle concepts by producing household linens furniture, crystal stemware, and patterns for china place settings. Other additions to the Hechter line were men's fragrances: Caractére in 1989, promoted as a simple, warm scent, and XXL in 1996, said to have a woodsy, energetic character.

The company has been a regular employer of fashion design graduates from all over the world. Hechter believes this inserts a continual flow of fresh ideas and invigorates the Daniel Hechter image. The company exports goods and has numerous licensing contracts throughout the world, as well as operating its own boutiques in nearly every Western European country, one in Russia, fourteen in Asia or the Middle East, three in Africa, two in South America, and two in the United States. The company is looking toward Eastern Europe for further expansion. The success of the business has sparked Hechter's creative flow—he developed a new line of clothing using natural fabrics called DH 621. The products were first launched in Israel in 1994 and spread to Asia from there. Hechter says the clothing falls between casual and sportswear and costs a bit less than his other lines.

Hechter attributes his success to his practical, matter-of-fact approach to design. He displays none of the airs or temperament associated with the stereotypical fashion designer. In fact, Hechter has allowed his personal interests to shape and extend the direction of the company. Sports have been a lifelong passion, and in 1972 he cofounded the Paris Saint-Germain Football Club. Years later, in 1998, he designed the streetwear for the French Soccer World Cup team. His support of tennis with over 20 years of annual parties during the French Open led to a request from the French Tennis Federation for him to create the umpires' outfits in 1993.

Hechter has also dabbled in politics, sitting on the Marseilles Regional Council since 1992. In 1997 he moved to Geneva, Switzerland, and wrote a novel entitled Le Boss, published in 2000. Daniel Hechter has used his personal experiences to perceive and fill voids left by others in the fashion world.

—Kevin Almond; updated by Carrie Snyder

HEIM, Jacques

French designer

Born: Paris, 8 May 1899. Family: Married; one son: Philippe. Career: Manager, Isadore and Jeanne Heim fur fashion house, from about 1920; initiated couture department for coats, suits, and gowns, circa 1925; opened own couture house, 1930; Heim Jeunes Filles collection introduced, 1936; Heim sportswear boutiques established in Biarritz and Cannes, from 1937; Heim-Actualité girlswear collection introduced, 1950; fragrances included Alambie, 1947, J'Aime, 1958, Shandoah, 1966; house closed, 1969; president, Chambre Syndicale de la Couture Parisienne, 1958–62. Also owner and publisher, Revue Heim, 1950s. Died: 8 January 1967, in Paris.

PUBLICATIONS

On HEIM:

Books

Milbank, Caroline Rennolds, Couture: The Great Designers, New York, 1985.

Stegemeyer, Anne, Who's Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.

Jacques Heim, fall 1963 collection. © Bettmann/CORBIS.

Articles

Peterson, Patricia, "Heim Drops Hemline and Ban on Photographs," in the New York Times, 23 July 1962.
Obituary, in the New York Times, 9 January 1967.

* * *

Caroline Rennolds Milbank called Jacques Heim an "innovator by nature," in her 1985 book, Couture: The Great Designers. Few would agree. Heim's New York Times obituary (9 January 1967) read: "Mr. Heim's fashion house designed and made clothes of a modest style. He was never in the front ranks of the big houses that radically changed the looks of women by offering new silhouettes in the manner of Balenciaga, Chanel, or Saint Laurent." Perhaps the median truth was expressed in Women's Wear Daily's obituary: "Heim was basically an innovator in business. He didn't want to be called a designer, but rather an editor of clothes." He aggressively conceived of ways in which couture might be vital to new audiences (his Heim Jeunes Filles brought garments to a young audience long before other couture designers, and engendered early client loyalty) and was an impeccable spokesman for the fashion industry of France (until he broke with the couture schedule for delayed photographs in summer 1962). He was an editor of many design ideas, beginning with the possibilities of fur, continuing through beach and play outfits, even the two-piece swimsuit, and the plane and planar simplifications of design in the youth-conscious 1960s.

If he was not driven by the market, he was at least keenly sensitive to it. Heim was a smart, eclectic designer of many styles; through consistent sales sensitivity he transformed the fur business of his parents Isadore and Jeanne Heim, founded in 1898, and persevered and prospered as a designer for nearly four decades. Heim's fashion breakthrough was to realize that fur could be worked as a fabric. Wool and fur combinations, geometries of fur and textiles, and fur accents became hallmarks of the Heim fashion in the 1930s. At the same time, along with Chanel and Patou and others, Heim was alert to the possibilities of elegant sportswear and observed bathing and sports costumes as inspiration. According to Milbank, Heim was inspired by the Tahitian exhibits in the Paris colonial exhibition of 1931 to create pareos and sarongs. Later, his 1950 two-piece swimsuit Atome came considerably after the bikini incident and invention, but addressed a broader public.

Through the 1950s, Heim addressed American needs for sportswear in innovative and utilitarian fabrics, while still remaining, in the vocabulary of the day, very ladylike. Moreover, his Heim Actualité diffusion line, launched in 1950, extended his influence into ready-to-wear along with the young styles of Heim Jeunes Filles. From 1958 to 1962 he was president of the Chambre Syndicale de la Couture Parisienne, and was "probably the last effective president of the couture's professional body," according to Women's Wear Daily. When, however, he permitted immediate release of collection photographs to the press in July 1962, in advance of the agreed-upon delayed release, he precipitated a furor among designers to preserve the design's secret until their slow dissemination. Heim was steadfastly modern and business-oriented. In this decision, he anticipated the couture's gradual détente in the 1960s, but did it so abruptly that he lost the confidence of his colleagues. Patricia Peterson, writing for the New York Times, in July 1962, reported, "Photographs were not to have been published in the United States until August 26, for Europe the release date was to have been August 27. When Heim allowed photographs to run even before the opening, the chase was on to find photographers. Men used to shooting wars, riots, and dignitaries were suddenly faced with swirling models. Other couture houses were besieged with queries.” Perhaps it always takes an insider to bring the certain news of change, but Heim was as wounded as any messenger with the apparent bad tidings that couture’s control was over and the camera and the press held sway.

Design by Jacques Heim, 1954. © Genevieve Naylor/CORBIS.

Favored by Mme. Charles de Gaulle and a designer for Mrs. Dwight D. Eisenhower, Heim understood the expression “old soldiers never die.” He never married a style or became one form’s advocate; instead, he had insisted on the business principle that fashion would thrive in change and adaptation. “The life of a couturier is a magnificent and continuous torture,” Heim said. But he was probably only expressing a businessman’s shrewd romanticism and a leader’s quixotic belief in fashion’s anguish. His commerce was clearly his passion and his métier, not the design itself. As the New York Times commented in his obituary, “Jacques Heim, a tall good-looking man with a cheery disposition, seemed more like a businessman or banker than a couturier. He exhibited none of the flamboyance or temperament of competitors like Yves Saint Laurent or Christian Dior." But, of course, design is made by acumen as well as by inspiration.

—Richard Martin

HEISEL, Sylvia

American fashion designer

Born: Princeton, New Jersey, 22 June 1962. Education: Barnard College, New York, 1980–81. Career: Designed and sold costume jewelry, 1981–82; designed collection of coats for Henri Bendel, New York, 1982, and exclusive line of womenswear for Barneys New York, 1987; film costume designer, mid-1980s; first full catwalk collection shown, 1988; introduced first line of lingerie, 1999; opened first retail store, in New York's SoHo neighborhood, 1999; participated in auction of designer Halloween outfits for DISHES Project to battle pediatric AIDS, 1999. Awards: Chicago Gold Coast award, 1993. Address: 230 West 39th Street, New York, NY 10018, USA.

PUBLICATIONS

On HEISEL:

Books

Stegemeyer, Anne, Who's Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.

Articles

"Fashion," in Interview (New York), July 1987.

Washington, Roxanne, "Designer Heisel Guided by the Feel, Not the Look," in the Ann Arbor News, 10 September 1991.

Pandiscio, Richard, "Sylvia Heisel: Gun Control Fashion," in Interview, January 1993.

Siroto, Janet, "Evening Star," in Vogue, February 1993.

"Autumn in New York," in Women's Wear Daily, 2 April 1998.

Monget, Karyn, "Style, Substance Lead the Way," in WWD, 17 May 1999.

Gilbert, Daniela, "Fright for a Cause," in WWD, 2 November 1999.

Fass, Allison, "Retail Renaissance on Thompson Street," in the New York Times, 21 November 1999.

"The Last Hurrah," in WWD, 15 February 2000.

Doonan, Simon, "Get Pushy with a Dressmaker; Cram Your Closet with 'Originals,'" in the New York Observer, 5 February 2001.

*

I think fashion is about who you are right now. What you're wearing says who you are at that moment in time. It's the first thing you communicate to another person.

My favorite clothes are easy, comfortable, creative, and beautiful because that's what I'm attracted to in people. What we wear is a combination of reality and what is in our minds. The reality is where we have to go, what we have to do, and what we can afford. The dream is who we want to be, what's beautiful and exciting to us, and what we desire. I try to design clothes with a combination of these qualities: wearability in the real world with an aesthetic of dreams.

Inspiration comes from everything in the world, more often from the zeitgeist than from other pieces of clothing or designed items. Historically, fashion is interesting because of what it says about any particular moment in history. What looks good, new, and exciting one day looks old and tired the next. It is the most transient of art and design fields. The clothes I design combine skills of construction and manufacturing with the communication of my ideas.

—Sylvia Heisel

* * *

Sophisticated elegance is perhaps the most distinguishing characteristic of Sylvia Heisel's collections. Her use of exquisite fabrics, colors and the simplicity of cuts have ensured her favorable recognition by fashion buyers and critics alike. As one of New York's young contemporary fashion designers, Heisel has instinctively avoided catering to recent trends. Her approach to fashion combines an "aesthetic of dreams" with the reality of modern wearability and affordability.

Heisel studied art history briefly at Barnard, leaving college eventually to pursue a freelance career designing costume jewelry, theatre costuming, and fashion display. With no formal training in fashion design, Heisel launched her first coat collection for Henri Bendel in New York, followed by an exclusive line for Barneys first women's store in New York in 1987. Her first independent collection appeared in the spring of 1988.

Heisel is interested in communicating ideas intrinsic to particular moments in history. The 1980s' emphasis on body consciousness led Heisel to embrace the notion of executing a controlled draping of her now signature slip and tank dresses. Constructed in fabrics such as jersey, mesh, and silk, these dresses are contoured, accentuating the body with deep-cut backs and high slits. They are simultaneously wearable and feminine.

The growth of professional American women in the job market highlighted fashion designers' need to accommodate this new status with garments both practical and timeless. Heisel addressed these needs with small, tightly-edited collections, including "sportswear-inspired suits, separates for day and sophisticated dresses and coats for evening." Her jackets range from waist length to sleek over-the-hip styles. The selected fabrics, such as silk and wool crêpe, are comfortable and travel well. Her garments are architectural, employing both bodyfitting silhouettes and a boxy construction in her coats and jackets. Heisel's color selection is based on instinct rather than forecasts, and she often uses black for balance. The use of solids highlights the minimalist cut, drape, and texture of each garment. At the same time, simplicity allows for a variety of ways of wearing each piece.

Heisel's awareness of contemporary culture was successfully transferred into costume designs for the 1985 film Parting Glances. In 1985, Heisel was included in the New York Times list of young designers—including Carol Horn, Cathy Hardwick, and Mary Jane Marcosiano—who were "currying favors with American women and retailers." Heisel has on several occasions deviated from collections based on minimalist constructions—fake pony-fur coats, lizard prints, and McFadden-esque dresses. She still maintains a consistent approach, stressing that how a woman feels in her clothes is as much a part as how the clothes look.

than a couturier. He exhibited none of the flamboyance or temperament of competitors like Yves Saint Laurent or Christian Dior." But, of course, design is made by acumen as well as by inspiration.

—Richard Martin

HEISEL, Sylvia

American fashion designer

Born: Princeton, New Jersey, 22 June 1962. Education: Barnard College, New York, 1980–81. Career: Designed and sold costume jewelry, 1981–82; designed collection of coats for Henri Bendel, New York, 1982, and exclusive line of womenswear for Barneys New York, 1987; film costume designer, mid-1980s; first full catwalk collection shown, 1988; introduced first line of lingerie, 1999; opened first retail store, in New York's SoHo neighborhood, 1999; participated in auction of designer Halloween outfits for DISHES Project to battle pediatric AIDS, 1999. Awards: Chicago Gold Coast award, 1993. Address: 230 West 39th Street, New York, NY 10018, USA.

PUBLICATIONS

On HEISEL:

Books

Stegemeyer, Anne, Who's Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.

Articles

"Fashion," in Interview (New York), July 1987.

Washington, Roxanne, "Designer Heisel Guided by the Feel, Not the Look," in the Ann Arbor News, 10 September 1991.

Pandiscio, Richard, "Sylvia Heisel: Gun Control Fashion," in Interview, January 1993.

Siroto, Janet, "Evening Star," in Vogue, February 1993.

"Autumn in New York," in Women's Wear Daily, 2 April 1998.

Monget, Karyn, "Style, Substance Lead the Way," in WWD, 17 May 1999.

Gilbert, Daniela, "Fright for a Cause," in WWD, 2 November 1999.

Fass, Allison, "Retail Renaissance on Thompson Street," in the New York Times, 21 November 1999.

"The Last Hurrah," in WWD, 15 February 2000.

Doonan, Simon, "Get Pushy with a Dressmaker; Cram Your Closet with 'Originals,'" in the New York Observer, 5 February 2001.

*

I think fashion is about who you are right now. What you're wearing says who you are at that moment in time. It's the first thing you communicate to another person.

My favorite clothes are easy, comfortable, creative, and beautiful because that's what I'm attracted to in people. What we wear is a combination of reality and what is in our minds. The reality is where we have to go, what we have to do, and what we can afford. The dream is who we want to be, what's beautiful and exciting to us, and what we desire. I try to design clothes with a combination of these qualities: wearability in the real world with an aesthetic of dreams.

Inspiration comes from everything in the world, more often from the zeitgeist than from other pieces of clothing or designed items. Historically, fashion is interesting because of what it says about any particular moment in history. What looks good, new, and exciting one day looks old and tired the next. It is the most transient of art and design fields. The clothes I design combine skills of construction and manufacturing with the communication of my ideas.

—Sylvia Heisel

* * *

Sophisticated elegance is perhaps the most distinguishing characteristic of Sylvia Heisel's collections. Her use of exquisite fabrics, colors and the simplicity of cuts have ensured her favorable recognition by fashion buyers and critics alike. As one of New York's young contemporary fashion designers, Heisel has instinctively avoided catering to recent trends. Her approach to fashion combines an "aesthetic of dreams" with the reality of modern wearability and affordability.

Heisel studied art history briefly at Barnard, leaving college eventually to pursue a freelance career designing costume jewelry, theatre costuming, and fashion display. With no formal training in fashion design, Heisel launched her first coat collection for Henri Bendel in New York, followed by an exclusive line for Barneys first women's store in New York in 1987. Her first independent collection appeared in the spring of 1988.

Heisel is interested in communicating ideas intrinsic to particular moments in history. The 1980s' emphasis on body consciousness led Heisel to embrace the notion of executing a controlled draping of her now signature slip and tank dresses. Constructed in fabrics such as jersey, mesh, and silk, these dresses are contoured, accentuating the body with deep-cut backs and high slits. They are simultaneously wearable and feminine.

The growth of professional American women in the job market highlighted fashion designers' need to accommodate this new status with garments both practical and timeless. Heisel addressed these needs with small, tightly-edited collections, including "sportswear-inspired suits, separates for day and sophisticated dresses and coats for evening." Her jackets range from waist length to sleek over-the-hip styles. The selected fabrics, such as silk and wool crêpe, are comfortable and travel well. Her garments are architectural, employing both bodyfitting silhouettes and a boxy construction in her coats and jackets. Heisel's color selection is based on instinct rather than forecasts, and she often uses black for balance. The use of solids highlights the minimalist cut, drape, and texture of each garment. At the same time, simplicity allows for a variety of ways of wearing each piece.

Heisel's awareness of contemporary culture was successfully transferred into costume designs for the 1985 film Parting Glances. In 1985, Heisel was included in the New York Times list of young designers—including Carol Horn, Cathy Hardwick, and Mary Jane Marcosiano—who were "currying favors with American women and retailers." Heisel has on several occasions deviated from collections based on minimalist constructions—fake pony-fur coats, lizard prints, and McFadden-esque dresses. She still maintains a consistent approach, stressing that how a woman feels in her clothes is as much a part as how the clothes look.

Though known for her elegant, classic eveningwear designs, Heisel has expanded into other areas, notably lingerie, which she launched in 1999, and sportswear, of which she has been designing a growing number of pieces. While ensuring that her clothes maintain a classic appeal, Heisel injects a sense of humor into much of her work, especially her lingerie and sportswear items. In her fall 2000 sportswear collection, for example, she combined tartan plaid dresses with plaid-lined gold metallic nylon tops and created a strapless dress and jacket from plum tweed cashmere. Women's Wear Daily (15 February 2000) described the collection as combining "a dressed-up sensibility with a schoolgirl approach."

Heisel's lingerie line, which includes camisoles, slips, tank tops, and crop pants, is meant to be worn either under clothing or as clothing. As Heisel told Women's Wear Daily back in May 1999, "We're leaving it up to the woman to decide how she wants to wear it. It's not lingerie you try to hide." For evening, Heisel tends to stick with the bias-cut silk dresses for which she is known. They appeal to all types of customers, not only in their flattering, elegant fit, but because they are available in 100 colors. Similarly, her lingerie designs come in 50 hues, ranging from bright neons to subtle pales.

Heisel opened her first retail store in 1999 on Thompson Street in New York's SoHo neighborhood. There she showcases what Women's Wear Daily describes as her pretty, well-cut apparel, ranging from long skirts, tailored taffeta shirts, sheaths, and boleros to tweed cashmere coats, colored scarves, velvet tank dresses, and printed pants. Most of her pieces are classics that can be worn from season to season, simply updated with a new accessory.

In the store, Heisel is able to highlight some of her fun fantasies, such as boleros of organdy flowers or cocktail dresses featuring two-foot-long gold chains as trim. In a February 2001 article, the New York Observer termed the store's overall sensibility, however, as one of "affordable, hip restraint," a phrase that could be used to describe much of Heisel's work.

—Teal Triggs; updated by Karen Raugust

HELPERN, Joan and David

See JOAN & DAVID

HEMINGWAY, Wayne and Geraldine

See RED OR DEAD

HENDERSON, Gordon

American designer

Born: Berkeley, California, 19 March 1957. Education: Studied medicine, University of California; studied fashion design, Parsons

School of Design, New York, 1981–83. Career: Assistant designer, Calvin Klein, 1984; formed own company, 1985; launched lower priced "But, Gordon" line, 1990; signed exclusive contract with Saks Fifth Avenue, 1992; designed wedding suit for John F. Kennedy Jr., 1996; design critic at student fashion shows, from late 1990s. Awards: Council of Fashion Designers of America Perry Ellis award, 1989.

PUBLICATIONS

On HENDERSON:

Books

Stegemeyer, Anne, Who's Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.

Articles

Darnton, Nina, "At What Price Young Success?" in Newsweek (New York), 20 November 1989.

Haynes, Kevin, "Gordon Henderson: All the Rage," in WWD, 22 November 1989.

Hochswender, Woody, "Realism Takes Henderson to Top," in the New York Times, 28 November 1989.

Duffy, Martha, "But Gordon, I Want It All," in Time, 26 February 1990.

"Flash! Gordon Has Designs on You," in Mademoiselle (New York), March 1990.

Shapiro, Harriet, "Gordon Henderson's Affordable Designs are Making Him Fashion's Man for the Woman Who Works," in People, 19 March 1990.

_____, "Designer Clothes at a Lower Price," in the New York Times, 16 September 1990.

Agins, Teri, "In Fashion, the Talent and His Money Man Make Promising Team," in the Wall Street Journal, 18 September 1990.

Washington, Elsie B., "Now: Brothers on Seventh Avenue," in Essence, November 1991.

* * *

Versatile separates. Dressing with ease. These American sportswear tenets are the meat and potatoes of Gordon Henderson's fashion. Although young, he has shown the discipline of engaging in no design that is superfluous and of giving the customer what she wants—garments that can be multipurpose and mixable in a wardrobe, favoring fashion that is neither flamboyant nor expensive. Henderson is anomalous among designers making a mark in the late 1980s in adhering so intensely to the sportswear ethos, never succumbing to the glamour of high-priced fashion. His penchant for vegetable and earth colors seems even politically correct in the ecology-aware 1990s.

He is, as Woody Hochswender of the New York Times, "a realist." Such sportswear orthodoxy and awareness to design's realization in sales made Henderson the "hottest new designer" on Seventh Avenue, New York, according to the Wall Street Journal on September 1990. As there is a pragmatism to Henderson's view of fashion, there is a corresponding restraint in the designer. Photogenic enough to

Though known for her elegant, classic eveningwear designs, Heisel has expanded into other areas, notably lingerie, which she launched in 1999, and sportswear, of which she has been designing a growing number of pieces. While ensuring that her clothes maintain a classic appeal, Heisel injects a sense of humor into much of her work, especially her lingerie and sportswear items. In her fall 2000 sportswear collection, for example, she combined tartan plaid dresses with plaid-lined gold metallic nylon tops and created a strapless dress and jacket from plum tweed cashmere. Women's Wear Daily (15 February 2000) described the collection as combining "a dressed-up sensibility with a schoolgirl approach."

Heisel's lingerie line, which includes camisoles, slips, tank tops, and crop pants, is meant to be worn either under clothing or as clothing. As Heisel told Women's Wear Daily back in May 1999, "We're leaving it up to the woman to decide how she wants to wear it. It's not lingerie you try to hide." For evening, Heisel tends to stick with the bias-cut silk dresses for which she is known. They appeal to all types of customers, not only in their flattering, elegant fit, but because they are available in 100 colors. Similarly, her lingerie designs come in 50 hues, ranging from bright neons to subtle pales.

Heisel opened her first retail store in 1999 on Thompson Street in New York's SoHo neighborhood. There she showcases what Women's Wear Daily describes as her pretty, well-cut apparel, ranging from long skirts, tailored taffeta shirts, sheaths, and boleros to tweed cashmere coats, colored scarves, velvet tank dresses, and printed pants. Most of her pieces are classics that can be worn from season to season, simply updated with a new accessory.

In the store, Heisel is able to highlight some of her fun fantasies, such as boleros of organdy flowers or cocktail dresses featuring two-foot-long gold chains as trim. In a February 2001 article, the New York Observer termed the store's overall sensibility, however, as one of "affordable, hip restraint," a phrase that could be used to describe much of Heisel's work.

—Teal Triggs; updated by Karen Raugust

HELPERN, Joan and David

See JOAN & DAVID

HEMINGWAY, Wayne and Geraldine

See RED OR DEAD

HENDERSON, Gordon

American designer

Born: Berkeley, California, 19 March 1957. Education: Studied medicine, University of California; studied fashion design, Parsons

School of Design, New York, 1981–83. Career: Assistant designer, Calvin Klein, 1984; formed own company, 1985; launched lower priced "But, Gordon" line, 1990; signed exclusive contract with Saks Fifth Avenue, 1992; designed wedding suit for John F. Kennedy Jr., 1996; design critic at student fashion shows, from late 1990s. Awards: Council of Fashion Designers of America Perry Ellis award, 1989.

PUBLICATIONS

On HENDERSON:

Books

Stegemeyer, Anne, Who's Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.

Articles

Darnton, Nina, "At What Price Young Success?" in Newsweek (New York), 20 November 1989.

Haynes, Kevin, "Gordon Henderson: All the Rage," in WWD, 22 November 1989.

Hochswender, Woody, "Realism Takes Henderson to Top," in the New York Times, 28 November 1989.

Duffy, Martha, "But Gordon, I Want It All," in Time, 26 February 1990.

"Flash! Gordon Has Designs on You," in Mademoiselle (New York), March 1990.

Shapiro, Harriet, "Gordon Henderson's Affordable Designs are Making Him Fashion's Man for the Woman Who Works," in People, 19 March 1990.

_____, "Designer Clothes at a Lower Price," in the New York Times, 16 September 1990.

Agins, Teri, "In Fashion, the Talent and His Money Man Make Promising Team," in the Wall Street Journal, 18 September 1990.

Washington, Elsie B., "Now: Brothers on Seventh Avenue," in Essence, November 1991.

* * *

Versatile separates. Dressing with ease. These American sportswear tenets are the meat and potatoes of Gordon Henderson's fashion. Although young, he has shown the discipline of engaging in no design that is superfluous and of giving the customer what she wants—garments that can be multipurpose and mixable in a wardrobe, favoring fashion that is neither flamboyant nor expensive. Henderson is anomalous among designers making a mark in the late 1980s in adhering so intensely to the sportswear ethos, never succumbing to the glamour of high-priced fashion. His penchant for vegetable and earth colors seems even politically correct in the ecology-aware 1990s.

He is, as Woody Hochswender of the New York Times, "a realist." Such sportswear orthodoxy and awareness to design's realization in sales made Henderson the "hottest new designer" on Seventh Avenue, New York, according to the Wall Street Journal on September 1990. As there is a pragmatism to Henderson's view of fashion, there is a corresponding restraint in the designer. Photogenic enough to pose for a Gap advertisement (wearing denim) and for selection as one of People magazine's beautiful people, Henderson provides a beguiling and handsome personal accompaniment to his plain message of fashion modesty. For Hochswender, Henderson is "a designer many are calling the first important new talent of the 1990s." Henderson told Kevin Haynes, "People identify me as doing classics with a twist—it sounds like a drink to me. But there's beauty in using relatively inexpensive fabrics and treating them like they're very expensive. I don't like people getting uptight with clothes."

The ideal Henderson client would be a woman who shops for other labels and perhaps even buys basics at the Gap or other retailers, allowing the Henderson separates to work as accent pieces. "You can take the clothes and put them together for career women," Henderson told Nina Darnton, "or combine them for weekend or evening. That's what the 1990s are about—servicing your customer in the way she needs." Even beyond his eponymous line, Henderson created "But, Gordon," an even more responsive, inexpensive line with its name coming from stores who liked certain garments, but wanted them at lesser prices, whining, "but, Gordon..." again and again until the designer acquiesced with a secondary line.

When one examines Henderson's work, one realizes its appeal as fashion basics, from simple dresses to halter tops, beautifully cut trousers, and other wardrobe-building elements. Inevitably, one designer he acknowledges as a favorite is Claire McCardell, whose ingenuity with materials and basic sportswear elements is recapitulated in Henderson's imagination with materials and flair for a simple, uncluttered style. Henderson's lyrical summer dresses, bandeaux, and capelet jackets reflect the spirit of McCardell. His slightly off-beat colors (occurred in part by necessity and in part by a commitment to the earth) and his love of plaids and checks also align Henderson with McCardell. But Henderson also admires Chanel, an admiration evident in his very serviceable boxy jackets.

McCardell, however, works better as a Henderson muse since she realized the sensibility of suburbs and country (Henderson was brought up in California.) There is something so unabashedly price-conscious and trend-avoiding about Henderson's clothing that it becomes almost antiurban. And it may be precisely the gleeful suburban, campus, low-pressure calm that makes his work so attractive to a broad audience. After all, the working woman is no longer an exclusive phenomenon of the big city, but a staple of suburban lifestyle as well. Henderson also says of his work at Calvin Klein, "I learned everything there. He gives you consistency, and he's so clean and precise it's almost ridiculous. He can take a good idea and go on with it forever."

Henderson has produced a promising prospect of his own "forever" in a consistent and compelling vision of sportswear separates kept at a reasonable price for both American and international customers. Fashion, which has a tendency to drift upward, even among designers who start out with the intention of serving the broadest public, has not corrupted Henderson. He continues to give every sign of being different: reaching the top of his field by adamantly and effectively staying at the bottom of the price ranges, and in giving something back to the industry. In the late 1990s he acted as a design critic for student fashion shows at institutions such as the Parsons School of Design and Marist College. He also gained notice, in September 1996, as the designer of the blue suit worn by the late John F. Kennedy Jr. during his wedding to the late Carolyn Bessette Kennedy, a former Calvin Klein publicist and a friend of Henderson's.

As of July 2000, Henderson was reported by the website Urbangoods.com as planning to open a New York City gift and home furnishings store in partnership with artist Conan Hayes. His loyal clients, no doubt, are looking forward to this next endeavor.

—Richard Martin; updated by Karen Raugust

HERMÈS

French design house

Founded: in Paris by Thierry Hermès in 1837 to manufacture bridles, saddles, and riding boots for the carriage trade. Company History: Company moved to rue de Faubourg in Paris, 1879; began accessories, including silk scarves, 1926; founder's grandson, Emile Hermès, established luggage and couture clothing in 1930s; Hermès scarf introduced, 1937; silk ties first sold, 1949; first fragrances, 1950 (later including Caleche, 1961; 24, Faubourg, 1995, and Hermès Rouge, 2001); glassware, tableware introduced, 1980s; initial public offering, 1993; Martin Margiela appointed ready-to-wear designer, 1997; purchases 35-percent stake in Jean-Paul Gaultier's design business, 1999; opened Madison Avenue store, New York, 2000. Company Address: 24 rue du Faubourg Saint-Honoré, 75008 Paris, France.

Hermès, fall 2001 collection. © AP/Wide World Photos/Fashion Wire Daily.

pose for a Gap advertisement (wearing denim) and for selection as one of People magazine's beautiful people, Henderson provides a beguiling and handsome personal accompaniment to his plain message of fashion modesty. For Hochswender, Henderson is "a designer many are calling the first important new talent of the 1990s." Henderson told Kevin Haynes, "People identify me as doing classics with a twist—it sounds like a drink to me. But there's beauty in using relatively inexpensive fabrics and treating them like they're very expensive. I don't like people getting uptight with clothes."

The ideal Henderson client would be a woman who shops for other labels and perhaps even buys basics at the Gap or other retailers, allowing the Henderson separates to work as accent pieces. "You can take the clothes and put them together for career women," Henderson told Nina Darnton, "or combine them for weekend or evening. That's what the 1990s are about—servicing your customer in the way she needs." Even beyond his eponymous line, Henderson created "But, Gordon," an even more responsive, inexpensive line with its name coming from stores who liked certain garments, but wanted them at lesser prices, whining, "but, Gordon..." again and again until the designer acquiesced with a secondary line.

When one examines Henderson's work, one realizes its appeal as fashion basics, from simple dresses to halter tops, beautifully cut trousers, and other wardrobe-building elements. Inevitably, one designer he acknowledges as a favorite is Claire McCardell, whose ingenuity with materials and basic sportswear elements is recapitulated in Henderson's imagination with materials and flair for a simple, uncluttered style. Henderson's lyrical summer dresses, bandeaux, and capelet jackets reflect the spirit of McCardell. His slightly off-beat colors (occurred in part by necessity and in part by a commitment to the earth) and his love of plaids and checks also align Henderson with McCardell. But Henderson also admires Chanel, an admiration evident in his very serviceable boxy jackets.

McCardell, however, works better as a Henderson muse since she realized the sensibility of suburbs and country (Henderson was brought up in California.) There is something so unabashedly price-conscious and trend-avoiding about Henderson's clothing that it becomes almost antiurban. And it may be precisely the gleeful suburban, campus, low-pressure calm that makes his work so attractive to a broad audience. After all, the working woman is no longer an exclusive phenomenon of the big city, but a staple of suburban lifestyle as well. Henderson also says of his work at Calvin Klein, "I learned everything there. He gives you consistency, and he's so clean and precise it's almost ridiculous. He can take a good idea and go on with it forever."

Henderson has produced a promising prospect of his own "forever" in a consistent and compelling vision of sportswear separates kept at a reasonable price for both American and international customers. Fashion, which has a tendency to drift upward, even among designers who start out with the intention of serving the broadest public, has not corrupted Henderson. He continues to give every sign of being different: reaching the top of his field by adamantly and effectively staying at the bottom of the price ranges, and in giving something back to the industry. In the late 1990s he acted as a design critic for student fashion shows at institutions such as the Parsons School of Design and Marist College. He also gained notice, in September 1996, as the designer of the blue suit worn by the late John F. Kennedy Jr. during his wedding to the late Carolyn Bessette Kennedy, a former Calvin Klein publicist and a friend of Henderson's.

As of July 2000, Henderson was reported by the website Urbangoods.com as planning to open a New York City gift and home furnishings store in partnership with artist Conan Hayes. His loyal clients, no doubt, are looking forward to this next endeavor.

—Richard Martin; updated by Karen Raugust

HERMÈS

French design house

Founded: in Paris by Thierry Hermès in 1837 to manufacture bridles, saddles, and riding boots for the carriage trade. Company History: Company moved to rue de Faubourg in Paris, 1879; began accessories, including silk scarves, 1926; founder's grandson, Emile Hermès, established luggage and couture clothing in 1930s; Hermès scarf introduced, 1937; silk ties first sold, 1949; first fragrances, 1950 (later including Caleche, 1961; 24, Faubourg, 1995, and Hermès Rouge, 2001); glassware, tableware introduced, 1980s; initial public offering, 1993; Martin Margiela appointed ready-to-wear designer, 1997; purchases 35-percent stake in Jean-Paul Gaultier's design business, 1999; opened Madison Avenue store, New York, 2000. Company Address: 24 rue du Faubourg Saint-Honoré, 75008 Paris, France.

Hermès, fall 2001 collection. © AP/Wide World Photos/Fashion Wire Daily.

Hermès, fall 2001 collection. © AP/Wide World Photos/Fashion Wire Daily.

PUBLICATIONS

By HERMÈS:

Books

- Hermès Handbook*, New York, n.d.
How to Wear Your Hermès Scarf, Paris, 1986, 1988, 1994.
 Baseman, Andrew, The Scarf, New York, 1989.
Hermès: Le Monde d'Hermès 1992, Paris, 1991.

On HERMÈS:

Books

- Hermès Handbook*, New York n.d.
 Keller-Krische, Christiane, The Book of Scarves: Scarves, Shawls, and Ties Dressed with Imagination, 2000.

Articles

- “A Boutique Where You Don’t Just Buy—You Invest,” in Vogue, October 1974.
 Van Dyke, Grace, “Hermès: Old World Luxury in the New World,” in USA Today, July 1984.

- Dryansky, G.Y., “Hermès: Quality with a Kick,” in Harper’s Bazaar, April 1986.
 “Scarves Everywhere,” in the New Yorker, 30 January 1989.
 Aillaud, Charlotte, “The Hermès Museum: Inspiration for the Celebrated Family Firm,” in Architectural Digest, January 1989.
 Beckett-Young, Kathleen, “Signature in the Social Register,” in Connoisseur, June 1989.
 Tompkins, Mimi, “Sweatshop of the Stars,” in U.S. News & World Report, 12 February 1990.
 Gandee, Charles, “Jean-Louis Dumas—Hermès is Flying High,” in House & Garden, August 1990.
 Hornblower, Margaret, “As Luxe as It Gets,” in Time, 6 August 1990.
 “Hermès: Still in the Saddle,” in WWD, 25 September 1991.
 “Hermès of Paris, Inc.,” in the New York Times, 5 October 1991.
 Andrieu, Frederic, “European Accents: A Gold Brooch Here, a Quilted Bag There, and Hermès Scarves Everywhere...,” in Lear’s (New York), January 1992.
 Slesin, Susan, “Ah, the Horse: Hermès Introduces New Porcelain Pattern,” in the New York Times, 21 May 1992.
 Rotenier, Nancy, “Tie Man Meets Queen of England,” in Forbes, 13 September 1993.
 Morris, Bernadine, “Five Designers Reveal a Sense of Calm in Paris,” in the New York Times, 10 March 1994.
 White, Constance C.R., “Hermès Seeks a New Image,” in the New York Times, 20 March 1995.
 Mead, Rebecca, “The Crazy Professor: Why was Paris Persuaded that the Radical Martin Margiela was Right for the Venerable House of Hermès?” in the New Yorker, 30 March 1998.
 Strom, Stephanie, “Luxury in Recession Land; the Hermès of the World Find New Ways to Prosper in Japan’s Weak Economy,” in the New York Times, 29 October 1998.
 Thomas, Dana, “Gaultier Goes for Growth,” in the Newsweek International, 19 July 1999.
 “Time and Again: Hermès Opens Boutique on Madison Avenue...,” in Elle, December 2000.
 Taber, Andrew, “Hermès,” [profile] available online at Fashion Live, www.fashionlive.com, 19 March 2001.

* * *

Emile-Maurice Hermès, grandson of founder Thierry Hermès, summed up the philosophy of his family’s celebrated firm in the 1920s as “Leather, sport, and a tradition of refined elegance.” Passed down over generations, the House of Hermès has been committed to quality in design and production for more than 160 years. At the dawn of the 21st century, the name Hermès continues to represent the ultimate in French luxury.

Hermès began as a Parisian leather goods shop in 1837, making finely wrought harnesses, bridles, and riding boots for the carriage trade. As early as 1855 Hermès was earning accolades, winning first prize in its class at the 1855 Paris Exposition. Thierry’s son Emile-Charles established the current flagship store at 24 rue du Faubourg Saint-Honoré, where he introduced saddlery and began retail sales. Emile-Charles sold his stake in the company to his brother, Emile-Maurice, who in turn was the true visionary of the Hermès family.

With the advent of the automobile, the firm adapted its careful saddle stitching techniques to the production of wallets, luggage, handbags, watchbands, and accessories for golfing, hunting, and polo playing, and began to design couture sportswear. All were made with the same fine materials and attention to detail as the original leather wares, and the firm continued to build on its reputation for quality. Hermès made fashion news in the 1920s by designing one of the first leather garments of the 20th century, a zippered golfing jacket, for the Prince of Wales. For a time the zipper was called the fermature Hermès, because of its European impact (Emile-Maurice had bought a two-year patent on the unusual Canadian invention).

The fourth generation of proprietors were two sons-in-law, Jean Guerrand and Robert Dumas. Guerrand and Dumas added scarves and perfume to the line, while the leather artisans remained loyal, often staying on for decades. Into the 1960s the company continued to expand, with the introduction of new styles and fragrances. Jean-Louis Dumas, the son of Robert Dumas, became président-directeur général in 1978.

The 1980s were a period of unprecedented growth for the firm. Hermès benefitted from the revival of status dressing. Women sported the crocodile-skin Kelly bag (named for Grace Kelly), the Constance clutch, brightly colored leathers, sensuous cashmeres, bold jewelry, tricolored spectator shoes, and silk ballet slippers. For men, Hermès made leather jackets with sherpa lining and trim, gabardine blazers and dashing greatcoats, and richly patterned silk ties. Dumas introduced new materials like porcelain and crystal, expanding the line to some 30,000 items. It is to the firm's credit that they have never licensed any of their products, but keep tight control over the design and manufacture of this vast range of goods. Thus every leather-bound datebook, porcelain teapot, silk waistcoat, scarf, and handbag is made under a watchful Hermès eye.

One of the most visible and bestselling items in the Hermès line is the scarf, or carré as they are called. The carefully printed, heavy silk scarves are coveted for the air of Parisian style they impart. Many of the carrés feature equestrian motifs, as well as other symbols of prestige, like coats of arms, banners, and military insignia. Women boast of how many they own, and hand them down through generations; some of the scarves end up as framed wall-hangings or are made into pillows. The firm corresponds regularly with Hermès addicts trying to collect every scarf on the books, and reports that during the holiday season in the Paris store, a scarf is sold every 20 seconds. Queen Elizabeth II was pictured on an English postage stamp with an Hermès scarf wrapped around her royal head. Each scarf could be considered a small symbol of all of the carefully made luxury goods Hermès has produced for generations.

Hermès, rarely one to keep pace with trends, astonished the fashion world with the appointment of deconstructionist Martin Margiela as its ready-to-wear designer in 1997. The Dutch eccentric, known for his savage avant-garde designs—often literally ripping the seams of garments and haphazardly stitching them back together—proved an excellent albeit bizarre fit. The first Margiela collection debuted in March 1998 and was well received. Andrew Taber, writing for Fashion Live, found the collection “quietly subversive” and further commented, “Margiela’s sweeping camel coats and unstructured layers of cashmere and deerskin were timeless, serene, and utterly luxurious in their lack of ostentation.”

Though many had their doubts when Jean-Louis Dumas brought Margiela into the Hermès fold, the designer brought a hint of radicalism into the lap of conservative luxury. Another move into the fashion left came with the purchase in 1999 of a 35-percent stake in Gaultier Couture, the company of fashion bad boy Jean-Paul Gaultier. Gaultier got funds for expansion; Hermès extended its empire to keep up with luxe conglomerates like LVMH. Yet the recent additions of Gaultier and Margiela far from tarnished the Hermès name; the company’s clothing and accessories have continued to transcend fashion. The Hermès look relies not on trends but on the finest materials, exquisite construction, and the instinctively casual chic of French style.

Over the course of the 20th century and into the 21st, the cut of the clothing and the palettes may have changed, but the classic quality of Hermès designs have remained constant. Beyond mere status symbols, the firm’s goods are the embodiment of simplicity and elegance in extremely well made and durable products. Whether it be a jacket of meltingly soft leather, a paisley silk dressing gown, a Kelly bag, a valise, or a carré, an Hermès purchase comes with the assurance that it will be stylish and appropriate for a lifetime. With more than 215 Hermès stores around the world and countless boutiques in high-end department stores in Europe, Asia, and the U.S., the Hermès name has certainly gained more prominence, but its goods land not in the hands of the masses but in the chosen few.

—Kathleen Paton; updated by Nelly Rhodes

HERRERA, Carolina

Venezuelan designer working in New York

Born: Maria Carolina Josefina Pacanins y Nino in Caracas, Venezuela, 8 January 1939. Education: El Carmen School, Venezuela.

Family: Married Reinaldo Herrera, 1957; children: Mercedes, Ana Luisa, Carolina, Patricia. Career: Showed first couture collection, 1981; introduced fur collection for Revillion, 1984; launched CH diffusion line, 1986, Couture Bridal collection, 1987, Carolina Herrera Collection II sportswear line, 1989, Herrera for Men, Herrera Studio bridge line, and W by Carolina Herrera, 1992; introduced Carolina Herrera fragrances, 1988; introduced jewelry collections, 1990, 1991; moved toward more youthful styles influenced by her daughters, late 1990s; signed deal with STL of Spain for men’s and women’s gold-range apparel and retail stores in Europe, 2000; opened first free-standing boutique on Madison Avenue in New York, 2000. Awards: Pratt Institute award, 1990; Dallas Fashion Excellence award. Address: 48 West 38th Street, New York, NY 10018, USA.

PUBLICATIONS

On HERRERA:

Books

Diamonstein, Barbaralee, Fashion: The Inside Story, New York, 1985.

Steele, Valerie, Women of Fashion: Twentieth-Century Designers, New York, 1991.

Riehecky, Janet, Carolina Hererra: International Fahsion Designer, Chicago, 1991.

Navarette Talavera, Ela, Perfiles latinoamericanos de los 1990s, Panama, 1992.

Stegemeyer, Anne, Who’s Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.

Telgen, Diane, and Jim Kamp, Latinas! Women of Achievement, Detroit, 1996.

Morey, Janet, and Wendy Dunn, Famous Hispanic Americans, New York, 1996.

wares, and the firm continued to build on its reputation for quality. Hermès made fashion news in the 1920s by designing one of the first leather garments of the 20th century, a zippered golfing jacket, for the Prince of Wales. For a time the zipper was called the fermature Hermès, because of its European impact (Emile-Maurice had bought a two-year patent on the unusual Canadian invention).

The fourth generation of proprietors were two sons-in-law, Jean Guerrand and Robert Dumas. Guerrand and Dumas added scarves and perfume to the line, while the leather artisans remained loyal, often staying on for decades. Into the 1960s the company continued to expand, with the introduction of new styles and fragrances. Jean-Louis Dumas, the son of Robert Dumas, became président-directeur général in 1978.

The 1980s were a period of unprecedented growth for the firm. Hermès benefitted from the revival of status dressing. Women sported the crocodile-skin Kelly bag (named for Grace Kelly), the Constance clutch, brightly colored leathers, sensuous cashmeres, bold jewelry, tricolored spectator shoes, and silk ballet slippers. For men, Hermès made leather jackets with sherpa lining and trim, gabardine blazers and dashing greatcoats, and richly patterned silk ties. Dumas introduced new materials like porcelain and crystal, expanding the line to some 30,000 items. It is to the firm's credit that they have never licensed any of their products, but keep tight control over the design and manufacture of this vast range of goods. Thus every leather-bound datebook, porcelain teapot, silk waistcoat, scarf, and handbag is made under a watchful Hermès eye.

One of the most visible and bestselling items in the Hermès line is the scarf, or carré as they are called. The carefully printed, heavy silk scarves are coveted for the air of Parisian style they impart. Many of the carrés feature equestrian motifs, as well as other symbols of prestige, like coats of arms, banners, and military insignia. Women boast of how many they own, and hand them down through generations; some of the scarves end up as framed wall-hangings or are made into pillows. The firm corresponds regularly with Hermès addicts trying to collect every scarf on the books, and reports that during the holiday season in the Paris store, a scarf is sold every 20 seconds. Queen Elizabeth II was pictured on an English postage stamp with an Hermès scarf wrapped around her royal head. Each scarf could be considered a small symbol of all of the carefully made luxury goods Hermès has produced for generations.

Hermès, rarely one to keep pace with trends, astonished the fashion world with the appointment of deconstructionist Martin Margiela as its ready-to-wear designer in 1997. The Dutch eccentric, known for his savage avant-garde designs—often literally ripping the seams of garments and haphazardly stitching them back together—proved an excellent albeit bizarre fit. The first Margiela collection debuted in March 1998 and was well received. Andrew Taber, writing for Fashion Live, found the collection “quietly subversive” and further commented, “Margiela’s sweeping camel coats and unstructured layers of cashmere and deerskin were timeless, serene, and utterly luxurious in their lack of ostentation.”

Though many had their doubts when Jean-Louis Dumas brought Margiela into the Hermès fold, the designer brought a hint of radicalism into the lap of conservative luxury. Another move into the fashion left came with the purchase in 1999 of a 35-percent stake in Gaultier Couture, the company of fashion bad boy Jean-Paul Gaultier. Gaultier got funds for expansion; Hermès extended its empire to keep up with luxe conglomerates like LVMH. Yet the recent additions of Gaultier and Margiela far from tarnished the Hermès name; the company’s clothing and accessories have continued to transcend fashion. The Hermès look relies not on trends but on the finest materials, exquisite construction, and the instinctively casual chic of French style.

Over the course of the 20th century and into the 21st, the cut of the clothing and the palettes may have changed, but the classic quality of Hermès designs have remained constant. Beyond mere status symbols, the firm’s goods are the embodiment of simplicity and elegance in extremely well made and durable products. Whether it be a jacket of meltingly soft leather, a paisley silk dressing gown, a Kelly bag, a valise, or a carré, an Hermès purchase comes with the assurance that it will be stylish and appropriate for a lifetime. With more than 215 Hermès stores around the world and countless boutiques in high-end department stores in Europe, Asia, and the U.S., the Hermès name has certainly gained more prominence, but its goods land not in the hands of the masses but in the chosen few.

—Kathleen Paton; updated by Nelly Rhodes

HERRERA, Carolina

Venezuelan designer working in New York

Born: Maria Carolina Josefina Pacanins y Nino in Caracas, Venezuela, 8 January 1939. Education: El Carmen School, Venezuela.

Family: Married Reinaldo Herrera, 1957; children: Mercedes, Ana Luisa, Carolina, Patricia. Career: Showed first couture collection, 1981; introduced fur collection for Revillion, 1984; launched CH diffusion line, 1986, Couture Bridal collection, 1987, Carolina Herrera Collection II sportswear line, 1989, Herrera for Men, Herrera Studio bridge line, and W by Carolina Herrera, 1992; introduced Carolina Herrera fragrances, 1988; introduced jewelry collections, 1990, 1991; moved toward more youthful styles influenced by her daughters, late 1990s; signed deal with STL of Spain for men’s and women’s gold-range apparel and retail stores in Europe, 2000; opened first free-standing boutique on Madison Avenue in New York, 2000. Awards: Pratt Institute award, 1990; Dallas Fashion Excellence award. Address: 48 West 38th Street, New York, NY 10018, USA.

PUBLICATIONS

On HERRERA:

Books

Diamonstein, Barbaralee, Fashion: The Inside Story, New York, 1985.

Steele, Valerie, Women of Fashion: Twentieth-Century Designers, New York, 1991.

Riehecky, Janet, Carolina Hererra: International Fahsion Designer, Chicago, 1991.

Navarette Talavera, Ela, Perfiles latinoamericanos de los 1990s, Panama, 1992.

Stegemeyer, Anne, Who’s Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.

Telgen, Diane, and Jim Kamp, Latinas! Women of Achievement, Detroit, 1996.

Morey, Janet, and Wendy Dunn, Famous Hispanic Americans, New York, 1996.

Carolina Herrera, fall 2001 collection: sheared mink top and black pants. © Reuters NewMedia Inc./CORBIS.

Articles

- Shapiro, Harriet, "From Venezuela to Seventh Avenue, Carolina Herrera's Fashions Cast a Long Shadow," in People, 3 May 1982.
- Rayner, William, and Chesbrough Rayner, "An Evening with Carolina and Reinaldo Herrera: Strong Opinions, European Style," in Vogue, March 1987.
- Daria, Irene, "Carolina Herrera: A Personal Evolution," in WWD, 2 March 1987.
- _____, "Designers on Designing: Carolina Herrera," in WWD, 2 March 1987.
- Estrada, Mary Batts, "Carolina Herrera Talks About Fashion," in Hispanic, March 1989.
- Reed, Julia, "Talking Fashion: Carolina Herrera is the Undisputed Queen of Seventh Avenue," in Vogue, June 1990.
- Koski, Lorna, "Carolina's Prime Time," in WWD, 18 June 1991.
- Struensee, Chuck, "Carolina Herrera's New Horizons," in WWD, 20 October 1992.
- "New York: Carolina Herrera," in WWD, 1 November 1994.
- "New York: Carolina Herrera," in WWD, 4 April 1995.
- "Carolina Herrera," in Current Biography Yearbook, 1996.
- Schiro, Anne Marie, "Designers Who Know Their Customer," in the New York Times, 10 April 1997.

- Tapert, Annette, "Women of Style: Carolina Herrera," Town & Country, September 1997.
- Horyn, Cathy, "And Now, a Gentle Nudge from Herrera and de la Renta," in the New York Times, 15 September 1999.
- Wilson, Eric, "Herrera Mines for Spanish Gold," in WWD, 23 March 2000.
- Givhan, Robin, "The Lady Flourishes: Herrera's Work Blossoms with Understated Femininity," in the Washington Post, 8 December 2000.
- "WWD Luxury" Special Supplement, in WWD, February 2001.

* * *

When Carolina Herrera introduced her first fashion collection in 1981, Women's Wear Daily dubbed her "Our Lady of the Sleeve." Her early interest in the shoulder area has remained constant throughout her many lines and seasons. The Herrera look is characterized by strong fitted shoulders, tight bodices, straight lines, and slightly pushed-up sleeves.

Though she has often been referred to as a socialite turned designer, her contributions to the industry are many. Prior to beginning her career as a designer, Herrera was on the International Best Dressed List for over 10 years and was then nominated to the Best Dressed Hall of Fame. Her personal style influenced how women dressed around the world. Her affluent, South American background exposed her to the work of the best couturiers and dressmakers in the world; she cites Balenciaga as her greatest influence. It was a natural transition from socialite to fashion designer, as Herrera is a member of the world for which she designs. She understands her customers' lifestyles and needs because she is one of them. Her friends, impressed with her design quality, fabric selection, attention to detail, construction and drape, soon became her clients.

Herrera's designs have been described as being for the "quintessential woman of the 1980s who has consummate style and taste as well as an active lifestyle." Her clothes have a couture element, feminine detail, and genuine ease. Herrera herself believes her clothes are feminine, elegant, and most important, comfortable. Though she loves to mix and match expensive Italian and French fabrics, she maintains the importance of the cut of the clothes. Herrera states, "You don't have to buy very expensive materials if the clothes are well cut." In terms of color, Herrera favors the combination of black and white or black and brown.

Becoming a designer seemed a logical evolution in Herrera's life. She was married, had four children, and came to symbolize the upper-class South American lifestyle. When her children were grown she decided, with the financial backing of a wealthy South American publisher, to open a design house in New York.

Like many designers, Herrera expanded her business to include other lines. The CH Collections, introduced in 1986, are less expensive versions of her high-fashion lines, similar silhouettes in cut and finish but made of different fabrics. Herrera also launched a successful bridal line in 1987 after designing Caroline Kennedy's wedding gown. A perfume for both women (1988) and men (1991) also followed.

In the early collections, Herrera's strengths were in her day dresses and luncheon suits. They expressed femininity through their beautifully tailored hourglass design. In more recent collections, she has ventured into the downtown New York scene for inspiration, showing chiffon split skirts topped with satin motorcycle jackets, thus illustrating her ability to interpret and combine the surrounding culture with her own design sense. Most important, her clothes are about style and elegance achieved by her trademark of shoulders, sleeves, line, and construction.

Carolina Herrera, spring 2001 collection. © AP/Wide World Photos.

Herrera has continued to design for women like herself who are wealthy and sophisticated. As Anne-Marie Schiro pointed out in the New York Times, Herrera's customers desire tasteful, flattering clothing, fashionable yet not cutting-edge, incorporating a few surprises yet wearable. Her fall/winter 1997 collection offered some challenges in the form of snakeskin print and black glossy leathers, leopard pattern chiffons, and tiger print velvets. All of these, according to Schiro, were fashioned into the sorts of jackets, coats, and shifts that feel comfortable to Herrera's customers.

Cathy Horyn, also writing in the New York Times, compared Herrera's spring/summer 2000 collection to the designer's personality: both practical and lavish. Most ensembles were comprised of basic pants and a top, but the pants were made of materials such as shantung and the tops of fabrics such as peony-pink fitted suede. A new wrinkle were younger, sexier designs than Herrera had shown in the past, including a lemon-colored bikini and a ball gown with a skirt starting two inches below the waist.

Robin Givhan in the Washington Post also noted Herrera's skew toward the youthful at the end of the millennium, pointing out that the transformation earned her new customers, such as young Hollywood actresses, as well as a wider distribution in specialty stores. Her two daughters, a filmmaker and a fashion editor, were cited as influences. They encouraged her, for example, to create more mix-and-match pieces rather than full ensembles. At the same time, Herrera has kept her traditional customers in mind, moving toward more youthful styles but not shocking them or turning them away. Givhan called Herrera's spring 2000 collection an example of well-groomed, genteel femininity.

In 2000 Herrera signed a licensing agreement with the Spanish apparel company STL to develop a women's and men's gold-range line called CH Carolina Herrera. The deal was expected to lead to the establishment of 40 stores throughout Europe—where her signature and 212 perfume lines have a high profile—within a few years. Herrera had experimented with two bridge lines in the mid-1990s, both of which were discontinued quickly. The new CH line is priced about a third lower than her signature apparel and includes women's sportswear for day and evening as well as men's tailored clothing and sportswear. The deal marked Herrera's first foray into men's apparel, although she had previously produced accessories and scents for men.

The deal paved the way for stores in the U.S.; Herrera opened her first freestanding boutique on New York's Madison Avenue in 2000. In the past, her signature line had been available in only about 100 stores worldwide.

—Margo Seaman; updated by Karen Raugust

HILFIGER, Tommy

American designer

Born: 1952. Career: Owner/designer, People's Places, New York, until 1979; founder/designer, and vice chairman, Tommy Hilfiger Corporation, New York; company floated on NYSE, 1992; member, Council of Fashion Designers of America; introduced women's sportswear and Tommy Girl fragrance, 1996; opened 20,000-square-foot U.S. flagship on Rodeo Drive in Beverly Hills, 1997 (later scheduled for closure); launched first European products, 1997; introduced athletic footwear and apparel collection, licensed to Stride Rite, 1997; acquired jeanswear, womenswear, and Canadian businesses from licensees, 1998; opened flagship stores in London (closed in 2000) and Mexico City, 1999; launched women's line in Europe, 1999; introduced unisex fragrance, Freedom, 1999; sponsored rock tours for the likes of Britney Spears and Rolling Stones during its Year of Music, 1999; attempted but failed to acquire Calvin Klein, 2000; switched men's accessories licensee from Ghurka to Swank, 2000; announced first quarterly loss since going public, 2000; introduced watch line with Movado, 2001; created first full women's swimwear collection with Jantzen, 2001; menswear lines dropped from most Bloomingdale's stores, 2001; effected turnaround women's and junior's businesses, 2001. Awards: Council of Fashion Designers of America Designer of the Year, 1995; VH1's From the Catwalk to the Sidewalk award, 1995; Parsons School of Design Designer of the Year, 1998; GQ Designer of the Year, 1998; several fragrance industry FiFi awards. Address: 25 West 39th Street, New York, NY 10018, USA. Website: www.tommy.com.

Carolina Herrera, spring 2001 collection. © AP/Wide World Photos.

elegance achieved by her trademark of shoulders, sleeves, line, and construction.

Herrera has continued to design for women like herself who are wealthy and sophisticated. As Anne-Marie Schiro pointed out in the New York Times, Herrera's customers desire tasteful, flattering clothing, fashionable yet not cutting-edge, incorporating a few surprises yet wearable. Her fall/winter 1997 collection offered some challenges in the form of snakeskin print and black glossy leathers, leopard pattern chiffons, and tiger print velvets. All of these, according to Schiro, were fashioned into the sorts of jackets, coats, and shifts that feel comfortable to Herrera's customers.

Cathy Horyn, also writing in the New York Times, compared Herrera's spring/summer 2000 collection to the designer's personality: both practical and lavish. Most ensembles were comprised of basic pants and a top, but the pants were made of materials such as shantung and the tops of fabrics such as peony-pink fitted suede. A new wrinkle were younger, sexier designs than Herrera had shown in the past, including a lemon-colored bikini and a ball gown with a skirt starting two inches below the waist.

Robin Givhan in the Washington Post also noted Herrera's skew toward the youthful at the end of the millennium, pointing out that the transformation earned her new customers, such as young Hollywood actresses, as well as a wider distribution in specialty stores. Her two daughters, a filmmaker and a fashion editor, were cited as influences. They encouraged her, for example, to create more mix-and-match pieces rather than full ensembles. At the same time, Herrera has kept her traditional customers in mind, moving toward more youthful styles but not shocking them or turning them away. Givhan called Herrera's spring 2000 collection an example of well-groomed, genteel femininity.

In 2000 Herrera signed a licensing agreement with the Spanish apparel company STL to develop a women's and men's gold-range line called CH Carolina Herrera. The deal was expected to lead to the establishment of 40 stores throughout Europe—where her signature and 212 perfume lines have a high profile—within a few years. Herrera had experimented with two bridge lines in the mid-1990s, both of which were discontinued quickly. The new CH line is priced about a third lower than her signature apparel and includes women's sportswear for day and evening as well as men's tailored clothing and sportswear. The deal marked Herrera's first foray into men's apparel, although she had previously produced accessories and scents for men.

The deal paved the way for stores in the U.S.; Herrera opened her first freestanding boutique on New York's Madison Avenue in 2000. In the past, her signature line had been available in only about 100 stores worldwide.

—Margo Seaman; updated by Karen Raugust

HILFIGER, Tommy

American designer

Born: 1952. Career: Owner/designer, People's Places, New York, until 1979; founder/designer, and vice chairman, Tommy Hilfiger Corporation, New York; company floated on NYSE, 1992; member, Council of Fashion Designers of America; introduced women's sportswear and Tommy Girl fragrance, 1996; opened 20,000-square-foot U.S. flagship on Rodeo Drive in Beverly Hills, 1997 (later scheduled for closure); launched first European products, 1997; introduced athletic footwear and apparel collection, licensed to Stride Rite, 1997; acquired jeanswear, womenswear, and Canadian businesses from licensees, 1998; opened flagship stores in London (closed in 2000) and Mexico City, 1999; launched women's line in Europe, 1999; introduced unisex fragrance, Freedom, 1999; sponsored rock tours for the likes of Britney Spears and Rolling Stones during its Year of Music, 1999; attempted but failed to acquire Calvin Klein, 2000; switched men's accessories licensee from Ghurka to Swank, 2000; announced first quarterly loss since going public, 2000; introduced watch line with Movado, 2001; created first full women's swimwear collection with Jantzen, 2001; menswear lines dropped from most Bloomingdale's stores, 2001; effected turnaround women's and junior's businesses, 2001. Awards: Council of Fashion Designers of America Designer of the Year, 1995; VH1's From the Catwalk to the Sidewalk award, 1995; Parsons School of Design Designer of the Year, 1998; GQ Designer of the Year, 1998; several fragrance industry FiFi awards. Address: 25 West 39th Street, New York, NY 10018, USA. Website: www.tommy.com.

Tommy Hilfiger (foreground) posing with designs from his fall 2001 collection. © AP/Wide World Photos.

PUBLICATIONS

By HILFIGER:

Books

Hilfiger, Tommy, with David A. Keeps, All-American: A Style Book, New York, 1997.

Hilfiger, Tommy, with Anthony DeCurtis, Rock Style: How Fashion Moves to Music, New York, 1999.

On HILFIGER:

Books

Mandle, Jay, "In a Word, Hilfiger: Fragrances, Film, Books on Fashion Titan's Runway," in Sora, Joseph, editor, Corporate Power in the United States, New York, 1998.

Le Dortz, Laurent, and Béatrice Debosscher, Stratégies des leaders américains de la mode: Calvin Klein, Donna Karan, Liz Clairborne, Polo Ralph Lauren, et Tommy Hilfiger, Paris, 2000.

Articles

La Ferla, Ruth, "Hilfiger Re-Emerges," in the New York Times, 31 July 1990.

Younger, Joseph D., "The Man Makes the Clothes," in Amtrak Express (Washington, D.C.), September/October 1993.

"Throwing Down the Trousers," in Newsweek, 11 July 1994.

Mather, John, "Tommy Hilfiger's Great Leap," in Esquire, August 1994.

Duffy, Martha, "H Stands for Hilfiger: The Former Menswear Laughingstock Expands into the Women's Market," in Time, 16 September 1996.

Brown, Ed, "The Street Likes Hilfiger's Style," in Fortune, 16 March 1998.

Dodd, Anmarie, "From Hip-Hop to the Top: Tommy Tells How He Pushes the Envelope," in Daily News Record, 2 November 1998.

Jenkins, Maureen, "Tommy Hilfiger Success Rooted in Music Tie-Ins, Multiple Niches," in Knight-Ridder/Tribune Business News, 6 August 1999.

Lockwood, Lisa, "Crossing Over: Hilfiger Charts His Course in Women's Wear," in WWD, 13 September 1999.

Curran, Catherine, "Tommy's Swoon; Designer Lost Touch with Core Audience; Overexpansion Diluted Brand's Cachet," in Crain's New York Business, 4 September 2000.

Young, Vicki M., "Bloomingdale's to Drop Tommy Men's From Branches," in Daily News Record, 26 March 2001.

Fallon, James, "Hilfiger is Soaring in Europe; Designer's European Business is Over $100M," in Daily News Record, 30 March 2001.

Tommy Hilfiger, fall 2001 collection. © AP/Wide World Photos.

* * *

In an article titled "Throwing Down the Trousers" (Newsweek, 11 July 1994), Calvin Klein and Tommy Hilfiger are rendered in a showdown over men's underwear, the former having long occupied Times Square billboard space with provocative underwear ads. Hilfiger, seen standing on Broadway and 44th Street with his boxer-clad male models, meekly states, "My image is all about good, clean fun. I think Calvin's image is about maybe something different." Hilfiger is smart. He juxtaposes his hunky models in flag-and-stripe-designed boxers at surfer jam length with the implied enemy in bawdy, black, sopping promiscuity. Hilfiger has been right—in design and business—in promising "good, clean fun" in an unabashed American style that has achieved phenomenal success. America has wanted a menswear mainstream, neither aristocratic nor licentious. Emerging first in the 1980s with a clever campaign announcing himself among established designers, he has come to fulfill his own declaration to become one of the leading names in American design, certainly in menswear.

Acknowledging "I'm both a designer and a businessman" in the September-October 1993 issue of Amtrak Express, Hilfiger divides his own successful role into its two components that he himself has rendered indivisible. Hilfiger has most certainly learned from American designers Ralph Lauren and Calvin Klein that fashion is a synergy of business, aspiration, and classic design—with the image and craving constituting aspiration as perhaps the most important element. Hilfiger has shrewdly chosen a particular place for himself in American menswear imagery.

Whereas Lauren has preempted old-money WASP styles and Klein has successfully created a sexy vivacity, Hilfiger has come closer to Main Street, a colorful Americana that still waves flags, still loves button-down collars, that appreciates classics, and adores his "good, clean fun" along with family values. His customers may even abhor pretense or promiscuity, and may strive for collegiate looks but would never rebel too much—dressing a little more modestly and traditionally than those who prefer his designer-commerce confreres. His closest kinship (or competitor) in the market is David Chu's similarly brilliant work for Nautica, likewise reaching into the smalltown, cautious American sensibility for roots and imagination.

The "real people" effectiveness of Hilfiger is, of course, both real and illusory: he is stirring the deep-felt American conservative sensibilities of the late 20th century at the very time when culture is annulling any vestige of Our Town sentimentalities. The "feel good" ethos of Hilfiger's design is not image alone, for his intense commitment to value-for-price and quality materials confirms the joy in his design. His colorful, sporty, comfortable clothing appealed preeminently in the 1980s to the middle class in America. In 1988 Hilfiger said in his own advertising, "The clothes I design are relaxed, comfortable, somewhat traditional, affordable and...simple. They are the classic American clothes we've always worn, but I've reinterpreted them so that they fit more easily into the lives we live today." By the 1990s, Hilfiger was a clothing symbol of African American and Hispanic urban youth, engendering immense street-smart urban loyalty along with his classic Main Street constituency. Hilfiger's clothing is readily identified, with logos clearly visible on his ever-expanding clothing collections.

Hilfiger has associated himself with two other popular American images, both with special appeal to youth: sports teams and rock music. He has captured 30-something clients who are aging into their 40s, and yet Hilfiger is also building his young following. His great success has defied much élitist fashion skepticism. Ruth La Ferla, writing for the New York Times in July 1990, reported unforgivingly, "As a 'name' designer Mr. Hilfiger sprang full grown from the mind of his sponsor, Mohan Murjani, in the mid-1980s. Explicitly promoted as a successor to Perry Ellis or Calvin Klein or Ralph Lauren, Mr. Hilfiger achieved a degree of fame, or notoriety. But the stunt never came off; Mr. Hilfiger's fashions and image did not gel."

Of course, American enterprise is full of "stunts," from P.T. Barnum to Henry Ford to Dr. Kellogg, all with origins in harmless chicanery and old-fashioned chutzpah. Despite detractors, Hilfiger has consistently created his own dynamic and vigorous vision. After Murjani's backing, Hilfiger took his business public on the New York Stock Exchange in 1992, a rare instance of a designer-name business trading with success.

Hilfiger's sensitivity to casualwear can be brought to the business side of the male wardrobe, especially as it is already inflected by casual and sports-influenced notes. In 1994 he added tailored clothing to his line, confident the men who had already associated him with comfort and clean-cut exuberance would carry those same ideals to a full-cut American suit or jacket for business. Part of his business acumen and pragmatism is expressed a statement to Joseph Younger that he wanted to dress men from head to toe before dressing women and children—which was exactly what he did (though many of his men's shirts, shorts, and trousers were worn by women and teens).

Hilfiger's business experienced ups and downs during the late 1990s and early 2000s, going from being Wall Street's fashion-industry darling for eight years (starting in 1992) to suffering lowered profits and stock prices in 2000. Many of the company's troubles were attributed to overexpansion, both in customer base and retail presence. During the late 1990s, Hilfiger entered several new business segments, including fragrance (Tommy, Tommy Girl, Freedom); a cosmetics line, Tommy Hilfiger Color; women's sportswear; a watch collection (licensed to Movado); a full line of women's swimwear (licensed to Jantzen), athletic apparel and shoes (licensed to Stride Rite), and the Hilfiger Home collection, which like the apparel, was influenced by the designer's preppy and patriotic sensibilities. This aggressive strategy led the brand to lose some of its cachet, especially in the eyes of its loyal consumers. Stores began to discount Hilfiger merchandise, and retailers were quoted in publications such as Crain's New York Business as saying its core designs were a season or two behind the trends.

Hilfiger's marketing direction in 1999—called the Year of Music—did not help matters. Sponsorship of tours by mainstream musicians such as the Rolling Stones and Britney Spears alienated the hip-hop youth who had been the company's loyal customers since 1994. Some of the designer's problems were beyond his control, however; email rumors circulated, suggesting Hilfiger was a racist (unfounded), which had ramifications on sales. All of this led the Tommy Hilfiger company to announce a loss in the quarter ending March 2000, the first ever since it went public eight years earlier. The design firm now found itself in the position of explaining to the financial community how it would turn itself around.

Although the company's retail operation grew quickly in the late 1990s, with 15,000- to 20,000-square-foot flagship stores opened in London, Mexico City, and Beverly Hills, many of these large stores were closed within a few years. Hilfiger refocused its retail strategy on smaller stores, such as a planned outlet in New York's SoHo neighborhood. In addition, the designer's expansion into womenswear did not meet expectations, and as of 2001, the company was in the midst of turning this segment around.

Other setbacks included Bloomingdale's decision, as part of a restructuring, to eliminate the Tommy men's brand from all its stores except the 59th Street New York flagship—women's and children's apparel were unaffected—and Hilfiger's failed attempt in 2000 to acquire rival Calvin Klein. One bright area of Hilfiger's business in the early 2000s, however, was Europe, launched through a license with Pepe Jeans London in 1997. The business began with men's sportswear and segued into other men's categories, as well as women's and children's apparel and licensed fragrances. Europe was Hilfiger's largest market outside North America, with products sold in upscale department stores such as House of Fraser, Harrods, Galeries Lafayette, El Corte Ingles, and Brown Thomas.

To get its domestic business back on track in 2001, Hilfiger concentrated on returning to what company executives (quoted in Crain's) termed "traditional Tommy Hilfiger styling—classics with a twist." Hilfiger continues to oversee a youthful, purely American look with ties to music and pop culture; part of his fall 2001 collection was inspired by auto racing and featured sleek leather pieces. The challenge for Hilfiger now is to continue his appeal to a broad range of demographic groups yet not lose sight of the fashion-forward urban consumers who put him on the map.

—Richard Martin; updated by Karen Raugust

HOBBS LTD.

British fashion company

Founded: in 1981 by Marilyn and Yoram Anselm. Company History: Marilyn studied sculpture at the Central School of Art, London; married Yoram and they had two children (Kate, Amy). The Anselms, along with Yoram's brother Ronnie, began retailing to English design labels before turning to shoe and clothing design; developed idea of "capsule wardrobes," coordinated clothes, shoe, and accessory design for women, 1980s; brothers Yoram began feuding, 1990s; case settled against Ronnie Yoram, 2000; Company Address: 122 Gloucester Ave, London NW1 8HX, England.

PUBLICATIONS

On HOBBS LTD.:

Articles

- Garrett, Pat, "Hobb's Choice," in Homes & Antiques, n.d.
Quick, Harriet, "Cold Shoe Shuffle," in The Guardian, 6 December 1995.
Mendick, Robert, "Hobbs Brothers Settle Feud in Own Fashion," in The Independent Sunday, 19 March 2000.

* * *

A family business based in London, Hobbs Ltd. is a successful clothing and footwear chain owned by designer Marilyn Anselm, with her husband Yoram in charge of finance, daughter Kate Anselm as footwear designer, and daughter Amy Anselm as the merchandise director in charge of shoes, clothes, and accessories. The targeted customer is perceived as an average woman between the ages of 20 and 40 interested in clothing "designed by mothers and daughters for mothers and daughters," displaying an understated yet unmistakably English sense of style.

The origins of the business were in clothing, although footwear made the company's name. This success is possibly due to the fact that Marilyn Anselm has a background in sculpture, having studied at London's Central School of Art, and has rendered three-dimensional forms in a convincing manner. "A shoe designer should be a sculptor rather than a painter," she points out. Her fine arts training has certainly come into use in the company's designs.

The popularity of Hobbs footwear can be explained by Marilyn Anselm's goal—to produce shoes of the same quality, style, and above all—with the comfort usually found in men's shoes. In women's footwear design, the emphasis is often put on fashion, above all other considerations, the traditional idea being that the shoes are meant to be quickly phased out owing to rapidly changing trends in the

and children—which was exactly what he did (though many of his men's shirts, shorts, and trousers were worn by women and teens).

Hilfiger's business experienced ups and downs during the late 1990s and early 2000s, going from being Wall Street's fashion-industry darling for eight years (starting in 1992) to suffering lowered profits and stock prices in 2000. Many of the company's troubles were attributed to overexpansion, both in customer base and retail presence. During the late 1990s, Hilfiger entered several new business segments, including fragrance (Tommy, Tommy Girl, Freedom); a cosmetics line, Tommy Hilfiger Color; women's sportswear; a watch collection (licensed to Movado); a full line of women's swimwear (licensed to Jantzen), athletic apparel and shoes (licensed to Stride Rite), and the Hilfiger Home collection, which like the apparel, was influenced by the designer's preppy and patriotic sensibilities. This aggressive strategy led the brand to lose some of its cachet, especially in the eyes of its loyal consumers. Stores began to discount Hilfiger merchandise, and retailers were quoted in publications such as Crain's New York Business as saying its core designs were a season or two behind the trends.

Hilfiger's marketing direction in 1999—called the Year of Music—did not help matters. Sponsorship of tours by mainstream musicians such as the Rolling Stones and Britney Spears alienated the hip-hop youth who had been the company's loyal customers since 1994. Some of the designer's problems were beyond his control, however; email rumors circulated, suggesting Hilfiger was a racist (unfounded), which had ramifications on sales. All of this led the Tommy Hilfiger company to announce a loss in the quarter ending March 2000, the first ever since it went public eight years earlier. The design firm now found itself in the position of explaining to the financial community how it would turn itself around.

Although the company's retail operation grew quickly in the late 1990s, with 15,000- to 20,000-square-foot flagship stores opened in London, Mexico City, and Beverly Hills, many of these large stores were closed within a few years. Hilfiger refocused its retail strategy on smaller stores, such as a planned outlet in New York's SoHo neighborhood. In addition, the designer's expansion into womenswear did not meet expectations, and as of 2001, the company was in the midst of turning this segment around.

Other setbacks included Bloomingdale's decision, as part of a restructuring, to eliminate the Tommy men's brand from all its stores except the 59th Street New York flagship—women's and children's apparel were unaffected—and Hilfiger's failed attempt in 2000 to acquire rival Calvin Klein. One bright area of Hilfiger's business in the early 2000s, however, was Europe, launched through a license with Pepe Jeans London in 1997. The business began with men's sportswear and segued into other men's categories, as well as women's and children's apparel and licensed fragrances. Europe was Hilfiger's largest market outside North America, with products sold in upscale department stores such as House of Fraser, Harrods, Galeries Lafayette, El Corte Ingles, and Brown Thomas.

To get its domestic business back on track in 2001, Hilfiger concentrated on returning to what company executives (quoted in Crain's) termed "traditional Tommy Hilfiger styling—classics with a twist." Hilfiger continues to oversee a youthful, purely American look with ties to music and pop culture; part of his fall 2001 collection was inspired by auto racing and featured sleek leather pieces. The challenge for Hilfiger now is to continue his appeal to a broad range of demographic groups yet not lose sight of the fashion-forward urban consumers who put him on the map.

—Richard Martin; updated by Karen Raugust

HOBBS LTD.

British fashion company

Founded: in 1981 by Marilyn and Yoram Anselm. Company History: Marilyn studied sculpture at the Central School of Art, London; married Yoram and they had two children (Kate, Amy). The Anselms, along with Yoram's brother Ronnie, began retailing to English design labels before turning to shoe and clothing design; developed idea of "capsule wardrobes," coordinated clothes, shoe, and accessory design for women, 1980s; brothers Yoram began feuding, 1990s; case settled against Ronnie Yoram, 2000; Company Address: 122 Gloucester Ave, London NW1 8HX, England.

PUBLICATIONS

On HOBBS LTD.:

Articles

- Garrett, Pat, "Hobb's Choice," in Homes & Antiques, n.d.
- Quick, Harriet, "Cold Shoe Shuffle," in The Guardian, 6 December 1995.
- Mendick, Robert, "Hobbs Brothers Settle Feud in Own Fashion," in The Independent Sunday, 19 March 2000.

* * *

A family business based in London, Hobbs Ltd. is a successful clothing and footwear chain owned by designer Marilyn Anselm, with her husband Yoram in charge of finance, daughter Kate Anselm as footwear designer, and daughter Amy Anselm as the merchandise director in charge of shoes, clothes, and accessories. The targeted customer is perceived as an average woman between the ages of 20 and 40 interested in clothing "designed by mothers and daughters for mothers and daughters," displaying an understated yet unmistakably English sense of style.

The origins of the business were in clothing, although footwear made the company's name. This success is possibly due to the fact that Marilyn Anselm has a background in sculpture, having studied at London's Central School of Art, and has rendered three-dimensional forms in a convincing manner. "A shoe designer should be a sculptor rather than a painter," she points out. Her fine arts training has certainly come into use in the company's designs.

The popularity of Hobbs footwear can be explained by Marilyn Anselm's goal—to produce shoes of the same quality, style, and above all—with the comfort usually found in men's shoes. In women's footwear design, the emphasis is often put on fashion, above all other considerations, the traditional idea being that the shoes are meant to be quickly phased out owing to rapidly changing trends in the women's retail market. Hobbs, however, produces classic, albeit slightly quirky designs that attempt to provide quality and style at an affordable price. An emphasis on good craftsmanship has led to the majority of Anselm's shoe and knitwear designs being manufactured in Italy, which achieves the desired quality of finish unavailable in Britain for the same manufacturing costs.

Originally based in Hampstead in the early 1970s, the business concentrated on the retailing of leading English design labels until Anselm visited a shoe fair in Italy and was bowled over by what she saw. She began designing her own collection of shoes and clothes, which led in turn to the setting up of the company and its first shop in South Molton Street, London. Yoram Anselm and his brother Ronnie, both born in Israel, added business acumen to the company. The three of them, and later Marilyn and Yoram's two daughters, built the company to the brand of choice for well-off Englishwomen by the early 1990s. The family, particularly the brothers, remained very private in spite of their great success. In 2000, however, a long-running feud between the brothers became public when it went to court for settlement. Ronnie Anselm, the financial head of the business, was accused of skimming funds from the company. Despite these difficulties, however, the company remains extremely successful.

Hobbs' success is ultimately due to an emphasis on redesigning traditional British styles, using luxury natural fibers alongside newly developed fabrics such as Lycra for stretch or drape and the notion of the capsule wardrobe, a coordinated approach to women's fashionwear. Anselm believes in designing a top-to-toe look, with every garment following a specific theme or fashion story, an idea later popularized on a massive scale by the lifestyle marketing campaigns of companies such as Next.

The name Hobbs makes direct reference to a particular kind of British living, as created and espoused by magazines such as Country Living. The name itself was filched from an advertisement in Horse & Hound, for George Hobb's Horseboxes. The imagery Hobbs has played on in its numerous shops—from their fruitwood shelves and wardrobes, wrought iron brackets, and tapestry-woven stools to the classic court shoes, cashmere reefers, jodhpurs, and linen trousers—is one of an ineffable and timeless Englishness, reflective of country houses, horses, and herbaceous borders. All this mediated through the gaze of a 21st-century businesswoman trading on the type of associations Paul Smith so successfully conjured up for men.

—Caroline Cox; updated by Carrie Snyder

HOGG, Pam

British fashion designer

Born: Paisley, Scotland; grew up in Glasgow. Education: Studied Fine Art at Glasgow School of Art; switched to printed textiles course, winning two medals and two scholarships; MA in Textiles at Royal College of Art, London. Career: Lectured in Derby, England, and Glasgow while selling paper designs to New York and Paris; first collection Psychedelic Jungle, 1981; singer in rock band, from 1987; current band Doll, from 1993. Exhibitions: Art Gallery Museum, Glasgow, June-August 1991.

Pam Hogg, spring/summer 2000 collection. © AFP/CORBIS.

PUBLICATIONS

On HOGG:

Articles

- Franklin, Caryn, "Hogg in the Limelight," in Clothes Show (London), April 1989.
- Godfrey, John, "Warrior Queen," in i-D (London), August 1989.
- Niland, Seta, "Hogging the Spotlight," in Fashion Weekly (London), 22 March 1990.
- Rodgers, Toni, "Double Vision," in Elle (London), March 1991.
- Godfrey, John, "Pam Hogg," in Elle, June 1994.
- McRobbie, Angela, "Falling Off the Catwalk," in the New Statesman & Society, 7 June 1996.

* * *

Drawing on influences as diverse as sportswear, S&M rubberwear and 15th-century armor, Pam Hogg produced distinctive clubwear with a punk feel. Exploring similar routes to those charted by Vivienne Westwood, she developed her own niche in the London women's retail market. Hobbs, however, produces classic, albeit slightly quirky designs that attempt to provide quality and style at an affordable price. An emphasis on good craftsmanship has led to the majority of Anselm's shoe and knitwear designs being manufactured in Italy, which achieves the desired quality of finish unavailable in Britain for the same manufacturing costs.

Originally based in Hampstead in the early 1970s, the business concentrated on the retailing of leading English design labels until Anselm visited a shoe fair in Italy and was bowled over by what she saw. She began designing her own collection of shoes and clothes, which led in turn to the setting up of the company and its first shop in South Molton Street, London. Yoram Anselm and his brother Ronnie, both born in Israel, added business acumen to the company. The three of them, and later Marilyn and Yoram's two daughters, built the company to the brand of choice for well-off Englishwomen by the early 1990s. The family, particularly the brothers, remained very private in spite of their great success. In 2000, however, a long-running feud between the brothers became public when it went to court for settlement. Ronnie Anselm, the financial head of the business, was accused of skimming funds from the company. Despite these difficulties, however, the company remains extremely successful.

Hobbs' success is ultimately due to an emphasis on redesigning traditional British styles, using luxury natural fibers alongside newly developed fabrics such as Lycra for stretch or drape and the notion of the capsule wardrobe, a coordinated approach to women's fashionwear. Anselm believes in designing a top-to-toe look, with every garment following a specific theme or fashion story, an idea later popularized on a massive scale by the lifestyle marketing campaigns of companies such as Next.

The name Hobbs makes direct reference to a particular kind of British living, as created and espoused by magazines such as Country Living. The name itself was filched from an advertisement in Horse & Hound, for George Hobb's Horseboxes. The imagery Hobbs has played on in its numerous shops—from their fruitwood shelves and wardrobes, wrought iron brackets, and tapestry-woven stools to the classic court shoes, cashmere reefers, jodhpurs, and linen trousers—is one of an ineffable and timeless Englishness, reflective of country houses, horses, and herbaceous borders. All this mediated through the gaze of a 21st-century businesswoman trading on the type of associations Paul Smith so successfully conjured up for men.

—Caroline Cox; updated by Carrie Snyder

HOGG, Pam

British fashion designer

Born: Paisley, Scotland; grew up in Glasgow. Education: Studied Fine Art at Glasgow School of Art; switched to printed textiles course, winning two medals and two scholarships; MA in Textiles at Royal College of Art, London. Career: Lectured in Derby, England, and Glasgow while selling paper designs to New York and Paris; first collection Psychedelic Jungle, 1981; singer in rock band, from 1987; current band Doll, from 1993. Exhibitions: Art Gallery Museum, Glasgow, June-August 1991.

Pam Hogg, spring/summer 2000 collection. © AFP/CORBIS.

PUBLICATIONS

On HOGG:

Articles

- Franklin, Caryn, "Hogg in the Limelight," in Clothes Show (London), April 1989.
- Godfrey, John, "Warrior Queen," in i-D (London), August 1989.
- Niland, Seta, "Hogging the Spotlight," in Fashion Weekly (London), 22 March 1990.
- Rodgers, Toni, "Double Vision," in Elle (London), March 1991.
- Godfrey, John, "Pam Hogg," in Elle, June 1994.
- McRobbie, Angela, "Falling Off the Catwalk," in the New Statesman & Society, 7 June 1996.

* * *

Drawing on influences as diverse as sportswear, S&M rubberwear and 15th-century armor, Pam Hogg produced distinctive clubwear with a punk feel. Exploring similar routes to those charted by Vivienne Westwood, she developed her own niche in the London fashion scene, while vehemently retaining elements of her native Scotland in her designs.

Riding the wave of British talent which swept to the forefront in the mid-1980s, Hogg, in common with John Richmond, represented the coming together of popular culture and fashion. She used rock music as a constant source of visual ideas, to create strong images for womenswear in PVC and studded leather. In a sense her clothes reflected her own lifestyle, her aspirations to pop stardom, which sometimes took precedence over her designing, and her enthusiastic involvement in London clubland. This close contact with street life enabled her work to remain in tune with shifts in focus among the generation of clubbers and popstars she dressed.

Hogg's work was infused with the desire to create fashion as a series of costumes, first for the early 1980s New Romantic nightlife, with heady silver-printed velvets which drew upon her training in textiles, and later, as she began to establish a more coherent and distinctive look, in sporty stretch jersey with leather. Her clothes promoted strong, often provocative images for women that dabbled in the confrontational sexual and tribal motifs of punk, and responded to her own uncompromising personality.

In 1990 this interest in raw sexual statements was crystallized in a collection that included shiny black rubber front-laced catsuits and thigh-high spike-heeled platform boots, which toyed with fetishism. The stark, anarchic personae created by such clothes was tempered by a sense of humor and frequent references to another strong look from the 1970s—glam rock. Hogg often used sparkling gold lurex for leggings or bell bottoms flouting convention, fake cowhide chaps, and red tartan panels and fringing.

Her silver leather minikilts and studded biker jackets equally exemplified her mixing of imagery. In characteristic style, in the autumn-winter of 1989–90, she combined references to Joan of Arc with Hell's Angels and go-go dancers, dubbed the "Warrior Queen" collection. It was typical of her work; shiny corsets were worn with jersey separates with puffed shoulder and elbow sections that referred to slashed 15th-century styles and seemingly castellated cutout hem, and leather crowns-cum-helmets providing a nocturnal urban armor. Her work ran parallel with Westwood's, yet Hogg was more concerned with exploring subcultures and historical inspirations for strong imagery than for overriding philosophies.

The ability to combine shock tactics with wearable clothes continued in Hogg's menswear, which derived its distinctive style from similar sources, with punkish overtones and an overblown humor, combining macho leather with lace, gold trimmings, and the obligatory tartan. It challenged notions of what is acceptable as menswear and set Hogg within the movement from the late 1980s to broaden the horizons of this area of design. Her own line was developed in response to the success of unisex garments within her women's range, with male customers keen to adopt Hogg's upbeat style and sport her flaming heart logo.

Despite having shifted her interest from clothing to music in 1992, her last collection continued to sell well, having become as close to a classic style as clubwear could. Her encapsulation of the traits of British city street life—music, sex, rebellion, and a perverse sense of its own heritage—ensured its continued popularity. Hogg's success in Britain was complemented by the appeal of such witty, indigenous imagery to foreign buyers, who quickly recognized her cult status.

—Rebecca Arnold

HOLAH, David

See BODYMAP

HOPE, Emma

British footwear designer

Born: Portsmouth, England, 11 July 1962. Education: Studied at Cordwainers College, Hackney, London, 1981–84. Career: Established business in London, 1984, first collection sold to Whistles, Joseph & Jones, London; designed and manufactured six collections for Laura Ashley, 1985–87; designed for, among others, the Chelsea Design Co., Betty Jackson, Jean Muir, English Eccentrics, 1985–87; opened first London store, 1987; designed for Harel, Paris, 1988, for Arabella Pollen, 1989, and for Nicole Farhi, from 1989; footwear fashion critic, from 1988; opened second London store, 1997; expanded line to include handbags and leather goods, 1997; opened third London store, 1999. Awards: Five Design Council awards, 1987–88; Martini Style award, 1988; Harpers and Queen award, 1989. Address: 53 Sloan Square, London SW1, England.

PUBLICATIONS

By HOPE:

Articles

- "Shoe Design: Tiptoeing into Industry," in Design (London), November 1988.
- "Emma Hope, Shoe Designer," in the Independent (London), 12 June 1998.

On HOPE:

Books

- Debrett's People of Today, London, 1991.

Articles

- Callen, Kerena, and Liz Freemantle, "Bit Parts," in Elle (London), May 1987.
- Lott, Jane, and Charity Durant, "Hoofers to the Nation," in the Observer (London), 30 August 1987.
- Rumbold, Judy, "The Last Shall Be First," in The Guardian (London), 21 September 1987.
- "Brave New Heels," in Connoisseur (London), October 1987.
- Thackara, John, "Put Your Foot in It," in the Observer Magazine (London), 22 November 1987.
- Allott, Serena, "A Foot in Every Door," in the Daily Telegraph, 20 November 1989.
- Schneider-Levy, Barbara, "U.K.'s Emma Hope Bolsters Men's Line," in Footwear News, 25 November 1991.
- "A Life in the Day of Emma Hope," in the Sunday Times (London), November 1991.
- Sharpe, Antonia, "Frivolity with Discipline," in the Financial Times Saturday edition (London), June 1992.
- Baber, Bonnie, "On the Verge of a Nervous Breakdown," in Footwear News, 30 January 1995.

fashion scene, while vehemently retaining elements of her native Scotland in her designs.

Riding the wave of British talent which swept to the forefront in the mid-1980s, Hogg, in common with John Richmond, represented the coming together of popular culture and fashion. She used rock music as a constant source of visual ideas, to create strong images for womenswear in PVC and studded leather. In a sense her clothes reflected her own lifestyle, her aspirations to pop stardom, which sometimes took precedence over her designing, and her enthusiastic involvement in London clubland. This close contact with street life enabled her work to remain in tune with shifts in focus among the generation of clubbers and popstars she dressed.

Hogg's work was infused with the desire to create fashion as a series of costumes, first for the early 1980s New Romantic nightlife, with heady silver-printed velvets which drew upon her training in textiles, and later, as she began to establish a more coherent and distinctive look, in sporty stretch jersey with leather. Her clothes promoted strong, often provocative images for women that dabbled in the confrontational sexual and tribal motifs of punk, and responded to her own uncompromising personality.

In 1990 this interest in raw sexual statements was crystallized in a collection that included shiny black rubber front-laced catsuits and thigh-high spike-heeled platform boots, which toyed with fetishism. The stark, anarchic personae created by such clothes was tempered by a sense of humor and frequent references to another strong look from the 1970s—glam rock. Hogg often used sparkling gold lurex for leggings or bell bottoms flouting convention, fake cowhide chaps, and red tartan panels and fringing.

Her silver leather minikilts and studded biker jackets equally exemplified her mixing of imagery. In characteristic style, in the autumn-winter of 1989–90, she combined references to Joan of Arc with Hell's Angels and go-go dancers, dubbed the "Warrior Queen" collection. It was typical of her work; shiny corsets were worn with jersey separates with puffed shoulder and elbow sections that referred to slashed 15th-century styles and seemingly castellated cutout hem, and leather crowns-cum-helmets providing a nocturnal urban armor. Her work ran parallel with Westwood's, yet Hogg was more concerned with exploring subcultures and historical inspirations for strong imagery than for overriding philosophies.

The ability to combine shock tactics with wearable clothes continued in Hogg's menswear, which derived its distinctive style from similar sources, with punkish overtones and an overblown humor, combining macho leather with lace, gold trimmings, and the obligatory tartan. It challenged notions of what is acceptable as menswear and set Hogg within the movement from the late 1980s to broaden the horizons of this area of design. Her own line was developed in response to the success of unisex garments within her women's range, with male customers keen to adopt Hogg's upbeat style and sport her flaming heart logo.

Despite having shifted her interest from clothing to music in 1992, her last collection continued to sell well, having become as close to a classic style as clubwear could. Her encapsulation of the traits of British city street life—music, sex, rebellion, and a perverse sense of its own heritage—ensured its continued popularity. Hogg's success in Britain was complemented by the appeal of such witty, indigenous imagery to foreign buyers, who quickly recognized her cult status.

—Rebecca Arnold

HOLAH, David

See BODYMAP

HOPE, Emma

British footwear designer

Born: Portsmouth, England, 11 July 1962. Education: Studied at Cordwainers College, Hackney, London, 1981–84. Career: Established business in London, 1984, first collection sold to Whistles, Joseph & Jones, London; designed and manufactured six collections for Laura Ashley, 1985–87; designed for, among others, the Chelsea Design Co., Betty Jackson, Jean Muir, English Eccentrics, 1985–87; opened first London store, 1987; designed for Harel, Paris, 1988, for Arabella Pollen, 1989, and for Nicole Farhi, from 1989; footwear fashion critic, from 1988; opened second London store, 1997; expanded line to include handbags and leather goods, 1997; opened third London store, 1999. Awards: Five Design Council awards, 1987–88; Martini Style award, 1988; Harpers and Queen award, 1989. Address: 53 Sloan Square, London SW1, England.

PUBLICATIONS

By HOPE:

Articles

- "Shoe Design: Tiptoeing into Industry," in Design (London), November 1988.
- "Emma Hope, Shoe Designer," in the Independent (London), 12 June 1998.

On HOPE:

Books

- Debrett's People of Today, London, 1991.

Articles

- Callen, Kerena, and Liz Freemantle, "Bit Parts," in Elle (London), May 1987.
- Lott, Jane, and Charity Durant, "Hoofers to the Nation," in the Observer (London), 30 August 1987.
- Rumbold, Judy, "The Last Shall Be First," in The Guardian (London), 21 September 1987.
- "Brave New Heels," in Connoisseur (London), October 1987.
- Thackara, John, "Put Your Foot in It," in the Observer Magazine (London), 22 November 1987.
- Allott, Serena, "A Foot in Every Door," in the Daily Telegraph, 20 November 1989.
- Schneider-Levy, Barbara, "U.K.'s Emma Hope Bolsters Men's Line," in Footwear News, 25 November 1991.
- "A Life in the Day of Emma Hope," in the Sunday Times (London), November 1991.
- Sharpe, Antonia, "Frivolity with Discipline," in the Financial Times Saturday edition (London), June 1992.
- Baber, Bonnie, "On the Verge of a Nervous Breakdown," in Footwear News, 30 January 1995.

- Williams, Sally, "Hot on the Heels of the Hackney Mafia," in the Independent (London), 25 May 1996.
- Cook, Emma, "How We Met; Raffaella Barker and Emma Hope," in the Independent Sunday (London), 14 July 1996.
- Fallon, James, "Hoping for Success," in Footwear News, 3 February 1997.
- Blanchard, Tamsin, "Made to Pleasure," in the Independent (London), 28 October 1998.
- Fox, Imogen, "Shopping with...Emma Hope—Emma's Box of Tricks," in the Independent Sunday (London), 3 January 1999.
- O'Riordain, Aoife, "The Evidence: The Shoe Designer's Work Table," in the Independent (London), 6 March 1999.
- Lewis, Henny, "Fashion & Lifestyle: Emma Hope," available online at My Village: Notting Hill, (www.portowebbo.co.uk/nottinghilltv), October 2000.
- "Emma Hope's Shoes," online at Create Britain, (www.create-britain.co.uk), 6 June 2001.

* * *

Emma Hope was part of the flowering of talent in British shoe design in the late 1980s. She trained at Cordwainers Technical College in London's Hackney along with successful contemporaries Christine Ahrens, Elizabeth Stuart-Smith, and Patrick Cox. There she received a thorough technical grounding that enabled her to design free, fanciful shoes that are also practical and comfortable to wear. Her first collection was sold to shops in London and America in 1984. She produced shoes for leading fashion designers such as Jean Muir, Bill Gibb, John Flett, Betty Jackson, and Joe Casely-Hayford. From 1987 Hope began exhibiting collections under her own name; in the same year, her work was featured in the 22 different styles of boots and shoes accepted by the Design Council for their footwear selection.

The opening of Hope's own shop in London in 1987 marked a new phase. She acknowledged it caused her to produce designs that were more straightforward and wearable and has described her shoes as "regalia for feet," decorative and distinctive but with comfort being an important feature. Inspiration comes from historical sources studied in the collections of the Victoria and Albert Museum in London and the Shoe Museum in Northampton. Paintings and Greek and Roman statues have been explored for source material as well. Louis heels and elongated toes were often seen in her work. Hope's shoes have been featured in the style pages of fashionable magazines such as Vogue, Cosmopolitan, and Harpers and Queen. The regular appearance of her shoes in more specialized publications such as Wedding and Home reflects her prominence in the field of decorative special occasion shoes, particularly for brides.

When Hope started her business, her shoes were made to her specifications in London by skilled craftspeople, but this method became increasingly difficult and in 1995 she moved production of all her shoes to Italy. According to Hope's statement in Footwear News (1997), the change was a wonderful success: wholesale sales increased by a third in the first season and had doubled by 1997. About two-thirds of Hope's business has come through the wholesale market, while the remaining third sells through her stores.

Hope has become one of the most well-known shoe designers in Britain, and her shoes are easily found in the U.S., Europe, Hong Kong, Japan, and Australia. She has also added a handbag collection to match her shoes, using the same materials—suede, silk, velvet, nappa, brocade, and the like. Her incredible success can in part be attributed to the combination of practicality and luxury that she pairs for each shoe she designs. Hope always has a mind toward where the shoes might be worn and how they will make the wearer feel; in other words, she puts herself in their shoes.

—Linda Coleing; updated by Carrie Snyder

HORN, Carol

American sportswear and knitwear designer

Born: New York City, 12 June 1936. Education: Columbia University, New York, and Boston University, Boston, MA. Career: Began designing sportswear for juniors, Bryant 9; designer, Benson & Partners and Outlander Sweater Company, 1968; designer/director, Carol Horn line for Malcolm Starr International; established her own company, Carol Horn's Habitat, 1974; launched Carol Horn Sportswear, 1983. Awards: Coty award, 1975; May Company award for Best Designer of the Year, 1976; Neiman Marcus Best Designer of the Year, 1977; Macy's Best Taste award, 1983; Knitwear Association's Knitwear Designer award, 1984. Address: 215 West 40th Street, New York, New York 10018, USA.

PUBLICATIONS

On HORN:

Books

Stegemeyer, Anne, Who's Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.

Articles

"Carol Horn Back in April with Lowered Price Tags," in WWD, 28 February 1983.

"Fall on SA Still in a Fashion Fog," in WWD, 21 April 1983.

Lockwood, Lisa, "Carol Horn Exclusive Set for Limited," in WWD, 14 February 1986.

_____, "Christine Thomson Signs Up for a Flagship Line," in WWD, 19 February 1986.

Hartlein, Robert, "Carol Horn Reorganizes Firm," in WWD, 12 October 1987.

_____, "Horn Won't Ship Spring, Zeroing in on Backer," in WWD, 9 December 1987.

Chua, Lawrence, "Carol Horn Enters Licensed Leather Pact (with Marquette Ltd.)," in WWD, 6 April 1988.

White, Constance C. R., "Carol Horn's New American Indian Bent," in WWD, 12 July 1989.

Friedman, Arthur, "Carol Horn Comes to Saril," in WWD, 11 September 1990.

"Carol Horn's Kids," in WWD, 6 May 1991.

"Seventh Avenue Continues March into Kids," in Children's Business, June 1991.

Lockwood, Lisa, "Carol Horn's Comeback Collection," in WWD, 29 September 1993.

* * *

Bringing cultures and traditions of the past and present into her designs, Carol Horn uniquely creates a style that is both stylish and

- Williams, Sally, "Hot on the Heels of the Hackney Mafia," in the Independent (London), 25 May 1996.
- Cook, Emma, "How We Met; Raffaella Barker and Emma Hope," in the Independent Sunday (London), 14 July 1996.
- Fallon, James, "Hoping for Success," in Footwear News, 3 February 1997.
- Blanchard, Tamsin, "Made to Pleasure," in the Independent (London), 28 October 1998.
- Fox, Imogen, "Shopping with...Emma Hope—Emma's Box of Tricks," in the Independent Sunday (London), 3 January 1999.
- O'Riordain, Aoife, "The Evidence: The Shoe Designer's Work Table," in the Independent (London), 6 March 1999.
- Lewis, Henny, "Fashion & Lifestyle: Emma Hope," available online at My Village: Notting Hill, (www.portowebbo.co.uk/nottinghilltv), October 2000.
- "Emma Hope's Shoes," online at Create Britain, (www.create-britain.co.uk), 6 June 2001.

* * *

Emma Hope was part of the flowering of talent in British shoe design in the late 1980s. She trained at Cordwainers Technical College in London's Hackney along with successful contemporaries Christine Ahrens, Elizabeth Stuart-Smith, and Patrick Cox. There she received a thorough technical grounding that enabled her to design free, fanciful shoes that are also practical and comfortable to wear. Her first collection was sold to shops in London and America in 1984. She produced shoes for leading fashion designers such as Jean Muir, Bill Gibb, John Flett, Betty Jackson, and Joe Casely-Hayford. From 1987 Hope began exhibiting collections under her own name; in the same year, her work was featured in the 22 different styles of boots and shoes accepted by the Design Council for their footwear selection.

The opening of Hope's own shop in London in 1987 marked a new phase. She acknowledged it caused her to produce designs that were more straightforward and wearable and has described her shoes as "regalia for feet," decorative and distinctive but with comfort being an important feature. Inspiration comes from historical sources studied in the collections of the Victoria and Albert Museum in London and the Shoe Museum in Northampton. Paintings and Greek and Roman statues have been explored for source material as well. Louis heels and elongated toes were often seen in her work. Hope's shoes have been featured in the style pages of fashionable magazines such as Vogue, Cosmopolitan, and Harpers and Queen. The regular appearance of her shoes in more specialized publications such as Wedding and Home reflects her prominence in the field of decorative special occasion shoes, particularly for brides.

When Hope started her business, her shoes were made to her specifications in London by skilled craftspeople, but this method became increasingly difficult and in 1995 she moved production of all her shoes to Italy. According to Hope's statement in Footwear News (1997), the change was a wonderful success: wholesale sales increased by a third in the first season and had doubled by 1997. About two-thirds of Hope's business has come through the wholesale market, while the remaining third sells through her stores.

Hope has become one of the most well-known shoe designers in Britain, and her shoes are easily found in the U.S., Europe, Hong Kong, Japan, and Australia. She has also added a handbag collection to match her shoes, using the same materials—suede, silk, velvet, nappa, brocade, and the like. Her incredible success can in part be attributed to the combination of practicality and luxury that she pairs for each shoe she designs. Hope always has a mind toward where the shoes might be worn and how they will make the wearer feel; in other words, she puts herself in their shoes.

—Linda Coleing; updated by Carrie Snyder

HORN, Carol

American sportswear and knitwear designer

Born: New York City, 12 June 1936. Education: Columbia University, New York, and Boston University, Boston, MA. Career: Began designing sportswear for juniors, Bryant 9; designer, Benson & Partners and Outlander Sweater Company, 1968; designer/director, Carol Horn line for Malcolm Starr International; established her own company, Carol Horn's Habitat, 1974; launched Carol Horn Sportswear, 1983. Awards: Coty award, 1975; May Company award for Best Designer of the Year, 1976; Neiman Marcus Best Designer of the Year, 1977; Macy's Best Taste award, 1983; Knitwear Association's Knitwear Designer award, 1984. Address: 215 West 40th Street, New York, New York 10018, USA.

PUBLICATIONS

On HORN:

Books

Stegemeyer, Anne, Who's Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.

Articles

"Carol Horn Back in April with Lowered Price Tags," in WWD, 28 February 1983.

"Fall on SA Still in a Fashion Fog," in WWD, 21 April 1983.

Lockwood, Lisa, "Carol Horn Exclusive Set for Limited," in WWD, 14 February 1986.

_____, "Christine Thomson Signs Up for a Flagship Line," in WWD, 19 February 1986.

Hartlein, Robert, "Carol Horn Reorganizes Firm," in WWD, 12 October 1987.

_____, "Horn Won't Ship Spring, Zeroing in on Backer," in WWD, 9 December 1987.

Chua, Lawrence, "Carol Horn Enters Licensed Leather Pact (with Marquette Ltd.)," in WWD, 6 April 1988.

White, Constance C. R., "Carol Horn's New American Indian Bent," in WWD, 12 July 1989.

Friedman, Arthur, "Carol Horn Comes to Saril," in WWD, 11 September 1990.

"Carol Horn's Kids," in WWD, 6 May 1991.

"Seventh Avenue Continues March into Kids," in Children's Business, June 1991.

Lockwood, Lisa, "Carol Horn's Comeback Collection," in WWD, 29 September 1993.

* * *

Bringing cultures and traditions of the past and present into her designs, Carol Horn uniquely creates a style that is both stylish and comfortable. She was the first to implement the essence of the 1960s, with collections of separates that carried over from season to season. Further, Horn blended such disparate looks as British nomad and the ultra structured lines of formal Japanese attire into her collections. Her fringed suede clothing, inspired by the Micmac Indians of Massachusetts, led to a 21-piece collection called Carol Horn's American Indian Collectibles.

To create fashionable designs from various cultures and traditions, Horn has used travel as a source of inspiration throughout her career. She made her first trip to India in 1969, in collaboration with the Indian Government's Department of Handicrafts. While on her trip, she examined and admired the gauzy sheer fabrics, in bright and vibrant colors, made and worn by the country's people. The clothing made an everlasting impression on Horn, which in turn led to what became her signature style. In addition to the color combinations of the Indian fabric, Horn also found the simplicity, function, and comfort of the clothing of lasting value and encouraging to her designs. After her India trip, Horn traveled extensively to find inspiration for her designs, including visits through Europe, Asia, the Middle East, and the Far East.

Newer collections featured knitwear created from multidyed yarns in rich colors, with each garment meticulously produced on a hand-loom. Her designs are never mass produced, and are all one of kind originals. Horn's knitwear line is just a small part of her business, however, her sweaters, leathers, fake furs, and sportswear have also well received by critics and customers. A recent sportswear collection, developed exclusively for The Limited's flagship store on Madison Avenue, was a great success.

Never leaving any target group ignored, Horn developed an interest in children's clothes in the beginning of the 1990s. The new line offered girls' sportswear in sizes 4 to 14. The designs were body-conscious and paralleled Horn's popular sportswear collections for women. Styles were offered in velour and stretch Lycra and featured several themes, including a harlequin or houndstooth prints, and ribbed velour.

Carol Horn's style of function and comfort, in vibrant mostly natural fabrics, is the key to her success as a fashion designer. She knows her customers want clothing that is both fashionable and simple, and she creates moderately priced collections to meet these needs. The traditions and cultures that her designs mimic are creatively integrated, producing unique, noticeable, and stylish designs.

—Kimbally A. Medeiros

HORSTING, Viktor

See VIKTOR & ROLF

HOWELL, Margaret

British fashion designer

Born: Tadworth, Surrey, 5 September 1946. Education: Studied Fine Art at Goldsmiths' College, London. Family: Divorced; children: two. Collections: Museum of Costume, Bath; Victoria and

Margaret Howell, fall 2001 collection. © AFP/CORBIS.

Albert Museum, London. Address: 5 Garden House, 8 Battersea Park Road, London SW8 4BG, UK.

PUBLICATIONS

On HOWELL:

Books

Mulvagh, Jane, Vogue History of 20th Century Fashion, London, 1988.

Rothstein, Natalie, 400 Years of Fashion, London, 1984.

Articles

Rubold, Judy, "A Howell of Triumph," in The Guardian (London), 26 October 1987.

"Designs on Men," in Elle (London), February 1990.

Armstrong, Lisa, "Fashioned for Life as Women Live It," in the Independent (London), 2 April 1992.

Reed, Paula, "Out of the Woods," in the Sunday Times (London), 13 September 1992.

"Suits You," in New Business, Winter 1999.

Barron, Susannah, "Always and Forever," in The Guardian (London), 7 January 2000.

comfortable. She was the first to implement the essence of the 1960s, with collections of separates that carried over from season to season. Further, Horn blended such disparate looks as British nomad and the ultra structured lines of formal Japanese attire into her collections. Her fringed suede clothing, inspired by the Micmac Indians of Massachusetts, led to a 21-piece collection called Carol Horn's American Indian Collectibles.

To create fashionable designs from various cultures and traditions, Horn has used travel as a source of inspiration throughout her career. She made her first trip to India in 1969, in collaboration with the Indian Government's Department of Handicrafts. While on her trip, she examined and admired the gauzy sheer fabrics, in bright and vibrant colors, made and worn by the country's people. The clothing made an everlasting impression on Horn, which in turn led to what became her signature style. In addition to the color combinations of the Indian fabric, Horn also found the simplicity, function, and comfort of the clothing of lasting value and encouraging to her designs. After her India trip, Horn traveled extensively to find inspiration for her designs, including visits through Europe, Asia, the Middle East, and the Far East.

Newer collections featured knitwear created from multidyed yarns in rich colors, with each garment meticulously produced on a hand-loom. Her designs are never mass produced, and are all one of kind originals. Horn's knitwear line is just a small part of her business, however, her sweaters, leathers, fake furs, and sportswear have also well received by critics and customers. A recent sportswear collection, developed exclusively for The Limited's flagship store on Madison Avenue, was a great success.

Never leaving any target group ignored, Horn developed an interest in children's clothes in the beginning of the 1990s. The new line offered girls' sportswear in sizes 4 to 14. The designs were body-conscious and paralleled Horn's popular sportswear collections for women. Styles were offered in velour and stretch Lycra and featured several themes, including a harlequin or houndstooth prints, and ribbed velour.

Carol Horn's style of function and comfort, in vibrant mostly natural fabrics, is the key to her success as a fashion designer. She knows her customers want clothing that is both fashionable and simple, and she creates moderately priced collections to meet these needs. The traditions and cultures that her designs mimic are creatively integrated, producing unique, noticeable, and stylish designs.

—Kimbally A. Medeiros

HORSTING, Viktor

See VIKTOR & ROLF

HOWELL, Margaret

British fashion designer

Born: Tadworth, Surrey, 5 September 1946. Education: Studied Fine Art at Goldsmiths' College, London. Family: Divorced; children: two. Collections: Museum of Costume, Bath; Victoria and

Margaret Howell, fall 2001 collection. © AFP/CORBIS.

Albert Museum, London. Address: 5 Garden House, 8 Battersea Park Road, London SW8 4BG, UK.

PUBLICATIONS

On HOWELL:

Books

Mulvagh, Jane, Vogue History of 20th Century Fashion, London, 1988.

Rothstein, Natalie, 400 Years of Fashion, London, 1984.

Articles

Rubold, Judy, "A Howell of Triumph," in The Guardian (London), 26 October 1987.

"Designs on Men," in Elle (London), February 1990.

Armstrong, Lisa, "Fashioned for Life as Women Live It," in the Independent (London), 2 April 1992.

Reed, Paula, "Out of the Woods," in the Sunday Times (London), 13 September 1992.

"Suits You," in New Business, Winter 1999.

Barron, Susannah, "Always and Forever," in The Guardian (London), 7 January 2000.

Margaret Howell, fall 2001 collection. © AFP/CORBIS.

*

From an early age I remember having an awareness of clothes and a response to those of my parents; the softness of my Father's well-worn cotton shirts and raincoat, the slim hang of a pleated chiffon dress my Mother used for ballroom dancing. She made her children's clothes; I loved the smell of new cotton as it was cut. I had fun making my school uniform stylish in the early 1960s. We wore our skirts long with ankle socks. We bought men's cardigans from Marks and Spencer. I enjoyed the androgynous character of the white shirt, the duffle coat and the double-breasted gabardine raincoats. In fact, I was styling the basics which I think is what I do now. I take a classic and reinterpret it by cut, detailing and the choice of fabric to make it modern and enjoyable to wear.

I am interested in the selection and then the editing process that goes on in design and in the grouping of things together to make a statement as a result of their selection. I am more interested in styling, quality, and workmanship than in the impact of fashion, but the styling has to run parallel with a current fashion that is determined by lifestyle and the needs of today.

—Margaret Howell

* * *

An established name in British fashion design, Margaret Howell originally trained as a fine artist at Goldsmiths' College of Art in London in the 1960s. Although having no formal training in fashion, in 1971 she produced her first range of accessories, the success of which led to the creation of a small business, printing and selling scarves to boutiques. Later she began designing men's shirts, which were sold in South Molton Street by Joseph.

Her clothes for both men and women, designed from the early 1970s onwards, are based on a typically English look, using vernacular materials such as Melton cloth, tweed, and wool. The clothing makes references to what are considered to be traditional approaches to dressing—the British traditions of cashmere and tweeds but twisted into a more relaxed image which is particularly appealing to Americans.

Howell has operated a shop in New York, and her reinterpretations of classic English clothes—a style dubbed “preppy” in the U.S. and equally successfully interpreted in Ralph Lauren’s Polo range—negotiate a series of experiments around standard garments such as the striped cotton shirt, box pleated skirt, Fair Isle sweater, or archetypal cardigan as in the 1994 cashmere version with tiny pearl buttons worn with silk pajama bottoms. The clothes themselves seem hardly to alter from season to season, and it seems ironic that Howell, a designer noted for timeless classics, is involved in the fashion world, which operates on the notion of novelty for novelty’s sake rather than being allied to any improved functionality.

“Timelessness” and “classic,” however, are a staple part of fashion terminology used to describe and market looks connoting notions of wealth and taste through good tailoring and the use of traditional materials. The classic look signifies affluence through the wearing of clothes that fit within the parameters of understated elegance and sophisticated taste; an emphasis on the texture of the materials used and the expertise of tailoring rather than more obviously conceptual ideas like grunge or punk. This concept has been successfully utilized in the design and marketing of Armani, say, or Hermès.

Howell’s clothes also operate successfully on the notion of nostalgia. Past eras such as the 1930s are referenced in women’s eveningwear, particularly the 1950s in daywear, an evocation of an Enid Blyton world where boys wear cricket flannels or knee-length shorts and girls wear cotton frocks, short socks, and cardies. In the early 1980s, British style guru Peter York dubbed Howell the designer for Babymakers, those who wore archaic children’s clothes particularly from their own childhoods, clothes with a children’s book feel as worn by the Famous Five or Just William. Striped blazers, Fair Isle slipovers, macintoshes, and flannel trousers in archaic cuts are all staples of Howell’s collections. With the demise of the Babymaking era, however, and the assertion of the tougher 1980s power look, Howell’s clothes were later bought for their comfort and “classic” qualities by the more “aesthetically aware” consumer who considered yarns, dyes, and reworkings of conventional clothing forms before the vagaries of high fashion.

The contemporary Howell look is praised for its pared-down line and simple silhouettes, the controlled restraint of shape and color, the workmanship and quality of cloth and cut. By the mid-1990s, she was concentrating on women’s clothing, particularly trouser suits, which have always been an integral part of her collections. The 1994 autumn/winter version featured masculine suiting feminized with soft chiffon scarves. Her designs for jackets, eveningwear, and nightwear still have a feel for styles of the past—such as her 1994 white handkerchief linen pajamas. These styles evoke memories of her own childhood, such as her father's gardening raincoat that hung on the back door, her mother's cotton dresses, and an English sporting look popularized by designers from Chanel onward and seen in Howell's nautical navy cotton cardigans with brass buttons and linen jodhpurs, worn with a white linen shawl-collared shirt.

By the beginning of 2000, Howell's empire had grown to employ 300 people worldwide, with global sales of £30 million. She has capitalized on the popularity of British design in Japan, designing under license for the Japanese company Anglobal and has 70 shops and concessions there, in contrast to only 10 in her home country. "Today Margaret Howell is the second biggest-selling British designer in Japan after Paul Smith," reported New Business magazine. "The Japanese love her linens, denims, and floral cottons for summer which are as English as cricket or cream teas. In winter, Howell's Far Eastern customers clamor for her tweeds, knitwear and stylish raincoats which have been adapted to their sophisticated demands."

Managing director Richard Craig was hired to help save Howell's company from a near collapse after the fashion industry shrank in the late 1980s at the same time Howell overexpanded. He has continued to guide the company, hoping to add to his successes in Britain and Japan by developing American and Western European markets. "But we want to build slowly, carefully and profitably," he told New Business.

Allowing a pro to handle the books while maintaining design freedom seems to work for Howell, who is entering her fourth decade at the cutting edge of a notoriously fickle business. She has become as much of a fashion classic as the clothing she favors. "Some things come back and have an appeal in a new era," she told Susannah Barron of The Guardian. "They are the real classics."

—Caroline Cox; updated by Lisa Groshong

HUGO BOSS AG

German menswear fashion house

Founded: in Metzingen, Germany, by Hugo Boss in 1923, to manufacture work clothes and uniforms. Company History: Bought U.S.-based Joseph & Feiss, 1966; subsequently taken over by Siegfried Boss and son-in-law Eugen Holly (1948–72) and in 1972 by grandsons Jochen Holly and Uwe Holly; introduced men's and children's lines, 1948; began export to Belgium and Netherlands, 1973; Scandinavia and England, 1975; formed Paris subsidiary and began exporting to U.S., 1977; added men's shirts, 1981; exported to Canada, 1982; introduced sportswear and cosmetics line, 1984; added Italy, Japan, and Spain to export countries, 1985–86; created U.S. subsidiary in New York, 1986; Portugal, Taiwan, and Korea, 1987–88; launched eyewear collection, 1989; firm acquired by Japanese investment group Leyton House, Ltd., 1989; womenswear collection debuted and discontinued, 1990–91; bought by Italian manufacturer Marzotto & Figli, SpA (which became Gruppo Industriale Marzotto), 1991; formed units in Milan and Japan, 1991; Hugo and Baldessarini lines for men introduced, 1994; opened new stores in Prague and Shanghai, 1994; major media blitz and image rehaul, 1995; opened shop inside Saks Fifth Avenue, New York, 1996; sold Joseph & Feiss, 1996; launched Hugo womenswear, 1998; second womenswear line, under Boss label, announced 1999; Boss

Hugo Boss AG, fall/winter 2001–02 collection. © AP/Wide World Photos.

womenswear debuted, 2000; fragrances include Boss Sport, Boss Spirit, Boss Elements, 1994; Hugo, 1995; and Hugo Woman, 1997.

Company Address: Dieselstrasse 12, 72555 Metzingen, Germany.

Company Website: www.hugoboss.com.

PUBLICATIONS

On HUGO BOSS:

Articles

Syedain, Hashi, "What Suits Boss," in Management Today (London), June 1989.

"Modest Boss," in DNR, 25 January 1991.

Deeny, Godfrey, "The World According to Boss," in DNR, 1 April 1991.

Protzman, Ferdinand, "Hugo Boss: A Fading Status Symbol," in the New York Times, 23 June 1991.

Deeny, Godfrey, "Redirecting the Empire: Hugo Boss Adjusts to the 'Values' of the 1990s," in DNR, 5 August 1993.

Levine, Joshua, "I Am the Boss," in Forbes, 25 October 1993.

childhood, such as her father's gardening raincoat that hung on the back door, her mother's cotton dresses, and an English sporting look popularized by designers from Chanel onward and seen in Howell's nautical navy cotton cardigans with brass buttons and linen jodhpurs, worn with a white linen shawl-collared shirt.

By the beginning of 2000, Howell's empire had grown to employ 300 people worldwide, with global sales of £30 million. She has capitalized on the popularity of British design in Japan, designing under license for the Japanese company Anglobal and has 70 shops and concessions there, in contrast to only 10 in her home country. "Today Margaret Howell is the second biggest-selling British designer in Japan after Paul Smith," reported New Business magazine. "The Japanese love her linens, denims, and floral cottons for summer which are as English as cricket or cream teas. In winter, Howell's Far Eastern customers clamor for her tweeds, knitwear and stylish raincoats which have been adapted to their sophisticated demands."

Managing director Richard Craig was hired to help save Howell's company from a near collapse after the fashion industry shrank in the late 1980s at the same time Howell overexpanded. He has continued to guide the company, hoping to add to his successes in Britain and Japan by developing American and Western European markets. "But we want to build slowly, carefully and profitably," he told New Business.

Allowing a pro to handle the books while maintaining design freedom seems to work for Howell, who is entering her fourth decade at the cutting edge of a notoriously fickle business. She has become as much of a fashion classic as the clothing she favors. "Some things come back and have an appeal in a new era," she told Susannah Barron of The Guardian. "They are the real classics."

—Caroline Cox; updated by Lisa Groshong

HUGO BOSS AG

German menswear fashion house

Founded: in Metzingen, Germany, by Hugo Boss in 1923, to manufacture work clothes and uniforms. Company History: Bought U.S.-based Joseph & Feiss, 1966; subsequently taken over by Siegfried Boss and son-in-law Eugen Holly (1948–72) and in 1972 by grandsons Jochen Holly and Uwe Holly; introduced men's and children's lines, 1948; began export to Belgium and Netherlands, 1973; Scandinavia and England, 1975; formed Paris subsidiary and began exporting to U.S., 1977; added men's shirts, 1981; exported to Canada, 1982; introduced sportswear and cosmetics line, 1984; added Italy, Japan, and Spain to export countries, 1985–86; created U.S. subsidiary in New York, 1986; Portugal, Taiwan, and Korea, 1987–88; launched eyewear collection, 1989; firm acquired by Japanese investment group Leyton House, Ltd., 1989; womenswear collection debuted and discontinued, 1990–91; bought by Italian manufacturer Marzotto & Figli, SpA (which became Gruppo Industriale Marzotto), 1991; formed units in Milan and Japan, 1991; Hugo and Baldessarini lines for men introduced, 1994; opened new stores in Prague and Shanghai, 1994; major media blitz and image rehaul, 1995; opened shop inside Saks Fifth Avenue, New York, 1996; sold Joseph & Feiss, 1996; launched Hugo womenswear, 1998; second womenswear line, under Boss label, announced 1999; Boss

Hugo Boss AG, fall/winter 2001–02 collection. © AP/Wide World Photos.

womenswear debuted, 2000; fragrances include Boss Sport, Boss Spirit, Boss Elements, 1994; Hugo, 1995; and Hugo Woman, 1997.

Company Address: Dieselstrasse 12, 72555 Metzingen, Germany.

Company Website: www.hugoboss.com.

PUBLICATIONS

On HUGO BOSS:

Articles

Syedain, Hashi, "What Suits Boss," in Management Today (London), June 1989.

"Modest Boss," in DNR, 25 January 1991.

Deeny, Godfrey, "The World According to Boss," in DNR, 1 April 1991.

Protzman, Ferdinand, "Hugo Boss: A Fading Status Symbol," in the New York Times, 23 June 1991.

Deeny, Godfrey, "Redirecting the Empire: Hugo Boss Adjusts to the 'Values' of the 1990s," in DNR, 5 August 1993.

Levine, Joshua, "I Am the Boss," in Forbes, 25 October 1993.

Hugo Boss AG, fall/winter 2001 ready-to-wear collection. © AFP/CORBIS.

Laws, Malcolm, "Boss Cuts its Cloth to Suit the Modern Man," in the European, 22 December 1994.

"No Question Who's Boss," in DNR, 6 February 1995.

Gellers, Stan, "He's the Design Boss at Boss; Lothar Reiff is Busy Redesigning Boss Fashions and Image," in DNR, 13 March 1995.

Drier, Melissa, "Hugo to Start Chasing Generation X in October," in Women's Wear Daily, 26 May 1995.

Fisher, Andrew, "Hugo Boss Man Fashions Strategy for Expansion," in the Financial Times, 9 January 1996.

Palmieri, Jean E., "Brave New Boss Shop at Saks Flagship," in DNR, 15 August 1996.

"Hugo Boss USA Unveils Big Retail Expansion," in DNR, 26 September 1996.

Ozzard, Janet, "Men's Star Hugo Boss Planning Major Entry into Womenswear in 1998," in Women's Wear Daily, 7 April 1997.

Palmieri, Jean E., "Hugo Boss USA Building Retail Empire," in DNR, 1 August 1997.

Bow, Josephine, "In Huge China Market, Early Arrivals Zegna and Hugo Boss Make Gains," in DNR, 4 January 1999.

Weisman, Katherine, "Hugo Boss: Big Plans in Womenswear," in Women's Wear Daily, 31 March 1999.

* * *

A company originally producing workwear in the 1920s, Hugo Boss segued successfully into suits for aspiring executives. In the 1960s Uwe and Jochem Holz, grandchildren of the company's founder, saw a place in the market for a mid-range version of the kind of fashionable clothes they enjoyed wearing from Pierre Cardin. Since then the continuing success of the company and the incursion of similar middle-market concerns into the European clothing industry has resulted in top German designers and fashion groups like Jil Sander, Mondi and Hugo Boss becoming international brand names.

Using new technology and the strategy of subcontracting, together with high quality materials, stringent quality control, and the business acumen of the company directors, Hugo Boss became a household name; acknowledging the powers of advertising, particularly the use of product placement, the company created an indelible image in the power dressing of the 1980s. Early in the decade, Boss became associated with the hard metropolitan chic of the ubiquitous yuppie, through male characters sporting a variety of Boss garments on television's Miami Vice and L.A. Law series.

The popular conception of the Filofax-toting, mobile-phone wielding entrepreneur living in a warehouse apartment, surrounded by matte black accoutrements, was conflated by the young(ish) European man with Hugo Boss suits, although in reality if the yuppie existed in great numbers he was far more likely to frequent Paul Smith or Armani. Nevertheless the sharp Boss suit, styled by businessmen rather than tailors, became symbolic of materialism and power for large numbers of European men, as increasing sales figures throughout the 1980s proved.

The Boss look, based on a traditionally masculine 20th-century silhouette, revolved around variations on the wide-shouldered suit, usually double-breasted with front pleated trousers; the Euroman added his own styling by rolling up the sleeves of the jacket à la Don Johnson. In the 1990s the Boss logo began appearing at prestigious sporting events, not so much because the company was interested in producing a line of sportswear to rival those of the German firms Puma and Adidas, but because of the glamorous image and athletic machismo associated with Formula One racing and Davis Cup tennis. This was subsequently reflected in the marketing of Boss Sport—"fragrance and bodycare for the confident man leading an active lifestyle."

The company responded well to the 1990s; export success remained constant, although for a time the name Boss was seen in Germany as somewhat downmarket due to overexposure. Rather than concentrating on export and weathering the storm, Boss responded by quickly withdrawing deliveries from a number of German retailers who no longer fit its standards, prepared to accept a loss of revenue rather than downgrading—a strategy which appeared to work as the firm very successfully went public. As for the image which seemed to be so squarely rooted in the 1980s? The suits gained more rounded shoulders but the advertising and brandnaming gave more of a clue—Europeans were introduced to a Boss man with "a new attitude and vision," seemingly encapsulated in a new fragrance and marketing angle, Boss Spirit.

Part of the “Boss Spirit” had to do with new chief executive Dr. Peter Littman, who took the reins in 1993. A shrewd businessman, Littman initiated a reorganization of the firm and its image. The old logo was tossed in favor of three new ones, each representing one of the menswear lines: Boss, the high-end sophisticated collection; Hugo, with the younger, trendier male in mind; and Baldessarini, for more luxurious, handmade menswear. By 1996 several new in-store boutiques were opening in high-end department stores; the first and largest, measuring in at 1,000 square feet, was built inside Saks Fifth Avenue’s New York flagship store. Boss announced it would build 25 freestanding Boss stores along with another 50 in-store boutiques within the next five years. Handsome furnished stores opened in Los Angeles, Washington D.C., and Las Vegas in quick succession.

Surprisingly, Boss revisited womenswear in the late 1990s despite a dismal attempt back in 1990. The first collections, under the Hugo label for women aged 20 to 40, featured ready-to-wear and sportswear and followed on the heels of the latest fragrance launch, Hugo Woman, which had debuted in the U.S. in fall 1997. Another collection under the more exclusive Boss label was announced in 1999 along with the formation of a new subsidiary, Hugo Boss SpA, to deal solely with the Boss womenswear line, based in Milan. Additionally, the company had continued to expand its licensing program, with the Hugo Boss label on innerwear, loungewear, watches, footwear, and a major push into golf apparel.

While Hugo Boss had been an enduring and successful brand in Germany and Europe, the company’s push for dominance in the U.S. through numerous retail outlets and aggressive advertising was paying off by 1998 and 1999. The same was true for China, where the firm had five stores at a time when there was little competition from fashion’s leading menswear labels. Other than Ermenegildo Zegna, which had been in China since the early 1990s, and newcomer Giorgio Armani, few menswear producers had ventured to the country.

—Caroline Cox; updated by Nelly Rhodes

HULANICKI, Barbara

British designer

Born: Warsaw, Poland, 8 December 1936; raised in Palestine, immigrated to England in 1948. Education: Studied fashion and fashion illustration at Brighton College, 1954–56; winner in the Evening Standard Design Competition, beachwear division, 1955. Family: Married Stephen Fitz-Simon, 1961 (deceased); children: Witwold. Career: Illustrator for Helen Jardine Artists, London, circa 1956–59; freelance fashion illustrator, 1961–64; opened Biba’s Postal Boutique, 1963; established first Biba emporium, Abingdon Road, London, 1964; moved and expanded to Church Street, London, 1965; opened branch location in Brighton, 1966; launched mail order catalogue, 1968; moved Biba to High Street, Kensington, London, 1969; introduced line of Biba cosmetics, 1969; cosmetics distributed nationally through Dorothy Perkins shops, 1969; introduced line of footwear, 1969; majority stake in company sold to consortium of investors, 1969; Biba boutique established at Bergdorf Goodman, New York, 1970; purchased Derry and Toms Department Store for “Big Biba,” 1972; control of firm passed to British Land, 1972; Big Biba opened, 1973 (closed, 1975); firm declared bankruptcy, 1976; designed in Brazil, 1976–80; relocated to Miami Beach, Florida, 1987; designer of hotel and club interiors, videos, ready-to-wear children’s clothes, theatre costumes, from 1988. Exhibitions: Retrospective, Newarke Houses Museum, Leicester, England, 1993. Awards: Bath Museum of Costume Dress of the Year award, 1972; Miami Design Preservation League award, for her redesign of the Marlin Hotel, Miami, Florida. Address: 1300 Collins Avenue, Suite 205, Miami Beach, FL 33139, USA.

PUBLICATIONS

By HULANICKI:

Books

From A to Biba, London, 1983.

Disgrace, London, 1990.

Articles

“The Dedicated Modeller of Fashion,” in the Times (London), 15 August 1983.

“When Big Becomes Beautiful,” in the Times (London), 16 August 1983.

“The Shattering of a Dream,” in the Times (London), 17 August 1983.

On HULANICKI:

Books

Bernard, Barbara, Fashion in the Sixties, London, 1978.

Harris, Jennifer, Sarah Hyde, and Greg Smith, 1966 and All That: Design and the Consumer in Britain, 1960–1969, London, 1986.

Whiteley, Nigel, Pop Design: Modernism to Mod, London, 1987.

Loebenthal, Joel, Radical Rags: Fashions of the Sixties, New York, 1990.

Articles

“Twiggy in Bibaland,” in Vogue (London), December 1973.

“Biba: What Went Wrong?” in Drapers Record (London), 30 August 1975.

“Biba,” in the Times (London), 1 April 1976.

“Biba is Back: A ‘Paradise’ in London,” in Drapers Record (London), 2 December 1978.

“Bye-Bye Biba—Hello Hulanicki,” in Women’s Journal (London), March 1981.

Brampton, Sally, “Bringing Up Baby,” in the Observer (London), 4 September 1983.

Neustatter, Angela, “Biba and Son,” in the Sunday Times Magazine (London), 18 May 1986.

Samuel, Kathryn, “Biba Goes Back to the Drawing Board,” in the Daily Telegraph (London), 19 June 1986.

Neustatter, Angela, “Life No. 3 for the Biba Girl,” in the Daily Telegraph (London), 21 January 1987.

Cuccio, Angela, “Mini Rock Rolls,” in WWD, 10 October 1988.

Brampton, Sally, “Barbara Hulanicki and Disgrace,” in the Correspondent Magazine (London), 25 March 1990.

McRobbie, Angela, “Disgrace,” [book review] in the New Statesman and Society, 30 March 1990.

Fallon, James, “Barbara Hulanicki, Biba and Beyond,” in WWD, 14 May 1990.

Gandee, Charles, “Barbara Hulanicki is Hot for Miami,” in House & Garden, June 1992.

Part of the “Boss Spirit” had to do with new chief executive Dr. Peter Littman, who took the reins in 1993. A shrewd businessman, Littman initiated a reorganization of the firm and its image. The old logo was tossed in favor of three new ones, each representing one of the menswear lines: Boss, the high-end sophisticated collection; Hugo, with the younger, trendier male in mind; and Baldessarini, for more luxurious, handmade menswear. By 1996 several new in-store boutiques were opening in high-end department stores; the first and largest, measuring in at 1,000 square feet, was built inside Saks Fifth Avenue’s New York flagship store. Boss announced it would build 25 freestanding Boss stores along with another 50 in-store boutiques within the next five years. Handsome furnished stores opened in Los Angeles, Washington D.C., and Las Vegas in quick succession.

Surprisingly, Boss revisited womenswear in the late 1990s despite a dismal attempt back in 1990. The first collections, under the Hugo label for women aged 20 to 40, featured ready-to-wear and sportswear and followed on the heels of the latest fragrance launch, Hugo Woman, which had debuted in the U.S. in fall 1997. Another collection under the more exclusive Boss label was announced in 1999 along with the formation of a new subsidiary, Hugo Boss SpA, to deal solely with the Boss womenswear line, based in Milan. Additionally, the company had continued to expand its licensing program, with the Hugo Boss label on innerwear, loungewear, watches, footwear, and a major push into golf apparel.

While Hugo Boss had been an enduring and successful brand in Germany and Europe, the company’s push for dominance in the U.S. through numerous retail outlets and aggressive advertising was paying off by 1998 and 1999. The same was true for China, where the firm had five stores at a time when there was little competition from fashion’s leading menswear labels. Other than Ermenegildo Zegna, which had been in China since the early 1990s, and newcomer Giorgio Armani, few menswear producers had ventured to the country.

—Caroline Cox; updated by Nelly Rhodes

HULANICKI, Barbara

British designer

Born: Warsaw, Poland, 8 December 1936; raised in Palestine, immigrated to England in 1948. Education: Studied fashion and fashion illustration at Brighton College, 1954–56; winner in the Evening Standard Design Competition, beachwear division, 1955. Family: Married Stephen Fitz-Simon, 1961 (deceased); children: Witwold. Career: Illustrator for Helen Jardine Artists, London, circa 1956–59; freelance fashion illustrator, 1961–64; opened Biba’s Postal Boutique, 1963; established first Biba emporium, Abingdon Road, London, 1964; moved and expanded to Church Street, London, 1965; opened branch location in Brighton, 1966; launched mail order catalogue, 1968; moved Biba to High Street, Kensington, London, 1969; introduced line of Biba cosmetics, 1969; cosmetics distributed nationally through Dorothy Perkins shops, 1969; introduced line of footwear, 1969; majority stake in company sold to consortium of investors, 1969; Biba boutique established at Bergdorf Goodman, New York, 1970; purchased Derry and Toms Department Store for “Big Biba,” 1972; control of firm passed to British Land, 1972; Big Biba opened, 1973 (closed, 1975); firm declared bankruptcy, 1976; designed in Brazil, 1976–80; relocated to Miami Beach, Florida, 1987; designer of hotel and club interiors, videos, ready-to-wear children’s clothes, theatre costumes, from 1988. Exhibitions: Retrospective, Newarke Houses Museum, Leicester, England, 1993. Awards: Bath Museum of Costume Dress of the Year award, 1972; Miami Design Preservation League award, for her redesign of the Marlin Hotel, Miami, Florida. Address: 1300 Collins Avenue, Suite 205, Miami Beach, FL 33139, USA.

PUBLICATIONS

By HULANICKI:

Books

From A to Biba, London, 1983.

Disgrace, London, 1990.

Articles

“The Dedicated Modeller of Fashion,” in the Times (London), 15 August 1983.

“When Big Becomes Beautiful,” in the Times (London), 16 August 1983.

“The Shattering of a Dream,” in the Times (London), 17 August 1983.

On HULANICKI:

Books

Bernard, Barbara, Fashion in the Sixties, London, 1978.

Harris, Jennifer, Sarah Hyde, and Greg Smith, 1966 and All That: Design and the Consumer in Britain, 1960–1969, London, 1986.

Whiteley, Nigel, Pop Design: Modernism to Mod, London, 1987.

Loebenthal, Joel, Radical Rags: Fashions of the Sixties, New York, 1990.

Articles

“Twiggy in Bibaland,” in Vogue (London), December 1973.

“Biba: What Went Wrong?” in Drapers Record (London), 30 August 1975.

“Biba,” in the Times (London), 1 April 1976.

“Biba is Back: A ‘Paradise’ in London,” in Drapers Record (London), 2 December 1978.

“Bye-Bye Biba—Hello Hulanicki,” in Women’s Journal (London), March 1981.

Brampton, Sally, “Bringing Up Baby,” in the Observer (London), 4 September 1983.

Neustatter, Angela, “Biba and Son,” in the Sunday Times Magazine (London), 18 May 1986.

Samuel, Kathryn, “Biba Goes Back to the Drawing Board,” in the Daily Telegraph (London), 19 June 1986.

Neustatter, Angela, “Life No. 3 for the Biba Girl,” in the Daily Telegraph (London), 21 January 1987.

Cuccio, Angela, “Mini Rock Rolls,” in WWD, 10 October 1988.

Brampton, Sally, “Barbara Hulanicki and Disgrace,” in the Correspondent Magazine (London), 25 March 1990.

McRobbie, Angela, “Disgrace,” [book review] in the New Statesman and Society, 30 March 1990.

Fallon, James, “Barbara Hulanicki, Biba and Beyond,” in WWD, 14 May 1990.

Gandee, Charles, “Barbara Hulanicki is Hot for Miami,” in House & Garden, June 1992.

- Webb, Michael, "Island Fantasy," in Hospitality Design, July/August 1992.
- Wilson, Kennedy, "Gone But Not Forgotten: A Success Story of the Swinging Sixties," in the Herald (Glasgow), 5 January 1993.
- Tredre, Roger, "Heaven Was a Place Called Biba," in the Independent (London), 12 February 1993.
- Godley, Georgina, "The Importance of Biba," in Blueprint (London), No. 96, April 1993.
- Young, Lucie, "At Home with Barbara Hulanicki: Color So Bright You Need Shades," in the New York Times, 31 December 1998.

* * *

In the decade from 1964 to 1974, Barbara Hulanicki's design and entrepreneurial skills contributed to the development of an entirely new ethos in British fashion that responded to ideas generated by the rising youth culture of the period. Hulanicki and her husband, Stephen Fitz-Simon, created a series of fashion businesses, under the name of Biba, perfectly suited to the spirit of change and adventure characterizing the Mod movement originating in London during the early 1960s. Unlike the English establishment rag trade, Hulanicki understood that fashion ideas would, henceforth, originate in the streets of British cities, rather than in couture houses across the Channel. She styled her shop as a meeting spot and a place of entertainment for those interested in a lifestyle represented by the clothes and other goods designed by Hulanicki.

Following a year at art school, Hulanicki set up Biba's Postal Boutique in the early 1960s, with herself as designer and Fitz-Simon as business manager. The success of their business was ensured when an early design for a simple smock dress was worn by Cathy McGowan, "Queen of the Mods," on the popular television program Ready, Steady, Go. The first Biba shop was opened in 1964 in a small, old-fashioned chemist's shop on a corner of Abingdon Road, Kensington, London. Hulanicki concentrated on generating a unique atmosphere through décor, music, and the glamor of the young shop assistants—all of which turned her shop into an instant "scene," a gathering place for a hip, young clientèle who knew where to go for the latest ideas in clothing, without even the benefit of a sign over the shop-front.

Hulanicki's early clothes were short, simple dresses, the "Biba smock," which became the uniform for an era. Her little girl look was given a major boost when Julie Christie selected her wardrobe for the film Darling from the Biba shop. Other early customers included Sonny and Cher, Twiggy, and Mick Jagger. The typical Biba dolly girl would have a slim, boyish figure, huge eyes and a childlike pout, updating the Audrey Hepburn gamine look of the 1950s. She would wear a simple mini dress selected from a wide range of muted colors—blueberry, rust, plum—which Hulanicki called Auntie colors, as they had previously been associated with the wardrobes of old ladies. At this time, she also introduced the first fashion t-shirts, distinguished from their ordinary equivalent by the range of Auntie colors in which they were dyed. The t-shirts initiated the unisex appeal of Biba goods.

In 1966 the shop moved to larger premises in Kensington Church Street. The new boutique sported a black and gold art nouveau logo and was decorated in an eclectic mix of late 19th-century decadent motifs, Victoriana, and art deco. Hulanicki expanded her range of clothing to include fashion accessories, including bangles and feather boas displayed on old-fashioned bentwood hatstands, cosmetics, menswear, and household accessories. The Church Street Biba became an internationally known symbol of swinging London in the mid-1960s.

In the early 1970s, the Biba style developed in the direction of retro glamor and glitter. Hulanicki introduced a line of children's clothing that followed the styles and colors of the adult ranges. She featured items such as straw hats with veils and artificial flowers, velvet, and lace, all enhanced by a new element of innocent eroticism and unchildlike glamor. Her cosmetics had, by the late 1960s, become big business, the range of colors corresponding to the Auntie colors of her clothing and including bizarre hues such as blue, green, purple, and black lipstick, eye shadow and powder.

Rapidly increasing sales forced Biba to move again, in 1969, to a larger shop in Kensington High Street, where art nouveau and art deco fused into a single style that became Biba's own. During the early 1970s, Hulanicki and Fitz-Simon expanded their operations to the U.S. through New York's Bergdorf Goodman, which set up a Biba boutique in its flagship store. The final phase of expansion came in 1973, when Hulanicki opened the Biba department store in the former Derry and Toms premises in Kensington High Street, London. This enormous art deco building housed a huge enterprise that provided a complete setting, including an all-day restaurant and nightly entertainment in the glamorous Rainbow Room, exotic roof gardens, and a kasbah for the elegant and exotic retro style clothes, all designed by Hulanicki.

The Biba store was, for a short time, a mecca for fashionable young Londoners looking for a setting in which to parade the elegant and eclectic clothing of the period. Management difficulties forced Hulanicki to leave Biba in the mid-1970s. She eventually moved to Brazil and thence to Florida, where she began to design under the Hulanicki name. Her groundbreaking designs in the 1960s and 1970s were showcased in an exhibition entitled "Biba, the Label, the Lifestyle, the Look," which opened in 1993 at the Laing Gallery in Newcastle and later traveled to the Aberdeen Art Gallery.

In the 1990s, Hulanicki turned to interior design, using bold colors to revitalize hotels in Miami's South Beach and the Caribbean. She drew both praise and criticism for her wild combinations that splashed together dozens of hues in buildings, including the Pink Sands Hotel and Compass Point in the Bahamas and the Leslie in Miami. She won an award from the Miami Design Preservation League for her redesign of the Marlin Hotel. Later, the same group blasted her color choices for other projects. "Barbara was at the forefront of changing the local colors from pastel to bright," Michael D. Kinerk, chairman of the Miami Design Preservation League, told Lucie Young of the New York Times. "It is the position of the league that the Art Deco district's colors should now swing back to more historically appropriate ones."

Young quoted Miami photographer Steven Brooke as observing that "the colors [Hulanicki] uses might be legal but they are egregiously ugly." Hulanicki took the criticisms in stride, noting that similar critiques had been leveled at her early fashions, which in the end revolutionized fashion. "It's about energy," she told Young. "It has the same effect on babies and adults: it makes our minds tick."

I. MAGNIN

American department store chain

Founded: by Mary Ann Magnin in San Francisco, 1876. Company History: First branch opened in Santa Barbara, 1912; Los Angeles store opened, 1938, flagship San Francisco store opened, 1948; sold to Bullock's, 1943; to Federated Department Stores, 1964, which was acquired by Campeau Corporation (after an attempted merger with R.H. Macy Corporation); R.H. Macy Corporation purchases I. Magnin stores, 1988; Federated and R.H. Macy merge, announcing closure of I. Magnin chain, 1994; several stores bought by Saks Fifth Avenue and others, 1994–95; remaining Magnin stores renamed as other Federated retailers.

PUBLICATIONS

On I. MAGNIN:

Books

- Crawford, M.D.C., The Ways of Fashion, New York, 1948.
Riley, Robert, Fashion Makers, New York, 1968.
Birmingham, Nan Tillson, Store, New York, 1978.
Hendrickson, Robert, The Grand Emporiums, Briarcliff Manor, New York, 1979.
Dresner, Susan, Shopping on the Inside Track, Salt Lake City, Utah, 1988.
Frick, Devin Thomas, I. Magnin & Company: A California Legacy, Garden Grove, California, 2000.

Articles

- Stabiner, Karen, "Store Wars," in Savvy (New York), July 1988.
Ginsberg, Steve, "I. Magnin: Seeking Solutions in the 1990s," in WWD, 9 October 1990.
Adelson, Andrea, "Retail Dinosaur Tries to Put Off Extinction," in the New York Times, 10 April 1993.
Schmeltzer, John, "A Merger on 34th Street," in the Chicago Tribune, 15 July 1994.
Adelson, Andrea, "R.H. Macy Planning to Close I. Magnin Specialty Stores," in the New York Times, 19 November 1994.

* * *

Founded by Mary Ann Magnin in 1876, I. Magnin & Company has always stood for beautiful designs of a high quality. They were responsible for making women in San Francisco, California, among the best dressed in the world.

Mary Ann and Isaac Magnin were married in London, England, though both were originally from Holland. They moved to San Francisco in the 1870s, traveling by boat around Cape Horn. They had eight children. Mary Ann did not want her husband working on ceilings as a wood carver, because he might fall and be crippled, leaving her with a large family to support. As a result she used her skills as an accomplished seamstress to make baby clothes which Isaac sold, carrying the items in a pack on his back. Before long they were able to open the first I. Magnin in San Francisco, selling needles, thread, and notions.

The store expanded to include the fashions Mary Ann made, including trousseau, and exquisite lingerie which she made for the fashion-starved ladies of Nob Hill, San Francisco. She made night-gowns, chemises and drawers, bridal gowns, and baby clothes, ordering her lace and linen from Europe. Owing to transportation costs, these items were expensive. Nevertheless, the orders increased and she was able to hire helpers. Her four sons—John, Grover, Joseph, and Sam—were encouraged to learn about fabrics and, most importantly, quality.

Magnin's moved to a larger store, but the 1906 earthquake destroyed it. Mary Ann and Isaac operated their business from their own home until they could rebuild. San Francisco was a thriving community of people who had money to spend and was an excellent market for the luxury goods available at I. Magnin. Eventually one son, John, moved to New York where he opened a buying office. While on a visit there, Mary Ann was so impressed with a marble floor she saw at B. Altman's store that she had one put into her own store. Magnin's store was elegant and designed as a stage for their fashions. Marble, crystal, and gold leaf were used extensively throughout; just as Mary Ann emphasized the best quality in fashion, she also demanded the best for the setting.

I. Magnin showcased the work of the major designers of the times, Jeanne Lanvin, Hattie Carnegie, and Christian Dior, where they introduced their new designs to the West Coast and the United States. The customers were wealthy—the Magnin woman purchased the best of everything, and price was no consideration. Magnin's was noted for fine apparel and having fashion firsts sometimes a year before they reached other stores. Quality, as Mary Ann impressed on her sons at an early age, was always an important ingredient in the operation of I. Magnin.

In her book Store (New York, 1978) Nan Tillson Birmingham described I. Magnin's doorman who would greet the car as customers arrived to shop for their school clothes. Clothing was selected by a personal shopper who would have them hanging in the dressing rooms, waiting for the approval of the shoppers. Service to the customer was another aspect of the Magnin shopping experience.

Throughout the 1980s and 1990s, the ownership of I. Magnin changed hands many times. In 1988 when R.H. Macy Corporation bought the luxury chain, the future still seemed bright. By 1993 R.H. Macy was struggling and attempted to revitalize the I. Magnin stores, to no avail. The following year, overwhelmed by debt, Macy closed its first Magnin store, located on Chicago's famed Miracle Mile. Federated Department Stores then stepped in and proposed a merger with the stricken R.H. Macy; in the deal all remaining I. Magnin stores were slated for closure. Several individual stores were bought by Saks Fifth Avenue and other upscale retailers, and the once world renowned I. Magnin name ceased to exist.

—Nancy House; updated by Owen James

IRIÉ, Sueo

Japanese designer working in Paris

Born: Osaka, Japan, 23 December 1946. Education: Graduated from Osaka Sogo Fukoso Gakium, 1970. Career: Assistant to Hiroko Koshino, 1968; moved to Paris, 1970; assistant designer, Kenzo, 1970–79; presented first collection as designer for Studio V, 1980; set up own shop, 1983. Exhibitions: Technology and Design, Victoria & Albert Museum, London; Mode et Japonisme, Paris. Address: 8 rue du Pre-aux-Clercs, 75008 Paris, France.

PUBLICATIONS

On IRIÉ:

Books

The Tokyo Collection, Tokyo, 1986.

Articles

de L'Homme, F., "Irié Ou L'art de la Simplicity," in Dépèche Mode (Paris), March 1987.

Betts, K., "The Next Wave," in WWD, April 1990.

Carter, Charles, "Europe 1990: Designers to Watch," in Vogue, August 1990.

Risbourg, P., "View: European Designers to Watch," in Vogue, August 1990.

Hochswender, Woody, "Clothes of Irié: Stylish, But Not Stuffy," in The New York Times, September 1990.

Bailhache, P., "Créateurs: Leur monde secret," in Marie-Claire (Paris), October 1992.

Menkes, Suzy, "On Paris' Left Bank," in the International Herald Tribune, May 1993.

Coppet, A., "Irié, le Succès Merité," in Marie-Claire Bis (Paris), Autumn 1993.

Zamelly, C., "Irié à l'affiche de St Germain-des-Pres," in Elle (Paris), Autumn 1993.

Ronaldson, F., "Designer Inspiration Focus: Irié," in Joyce (Hong Kong), Autumn 1993.

"AngloFiles, No. 13," available online at www.iway.fr/AngloFiles, 22 May, 1996.

Godoy, Tiffany, "Tiffany's Paris Fashion Week Diary," in Composite (Tokyo), December 2000.

"Japan/U.S.—Branding Operation Between Ariel and Irié," in Usine Nouvelle, 25 January 2001.

"Paris Shopping: Designer Directions," available online at Timeout.com (www.timeout.com/paris), 23 June 2001.

*

I wish to continue creating, inspired by the air of the present.

—Sueo Irié

* * *

Sueo Irié is the name of a Japanese-born designer who first traveled to Europe in the 1970s. Over the last 30 years, he has built a life and career in fashion based in St. Germain des Prés, Paris. With his clothes available from boutiques across France and outlets in Munich and Milan, Irié is a craftsman-artist of contemporary fashion.

Arriving in Paris on the Trans-Siberian Express with little money and no firm plans, Irié worked for Japanese designer Kenzo before opening his own shop and launching his own collection in 1983. Irié claims the opening of his first outlet would never have happened except that on the spur of the moment, he bought a Corinthian column from a Paris flea market and decided he needed a boutique in which to house it. The company has remained small, with Irié overseeing everything himself: stock, manufacturing, sales, and customer satisfaction. And for three weeks every August, the store shuts down so the designer can enjoy a vacation.

The style of Irié's collections has been simplicity paired with casual chic. Irié likes to design for women, all women, across the spectrum of age and profession. He keeps his clothes simple and believes they form a base upon which women can build; his are the raw components of a wardrobe from which a woman can add personal touches as required. The clothes adapt to let the wearer's identity shine through. Irié's early innovations included the use of Lycra to increase comfort of short skirts. He also designed colorful leotards as underclothes long before they became an established and popular fashion.

Irié excludes no colors from his designs. He also makes extensive use of patterned fabrics, some of which he designs himself. Patterns range from romantic florals to wild fantasy, and here we find the one recurring theme of his collections: animal skin prints. The materials and fabrics he uses are dictated by his professed preference for comfort and convenience: natural cotton, wool, silk, synthetics, polyester, vinyl, and fake fur. He uses stretch fabrics everywhere. His later collections paired the usual jeans, suits, and dresses with unusual details like sequins, hologram prints, and plastic coatings.

Irié's essential idea is cheap chic. His ideal woman would wear a Chanel jacket with cheap trainers. He defines elegance as an expensive shirt worn with old jeans and Tiffany earrings to a black-tie dinner. He has said he is motivated to create clothes that allow a woman to share lunch with her banker in Paris 16e, then drink a café noisette with some friends on the Rive Gauche.

Irié's influences are all French: café lifestyles and black-and-white French films. There is nothing of the Far East in his clothes, no hint of Asian heritage; champagne or Coca Cola, Irié is Westernized through and through. His originality is his presentation. For a small design company, he has big designer pretensions. His Paris boutique, all chrome and mirrors, houses a stuffed zebra, a grand piano, and the enduring Corinthian column. Another stuffed lion is kept in his flat. Though he may head a small-scale company, he does not act like a small player. The clothes he sells are the best quality at affordable prices.

The Irié collection is really too small to influence a larger fashion world, apart from one essential way: his influence is his choice to live in a small flat, two minutes from his shop, to keep his business small,

its first Magnin store, located on Chicago's famed Miracle Mile. Federated Department Stores then stepped in and proposed a merger with the stricken R.H. Macy; in the deal all remaining I. Magnin stores were slated for closure. Several individual stores were bought by Saks Fifth Avenue and other upscale retailers, and the once world renowned I. Magnin name ceased to exist.

—Nancy House; updated by Owen James

IRIÉ, Sueo

Japanese designer working in Paris

Born: Osaka, Japan, 23 December 1946. Education: Graduated from Osaka Sogo Fukoso Gakium, 1970. Career: Assistant to Hiroko Koshino, 1968; moved to Paris, 1970; assistant designer, Kenzo, 1970–79; presented first collection as designer for Studio V, 1980; set up own shop, 1983. Exhibitions: Technology and Design, Victoria & Albert Museum, London; Mode et Japonisme, Paris. Address: 8 rue du Pre-aux-Clercs, 75008 Paris, France.

PUBLICATIONS

On IRIÉ:

Books

The Tokyo Collection, Tokyo, 1986.

Articles

de L'Homme, F., "Irié Ou L'art de la Simplicity," in Dépèche Mode (Paris), March 1987.

Betts, K., "The Next Wave," in WWD, April 1990.

Carter, Charles, "Europe 1990: Designers to Watch," in Vogue, August 1990.

Risbourg, P., "View: European Designers to Watch," in Vogue, August 1990.

Hochswender, Woody, "Clothes of Irié: Stylish, But Not Stuffy," in The New York Times, September 1990.

Bailhache, P., "Créateurs: Leur monde secret," in Marie-Claire (Paris), October 1992.

Menkes, Suzy, "On Paris' Left Bank," in the International Herald Tribune, May 1993.

Coppet, A., "Irié, le Succès Merité," in Marie-Claire Bis (Paris), Autumn 1993.

Zamelly, C., "Irié à l'affiche de St Germain-des-Pres," in Elle (Paris), Autumn 1993.

Ronaldson, F., "Designer Inspiration Focus: Irié," in Joyce (Hong Kong), Autumn 1993.

"AngloFiles, No. 13," available online at www.iway.fr/AngloFiles, 22 May, 1996.

Godoy, Tiffany, "Tiffany's Paris Fashion Week Diary," in Composite (Tokyo), December 2000.

"Japan/U.S.—Branding Operation Between Ariel and Irié," in Usine Nouvelle, 25 January 2001.

"Paris Shopping: Designer Directions," available online at Timeout.com (www.timeout.com/paris), 23 June 2001.

*

I wish to continue creating, inspired by the air of the present.

—Sueo Irié

* * *

Sueo Irié is the name of a Japanese-born designer who first traveled to Europe in the 1970s. Over the last 30 years, he has built a life and career in fashion based in St. Germain des Prés, Paris. With his clothes available from boutiques across France and outlets in Munich and Milan, Irié is a craftsman-artist of contemporary fashion.

Arriving in Paris on the Trans-Siberian Express with little money and no firm plans, Irié worked for Japanese designer Kenzo before opening his own shop and launching his own collection in 1983. Irié claims the opening of his first outlet would never have happened except that on the spur of the moment, he bought a Corinthian column from a Paris flea market and decided he needed a boutique in which to house it. The company has remained small, with Irié overseeing everything himself: stock, manufacturing, sales, and customer satisfaction. And for three weeks every August, the store shuts down so the designer can enjoy a vacation.

The style of Irié's collections has been simplicity paired with casual chic. Irié likes to design for women, all women, across the spectrum of age and profession. He keeps his clothes simple and believes they form a base upon which women can build; his are the raw components of a wardrobe from which a woman can add personal touches as required. The clothes adapt to let the wearer's identity shine through. Irié's early innovations included the use of Lycra to increase comfort of short skirts. He also designed colorful leotards as underclothes long before they became an established and popular fashion.

Irié excludes no colors from his designs. He also makes extensive use of patterned fabrics, some of which he designs himself. Patterns range from romantic florals to wild fantasy, and here we find the one recurring theme of his collections: animal skin prints. The materials and fabrics he uses are dictated by his professed preference for comfort and convenience: natural cotton, wool, silk, synthetics, polyester, vinyl, and fake fur. He uses stretch fabrics everywhere. His later collections paired the usual jeans, suits, and dresses with unusual details like sequins, hologram prints, and plastic coatings.

Irié's essential idea is cheap chic. His ideal woman would wear a Chanel jacket with cheap trainers. He defines elegance as an expensive shirt worn with old jeans and Tiffany earrings to a black-tie dinner. He has said he is motivated to create clothes that allow a woman to share lunch with her banker in Paris 16e, then drink a café noisette with some friends on the Rive Gauche.

Irié's influences are all French: café lifestyles and black-and-white French films. There is nothing of the Far East in his clothes, no hint of Asian heritage; champagne or Coca Cola, Irié is Westernized through and through. His originality is his presentation. For a small design company, he has big designer pretensions. His Paris boutique, all chrome and mirrors, houses a stuffed zebra, a grand piano, and the enduring Corinthian column. Another stuffed lion is kept in his flat. Though he may head a small-scale company, he does not act like a small player. The clothes he sells are the best quality at affordable prices.

The Irié collection is really too small to influence a larger fashion world, apart from one essential way: his influence is his choice to live in a small flat, two minutes from his shop, to keep his business small,

and to enjoy a full life in Paris. He has neither the great fame nor the associated wealth and power problems of the large designers. During the day, he creates fabrics, designs, and sells clothes to pay his bills and fuel his moped. At night, he loses himself in a Parisian nightlife that might be a concert by Vanessa Paradis or a long night of philosophical conversation over pastis.

—Sally Ann Melia; updated by Carrie Snyder

ISANI

Korean design team; currently restaurant owners

Founded: by Jun Kim and Soyon Kim. Jun Kim was born in Korea, 1966; went on to study marketing at Pace University in New York (B.A., 1988), and fashion design at Parsons School of Design. Soyon Kim was born in Korea, 1968; studied fashion design at Parsons School of Design (B.F.A., 1989). Both trained in their family's São Paulo, Brazil, clothing firm, Anderson, Ltd. Company History: First designer sportswear line shown, 1988–93; introduced Isani Studio bridge line; introduced Christina line, 1990; introduced Isani Shirts blouse collection, 1992; Isani designer collection closed, 1993; Temple restaurant launched, 2000.

PUBLICATIONS

On ISANI:

Articles

- “Great Expectations,” in WWD, 12 June 1991.
- White, Constance C. R., “Isani’s Busy Signals: A Hot Line,” in WWD, 4 September 1991.
- _____, “Isani: Facing Reality,” in WWD, 2 June 1993.
- Pettera, Angela, “Rearranging the Furniture, and Making Some Alterations,” Los Angeles Times, 7 December, 2000.
- Harper, Rebecca, “Fashion Plates,” available online at One: Design Matters, onemedia.com, 17 June 2001.

* * *

Cosmopolitan, discreet, stylish clothing created by Jun and Soy়on Kim for Isani emanated a worldly grace and a reserved, sensible approach to clothing rarely associated with young designers. But the

Kim pair (brother Jun and sister Soy়on) purposefully spared themselves the excesses more commonly seen in young designers to create clothes in the scrupulous heritage of Mainbocher and Halston as an American tailoring for a sophisticated client.

The design propensity of the Kims was modernist, but there was often a picturesque charm to the garments, whether in their Jackie O dresses in suave 1960s revival in 1991 or the fall-winter 1992 accommodations of menswear to the most delicate details and accentuated femininity of fit. Jun Kim averred, “Our clothes are directed at American women, but they’re not typical American sportswear. They reflect an approach to fashion that looks right anywhere in the world.” Isani represented the possibility of clothing in the 1990s to surpass a parochial sense of nationality and even global regionalism—to seek a style that would be right and reasonable in any major city of the world. The designers, who were born in Korea but grew up chiefly in Brazil, followed by higher education and the launch of their professional careers in New York, chose Isani as the firm’s name from the Italian for “healthy.”

There was a secure sense of anachronism about Isani. It eschewed the aggressiveness of much young design, and its bashful and absolute discretion was a predilection for exquisite refinement that were the hallmarks of fashion design before World War II. No such historicism actually existed in the work, but there was an ethos, a point of view distinctly and positively old-fashioned in its elegance and subtlety. Although Isani clothing was directed toward a middle-class consumer, the design recalls couture in its suppressed, cultivated aplomb.

Isani achieved a distinction in the marketplace even in its first collections, so refined was the sensibility and so subtle were the plays in the fabrication and proportions. But in early 1993, Isani decided to discontinue its designer collection and focus on lower-cost individual pieces. Later in the 1990s, the team chose to change careers, ending all Isani operations and opening a restaurant in Beverly Hills, California. The Kims have embarked on their new venture with much of the same fresh attitude they brought to the clothing industry. Called Temple, the restaurant showcases a modern Korean fare with hints of the Brazilian influence on the Kims’ upbringing.

The Kims proposed that the most important aspect of fashion design was for clothes to be real, with the prospective client able to associate with the designer’s vision. Their challenge then became to take this same vision and apply it to the culinary world, finding the subtle blend of tastes that will keep customers coming back for more.

—Richard Martin; updated by Carrie Snyder

and to enjoy a full life in Paris. He has neither the great fame nor the associated wealth and power problems of the large designers. During the day, he creates fabrics, designs, and sells clothes to pay his bills and fuel his moped. At night, he loses himself in a Parisian nightlife that might be a concert by Vanessa Paradis or a long night of philosophical conversation over pastis.

—Sally Ann Melia; updated by Carrie Snyder

ISANI

Korean design team; currently restaurant owners

Founded: by Jun Kim and Soyon Kim. Jun Kim was born in Korea, 1966; went on to study marketing at Pace University in New York (B.A., 1988), and fashion design at Parsons School of Design. Soyon Kim was born in Korea, 1968; studied fashion design at Parsons School of Design (B.F.A., 1989). Both trained in their family's São Paulo, Brazil, clothing firm, Anderson, Ltd. Company History: First designer sportswear line shown, 1988–93; introduced Isani Studio bridge line; introduced Christina line, 1990; introduced Isani Shirts blouse collection, 1992; Isani designer collection closed, 1993; Temple restaurant launched, 2000.

PUBLICATIONS

On ISANI:

Articles

- “Great Expectations,” in WWD, 12 June 1991.
- White, Constance C. R., “Isani’s Busy Signals: A Hot Line,” in WWD, 4 September 1991.
- _____, “Isani: Facing Reality,” in WWD, 2 June 1993.
- Pettera, Angela, “Rearranging the Furniture, and Making Some Alterations,” Los Angeles Times, 7 December, 2000.
- Harper, Rebecca, “Fashion Plates,” available online at One: Design Matters, onemedia.com, 17 June 2001.

* * *

Cosmopolitan, discreet, stylish clothing created by Jun and Soy়on Kim for Isani emanated a worldly grace and a reserved, sensible approach to clothing rarely associated with young designers. But the

Kim pair (brother Jun and sister Soy়on) purposefully spared themselves the excesses more commonly seen in young designers to create clothes in the scrupulous heritage of Mainbocher and Halston as an American tailoring for a sophisticated client.

The design propensity of the Kims was modernist, but there was often a picturesque charm to the garments, whether in their Jackie O dresses in suave 1960s revival in 1991 or the fall-winter 1992 accommodations of menswear to the most delicate details and accentuated femininity of fit. Jun Kim averred, “Our clothes are directed at American women, but they’re not typical American sportswear. They reflect an approach to fashion that looks right anywhere in the world.” Isani represented the possibility of clothing in the 1990s to surpass a parochial sense of nationality and even global regionalism—to seek a style that would be right and reasonable in any major city of the world. The designers, who were born in Korea but grew up chiefly in Brazil, followed by higher education and the launch of their professional careers in New York, chose Isani as the firm’s name from the Italian for “healthy.”

There was a secure sense of anachronism about Isani. It eschewed the aggressiveness of much young design, and its bashful and absolute discretion was a predilection for exquisite refinement that were the hallmarks of fashion design before World War II. No such historicism actually existed in the work, but there was an ethos, a point of view distinctly and positively old-fashioned in its elegance and subtlety. Although Isani clothing was directed toward a middle-class consumer, the design recalls couture in its suppressed, cultivated aplomb.

Isani achieved a distinction in the marketplace even in its first collections, so refined was the sensibility and so subtle were the plays in the fabrication and proportions. But in early 1993, Isani decided to discontinue its designer collection and focus on lower-cost individual pieces. Later in the 1990s, the team chose to change careers, ending all Isani operations and opening a restaurant in Beverly Hills, California. The Kims have embarked on their new venture with much of the same fresh attitude they brought to the clothing industry. Called Temple, the restaurant showcases a modern Korean fare with hints of the Brazilian influence on the Kims’ upbringing.

The Kims proposed that the most important aspect of fashion design was for clothes to be real, with the prospective client able to associate with the designer’s vision. Their challenge then became to take this same vision and apply it to the culinary world, finding the subtle blend of tastes that will keep customers coming back for more.

—Richard Martin; updated by Carrie Snyder

J

JACKSON, Betty

British designer

Born: Bacup, Lancashire, 24 June 1949. Education: Studied at Birmingham College of Art, 1968–71. Family: Married David Cohen, 1985; children: Pascale, Oliver. Career: Freelance fashion illustrator, London, 1971–73; design assistant to Wendy Dagworthy, London, 1973–75; chief designer, Quorum, London, 1975–81; director/chief designer, Betty Jackson Ltd., London, from 1981; introduced Betty Jackson, fall/winter 2001 collection: fur wrap over a leather top. © AP/Wide World Photos.

Betty Jackson for Men collection, 1986; opened flagship shop in the Brompton Road, London, 1991; began designing and selling accessories, including jewelry, gloves, belts, bags, and scarves. Awards: Woman Magazine Separates Designer of the Year award, London, 1981, 1983; Cotton Institute Cotton Designer of the Year award, 1983; Bath Museum of Costume Dress of the Year award, 1984; British Designer of the Year award, 1985; Harvey Nichols award, 1985; International Linen Council Fil d'Or award, 1985, 1989; Viyella award, 1987; Member of the British Empire, 1987; Honorary Fellow, Royal College of Art, London, 1989; Fellow, Birmingham Polytechnic, 1989; Honorary Fellow, University of Central Lancashire, 1992; Designer of the Year, 1999. Address: 311 Brompton Road, London, England.

PUBLICATIONS

On JACKSON:

Books

Stegemeyer, Anne, Who's Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.

Articles

Spankie, Sarah, "First Sight: The Chiller Thriller from the Jackson File," in the Sunday Times Magazine (London), 6 May 1984.

Dodd, C., "Betty Jackson: Seeing Through to the Street," in Design (London), November 1984.

"Influences: Betty Jackson," in Woman's Journal (London), April 1985.

Brampton, Sally, "The Elle-Shaped Room: A Fine Collection," in Elle (London), April 1986.

"Designer Reports, Summer '87: London, Betty Jackson," in International Textiles (London), December 1986.

Rumbold, Judy, "Jackson Heights," in The Guardian (London), 28 September 1987.

Fremantle, Liz, "Designer Focus: Betty Jackson," in Cosmopolitan (London), November 1988.

"Betty Jackson," in DR: The Fashion Business (London), 3 December 1988.

Klensch, Elsa, "Getting Comfortable with Betty Jackson," CNN.com, www.cnn.com, 30 October 1997.

"Jackson, Betty," in Chambers Biographical Dictionary 1997, available online at Wilson Web, www.hwwilson.com, 10 July 2001.

Davis, Boyd, "Tryst at the Rose Garden," online at Fashion Windows, www.fashionwindows.com, 18 July 2001.

Betty Jackson, spring/summer 2002 collection. © Reuters NewMedia Inc./CORBIS.

*

My work is understated and easy. I do not like formal dressing and I always try to achieve a relaxed and casual look. The mix of texture and pattern is very important and we work with many textile designers to have specialness and exclusivity on fabrics. Unexpected fabrics are often used in simple, classic shapes.

—Betty Jackson

* * *

"What makes you most depressed?" Betty Jackson was once asked by a fashion editor. Her reply was that it was only when work was going badly, and that in such situations, strength of character and conviction became important assets. It comes as no surprise, therefore, to find that she admires strong women, "bold and casual like Lauren Bacall." A stoic, no-nonsense fashion approach underpins a business that Jackson declares began in a recession, only to find itself in another one when the company celebrated its 10th anniversary in 1991. As she celebrates her 20th anniversary, Jackson has diversified into home furnishings, accessories, and knits. She continues to be an important name in the international fashion industry.

Jackson began her career at Birmingham College of Art in 1968, working in London as a freelance fashion illustrator until 1973, when she joined Wendy Dagworthy as her design assistant. She moved to further positions at Quorum, then Coopers, before setting up her own design company with husband David Cohen in 1981. Success was quick to come, culminating in several awards, including the Cotton Institute Designer of the Year in 1983 and the Fil d'or award from the International Linen Council in 1985, the year she was also named British Designer of the Year; two years later she was awarded the MBE in the Queen's Birthday Honours list for services to British industry and export as well as becoming an elected member of the British Fashion Council.

Betty Jackson has gained an international reputation as a designer of young, up-to-the-minute clothes. "I've never liked prettiness much," she has said, and this is reflected in her designs. She rescales separates into larger, unstructured proportions; loose, uncomplicated shapes with no awkward cuts are often made up in boldly colored and patterned fabrics. Jackson loves bright prints and knits, often working in conjunction with the textile designers Timney Fowler in colors complementing the warm, smoky, and earthy base colors of the collections. The oversized printed shirts and hand-knit sweaters are always popular and usually the first garments to sell out. Her previous print and knit themes were inspired by Sonia Delauney, oversized paisleys or abstract painterly shapes and textures reminiscent of Matisse or Braque.

The rescaled sporty shapes give the clothes an androgynous feeling reflected when the menswear collection was launched in 1986. However, Jackson never uses androgyny to shock or alienate her established customer or to make a fashion statement. Instead, her themes evolve each season, incorporating the newest shapes, lengths, and fabrics. She tends to favor expensive, supple fabrics like linen, suede, or viscose mixes, crêpes, chenilles, and soft jerseys.

Jackson has said she prefers not to follow trends set by other designers or predictions from fashion forecasters. She prefers to source her own ideas for inspiration, ideas that are relevant to her and her own design philosophies. "There's nothing like taking a color you love, making something wonderful, and seeing a beautiful girl wearing it. I think if you ever tire of that feeling, then it's time to think again," she says.

An important development at Betty Jackson Ltd. was the opening of a shop that she describes as her greatest extravagance. She was quick, however, to deny this extravagance implied recklessness, "and it's certainly not reckless as it is part of a well laid plan." She has also turned her talents to accessories: chunky jewelry in bright colors encased in bronze and silver, soft suede gloves, belts, bags, and printed scarves.

Elsa Klenesch on CNN in 1997 said that Jackson's spring-summer collection was "streamlined" and reminiscent of the 1940s' Bloomsbury period, with a mixture of fabrics, such as sheer with opaque or shiny with matte. "It's streamlined, I think, rather than tailored," Jackson told Klenesch. "My collection has nothing to do with revisiting the 1980s or anything like that. I really think modern women want that choice of softness or fluidity or versatility in clothes, and it has to do with how you put different fabrics together, and is much more simple, I think, than before." Klensch noted that Jackson's color palette included suggestions of herbs such as rosemary, coriander, and sage.

The British Fashion Council has called Jackson a "directional classicist." Her designs are not "tailored" but are easygoing, with great fluidity. Her spring and fall collections in 2001 were noteworthy for their emphasis on freedom of body movement. According to Boyd Davis, online editor for the Fashion Windows website, Jackson's fall show "presented a contemporary romantic show straight from Mills & Boon and Barbara Cartland." She emphasized soft colors of beige and green, with brighter colors as highlights. The fluidity of the garments was complemented by harder leather accessories. Outerwear included fur coats and stoles and Pashmina, and skirt lengths varied from just above the knee to below the knee.

Jackson declares the single thing that would most improve the quality of her life would be more time. "I organize myself badly and never have enough time to do anything." It is the dilemma of many creative people, forced to sacrifice precious creative time to the day-to-day practicalities of running a business. Lack of time, however, has not halted Jackson's achievements. Her business is thriving and she was made honorary fellow of both the Royal College of Art, London, and the University of Central Lancashire.

—Kevin Almond; updated by Sally A. Myers

JACOBS, Marc

American designer

Born: New York City, New York, 1964. Education: Graduated from Parsons School of Design, New York, 1984. Career: Designer, Sketchbook label, for Ruben Thomas Inc., New York, 1984–85; managed own firm, 1986–88; named vice president for womenswear, Perry Ellis, 1988; head designer, Perry Ellis, New York, 1989–93, Marc Jacobs, from 1994; Marc Jacobs Look, distributed by Mitsubishi and Renown Look, 1996; opened Marc Jacobs Boutique in SoHo, New York, 1997; artistic director, Louis Vuitton, from 1997; designed Stain Boy t-shirt to benefit Elizabeth Glaser Pediatric AIDS Foundation, 2000; introduced Marc, line of mid-priced sportswear, 2001. Awards: Parsons School of Design Perry Ellis Golden Thimble award, 1984; Council of Fashion Designers of America Perry Ellis award, 1988; Womenswear Designer of the Year award, 1992, 1998. Address: 163 Mercer Street, New York, NY 10012, USA. Website: www.marcjacobs.com.

PUBLICATIONS

On JACOBS:

Books

Stegemeyer, Anne, Who's Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.
 "Marc Jacobs," in Current Biography Yearbook, New York, 1998.

Marc Jacobs, fall 2001 collection. © AP/Wide World Photos.

Articles

- Badum, John, and Kurt Kilgus, "So Good They Named It Twice: A Second Bite at the Big Apple," in Fashion '86 (London), 1985.
- Boyes, Kathleen, "Marc Jacobs: Getting Focused, Staying Passionate," in WWD, 4 April 1988.
- Allis, Tim, "At 25, Whimsy-Loving Designer Marc Jacobs Has Been Up, Down, and Everywhere in Between," in People 2 May 1988.
- Young, Lucie, "Corporate Greed: A Fashionable Vice," in Design (London), August 1988.
- Lockwood, Lisa, "Jacobs is In, Pastor is Out at Perry Ellis," in WWD, 23 November 1988.
- DeCaro, Frank, "A Very-Perry New Boss," in Newsday, 6 December 1988.
- Edersheim, Peggy, "The Comeback Kid," in Manhattan, Inc., February 1989.
- Gooch, Brad, "Jacobs Makes His Mark," in Vanity Fair, April 1989.
- Wayne, George, "Verry Jacobs," in Paper, May 1989.
- Worthington, Christa, "The Three Choicest Dudes in the USA," in the Sunday Times Magazine (London), 26 August 1990.
- Martin, Richard, "Double Entendres: Art, Decorative Arts, and Fashion Discourse in Marc Jacobs for Perry Ellis, 1991," in Textile & Text (New York), 13/4, 1991.

1980s or anything like that. I really think modern women want that choice of softness or fluidity or versatility in clothes, and it has to do with how you put different fabrics together, and is much more simple, I think, than before." Klensch noted that Jackson's color palette included suggestions of herbs such as rosemary, coriander, and sage.

The British Fashion Council has called Jackson a "directional classicist." Her designs are not "tailored" but are easygoing, with great fluidity. Her spring and fall collections in 2001 were noteworthy for their emphasis on freedom of body movement. According to Boyd Davis, online editor for the Fashion Windows website, Jackson's fall show "presented a contemporary romantic show straight from Mills & Boon and Barbara Cartland." She emphasized soft colors of beige and green, with brighter colors as highlights. The fluidity of the garments was complemented by harder leather accessories. Outerwear included fur coats and stoles and Pashmina, and skirt lengths varied from just above the knee to below the knee.

Jackson declares the single thing that would most improve the quality of her life would be more time. "I organize myself badly and never have enough time to do anything." It is the dilemma of many creative people, forced to sacrifice precious creative time to the day-to-day practicalities of running a business. Lack of time, however, has not halted Jackson's achievements. Her business is thriving and she was made honorary fellow of both the Royal College of Art, London, and the University of Central Lancashire.

—Kevin Almond; updated by Sally A. Myers

JACOBS, Marc

American designer

Born: New York City, New York, 1964. Education: Graduated from Parsons School of Design, New York, 1984. Career: Designer, Sketchbook label, for Ruben Thomas Inc., New York, 1984–85; managed own firm, 1986–88; named vice president for womenswear, Perry Ellis, 1988; head designer, Perry Ellis, New York, 1989–93, Marc Jacobs, from 1994; Marc Jacobs Look, distributed by Mitsubishi and Renown Look, 1996; opened Marc Jacobs Boutique in SoHo, New York, 1997; artistic director, Louis Vuitton, from 1997; designed Stain Boy t-shirt to benefit Elizabeth Glaser Pediatric AIDS Foundation, 2000; introduced Marc, line of mid-priced sportswear, 2001. Awards: Parsons School of Design Perry Ellis Golden Thimble award, 1984; Council of Fashion Designers of America Perry Ellis award, 1988; Womenswear Designer of the Year award, 1992, 1998. Address: 163 Mercer Street, New York, NY 10012, USA. Website: www.marcjacobs.com.

PUBLICATIONS

On JACOBS:

Books

Stegemeyer, Anne, Who's Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.
 "Marc Jacobs," in Current Biography Yearbook, New York, 1998.

Marc Jacobs, fall 2001 collection. © AP/Wide World Photos.

Articles

- Badum, John, and Kurt Kilgus, "So Good They Named It Twice: A Second Bite at the Big Apple," in Fashion '86 (London), 1985.
- Boyes, Kathleen, "Marc Jacobs: Getting Focused, Staying Passionate," in WWD, 4 April 1988.
- Allis, Tim, "At 25, Whimsy-Loving Designer Marc Jacobs Has Been Up, Down, and Everywhere in Between," in People 2 May 1988.
- Young, Lucie, "Corporate Greed: A Fashionable Vice," in Design (London), August 1988.
- Lockwood, Lisa, "Jacobs is In, Pastor is Out at Perry Ellis," in WWD, 23 November 1988.
- DeCaro, Frank, "A Very-Perry New Boss," in Newsday, 6 December 1988.
- Edersheim, Peggy, "The Comeback Kid," in Manhattan, Inc., February 1989.
- Gooch, Brad, "Jacobs Makes His Mark," in Vanity Fair, April 1989.
- Wayne, George, "Verry Jacobs," in Paper, May 1989.
- Worthington, Christa, "The Three Choicest Dudes in the USA," in the Sunday Times Magazine (London), 26 August 1990.
- Martin, Richard, "Double Entendres: Art, Decorative Arts, and Fashion Discourse in Marc Jacobs for Perry Ellis, 1991," in Textile & Text (New York), 13/4, 1991.

Marc Jacobs, fall 2001 collection: peplum dress. © AP/Wide World Photos.

Postner, Caryl, "Jacobs Ladder: Climbing to the Top," in Footwear News (New York), 3 June 1991.
 Orlean, Susan, "Breaking Away," in Vogue, September 1992.
 Boehlert, Bart, "Twelve Minutes: Marc Jacobs," in QW (New York), 8 November 1992.
 James, Laurie, "On the Marc," in Harper's Bazaar January 1993.
 "Designer Dish," in WWWD, 29 March 1993.
 Norwich, William, "As Retail Shrinks, Jacobs Thinks," in the New York Observer, 24 January 1994.
 Berman, Phyllis, "Grunge is Out, Licensing is In," in Forbes, 23 May 1994.
 Foley, Bridget, "Hard Acts to Follow: Marc Jacobs," in WWWD, 24 October 1994.
 Spindler, Amy M., "Lots of Sugar, With Some Pinches of Spice," in the New York Times, 31 October 1994.
 "New York: Marc Jacobs," in WWWD, 31 October 1994.
 Menkes, Suzy, "Amid the Trashy Glamour, the Ladies Have Their Day," in the International Herald Tribune, 1 November 1994.
 Davis, Peter, "Men à la Mode," in Genre (Hollywood), March 1995.

- Spindler, Amy M., "Mod Look Returns, à la Jacobs," in the New York Times, 5 April 1995.
 "New York: Marc Jacobs," in WWWD, 5 April 1995.
 Spindler, Amy, "Jacobs and Tyler Seize the Moment," in the New York Times, 1 November 1995.
 White, Constance C.R., "New Designers Bestow a Fresh Elegance on Fur," in the New York Times, 28 May 1996.
 ———, "Young American Designers Make Inroads in Japan," in the New York Times, 31 December 1996.
 Spindler, Amy, "Vuitton and Jacobs Seen in Ready-to-Wear Deal," in the New York Times, 7 January 1997.
 Wayne, George, "Marc Jacobs," in Vogue, February 1997.
 Spindler, Amy, "Two Take the Money and Produce," in the New York Times, 9 April 1997.
 White, Constance C.R., "A Delicate Partnership," in the New York Times, 8 July 1997.
 Klensch, Elsa, "Jacobs Collection: Urban, Unpretentious," available online at CNN.com, 25 August 1997.
 White, Constance C.R., "New Wave of Designers Opening Stores in SoHo," in the New York Times, 2 September 1997.
 Heller, Zoe, "Jacobs' Ladder," in the New Yorker, 22 September 1997.
 White, Constance C.R., "Why Coy Can Sizzle Hotter than Brazen," in the New York Times, 5 November 1997.
 "Marc Jacobs," in Current Biography, February 1998.
 Barrett, Amy, "House of New Style," in the Wall Street Journal, 10 March 1998.
 White, Constance C.R., "Taking the Fad out of Fashion," in the New York Times, 4 November 1998.
 Luscombe, Belinda, "Spring/Summer Ready-to-Wear Marc Jacobs," in Time, 16 November 1998.
 Schiro, Anne-Marie, "Warmth and Wearability, but Where's the Surprise?" in the New York Times, 17 February 1999.
 Singer, Sally, "Paris Match," in Vogue, February 2000.
 Foxman, Ariel, "It's a Bird, It's a Stain," in In Style, 1 February 2000.
 Parr, Karen, "On the Marc: Fall Fashion Week's Peak," in In Style, 1 April 2000.
 "A New Look for Louis Vuitton," in Esquire, September 2000.
 Kirschbaum, Susan, "San Francisco Treat: Designer Jacobs Leaves His Mark on the City by the Bay," in In Style, 1 October 2000.
 Bellafante, Gina, "Repressed Anguish as a Virtue," in the New York Times, 13 October 2000.
 Deeny, Godfrey, "Louis Vuitton: Marc Jacobs Dresses the Neo-Romantic Gentleman," in Fashion Wire Daily, available online at fashionwindows.com, 26 January 2001.
 Limnander, Armand, "Marc Jacobs," available online at style.com, 12 February 2001.
 Deeny, Godfrey, "Marc Jacobs Fall 2001," in Fashion Wire Daily, available online at fashionwindows.com, 13 February 2001.
 Mui, Nelson, "Marc's Modern-Rock Schoolgirls," in Fashion Wire Daily, available online at fashionwindows.com, 13 February 2001.
 Bellafante, Gina, "At Marc Jacobs, Dressing for Life as a Perpetual Child," in the New York Times, 14 February 2001.
 Thomas, Dana, "Louis Vuitton's Return to Camelot," in Fashion Wire Daily, available online at fashionwindows.com, 12 March 2001.
 Robinovitz, Karen, "When 200 Women Are Happily Crammed into a Boutique," in the New York Times, 15 April 2001.
 Deeny, Godfrey, "Louis Vuitton Menswear by Marc Jacobs," in Fashion Wire Daily, available online at fashionwindows.com, 2 July 2001.

Lenander, Johanna, "Marc Jacobs," available online at fashionlive.com, 24 July 2001.

* * *

Marc Jacobs was from the start a fashion legend, a prodigy of mythical talent, tribulation, and triumph who attained unequivocal success and authority. The legend is indisputably true, but the clothing tells a similar and instructive story in which a special genius is realized—encyclopedic in its sources, poignantly romantic, remarkably sophisticated, and yet impudent and joyous. Through a succession of labels and collections, Jacobs has consistently demonstrated a strong personal sensibility and has altered the history of clothing forever.

Jacobs' first collection was hand-knit sweaters produced by Charivari, the New York clothing store where he worked as stock boy. Fatefully, those sweaters earned him the Perry Ellis Golden Thimble award at Parsons. Upon graduation in 1984, he designed Sketchbook for Ruben Thomas through the fall of 1985. There he created a memorable collection based on the film Amadeus. In 1986 he began designing his own label, first with backing from Jack Atkins and later from Onward Kashiyama.

In late 1988, Jacobs was named vice president for womenswear at Perry Ellis, succeeding Patricia Pastor, who had worked with and succeeded Ellis. Along the way, there were Homeric afflictions and distress, ranging from a major theft at the Ruben Thomas showroom to a fire that gutted his Kashiyama studio and destroyed his fall 1988 collection and fabrics two months before showings. The appointment at Perry Ellis was, of course, only another trial for the 25-year-old designer. As Peggy Edersheim wrote in Manhattan, Inc., "Instead of staying one step ahead of the bill collector, he now has to worry about keeping up with Calvin Klein," a prodigious challenge in leadership for one of the principal sportswear houses in America. Jacobs, however, made a great critical success of Perry Ellis, reinstilling the firm with the bountiful energy and excitement of its founder.

Significantly, Jacobs' works reflected the design skills of Ellis before him. Jacobs did not perpetuate Ellis, but expanded on fundamental traits. For example, Ellis' imaginative palette was hauntingly revived in Jacobs' work, including extraordinary colors of fall in ocher, pumpkin, plum, camel, and rust, renewing the vitality of the Ellis spectrum. In fall 1991, Jacobs showed a grape princess coat over a brown cardigan, and a tangerine car coat with a butterscotch sweater and trousers with complete coloristic self-confidence. Ellis' sensuous fabrics were transmuted into Jacobs' hallmark sophistication: cashmere, camel, wool and angora, and mohair were soft, sumptuous materials.

Jacobs returns again and again to a basic vocabulary of design, treating each new interpretation of stripes, American flag, tartan, or gingham with a renewing luxury. His tailoring is also refined, returning to such classics as a Norfolk jacket or the eight-button double-breasted camel wool flannel suit for fall 1990 that appeared on the front page of Women's Wear Daily.

Jacobs' special interests include homages to other designers he admires in addition to Ellis. His "hugs" sequined dress of 1985 remembered Schiaparelli, and his spring 1990 English sycamore sequined short sheath "for Perry Ellis" was a touching tribute of the workroom and showroom environment of Perry Ellis, with its silver accents on blond sycamore. Jacobs has long loved the 1960s and returned not only in the early sweaters with happy faces but also in his voluminous mohair balloon sweaters for fall 1989. Suzy Menkes, reviewing his first collection at Perry Ellis, noted, "Jacobs' own-label collections have also been all-American, but much less innocent—celebrations of Miami Beach kitsch, sendups of the 1960s hippies and wacky versions of patchwork and down-home gingham."

New York-bred and street-smart, Jacobs is nimbly, naturally witty with a sliver of cynicism blended into his clothing. A spring 1990 red-and-white tablecloth cotton shirt and jacket was accompanied by embroidered and beaded black ants; his early "Freudian slip" was a simple dress imprinted with the face of the Viennese master; fall 1991 showed sweaters with aphorisms borrowed from the tart embroideries of Elsie de Wolfe. Language, too, cropped up even in Jacobs' fall 1990 "fresh berries and cream" collection that included blueberry herringbone patterns on a cream field in wool jackets and the same design in short chiffon flirt skirts. His spring 1992 collection, focused on the Wild West and Southern California, was a smart synthesis of Hollywood glamor (including an Oscar® dress with the Academy Award® statue) and boot-stomping country-and-western cowgirls, a perfect combination of rodeo and Rodeo Drive.

For spring 1993 Jacobs introduced his now legendary "grunge" collection with flowered silk little-girl dresses paired with combat boots and $300 silk shirts printed to look like flannel. Though the sensational collection never made it into retail stores, it was highly regarded for its trendsetting individualism by the fashion press. But Perry Ellis executives discontinued their designer clothing lines shortly thereafter, trying to maintain their more tailored reputation rather than embracing Jacobs' more unconventional designs. This transition helped launch Marc Jacobs International, guided by long-time business partner Robert Duffy, and ultimately paved the way for Jacobs to take a position as artistic director for Louis Vuitton.

Prior to taking the prestigious post, however, Jacobs' designs gradually progressed from unconventional cool to urban couture. "His early work was characterized by a certain amount of high-concept whimsy but his designs in recent years have grown sleeker and subtler," wrote Zoe Heller of the New Yorker in 1997. Well-tailored striped pantsuits, knee-length skirts, and calf-length double-breasted satin coats were featured in his 1970s-inspired spring 1994 collection. A fitted wool jacket topped a silk floral dress, and jeweled cashmere cardigans framed taffeta slip dresses in his successful spring 1996 collection. Then in 1997, when 146-year-old luggage and handbag company Louis Vuitton decided to expand, luxury-goods conglomerate LVMH (which includes Christian Dior, Givenchy, Kenzo, Christian Lacroix, and Louis Vuitton) chose Jacobs as its artistic director. His mission was to design a full line of ready-to-wear fashions for the first time.

Jacobs' designs for Louis Vuitton began with secret LV logos hidden beneath buttons, hems, and soles of shoes. Then came Damier-print pony-skin slingbacks, patent leather-embossed Bernis bags in Crayola hues, and stiff raincoats and trenches splattered with tiny LVs. "Jacobs has taken the house's signature and gone native," wrote Sally Singer in Vogue (February 2000). For spring 2000, Jacobs offered simple pleated trousers in lightweight wool adorned with bead-lined pockets and "fabulous swirl prints in 1960s colors that transform a low-key office dress into a sexy diva frock," according to Singer.

His fall 2001 menswear collection for Louis Vuitton broke through trends once again when Jacobs snubbed the widespread military theme. Instead he dressed the "neo-romantic gentleman" in black leather pea coats with red trimmed buttonholes and bold stripy shirts worn under high-necked sweatshirts. His fall/winter 2001–2002 womenswear collection was “sheer perfection,” according to Dana Thomas of the Fashion Windows website, writing in August 2001. Reminiscent of Jacqueline Kennedy during her White House years, small fitted jackets had cropped sleeves and there were bell skirts, princess coats, and soft empire-waist dresses. Fabrics included cotton flannel, silk twill, denim, jersey, and sealskin. Striking details like mink-covered buttons and sexy leather lace-up boots finished off the collection.

For Jacobs’ own line, the fall 2001 season portrayed girlish innocence dressed in elegance and sophistication. The crowdpleasers were cashmere coats using oversized, childlike buttons, colorful trompe l’oeil lapels, yellow mohair and sequin coats, and edgy jersey dresses. And as if four lines of clothing weren’t enough, Jacobs debuted his Marc collection in 2001, creating a lineup for his creased front, hip-hugging jeans. For fall, the Marc line included heavily-buttoned military coats mixed with multiple tiered skirts, pink and yellow striped jeans, and graffiti sweatshirts.

“Talents like Mr. Jacobs have become exceptional,” wrote Amy Spindler of the New York Times. “He has become the most consistently strong, individualistic, real, live, kicking designer in New York.” The legend of fashion prodigy is probably inseparably attached to Jacobs; that he has performed prodigiously as a leading master of American style in an immediate and seamless transition is indeed a marvel.

—Richard Martin; updated by Jodi Essey-Stapleton

JACOBSON, Jacqueline and Elie

See DOROTHÉE BIS

JAEGER

British fashion house

Founded: in London in 1884 by Lewis Tomalin, based on the principles of Dr. Gustav Jaeger. Company History: Lewis Tomalin was the sole purveyor of Dr. Jaeger’s Sanitary Woollens, to the 1920s. Tomalin obtained the rights, patents, and Jaeger name; began manufacturing undergarments, 1884; added cardigans, dressing gowns, jumpers, shawls, and, by the early 1900s, coats, skirts, suits, etc. Jaeger London launched, 1993; began renovating New York flagship store, 1994–95; hired designer Jeanette Todd and introduced Sport line, 1996; announced plans for new London store, 1997; hired Bella Freud, 2001; other designers associated with the firm have included Jean Muir, Sheridan Barnett, and Alistair Blair. Company Address: 57 Broadwick Street, London W1, England.

PUBLICATIONS

On JAEGER:

Books

Wilson, E., and L. Taylor, Through the Looking Glass, London, 1989.

Articles

- “The Jaeger Story,” in American Fabrics & Fashion (New York), No. 100, Spring 1974.
- “Quiet, Classic Jaeger,” in the Sunday Times (London), 25 May 1980.
- Alexander, Hilary, “Mrs Roache (and Jaeger) Go to Court,” in the Daily Telegraph (London), 2 November 1991.
- “Suits Are Getting a Kinder Cut,” in the Eastern Daily Press (Norwich, Norfolk), 22 April 1992.
- “Jaeger Variation,” in the Watford Free Observer (Watford, Hertfordshire), 28 May 1992.
- Fallon, James, “Jaeger Rolls Out London, Drives for a Younger Crowd,” in WWD, 29 September 1994.
- Edelson, Sharon, “Jaeger Gives Contemporary Twist to Clothes, Madison Ave. Flagship,” in WWD, 18 July 1996.
- Manning, Clinton, “Top Fashion Chain Takes a Clobbering,” in the Mirror (London), 12 September 1996.
- Wheeler, Karen, “Jaeger’s Collection Puts a Spring in Your Step,” in the Financial Times, 8 February 1997.
- Rice, Ann, “Ease Into Fashion Elegance,” the Birmingham Post (England), 18 November 1998.
- Clapp, Susannah, “Meet the New Jaeger Meister: Bella Freud,” in the Observer, 30 July 2000.
- Findlay, Jane, “Check Out Jaeger’s Sexy Look,” in the Sunday Mail (Glasgow, Scotland), 8 April 2001.
- Watson, Linda, “Back to the Future,” in the Sunday Times, 29 July 2001.
- “Jaeger Tries to Throw Off Its Mrs. T Image,” in The Independent (London), 10 August 2001.
- Polan, Brenda, “How Jaeger Got Younger,” in the Daily Mail, 16 August 2001.

* * *

Jaeger is a British retail fashion company producing distinctive clothes for both men and women. Its origins lie in Germany over a century ago—a period when theories of rational dress abounded throughout Europe and the United States. In 1880 Dr. Gustav Jaeger of Stuttgart, a zoologist and physiologist, expounded his belief that only clothes made of animal fibers (principally wool) were conducive to one’s health.

Jaeger’s theories were translated into English by Lewis Tomalin and taken up by the Times, which devoted a leading article to Dr. Jaeger’s ideas on 4 October 1884, on the occasion of the London International Health Exhibition in South Kensington. Tomalin obtained Dr. Jaeger’s permission to use his name and opened a shop to sell the “Sanitary Woollen System” of clothing on Fore Street, in London, where two of the earliest and most famous customers were Oscar Wilde and George Bernard Shaw. The latter heartily endorsed the product and wore Jaeger clothing for much of his long life.

Jaeger clothes were remarkable not only for their material—extraordinarily fine machine-knit wool jersey, cashmere, alpaca, and vicuna (“the woollen stuffs which are microscopically tested for adulteration with vegetable fibre can be supplied by the yard,” ran an advertisement of 1884)—but also for their unrestrictive construction. This made both underwear and outerwear particularly suitable for traveling. “Day and night—prevents chill—a necessity to all who value health,” claimed an 1898 advertisement for “lovely and luxurious dressing gowns.”

womenswear collection was “sheer perfection,” according to Dana Thomas of the Fashion Windows website, writing in August 2001. Reminiscent of Jacqueline Kennedy during her White House years, small fitted jackets had cropped sleeves and there were bell skirts, princess coats, and soft empire-waist dresses. Fabrics included cotton flannel, silk twill, denim, jersey, and sealskin. Striking details like mink-covered buttons and sexy leather lace-up boots finished off the collection.

For Jacobs’ own line, the fall 2001 season portrayed girlish innocence dressed in elegance and sophistication. The crowdpleasers were cashmere coats using oversized, childlike buttons, colorful trompe l’oeil lapels, yellow mohair and sequin coats, and edgy jersey dresses. And as if four lines of clothing weren’t enough, Jacobs debuted his Marc collection in 2001, creating a lineup for his creased front, hip-hugging jeans. For fall, the Marc line included heavily-buttoned military coats mixed with multiple tiered skirts, pink and yellow striped jeans, and graffiti sweatshirts.

“Talents like Mr. Jacobs have become exceptional,” wrote Amy Spindler of the New York Times. “He has become the most consistently strong, individualistic, real, live, kicking designer in New York.” The legend of fashion prodigy is probably inseparably attached to Jacobs; that he has performed prodigiously as a leading master of American style in an immediate and seamless transition is indeed a marvel.

—Richard Martin; updated by Jodi Essey-Stapleton

JACOBSON, Jacqueline and Elie

See DOROTHÉE BIS

JAEGER

British fashion house

Founded: in London in 1884 by Lewis Tomalin, based on the principles of Dr. Gustav Jaeger. Company History: Lewis Tomalin was the sole purveyor of Dr. Jaeger’s Sanitary Woollens, to the 1920s. Tomalin obtained the rights, patents, and Jaeger name; began manufacturing undergarments, 1884; added cardigans, dressing gowns, jumpers, shawls, and, by the early 1900s, coats, skirts, suits, etc. Jaeger London launched, 1993; began renovating New York flagship store, 1994–95; hired designer Jeanette Todd and introduced Sport line, 1996; announced plans for new London store, 1997; hired Bella Freud, 2001; other designers associated with the firm have included Jean Muir, Sheridan Barnett, and Alistair Blair. Company Address: 57 Broadwick Street, London W1, England.

PUBLICATIONS

On JAEGER:

Books

Wilson, E., and L. Taylor, Through the Looking Glass, London, 1989.

Articles

- “The Jaeger Story,” in American Fabrics & Fashion (New York), No. 100, Spring 1974.
- “Quiet, Classic Jaeger,” in the Sunday Times (London), 25 May 1980.
- Alexander, Hilary, “Mrs Roache (and Jaeger) Go to Court,” in the Daily Telegraph (London), 2 November 1991.
- “Suits Are Getting a Kinder Cut,” in the Eastern Daily Press (Norwich, Norfolk), 22 April 1992.
- “Jaeger Variation,” in the Watford Free Observer (Watford, Hertfordshire), 28 May 1992.
- Fallon, James, “Jaeger Rolls Out London, Drives for a Younger Crowd,” in WWD, 29 September 1994.
- Edelson, Sharon, “Jaeger Gives Contemporary Twist to Clothes, Madison Ave. Flagship,” in WWD, 18 July 1996.
- Manning, Clinton, “Top Fashion Chain Takes a Clobbering,” in the Mirror (London), 12 September 1996.
- Wheeler, Karen, “Jaeger’s Collection Puts a Spring in Your Step,” in the Financial Times, 8 February 1997.
- Rice, Ann, “Ease Into Fashion Elegance,” the Birmingham Post (England), 18 November 1998.
- Clapp, Susannah, “Meet the New Jaeger Meister: Bella Freud,” in the Observer, 30 July 2000.
- Findlay, Jane, “Check Out Jaeger’s Sexy Look,” in the Sunday Mail (Glasgow, Scotland), 8 April 2001.
- Watson, Linda, “Back to the Future,” in the Sunday Times, 29 July 2001.
- “Jaeger Tries to Throw Off Its Mrs. T Image,” in The Independent (London), 10 August 2001.
- Polan, Brenda, “How Jaeger Got Younger,” in the Daily Mail, 16 August 2001.

* * *

Jaeger is a British retail fashion company producing distinctive clothes for both men and women. Its origins lie in Germany over a century ago—a period when theories of rational dress abounded throughout Europe and the United States. In 1880 Dr. Gustav Jaeger of Stuttgart, a zoologist and physiologist, expounded his belief that only clothes made of animal fibers (principally wool) were conducive to one’s health.

Jaeger’s theories were translated into English by Lewis Tomalin and taken up by the Times, which devoted a leading article to Dr. Jaeger’s ideas on 4 October 1884, on the occasion of the London International Health Exhibition in South Kensington. Tomalin obtained Dr. Jaeger’s permission to use his name and opened a shop to sell the “Sanitary Woollen System” of clothing on Fore Street, in London, where two of the earliest and most famous customers were Oscar Wilde and George Bernard Shaw. The latter heartily endorsed the product and wore Jaeger clothing for much of his long life.

Jaeger clothes were remarkable not only for their material—extraordinarily fine machine-knit wool jersey, cashmere, alpaca, and vicuna (“the woollen stuffs which are microscopically tested for adulteration with vegetable fibre can be supplied by the yard,” ran an advertisement of 1884)—but also for their unrestrictive construction. This made both underwear and outerwear particularly suitable for traveling. “Day and night—prevents chill—a necessity to all who value health,” claimed an 1898 advertisement for “lovely and luxurious dressing gowns.”

Famous British expeditions were fitted out in Jaeger, from Scott and Shackleton in the Arctic to Stanley on his search for Dr. Livingstone in Africa and later. Before World War I, Jaeger's functional, mobile approach gave the firm much of its impetus in what was to prove a rapidly expanding market from its new purpose-built shops, such as those in Regent Street, London, and Edinburgh, and its wholesale company supplying agents as far afield as Shanghai. By the 1930s, however, Jaeger had greatly extended its range from the early emphasis on "sanitary wear" as exemplified in turn-of-the-century exhortations to "Wear wool to South Africa—khaki drill spells chill." Under the founder's son, H.F. Tomalin, the emphasis turned from functionalism to fashionability, all a woman (or man) needed for work and leisure, from country tweeds, twinsets, and stylish coats to swimsuits and slacks.

Jaeger exported its goods to such diverse locales as Beirut and Buenos Aires, upholding Tomalin's now-dated dictum, "Wherever you go among white people you will find that Jaeger is known." Jaeger's continuing attention to the actual fabric of their clothes gave them an honored place in the British postwar export market, but the emphasis on durability continues to the present. The original ethos of health clothing, however, has long been superseded by one of cool, timeless elegance, albeit still in fine materials—an image aided by the high caliber of Jaeger design.

After some difficult years during the 1990s when sales slumped, Jaeger began revamping its image and designs. The company successfully blended its traditional look with updated takes: tweeds were replaced with cashmere, suede, leather, and newer, high-performance fabrics. The firm's intention was to draw in younger buyers without alienating established clients. Shops emphasized service, and employees were specifically trained to assist customers in incorporating new pieces with items they already owned. In 2001 Jaeger hired well-known and highly respected designer Bella Freud to add some pizzazz to the mix. In addition to Jaeger's traditional lines, Freud brought in miniskirts, bomber jackets, a little black dress, and a "Juliette Greco resistance coat" inspired by Jaeger's 1930s and 1940s designs. Regardless of these design changes, the company remains committed to quality fabrics and tailoring at reasonable prices.

Jaeger is one of the few fashion companies able to produce a complete package, from sourcing exclusive fabrics and producing original designs through to manufacturing extensive ranges of tailoring and knitwear. These ranges are sold throughout the world, as exporting the Jaeger product has always been a prime part of the business. Jaeger Ladieswear and Jaeger Man are as distinctive as the firm's witty "straw" logo; Jaeger designs in the 21st century reach markets undreamed of by Dr. Jaeger and his English translator.

—Doreen Ehrlich; updated by Carrie Snyder

JAMES, Charles

American designer

Born: Camberley, England, of Anglo-American parentage, 18 July 1906. Education: Self-taught in design. Family: Married Nancy Lee Gregory in 1954 (separated, 1961); children: Charles, Louise. Career: Moved to U.S., established as Charles Boucheron, milliner, Chicago, 1924–28; milliner and custom dressmaker, New York, 1928–29; custom dressmaker, using the name E. Haweis James, London and Paris, 1929–circa 1939; also sold designs to wholesale manufacturers in New York, 1930s; relocated to New York, 1939; established as Charles James, Inc., primarily for custom designs, from 1940; became permanent resident of the United States, 1942; designer, couture collection, Elizabeth Arden salon, New York, 1943–45; worked as independent designer, 1945–78; Charles James Services, Inc., licensing company established, 1949; Charles James Associates, limited partnership for manufacture of custom clothes, established, 1954, then merged with Charles James Services; Charles James Manufacturers Company established, 1955. Exhibitions: A Decade of Design, Brooklyn Museum, 1948; A Total Life Involvement (retrospective), Everson Museum, Syracuse, New York, 1975; The Genius of Charles James (retrospective), Brooklyn Museum and Art Institute of Chicago, 1982–83; Charles James, Architect of Fashion, Fashion Institute of Technology, New York, 1993. Awards: Coty American Fashion Critics award, 1950, 1954; Neiman Marcus award, Dallas, 1953; Woolens and Worsteds of America Industry award, 1962; John Simon Guggenheim fellowship, 1975; inducted to Fashion Walk of Fame, Seventh Avenue, New York, 2001. Died: 23 September 1978, in New York.

PUBLICATIONS

By JAMES:

Articles

"Portrait of a Genius by a Genius," in Nova (London), July 1974.

On JAMES:

Books

Morris, Bernadine, and Barbara Walz, The Fashion Makers, New York, 1978.

Coleman, Elizabeth A., The Genius of Charles James, New York, 1982.

Milbank, Caroline Rennolds, Couture: The Great Designers, New York, 1985.

New York and Hollywood Fashion: Costume Designs from the Brooklyn Museum Collection, New York, 1986.

Stegemeyer, Anne, Who's Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.

Articles

Bosworth, Patricia, "Who Killed High Fashion?" in Esquire (New York), May 1973.

"Charles James, the Majority of One," in American Fabrics and Fashions (New York), No. 98, 1973.

Cunningham, Bill, "Is the New Subculture Getting You Down?" in the New York Daily News, 3 February 1975.

Barr, Jeffrey, "Charles James, Master of Couture," in Fashion World Daily, August 1978.

Duka, John, "Ghost of Seventh Avenue," in New York, 16 October 1978.

Bryant, Gay, "Charles James, 1906–1978," in Harper's & Queen (London), September 1979.

Taki, "Arbiter of Chic," in Esquire (New York), May 1981.

Coleman, Elizabeth A., "Abstracting the 'Abstract Gown,'" in Dress (Earleville, Maryland), 1982.

Cocks, Jay, "Puttin' on the Ritz in Gotham (Metropolitan Museum of Art and the Brooklyn Museum, New York)," in Time, 10 January 1983.

Famous British expeditions were fitted out in Jaeger, from Scott and Shackleton in the Arctic to Stanley on his search for Dr. Livingstone in Africa and later. Before World War I, Jaeger's functional, mobile approach gave the firm much of its impetus in what was to prove a rapidly expanding market from its new purpose-built shops, such as those in Regent Street, London, and Edinburgh, and its wholesale company supplying agents as far afield as Shanghai. By the 1930s, however, Jaeger had greatly extended its range from the early emphasis on "sanitary wear" as exemplified in turn-of-the-century exhortations to "Wear wool to South Africa—khaki drill spells chill." Under the founder's son, H.F. Tomalin, the emphasis turned from functionalism to fashionability, all a woman (or man) needed for work and leisure, from country tweeds, twinsets, and stylish coats to swimsuits and slacks.

Jaeger exported its goods to such diverse locales as Beirut and Buenos Aires, upholding Tomalin's now-dated dictum, "Wherever you go among white people you will find that Jaeger is known." Jaeger's continuing attention to the actual fabric of their clothes gave them an honored place in the British postwar export market, but the emphasis on durability continues to the present. The original ethos of health clothing, however, has long been superseded by one of cool, timeless elegance, albeit still in fine materials—an image aided by the high caliber of Jaeger design.

After some difficult years during the 1990s when sales slumped, Jaeger began revamping its image and designs. The company successfully blended its traditional look with updated takes: tweeds were replaced with cashmere, suede, leather, and newer, high-performance fabrics. The firm's intention was to draw in younger buyers without alienating established clients. Shops emphasized service, and employees were specifically trained to assist customers in incorporating new pieces with items they already owned. In 2001 Jaeger hired well-known and highly respected designer Bella Freud to add some pizzazz to the mix. In addition to Jaeger's traditional lines, Freud brought in miniskirts, bomber jackets, a little black dress, and a "Juliette Greco resistance coat" inspired by Jaeger's 1930s and 1940s designs. Regardless of these design changes, the company remains committed to quality fabrics and tailoring at reasonable prices.

Jaeger is one of the few fashion companies able to produce a complete package, from sourcing exclusive fabrics and producing original designs through to manufacturing extensive ranges of tailoring and knitwear. These ranges are sold throughout the world, as exporting the Jaeger product has always been a prime part of the business. Jaeger Ladieswear and Jaeger Man are as distinctive as the firm's witty "straw" logo; Jaeger designs in the 21st century reach markets undreamed of by Dr. Jaeger and his English translator.

—Doreen Ehrlich; updated by Carrie Snyder

JAMES, Charles

American designer

Born: Camberley, England, of Anglo-American parentage, 18 July 1906. Education: Self-taught in design. Family: Married Nancy Lee Gregory in 1954 (separated, 1961); children: Charles, Louise. Career: Moved to U.S., established as Charles Boucheron, milliner, Chicago, 1924–28; milliner and custom dressmaker, New York, 1928–29; custom dressmaker, using the name E. Haweis James, London and Paris, 1929–circa 1939; also sold designs to wholesale manufacturers in New York, 1930s; relocated to New York, 1939; established as Charles James, Inc., primarily for custom designs, from 1940; became permanent resident of the United States, 1942; designer, couture collection, Elizabeth Arden salon, New York, 1943–45; worked as independent designer, 1945–78; Charles James Services, Inc., licensing company established, 1949; Charles James Associates, limited partnership for manufacture of custom clothes, established, 1954, then merged with Charles James Services; Charles James Manufacturers Company established, 1955. Exhibitions: A Decade of Design, Brooklyn Museum, 1948; A Total Life Involvement (retrospective), Everson Museum, Syracuse, New York, 1975; The Genius of Charles James (retrospective), Brooklyn Museum and Art Institute of Chicago, 1982–83; Charles James, Architect of Fashion, Fashion Institute of Technology, New York, 1993. Awards: Coty American Fashion Critics award, 1950, 1954; Neiman Marcus award, Dallas, 1953; Woolens and Worsteds of America Industry award, 1962; John Simon Guggenheim fellowship, 1975; inducted to Fashion Walk of Fame, Seventh Avenue, New York, 2001. Died: 23 September 1978, in New York.

PUBLICATIONS

By JAMES:

Articles

"Portrait of a Genius by a Genius," in Nova (London), July 1974.

On JAMES:

Books

Morris, Bernadine, and Barbara Walz, The Fashion Makers, New York, 1978.

Coleman, Elizabeth A., The Genius of Charles James, New York, 1982.

Milbank, Caroline Rennolds, Couture: The Great Designers, New York, 1985.

New York and Hollywood Fashion: Costume Designs from the Brooklyn Museum Collection, New York, 1986.

Stegemeyer, Anne, Who's Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.

Articles

Bosworth, Patricia, "Who Killed High Fashion?" in Esquire (New York), May 1973.

"Charles James, the Majority of One," in American Fabrics and Fashions (New York), No. 98, 1973.

Cunningham, Bill, "Is the New Subculture Getting You Down?" in the New York Daily News, 3 February 1975.

Barr, Jeffrey, "Charles James, Master of Couture," in Fashion World Daily, August 1978.

Duka, John, "Ghost of Seventh Avenue," in New York, 16 October 1978.

Bryant, Gay, "Charles James, 1906–1978," in Harper's & Queen (London), September 1979.

Taki, "Arbiter of Chic," in Esquire (New York), May 1981.

Coleman, Elizabeth A., "Abstracting the 'Abstract Gown,'" in Dress (Earleville, Maryland), 1982.

Cocks, Jay, "Puttin' on the Ritz in Gotham (Metropolitan Museum of Art and the Brooklyn Museum, New York)," in Time, 10 January 1983.

- Campbell, Lawrence, "Fashion Shapes by Charles James," in Art in America (New York), May 1983.
- Turner, Florence, "Remembering Charles," in Vogue (London), May 1983.
- Coleman, Elizabeth A., "Charles James at the Brooklyn Museum," in American Fabrics and Fashions (New York), No. 128, November 1983.
- Lawford, Valentine, "Encounters with Chanel, Mainbocher, Schiaparelli, Valentina, and Charles James," in Architectural Digest, September 1988.
- Tobias, Tobi, "A Man of the Cloth," in Dance Ink (New York), Winter 1994–95.
- Als, Hilton, "The Insider's Outsider (The Life and Career of Fashion Designer Charles James)," in the New Yorker, 21 September 1998.

* * *

"Charles James is not only the greatest American couturier, but the world's best and only dressmaker who has raised it from an applied art form to a pure art form." From anyone other than their author, and James' closest professional equal, Cristobal Balenciaga, these words would seem potentially pretentious and inflated. Instead they constitute a balanced and deserved evaluation.

Charles Wilson Brega James was of Anglo-American parentage and possessed an incredibly sharp mind. He could have excelled in any number of fields but a foray into millinery in Chicago of the 1920s led to a career devising intellectually refined and devastatingly beautiful women's garments. James' lifetime career was devoted not to producing quantities of either designs or products but rather to refining and evolving concepts. His clientèle in Britain, France, and the U.S. was dedicated: they put up with his unpredictability and his inflated costs. When they ordered a garment there was no guarantee of its delivery or its permanence in their wardrobe as the designer would freely play roulette with his clients' clothes.

Why did clients remain loyal? Why is the word "genius" applied so frequently in describing James? Because James saw the female form as an armature on which to fashion sculpture, not just cover with clothes. He did not just sketch or drape a model. He approached the craft of dressmaking with the science of an engineer, often studying the weight distribution of a garment. Like an artist he analyzed the interacting elements of proportion, line, color, and texture. Construction details were not merely important, they were an obsession. He spent a vast sum on perfecting a sleeve. He turned a four-leaf clover hat into the hemline of a ballgown which he then built up into the garment he designated as his thesis in dressmaking.

A cruciform became a circular skirt; an evening dress (with matching cape of antique ribbons) which made its debut in 1937 was still offered 20 years later, the finesse of the ribbon replaced by other yardgoods of silk, but the detailing to infinity remaining. James was such a perfectionist that clients never banked on wearing either a new or old James to a function. Even his well-known quilted jacket designed in 1937, and now in the London's Victoria and Albert Museum, bears witness to his challenge to perfect. One can follow his tortured, ghost-like tracts of stitching and restitching.

As brilliant as his design sense was James' subtle sensibility of color. Open a coat or jacket of subdued hues and be confronted with a lining of an unexpected range. Follow his curvilinear pattern configurations and note that inset sleeves and darts are not part of either his design or construction vocabulary. His lines are seductive and intellectually intriguing. Rarely did he employ patterned materials, relying rather on the most revealing, unforgiving plain goods. While he is perhaps best remembered for his spectacular eveningwear, his tailored daywear was equally original. It was with his coats that he attempted to enter what he perceived to be the more lucrative ready-to-wear market. This, however, didn't suit his temperament or methods of working.

James dressed many of America's best-dressed women of the generation. They patronized the couture salons of Paris and could easily have been dressed abroad. Instead they had the courage and determination to support a unique creator of fashion: Charles James.

—Elizabeth A. Coleman

JANSEN, Jan

Dutch footwear designer

Born: circa 1945. Family: Married to Tonny Jansen. Career: Worked originally under the Jeannot label; became known for his original and often extreme footwear designs, 1960s; eventually designed under his own label; opened first shop in Amsterdam, 1968; subsequent boutiques opened in Heusden and Antwerp; sold North American licensing for footwear to Meno Vos and Thoan Kho; opened first U.S. store near San Francisco, 2000.

PUBLICATIONS

On JANSEN:

Books

De Schoenen van Jan Jansen 1964–1974, [exhibition catalogue], Stedelijk Museum, Amsterdam, 1974.

McDowell, Colin, Shoes, Fashion and Fantasy, London, 1989.

Articles

Anniss, Elisa, "Going Dutch: Avant-Garde Footwear Artistry Blooms in the Netherlands, in Footwear News, 7 August 1995.

"Hide & Seek," in Footwear News, 10 May 1999.

Saeks, Diane Dorrans, "Go Dutch: The Netherlands Meets Northern California with Jan Jansen's First U.S. Footwear Boutique," in Footwear News, 4 December 2000.

* * *

Little known to the public but highly regarded by fellow professionals, Jan Jansen, the Dutch shoe designer, is one of the most inventive and original translators in his chosen field. Unlike designers who produce cosmetic updates of existing styles, Jansen conceives the item in a truly unique and conceptual way. An original and gifted man, his work inspires great admiration from those who recognize his quite individual style. His footwear is different, often extreme, unexpected with verve and daring. It can visually arrest you in a way the work of few other shoe designers can—and seems to push the boundaries of one's expectations of what a shoe should be.

Jansen worked originally under the Jeannot label, pouring out thousands of highly successful designs. His ability to translate his prototypes into commercially acceptable shoes is legendary. He kept many footwear retailers and factories on their feet through very tough

- Campbell, Lawrence, "Fashion Shapes by Charles James," in Art in America (New York), May 1983.
- Turner, Florence, "Remembering Charles," in Vogue (London), May 1983.
- Coleman, Elizabeth A., "Charles James at the Brooklyn Museum," in American Fabrics and Fashions (New York), No. 128, November 1983.
- Lawford, Valentine, "Encounters with Chanel, Mainbocher, Schiaparelli, Valentina, and Charles James," in Architectural Digest, September 1988.
- Tobias, Tobi, "A Man of the Cloth," in Dance Ink (New York), Winter 1994–95.
- Als, Hilton, "The Insider's Outsider (The Life and Career of Fashion Designer Charles James)," in the New Yorker, 21 September 1998.

* * *

"Charles James is not only the greatest American couturier, but the world's best and only dressmaker who has raised it from an applied art form to a pure art form." From anyone other than their author, and James' closest professional equal, Cristobal Balenciaga, these words would seem potentially pretentious and inflated. Instead they constitute a balanced and deserved evaluation.

Charles Wilson Brega James was of Anglo-American parentage and possessed an incredibly sharp mind. He could have excelled in any number of fields but a foray into millinery in Chicago of the 1920s led to a career devising intellectually refined and devastatingly beautiful women's garments. James' lifetime career was devoted not to producing quantities of either designs or products but rather to refining and evolving concepts. His clientèle in Britain, France, and the U.S. was dedicated: they put up with his unpredictability and his inflated costs. When they ordered a garment there was no guarantee of its delivery or its permanence in their wardrobe as the designer would freely play roulette with his clients' clothes.

Why did clients remain loyal? Why is the word "genius" applied so frequently in describing James? Because James saw the female form as an armature on which to fashion sculpture, not just cover with clothes. He did not just sketch or drape a model. He approached the craft of dressmaking with the science of an engineer, often studying the weight distribution of a garment. Like an artist he analyzed the interacting elements of proportion, line, color, and texture. Construction details were not merely important, they were an obsession. He spent a vast sum on perfecting a sleeve. He turned a four-leaf clover hat into the hemline of a ballgown which he then built up into the garment he designated as his thesis in dressmaking.

A cruciform became a circular skirt; an evening dress (with matching cape of antique ribbons) which made its debut in 1937 was still offered 20 years later, the finesse of the ribbon replaced by other yardgoods of silk, but the detailing to infinity remaining. James was such a perfectionist that clients never banked on wearing either a new or old James to a function. Even his well-known quilted jacket designed in 1937, and now in the London's Victoria and Albert Museum, bears witness to his challenge to perfect. One can follow his tortured, ghost-like tracts of stitching and restitching.

As brilliant as his design sense was James' subtle sensibility of color. Open a coat or jacket of subdued hues and be confronted with a lining of an unexpected range. Follow his curvilinear pattern configurations and note that inset sleeves and darts are not part of either his design or construction vocabulary. His lines are seductive and intellectually intriguing. Rarely did he employ patterned materials, relying rather on the most revealing, unforgiving plain goods. While he is perhaps best remembered for his spectacular eveningwear, his tailored daywear was equally original. It was with his coats that he attempted to enter what he perceived to be the more lucrative ready-to-wear market. This, however, didn't suit his temperament or methods of working.

James dressed many of America's best-dressed women of the generation. They patronized the couture salons of Paris and could easily have been dressed abroad. Instead they had the courage and determination to support a unique creator of fashion: Charles James.

—Elizabeth A. Coleman

JANSEN, Jan

Dutch footwear designer

Born: circa 1945. Family: Married to Tonny Jansen. Career: Worked originally under the Jeannot label; became known for his original and often extreme footwear designs, 1960s; eventually designed under his own label; opened first shop in Amsterdam, 1968; subsequent boutiques opened in Heusden and Antwerp; sold North American licensing for footwear to Meno Vos and Thoan Kho; opened first U.S. store near San Francisco, 2000.

PUBLICATIONS

On JANSEN:

Books

De Schoenen van Jan Jansen 1964–1974, [exhibition catalogue], Stedelijk Museum, Amsterdam, 1974.

McDowell, Colin, Shoes, Fashion and Fantasy, London, 1989.

Articles

Anniss, Elisa, "Going Dutch: Avant-Garde Footwear Artistry Blooms in the Netherlands, in Footwear News, 7 August 1995.

"Hide & Seek," in Footwear News, 10 May 1999.

Saeks, Diane Dorrans, "Go Dutch: The Netherlands Meets Northern California with Jan Jansen's First U.S. Footwear Boutique," in Footwear News, 4 December 2000.

* * *

Little known to the public but highly regarded by fellow professionals, Jan Jansen, the Dutch shoe designer, is one of the most inventive and original translators in his chosen field. Unlike designers who produce cosmetic updates of existing styles, Jansen conceives the item in a truly unique and conceptual way. An original and gifted man, his work inspires great admiration from those who recognize his quite individual style. His footwear is different, often extreme, unexpected with verve and daring. It can visually arrest you in a way the work of few other shoe designers can—and seems to push the boundaries of one's expectations of what a shoe should be.

Jansen worked originally under the Jeannot label, pouring out thousands of highly successful designs. His ability to translate his prototypes into commercially acceptable shoes is legendary. He kept many footwear retailers and factories on their feet through very tough economic times, despite the fact that his designs were widely copied and infiltrated lesser stores. He soon began, anonymously, to design for well-known companies like Charles Jourdan. When he finally decided to dedicate himself to his own line, his took his original wares to European trade fairs. When his footwear was eagerly anticipated by a growing number of devotees, the designer opened a tiny shop in Amsterdam in 1968. Two subsequent shops, in Heusden and Antwerp, followed.

Liberated in his thinking, and a true entertainer, Jansen's ideas are visually stunning at times, and quite beautiful. His great affection for suede, whether of the finest quality or rougher and more casual, and his dramatic use of color have ensured that brilliant red, peacock blue, saffron yellow, or even black would be an integral part of each season's handwriting. No matter how extreme, the shoes are always wearable, but only by a courageous client. Jansen's creations are seldom understated in shape, and he has used unusual textures and modern materials (plexiglass, bamboo, cork, etc.) to augment his designs. His skills cover a wide range of disciplines; he still handcrafts his lasts and is able to translate his many inventive styles for quantity production to satisfy the mass market. Jansen easily stands alongside the familiar and respected names in the trade.

By the 1990s the Dutch had moved into the realm of fashion influence with a number of fashion forward designers. Jansen, Dries van Noten, and the design team of Viktor & Rolf brought mounting recognition to the Netherlands for their original fashion interpretations. As Elisa Anniss, writing for Footwear News (7 August 1995) explained, "In-the-know buyers were discovering that Holland offered some interesting looks, such as the sculptural designs by eclectic Dutch designer Jan Jansen, and an abundance of shoes that manage to fuse comfort features and athletic details with an edgy fashion sensibility."

In the 21st century, Jansen brought his one-of-kind creations to America, opening his fourth boutique (and first in the U.S.) in Mill Valley, California. Near San Francisco, the eponymously named store was made possible by a Dutch couple, Meno Vos and Thoan Kho, who also acquired the licensing rights to manufacture and distribute Jansen's footwear in North America. Vos is a longtime Jansen fan, having fell in love with the designer's shoes back in the early 1980s. The new Mill Valley store was a dream come true for Jansen, as well as Vos and Kho.

"Jan Jansen is a rare person in the shoe business," Vos told Footwear News (4 December 2000), "He works like an artist, designs every piece in his line, and doesn't follow fashions or care what other shoe design companies are producing. His shoe collections have a sense of humor and a carefree sense of style. And Jansen is one of the few true designers with enough diversity and creativity to fill a whole shop." For his part, Jansen simply says, "I want to make feet feel at home," something he has been doing with fantastically original style for well over three decades.

—Angela Pattison and Owen James

JANTZEN, INC.

American knitwear company

Founded: in Portland, Oregon, as the Portland Knitting Company by John A. Zentbauer, C. Ray Zentbauer, and Carl C. Jantzen, 1910; renamed Jantzen Knitting Mills, 1916, and Jantzen, Inc., beginning in 1949. Company History: Introduced first rib stitch swimsuit, 1913; North American sales extended to Mexico and Canada, beginning 1920; company went public, 1921; introduced diving girl logo, 1923; added knitwear and foundation lines, 1938; established separate men's and women's divisions, mid-1960s; company became a wholly owned subsidiary of Blue Bell, Inc., Greensboro, N.C., 1979–86, then a division of VF Corporation, 1986; opened first retail store, Portland, 1992; began designing and manufacturing Nike brand swimwear, 1995; added SwimFit Website to assist women in finding desired swimsuit styles, 1997; discontinued sportswear collection, 1999. Awards: Six Woolknit awards for men's sweater design, 1965–80. Company Address: P.O. Box 3001, Portland, OR 97208–3001. Company Website: www.jantzen.com.

PUBLICATIONS

On JANTZEN:

Books

Wallace, Don, Shaping America's Products, New York, 1956.

Wallis, Dorothy, The Jantzen Story, New York, 1959.

Cleary, David P., Great American Brands, New York, 1981.

Morgan, Hal, Symbols of America, New York, 1986.

Lencek, Lena, and Gideon Bosker, Making Waves: Swimsuits and the Undressing of America, San Francisco, 1989.

Martin, Richard, and Harold Koda, Splash! A History of Swimwear, New York, 1990.

Jantzen: A Brief History, Portland, Oregon, 1992.

Articles

Magiera, Marcy, "Swimwear Makers Aim for 'Older' Women," in Advertising Age, 21 April 1986.

Bloomfield, Judy, "Jantzen Turning the Tide," in WWD, 19 September 1990.

Smith, Matthew, "Jantzen Slimming Down to Fit Into New Corporate Suit," in Business Journal, 23 September 1991.

Parola, Robert, "Keep the Environment in Fashion," in DNR, 20 April 1992.

Van Dang, Kim, "Vintage Power," in WWD, 10 February 1992.

Hartlein, Robert, "On the Comeback Trail," in WWD (swimwear supplement), July 1992.

Walsh, Peter, "Jantzen Aims for Bigger Chunk of Sweater Biz," in DNR, 16 March 1993.

Halvorsen, Donna, "Jantzen Puts Swimsuit Fittings on the Internet," in the Star Tribune (Minneapolis, Minnesota), 12 March 1997.

"Seattle Gear and Jantzen Announce Cuts in Work Force," in the Seattle Post-Intelligencer, 18 February 1998.

Manning, Jeff, "Portland, Oregon-Based Sportswear-Maker Jantzen to Cut 140 jobs," in Knight-Ridder/Tribune Business News, 13 June 1999.

* * *

Eight decades ago, the struggling Portland Knitting Company developed "the suit that changed bathing to swimming." Due to a burgeoning fitness craze, their new knit swimwear found a ready audience. The renamed Jantzen Company quickly became an international name and gained a commanding position in the leisurewear industry by expanding its markets and manufacturing sites overseas.

economic times, despite the fact that his designs were widely copied and infiltrated lesser stores. He soon began, anonymously, to design for well-known companies like Charles Jourdan. When he finally decided to dedicate himself to his own line, his took his original wares to European trade fairs. When his footwear was eagerly anticipated by a growing number of devotees, the designer opened a tiny shop in Amsterdam in 1968. Two subsequent shops, in Heusden and Antwerp, followed.

Liberated in his thinking, and a true entertainer, Jansen's ideas are visually stunning at times, and quite beautiful. His great affection for suede, whether of the finest quality or rougher and more casual, and his dramatic use of color have ensured that brilliant red, peacock blue, saffron yellow, or even black would be an integral part of each season's handwriting. No matter how extreme, the shoes are always wearable, but only by a courageous client. Jansen's creations are seldom understated in shape, and he has used unusual textures and modern materials (plexiglass, bamboo, cork, etc.) to augment his designs. His skills cover a wide range of disciplines; he still handcrafts his lasts and is able to translate his many inventive styles for quantity production to satisfy the mass market. Jansen easily stands alongside the familiar and respected names in the trade.

By the 1990s the Dutch had moved into the realm of fashion influence with a number of fashion forward designers. Jansen, Dries van Noten, and the design team of Viktor & Rolf brought mounting recognition to the Netherlands for their original fashion interpretations. As Elisa Anniss, writing for Footwear News (7 August 1995) explained, "In-the-know buyers were discovering that Holland offered some interesting looks, such as the sculptural designs by eclectic Dutch designer Jan Jansen, and an abundance of shoes that manage to fuse comfort features and athletic details with an edgy fashion sensibility."

In the 21st century, Jansen brought his one-of-kind creations to America, opening his fourth boutique (and first in the U.S.) in Mill Valley, California. Near San Francisco, the eponymously named store was made possible by a Dutch couple, Meno Vos and Thoan Kho, who also acquired the licensing rights to manufacture and distribute Jansen's footwear in North America. Vos is a longtime Jansen fan, having fell in love with the designer's shoes back in the early 1980s. The new Mill Valley store was a dream come true for Jansen, as well as Vos and Kho.

"Jan Jansen is a rare person in the shoe business," Vos told Footwear News (4 December 2000), "He works like an artist, designs every piece in his line, and doesn't follow fashions or care what other shoe design companies are producing. His shoe collections have a sense of humor and a carefree sense of style. And Jansen is one of the few true designers with enough diversity and creativity to fill a whole shop." For his part, Jansen simply says, "I want to make feet feel at home," something he has been doing with fantastically original style for well over three decades.

—Angela Pattison and Owen James

JANTZEN, INC.

American knitwear company

Founded: in Portland, Oregon, as the Portland Knitting Company by John A. Zentbauer, C. Ray Zentbauer, and Carl C. Jantzen, 1910; renamed Jantzen Knitting Mills, 1916, and Jantzen, Inc., beginning in 1949. Company History: Introduced first rib stitch swimsuit, 1913; North American sales extended to Mexico and Canada, beginning 1920; company went public, 1921; introduced diving girl logo, 1923; added knitwear and foundation lines, 1938; established separate men's and women's divisions, mid-1960s; company became a wholly owned subsidiary of Blue Bell, Inc., Greensboro, N.C., 1979–86, then a division of VF Corporation, 1986; opened first retail store, Portland, 1992; began designing and manufacturing Nike brand swimwear, 1995; added SwimFit Website to assist women in finding desired swimsuit styles, 1997; discontinued sportswear collection, 1999. Awards: Six Woolknit awards for men's sweater design, 1965–80. Company Address: P.O. Box 3001, Portland, OR 97208–3001. Company Website: www.jantzen.com.

PUBLICATIONS

On JANTZEN:

Books

Wallace, Don, Shaping America's Products, New York, 1956.

Wallis, Dorothy, The Jantzen Story, New York, 1959.

Cleary, David P., Great American Brands, New York, 1981.

Morgan, Hal, Symbols of America, New York, 1986.

Lencek, Lena, and Gideon Bosker, Making Waves: Swimsuits and the Undressing of America, San Francisco, 1989.

Martin, Richard, and Harold Koda, Splash! A History of Swimwear, New York, 1990.

Jantzen: A Brief History, Portland, Oregon, 1992.

Articles

Magiera, Marcy, "Swimwear Makers Aim for 'Older' Women," in Advertising Age, 21 April 1986.

Bloomfield, Judy, "Jantzen Turning the Tide," in WWD, 19 September 1990.

Smith, Matthew, "Jantzen Slimming Down to Fit Into New Corporate Suit," in Business Journal, 23 September 1991.

Parola, Robert, "Keep the Environment in Fashion," in DNR, 20 April 1992.

Van Dang, Kim, "Vintage Power," in WWD, 10 February 1992.

Hartlein, Robert, "On the Comeback Trail," in WWD (swimwear supplement), July 1992.

Walsh, Peter, "Jantzen Aims for Bigger Chunk of Sweater Biz," in DNR, 16 March 1993.

Halvorsen, Donna, "Jantzen Puts Swimsuit Fittings on the Internet," in the Star Tribune (Minneapolis, Minnesota), 12 March 1997.

"Seattle Gear and Jantzen Announce Cuts in Work Force," in the Seattle Post-Intelligencer, 18 February 1998.

Manning, Jeff, "Portland, Oregon-Based Sportswear-Maker Jantzen to Cut 140 jobs," in Knight-Ridder/Tribune Business News, 13 June 1999.

* * *

Eight decades ago, the struggling Portland Knitting Company developed "the suit that changed bathing to swimming." Due to a burgeoning fitness craze, their new knit swimwear found a ready audience. The renamed Jantzen Company quickly became an international name and gained a commanding position in the leisurewear industry by expanding its markets and manufacturing sites overseas.

Jantzen's success story and long-term fashion influence spring from its innovative merchandising and promotional programs as well as its appealing apparel. The firm led the way in creative, comprehensive marketing campaigns aimed at the mainstream market. The initial springboard product was a one-piece wool bathing suit in an elasticized rib stitch, made on knitting equipment used to make sweater cuffs. Like the improvised suit Australian swimming celebrity Annette Kellerman wore in 1907, the Jantzen suit eliminated the encumbering yardage of the standard bathing costume of the late Edwardian era. Men and women who wanted to swim, not just dunk and splash, embraced it.

Jantzen's subsequent designs combined fashion and function; new cutting and patented assembly methods achieved a better fit for ease of swimming movement and figure enhancement. The basic style—the so-called California style—of long shorts attached to a sleeveless clinging skirted top came in vibrant colors with accent stripes for all members of the family. Jantzen soon offered new styles, colors, and novelty knits. The company fostered swimming (and swimsuit sales) with its "Learn to Swim" campaigns.

Jantzen's clinging and increasingly abbreviated swimwear at first outraged local moral authorities and helped crumble recreational dress restrictions. This coincided with the evolving corsetless streetwear of the 1920s. Jantzen's swimwear lines tended toward the sporty, athletic look while adapting to technological and sociological changes. An advertising campaign with catchy phrases heralded each new style.

The eight-ounce "Molded-Fit" swimming suits knitted from "Miracle Yarn" elastic were akin to "nude bathing." Famed illustrator George Petty's 1940 "Pretty Girl" suit was made in "new superb-fitting Sea-Ripple with live all-way elasticity." Lastex fabric of rubber-cored thread made possible suits "with the figure control qualities of a foundation garment." French designer Fernald Lafitte designed textured knits "with a Paris flavor."

In the annals of fashion, Jantzen's Red Diving Girl symbol is notable as one of America's first pin-up girls and first memorable apparel logo. She leapt from the cover of a 1920 catalogue to make a sensational splash on groundbreaking billboard advertisements and as a sometimes-banned decal on millions of car windshields. Jantzen hired artists like Alberto Varga to update her figure periodically. The Red Diving Girl graced all advertising and countless advertising giveaways and gadgets. She was embroidered or sewn on Jantzen swimsuits for over 60 years.

Like the other major West Coast sportswear companies, Catalina and Cole of California, Jantzen created advertising featuring Hollywood celebrities. Collaborative promotions with First National and Warner Brothers included Loretta Young as Miss Jantzen in 1931. In 1947 independent campaigns used a teenage "Mr. Jantzen," actor James Garner, to model swim trunks, and a young Marilyn Monroe modeled the "Double-Dare" two-piece suit with peek-a-boo cutouts on the hips.

Jantzen often emphasized color coordination in their ads and in-store merchandising. For a smart fashion-conscious beach look, in 1928 customers turned to authority Hazel Adler's "Jantzen Color Harmony Guide." In the 1950s, Jantzen went in with Revlon for a "Love that Red" campaign and based a swimwear collection on a bright red line of lipstick and nail polish. Jantzen expanded its lines to include bras and foundation garments as well as a wide range of men's and women's leisurewear in interchangeable parts of coordinating and contrasting colors and fabrics. The "Darlings from Jantzen," traveling fashion consultants, prepared personalized color charts to encourage customers to buy flattering color-coded Jantzen wardrobes.

At times, Jantzen provided suits and sponsorship of both the Miss America and Miss Universe beauty pageants. Two modified suits gained mystique as lucky "supersuits," because whoever wore them won the swimsuit competition and often the Miss America crown or runner-up status. Jantzen's pioneering merchandising programs as well as fashion innovations put it into the forefront of influential American apparel manufacturers. Through its overseas operations it exported American West Coast- and Hollywood-inspired fashions to a worldwide audience. The Red Diving Girl logo, involvement in major beauty pageants, and Learn to Swim and recent Clean Water Campaign programs significantly contributed to American recreational and popular culture. The company was also quick to harness the power of the Internet—by the spring of 1997, it had created the SwimFit Website to allow women to experiment with swimwear styles before ever setting foot in a store to reduce frustration when purchasing a suit.

Today, Jantzen is the leading brand of swimwear in over 100 countries, although a tough business climate forced the company to lay off workers, move some production operations to Latin America and the Caribbean, and discontinue its sportswear lines. In the 21st century Jantzen focused on expanding its swimwear business, in part by designing and manufacturing swimsuits for major fashion labels like Nike.

—Debra Regan Cleveland; updated by Carrie Snyder

JAVITS, Eric

American milliner

Born: New York, 24 May 1956. Education: Choate School, 1970–74; graduated from Rhode Island School of Design, 1978. Career: Cofounder, Whittall and Javits, Inc., 1978, creating women's hats and later separates and t-shirts; sold out to partner, 1985; founded Eric Javits, Inc., specializing in women's hats and occasionally hair accessories, 1985; licenses included Maximilian Furs, 1991–93, and Kato International, Japan; also designed hats for films, including Bonfire of the Vanities, for television shows, including Dynasty and Dallas, for many advertising campaigns, and runway collections of other designers, including Carolina Herrera, Caroline Roehm, Mary McFadden, Pauline Trigère, Adolfo, Louis Féraud, and Donna Karan. Exhibitions: Mad Hatters, Women's Guild of the New Orleans Opera Association, 1989; Current Trends in Millinery, Fashion Institute of Technology, New York, 1990; The Art of Millinery—20th Century Hat Design, Philadelphia Museum of Art, 1993. Collections: Metropolitan Museum of Art Costume Institute, Fashion Institute of Technology, New York. Awards: "Millie" award, Hat Designer of the Year, 1991, 1992; Martin Birnbaum award for Excellence in Drawing and Painting; National Spanish Examination award, three years in a row at Choate. Member: Millinery Institute of America and Council of Fashion Designers of America. Address: 433 Fifth Avenue, Suite 200, New York, NY 10016, USA. Email: ejavitsinc@aol.com.

Jantzen's success story and long-term fashion influence spring from its innovative merchandising and promotional programs as well as its appealing apparel. The firm led the way in creative, comprehensive marketing campaigns aimed at the mainstream market. The initial springboard product was a one-piece wool bathing suit in an elasticized rib stitch, made on knitting equipment used to make sweater cuffs. Like the improvised suit Australian swimming celebrity Annette Kellerman wore in 1907, the Jantzen suit eliminated the encumbering yardage of the standard bathing costume of the late Edwardian era. Men and women who wanted to swim, not just dunk and splash, embraced it.

Jantzen's subsequent designs combined fashion and function; new cutting and patented assembly methods achieved a better fit for ease of swimming movement and figure enhancement. The basic style—the so-called California style—of long shorts attached to a sleeveless clinging skirted top came in vibrant colors with accent stripes for all members of the family. Jantzen soon offered new styles, colors, and novelty knits. The company fostered swimming (and swimsuit sales) with its "Learn to Swim" campaigns.

Jantzen's clinging and increasingly abbreviated swimwear at first outraged local moral authorities and helped crumble recreational dress restrictions. This coincided with the evolving corsetless streetwear of the 1920s. Jantzen's swimwear lines tended toward the sporty, athletic look while adapting to technological and sociological changes. An advertising campaign with catchy phrases heralded each new style.

The eight-ounce "Molded-Fit" swimming suits knitted from "Miracle Yarn" elastic were akin to "nude bathing." Famed illustrator George Petty's 1940 "Pretty Girl" suit was made in "new superb-fitting Sea-Ripple with live all-way elasticity." Lastex fabric of rubber-cored thread made possible suits "with the figure control qualities of a foundation garment." French designer Fernald Lafitte designed textured knits "with a Paris flavor."

In the annals of fashion, Jantzen's Red Diving Girl symbol is notable as one of America's first pin-up girls and first memorable apparel logo. She leapt from the cover of a 1920 catalogue to make a sensational splash on groundbreaking billboard advertisements and as a sometimes-banned decal on millions of car windshields. Jantzen hired artists like Alberto Varga to update her figure periodically. The Red Diving Girl graced all advertising and countless advertising giveaways and gadgets. She was embroidered or sewn on Jantzen swimsuits for over 60 years.

Like the other major West Coast sportswear companies, Catalina and Cole of California, Jantzen created advertising featuring Hollywood celebrities. Collaborative promotions with First National and Warner Brothers included Loretta Young as Miss Jantzen in 1931. In 1947 independent campaigns used a teenage "Mr. Jantzen," actor James Garner, to model swim trunks, and a young Marilyn Monroe modeled the "Double-Dare" two-piece suit with peek-a-boo cutouts on the hips.

Jantzen often emphasized color coordination in their ads and in-store merchandising. For a smart fashion-conscious beach look, in 1928 customers turned to authority Hazel Adler's "Jantzen Color Harmony Guide." In the 1950s, Jantzen went in with Revlon for a "Love that Red" campaign and based a swimwear collection on a bright red line of lipstick and nail polish. Jantzen expanded its lines to include bras and foundation garments as well as a wide range of men's and women's leisurewear in interchangeable parts of coordinating and contrasting colors and fabrics. The "Darlings from Jantzen," traveling fashion consultants, prepared personalized color charts to encourage customers to buy flattering color-coded Jantzen wardrobes.

At times, Jantzen provided suits and sponsorship of both the Miss America and Miss Universe beauty pageants. Two modified suits gained mystique as lucky "supersuits," because whoever wore them won the swimsuit competition and often the Miss America crown or runner-up status. Jantzen's pioneering merchandising programs as well as fashion innovations put it into the forefront of influential American apparel manufacturers. Through its overseas operations it exported American West Coast- and Hollywood-inspired fashions to a worldwide audience. The Red Diving Girl logo, involvement in major beauty pageants, and Learn to Swim and recent Clean Water Campaign programs significantly contributed to American recreational and popular culture. The company was also quick to harness the power of the Internet—by the spring of 1997, it had created the SwimFit Website to allow women to experiment with swimwear styles before ever setting foot in a store to reduce frustration when purchasing a suit.

Today, Jantzen is the leading brand of swimwear in over 100 countries, although a tough business climate forced the company to lay off workers, move some production operations to Latin America and the Caribbean, and discontinue its sportswear lines. In the 21st century Jantzen focused on expanding its swimwear business, in part by designing and manufacturing swimsuits for major fashion labels like Nike.

—Debra Regan Cleveland; updated by Carrie Snyder

JAVITS, Eric

American milliner

Born: New York, 24 May 1956. Education: Choate School, 1970–74; graduated from Rhode Island School of Design, 1978. Career: Cofounder, Whittall and Javits, Inc., 1978, creating women's hats and later separates and t-shirts; sold out to partner, 1985; founded Eric Javits, Inc., specializing in women's hats and occasionally hair accessories, 1985; licenses included Maximilian Furs, 1991–93, and Kato International, Japan; also designed hats for films, including Bonfire of the Vanities, for television shows, including Dynasty and Dallas, for many advertising campaigns, and runway collections of other designers, including Carolina Herrera, Caroline Roehm, Mary McFadden, Pauline Trigère, Adolfo, Louis Féraud, and Donna Karan. Exhibitions: Mad Hatters, Women's Guild of the New Orleans Opera Association, 1989; Current Trends in Millinery, Fashion Institute of Technology, New York, 1990; The Art of Millinery—20th Century Hat Design, Philadelphia Museum of Art, 1993. Collections: Metropolitan Museum of Art Costume Institute, Fashion Institute of Technology, New York. Awards: "Millie" award, Hat Designer of the Year, 1991, 1992; Martin Birnbaum award for Excellence in Drawing and Painting; National Spanish Examination award, three years in a row at Choate. Member: Millinery Institute of America and Council of Fashion Designers of America. Address: 433 Fifth Avenue, Suite 200, New York, NY 10016, USA. Email: ejavitsinc@aol.com.

Design by Eric Javits. © Haig/Artlightning Productions NYC.

PUBLICATIONS

On JAVITS:

Articles

- Berman, Phyllis, "Wearable Art," in Forbes, 19 October 1987.
 Howard, Tammi, "Eric Javits: Changing the Shape of Millinery," in WWD, 18 March 1988.
 Hochswender, Woody, "Designers Find Fashionable Ways of Talking through Their Hats," in the New York Times, 14 June 1988.
 Stevenson, Peter M., "Crown Prince," in Manhattan, Inc. (New York), August 1989.
 Newman, Jill, "The Many Hats of Eric Javits," WWD, 2 March 1990.
 Sherman, Jean, "Top Hatter," New York Magazine, 16 September 1991.
 "Hats are Back," in the Kansas City Star, 4 April 1993.
 Kramer, Carol, "The Drape of the Locks," in the New York Times, 4 July 1993.
 Carter, Reon, "The Proper Topper," in the Cincinnati Enquirer, 10 March 1997.
 Barrett, Janet, "Eric Javits ('74) Designing Hats That Women Love," in Choate Rosemary Hall Bulletin, Winter/Spring 1999.

- Wright, Jason Ashley, "Hat Designer Eric Javits to Visit Friday," in Tulsa World, 15 April 1999.
 Homan, Becky, "Style with Squish: Eric Javits Makes Hats to Flatter and to Fold," in the St. Louis Post-Dispatch, 16 October 1999.
 Robins, Cynthia, "Sun Screens," in the San Francisco Chronicle, 6 May 2001.
 "Eric Javits, Inc.," available online at the Key West Madhatter, www.kw-madhatter.com, 9 June 2001.

*

My design work is only one aspect of involvement with owning my own hat company, and it remains the only part where I am not relying on the team's abilities but on my own.

Whenever an inspiration hits me, I make a note of the idea by sketching a small diagram. This provides a springboard from which many things can later develop. Using this method, I can have the concepts for an entire collection outlined within a few days. Sometime later in the process, when the designs are actually being fabricated, I will consider them from a production and marketing viewpoint. Those issues are quite complex given the varied needs of today's woman, and the ever-changing nature of the fashion business.

Many of my ideas are the result of an evolution, synthesizing and reworking bits and pieces of my most effective ideas and occasionally going off to test a completely new direction which, if successful, could eventually become part of the line's core. When a design arrives successfully, most of my developmental energy is not evident. What remains, seemingly, is an object which has its own logic and which appears to have been plucked effortlessly from our collective subconscious.

—Eric Javits

* * *

Style-consciousness began in Eric Javits' family in the 1920s, during which his grandmother, artist Lily Javits, made hats for the Shubert Organization and counted actress Mae West among her fans. Of his fascination with his grandmother's paintings, he commented, "I was the only grandchild who was permitted in her studio, because she knew I wouldn't touch anything. Then she saw how interested I was and bought me my own paints. That was when I was about five years old." A versatile, involved student, he directed the literary magazine, managed the campus radio station, sang with the chorus, and played soccer, squash, and tennis.

By September 1991, the skill of Eric Javits was touted in New York Magazine, as "quite simply, tops." In an era in which the hat is a style anachronism and a definite statement of individuality, if not idiosyncrasy and exhibitionism, Javits has created hats of distinct and discreet identity, both the designer's and that of the potential wearer.

Upon graduation as a painter and sculptor from the Rhode Island School of Design in 1978, Javits began his millinery career as a sculptural improvisation. Javits has created a wide range of hats: United Airlines flight attendant caps, private-label millinery for many American department stores and specialty chains, Louis Féraud hats, his own label, and its diffusion line, Lily J., named for his grandmother. But even though he is dubbed "crown prince" by Peter Stevenson in Manhattan, Inc. in August 1989, Javits is not making hats for grandmothers. He is almost Spartan in millinery adornment and has concentrated on hats that are not agglomerations and concoctions, but are modest one-statement sculptures for the head. Javits' restraint is his focus on one important statement in each hat, seldom adding secondary elements.

Design by Eric Javits. © Haig/Artlightning Productions NYC.

Often the interest is, in fact, in the shape and he has searched the past for a wondrous array of traditional shapes to frame the face. Yet, even as shape is of critical importance to Javits, one millinery myth has he, or the archetypal hat designer, whipping a perfect hat out of his pocket—as Javits is said to have done for Carolina Herrera. The legerdemain of the hat in his pocket notwithstanding, Javits plays with a softening of shape so that even his military inspirations and his menswear derivations work as softer versions of the source, though never collapsing into Oldenburg flaccidity.

Defending his decision to enter millinery, as he did somewhat serendipitously, Javits describes the early hat-making as a relief from painting and sculpture. "Hatmaking was playful, there was no pressure. A weight was taken off, and it snowballed into something more serious." His play is quite serious, though, a Bauhausian caprice rather than Carmen Miranda theatrics. While some of Javits' hats are for a day at the races, his most important contributions are hats that can serve for day and cocktail hours. He makes one of the most convincing arguments for the possible return of millinery to daily attire in dealing with classic shapes, such as a velour beret or the most refined form of the basic derby. His red tophat with poinsettia photographed on the cover of Town & Country, (New York, December 1990) is Dickensian tradition manifested in a time-honored silhouette, but made fresh with a feminine and flattering red as well as the single note of the white poinsettia adornment. Javits excels in such distilled grace notes, projecting the hat as a deliberate statement for and upon the wearer.

Fred Miller Robinson argues for the bowler hat as a salient sign of the modern spirit (The Man in the Bowler Hat, Chapel Hill, 1993). He points out that it is ever and increasingly filled with the semantics of its origin. What happens in an Eric Javits hat? Customarily, saving most of the over-the-top extravagance for the Louis Féraud line, the Javits hats have the snappy stateliness of a wonderful tradition fittingly renewed. Without succumbing either to arid art or to a conceptual base alone, Javits' fundamentals of hatmaking likewise give the hat its historical function and purpose and offer it as a basic vessel adaptable to modern lives. Few milliners have been as conscientious as Javits in reconfiguring the hat in accordance with its historical templates and modern comforts. Few milliners have taken a modernist sculptural responsibility and talent in honing in one element of the hat to make it converse with the apparel to give presence to the face of its wearer.

Into the 21st century, Javits, the grandnephew of the late New York Senator Jacob Javits, earns a place among the creators of beautiful things. Some of his chicery, like the hats with wigs attached, he crafts especially to the tastes of the Big Apple to celebrate women, from the everyday impulse shopper at Bergdorf's to Katie Couric, Whitney Houston, Hillary Clinton, and Madeline Albright. In his words, "What career woman cares about price? As long as career women care what they look like, I'm in business."

Javits has stayed in demand in a fickle, style-driven market by keeping abreast of what the youngest hat-wearers want and by knowing where and how people display head coverings. Consequently, he has maintained a steady fine-tuning of his classic, elegant, sensible, and fantasy models sold in the millinery salons of Bonwit Teller, Bergdorf Goodman, Saks Fifth Avenue, Bloomingdale's, Macy's, Chicago's Marshall Fields, and specialty shops. In the fall of 2000, LuxuryFinder.com, a top online retailer of luxury goods, touted its selection of Javits hats. Tops in the era were his Stetson in natural python and matching hat and hobo bag in cheetah, giraffe, leopard, and wildcat patterns. Of these whimsical models, he comments, "I like to see women have fun in hats. You wear them for all different reasons, but I think the main thing is that it's another way to express yourself. Marry that with function, and then you really need them."

—Richard Martin; updated by Mary Ellen Snodgrass

JEAN PATOU

French design company

Founded: by Jean Patou (1887–1936), who worked in a small dressmaking business, Parry, before World War I. Company History: Patou produced first collection, 1914; Captain of Zouaves during World War I; returned to fashion, launching first couture collection, 1919; moved to rue St. Florentin, Paris, 1922; visited U.S., brought back six American models, 1924; created perfume house, and has concentrated on hats that are not agglomerations and concoctions, but are modest one-statement sculptures for the head. Javits' restraint is his focus on one important statement in each hat, seldom adding secondary elements.

Design by Eric Javits. © Haig/Artlightning Productions NYC.

Often the interest is, in fact, in the shape and he has searched the past for a wondrous array of traditional shapes to frame the face. Yet, even as shape is of critical importance to Javits, one millinery myth has he, or the archetypal hat designer, whipping a perfect hat out of his pocket—as Javits is said to have done for Carolina Herrera. The legerdemain of the hat in his pocket notwithstanding, Javits plays with a softening of shape so that even his military inspirations and his menswear derivations work as softer versions of the source, though never collapsing into Oldenburg flaccidity.

Defending his decision to enter millinery, as he did somewhat serendipitously, Javits describes the early hat-making as a relief from painting and sculpture. "Hatmaking was playful, there was no pressure. A weight was taken off, and it snowballed into something more serious." His play is quite serious, though, a Bauhausian caprice rather than Carmen Miranda theatrics. While some of Javits' hats are for a day at the races, his most important contributions are hats that can serve for day and cocktail hours. He makes one of the most convincing arguments for the possible return of millinery to daily attire in dealing with classic shapes, such as a velour beret or the most refined form of the basic derby. His red tophat with poinsettia photographed on the cover of Town & Country, (New York, December 1990) is Dickensian tradition manifested in a time-honored silhouette, but made fresh with a feminine and flattering red as well as the single note of the white poinsettia adornment. Javits excels in such distilled grace notes, projecting the hat as a deliberate statement for and upon the wearer.

Fred Miller Robinson argues for the bowler hat as a salient sign of the modern spirit (The Man in the Bowler Hat, Chapel Hill, 1993). He points out that it is ever and increasingly filled with the semantics of its origin. What happens in an Eric Javits hat? Customarily, saving most of the over-the-top extravagance for the Louis Féraud line, the Javits hats have the snappy stateliness of a wonderful tradition fittingly renewed. Without succumbing either to arid art or to a conceptual base alone, Javits' fundamentals of hatmaking likewise give the hat its historical function and purpose and offer it as a basic vessel adaptable to modern lives. Few milliners have been as conscientious as Javits in reconfiguring the hat in accordance with its historical templates and modern comforts. Few milliners have taken a modernist sculptural responsibility and talent in honing in one element of the hat to make it converse with the apparel to give presence to the face of its wearer.

Into the 21st century, Javits, the grandnephew of the late New York Senator Jacob Javits, earns a place among the creators of beautiful things. Some of his chicery, like the hats with wigs attached, he crafts especially to the tastes of the Big Apple to celebrate women, from the everyday impulse shopper at Bergdorf's to Katie Couric, Whitney Houston, Hillary Clinton, and Madeline Albright. In his words, "What career woman cares about price? As long as career women care what they look like, I'm in business."

Javits has stayed in demand in a fickle, style-driven market by keeping abreast of what the youngest hat-wearers want and by knowing where and how people display head coverings. Consequently, he has maintained a steady fine-tuning of his classic, elegant, sensible, and fantasy models sold in the millinery salons of Bonwit Teller, Bergdorf Goodman, Saks Fifth Avenue, Bloomingdale's, Macy's, Chicago's Marshall Fields, and specialty shops. In the fall of 2000, LuxuryFinder.com, a top online retailer of luxury goods, touted its selection of Javits hats. Tops in the era were his Stetson in natural python and matching hat and hobo bag in cheetah, giraffe, leopard, and wildcat patterns. Of these whimsical models, he comments, "I like to see women have fun in hats. You wear them for all different reasons, but I think the main thing is that it's another way to express yourself. Marry that with function, and then you really need them."

—Richard Martin; updated by Mary Ellen Snodgrass

JEAN PATOU

French design company

Founded: by Jean Patou (1887–1936), who worked in a small dressmaking business, Parry, before World War I. Company History: Patou produced first collection, 1914; Captain of Zouaves during World War I; returned to fashion, launching first couture collection, 1919; moved to rue St. Florentin, Paris, 1922; visited U.S., brought back six American models, 1924; created perfume house, Skiwear design by Jean Patou, ca. 1930. © Hulton-Deutsch Collection/CORBIS.

1925; introduced Princess line, 1929; brother-in-law, Raymond Barbas, took over business on death of Patou, 1936; Parfums Patou established in London, Milan, Geneva, Hong Kong, and Australia, by 1982; designers for the house have included Bohan (1954–56), Lagerfeld (1960–63), Gaultier (1971–73), Goma (1963–73), Tarlazzi (1973–77), Gonzalès (1977–82), and Lacroix (1982–87); signed licensing deal with Yohji Yamamoto for fragrances, 1994; fragrances include: Amour Amour, que sais-je, Adieu Sagesse, 1925; Chaldée, 1927; Moment Suprême, 1929; Joy, 1930; Divine Folie, 1933; Normandie, 1935; Vacances, 1936; Colony, 1938; l'Heure Attendue, 1946; Caline, 1964; 1000 de Jean Patou, 1972; Eau de Patou, 1976; Patou pour Homme, 1980; Sublime, 1992; Prive, 1994; Quasar, 1995; Yohji, 1996; Yohji Essential and Patou for Ever, 1998; Yohji Homme, 1999; Nacre, 2001. Awards: Scent of the Century (Joy), 2000. Company Address: 7 rue St. Florentin, Paris, 75008 France.

PUBLICATIONS

On JEAN PATOU:

Books

Etherington-Smith, Meredith, Patou, London, 1983.

- McDowell, Colin, McDowell's Directory of Twentieth Century Fashion, Englewood Cliffs, NJ, 1985.
 Milbank, Caroline Rennolds, Couture: The Great Designers, New York, 1985.
 Ewing, Elizabeth, History of Twentieth Century Fashion, Totowa, NJ, 1986.
 Milbank, Caroline Rennolds, New York Fashion: The Evolution of American Style, New York, 1989.
 Steele, Valerie, Women of Fashion: Twentieth-Century Designers, New York, 1991.
 Stegemeyer, Anne, Who's Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.

Articles

- "Patou with a New Spirit," in Vogue, May 1985.
 Donovan, Carrie, "The Two Sides of Paris Couture," in the New York Times Magazine, 23 February 1986.
 Everett, Patty, "After Half a Century, Joy Adds Bath, Body Line," in WWD, 9 January 1987.
 Koselka, Rita, "Affordable Luxury," in Forbes, 4 May 1987.
 "Yohji Yamamoto in Deal to Develop Fragrance," in WWD, 5 July 1994.
 "Patou Judgement Goes Against Gaultier," in WWD, 30 November 1994.
 Aktar, Alev, "Yohji Readies Scent," in WWD, 12 July 1996.
 "Vive l'Amour," in WWD, 13 March 1998.
 Ozzard, Janet, "May Debut for Yohji Homme (Patou's New Men's Fragrance)," in WWD, 2 April 1999.
 "Great Joy for Patou—Joy, Scent of the Century," in Soap Perfumery & Cosmetics, September 2000.
 Born, Pete, "Newest Pearl in Patou's Crown," in WWD, 23 February 2001.

*

Since its origin, the House of Jean Patou has always associated fashion (1919) and perfumery (1925) activities. I think there are numerous similarities in the care given to these two industries, notably in the domaine of know-how, innovation, the constant research for quality and in the intervention of a highly qualified workforce.

Forever the forerunner, Jean Patou has always understood the tastes and aspirations of his contemporaries. Whilst he was the primary influence in women's sportswear and creator of the first knitted bathing-suits, he was also the first couturier to use his monogram as a design feature. For Jean Patou, "the modern woman leads an active life, and the creator must therefore dress her accordingly, in the most simple way, whilst maintaining her charm and femininity."

It is in this sense that the stylists that have succeeded Jean Patou have worked. They have created original and striking collections, with no limits, maintaining the label's prestigious aura, its liberty and quality. I think that fashion should reflect a woman's desires, should not constrain her but allow her to live with her epoch.

—Jean de Moüy

* * *

Fashion history records that Jean Patou is best known for Joy, the world's most expensive perfume, and for his famous cubist sweaters.

His contributions to fashion were, however, much more substantial and far reaching. His genius was his ability to interpret the times in which he lived and translate the ideals of that era into fashion. In Paris during the 1920s, couture was evolving from serving a few wealthy clients into a huge autonomous industry and Patou recognized couture's tremendous potential, both in France and in the United States. Patou helped expand the industry by introducing sportswear, expanding his business into the American market, emphasizing accessories and, like Paul Poiret, offering his customers a signature perfume.

The 1920s ideal woman was youthful, physically fit, and healthy looking. The truly athletic woman was realized in Suzanne Lenglen, the 1921 Wimbledon tennis star, who wore Patou clothes both on and off the court. The benefits gained by the sports stars and other celebrities publicizing Patou's designs were many. Patou also provided a complete wardrobe for American female aviator, Ruth Elder, as well as many well-known stage stars. Patou customers, most of whom did not play sports, sought to emulate this new look. Patou recognized the need for clothes for the sports participant, the spectator, and for those wishing to appear athletic, both in the U.S. and in Europe.

In 1925 he opened a Paris boutique called Le Coin des Sports where he devoted a series of rooms each to an individual sport. Complete accessorized outfits were available for aviation, riding, fishing, tennis, golf, and yachting, among others. Also recognizing the importance of leisure and travel to his customers, Patou opened salons in the resort areas, Deauville and Biarritz, where off-the-rack items such as sweater sets, swimsuits, and accessories were available.

After expanding his business in France, Patou realized the potential for the fashion industry in the U.S. and admired the long, lean lines of the American silhouette. In 1925 he traveled to New York and hired six women to return to Paris with him and work as mannequins. This well-publicized action made the couture more accessible to Americans, improving his overall market share and profits. The French sought to emulate this silhouette as well, making Patou one of the best-known names in fashion.

Patou's design philosophy was influenced by sportswear, continuing the theme of casual elegance into day and evening ensembles. He believed in beautiful but functional clothes which reflected the personality of the wearer. Patou never felt fashion should dictate; the cut of the clothes was simple, often accented with architectural seam lines, embroidery detail, and attention to fabric, trims, and finishings. By collaborating with textile mills on design and color, Patou was able to create exclusive colors through thread-dyeing methods, eliminating exact copies by lesser competitors. Patou also developed a swimsuit fabric which resisted shrinkage and fading, pleasing both swimmer and sun worshipper. Design inspirations included Russian embroideries, antique textiles, and modern art.

By interpreting the surrounding art movements and cultural ideas into his designs, Patou created such classics as "cubist" sweaters, which figured prominently in his business. By adding coordinating skirts, scarves, hats, and other accessories, he increased his overall sales. Patou revolutionized the knitting industry with machine production, which meant greater productivity and greater profits. The casual fit of sweater and sportswear, in general, was financially beneficial as it required fewer fittings and less overall production time. Patou also applied his own monogram to his sportswear designs—the first visible designer label (and over which the company later went to court with Jean-Paul Gaultier, suing the former in-house designer for a logo too closely resembling Patou's renowned initials).

The legendary rivalry between Patou and Chanel was intense and perhaps fueled both of their successful careers. Their visions for the modern woman were quite similar, and although it is Chanel that fashion history has credited with many of the silhouette and conceptual changes of 1920s fashions, it was Patou who, in 1929, dropped the hemline and raised the waistline—Chanel quickly followed suit.

The House of Patou prospered during the Depression but Patou himself was unable to interpret the 1930s as he had so successfully captured the 1920s. He died in 1936, a relatively young man. While Patou had demonstrated a brilliant business sense, ultimately undermined by his destructive gambling tendencies, the company stayed in family hands and remains world renowned today. Just as it had in the later years of the 20th century, Jean Patou in the 21st century revolved around an increasing stable of fragrances for men and women. Unlike many firms who contracted out, Jean Patou had not one but two full-time perfumers on its premises as of 1998. In addition to creating its own fragrances, licensing deals to distribute Hubigant's Quelques Fleurs, and to develop and sell Yohji Yamamoto's fragrance line have kept Jean Patou at the forefront of the industry.

The new millennium brought further exposure and accolades for Jean Patou. Yamamoto's first two fragrances had proven successful enough for a third, and perennial bestseller Joy was named the "Scent of the Century" in 2000, beating out longtime rivals such as Chanel No. 5 and Anaïs Anaïs for the honor, which was sponsored by the UK's Fifi awards. Capitalizing on its higher profile, Jean Patou launched two new women's fragrances, Lacoste in 2000 and Nacre in 2001. The first was unveiled in Azerbaijan, and second, meaning mother of pearl in French, harked back to a dress called the "Fleur de Nacre," which debuted in spring 1922.

—Margo Seaman; updated by Nelly Rhodes

JOAN & DAVID

American footwear and fashion firm

Founded: by Joan and David Helpern in Cambridge, Massachusetts, 1967. Company History: Joan & David label introduced, 1977; David & Joan menswear division launched, 1982; Joan & David Too, lower priced line of shoes and accessories introduced, 1987; first women's apparel collection produced by Sir for Her, 1983–85; second women's ready-to-wear collection produced by Gruppo GFT, from 1988; licensing agreement with Ann Taylor chain of fashion shops, 1967–92; producer and distributor, Calvin Klein Footwear, from 1990, and Calvin Klein accessories, 1990–91; New York flagship shop opened, 1985; in-store boutiques opened at Harvey Nichols, London, and Ogilvey's, Montreal, 1987; freestanding Paris and Hong Kong boutiques opened, 1988; filed for Chapter 11 and sold Joan Helpern Designs, Inc. to Maxwell Shoe Company, 2000. Awards: American Fashion Critics Coty award, 1978; Footwear News Designer of the Year award, 1986; Cutty Sark award, 1986; Golden Slipper award, 1988; Golden Shoe award, 1989; Fashion Footwear Association of New York award, 1990; Silver Trophy, 1992; Michelangelo award, 1993; Joan: Girl Scouts of America Woman of the Year, 1995. Member: Joan: Council of Fashion Designers of America; Committee of 200. Company Address: 4 West 58th Street, New York, NY 10019, USA.

His contributions to fashion were, however, much more substantial and far reaching. His genius was his ability to interpret the times in which he lived and translate the ideals of that era into fashion. In Paris during the 1920s, couture was evolving from serving a few wealthy clients into a huge autonomous industry and Patou recognized couture's tremendous potential, both in France and in the United States. Patou helped expand the industry by introducing sportswear, expanding his business into the American market, emphasizing accessories and, like Paul Poiret, offering his customers a signature perfume.

The 1920s ideal woman was youthful, physically fit, and healthy looking. The truly athletic woman was realized in Suzanne Lenglen, the 1921 Wimbledon tennis star, who wore Patou clothes both on and off the court. The benefits gained by the sports stars and other celebrities publicizing Patou's designs were many. Patou also provided a complete wardrobe for American female aviator, Ruth Elder, as well as many well-known stage stars. Patou customers, most of whom did not play sports, sought to emulate this new look. Patou recognized the need for clothes for the sports participant, the spectator, and for those wishing to appear athletic, both in the U.S. and in Europe.

In 1925 he opened a Paris boutique called Le Coin des Sports where he devoted a series of rooms each to an individual sport. Complete accessorized outfits were available for aviation, riding, fishing, tennis, golf, and yachting, among others. Also recognizing the importance of leisure and travel to his customers, Patou opened salons in the resort areas, Deauville and Biarritz, where off-the-rack items such as sweater sets, swimsuits, and accessories were available.

After expanding his business in France, Patou realized the potential for the fashion industry in the U.S. and admired the long, lean lines of the American silhouette. In 1925 he traveled to New York and hired six women to return to Paris with him and work as mannequins. This well-publicized action made the couture more accessible to Americans, improving his overall market share and profits. The French sought to emulate this silhouette as well, making Patou one of the best-known names in fashion.

Patou's design philosophy was influenced by sportswear, continuing the theme of casual elegance into day and evening ensembles. He believed in beautiful but functional clothes which reflected the personality of the wearer. Patou never felt fashion should dictate; the cut of the clothes was simple, often accented with architectural seam lines, embroidery detail, and attention to fabric, trims, and finishings. By collaborating with textile mills on design and color, Patou was able to create exclusive colors through thread-dyeing methods, eliminating exact copies by lesser competitors. Patou also developed a swimsuit fabric which resisted shrinkage and fading, pleasing both swimmer and sun worshipper. Design inspirations included Russian embroideries, antique textiles, and modern art.

By interpreting the surrounding art movements and cultural ideas into his designs, Patou created such classics as "cubist" sweaters, which figured prominently in his business. By adding coordinating skirts, scarves, hats, and other accessories, he increased his overall sales. Patou revolutionized the knitting industry with machine production, which meant greater productivity and greater profits. The casual fit of sweater and sportswear, in general, was financially beneficial as it required fewer fittings and less overall production time. Patou also applied his own monogram to his sportswear designs—the first visible designer label (and over which the company later went to court with Jean-Paul Gaultier, suing the former in-house designer for a logo too closely resembling Patou's renowned initials).

The legendary rivalry between Patou and Chanel was intense and perhaps fueled both of their successful careers. Their visions for the modern woman were quite similar, and although it is Chanel that fashion history has credited with many of the silhouette and conceptual changes of 1920s fashions, it was Patou who, in 1929, dropped the hemline and raised the waistline—Chanel quickly followed suit.

The House of Patou prospered during the Depression but Patou himself was unable to interpret the 1930s as he had so successfully captured the 1920s. He died in 1936, a relatively young man. While Patou had demonstrated a brilliant business sense, ultimately undermined by his destructive gambling tendencies, the company stayed in family hands and remains world renowned today. Just as it had in the later years of the 20th century, Jean Patou in the 21st century revolved around an increasing stable of fragrances for men and women. Unlike many firms who contracted out, Jean Patou had not one but two full-time perfumers on its premises as of 1998. In addition to creating its own fragrances, licensing deals to distribute Hubigant's Quelques Fleurs, and to develop and sell Yohji Yamamoto's fragrance line have kept Jean Patou at the forefront of the industry.

The new millennium brought further exposure and accolades for Jean Patou. Yamamoto's first two fragrances had proven successful enough for a third, and perennial bestseller Joy was named the "Scent of the Century" in 2000, beating out longtime rivals such as Chanel No. 5 and Anaïs Anaïs for the honor, which was sponsored by the UK's Fifi awards. Capitalizing on its higher profile, Jean Patou launched two new women's fragrances, Lacoste in 2000 and Nacre in 2001. The first was unveiled in Azerbaijan, and second, meaning mother of pearl in French, harked back to a dress called the "Fleur de Nacre," which debuted in spring 1922.

—Margo Seaman; updated by Nelly Rhodes

JOAN & DAVID

American footwear and fashion firm

Founded: by Joan and David Helpern in Cambridge, Massachusetts, 1967. Company History: Joan & David label introduced, 1977; David & Joan menswear division launched, 1982; Joan & David Too, lower priced line of shoes and accessories introduced, 1987; first women's apparel collection produced by Sir for Her, 1983–85; second women's ready-to-wear collection produced by Gruppo GFT, from 1988; licensing agreement with Ann Taylor chain of fashion shops, 1967–92; producer and distributor, Calvin Klein Footwear, from 1990, and Calvin Klein accessories, 1990–91; New York flagship shop opened, 1985; in-store boutiques opened at Harvey Nichols, London, and Ogilvey's, Montreal, 1987; freestanding Paris and Hong Kong boutiques opened, 1988; filed for Chapter 11 and sold Joan Helpern Designs, Inc. to Maxwell Shoe Company, 2000. Awards: American Fashion Critics Coty award, 1978; Footwear News Designer of the Year award, 1986; Cutty Sark award, 1986; Golden Slipper award, 1988; Golden Shoe award, 1989; Fashion Footwear Association of New York award, 1990; Silver Trophy, 1992; Michelangelo award, 1993; Joan: Girl Scouts of America Woman of the Year, 1995. Member: Joan: Council of Fashion Designers of America; Committee of 200. Company Address: 4 West 58th Street, New York, NY 10019, USA.

Joan Helpern in a Joan & David showroom, 1999. © AP/Wide World Photos.

PUBLICATIONS

On JOAN & DAVID:

Books

- McDowell, Colin, Shoes: Fashion and Fantasy, New York, 1989.
Trasko, Mary, Heavenly Soles, New York, 1989.
Stegemeyer, Anne, Who's Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.

Articles

- Bethany, Marilyn, "Sole Sister," in New York, 10 March 1986.
"Joan and David: Less is More," in Vogue (Paris), October 1986.
Infantino, Vivian, "Designer of the Year: Joan Helpern," in Footwear News, December 1986.
Williams, Lisa, "Uniquely Joan & David," in Footwear News, March 1989.
Huffman, Frances, "Role Model," in Entrepreneurial Woman (Irvine, California), March 1992.

- Furman, Phyllis, "Putting New Foot Forward: Joan and David Rebuilds After Ann Taylor Rift," in Crain's New York Business, 23 March 1992.
- Quinn, Colleen, "The Many Dimensions of Joan Helpern," in Footwear News, 1 June 1992.
- Infantino, Vivian, "World Class Performances: Joan & David—It Ain't Just Shoes," in Footwear News, November 1992.
- Moin, David, "Joan's New Platforms: Not Just Shoes," in WWF, 23 August 1993.
- Barnett, Amy DuBois, "The Interview: Joan & David Matriarch," in Fashion Planet, Spring 1997.

* * *

Joan & David, Inc. is responsible for making flat shoes for women fashionable. The company developed because Joan Helpern wanted a comfortable, stylish shoe that would not become dated through its design. When Joan married David Helpern in the 1960s, she was a student in child psychology working on her Ph.D. at Harvard University. In her multiple roles of wife, mother, teacher, and student, Joan wanted a shoe that was not a gym shoe, loafer, or stiletto, the only readily available styles for women at the time. She needed a shoe that would look stylish yet allow her to get about the city in comfort. The solution was to design the shoe herself, an oxford style still available in a modified form today.

While editing academic manuscripts, Joan created footwear designs for department stores and private labels, including Harvard Square and Foreign Affairs. She began designing under the name of Joan & David in 1977. Joan served as president and designer, while David was chairman of the company.

Joan & David designs are found throughout the world. The shoes are manufactured in Italy, because it was there that Joan found craftspeople willing to produce limited editions of her designs, numbering from 12 to 120, to her specifications. Joan & David, Inc. produces shoes specifically for women under the name Joan & David, Joan & David Too, and Joan & David Couture. Men's footwear is designed under the names David & Joan and David & Joan Couture. Through the years, the product line has expanded to include purses, belts, scarves, socks, sunglasses, and other accessories as well as women's ready-to-wear.

Joan's entry into the design field was not planned, and she had no formal design training. She knew, however, what she wanted in a shoe, so she researched the market and technology involved in their manufacture. She was able to produce footwear to meet the needs of active women like herself, who race through the day serving in many different roles, who are not self-consciously fashionable but value good quality and style. Joan has a less-is-more philosophy when it comes to design; she concentrates on classic, usable styles such as oxfords and patent pumps with designs evolving from year to year. The colors she uses are subtle with the emphasis on interesting textures, and comfort is essential. Neither flat shoes nor shoes with low heels have extraneous details or extreme designs. In 1978 she was given the Coty award for her designs.

Joan has been influential in the field of shoe design. By successfully creating both comfortable and stylish shoes, she helped open up a new way of thinking about shoe design for women. Professional women wanted what Joan herself originally searched for—a fashionably comfortable shoe that would not be an obsolete design the next season—something more stylish than sneakers but more comfortable than stilettos. By providing herself with such shoes, Joan, along with her husband David, were able to fill this need and develop the successful business named Joan & David.

The Helperns have long been known for their philanthropy. "We try to support the major worldwide concerns like AIDS and breast and prostate cancer research," Joan told Amy DuBois Barnett of Fashion Planet. "But it's also a matter of where David and I feel most involved." In 1995, New York City's Columbia-Presbyterian Medical Center used a donation from the couple to open the Joan and David Helpern Clinical Noninvasive Vascular Diagnostic Laboratory. The Helperns have also been interested in vision care, providing glasses and medical treatment for needy children.

At the turn of the century, the Helperns' shoe business took a turn for the worse. In March 2000 Joan & David filed for chapter 11 bankruptcy protection. Later that year, Joan Helpern Designs, Inc. was purchased by the Maxwell Shoe Company for $16.8 million. The sale included most of the company's assets, including its 7,000-square-foot New York office, as well as trademarks for all Helpern designs. Footwear giant Maxwell Shoe, in business since 1949, also owns brands including Mootsies Tootsies, Dockers Footwear for Women, Anne Klein 2, and Sam & Libby shoes. The company planned to relaunch the Joan & David line in 2001, bringing down their customary prices in a long-term effort to increase sales to $40 million or $50 million.

—Nancy House; updated by Lisa Groshong

JOHN, John P.

American milliner

Born: John Pico Harberger in Munich, 14 March 1906; immigrated to the U.S., 1919. Education: Studied medicine, University of Lucerne, and art at the Sorbonne and l'École des Beaux Arts, Paris. Career: Milliner, Mme Laurel, dressmaker, New York, 1926; partner (with Fred Fredericks), John-Fredericks, milliners, 1929–48, with shops in New York, Hollywood, Miami, and Palm Beach; formed independent company, Mr. John, Inc., New York, 1948–70; designed for private clients, from 1970. Awards: Coty American Fashion Critics award, 1943; Neiman Marcus award, 1950; Millinery Institute of America award, 1956. Died: 25 June 1993, in New York.

PUBLICATIONS

By JOHN:

Articles

"It Had to Be Hats," with Nanette Kutner, in Good Housekeeping (New York), June 1957.

On JOHN:

Books

- Lambert, Eleanor, World of Fashion: People, Places, Resources, New York and London, 1976.
- Morris, Bernadine, and Barbara Walz, The Fashion Makers, New York, 1978.
- McDowell, Colin, Hats: Status, Style, Glamour, London, 1992.

- Furman, Phyllis, "Putting New Foot Forward: Joan and David Rebuilds After Ann Taylor Rift," in Crain's New York Business, 23 March 1992.
- Quinn, Colleen, "The Many Dimensions of Joan Helpern," in Footwear News, 1 June 1992.
- Infantino, Vivian, "World Class Performances: Joan & David—It Ain't Just Shoes," in Footwear News, November 1992.
- Moin, David, "Joan's New Platforms: Not Just Shoes," in WWF, 23 August 1993.
- Barnett, Amy DuBois, "The Interview: Joan & David Matriarch," in Fashion Planet, Spring 1997.

* * *

Joan & David, Inc. is responsible for making flat shoes for women fashionable. The company developed because Joan Helpern wanted a comfortable, stylish shoe that would not become dated through its design. When Joan married David Helpern in the 1960s, she was a student in child psychology working on her Ph.D. at Harvard University. In her multiple roles of wife, mother, teacher, and student, Joan wanted a shoe that was not a gym shoe, loafer, or stiletto, the only readily available styles for women at the time. She needed a shoe that would look stylish yet allow her to get about the city in comfort. The solution was to design the shoe herself, an oxford style still available in a modified form today.

While editing academic manuscripts, Joan created footwear designs for department stores and private labels, including Harvard Square and Foreign Affairs. She began designing under the name of Joan & David in 1977. Joan served as president and designer, while David was chairman of the company.

Joan & David designs are found throughout the world. The shoes are manufactured in Italy, because it was there that Joan found craftspeople willing to produce limited editions of her designs, numbering from 12 to 120, to her specifications. Joan & David, Inc. produces shoes specifically for women under the name Joan & David, Joan & David Too, and Joan & David Couture. Men's footwear is designed under the names David & Joan and David & Joan Couture. Through the years, the product line has expanded to include purses, belts, scarves, socks, sunglasses, and other accessories as well as women's ready-to-wear.

Joan's entry into the design field was not planned, and she had no formal design training. She knew, however, what she wanted in a shoe, so she researched the market and technology involved in their manufacture. She was able to produce footwear to meet the needs of active women like herself, who race through the day serving in many different roles, who are not self-consciously fashionable but value good quality and style. Joan has a less-is-more philosophy when it comes to design; she concentrates on classic, usable styles such as oxfords and patent pumps with designs evolving from year to year. The colors she uses are subtle with the emphasis on interesting textures, and comfort is essential. Neither flat shoes nor shoes with low heels have extraneous details or extreme designs. In 1978 she was given the Coty award for her designs.

Joan has been influential in the field of shoe design. By successfully creating both comfortable and stylish shoes, she helped open up a new way of thinking about shoe design for women. Professional women wanted what Joan herself originally searched for—a fashionably comfortable shoe that would not be an obsolete design the next season—something more stylish than sneakers but more comfortable than stilettos. By providing herself with such shoes, Joan, along with her husband David, were able to fill this need and develop the successful business named Joan & David.

The Helperns have long been known for their philanthropy. "We try to support the major worldwide concerns like AIDS and breast and prostate cancer research," Joan told Amy DuBois Barnett of Fashion Planet. "But it's also a matter of where David and I feel most involved." In 1995, New York City's Columbia-Presbyterian Medical Center used a donation from the couple to open the Joan and David Helpern Clinical Noninvasive Vascular Diagnostic Laboratory. The Helperns have also been interested in vision care, providing glasses and medical treatment for needy children.

At the turn of the century, the Helperns' shoe business took a turn for the worse. In March 2000 Joan & David filed for chapter 11 bankruptcy protection. Later that year, Joan Helpern Designs, Inc. was purchased by the Maxwell Shoe Company for $16.8 million. The sale included most of the company's assets, including its 7,000-square-foot New York office, as well as trademarks for all Helpern designs. Footwear giant Maxwell Shoe, in business since 1949, also owns brands including Mootsies Tootsies, Dockers Footwear for Women, Anne Klein 2, and Sam & Libby shoes. The company planned to relaunch the Joan & David line in 2001, bringing down their customary prices in a long-term effort to increase sales to $40 million or $50 million.

—Nancy House; updated by Lisa Groshong

JOHN, John P.

American milliner

Born: John Pico Harberger in Munich, 14 March 1906; immigrated to the U.S., 1919. Education: Studied medicine, University of Lucerne, and art at the Sorbonne and l'École des Beaux Arts, Paris. Career: Milliner, Mme Laurel, dressmaker, New York, 1926; partner (with Fred Fredericks), John-Fredericks, milliners, 1929–48, with shops in New York, Hollywood, Miami, and Palm Beach; formed independent company, Mr. John, Inc., New York, 1948–70; designed for private clients, from 1970. Awards: Coty American Fashion Critics award, 1943; Neiman Marcus award, 1950; Millinery Institute of America award, 1956. Died: 25 June 1993, in New York.

PUBLICATIONS

By JOHN:

Articles

"It Had to Be Hats," with Nanette Kutner, in Good Housekeeping (New York), June 1957.

On JOHN:

Books

- Lambert, Eleanor, World of Fashion: People, Places, Resources, New York and London, 1976.
- Morris, Bernadine, and Barbara Walz, The Fashion Makers, New York, 1978.
- McDowell, Colin, Hats: Status, Style, Glamour, London, 1992.

Stegemeyer, Anne, Who's Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.

Articles

Fredericks, Pierce G., "Mad Hatter," in Cosmopolitan (New York), April 1951.

"John P(ico) John," in Current Biography (New York), October 1956.

Morris, Bernadine, "Fashion's Mad Hatter Turns Conservative for Spring," in the New York Times, 7 January 1966.

Schiros, Anne-Marie, "Mr. John, 91, Hat Designer for Stars and Society," [obituary] in the New York Times, 29 June 1993.

"John P. John," [obituary] in Current Biography (New York), September 1993.

* * *

"My business," John P. John told Good Housekeeping in June 1957, "is strictly an individual business. When I go, there will be no more Mr John. I have only one worry: when I do go, should I reach heaven, what will I do? I know I cannot improve on the halo." Ironically, John, who had made almost every kind of head covering other than a halo, saw the demise of his kind of milliner on earth; by the time of his death in 1993, perhaps even the halo was obsolete. As early as 1957, he was already on the defensive, arguing, "A hat cannot actually give one golden curls if the hair is mouse-colored and stringy; it cannot lift a face, pay overdue bills, subtract ten years from one's age, or transform a plain soul into a reigning princess. But it can lend practically any woman a temporary out-of-herself feeling. For the right hat creates a desired mood, and that isn't fiction or fancy, but fact, fact, fact."

Like his contemporaries Lilly Daché and Halston who would follow later (translating the concept to apparel, but retaining John's contradictory modes of shape reductivism and theatrical sparkle), John successfully combined the glamor of a custom business with a wide-reaching appeal. He could create extraordinary hats for exceptional women. At the same time, he was a hero to countless middle-class women who copied his styles or had them copied by local milliners. John's hats adorned the cover of Vogue many times, in issues hitting newsstands in 1943, 1944, 1946, and 1953.

From the opening of his own business in the 1920s, after apprenticing with his mother through the 1960s, John was an important milliner, never fixed in one style but producing eclectic variations of romantic picture hats, snoods, subdued cloches, and other forms. It was form indeed that was essential to John: his hats were sculptural, shaped to flatter the face, outfit, and presence. His historicist pieces, in particular, could use surface decoration, but the effect of a Mr. John hat nonetheless always resided in the shape. As Anne-Marie Schiro of the New York Times described in June 1993, "In the 1940s and 1950s, the name Mr. John was as famous in the world of hats as Christian Dior was in the realm of haute couture. At a time when other milliners were piling on flowers, feathers, and tulle, Mr. John was stripping hats naked, relying on pure shape for effect." Turbans, berets, and snoods—a specialty—were supple shapes in favor with John and were often shown in the style magazines with American fashion. He could, however, also cut crisp shapes and bow a brim to flatter the face and forehead to accompany Dior, Schiaparelli, and Balenciaga. For all the flamboyance of his own life and all the drama that he could vest in a suite of picture hats that ever seemed to belong at Tara, John could also create what Vogue characterized as a "strict" black hat of utmost simplicity in 1951. Even at their most whimsical and wild, John's hats were flattering to the wearer and to the ensemble of dress.

Eugenia Sheppard of the New York Herald Tribune called him "the artist among milliners" in July 1956 and he self-consciously courted the rubric of art, including collections with the themes of modern art and style history, and a sense of the avant-garde. It was one piece of historical recreation, however, that made John most famous: his millinery for Vivien Leigh in Gone with the Wind. Widely copied, the Gone with the Wind hats confirmed John's longtime association with Hollywood and women of style, including Mary Pickford, Greta Garbo, Gloria Vanderbilt, Gloria Swanson, Jacqueline Kennedy Onassis, and the Duchess of Windsor. His hats were also worn in films by Marilyn Monroe in Gentlemen Prefer Blondes and Marlene Dietrich in Shanghai Express. By the time Mr. John closed in 1970, hats were largely démodé.

Custom-made millinery is a matter of extreme codependency between client and milliner. If it is the purpose of the hat to flatter, the milliner, too, must practice a psychology of intervention and flattery. When Pierce Fredericks dubbed John the "Mad Hatter" in Cosmopolitan in April 1951, the madness was only of energy; rather, clients enjoyed John's "diplomatic manner." John used only one house model, a Miss Lynn, for many years; she was his type for countless hats, many of which he made directly on her head. He was also famous for his miniature hat collection, prototypes for his own hats and historical recreations based upon his study in museums and historical references. John lived in and defined the golden age of millinery.

—Richard Martin

JOHNSON, Betsey

American designer

Born: Weathersfield, Connecticut, 10 August 1942. Education: Studied at Pratt Institute, Brooklyn, New York, 1960–61; B.A., Phi Beta Kappa, Syracuse University, Syracuse, New York, 1964. Family: Married John Cale, 1966 (divorced); married Jeffrey Oliviere, 1981 (divorced); married Brian Reynolds, 1997 (separated); daughter: Lulu. Career: Guest Editor, Mademoiselle, New York, 1964–65; designer, Paraphernalia boutiques, New York, 1965–69; partner in boutique Betsey, Bunk & Nini, New York, from 1969; designer, Alvin Duskin Co., San Francisco, 1970; designer, Alley Cat, 1970–74; Butterick patterns, 1971 and 1975; Jeanette Maternities, 1974–75; Gant, 1974–75; Betsey Johnson's Kidswear division of Shutterbug, 1974–77; Tric-Trac by Betsey Johnson, 1974–76; Star Ferry by Betsey Johnson and Michael Miles, 1975–77; head designer, president, treasurer, B. J. Vines, from 1978; owner, Betsey Johnson stores, from 1979. Awards: Mademoiselle Merit award, 1970; Coty American Fashion Critics award, 1971; American Printed Fabrics Council Tommy award, 1971, 1990; Council of Fashion Designers of America Timeless Talent award, 1999. Address: 498 Seventh Avenue, New York, New York 10018, USA. Website: www.betseyjohnson.com.

Stegemeyer, Anne, Who's Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.

Articles

Fredericks, Pierce G., "Mad Hatter," in Cosmopolitan (New York), April 1951.

"John P(ico) John," in Current Biography (New York), October 1956.

Morris, Bernadine, "Fashion's Mad Hatter Turns Conservative for Spring," in the New York Times, 7 January 1966.

Schiros, Anne-Marie, "Mr. John, 91, Hat Designer for Stars and Society," [obituary] in the New York Times, 29 June 1993.

"John P. John," [obituary] in Current Biography (New York), September 1993.

* * *

"My business," John P. John told Good Housekeeping in June 1957, "is strictly an individual business. When I go, there will be no more Mr John. I have only one worry: when I do go, should I reach heaven, what will I do? I know I cannot improve on the halo." Ironically, John, who had made almost every kind of head covering other than a halo, saw the demise of his kind of milliner on earth; by the time of his death in 1993, perhaps even the halo was obsolete. As early as 1957, he was already on the defensive, arguing, "A hat cannot actually give one golden curls if the hair is mouse-colored and stringy; it cannot lift a face, pay overdue bills, subtract ten years from one's age, or transform a plain soul into a reigning princess. But it can lend practically any woman a temporary out-of-herself feeling. For the right hat creates a desired mood, and that isn't fiction or fancy, but fact, fact, fact."

Like his contemporaries Lilly Daché and Halston who would follow later (translating the concept to apparel, but retaining John's contradictory modes of shape reductivism and theatrical sparkle), John successfully combined the glamor of a custom business with a wide-reaching appeal. He could create extraordinary hats for exceptional women. At the same time, he was a hero to countless middle-class women who copied his styles or had them copied by local milliners. John's hats adorned the cover of Vogue many times, in issues hitting newsstands in 1943, 1944, 1946, and 1953.

From the opening of his own business in the 1920s, after apprenticing with his mother through the 1960s, John was an important milliner, never fixed in one style but producing eclectic variations of romantic picture hats, snoods, subdued cloches, and other forms. It was form indeed that was essential to John: his hats were sculptural, shaped to flatter the face, outfit, and presence. His historicist pieces, in particular, could use surface decoration, but the effect of a Mr. John hat nonetheless always resided in the shape. As Anne-Marie Schiro of the New York Times described in June 1993, "In the 1940s and 1950s, the name Mr. John was as famous in the world of hats as Christian Dior was in the realm of haute couture. At a time when other milliners were piling on flowers, feathers, and tulle, Mr. John was stripping hats naked, relying on pure shape for effect." Turbans, berets, and snoods—a specialty—were supple shapes in favor with John and were often shown in the style magazines with American fashion. He could, however, also cut crisp shapes and bow a brim to flatter the face and forehead to accompany Dior, Schiaparelli, and Balenciaga. For all the flamboyance of his own life and all the drama that he could vest in a suite of picture hats that ever seemed to belong at Tara, John could also create what Vogue characterized as a "strict" black hat of utmost simplicity in 1951. Even at their most whimsical and wild, John's hats were flattering to the wearer and to the ensemble of dress.

Eugenia Sheppard of the New York Herald Tribune called him "the artist among milliners" in July 1956 and he self-consciously courted the rubric of art, including collections with the themes of modern art and style history, and a sense of the avant-garde. It was one piece of historical recreation, however, that made John most famous: his millinery for Vivien Leigh in Gone with the Wind. Widely copied, the Gone with the Wind hats confirmed John's longtime association with Hollywood and women of style, including Mary Pickford, Greta Garbo, Gloria Vanderbilt, Gloria Swanson, Jacqueline Kennedy Onassis, and the Duchess of Windsor. His hats were also worn in films by Marilyn Monroe in Gentlemen Prefer Blondes and Marlene Dietrich in Shanghai Express. By the time Mr. John closed in 1970, hats were largely démodé.

Custom-made millinery is a matter of extreme codependency between client and milliner. If it is the purpose of the hat to flatter, the milliner, too, must practice a psychology of intervention and flattery. When Pierce Fredericks dubbed John the "Mad Hatter" in Cosmopolitan in April 1951, the madness was only of energy; rather, clients enjoyed John's "diplomatic manner." John used only one house model, a Miss Lynn, for many years; she was his type for countless hats, many of which he made directly on her head. He was also famous for his miniature hat collection, prototypes for his own hats and historical recreations based upon his study in museums and historical references. John lived in and defined the golden age of millinery.

—Richard Martin

JOHNSON, Betsey

American designer

Born: Weathersfield, Connecticut, 10 August 1942. Education: Studied at Pratt Institute, Brooklyn, New York, 1960–61; B.A., Phi Beta Kappa, Syracuse University, Syracuse, New York, 1964. Family: Married John Cale, 1966 (divorced); married Jeffrey Oliviere, 1981 (divorced); married Brian Reynolds, 1997 (separated); daughter: Lulu. Career: Guest Editor, Mademoiselle, New York, 1964–65; designer, Paraphernalia boutiques, New York, 1965–69; partner in boutique Betsey, Bunk & Nini, New York, from 1969; designer, Alvin Duskin Co., San Francisco, 1970; designer, Alley Cat, 1970–74; Butterick patterns, 1971 and 1975; Jeanette Maternities, 1974–75; Gant, 1974–75; Betsey Johnson's Kidswear division of Shutterbug, 1974–77; Tric-Trac by Betsey Johnson, 1974–76; Star Ferry by Betsey Johnson and Michael Miles, 1975–77; head designer, president, treasurer, B. J. Vines, from 1978; owner, Betsey Johnson stores, from 1979. Awards: Mademoiselle Merit award, 1970; Coty American Fashion Critics award, 1971; American Printed Fabrics Council Tommy award, 1971, 1990; Council of Fashion Designers of America Timeless Talent award, 1999. Address: 498 Seventh Avenue, New York, New York 10018, USA. Website: www.betseyjohnson.com.

Betsey Johnson, fall 2001 collection: lurex knit cardigan and chiffon mini skirt. © AP/Wide World Photos.

PUBLICATIONS

On JOHNSON:

Books

- Milinaire, Caterine, and Carol Troy, Cheap Chic, New York, 1975.
 Morris, Bernadine, and Barbara Walz, The Fashion Makers, New York, 1978.
 Milbank, Caroline Rennolds, New York Fashion: The Evolution of American Style, New York, 1989.
 Lobenthal, Joel, Radical Rags: Fashions of the Sixties, New York, 1990.
 Steele, Valerie, Women of Fashion, New York, 1991.
 Stegemeyer, Anne, Who's Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.

Articles

- "We Orbit Around...Betsey Johnson," in Mademoiselle, August 1966.

- Fraser, Kennedy, "On and Off the Avenue: Feminine Fashions," in The New Yorker, 1 April 1972.
 Comer, Nancy, "Betsey Johnson," in Mademoiselle, August 1972.
 Kaiser, Diane, "Profile on People," in Fashion Accessories Magazine, March 1979.
 Burggraf, Helen, "Betsey Johnson: Alive and Well and Designing in New York," in Apparel News, 1981.
 "Sweet and Tough," in Soho News (New York), 23 February 1982.
 Bloomfield, Judy, "Happy Partners: Bacon and Johnson," in WWD, 7 September 1988.
 Haistreiter, Kim, "Earth to Betsey," in Paper (New York), April 1989.
 Benatar, Giselle, "Betsey Johnson," in Mademoiselle, February 1993.
 "Betsey Johnson," in Current Biography, January 1994.
 Loukin, Andrea, "Betsey Johnson and Tarik Currimbhoy," in Interior Design, May 1996.
 Schiro, Anne-Marie, "Betsey Johnson: Honor for a Life of Celebrating Youth," in The New York Times, 18 May 1999.
 D'Innocenzio, Anne, "Betsey Johnson's New Chapter," in WWD, 3 May 2000.
 Shanahan, Laura, "Designated Shopper," in Brandweek, 13 November 2000.

* * *

For the youthquake generation, the names Betsey Johnson and Paraphernalia symbolized the hip, young fashions of mid-1960s America just as Mary Quant and Biba did for the equivalent age group in Great Britain. In the early 1970s, a second wave of young women with a taste for affordable style discovered the flippant body-conscious clothes Johnson designed for the ready-to-wear firm Alley Cat. Throughout the 1980s and into the 1990s, Johnson's clothes have been characterized by her sense of humor and an innocent, tongue-in-cheek sexiness. Wearing a Betsey Johnson dress is like putting on a good mood.

After graduating Phi Beta Kappa and magna cum laude from Syracuse University, Johnson won a guest editorship at Mademoiselle magazine. There, colleagues put her name forward to Paul Young, who was scouting out fresh new design talent to launch his Paraphernalia boutiques. It was a good match: Young encouraged experimentation and Johnson began to develop what was to be a long-standing interest in such unorthodox materials as vinyl, sequin sheeting, and the then-new stretch fabrics. Her "kit" dress, for example, was of clear vinyl with a trim-it-yourself package of stars, dots, and ellipses cut from reflective adhesive foil. The "noise" dress had a hem fringed with loose grommets.

Johnson's approach to clothing is very much influenced by her early days as a dancer. "I am basically about a ballerina torso and a full skirt," she told a reporter for the Soho News in 1982, "a dancing school dress-up craziness." Johnson's emphasis on tight, stretch bodices also grew out of her dancing school background. Not surprisingly, the shift in the 1970s to a subdued, tailored look was incompatible with Johnson's style as a designer. She continued to have her own label with a variety of manufacturers, but it was not until the end of that decade that Johnson's real joie de vivre emerged again, this time for her own company.

Johnson's company and her girlish, bohemian style have continued to endure, despite the economic downturns of the late 1980s and the androgynous “grunge” trends of the early 1990s. In the final years of the century, Johnson’s flirtily and whimsical designs were again at the forefront of fashion trends. As of 2001, almost 40 Betsey Johnson stores were open worldwide, with further expansion planned. Her label is available in several upper-end department stores and specialty stores, together with Johnson’s designer-price brand, Ultra. Throughout the 1990s, Betsey Johnson, Inc. continued to broaden its offerings, developing a line of accessories, jewelry, footwear, children’s clothing, bath and beauty products, and fragrance. Johnson’s imaginative runway fashion shows are eagerly anticipated each year, opened by the designer’s trademark cartwheel down the catwalk.

Betsey Johnson, fall 2001 collection. © AP/Wide World Photos.

The youthful spirit of the company is kept alive through Johnson’s own playful personality and the design talents of a young staff, including her daughter, Lulu Johnson. Betsey Johnson is the first to admit that her designs have changed little conceptually over her long career, but she is able to manipulate this basic style to suit a contemporary mood. Johnson’s loyalty to her own vision has been crucial to her success and appeal. Kal Ruttenstein, Bloomingdale’s fashion director, recognizes Johnson’s enduring style: “Betsey reinvents herself,” Ruttenstein says. “If she keeps doing what she does, fashion comes around to her every few years.”

—Whitney Blausen; updated by Megan Stacy

JONES, Stephen

British milliner

Born: West Kirby, Cheshire, England, 31 May 1957. Education: Studied at High Wycombe School of Art, 1975–76; B.A. (with honors) in fashion from St. Martin’s School of Art, London, 1979. Military Service: Served as chief petty officer in the Royal Navy, 1974–76. Career: Chairman/designer, Stephen Jones Millinery, from 1981; S.J. Scarves and Miss Jones lines introduced, from 1988; color creator, Shiseido Cosmetics, 1988; Jonesboy and S.J. Handkerchiefs, from 1990; S.J. Kimonos, from 1991; handbag line introduced, 1993; Jonesgirl, Stephen Jones Japan; license for gloves, scarves, and eyewear; opened shop in Covent Garden, 1995; hat featured on British postage stamp, 2001. Exhibitions: Headspace by Stephen Jones, Isetan Museum, Tokyo, 1984; Fashion and Surrealism, Victoria and Albert Museum, London and Fashion Institute of Technology, New York, 1988; Mad Hatter, Australian National Gallery, Canberra, Sydney, 1992; Hats: Status, Style, Glamour, The Collection, London, 1993; Rococo Futura, Ginza Artspace, Tokyo, 1994; Blah, Blah, Blah, London Fashion Week, 2000. Address: 36 Great Queen Street, Covent Garden, London WC2B 5AA, England.

PUBLICATIONS

By JONES:

Articles

- “Heads You Win,” in You magazine of the Mail on Sunday (London), 29 May 1983.
- “England’s Leading Milliner—The Collection,” available online at www.eodel.com/events/milliner.shtml, 18 June 2001.

On JONES:

Books

- Polan, Brenda, The Fashion Year, London, 1983.
- McDowell, Colin, Twentieth Century Fashion, London, 1984.
- Damase, Jacques, L’histoire du chapeaux, Paris, 1987.
- Martin, Richard, Fashion and Surrealism, New York, 1987.
- Mulvagh, Jane, The Vogue History of Twentieth Century Fashion, London, 1988.
- Ginsburg, Madeleine, The Hat, London, 1990.
- McDowell, Colin, Hats: Status, Style, Glamour, London, 1992.
- Stegemeyer, Anne, Who’s Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.

Articles

- Jagger, Harriett, “Making Up is Art to Do,” in the Observer Magazine (London), 11 December 1983.
- “Stephen Jones: Un toque de chapeaux,” in Elle (Paris), September 1984.
- Smith, Liz, “Mad as a Hatter,” in the Standard (London), 23 October 1984.
- “Jones the Hat,” in You magazine of the Mail on Sunday, 2 December 1984.
- Grieve, Amanda, “Hat Check Job,” in Harpers & Queen (London), December 1984.
- “Hats to Turn Heads,” in the Observer (London), 2 June 1985.

Betsey Johnson, fall 2001 collection. © AP/Wide World Photos.

androgynous “grunge” trends of the early 1990s. In the final years of the century, Johnson’s flirtily and whimsical designs were again at the forefront of fashion trends. As of 2001, almost 40 Betsey Johnson stores were open worldwide, with further expansion planned. Her label is available in several upper-end department stores and specialty stores, together with Johnson’s designer-price brand, Ultra. Throughout the 1990s, Betsey Johnson, Inc. continued to broaden its offerings, developing a line of accessories, jewelry, footwear, children’s clothing, bath and beauty products, and fragrance. Johnson’s imaginative runway fashion shows are eagerly anticipated each year, opened by the designer’s trademark cartwheel down the catwalk.

The youthful spirit of the company is kept alive through Johnson’s own playful personality and the design talents of a young staff, including her daughter, Lulu Johnson. Betsey Johnson is the first to admit that her designs have changed little conceptually over her long career, but she is able to manipulate this basic style to suit a contemporary mood. Johnson’s loyalty to her own vision has been crucial to her success and appeal. Kal Ruttenstein, Bloomingdale’s fashion director, recognizes Johnson’s enduring style: “Betsey reinvents herself,” Ruttenstein says. “If she keeps doing what she does, fashion comes around to her every few years.”

—Whitney Blausen; updated by Megan Stacy

JONES, Stephen

British milliner

Born: West Kirby, Cheshire, England, 31 May 1957. Education: Studied at High Wycombe School of Art, 1975–76; B.A. (with honors) in fashion from St. Martin’s School of Art, London, 1979. Military Service: Served as chief petty officer in the Royal Navy, 1974–76. Career: Chairman/designer, Stephen Jones Millinery, from 1981; S.J. Scarves and Miss Jones lines introduced, from 1988; color creator, Shiseido Cosmetics, 1988; Jonesboy and S.J. Handkerchiefs, from 1990; S.J. Kimonos, from 1991; handbag line introduced, 1993; Jonesgirl, Stephen Jones Japan; license for gloves, scarves, and eyewear; opened shop in Covent Garden, 1995; hat featured on British postage stamp, 2001. Exhibitions: Headspace by Stephen Jones, Isetan Museum, Tokyo, 1984; Fashion and Surrealism, Victoria and Albert Museum, London and Fashion Institute of Technology, New York, 1988; Mad Hatter, Australian National Gallery, Canberra, Sydney, 1992; Hats: Status, Style, Glamour, The Collection, London, 1993; Rococo Futura, Ginza Artspace, Tokyo, 1994; Blah, Blah, Blah, London Fashion Week, 2000. Address: 36 Great Queen Street, Covent Garden, London WC2B 5AA, England.

PUBLICATIONS

By JONES:

Articles

- “Heads You Win,” in You magazine of the Mail on Sunday (London), 29 May 1983.
- “England’s Leading Milliner—The Collection,” available online at www.eodel.com/events/milliner.shtml, 18 June 2001.

On JONES:

Books

- Polan, Brenda, The Fashion Year, London, 1983.
- McDowell, Colin, Twentieth Century Fashion, London, 1984.
- Damase, Jacques, L’histoire du chapeaux, Paris, 1987.
- Martin, Richard, Fashion and Surrealism, New York, 1987.
- Mulvagh, Jane, The Vogue History of Twentieth Century Fashion, London, 1988.
- Ginsburg, Madeleine, The Hat, London, 1990.
- McDowell, Colin, Hats: Status, Style, Glamour, London, 1992.
- Stegemeyer, Anne, Who’s Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.

Articles

- Jagger, Harriett, “Making Up is Art to Do,” in the Observer Magazine (London), 11 December 1983.
- “Stephen Jones: Un toque de chapeaux,” in Elle (Paris), September 1984.
- Smith, Liz, “Mad as a Hatter,” in the Standard (London), 23 October 1984.
- “Jones the Hat,” in You magazine of the Mail on Sunday, 2 December 1984.
- Grieve, Amanda, “Hat Check Job,” in Harpers & Queen (London), December 1984.
- “Hats to Turn Heads,” in the Observer (London), 2 June 1985.

- "Stephen Jones: Un Idea per Cappello," in L'Uomo Vogue (Milan), December 1985.
- Gessner, Liz, "Thoroughly Modern Millinery," in WWD, 26 June 1987.
- DuCann, Charlotte, "Keeping Ahead of Jones," in Elle (London), September 1987.
- Barron, Patti, "Thoroughly Modern Millinery," in the Standard (London), 6 October 1987.
- Ranson, Geraldine, "The Hatter Who Flatters," in the Sunday Telegraph (London), 24 April 1988.
- Brampton, Sally, "Just a Trifle Over the Top," in the Observer (London), 3 October 1992.
- McDowell, Colin, "Crown Jewels," in the Sunday Telegraph (London), 8 November 1992.
- Davidson, John, "Crowning Glory," in the Scotsman (Edinburgh), 11 May 1994.
- Rickey, Melanie, "The Milliner's Tale," in the Independent Sunday (London), 7 April 1996.
- Menkes, Suzy, "Luxury and Fantasy: The Feel-Good Factor in Menswear," in the International Herald Tribune (France), 28 January 1997.
- "How U2 Can Look Like This," in the Sunday Telegraph, August 1997.
- Donnelly, Trish, "Fall/Winter French Collections: Galliano Takes Dior on a Trip to Mexico," in the San Francisco Chronicle, 11 March 1998.
- "Behind the Seams," in American Cinematheque, 30 November 2000.
- "Jones, Stephen," in Vogue: The Fashion Designer Database, available online at handbag.com, 18 June 2001.
- Hayes, David, and Harriet Arkell, "Milliners Stamp Their Designs on Ascot as Horses Go to Post," in the Evening Standard (London), 19 June 2001.

*

Hats for me are an expression of the spirit. They can parallel the whole range of human emotions and may exaggerate them to dramatic effect. The expression of an eye can be enhanced by the particular line of a brim, a Roman profile concealed or enhanced by twists of fabric, or the wearer can be veiled with mystery. Whatever effect my hats achieve, they must have, as Diana Vreeland would have said, "Pizazz." Therefore the balance between them and the wearer is all-important; too much emotion in the curl of a feather or the glint of a paillette is vulgar and dominating, too little and the exercise is pointless.

Unlike clothing, novelty is the raison d'être of millinery. I must rewrite the score in every hat I make. Making a hat should be like dancing; as one's body follows the beat, so must one's hands be in rhythm with the tempo of the particular hat. Hats make themselves, I merely help them along.

—Stephen Jones

* * *

When Stephen Jones left St. Martin's School of Art in London in 1979, hats were yet to become high fashion news for the young. Ethnic styles had spread from the mid-1970s onward, drably cloaking the fashion-buying public with serious good taste and leaving little room for wit or fantasy.

The late 1970s, however, brought a glimmer of change. Waists, hips, and padded shoulders were beginning to emerge from shapeless chemises and sloppy knits. What better to complete this new silhouette than an amusing and frivolous piece of headgear? Many of London's young clubgoers had first appeared on the scene wearing the spiky aggressive trappings of punk. They were new to this glamour born of Hollywood retro-kitsch and embraced it wholeheartedly, and Jones entered right on cue.

Jones was a champion of the eccentric, the stylish, and the innovative. He could be seen emerging from the morning train at Paddington, dressed like the other commuters in smart pinstriped suiting but with black patent stilettos emerging from his immaculate turnups. He was a great ornament to the clubs and parties of the era, usually wearing one of his own asymmetric and intriguing hats perched on his bald head. An enthusiastic self-publicist, his charm and good humor endeared him to many.

Jones' salons—the first in Covent Garden's P.X.—were unique environments, swathed in lush fabric and dripping with gilt cupids, where one might gaze leisurely at his always astonishing and delightful creations. He reinterpreted the chic and quirky styles of the past, cleverly draping, molding, and trimming his hats in a way so personal as to be entirely of its own time. Moreover, Jones' hats are well crafted—a reflection of early work at the traditional couture house of Lachasse.

Jones was soon a fast-rising star in the heady London galaxy of the early 1980s. His talent and that of his peers—Bodymap, Stephen Linard—burst on the scene like a vivid fireworks display, drawing the world's fashion buyers and press as moths to the British flame. During the following decades, Jones' esoterically titled collections—Sunset on Suburbia, Ole' Steamy, Passport to Pleasure—continued to delight and inspire, and he must take due credit for the current popularity of hats among the young. His designs have even attracted the attention and heads of such musical stars as Madonna and U2, and were featured in multiple films including Steven Spielberg's Jurassic Park (1993) and Disney's 101 Dalmations (1996). Further proof of his influence and fame came in 2001 when one of his hats was featured on a British postage stamp.

Millinery remains a popular subject on fashion course timetables, whereas two decades ago it was fast becoming an endangered species. Jones himself, in fact, admits to hardly keeping up with demand during the show season. He begins meeting with designers in early winter, when he collects ideas and forms a general impression of the designers' moods. The process continues through the next two months as designers choose from sketches, view prototypes, and make a final selection mere days before a show is to begin. The grueling routine is repeated through spring and summer, only to begin again in the fall. Yet Jones thrives on the excitement and stress, using it to draw out his creative energies. More recent work was from the school of maximalism: three-foot plastic Stetsons, Christmas trees, full body-length Indian headdresses, even hats made from painted macaroni noodles and cardboard.

Jones' talents have naturally taken him abroad; he continuously designs for top French fashion houses—Gaultier, Montana, Mugler, Christian Dior—and enjoys much success in Japan with a line called Jonesgirls, in which genuinely innovative design skills allied with Western charisma are justly lauded. American designer Jeremy Scott has also called upon Jones to complete his “king of kitsch” look. Other young milliners have arisen, some to stay and some to go, but Stephen Jones was the first of this new breed, and has remained one of its most influential and quixotic practitioners.

—Alan J. Flux; updated by Carrie Snyder

JONES NEW YORK

American retailer and design firm

Incorporated: by Sidney Kimmel as Jones New York, 1975. Company History: Acquired several licenses and became America's fastest-growing apparel company, 1980s; sales fell and company approached bankruptcy, 1987; went public, 1990; launched Rena Rowan for Saville label, 1991; purchased Evan-Picone brand, 1992; surpassed $1 billion in sales, 1996; licensed Lauren by Ralph Lauren, 1996, and Ralph by Ralph Lauren, 1998; launched Jones New York menswear program and purchased Sun Apparel, 1998; purchased Nine West Group and Todd Oldham, 1999; acquired Canadian Ralph Lauren licenses, repositioned Evan-Picone, and acquired Victoria & Company, 2000; designer Rena Rowan retired after 25 years with company, 2000. Company Address: 250 Rittenhouse Circle, Bristol, PA 19007, USA. Company Website: www.jonesnewyork.com.

PUBLICATIONS

On JONES NEW YORK:

Books

Derdak, Thomas, ed., International Directory of Company Histories, Chicago, 1988.

Articles

Lockwood, Lisa, “Jones: Keeping Up with the Laurens,” in WWD, 17 July 1998.

“Jones New York Offers First Watch Line for Men,” in DNR, 8 January 1999.

“Jones New York,” in Women's Wear Daily's Fairchild 100 Supplement, November 1999.

Solnik, Claude, “Jones Buys Back Bags,” in Footwear News (New York), 15 November 1999.

“G-III Gets License for Jones New York Outerwear,” in DNR, 17 March 2000.

“Jones Apparel Acquires Polo's Canadian Licenses,” in DNR, 7 April 2000.

D'Innocenzo, Anne, “Jones to Swing Some NWG Lines Into Fast-Track Mass Market,” in Footwear News (New York) 29 May 2000.

Cunningham, Thomas, “Jones Men's Facing Uncertain Future,” in DNR, 20 November 2000.

Wilson, Eric, “Polo-Jones New Deal, in WWD, 16 November 2000.

* * *

Jones Apparel Group, U.S.-based marketer of moderate women's suits, dresses, and sportswear under the Jones New York trademark,

was incorporated in 1975 by Sidney Kimmel, an executive with two decades of apparel industry experience. His goal was to create clothes similar in style and quality to expensive designer fashions but at an affordable price.

Kimmel's fashion career began at a knitting mill, after which he became president of Villager, Inc., the women's sportswear firm. He remained there until 1969, when W. R. Grace & Company, which wanted to increase its presence in women's apparel, hired Kimmel as head of its new women's clothing division. Villager knitwear designer Rena Rowan joined him.

In 1975, W. R. Grace spun off the division to Kimmel and Gerard Rubin. They renamed the business Jones Apparel Group and went after the inexpensive designer lookalike market. The company's first five years were difficult, marked by debt and low cash reserves. All the same, management adhered to an aggressive growth strategy, launching new labels and acquiring rights to others. Its most successful brand was its Jones New York $100 to $300 careerwear line.

Jones New York generated steady demand in an era when women were entering the workforce and wanted affordable yet fashionable clothing. The company's practice of outsourcing manufacturing while concentrating on marketing, distribution, and design was sound. It achieved profitability at the beginning of the 1980s and, within a few years, became one of the fastest-growing U.S. apparel companies.

By the mid-1980s, the company boasted sales of $250 million, making it the leading supplier of moderate women's apparel. But Jones' fast growth and heavy debt, combined with poor acquisitions—including Murjani's Gloria Vanderbilt Jeans, for which Jones had purchased marketing but not manufacturing, pricing, inventory, or delivery rights and lost $20 million—left the company near bankruptcy. In 1987 creditors demanded a reorganization that required the firm to divest many of its licensed labels (although it kept some, such as Christian Dior), lay off employees, and close divisions and warehouses. The reorganization helped almost immediately, with the company showing a profit, albeit a small one, in 1988, after two years of declining sales and earnings.

The Jones New York label led the way for a growth spurt that continued into the mid-1990s. Consumers fought tight budgets during the era's economic recession by buying Jones New York rather than pricey designer apparel. In 1990 management took the firm public, with Kimmel retaining 45 percent ownership. The following year, 1991, Jones Apparel launched Rena Rowan for Saville, priced slightly below Jones New York. Two years later, Rena Rowan was the firm's fastest-growing label and accounted for 15 percent of company sales. Jones New York continued to expand, with its Sport line accounting for about 20 percent of sales; other related labels included Jones & Company, Jones New York Dress, and Jones New York Suits.

Jones Apparel Group purchased the Evan-Picone brand for $105 million in 1992. It also began to extend distribution from its base of department stores (which continued to dominate sales) and catalogues, adding 100 high-margin factory outlet stores across the U.S. (as of 2000, the company operated 970 specialty and 590 outlet stores.) By 1994, revenues were up to $600 million, and in 1996, they passed the $1-billion mark.

The success of the Lauren lines resulted in some changes for Jones New York. The company launched the first Jones New York advertising campaign in 15 years. While its labels, which now included Jones

Western charisma are justly lauded. American designer Jeremy Scott has also called upon Jones to complete his “king of kitsch” look. Other young milliners have arisen, some to stay and some to go, but Stephen Jones was the first of this new breed, and has remained one of its most influential and quixotic practitioners.

—Alan J. Flux; updated by Carrie Snyder

JONES NEW YORK

American retailer and design firm

Incorporated: by Sidney Kimmel as Jones New York, 1975. Company History: Acquired several licenses and became America's fastest-growing apparel company, 1980s; sales fell and company approached bankruptcy, 1987; went public, 1990; launched Rena Rowan for Saville label, 1991; purchased Evan-Picone brand, 1992; surpassed $1 billion in sales, 1996; licensed Lauren by Ralph Lauren, 1996, and Ralph by Ralph Lauren, 1998; launched Jones New York menswear program and purchased Sun Apparel, 1998; purchased Nine West Group and Todd Oldham, 1999; acquired Canadian Ralph Lauren licenses, repositioned Evan-Picone, and acquired Victoria & Company, 2000; designer Rena Rowan retired after 25 years with company, 2000. Company Address: 250 Rittenhouse Circle, Bristol, PA 19007, USA. Company Website: www.jonesnewyork.com.

PUBLICATIONS

On JONES NEW YORK:

Books

Derdak, Thomas, ed., International Directory of Company Histories, Chicago, 1988.

Articles

- Lockwood, Lisa, “Jones: Keeping Up with the Laurens,” in WWD, 17 July 1998.
- “Jones New York Offers First Watch Line for Men,” in DNR, 8 January 1999.
- “Jones New York,” in Women's Wear Daily's Fairchild 100 Supplement, November 1999.
- Solnik, Claude, “Jones Buys Back Bags,” in Footwear News (New York), 15 November 1999.
- “G-III Gets License for Jones New York Outerwear,” in DNR, 17 March 2000.
- “Jones Apparel Acquires Polo's Canadian Licenses,” in DNR, 7 April 2000.
- D'Innocenzo, Anne, “Jones to Swing Some NWG Lines Into Fast-Track Mass Market,” in Footwear News (New York) 29 May 2000.
- Cunningham, Thomas, “Jones Men's Facing Uncertain Future,” in DNR, 20 November 2000.
- Wilson, Eric, “Polo-Jones New Deal, in WWD, 16 November 2000.

* * *

Jones Apparel Group, U.S.-based marketer of moderate women's suits, dresses, and sportswear under the Jones New York trademark,

was incorporated in 1975 by Sidney Kimmel, an executive with two decades of apparel industry experience. His goal was to create clothes similar in style and quality to expensive designer fashions but at an affordable price.

Kimmel's fashion career began at a knitting mill, after which he became president of Villager, Inc., the women's sportswear firm. He remained there until 1969, when W. R. Grace & Company, which wanted to increase its presence in women's apparel, hired Kimmel as head of its new women's clothing division. Villager knitwear designer Rena Rowan joined him.

In 1975, W. R. Grace spun off the division to Kimmel and Gerard Rubin. They renamed the business Jones Apparel Group and went after the inexpensive designer lookalike market. The company's first five years were difficult, marked by debt and low cash reserves. All the same, management adhered to an aggressive growth strategy, launching new labels and acquiring rights to others. Its most successful brand was its Jones New York $100 to $300 careerwear line.

Jones New York generated steady demand in an era when women were entering the workforce and wanted affordable yet fashionable clothing. The company's practice of outsourcing manufacturing while concentrating on marketing, distribution, and design was sound. It achieved profitability at the beginning of the 1980s and, within a few years, became one of the fastest-growing U.S. apparel companies.

By the mid-1980s, the company boasted sales of $250 million, making it the leading supplier of moderate women's apparel. But Jones' fast growth and heavy debt, combined with poor acquisitions—including Murjani's Gloria Vanderbilt Jeans, for which Jones had purchased marketing but not manufacturing, pricing, inventory, or delivery rights and lost $20 million—left the company near bankruptcy. In 1987 creditors demanded a reorganization that required the firm to divest many of its licensed labels (although it kept some, such as Christian Dior), lay off employees, and close divisions and warehouses. The reorganization helped almost immediately, with the company showing a profit, albeit a small one, in 1988, after two years of declining sales and earnings.

The Jones New York label led the way for a growth spurt that continued into the mid-1990s. Consumers fought tight budgets during the era's economic recession by buying Jones New York rather than pricey designer apparel. In 1990 management took the firm public, with Kimmel retaining 45 percent ownership. The following year, 1991, Jones Apparel launched Rena Rowan for Saville, priced slightly below Jones New York. Two years later, Rena Rowan was the firm's fastest-growing label and accounted for 15 percent of company sales. Jones New York continued to expand, with its Sport line accounting for about 20 percent of sales; other related labels included Jones & Company, Jones New York Dress, and Jones New York Suits.

Jones Apparel Group purchased the Evan-Picone brand for $105 million in 1992. It also began to extend distribution from its base of department stores (which continued to dominate sales) and catalogues, adding 100 high-margin factory outlet stores across the U.S. (as of 2000, the company operated 970 specialty and 590 outlet stores.) By 1994, revenues were up to $600 million, and in 1996, they passed the $1-billion mark.

The success of the Lauren lines resulted in some changes for Jones New York. The company launched the first Jones New York advertising campaign in 15 years. While its labels, which now included Jones

Jeans and Jones New York Country, dominated moderate apparel in department stores, Jones New York's competitors had created recognized lifestyle images through advertising, something Jones New York had not done. In 1996, Jones Apparel Group launched the licensed Lauren by Ralph Lauren line, which, with heavy advertising, grew to $350 million in sales in 1998, when Jones added the Ralph by Ralph Lauren label. Lauren has continued to play a significant role in the company's fortunes. In 2000, Jones acquired the Canadian licenses for several Polo brands and forged a deal to export its licensed Lauren and Ralph brands overseas, its initial foray into foreign markets.

Jones also extended the label into other categories, including jewelry, swimwear, footwear, watches, and handbags through licensing. All products were advertised and cross-promoted with the core Jones New York line. By the late 1990s, the company had retaken control of some of those licenses, bringing footwear and handbags in-house.

In fall 1998, Jones launched a Jones New York menswear program, which it expanded further by signing several licensing agreements, such as for men's leather, outerwear, and tailored clothing. Menswear turned out to be a tough business, however. Despite repositioning the line from collection to main-floor pricing, Jones failed to receive orders from some of its key customers for spring 2001, leading it to consider closing down the division.

On the acquisition front, Jones purchased Sun Apparel, a jeanswear and sportswear company and Polo Jeans licensee, in 1998; Todd Oldham in 1999; and Victoria & Company, a designer and marketer of Givenchy, Tommy Hilfiger, Napier, Richelieu, and Nine West costume jewelry, in 2000. Another major purchase was the Nine West Group in 1999, the footwear marketer's brands included Nine West, Amalfi, Bandolino, Luca B. for Calico, cK/Calvin Klein, 9 & Company, Pappagallo, Pied à Terre, and Selby. In 2000, Jones began repositioning several of those brands, along with Evan-Picone, into the mass market.

Acquisitions boosted total company volume to more than $4.5 billion in 2000. Designer and cofounder Rena Rowan announced her retirement that year, but Sidney Kimmel remained chairman. Over the past two and a half decades, the two partners supplemented their flagship Jones New York career collections by moving into new brands, markets, customer bases, price points, and distribution channels—expansion that promises to continue.

—Karen Raugust

Wolfgang Joop, fall 2001 collection. © AP/Wide World Photos/Fashion Wire Daily.

Joop! Homme. Address: Harvestehuder Weg 22, 2000 Hamburg 13, Germany.

PUBLICATIONS

On JOOP:

Books

Stegemeyer, Anne, Who's Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.

Articles

Morais, Richard, "Who is First in the Market, Sells," in Forbes, 16 September 1991.

Morris, Belinda, "Talking Fashion," in FHM (London), September 1993.

Drier, Melissa, "Joop Files 2 Suits Against CEO Frommen," WWD, 4 March 1997.

Larsen, Soren, "Joop Adds Scent to Garden Party," WWD, 18 July 1997.

Knight, Molly, "There's Hope for Joop," online at Fashion.com, www.fashion.com, July 2001.

JOOP, Wolfgang

German designer

Born: Potsdam, Germany, 18 November 1944. Family: Married Karin Bernatzky; children: Henriette, Florentine. Career: Journalist, Neue Mode; freelance designer for Christian Aujard, Brecco, and others; showed first fur collection under own label, 1978; added Joop! ready-to-wear line, 1981; added menswear line, 1985; opened Joop! boutiques, Hamburg and Munich, 1986; introduced fragrances, 1987; added Joop jeans, 1989; introduced ready-to-wear fur collection, 1990; menswear introduced in the U.S., 1994; reintroduced leather, 1996; fragrances include Joop! Berlin, Joop! Femme, and

Jeans and Jones New York Country, dominated moderate apparel in department stores, Jones New York's competitors had created recognized lifestyle images through advertising, something Jones New York had not done. In 1996, Jones Apparel Group launched the licensed Lauren by Ralph Lauren line, which, with heavy advertising, grew to $350 million in sales in 1998, when Jones added the Ralph by Ralph Lauren label. Lauren has continued to play a significant role in the company's fortunes. In 2000, Jones acquired the Canadian licenses for several Polo brands and forged a deal to export its licensed Lauren and Ralph brands overseas, its initial foray into foreign markets.

Jones also extended the label into other categories, including jewelry, swimwear, footwear, watches, and handbags through licensing. All products were advertised and cross-promoted with the core Jones New York line. By the late 1990s, the company had retaken control of some of those licenses, bringing footwear and handbags in-house.

In fall 1998, Jones launched a Jones New York menswear program, which it expanded further by signing several licensing agreements, such as for men's leather, outerwear, and tailored clothing. Menswear turned out to be a tough business, however. Despite repositioning the line from collection to main-floor pricing, Jones failed to receive orders from some of its key customers for spring 2001, leading it to consider closing down the division.

On the acquisition front, Jones purchased Sun Apparel, a jeanswear and sportswear company and Polo Jeans licensee, in 1998; Todd Oldham in 1999; and Victoria & Company, a designer and marketer of Givenchy, Tommy Hilfiger, Napier, Richelieu, and Nine West costume jewelry, in 2000. Another major purchase was the Nine West Group in 1999, the footwear marketer's brands included Nine West, Amalfi, Bandolino, Luca B. for Calico, cK/Calvin Klein, 9 & Company, Pappagallo, Pied à Terre, and Selby. In 2000, Jones began repositioning several of those brands, along with Evan-Picone, into the mass market.

Acquisitions boosted total company volume to more than $4.5 billion in 2000. Designer and cofounder Rena Rowan announced her retirement that year, but Sidney Kimmel remained chairman. Over the past two and a half decades, the two partners supplemented their flagship Jones New York career collections by moving into new brands, markets, customer bases, price points, and distribution channels—expansion that promises to continue.

—Karen Raugust

Wolfgang Joop, fall 2001 collection. © AP/Wide World Photos/Fashion Wire Daily.

Joop! Homme. Address: Harvestehuder Weg 22, 2000 Hamburg 13, Germany.

PUBLICATIONS

On JOOP:

Books

Stegemeyer, Anne, Who's Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.

Articles

Morais, Richard, "Who is First in the Market, Sells," in Forbes, 16 September 1991.

Morris, Belinda, "Talking Fashion," in FHM (London), September 1993.

Drier, Melissa, "Joop Files 2 Suits Against CEO Frommen," WWD, 4 March 1997.

Larsen, Soren, "Joop Adds Scent to Garden Party," WWD, 18 July 1997.

Knight, Molly, "There's Hope for Joop," online at Fashion.com, www.fashion.com, July 2001.

JOOP, Wolfgang

German designer

Born: Potsdam, Germany, 18 November 1944. Family: Married Karin Bernatzky; children: Henriette, Florentine. Career: Journalist, Neue Mode; freelance designer for Christian Aujard, Brecco, and others; showed first fur collection under own label, 1978; added Joop! ready-to-wear line, 1981; added menswear line, 1985; opened Joop! boutiques, Hamburg and Munich, 1986; introduced fragrances, 1987; added Joop jeans, 1989; introduced ready-to-wear fur collection, 1990; menswear introduced in the U.S., 1994; reintroduced leather, 1996; fragrances include Joop! Berlin, Joop! Femme, and Wolfgang Joop, fall 2001 collection. © AP/Wide World Photos/Fashion Wire Daily.

* * *

Photogenic Wolfgang Joop is at least as recognizable as his fashion and fragrance products. Along with Jil Sander, one of the major figures of German fashion in the 1990s, Joop is as much a national anomaly as he is an international celebrity. Until Sander and Joop, Germany had few designers of sexy clothing achieving world-class status: suddenly, after years in Germany, both came into international recognition in the early 1990s.

Joop, the design identity with an exclamation point, is the hyper-real, hyperbolic badge of the designer. He has brought the American concept of the designer to Germany, with its strong sense of personal identification and the projection of style. Again and again, he appears charismatically, if a little too prominently, in his own imagery. Further, as he describes in a 1993 press release, "When it comes to designing the men's collection, the man I have in mind for the clothes is myself."

When Joop bought an apartment in New York in 1993, it was the former apartment of Bill Blass, for Joop has cleverly understood the impulse of contemporary fashion marketing to personification and projection. He has expressed his admiration for the work of American minimalists and marketing prodigies Donna Karan and Calvin Klein.

Like Blass, Joop projects utmost self-confidence in style, an aplomb that allows him the polymath aptitude to design for menswear, women's apparel, and fragrance. In examining himself, he gives some surety in the ambiguous realms of style.

In telling his own story in a 1993 press release, with a merchant's beguiling fluency, Joop cites as an important influence growing up on a farm near Potsdam: "As the city of Philip the Great it was one of the poorest of the European courts, but the one with the most style," thus enjoying both a simple life and a proximity to high style. His statements on fashion lean to the populist, though his clothing is always on the well-mannered side of democracy (he called a fragrance Joop! Berlin after the fall of the Berlin Wall in 1989). He avers: "Fashion should not just be a blatant expression of money. It should be humorous and give dignity to the individual wearing the clothes."

Among his greatest successes have been jeanswear, likewise in the optimistic spirit of American style and ready-to-wear populism. But the Joop denim collections are not standard: fit, size, and style distinctions bring to the lowly subject of jeans at least a rudiment of tailoring and individuation. Joop's principle is that the ready-to-wear client, even in denim, must be served with a kind of customized distinction and satisfaction, again very much in the ethos of traditional American sportswear. Joop contends that "jeans are fashion's alter ego," and it is his conviction that jeans are part of daily life. His collections work for both casual dress and contemporary high style.

Essentially, Joop thinks fashion is about suspense and surprise and fantasy, not about rules. Flirting with incongruity, he mixes traditional clothing with new fashion, throwing a kimono over a little shift dress, pairing bobby socks with high heels, or mixing military styles with classic schoolgirl/schoolboy fashion items. He also designs his own prints. Having seen countless trends in the fashion industry, he has merged archived print designs with current trends, imparting a contemporary retro look.

At one time a leather clothing designer in Italy, Joop reintroduced leather into his collection in 1996, taking advantage of the new treatments that revolutionized the leather industry. Much lighter and easier to manipulate, the new leather allowed color possibilities beyond the traditional blacks and browns. Yet this collection and subsequent ones featured traditional leather jackets, pants, and dresses in neutral shades.

Joop in the 21st century featured fur-trimmed articles inspired by screen legends Greta Garbo and Marlene Dietrich. In an interview with Molly Knight, a fashion writer for www.fashion.com, Joop declared, "Dietrich was the best designer ever. She combined day and evening wear as well as men's and women's—it was the old glamor."

—Richard Martin; updated by Christine Miner Minderovic

JOSEPH

See ETTEDGUI, Joseph

JOURDAN, Charles

French footwear designer

Born: 1883. Career: Foreman at Établissements Grenier, shoe leather cutters, 1917; independent shoe manufacturer, 1919; Seducta, Wolfgang Joop, fall 2001 collection. © AP/Wide World Photos/Fashion Wire Daily.

* * *

Photogenic Wolfgang Joop is at least as recognizable as his fashion and fragrance products. Along with Jil Sander, one of the major figures of German fashion in the 1990s, Joop is as much a national anomaly as he is an international celebrity. Until Sander and Joop, Germany had few designers of sexy clothing achieving world-class status: suddenly, after years in Germany, both came into international recognition in the early 1990s.

Joop, the design identity with an exclamation point, is the hyper-real, hyperbolic badge of the designer. He has brought the American concept of the designer to Germany, with its strong sense of personal identification and the projection of style. Again and again, he appears charismatically, if a little too prominently, in his own imagery. Further, as he describes in a 1993 press release, "When it comes to designing the men's collection, the man I have in mind for the clothes is myself."

When Joop bought an apartment in New York in 1993, it was the former apartment of Bill Blass, for Joop has cleverly understood the impulse of contemporary fashion marketing to personification and projection. He has expressed his admiration for the work of American minimalists and marketing prodigies Donna Karan and Calvin Klein.

Like Blass, Joop projects utmost self-confidence in style, an aplomb that allows him the polymath aptitude to design for menswear, women's apparel, and fragrance. In examining himself, he gives some surety in the ambiguous realms of style.

In telling his own story in a 1993 press release, with a merchant's beguiling fluency, Joop cites as an important influence growing up on a farm near Potsdam: "As the city of Philip the Great it was one of the poorest of the European courts, but the one with the most style," thus enjoying both a simple life and a proximity to high style. His statements on fashion lean to the populist, though his clothing is always on the well-mannered side of democracy (he called a fragrance Joop! Berlin after the fall of the Berlin Wall in 1989). He avers: "Fashion should not just be a blatant expression of money. It should be humorous and give dignity to the individual wearing the clothes."

Among his greatest successes have been jeanswear, likewise in the optimistic spirit of American style and ready-to-wear populism. But the Joop denim collections are not standard: fit, size, and style distinctions bring to the lowly subject of jeans at least a rudiment of tailoring and individuation. Joop's principle is that the ready-to-wear client, even in denim, must be served with a kind of customized distinction and satisfaction, again very much in the ethos of traditional American sportswear. Joop contends that "jeans are fashion's alter ego," and it is his conviction that jeans are part of daily life. His collections work for both casual dress and contemporary high style.

Essentially, Joop thinks fashion is about suspense and surprise and fantasy, not about rules. Flirting with incongruity, he mixes traditional clothing with new fashion, throwing a kimono over a little shift dress, pairing bobby socks with high heels, or mixing military styles with classic schoolgirl/schoolboy fashion items. He also designs his own prints. Having seen countless trends in the fashion industry, he has merged archived print designs with current trends, imparting a contemporary retro look.

At one time a leather clothing designer in Italy, Joop reintroduced leather into his collection in 1996, taking advantage of the new treatments that revolutionized the leather industry. Much lighter and easier to manipulate, the new leather allowed color possibilities beyond the traditional blacks and browns. Yet this collection and subsequent ones featured traditional leather jackets, pants, and dresses in neutral shades.

Joop in the 21st century featured fur-trimmed articles inspired by screen legends Greta Garbo and Marlene Dietrich. In an interview with Molly Knight, a fashion writer for www.fashion.com, Joop declared, "Dietrich was the best designer ever. She combined day and evening wear as well as men's and women's—it was the old glamor."

—Richard Martin; updated by Christine Miner Minderovic

JOSEPH

See ETTEDGUI, Joseph

JOURDAN, Charles

French footwear designer

Born: 1883. Career: Foreman at Établissements Grenier, shoe leather cutters, 1917; independent shoe manufacturer, 1919; Seducta, a luxury range, introduced in Romans sur Isère, France, 1921; extended distribution to all of France, in the 1930s; after World War II, sons Rene, Charles, and Roland took over factory, adding shoe lines in the mid-1940s; first Charles Jourdan women's boutique in Paris, 1957, and London, 1959; Dior contract with international distribution of shoes under Dior label, 1959; Perugia began designing for Jourdan in early 1960s; first New York boutique, 1968; created bags and ready-to-wear clothing line, 1970s; 21 franchises by 1975; firm continued after Jourdan's death, sons launched menswear and Un Homme fragrance in early 1980s; company bought by Portland Cement Werke in 1981, chief designer: Bernard Sucheras, outside designers commissioned including Hervé Leger for accessories, company specializes in shoes, leather goods, accessories, jewelry, scarves. Exhibitions: Charles Jourdan: 70 Years, Galeries Lafayette, Paris and The Space, Tokyo, both 1991. Collections: Musée de la Chaussure, Romans sur Isère, France; Charles Jourdan Museum, Paris, including 2000 creations by André Perugia. Died: 1976. Company Address: 28, Avenue de New York, 75116 Paris, France. Company Website: www.charles-jourdan.com.

PUBLICATIONS

On JOURDAN:

Books

- Swann, June, Shoes, London, 1982.
- Benaim, L., L'année de la mode, Paris, 1987.
- McDowell, Colin, Shoes, Fashion and Fantasy, London, 1989.
- Grumbach, D., Histoires de la mode, Paris, 1994.
- Wilson, Eunice, A History of Shoe Fashions, Theatre Arts Books, n.d.

Articles

- "Dateline Paris," Footwear News (New York), 15 April 1985.
- Cohen, Edie Lee, "Charles Jourdan Monsieur," in Interior Design, September 1986.
- "The Added Essence of Elegance: Charles Jourdan," Elle (London), September 1987.
- "Flirtations of a High-Heeled Pump," Vogue (London), September 1987.
- Pringle, C., "Quoi de neuf?," Vogue (Paris), October 1987.
- "La couture a quatre mains," Vogue (Paris), August 1992.
- Anniss, Elisa, "French Connection," Shoe and Leather News, November 1992.
- "Le jeux de la métier," Liberation (Paris), March 1993.

* * *

Charles Jourdan, a shoe manufacturer, made the name Jourdan synonymous with couture by licensing and diversifying in the manner of the Paris haute couture houses. No other footwear company has so successfully marketed its image, and eight decades later Jourdan still symbolizes luxury, international fashion, and the best of couture.

The founder of the company, Charles Jourdan, was both a skilled craftsman and creative businessman. His aim was to produce shoes of quality, made with the best materials and the traditional skills of a böttier. He also recognized that many of these skills could be translated into the much larger ready-to-wear market, producing affordable luxury shoes. Jourdan believed in the power of advertising. As his business expanded during the 1930s he used a network of commercial travelers to introduce his brands across the whole of France, backing up this sales force with advertisement in popular magazines—a new concept at the time.

His styles were not trendsetting but their classic luxurious look succeeded. He produced perfectly handcrafted ladies shoes that could be worn in harmony with elegant outfits; not that these first simple styles were influenced by the direction of Parisian fashion. The only thing Jourdan had in common with his contemporaries Poiret, Schiaparelli, and Chanel, was that he also used only the finest materials. He did, however, benefit from the new higher hemline which raised the visibility of shoes, making them a much more important accessory in the modern woman's wardrobe.

The economic crisis of the 1930s, followed by the war, drastically affected the couture market, which could not cheapen its products. Jourdan, ever ready to diversify, recognized price was an important selling factor at all levels of the market, and he introduced new lines at lower prices. He sold to the newly emerging chain stores, and the Jourdan empire grew.

In the 1950s Jourdan's three sons began managing the business. The youngest son, Roland Jourdan, who was responsible for design and development, has been described as "the most able man in the shoe industry." He was fully aware that it was simplicity and quality, not wild innovation, that sold Jourdan shoes. When Jourdan's first boutique opened in Paris in 1957, Roland Jourdan only offered a small range of styles. But each style was available in 20 colors, all sizes, and three widths. At Jourdan, not only would the shoe fit, but it would also perfectly accessorize any shade of outfit.

The ultimate connection of the luxury shoe brand to haute couture came with the contract between Jourdan and the house of Christian Dior in 1959. Jourdan created, manufactured, and distributed shoe models for Dior worldwide; it was the ultimate seal of approval. The next two decades saw Jourdan at its most successful and creative—the company launched a series of seminal advertising campaigns that profoundly influenced both fashion and advertising. In the 1960s they commissioned Guy Bourdin, a young Parisian photographer, who produced a series of surreal, witty, and often visually stunning advertising photographs. The images usually had nothing to do with shoes, and the name "Charles Jourdan" appeared as a small caption in one corner. It is difficult now to imagine the impact of this campaign, but its success was such that for a time the brand became associated with a sense of innovation and modernity that the shoes themselves, perfect creations though they were, did not really possess.

The Jourdan boutique design helped perpetuate the company's innovative image. The ultra modern interiors and striking window displays of the first Paris boutique became a blueprint for a chain in every fashion capital of the world. It was the environment which created the Jourdan look, one extended at its peak in 1979 from neckties to sunglasses, allowing the dedicated customer to be completely Jourdan accessorized.

Jourdan achieved a level of product diversification unsurpassed in the footwear industry. Borrowing the haute couture strategies of licensing and franchising, and creating a global presence, Charles Jourdan became the couture accessory. This success attracted competition: new names such as Bruno Magli and Robert Clergerie were concentrating solely on footwear. The diversity that had made Jourdan so big suddenly threatened to dilute the brand name's exclusivity. Finally, the loyal customer base was growing older, and a new generation of women found alternative designers outside the classic couture mold.

In 1981 the family's dynastic control of the empire ended with the retirement of Roland Jourdan. The name and company survived and thrived, as true luxury would never be out of fashion. The continuing success of Jourdan, however, was also due to prescience—like bringing menswear into the fold in the early 1980s, and building a flagship store in New York City. In 1986, the town of Romans, France, paid tribute to the company and its founder through the dedication of a street, rue de Charles Jourdan.

In the 1990s, newer and younger lines were introduced yet still evincing the sleek, elegant style for which the Jourdan name is famous. The company went online with the Charles Jourdan website in 1997, one of the earliest couture houses to do so, and opened new boutiques in Australia, France, Germany, Israel, the Middle East, Russia, and the U.S. over the next two years. In 1999, the company redesigned its image and brand, creating an updated "visual identity" befitting the coming millennium. Charles Jourdan remains an important name in the fashion world, because its enduring strength is the recognition that what any man or woman really wants in shoewear or clothing, is the simply the perfect fit.

—Chris Hill; updated by Nelly Rhodes

JULIAN, Alexander

American designer

Born: Chapel Hill, North Carolina, 8 February 1948. Education: Graduated from the University of North Carolina, Chapel Hill, North Carolina, 1969; self-taught in design. Family: Married Lynn (divorced); married Meagan, 1987; children: Alystyre, Will. Career: Worked in his father's Chapel Hill menswear store to 1969; menswear designer/retailer with own store, Alexander's Ambition, Chapel Hill, 1969–75; founder/designer, Alexander Julian Company, New York, from 1975; showed first collection, 1975; introduced popular priced Colours by Alexander Julian line, 1981; launched womenswear line, 1983; Colours by Alexander Julian for Boys, and Watercolours swimwear line, 1984; Colours girlswear and hosiery collection, 1984; introduced home furnishing line, 1985; Alexander Julian Enterprises men's couture line and Colours luggage collection, 1988; created fragrance for women, 1991; designed uniforms for the Charlotte (North Carolina) Hornets professional basketball team, 1988, and the Charlotte Knights semiprofessional baseball team, 1990; designed the Knights Stadium, 1990; licensed Windsong for sportswear worldwide and American Trouser for bottoms, 1996; expanded home furnishings, mid- to late 1990s; signed Couristan for rugs, 1997; signed tailored menswear license with PBM, 1998; rebranded main floor collection as Alexander Julian, removing "Colours" from the identity, 1999; rebranded home collection under Alexander Julian at Home, 2000; signed home décor deal with retailer Lowe's, 2000. Awards: Coty American Fashion Critics award, 1977, 1979, 1981, 1983, 1984; Cutty Sark award, 1980, 1985, 1988; Men's Woolknit Design award, 1981; Council of Fashion Designers of America award, 1981; Color Marketing Group's Forrest L. Dimmick award for Excellence in Color Marketing, 1998. Address: 63 Cops Hill Road, Ridgefield, CT 06877, USA.

PUBLICATIONS

On JULIAN:

Books

Stegemeyer, Anne, Who's Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.

Articles

Burggraf, Helen, "Profile: Alexander Julian," in Men's Apparel News, 6 January 1981.

Boyagian, Paula, "Alexander Julian," in Fashion Retailer, October 1983.

Schwartz, Tony, "Coats of Many Colors," in New York, 24 September 1984.

Fressola, Peter, "Alexander Julian," in DNR, 1 March 1988.

Barol, Bill, "Pastels on the Hardwood," in Newsweek, 3 October 1988.

"The Americans: Alexander Julian," in DNR, 15 August 1989.

Cameron, Victoria Pearson, "Why So Blue? (Men's Fashions)" in Esquire, March 1991.

Spevack, Rachel, "Julian's Colours Label Making a Comeback," in DNR, 6 February 1996.

Wyman, Lissa, "Julian for Couristan: Complete Home," in HFN, 14 July 1997.

"Big and Brights: A Designer and His Wife Play with Color and Scale in Their Hardworking Kitchen," in Country Living, November 1997.

Gellers, Stan, "Alexander Julian Now Colours PBM's Clothing World," in DNR, 23 November 1998.

Howell, Debbie, "Lowe's Signs Alexander Julian, Gives Home Décor Biz Big Push," in Discount Store News, 20 March 2000.

* * *

Alexander Julian stated his philosophy in his Colours collection, first launched in 1981: "I believe in men who want to dress in their own image and not according to any singular vision that would have all men appear alike."

Julian was born in Chapel Hill, North Carolina, and grew up in the retail environment of his father's shop, which Alexander managed from the age of 16. He moved to New York in 1975, winning the prestigious Coty Men's Wear award for the first time in 1977, and became the youngest designer to be included in the Coty Hall of Fame. Julian had citations on the U.S. International Best Dressed List for nine consecutive years and has won nearly all the most prestigious fashion design awards in the United States.

Julian was one of the first U.S. men's clothing designers to create his own exclusive fabrics by working with European mills and exploring a broad range of color with a special eye for innovative and unusual color effects. Since the launch of Colours by Alexander Julian in 1981, a well-priced collection reflecting the use of color and texture that had become Julian's signature on his couture menswear collection, the Colours range has expanded beyond menswear in the U.S. to include outerwear, furnishings, sleepwear, leather goods, belts, bed linens, eyewear, and women's and men's fragrances. Today the collections are a worldwide multimillion-dollar business, with licensees in Japan, Mexico, Canada, and the U.K., where the imaginative color palette, changing each season, is a novelty in British menswear.

In 1981 the family's dynastic control of the empire ended with the retirement of Roland Jourdan. The name and company survived and thrived, as true luxury would never be out of fashion. The continuing success of Jourdan, however, was also due to prescience—like bringing menswear into the fold in the early 1980s, and building a flagship store in New York City. In 1986, the town of Romans, France, paid tribute to the company and its founder through the dedication of a street, rue de Charles Jourdan.

In the 1990s, newer and younger lines were introduced yet still evincing the sleek, elegant style for which the Jourdan name is famous. The company went online with the Charles Jourdan website in 1997, one of the earliest couture houses to do so, and opened new boutiques in Australia, France, Germany, Israel, the Middle East, Russia, and the U.S. over the next two years. In 1999, the company redesigned its image and brand, creating an updated "visual identity" befitting the coming millennium. Charles Jourdan remains an important name in the fashion world, because its enduring strength is the recognition that what any man or woman really wants in shoewear or clothing, is the simply the perfect fit.

—Chris Hill; updated by Nelly Rhodes

JULIAN, Alexander

American designer

Born: Chapel Hill, North Carolina, 8 February 1948. Education: Graduated from the University of North Carolina, Chapel Hill, North Carolina, 1969; self-taught in design. Family: Married Lynn (divorced); married Meagan, 1987; children: Alystyre, Will. Career: Worked in his father's Chapel Hill menswear store to 1969; menswear designer/retailer with own store, Alexander's Ambition, Chapel Hill, 1969–75; founder/designer, Alexander Julian Company, New York, from 1975; showed first collection, 1975; introduced popular priced Colours by Alexander Julian line, 1981; launched womenswear line, 1983; Colours by Alexander Julian for Boys, and Watercolours swimwear line, 1984; Colours girlswear and hosiery collection, 1984; introduced home furnishing line, 1985; Alexander Julian Enterprises men's couture line and Colours luggage collection, 1988; created fragrance for women, 1991; designed uniforms for the Charlotte (North Carolina) Hornets professional basketball team, 1988, and the Charlotte Knights semiprofessional baseball team, 1990; designed the Knights Stadium, 1990; licensed Windsong for sportswear worldwide and American Trouser for bottoms, 1996; expanded home furnishings, mid- to late 1990s; signed Couristan for rugs, 1997; signed tailored menswear license with PBM, 1998; rebranded main floor collection as Alexander Julian, removing "Colours" from the identity, 1999; rebranded home collection under Alexander Julian at Home, 2000; signed home décor deal with retailer Lowe's, 2000. Awards: Coty American Fashion Critics award, 1977, 1979, 1981, 1983, 1984; Cutty Sark award, 1980, 1985, 1988; Men's Woolknit Design award, 1981; Council of Fashion Designers of America award, 1981; Color Marketing Group's Forrest L. Dimmick award for Excellence in Color Marketing, 1998. Address: 63 Cops Hill Road, Ridgefield, CT 06877, USA.

PUBLICATIONS

On JULIAN:

Books

Stegemeyer, Anne, Who's Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.

Articles

Burggraf, Helen, "Profile: Alexander Julian," in Men's Apparel News, 6 January 1981.

Boyagian, Paula, "Alexander Julian," in Fashion Retailer, October 1983.

Schwartz, Tony, "Coats of Many Colors," in New York, 24 September 1984.

Fressola, Peter, "Alexander Julian," in DNR, 1 March 1988.

Barol, Bill, "Pastels on the Hardwood," in Newsweek, 3 October 1988.

"The Americans: Alexander Julian," in DNR, 15 August 1989.

Cameron, Victoria Pearson, "Why So Blue? (Men's Fashions)" in Esquire, March 1991.

Spevack, Rachel, "Julian's Colours Label Making a Comeback," in DNR, 6 February 1996.

Wyman, Lissa, "Julian for Couristan: Complete Home," in HFN, 14 July 1997.

"Big and Brights: A Designer and His Wife Play with Color and Scale in Their Hardworking Kitchen," in Country Living, November 1997.

Gellers, Stan, "Alexander Julian Now Colours PBM's Clothing World," in DNR, 23 November 1998.

Howell, Debbie, "Lowe's Signs Alexander Julian, Gives Home Décor Biz Big Push," in Discount Store News, 20 March 2000.

* * *

Alexander Julian stated his philosophy in his Colours collection, first launched in 1981: "I believe in men who want to dress in their own image and not according to any singular vision that would have all men appear alike."

Julian was born in Chapel Hill, North Carolina, and grew up in the retail environment of his father's shop, which Alexander managed from the age of 16. He moved to New York in 1975, winning the prestigious Coty Men's Wear award for the first time in 1977, and became the youngest designer to be included in the Coty Hall of Fame. Julian had citations on the U.S. International Best Dressed List for nine consecutive years and has won nearly all the most prestigious fashion design awards in the United States.

Julian was one of the first U.S. men's clothing designers to create his own exclusive fabrics by working with European mills and exploring a broad range of color with a special eye for innovative and unusual color effects. Since the launch of Colours by Alexander Julian in 1981, a well-priced collection reflecting the use of color and texture that had become Julian's signature on his couture menswear collection, the Colours range has expanded beyond menswear in the U.S. to include outerwear, furnishings, sleepwear, leather goods, belts, bed linens, eyewear, and women's and men's fragrances. Today the collections are a worldwide multimillion-dollar business, with licensees in Japan, Mexico, Canada, and the U.K., where the imaginative color palette, changing each season, is a novelty in British menswear.

Julian has designed uniforms for sports teams such as the Charlotte Hornets and North Carolina University Tar Heels basketball teams, and the uniforms, car colors, and crew clothes for the Newman Haas racing team, which is co-owned by Paul Newman. His clothes are worn by entertainment personalities such as Bill Cosby, Paul Newman, Tim Robbins, and jazz singer Harry Connick, Jr.

In 1992 Julian designed the clothes for all the male leads in Robert Altman's critically acclaimed movie The Player, creating a complex series of variations on the dress codes prevalent in the film industry. "What exists with most movie studios is that everyone tries to emulate the boss," states Julian, "and that's exactly what we did here." The personality of each character is played out in the color of his clothes: the style of jacket worn by all the male executives is identical, and as the narrative becomes more complex, the colors of the clothing worn by the main protagonist, played by Tim Robbins, change from green and gold to darker and darker colors as his situation changes. Additionally, Julian believes creative thinking in education should play a more significant role in children's learning development, and to this end he has set up the Alexander Julian Foundation for Aesthetic Understanding and Appreciation, which is helping to pioneer an experimental learning center in the United States.

Julian is one of the few menswear designers to successfully make the jump into home furnishings. Products for the home, from rugs and wallpaper to lamps and upholstered furniture, are marketed under the Alexander Julian at Home banner. Home décor has been his fast-growing business segment through the mid- to late 1990s and into the early 2000s, accounting for about 40 percent of revenues at the turn of the century. In 2000, Julian signed a deal for a range of home decorating products, including paint, carpeting, window treatments, countertops, and flooring, to be sold in the Lowe's do-it-yourself retail chain. Many of the products were available in other retail channels as well.

Julian favors a comfortable and casual style in the home, and his designs and color palette reflect the "modern traditional" identity of his menswear. In both areas of his business, he focuses on vibrant, mix-and-match colors and patterns and employs highly textured fabrics. The look of his upholstery mirrors the stripes, ties, and polka dots familiar from his ties and shirts; while his rugs are in the plaids and paisleys his customers know from his jackets and accessories. Julian's interior designs can also be viewed in public places, such as a baseball stadium he designed in Charlotte, North Carolina, and a restaurant in Westport, Connecticut.

In menswear and at home, Julian advocates flexibility, such as designing suits with jackets that can double as sports coats. The designer's menswear business underwent some changes in the late 1990s and early 2000s; he reassigned his tailored clothing license to Pincus Bros.-Maxwell (PBM) and simplified his main floor collection under the Alexander Julian name, deemphasizing the "Colours" label in that sector. He also continues to sign new licensees; the Alexander Julian brand encompasses all price tiers and customer segments within his core home furnishings and menswear markets. In addition to tailored apparel and home furnishings, others in his group of manufacturers market casual clothing, neckwear, fragrances, eyewear, and accessories.

Julian's strategy has been to bring a high-quality product to market at a fair price. He has been able to successfully walk the line between offering a creative, differentiated product and one that is commercially viable.

—Doreen Ehrlich; updated by Karen Raugust

K

KAHNG, Gemma

American designer

Born: Masan, Korea, 21 May 1954; immigrated to the U.S., 1969.
Education: Graduated from the Art Institute of Chicago, 1979.
Family: Married Charles Chang-Lima in 1984 (divorced, 1994).
Career: Design assistant, Cathy Hardwick, New York, 1981–84; designed freelance before establishing own business, 1989. Address: 224 Centre Street, New York, NY 0013, USA.

Gemma Kahng, fall 1997 collection. © Fashion Syndicate Press.

PUBLICATIONS

On KAHNG:

Articles

- Bizer, Karen, "A Designing Couple," in WWD, 22 July 1988.
Hartlein, Robert, "Gemma Kahng Emerges on Her Own," in WWD, 23 August 1989.
Staples, Kate, "The Kahng Formation," in WWD, 1 April 1991.
Darnton, Nina, "The New York Brat Pack: Their Clothes Are Coming Soon to a Closet Near You," in Newsweek, 29 April 1991.
Schiro, Anne-Marie, "With Help, Gemma Kahng's Star Soars," in the New York Times, 5 May 1991.
Saeks, Diane Dorrans, "Gemma's Jewels," in West, 16 June 1991.
Phillips, Barbara D., "Gemma Kahng: Paper Dolls to Haute Couture," in the Wall Street Journal, 6 August 1991.
Servin, James, "How I Got That Look: The Exotic Route," in Allure, June 1993.
"New York: Gemma Kahng," in WWD, 4 November 1994.
"Kahng Sets Secondary Line of Sportswear for Nordstrom," in WWD, 24 May 1996.
White, Constance C. R., "Patterns: Gemma Kahng Retrenches," in the New York Times, 30 December 1997.
"Hot Copy: Kid Luxe Update: Gemma Kahng," in Children's Business, April 1999.

*

The inspiration for each of my collections comes from my desire to create clothing that is sexy, witty, glamorous, comfortable, and most importantly, practical. I reflect on my own personality and lifestyle and think of things I would like to wear and what I need to expand my wardrobe.

Each of my collections begins with high-quality fabrics, an important tool for good design. Mostly I choose wools, silks, cottons, and linens that are luxurious yet basic, so that my design aesthetic becomes more prominent than the fabric itself. The details of clothing from the historical past are a good influence for my ideas. I am fascinated by the cultures of different time periods, especially the Victorian era, and find it challenging to combine them with the look of today.

This design sensibility appeals to my customer, a consistently busy woman who doesn't have the time to experiment with her image. She is a person who has enough confidence to incorporate a sense of humor in her style and can rely on my clothing and accessories for a complete look. Over the past five years, my image has become recognizable throughout the United States and is rapidly growing in foreign markets, especially in Hong Kong and Taipei where I have freestanding boutiques.

Gemma Kahng, fall 1997 collection. © Fashion Syndicate Press.

My goal is to perfect upon what it is that my customers like about my clothing and create something new. Design is a growing process and each season I experiment further by bringing more of my self-expression to a collection. What makes it exciting for me is the challenge and risk involved in taking the next step. No one can tell me what to bring to the future. I just have to be aware of the everyday world we live in.

—Gemma Kahng

* * *

"She's a lot like her designs," wrote Barbara Phillips of the Wall Street Journal in August 1991 of Gemma Kahng, "a winning mix of playfulness and practicality, forthrightness, and charm." Kahng's fashion design is practical, but at the same time, the chief trait of her work is to render a classic idea slightly askew or fresh with a theme of whimsy, exaggeration, or notice. The charm of the work is its perturbed normality: it is all just right but for that one eccentricity or detail that seems gloriously juvenile or marvelously anomalous in the template of a traditional garment.

Kahng's clothing is undeniably serious, addressed paramountly to an American working woman of some means, but always with a note of self-expression. Buttons can be almost as whimsical as those of Schiaparelli; pockets are unexpectedly given colorful flaps in accent colors; and pockets bounce with asymmetry. Schiaparelli is Kahng's soulmate in fashion history, not for the flamboyant garment but rather for those most restrained tailored suits that Schiaparelli created with nuanced absurdities and minor amazements. Kahng's identifying style resides in such quirky twists on classics, attention inevitably being drawn to the garment by an outstanding detail, but restrained in every other aspect of the composition.

Kahng works closely with her former husband, Charles Chang-Lima, who helms his own well-respected design line. For many years, Kahng worked out of Manhattan's Seventh Avenue garment district in New York, keeping production within the neighborhood rather than seeking large-scale production elsewhere. It is a matter for Kahng of quality and control; by keeping production local, she is attempting to guarantee production standards by watching the process, an old tradition of the garment industry now abandoned by many bigger companies. It is a working philosophy she has continued, even after her office moved to SoHo. Of course, there may be a reason for a designer not born in the U.S. to appraise American traditions and Western dress with a reasoning, potentially ironic eye. Kahng recalls that in her Korean childhood there were no store-bought dolls and that she had to fantasize and create clothing for her paper dolls.

"Classic with a twist" is a conventional goal of many young designers who take a minimal risk in construction and allow one lovely or bizarre note to make a memorable difference. The concept, however, is difficult to carry out, as one disturbance from the norm can seem to be an unwelcome aberration, especially in clothing that depends upon our sense of recognition of formality. Kahng has demonstrated an unusually sure and decisive sense of distorting or contributing enough in the gesture of discrepancy but without destroying the practical validity of the garment. When a tweed jacket is trimmed with red, the effect is at first of the most diabolically arresting house-painting on the block, but the combination settles into a rather winsome palette of clothing for the hunt. A pea jacket modified by horses on the pockets and jeweled buttons on the front ensures it will not be worn by Popeye, but deliberately softens the military regimen into a feminine and whimsical jacket. The anomaly for Kahng is never mere kitsch or cuteness: it is a feature that alters our perception (whether color or content) of the entire garment, an abnormality making us see the normal in a wholly new way.

Kahng departed somewhat from her established style in the late 1990s as she began to refocus both her design and her business strategy. While retaining her signature decorative accents, Kahng's designs and fabrics became softer and more delicate. Aside from moving her office to SoHo, she scaled down her staff and reduced the number of pieces in her new collections. Kahng also placed her couture line as well as her more affordably priced clothing in several high-end department stores under various labels. The designer ventured into the children's market in 1999 and also helped design the costumes and sets for fellow Korean American Margaret Cho's acclaimed one-woman performance piece.

From her emergence in the late 1980s, Kahng has stayed true to her proven and effective design statement; never unduly impulsive, the design is nonetheless different and enchantingly whimsical: Kahng honors the great traditions in dress and yet gives a happy surprise with each garment.

—Richard Martin; updated by Megan Stacy

KAISERMAN, Bill

American designer

Born: Brooklyn, New York, 8 September 1942. Education: Studied drama; no formal training in design. Family: Married Millie, 1971. Career: Millinery designer under the label Rafael; formed joint venture with Onward Kashiyama Co., 1989–92; launched independent label, WJK, to show menswear collection, 1992. Awards: Coty American Fashion Critics award, 1974, 1975, 1976, 1978; elected to Coty Hall of Fame, 1976; Hall of Fame citation, 1978. Address: Via Manzoni 43, Milan, Italy.

PUBLICATIONS

On KAISERMAN:

Books

Lambert, Eleanor, The World of Fashion, New York, 1976.
 Morris, Bernadine, and Barbara Walz, The Fashion Makers, New York, 1978.
 Khorak, Lucille, Fashion 2001, New York, 1982.

Articles

Hyde, Nina, "Bill Kaiserman, Putting His Shoulder to the Wheel," in the Washington Post, 7 December 1986.
 "Tanned Blond and Dresses to the Hilt: We Must be in Milan," in the Chicago Tribune, 14 March 1990.
 Marisa Fox, "Designers Sing a Soprano Tune for Fall," in the Chicago Tribune, 7 February 2000.

* * *

Bill Kaiserman has had success in the fields of menswear and womenswear. With no formal design training, he began his career as a salesperson in a men's clothing shop. While there, he started designing hats and sold them under the label Rafael. He was soon producing suede and leatherwear to complement the millinery. Cashmere sweaters and silk shirts were added, together with the safari suit—a revolutionary new shape in menswear establishing the concept of the leisure suit and leisure dressing for men.

Kaiserman's menswear success led him to produce ranges of womenswear, still under the label of Rafael. Beginning with tailored clothes, his look gradually became softer and more casual, evolving into a sophisticated daywear look, made to high standards in luxurious, discerning fabrics and colors. Produced in Italy, his clothes came to represent the best standards in American fashion.

Kaiserman cited his customers as being between 30 and 45, who wanted to look young and well dressed without resorting to the extremes of teenage fashion. As a menswear and womenswear designer, he has noted the marked difference in designing for both sexes. With womenswear, the approach is more creative and free. An idea can often be realized to its full potential, whereas with menswear, an imaginative idea often has to be restrained: "There are just a few shapes that are acceptable, there is less room for fantasy," he has said. He believes men should not look too formal, styled, or contrived. Women, on the other hand, look fabulous when the body shape is emphasized and exaggerated.

Amply recognized for his contribution to American fashion, Kaiserman has received several Coty awards and a Hall of Fame citation for his contribution to menswear. He and his wife Millie both declared themselves fitness and health fanatics. Kaiserman confessed he often gets design ideas when lifting weights and has joked that if he never made it as the world's biggest international designer, he would certainly be the strongest.

It is ultimately his menswear concept that was Kaiserman's greatest contribution to fashion. His leisurewear opened up greater boundaries for menswear design as a whole, and his leisure suit became a liberated classic for many men. He chose the name Rafael because he thought it would look better in print than his own; ironically, his name as a designer eclipsed the label he chose to represent his product.

In the 1980s, Kaiserman disappeared from the fashion industry, closing Rafael and moving to Italy. "My business had gotten too big for me to handle," he told Nina Hyde of the Washington Post. "I was spending 90 percent of my time trying to run a business and 10 percent designing, if that." He told Hyde that fashion's social scene, including parties and drugs, were "choking me to death." After about five years on hiatus from the business, Kaiserman eased his way back into designing by producing lines for other companies. In 1985 he signed an agreement to design womenswear for the upscale label Cache, founded in 1975. "His talent is superb," said Cache president Mitchell Robinson. "His style is certainly compatible with the typical Cache client who is sophisticated and fashion-aware."

Kaiserman told Hyde that his ideal garment structure had changed a bit over the years. "What I care about is enough structure in the clothes to enhance the shape of the body," he said. "No one has a perfect body without a little help."

Returning to the Milan fashion scene with the backing of clothing conglomerate Kashiyama & Company, a licensee of menswear from Ralph Lauren and Calvin Klein, the new Kaiserman menswear was not always as well received as his Rafael clothing. Suits and jackets were looser and proportioned differently; critics and clients alike seemed to yearn for Kaiserman designs from decades ago. A former assistant, however, Michael Savoia, turned heads with his debut menswear collection in New York in 2000. The well-tailored suits harked back to Kaiserman's crisp and classic Rafael clothing so popular in the 1970s and 1980s.

—Kevin Almond; updated by Lisa Groshong

KAMALI, Norma

American designer

Born: Norma Arraes in New York City, 27 June 1945. Education: Studied fashion illustration at Fashion Institute of Technology, New York, 1961–64. Family: Married Mohammed (Eddie) Houssein Kamali in 1967 (divorced, 1972). Career: Freelance fashion illustrator, New York, 1965–66; airline reservation clerk, 1966–67; freelance fashion designer and partner, with Eddie Kamali, Kamali Fashion Imports, New York, 1967–78; opened first retail store, Kamali, in New York, 1968; established OMO (On My Own) Norma Kamali boutiques in New York, from 1978; ready-to-wear line introduced,

KAISERMAN, Bill

American designer

Born: Brooklyn, New York, 8 September 1942. Education: Studied drama; no formal training in design. Family: Married Millie, 1971. Career: Millinery designer under the label Rafael; formed joint venture with Onward Kashiyama Co., 1989–92; launched independent label, WJK, to show menswear collection, 1992. Awards: Coty American Fashion Critics award, 1974, 1975, 1976, 1978; elected to Coty Hall of Fame, 1976; Hall of Fame citation, 1978. Address: Via Manzoni 43, Milan, Italy.

PUBLICATIONS

On KAISERMAN:

Books

Lambert, Eleanor, The World of Fashion, New York, 1976.
 Morris, Bernadine, and Barbara Walz, The Fashion Makers, New York, 1978.
 Khorak, Lucille, Fashion 2001, New York, 1982.

Articles

Hyde, Nina, "Bill Kaiserman, Putting His Shoulder to the Wheel," in the Washington Post, 7 December 1986.
 "Tanned Blond and Dresses to the Hilt: We Must be in Milan," in the Chicago Tribune, 14 March 1990.
 Marisa Fox, "Designers Sing a Soprano Tune for Fall," in the Chicago Tribune, 7 February 2000.

* * *

Bill Kaiserman has had success in the fields of menswear and womenswear. With no formal design training, he began his career as a salesperson in a men's clothing shop. While there, he started designing hats and sold them under the label Rafael. He was soon producing suede and leatherwear to complement the millinery. Cashmere sweaters and silk shirts were added, together with the safari suit—a revolutionary new shape in menswear establishing the concept of the leisure suit and leisure dressing for men.

Kaiserman's menswear success led him to produce ranges of womenswear, still under the label of Rafael. Beginning with tailored clothes, his look gradually became softer and more casual, evolving into a sophisticated daywear look, made to high standards in luxurious, discerning fabrics and colors. Produced in Italy, his clothes came to represent the best standards in American fashion.

Kaiserman cited his customers as being between 30 and 45, who wanted to look young and well dressed without resorting to the extremes of teenage fashion. As a menswear and womenswear designer, he has noted the marked difference in designing for both sexes. With womenswear, the approach is more creative and free. An idea can often be realized to its full potential, whereas with menswear, an imaginative idea often has to be restrained: "There are just a few shapes that are acceptable, there is less room for fantasy," he has said. He believes men should not look too formal, styled, or contrived. Women, on the other hand, look fabulous when the body shape is emphasized and exaggerated.

Amply recognized for his contribution to American fashion, Kaiserman has received several Coty awards and a Hall of Fame citation for his contribution to menswear. He and his wife Millie both declared themselves fitness and health fanatics. Kaiserman confessed he often gets design ideas when lifting weights and has joked that if he never made it as the world's biggest international designer, he would certainly be the strongest.

It is ultimately his menswear concept that was Kaiserman's greatest contribution to fashion. His leisurewear opened up greater boundaries for menswear design as a whole, and his leisure suit became a liberated classic for many men. He chose the name Rafael because he thought it would look better in print than his own; ironically, his name as a designer eclipsed the label he chose to represent his product.

In the 1980s, Kaiserman disappeared from the fashion industry, closing Rafael and moving to Italy. "My business had gotten too big for me to handle," he told Nina Hyde of the Washington Post. "I was spending 90 percent of my time trying to run a business and 10 percent designing, if that." He told Hyde that fashion's social scene, including parties and drugs, were "choking me to death." After about five years on hiatus from the business, Kaiserman eased his way back into designing by producing lines for other companies. In 1985 he signed an agreement to design womenswear for the upscale label Cache, founded in 1975. "His talent is superb," said Cache president Mitchell Robinson. "His style is certainly compatible with the typical Cache client who is sophisticated and fashion-aware."

Kaiserman told Hyde that his ideal garment structure had changed a bit over the years. "What I care about is enough structure in the clothes to enhance the shape of the body," he said. "No one has a perfect body without a little help."

Returning to the Milan fashion scene with the backing of clothing conglomerate Kashiyama & Company, a licensee of menswear from Ralph Lauren and Calvin Klein, the new Kaiserman menswear was not always as well received as his Rafael clothing. Suits and jackets were looser and proportioned differently; critics and clients alike seemed to yearn for Kaiserman designs from decades ago. A former assistant, however, Michael Savoia, turned heads with his debut menswear collection in New York in 2000. The well-tailored suits harked back to Kaiserman's crisp and classic Rafael clothing so popular in the 1970s and 1980s.

—Kevin Almond; updated by Lisa Groshong

KAMALI, Norma

American designer

Born: Norma Arraes in New York City, 27 June 1945. Education: Studied fashion illustration at Fashion Institute of Technology, New York, 1961–64. Family: Married Mohammed (Eddie) Houssein Kamali in 1967 (divorced, 1972). Career: Freelance fashion illustrator, New York, 1965–66; airline reservation clerk, 1966–67; freelance fashion designer and partner, with Eddie Kamali, Kamali Fashion Imports, New York, 1967–78; opened first retail store, Kamali, in New York, 1968; established OMO (On My Own) Norma Kamali boutiques in New York, from 1978; ready-to-wear line introduced, Norma Kamali standing in her Manhattan showroom with part of her spring 1997 line, featuring silkscreens of Mahatma Ghandi. © AP/Wide World Photos.

1981; produced sportswear for Jones Apparel Group, 1981; children's sportswear for Empire Shield Group, 1982; sportswear for Renown Corporation, Japan, 1983; costume designer for the Emerald City in The Wiz, 1983; designed and opened Norma Kamali Building, New York, 1983; bags and footwear for Vittorio Ricci, 1983–84, headwear for Stetson, 1983, and belts for Raymon Ridless, 1985; signature fragrance collection introduced, 1985; OMO home collection introduced, 1988; (800) 8-KAMALI line of casual wear introduced, 1993; cosmetics line introduced, 1994; produced and directed Fall Fantasy video; costume designer for three Twyla Tharp dance performances (The Upper Room, Sweet Fields, Route 66), 1995–96; commencement speaker for Fiftieth Anniversary of the Fashion Institute of Technology, 1995; Kamali website created, 1996; broadcasted Fall 1996 collection as virtual reality experience over the Internet, 1996; Internet shopping service "Shop Like a Celebrity" introduced, 1998; created New York Public Schools website (www.nycpublicschoolsart4U2c.com) to exhibit student artwork, fashion, and poetry, 1998; Living Rubber collection introduced, 1999; website evolved into a directory of seven linked sites, 2000; business opportunity for local representatives of NK Jersey line introduced, 2000. Exhibitions: Parachute designs displayed at Metropolitan Museum of Art, New York, 1977. Awards: Coty American Fashion

Critics award, 1981, 1982, 1983; Council of Fashion Designers of America award, 1982, 1985; Fashion Institute of Design and Merchandising award, Los Angeles, 1984; Fashion Group award, 1986; Distinguished Architecture award from New York Chapter of American Institute of Architects; Outstanding Graduate award from the Public Education Association of New York; award of merit, Video Culture International Competition; American Success award from the Fashion Institute of Technology in New York, 1989; Washington Irving High School's Hall of Fame for distinguished alumni, 1997; Youth Friends award, 1997; Pencil award, 1999; Willow award from Lower East Side Girls' Club, 1999; Fashion Outreach Style award, 1999. Address: Norma Kamali Building, 11 West 56th Street, New York, New York 10019, USA. Website: www.OMO-norma-kamali.com.

PUBLICATIONS

By KAMALI:

Articles

"Fashion," in the New York Times, 1 January 1989.

Norma Kamali, spring 1998 collection: wedding gown made of parachute nylon. © AP/Wide World Photos.

On KAMALI:

Books

- Diamonstein, Barbaralee, Fashion: The Inside Story, New York, 1985.
 Milbank, Caroline Rennolds, Couture: The Great Designers, New York, 1985.
 Perschitz, Lois, ed., W, The Designing Life, New York, 1987.
 Milbank, Caroline Rennolds, New York Fashion: The Evolution of American Style, New York, 1989.
 Stegemeyer, Anne, Who's Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.

Articles

- "Norma Kamali Talks to Sarah Montague," in Ritz (London), No. 25, 1978.
 "The Kamali Effect," in Vogue, June 1982.
 Krupp, C. "Reluctant Fashion Guru," in Glamour, September 1982.
 "Working Seventh Avenue Has Been No Sweat for Fashion's Greta Garbo," in People, 27 December 1982.
 Radakovich, Anka, "Hot Kamali's 'Kicky' Clothes," in Apparel News (New York), April 1984.

- Talley, André Leon, "True Wit: The Zany World of Norma Kamali," in Vogue, November 1984.
 "Norma Kamali: An Interview with the Fashion Video Pioneer," in Back Stage, 14 November 1986.
 "Shirting the Issue: Norma Kamali," in Self (New York), November 1988.
 Hamilton, William L., "The State of the Shape: Va-va-voom," in Metropolitan Home (New York), April 1989.
 Schiro, Anne-Marie, "Pastels at the Plaza, Cowgirls in the Park," in The New York Times, 31 October 1989.
 "The Designers Talk Passion, Whimsy, and Picassos," in ARTnews (New York), September 1990.
 Schiro, Anne-Marie, "A Spectrum for Spring, Hot to Cool," in The New York Times, 31 October 1990.
 Brubach, Holly, "In Fashion: On the Beach," in The New Yorker, 2 September 1991.
 Schiro, Anne-Marie, "Patterns," in The New York Times, 4 August 1992.
 ———, "For Evening Wear, Various Degrees of Retro," in The New York Times, 31 March 1993.
 "That Vargas Vamp," in American Photo (New York), March/April 1993.
 Gandee, Charles, "Hot Kamali," in Vogue, April 1993.
 La Ferla, Ruth, "Mode: Norma Kamali," in Elle (Paris), July 1993.
 White, Constance, "Some Age Gracefully," in The New York Times, 31 October 1995.
 Colman, David, "Norma Kamali Cleans House," in The New York Times, 22 February 1996.
 Schiro, Anne-Marie, "Three Clear Signatures," in The New York Times, 28 March 1996.
 White, Constance, "Norma Kamali Aids Students," in The New York Times, 11 February 1997.
 ———, "Eccentricity is the Key to Invention," in The New York Times, 9 April 1997.
 ———, "Definitive Lauren, Ingenious Kamali," in The New York Times, 2 April 1998.
 "Norma Kamali," in Current Biography Yearbook, November 1998.
 Luther, Marylou, "Kamali Meets Fans on Line," in The New York Times, 5 January 1999.
 Crow, Kelly, "Mere Bits of Skimpy Plastic are Hits at Sample Sale Day," in The New York Times, 2 July 2000.
 Bellafante, Ginia, "Kamali, Inspired by Kamali," in The New York Times, 14 November 2000.

* * *

In a highly original way, Norma Kamali has been designing with uncanny foresight for the modern woman's multifaceted lifestyle. The sensational success of her sweatshirt-fleece fabric line in 1981 brought Kamali clothes into the mainstream, while she continued to design experimental, one-of-a-kind fashions for wealthier clients. The mass produced sweats offered good design in comfortable clothes, with a touch of the eye-catching elements that have distinguished Kamali. Inspired by the late 1960s British clothes she brought back from England to sell in the New York Norma Kamali boutique—the retro Biba clothing of Barbara Hulanicki in particular—Kamali began offering her own designs to keep up with the demand. When she opened her New York OMO (On My Own) boutique in 1978 after her divorce, Kamali symbolized all newly independent women.

As early as 1972 Kamali designed bathing suits according to her own vision: gold lamé maillots, structured or spare bikinis, decorated or plain, introducing the then-startling high-thigh styles with cutouts to show off a well-toned body—beach fashions that became mainstream as the 1980s progressed. In the late 1960s Kamali was credited with the hot pants craze. A sense of playfulness combined rhinestones with stretch leotard material, pleasing the celebrities who patronized the Madison Avenue store. In 1974 Kamali changed to a more refined look, lacy and delicate, specializing in well-made suits and dresses.

It was in the West Side OMO store that Kamali came into her own. Cozy down-filled coats became popular after she introduced them, spurred by the necessity of sleeping in a sleeping bag after her divorce. Drawstring jumpsuits made of colorful parachute material resulted in her inclusion in the Vanity Fair Exhibition at the Costume Institute of the Metropolitan Museum of Art. She showed draped 1930s-styled jerseys, and exaggerated broad shoulders on garments from coats to sweatshirt dresses to evening gowns, always a little before her time. She also utilized suede in bright colors before it became trendy. Kamali 1950s-style “Ethel Mertz” dresses were fabricated in plaid flannel, certainly different than anything else on the streets in the early 1980s. Her short cheerleader skirts were the first popular miniskirts in a decade. Dramatic lamé accents appeared on special occasion sweats and she designed sweatshirting for children.

Kamali epitomized the shy person who allowed her clothes to speak for her, yet there has always been an inner strength leading to her successful business enterprises and the willingness to take risks. Using her boutique as an atelier, Kamali has been producing one-of-a-kind garments from unusual fabrics in versatile shapes to be worn in a number of ways. She was one of the first to present unitards or bodysuits as serious fashion staples. As in French couture, Kamali listens to her customers, on whom she has waited in person in her boutique, to get their honest opinions. She has described herself as relying upon intuition, taking inspiration from the street, but making it her own as if in a creative trance. Her credo has been to make the functional aspects of clothing attractive, taking inspiration from the unique qualities of each fabric, always designing for the woman who will wear the clothes.

Kamali launched a modern collection of interchangeable pieces that blended as quickly as the modern woman’s lifestyle in 1995. The collection featured a wardrobe made from a revolutionary polyester jersey fabric Kamali described as “soft as silk but strong as steel jersey.” Highly suitable for travel, the collection, the NK Jersey Line, emphasized wrinkle-free and machine-washable comfort in black, red, or white. This line kicked off a wave of practicality and a less-is-more attitude. In 1996 Kamali purged many of her personal belongings and furniture in an auction, banned black from her new collection and wardrobe, and looked forward to the new millennium. The star ensemble of the fall collection featured a dark-brown velvet jacket over a yellow chiffon shirt and gunmetal leather pants. Improvements and ingenuity defined her designs for the remainder of the 21st century. Her ever-faithful 1970s silk parachute coat was modernized in a more practical nylon in colors reminiscent of military gear, and she maintained a standard of ensuring even her most luxurious European-styled designs remained wearable and unique.

Throughout her career Kamali has inspired other designers, and has been considered one of the most original designers in New York. She has brought the inventiveness that used to be allowed only in couture salons to versions affordable to working women, although many of her more exclusive designs remain high-priced. Kamali has also introduced revolutionary marketing techniques to fashion merchandising. Twenty-four hours a day, fashion videos play in the windows of OMO. Unlike ordinary catwalk videotapes, Kamali videos are actually minimovies, often as long as 30 minutes, with storylines and character development, showing various situations in which Kamali fashions might be worn. Kamali also advertised through the use of billboards and by staging fashion shows in New York’s Central Park. By 1993 she was offering a toll-free number for ordering her new lower-priced label, while retaining the OMO Norma Kamali label for her expensive line.

But it was in 1996 marketing embarked on a high-tech journey to move OMO into the new millennium. The Internet became the runway for a virtual-reality simultaneous-broadcast of Kamali’s fall 1996 collection. Later in the year the company website (www.omo-norma-kamali.com) was created, featuring Kamali’s (800) 8-KAMALI collection, a direct marketing service called “Shop Like a Celebrity” which provides clients with a personal shopper and purchasing ease, and a business opportunity for individuals interested in becoming a local representative of the NK Jersey Line.

As OMO evolved into a 21st century marketplace, Norma Kamali continues to inspire. She has adopted the role of mentor and educator. Since 1997 Kamali has organized art students from her alma mater, Washington Irving High School, to develop a business for teaching art and commerce. She also set up an avenue for New York Public School students to exhibit their artwork, fashion, and poetry on a website (www.nycpublicschoolart4u2c.com).

Kamali clothes remain timeless in evoking past fashion eras while representing a modern outlook in interpretation, use of new materials, and technology. Back in 1991 Kamali presented bell-bottomed trousers, then scoffed at by the fashion press, which became standard in the revival of the 1970s. She herself revived her own fake leopard print coats to combine in the eclectic individualistic mood of the late 1990s with other garments having vintage and ethnic overtones. Soft flowing floral tunics, Edwardian and 1930s detailing, hip-huggers, lace dresses all in spirit with the times denote the experimentation that has always been the hallmark of Kamali’s style and has at last caught up with her fashion forward attitude. Shiny Lurex bathing suits feature underwire cups and a direction toward a more covered-up look in response to the new consciousness about the dangers of sunlight. Her own best model, Kamali epitomizes the 1940s vamp, a characteristically classic expression of her aesthetic: she has made self-expression seductive.

—Therese Duzinkiewicz Baker; updated by Jody Essey-Stapleton

KAPLAN, Jacques

French fur designer

Born: Paris, 1924. Career: Joined father’s furrier business (founded in Paris, 1889) on its move to New York, 1942; company bought by the Kenton Corporation, and Kaplan retired, 1971.

she opened her New York OMO (On My Own) boutique in 1978 after her divorce, Kamali symbolized all newly independent women.

As early as 1972 Kamali designed bathing suits according to her own vision: gold lamé maillots, structured or spare bikinis, decorated or plain, introducing the then-startling high-thigh styles with cutouts to show off a well-toned body—beach fashions that became mainstream as the 1980s progressed. In the late 1960s Kamali was credited with the hot pants craze. A sense of playfulness combined rhinestones with stretch leotard material, pleasing the celebrities who patronized the Madison Avenue store. In 1974 Kamali changed to a more refined look, lacy and delicate, specializing in well-made suits and dresses.

It was in the West Side OMO store that Kamali came into her own. Cozy down-filled coats became popular after she introduced them, spurred by the necessity of sleeping in a sleeping bag after her divorce. Drawstring jumpsuits made of colorful parachute material resulted in her inclusion in the Vanity Fair Exhibition at the Costume Institute of the Metropolitan Museum of Art. She showed draped 1930s-styled jerseys, and exaggerated broad shoulders on garments from coats to sweatshirt dresses to evening gowns, always a little before her time. She also utilized suede in bright colors before it became trendy. Kamali 1950s-style “Ethel Mertz” dresses were fabricated in plaid flannel, certainly different than anything else on the streets in the early 1980s. Her short cheerleader skirts were the first popular miniskirts in a decade. Dramatic lamé accents appeared on special occasion sweats and she designed sweatshirting for children.

Kamali epitomized the shy person who allowed her clothes to speak for her, yet there has always been an inner strength leading to her successful business enterprises and the willingness to take risks. Using her boutique as an atelier, Kamali has been producing one-of-a-kind garments from unusual fabrics in versatile shapes to be worn in a number of ways. She was one of the first to present unitards or bodysuits as serious fashion staples. As in French couture, Kamali listens to her customers, on whom she has waited in person in her boutique, to get their honest opinions. She has described herself as relying upon intuition, taking inspiration from the street, but making it her own as if in a creative trance. Her credo has been to make the functional aspects of clothing attractive, taking inspiration from the unique qualities of each fabric, always designing for the woman who will wear the clothes.

Kamali launched a modern collection of interchangeable pieces that blended as quickly as the modern woman’s lifestyle in 1995. The collection featured a wardrobe made from a revolutionary polyester jersey fabric Kamali described as “soft as silk but strong as steel jersey.” Highly suitable for travel, the collection, the NK Jersey Line, emphasized wrinkle-free and machine-washable comfort in black, red, or white. This line kicked off a wave of practicality and a less-is-more attitude. In 1996 Kamali purged many of her personal belongings and furniture in an auction, banned black from her new collection and wardrobe, and looked forward to the new millennium. The star ensemble of the fall collection featured a dark-brown velvet jacket over a yellow chiffon shirt and gunmetal leather pants. Improvements and ingenuity defined her designs for the remainder of the 21st century. Her ever-faithful 1970s silk parachute coat was modernized in a more practical nylon in colors reminiscent of military gear, and she maintained a standard of ensuring even her most luxurious European-styled designs remained wearable and unique.

Throughout her career Kamali has inspired other designers, and has been considered one of the most original designers in New York. She has brought the inventiveness that used to be allowed only in couture salons to versions affordable to working women, although many of her more exclusive designs remain high-priced. Kamali has also introduced revolutionary marketing techniques to fashion merchandising. Twenty-four hours a day, fashion videos play in the windows of OMO. Unlike ordinary catwalk videotapes, Kamali videos are actually minimovies, often as long as 30 minutes, with storylines and character development, showing various situations in which Kamali fashions might be worn. Kamali also advertised through the use of billboards and by staging fashion shows in New York’s Central Park. By 1993 she was offering a toll-free number for ordering her new lower-priced label, while retaining the OMO Norma Kamali label for her expensive line.

But it was in 1996 marketing embarked on a high-tech journey to move OMO into the new millennium. The Internet became the runway for a virtual-reality simultaneous-broadcast of Kamali’s fall 1996 collection. Later in the year the company website (www.omo-norma-kamali.com) was created, featuring Kamali’s (800) 8-KAMALI collection, a direct marketing service called “Shop Like a Celebrity” which provides clients with a personal shopper and purchasing ease, and a business opportunity for individuals interested in becoming a local representative of the NK Jersey Line.

As OMO evolved into a 21st century marketplace, Norma Kamali continues to inspire. She has adopted the role of mentor and educator. Since 1997 Kamali has organized art students from her alma mater, Washington Irving High School, to develop a business for teaching art and commerce. She also set up an avenue for New York Public School students to exhibit their artwork, fashion, and poetry on a website (www.nycpublicschoolart4u2c.com).

Kamali clothes remain timeless in evoking past fashion eras while representing a modern outlook in interpretation, use of new materials, and technology. Back in 1991 Kamali presented bell-bottomed trousers, then scoffed at by the fashion press, which became standard in the revival of the 1970s. She herself revived her own fake leopard print coats to combine in the eclectic individualistic mood of the late 1990s with other garments having vintage and ethnic overtones. Soft flowing floral tunics, Edwardian and 1930s detailing, hip-huggers, lace dresses all in spirit with the times denote the experimentation that has always been the hallmark of Kamali’s style and has at last caught up with her fashion forward attitude. Shiny Lurex bathing suits feature underwire cups and a direction toward a more covered-up look in response to the new consciousness about the dangers of sunlight. Her own best model, Kamali epitomizes the 1940s vamp, a characteristically classic expression of her aesthetic: she has made self-expression seductive.

—Therese Duzinkiewicz Baker; updated by Jody Essey-Stapleton

KAPLAN, Jacques

French fur designer

Born: Paris, 1924. Career: Joined father’s furrier business (founded in Paris, 1889) on its move to New York, 1942; company bought by the Kenton Corporation, and Kaplan retired, 1971.

Jacques Kaplan, 1968 collection: calfskin jacket with initials stenciled on it. © AP/Wide World Photos.

PUBLICATIONS

* * *

On KAPLAN:

Articles

Richardson, John, "Fauve Country," in House & Garden, February 1992.

"One of the few means of self expression left today is fashion," Jacques Kaplan told Grace Glueck of the New York Times in the 1960s, and in many ways Kaplan used fashion as a canvas to express many innovative new ideas.

Kaplan's business had originated with his grandparents who founded a fur business in Paris in 1889. The business moved to New York in 1942 and Kaplan eventually became the chairman and chief designer for the house. His exuberant, lively personality soon elevated the company to its status as the biggest volume fur business in the United States.

Jacques Kaplan, 1968 collection: fox parka. © AP/Wide World Photos.

Fur coats had long established themselves as a luxury item in fashion. Stylistically their image was somewhat stately, grand, and status conscious. Kaplan pioneered the concept of "fun furs" in unusual pelts, or fake fur, fur dresses, skirts, boots and hoods, all of which helped attract a younger, more fashion-conscious clientele. He introduced stenciled and colored furs, and for a 1963 promotional campaign, he commissioned five avant-garde artists to paint fur coats. Marisol painted a pink nude, whilst Richard Auszkiewicz did an Op Art arrangement on calfskin.

Kaplan's philosophy was that bizarre or arty antics help to promote and sell furs. With his ranch mink coats retailing at a highly profitable $4,500 in the mid-1960s this entrepreneurial attitude certainly helped. He also found ways, however, to bring down the price of fur: in 1961 he produced a cheaper version of a black-dyed ranch mink, made famous by Jackie Kennedy. In a similar stylish, yet spare silhouette, with horizontally worked pelts, made from Japanese mink, the coats sold for $1,000 each. Kaplan was also known to stage fun fur shows in art galleries and was the first to admit he drove to work on a Honda motor scooter and underwent psychoanalysis that helped him come to terms with the idiosyncrasies of the fashion business.

In acknowledgement of the growing antifur movements in the socially aware 1960s, the company was one of the first to take a stand against the use of fur from endangered species. Kaplan himself said, "Twenty years ago I used to hate to be a furrier, I thought it was the lowest degree socially." He had learned to love the trade, though, and acquired a great deal of creative fulfillment from his role.

In the late 1960s the company was bought by the Kenton Corporation, and when they wished to sell it in the 1970s Kaplan decided to leave fashion and pursue his interests in art and painting.

—Kevin Almond

KARAN, Donna

American designer

Born: Donna Faske in Forest Hills, New York, 2 October 1948.

Education: Studied at Parsons School of Design, New York. Family: Married Mark Karan, 1973 (divorced); married Stephan Weiss, 1977 (died 2001); children: Gabrielle, Lisa, Cory. Career: Assistant designer, Anne Klein & Co., and Addenda Company, New York, 1967–68; designer, Anne Klein, 1968–71; designer and director of design in association with Louis Dell'Olio, Anne Klein & Co., 1974–84; launched Anne Klein II diffusion line, 1982; designer, Donna Karan New York (DKNY), from 1985; added swimwear line, 1986; introduced hosiery collection, 1987; established DKNY bridge line, 1988; introduced DKNY menswear collection, 1991; founded Donna Karan Beauty Company, fragrance and cosmetic division, New York, 1992; introduced lingerie and children's line, DKNY Kids, from 1992; took company public, 1996; introduced new fragrance, Chaos, 1996; opened stores in Berlin, 1997; licensed DKNY Kids to Esprit, 1998; licensed timepieces collection and debuted fragrances DKNY Men, DKNY Women, 1999; introduced DKNY swimwear and Donna Karan Home, 2000; opened 10,000-square-foot DKNY store on Madison Avenue, 2001. Awards: Coty American Fashion Critics award, 1977, 1981, 1984, 1985; Fashion Footwear Association of New York award, 1988; Council of Fashion Designers of America award, 1985, 1986, 1990, 1992, 1996; Honorary Degree, Bachelor of Fine Arts, Parsons School of Design, 1987; named to Fashion Designer Walk of Fame, I. Magnin, 1991; Woolmark award, 1992. Address: 550 Seventh Avenue, New York, NY 10018, U.S.A.

PUBLICATIONS

On KARAN:

Books

Morris, Bernadine, and Barbara Walz, The Fashion Makers, New York, 1978.

Diamonstein, Barbaralee, Fashion: The Inside Story, New York, 1985.

Perschetz, Lois, ed., W, The Designing Life, New York, 1987.

Coleridge, Nicholas, The Fashion Conspiracy, London, 1988.

Steele, Valerie, Women of Fashion: Twentieth-Century Designers, New York, 1991.

Stegemeyer, Anne, Who's Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.

Jacques Kaplan, 1968 collection: fox parka. © AP/Wide World Photos.

for the house. His exuberant, lively personality soon elevated the company to its status as the biggest volume fur business in the United States.

Fur coats had long established themselves as a luxury item in fashion. Stylistically their image was somewhat stately, grand, and status conscious. Kaplan pioneered the concept of "fun furs" in unusual pelts, or fake fur, fur dresses, skirts, boots and hoods, all of which helped attract a younger, more fashion-conscious clientele. He introduced stenciled and colored furs, and for a 1963 promotional campaign, he commissioned five avant-garde artists to paint fur coats. Marisol painted a pink nude, whilst Richard Auszkiewicz did an Op Art arrangement on calfskin.

Kaplan's philosophy was that bizarre or arty antics help to promote and sell furs. With his ranch mink coats retailing at a highly profitable $4,500 in the mid-1960s this entrepreneurial attitude certainly helped. He also found ways, however, to bring down the price of fur: in 1961 he produced a cheaper version of a black-dyed ranch mink, made famous by Jackie Kennedy. In a similar stylish, yet spare silhouette, with horizontally worked pelts, made from Japanese mink, the coats sold for $1,000 each. Kaplan was also known to stage fun fur shows in art galleries and was the first to admit he drove to work on a Honda motor scooter and underwent psychoanalysis that helped him come to terms with the idiosyncrasies of the fashion business.

In acknowledgement of the growing antifur movements in the socially aware 1960s, the company was one of the first to take a stand against the use of fur from endangered species. Kaplan himself said, "Twenty years ago I used to hate to be a furrier, I thought it was the lowest degree socially." He had learned to love the trade, though, and acquired a great deal of creative fulfillment from his role.

In the late 1960s the company was bought by the Kenton Corporation, and when they wished to sell it in the 1970s Kaplan decided to leave fashion and pursue his interests in art and painting.

—Kevin Almond

KARAN, Donna

American designer

Born: Donna Faske in Forest Hills, New York, 2 October 1948.

Education: Studied at Parsons School of Design, New York. Family: Married Mark Karan, 1973 (divorced); married Stephan Weiss, 1977 (died 2001); children: Gabrielle, Lisa, Cory. Career: Assistant designer, Anne Klein & Co., and Addenda Company, New York, 1967–68; designer, Anne Klein, 1968–71; designer and director of design in association with Louis Dell'Olio, Anne Klein & Co., 1974–84; launched Anne Klein II diffusion line, 1982; designer, Donna Karan New York (DKNY), from 1985; added swimwear line, 1986; introduced hosiery collection, 1987; established DKNY bridge line, 1988; introduced DKNY menswear collection, 1991; founded Donna Karan Beauty Company, fragrance and cosmetic division, New York, 1992; introduced lingerie and children's line, DKNY Kids, from 1992; took company public, 1996; introduced new fragrance, Chaos, 1996; opened stores in Berlin, 1997; licensed DKNY Kids to Esprit, 1998; licensed timepieces collection and debuted fragrances DKNY Men, DKNY Women, 1999; introduced DKNY swimwear and Donna Karan Home, 2000; opened 10,000-square-foot DKNY store on Madison Avenue, 2001. Awards: Coty American Fashion Critics award, 1977, 1981, 1984, 1985; Fashion Footwear Association of New York award, 1988; Council of Fashion Designers of America award, 1985, 1986, 1990, 1992, 1996; Honorary Degree, Bachelor of Fine Arts, Parsons School of Design, 1987; named to Fashion Designer Walk of Fame, I. Magnin, 1991; Woolmark award, 1992. Address: 550 Seventh Avenue, New York, NY 10018, U.S.A.

PUBLICATIONS

On KARAN:

Books

Morris, Bernadine, and Barbara Walz, The Fashion Makers, New York, 1978.

Diamonstein, Barbaralee, Fashion: The Inside Story, New York, 1985.

Perschetz, Lois, ed., W, The Designing Life, New York, 1987.

Coleridge, Nicholas, The Fashion Conspiracy, London, 1988.

Steele, Valerie, Women of Fashion: Twentieth-Century Designers, New York, 1991.

Stegemeyer, Anne, Who's Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.

Donna Karan, fall 2001 collection. © Reuters NewMedia Inc./CORBIS.

Le Dortz, Laurent, and Béatrice Deboscher, Stratégies des leaders américains de la mode: Calvin Klein, Donna Karan, Liz Clairborne, Polo Ralph Lauren, et Tommy Hilfiger, Paris, 2000.

Articles

- “Cue: Designing Women—Donna Karan,” in Vogue (London), September 1985.
- Infantino, Vivian, “Interview: Donna Karan,” in Footwear News, July 1986.
- Gottfried, Carolyn, “In Conversation: Donna Karan and Joan Burstein...,” in Vogue (London), October 1986.
- Jobey, Liz, “Designing Women,” in Vogue (London), July 1987.
- Mansfield, Stephanie, “Prima Donna,” in Vogue (New York), August 1989.
- Conant, Jennet, “The New Queen of New York,” in Manhattan, Inc., October 1989.
- Chubb, Ann, “Donna Karan,” in Options (London), August 1990.
- Weisman, Katherine, “Designing Woman,” in Forbes, 1 October 1990.
- Cihlar, Kimberly, “Donna’s Man,” in DNR, 12 April 1991.

- White, Constance C.R., “Donna Karan: Talking Bridge,” in WWD, 11 September 1991.
- _____, “DKNY: A Home of Its Own,” in WWD, 12 February 1992.
- Born, Pete, “Karan Fashions a Fragrance,” in WWD, 1 May 1992.
- Howell, Georgina, “Donna’s Prime Time,” in Vogue, August 1992.
- Ducas, June, “Prima Donna,” in Women’s Journal (London), November 1992.
- Rudolph, Barbara, “Donna Inc.,” in Time, 21 December 1992.
- Myerson, Allen R., “Partners at Odds, Donna Karan to Go Public,” in the New York Times, 14 August 1993.
- Cosgrave, Bronwyn, “Donna Karan Crosses the Atlantic,” in Élan magazine of the European (London), 12–14 August 1994.
- Beckett, Kathleen, “Slip-Sliding to a Close: Donna Karan,” in the New York Post, 5 November 1994.
- Spindler, Amy M., “Klein and Karan: Clothes That Do the Job,” in the New York Times, 5 November 1994.
- _____, “Luxurious Armor by Karan, Klein, Mizrahi,” in the New York Times, 8 April 1995.
- “Donna Krishna,” in WWD, 10 April 1995.
- Rutberg, Sidney, “Donna Does It for Fall and Prepares an IPO for Imminent Delivery,” in WWD, 3 April 1996.
- “Donna Does It Today, Making Wall St. Bow with Stock Set at $24,” in WWD, 28 June 1996.
- Drier, Melissa, “Donna Karan: Global Retailer,” in WWD, 24 April 1997.
- Socha, Miles, “Esprit de Corp., Donna Karan Ink DKNY Kids License Deal,” in WWD, 26 February 1998.
- Slott, Mira, “Retailers Ready for Donna Karan Home,” in Home Textiles Today, 2 October 2000.
- “Donna Karan: A Recent History,” in WWD, 19 December 2000.
- Deeny, Godfrey, “Post-Nuclear Donna,” in Fashion Wire Daily, 16 February 2001.
- Limnander, Armand, “Donna Karan,” in Style.com (New York), 16 February 2001.
- Singer, Sally, “Love Story,” in Vogue, August 2001.
- “Donna’s Passion Play,” in DNR, 27 August 2001.
- “Donna Karan,” in Interview, September 2001.

* * *

Donna Karan can be considered the designer who has made it fashionable to be voluptuous. She has based her corporate philosophy on clothes designed to hug a woman but also hide bodily imperfections. “You’ve gotta accent your positive, delete your negative,” she declared in a press release, emphasizing the fact that if you’re pulled together underneath, you can build on top of that. Karan firmly relates designing to herself and her role as a woman. She sees design as a personal expression of the many roles she has had to balance, being a wife, mother, friend, and businessperson. She believes her sex has given her greater insight into solving problems women have with fashion, fulfilling their needs, simplifying dress to make life easier and to add comfort, luxury, and durability.

Originating as a womenswear label, the Karan company also produces menswear, childrenswear, accessories, beauty products, and a fragrance that perpetuate the lifestyle and philosophy instigated by the womenswear line. Donna Karan stresses that she has not drawn the line there. “There’s so much to be done. DKNY underwear, swimwear, home furnishings...the designs are already in my head, it's just a matter of getting them executed."

Donna Karan, fall 2001 collection: savage shearling wrap jacket with a jersey wrap skirt. © AP/Wide World Photos.

Karan was born and raised on Long Island, New York. Both her mother and father were involved in fashion careers, so it seemed inevitable she should follow in their footsteps. After two years studying fashion at Parsons School of Design in New York, she was hired by Anne Klein for a summer job. She later became an associate designer until Klein died in 1974. Her next lucky break was to shape the rest of her career. She was named successor to Anne Klein and together with Louis Dell'Olio, who joined the company a year later, designed the Klein collection.

Shortly after the launch of the diffusion line, Anne Klein II, in 1982, Karan felt ready to go it alone. Together with her husband, Stephen Weiss, she launched the first Donna Karan collection in 1985 and since then the company has grown at a dizzying pace. Karan is inspired by New York; she believes its energy, pace, and vibrance attracts the most sophisticated and artistic people in the world, the type of people and lifestyle for whom she has always designed. Her principle is that clothes should be interchangeable and flexible enough to go from day to evening, summer to winter. Fashion should be a multicultural language, easy, sensuous, and functional, a modern security blanket. Perhaps this explains why her fundamental trademark items, the bodysuits, unitards, black cashmere and stretch fabrics and sensuous bodywrap styles owe great allegiance to the innate style and taste of the artist.

There is a great sense of urgency about Donna Karan; to say there are not enough hours in a day would be an understatement. Her interviews are always frenetic, emotionally charged yet human and blatantly honest. When asked by journalist Sally Brampton to describe her life, she replied, "It's chaos, C.H.A.O.S." Karan's magic touch is a combination of creative flair and marketing know-how. She designs for human needs, people who live, work, and play. She conceptualizes a customer and wardrobe and can then merchandise a line, applying her designer's eye for color, proportion, and fit. In many ways she is like a contemporary American Chanel in that she analyses women's needs with a question to herself: "What do I need? How can I make life easier? How can dressing be simplified so I can get on with my own life?"

In 2000 and 2001 the life of Donna Karan, as a designer and as a woman, changed dramatically. Negotiations with LVMH to acquire a controlling share of DKI (the conglomerate that includes DKNY, Donna Karan, and her widely popular brand of sportswear and jeans) brought immense scrutiny from the entire fashion universe. At the same time, Stephan Weiss—the sculptor, mentor, husband, and friend with whom Karan launched her own design company in 1985—was dying of lung cancer. His death in June 2001 seemed to have galvanized Karan into her finest and most spectacular display of creativity. A new space on Madison Avenue, which had been under construction for three years, was opened to extended accolades from architectural critics as well as the fashion press.

The new store, a three-story brownstone built in 1852, provides over 10,000-square-feet of retail space for Karan designs, which has come to include home accessories. Karan never hesitates to acknowledge her debt to and her admiration for other designers. The first floor of her new Madison Avenue shop is a domestic paradise where DK designs for the home are discreetly arranged among shawls and scented candles and dozens of one-of-a-kind items she has discovered and offers to her customers. She explains that "the first thing I hope people see when they walk in is objects of passion, objects of desire."

Karan has moved from designing the feminine, comfortable clothes that have defined and improved the life of her clients to designs for these customers' homes, and finally to suggesting possessions that appeal to their souls. All the Karan lines, whether for the woman or for the home, respect the busy and chaotic nature of contemporary life. She has never been interested in quantity but now even more emphasizes the choice to live with and dress only in those things of the highest quality that make one utterly happy. Karan's clothing designs (supplemented by accessories, fragrance, and makeup collections) reflect the image of a New York woman; her home furnishings provide a glimpse into a New York lifestyle.

—Kevin Almond; updated by Kathleen Bonann Marshall

KASPER, Herbert

American designer

Born: New York City, 12 December 1926. Education: Studied English at New York University, 1949–53; studied fashion at Parsons

Donna Karan, fall 2001 collection: savage shearling wrap jacket with a jersey wrap skirt. © AP/Wide World Photos.

swimwear, home furnishings...the designs are already in my head, it's just a matter of getting them executed."

Karan was born and raised on Long Island, New York. Both her mother and father were involved in fashion careers, so it seemed inevitable she should follow in their footsteps. After two years studying fashion at Parsons School of Design in New York, she was hired by Anne Klein for a summer job. She later became an associate designer until Klein died in 1974. Her next lucky break was to shape the rest of her career. She was named successor to Anne Klein and together with Louis Dell'Olio, who joined the company a year later, designed the Klein collection.

Shortly after the launch of the diffusion line, Anne Klein II, in 1982, Karan felt ready to go it alone. Together with her husband, Stephen Weiss, she launched the first Donna Karan collection in 1985 and since then the company has grown at a dizzying pace. Karan is inspired by New York; she believes its energy, pace, and vibrance attracts the most sophisticated and artistic people in the world, the type of people and lifestyle for whom she has always designed. Her principle is that clothes should be interchangeable and flexible enough to go from day to evening, summer to winter. Fashion should be a multicultural language, easy, sensuous, and functional, a modern security blanket. Perhaps this explains why her fundamental trademark items, the bodysuits, unitards, black cashmere and stretch fabrics and sensuous bodywrap styles owe great allegiance to the innate style and taste of the artist.

There is a great sense of urgency about Donna Karan; to say there are not enough hours in a day would be an understatement. Her interviews are always frenetic, emotionally charged yet human and blatantly honest. When asked by journalist Sally Brampton to describe her life, she replied, "It's chaos, C.H.A.O.S." Karan's magic touch is a combination of creative flair and marketing know-how. She designs for human needs, people who live, work, and play. She conceptualizes a customer and wardrobe and can then merchandise a line, applying her designer's eye for color, proportion, and fit. In many ways she is like a contemporary American Chanel in that she analyses women's needs with a question to herself: "What do I need? How can I make life easier? How can dressing be simplified so I can get on with my own life?"

In 2000 and 2001 the life of Donna Karan, as a designer and as a woman, changed dramatically. Negotiations with LVMH to acquire a controlling share of DKI (the conglomerate that includes DKNY, Donna Karan, and her widely popular brand of sportswear and jeans) brought immense scrutiny from the entire fashion universe. At the same time, Stephan Weiss—the sculptor, mentor, husband, and friend with whom Karan launched her own design company in 1985—was dying of lung cancer. His death in June 2001 seemed to have galvanized Karan into her finest and most spectacular display of creativity. A new space on Madison Avenue, which had been under construction for three years, was opened to extended accolades from architectural critics as well as the fashion press.

The new store, a three-story brownstone built in 1852, provides over 10,000-square-feet of retail space for Karan designs, which has come to include home accessories. Karan never hesitates to acknowledge her debt to and her admiration for other designers. The first floor of her new Madison Avenue shop is a domestic paradise where DK designs for the home are discreetly arranged among shawls and scented candles and dozens of one-of-a-kind items she has discovered and offers to her customers. She explains that "the first thing I hope people see when they walk in is objects of passion, objects of desire."

Karan has moved from designing the feminine, comfortable clothes that have defined and improved the life of her clients to designs for these customers' homes, and finally to suggesting possessions that appeal to their souls. All the Karan lines, whether for the woman or for the home, respect the busy and chaotic nature of contemporary life. She has never been interested in quantity but now even more emphasizes the choice to live with and dress only in those things of the highest quality that make one utterly happy. Karan's clothing designs (supplemented by accessories, fragrance, and makeup collections) reflect the image of a New York woman; her home furnishings provide a glimpse into a New York lifestyle.

—Kevin Almond; updated by Kathleen Bonann Marshall

KASPER, Herbert

American designer

Born: New York City, 12 December 1926. Education: Studied English at New York University, 1949–53; studied fashion at Parsons

School of Design, New York, 1951–53, and l'École de la Chambre Syndicale de la Couture Parisienne, 1953. Family: Married Betsey Pickering, 1955 (divorced, 1958); married Jondar Conning, 1979. Military Service: Served in the U.S. Army. Career: Spent two years in Paris working for Fath, Rochas, and at Elle magazine; designer, Arnold and Fox, New York, 1954–64; designer, Kasper for Joan Leslie division of Leslie Fay, New York, 1964–85; designer, J.L. Sport, and Kasper for Weatherscope, 1970–85; vice president, Leslie Fay; designer, Kasper for ASL, from 1980. Awards: Coty American Fashion Critics award, 1955, 1970, 1976; Cotton Fashion award, 1972; Maas Brothers Pavilion design award, 1983; Cystic Fibrosis Foundation, Governor of Alabama award, 1984; Ronald MacDonald House award, 1984. Address: 32 East 64th Street, New York, New York 10021, USA.

PUBLICATIONS

On KASPER:

Books

- Morris, Bernadine, and Barbara Walz, The Fashion Makers, New York, 1978.
 Diamonstein, Barbaralee, Fashion: The Inside Story, New York, 1985.
 Milbank, Caroline Rennolds, New York Fashion: The Evolution of American Style, New York, 1989.
 Stegemeyer, Anne, Who's Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.

*

Over a lifetime of designing I've evolved a philosophy that comes from creating clothes for a particular kind of American woman. (Who, by the way, I very much admire.) This woman is adventurous and vital with a lifestyle that demands she play many different roles throughout the day. It's the confident spirit of this kind of woman that inspires me most.

Whatever she's doing, running a home, a career, entertaining, mothering, traveling, I deeply believe this woman remains an individual. No one is going to tell her exactly what she has to wear, no matter what's currently in style. She wants and needs high style, high quality, fashion-conscious clothes that can last for more than one season.... And because I think I have an exceptional ability to anticipate trends, my clothes always have a "today" spirit. I'm constantly refining, improving, interpreting...trying to capture the essence of the times without being trendy. But from whatever source my ideas come from, I always keep in mind that lively, energetic, smart looking woman who is my customer. She's my motivation and my ultimate inspiration.

—Herbert Kasper

* * *

Herbert Kasper has made his name as a designer by working predominantly for one company, Joan Leslie in New York, whom he joined in 1963. In 1980 he became vice president of the company as well as designer, creating high fashion looks that reflected trends but were commercial and wearable. A private customer, Joanne Carson (then the wife of talk-show host Johnny) described his clothes as being both feminine and sexy: "He's got a totally female concept," she enthused, adding that he knew how to put together the perfect interchangeable wardrobe for her various excursions abroad.

Kasper is a designer who really cares about his customer. He wants the person who buys a dress to enjoy it and return for more. His satisfaction comes from seeing a woman look and feel good in his clothes. His reputation has always been that of a respectable craftsman who honors all levels of production involved in creating fashion, from design to manufacture.

After military service in World War II, where he designed costumes for the troupe shows in which he took part as a chorus boy, Kasper enrolled at Parsons School of Design in New York. He then spent two years in Paris perfecting his skills, with a short period at l'École de la Chambre Syndicale de la Couture, Paris, and positions at Jacques Fath and Marcel Rochas. Returning to the U.S., he worked for the milliner Mr. Fred, where his reputation grew. In his next position as dress designer for a company called Penart, Lord & Taylor in New York—which was promoting American designers—said they wanted to feature his work. Kasper's designs were then featured as Kasper of Penart. His talent was for making inexpensive clothes look exquisite and expensive, which endeared him to several other Seventh Avenue manufacturers in the 1950s.

Kasper's forte has always been dresses, but a designer's job involves adapting to the demands of the market and in the early 1970s he opened a sportswear division for Joan Leslie, J.L. Sport. Part of his fashion philosophy has been that clothes should always work together, so he often found it difficult to differentiate between these two lines when designing. A coat for Joan Leslie Dresses, he once declared, could work equally well with the less expensive separates line for J.L. Sport.

While working in Paris, Kasper noted that women spent a great deal of money on custom-made clothes, ordering several outfits for different occasions. He formed a philosophy based on these observations that individual garments should be mixed and matched with many others to create several outfits, a sportswear concept that has become a way of life in the U.S. and elsewhere.

Kasper has always been a great socialite. His social life inspired his work because it gave him an insight into how people live, their attitudes, and changing tastes. As a designer he is happy with his work, regarding each creation as one of his own children, which in a way justifies his devotion to his craft.

—Kevin Almond

KAWAKUBO, Rei

Japanese designer

Born: Tokyo, Japan, 1942. Education: Graduated in fine arts, Keio University, Tokyo, 1964. Career: Worked in advertising department, Asahi Kasei textile firm, 1964–66; freelance designer, 1967–69; founder/designer, Comme des Garçons, 1969, firm incorporated, 1973; introduced Homme menswear line, 1978; introduced tricot knitwear and Robe de Chambre lines, 1981; opened first Paris boutique, 1981; formed Comme des Garçons, S.A. ready-to-wear subsidiary, 1982, formed New York subsidiary, 1986; launched furniture collection, 1983; introduced Homme Plus collection, 1984;

School of Design, New York, 1951–53, and l'École de la Chambre Syndicale de la Couture Parisienne, 1953. Family: Married Betsey Pickering, 1955 (divorced, 1958); married Jondar Conning, 1979. Military Service: Served in the U.S. Army. Career: Spent two years in Paris working for Fath, Rochas, and at Elle magazine; designer, Arnold and Fox, New York, 1954–64; designer, Kasper for Joan Leslie division of Leslie Fay, New York, 1964–85; designer, J.L. Sport, and Kasper for Weatherscope, 1970–85; vice president, Leslie Fay; designer, Kasper for ASL, from 1980. Awards: Coty American Fashion Critics award, 1955, 1970, 1976; Cotton Fashion award, 1972; Maas Brothers Pavilion design award, 1983; Cystic Fibrosis Foundation, Governor of Alabama award, 1984; Ronald MacDonald House award, 1984. Address: 32 East 64th Street, New York, New York 10021, USA.

PUBLICATIONS

On KASPER:

Books

- Morris, Bernadine, and Barbara Walz, The Fashion Makers, New York, 1978.
 Diamonstein, Barbaralee, Fashion: The Inside Story, New York, 1985.
 Milbank, Caroline Rennolds, New York Fashion: The Evolution of American Style, New York, 1989.
 Stegemeyer, Anne, Who's Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.

*

Over a lifetime of designing I've evolved a philosophy that comes from creating clothes for a particular kind of American woman. (Who, by the way, I very much admire.) This woman is adventurous and vital with a lifestyle that demands she play many different roles throughout the day. It's the confident spirit of this kind of woman that inspires me most.

Whatever she's doing, running a home, a career, entertaining, mothering, traveling, I deeply believe this woman remains an individual. No one is going to tell her exactly what she has to wear, no matter what's currently in style. She wants and needs high style, high quality, fashion-conscious clothes that can last for more than one season.... And because I think I have an exceptional ability to anticipate trends, my clothes always have a "today" spirit. I'm constantly refining, improving, interpreting...trying to capture the essence of the times without being trendy. But from whatever source my ideas come from, I always keep in mind that lively, energetic, smart looking woman who is my customer. She's my motivation and my ultimate inspiration.

—Herbert Kasper

* * *

Herbert Kasper has made his name as a designer by working predominantly for one company, Joan Leslie in New York, whom he joined in 1963. In 1980 he became vice president of the company as well as designer, creating high fashion looks that reflected trends but were commercial and wearable. A private customer, Joanne Carson (then the wife of talk-show host Johnny) described his clothes as being both feminine and sexy: "He's got a totally female concept," she enthused, adding that he knew how to put together the perfect interchangeable wardrobe for her various excursions abroad.

Kasper is a designer who really cares about his customer. He wants the person who buys a dress to enjoy it and return for more. His satisfaction comes from seeing a woman look and feel good in his clothes. His reputation has always been that of a respectable craftsman who honors all levels of production involved in creating fashion, from design to manufacture.

After military service in World War II, where he designed costumes for the troupe shows in which he took part as a chorus boy, Kasper enrolled at Parsons School of Design in New York. He then spent two years in Paris perfecting his skills, with a short period at l'École de la Chambre Syndicale de la Couture, Paris, and positions at Jacques Fath and Marcel Rochas. Returning to the U.S., he worked for the milliner Mr. Fred, where his reputation grew. In his next position as dress designer for a company called Penart, Lord & Taylor in New York—which was promoting American designers—said they wanted to feature his work. Kasper's designs were then featured as Kasper of Penart. His talent was for making inexpensive clothes look exquisite and expensive, which endeared him to several other Seventh Avenue manufacturers in the 1950s.

Kasper's forte has always been dresses, but a designer's job involves adapting to the demands of the market and in the early 1970s he opened a sportswear division for Joan Leslie, J.L. Sport. Part of his fashion philosophy has been that clothes should always work together, so he often found it difficult to differentiate between these two lines when designing. A coat for Joan Leslie Dresses, he once declared, could work equally well with the less expensive separates line for J.L. Sport.

While working in Paris, Kasper noted that women spent a great deal of money on custom-made clothes, ordering several outfits for different occasions. He formed a philosophy based on these observations that individual garments should be mixed and matched with many others to create several outfits, a sportswear concept that has become a way of life in the U.S. and elsewhere.

Kasper has always been a great socialite. His social life inspired his work because it gave him an insight into how people live, their attitudes, and changing tastes. As a designer he is happy with his work, regarding each creation as one of his own children, which in a way justifies his devotion to his craft.

—Kevin Almond

KAWAKUBO, Rei

Japanese designer

Born: Tokyo, Japan, 1942. Education: Graduated in fine arts, Keio University, Tokyo, 1964. Career: Worked in advertising department, Asahi Kasei textile firm, 1964–66; freelance designer, 1967–69; founder/designer, Comme des Garçons, 1969, firm incorporated, 1973; introduced Homme menswear line, 1978; introduced tricot knitwear and Robe de Chambre lines, 1981; opened first Paris boutique, 1981; formed Comme des Garçons, S.A. ready-to-wear subsidiary, 1982, formed New York subsidiary, 1986; launched furniture collection, 1983; introduced Homme Plus collection, 1984; opened men's Paris boutique, 1986; introduced Homme Deux and Noir collections, 1987; published Comme des Garçons Six magazine, from 1988; opened Tokyo flagship store, 1989; introduced, then removed men's pajama line, 1995; unveiled "padded" clothing, 1996; presented fused collection, 1998; opened Comme des Garçons shop in Chelsea, 1999; opened Comme des Garçons Two in Tokyo, 1999. Exhibitions: A New Wave in Fashion: Three Japanese Designers, Phoenix, Arizona, Art Museum, 1983; Mode et Photo, Comme des Garçons, Centre Georges Pompidou, Paris, 1986; Three Women: Madeleine Vionnet, Claire McCordell, and Rei Kawakubo, Fashion Institute of Technology, New York, 1987; Essence of Quality, Kyoto Costume Institute, Tokyo, 1993. Awards: Mainichi Newspaper Fashion award, 1983, 1988; Fashion Group Night of the Stars award, New York, 1986; Chevalier de L'Ordre des Arts et des Lettres, Paris, 1993; Harvard Graduate School of Design Excellence in Design award, 2000. Address: Comme des Garçons, 5–11–5 Minamiaoyama, Minato-ku Tokyo 107, Japan.

PUBLICATIONS

On KAWAKUBO:

Books

- A New Wave in Fashion: Three Japanese Designers*, [exhibition catalogue], Phoenix, AZ, 1983.
 Koren, Leonard, New Fashion Japan, Tokyo, 1984.
Comme des Garçons, [exhibition catalogue], Tokyo, 1986.
 Koda, Harold, et al., Three Women: Madeleine Vionnet, Claire McCordell, and Rei Kawakubo, [exhibition catalogue], New York, 1987.
 Sparke, Penny, Japanese Design, London, 1987.
 Sudjic, Deyan, Rei Kawakubo and Comme des Garçons, New York, 1990.
 Steele, Valerie, Women of Fashion: Twentieth-Century Designers, New York, 1991.
 Hiesinger, Kathryn B., and Felice Fischer, Japanese Design: A Survey Since 1950, New York, 1995.
 Stegemeyer, Anne, Who's Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.

Articles

- Cocks, Jay, "Into the Soul of the Fabric," in Time, 1 August 1983.
 Saint-Leon, Rhoda Marcus de, "Comme des Garçons: Rei Kawakubo Makes Magic," in American Fabrics and Fashions (Newtown, CT), Fall 1983.
 Koda, Harold, "Rei Kawakubo and the Aesthetic of Poverty," in Dress (Earlvile, MD), No. 11, 1985.
 Mower, Sarah, "The Kimono with Added Cut and Thrust," in The Guardian (London), 6 March 1986.
 Sudjic, Deyan, "All the Way Back to Zero," in the Sunday Times (London), 20 April 1986.
 Stetser, Maggie, "Future Shock, with the Brilliant Innovators of Japanese Fashion," in Connoisseur (London), September 1986.
 Conant, Jennet, "The Monk and the Nun: The Shock Value of Two Japanese Designers," in Newsweek, 2 February 1987.
 Martin, Richard, "Aesthetic Dress: The Art of Rei Kawakubo," in Arts Magazine (New York), March 1987.
 Withers, Jane, "Black: The Zero Option," in the Face (London), March 1987.

- Morris, Bernadine, "A New York Exhibition Traces the Evolution of Modern Fashion in the Designs of Vionnet, McCordell and Kawakubo," in the Chicago Tribune, 11 March 1987.
 Weinstein, Jeff, "Vionnet, McCordell, Kawakubo: Why There Are Three Great Women Artists," in the Village Voice (New York), 31 March 1987.
 Drier, Deborah, "Designing Women," in Art in America (New York), May 1987.
 Klensch, Elsa, "Another World of Style...Rei Kawakubo," in Vogue (New York), August 1987.
 Delmar, Michael, "Avec Rei Kawakubo," in Jardin des Modes, September 1987.
 Filmer, Deny, "Designer Focus: Rei Kawakubo," in Cosmopolitan (London), May 1988.
 Popham, Peter, "Modern Art by the Yard," in the Sunday Times (London), 16 April 1989.
 Jeal, Nicola, "Mistress of Monochrome," in the Observer (London), 22 October 1989.
 Livingston, David, "New Decade for Kawakubo," in the Globe and Mail, 26 October 1989.
 "Back from Zero," in Blueprint (London), November 1990.
 Morozzi, Christina, "Partire da Zero," in Moda (Milan), April 1991.
 Yusuf, Nilgin, "My Criterion is Beauty: Rei Kawakubo of Comme des Garçons," in Marie Claire (London), April 1992.
 Bowles, Hamish, "Fashion's Visionary," in Vogue, March 1993.
 Menkes, Suzy, "'Auschwitz' Fashions Draw Jewish Rebuke," in the International Herald Tribune, 4 February 1995.
 Martin, Richard, "The Shock(ing) Value at Fashion's Cutting Edge," in the Los Angeles Times, 19 February 1995.
 Spindler, Amy M., "Beyond Sweet, Beyond Black, Beyond 2001," in the New York Times, 17 March 1995.
 Brubach, Holly, "Witness for the Defense," in the New York Times, 2 April 1995.
 Posnick, Phyllis, "The Rei Way," in Vogue (New York), October 1995.
 Spindler, Amy M., "Avant-Gardist Comes into Bloom," in the New York Times, 14 March 1996.
 ———, "Three Revolutionaries Decide to Play It Safe," in the New York Times, 9 July 1996.
 Als, Hilton, "Bump and Mind," in Artforum International (New York), December 1996.
 "Venus Envy," in Vogue (New York), March 1997.
 Schiro, Anne-Marie, "The Deconstructivists: Summing Up the Parts," in the New York Times, 13 March 1998.
 White, Constance C.R., "Getting Personal in Paris with Romantic Visions," in the New York Times, 7 July 1998.
 Viladas, Pilar, "Up from SoHo," in the New York Times Magazine, 14 March 1999.
 Bussel, Abby, "The Mod Pod," in Interior Design, April 1999.
 Szabo, Julia, "Comme des Garçons Christmas Pillow," in the International Design Magazine (New York), July/August 1999.
 Larson, Soren, "A Futuristic Comme des Garçons Store in Tokyo Beckons Shoppers down its Meandering Paths," in Architectural Record (New York), September 1999.
 McGuire, Penny, "Garçons a la Mode," in the Architectural Review (London), October 1999.
 Cramer, Ned, "Unfashionable Fashion," in Architecture (Washington), May 2000.
 Rapp, Alan E., "Star Studded," in the International Design Magazine (New York), June 2000.

- Bellafante, Gina, "Paris Query: Just What is a Woman?" in the New York Times, 10 October 2000.
- Profile, "Comme des Garçons," available online at Fashion Live, www.fashionlive.com, 19 March 2001.
- Beals, Gregory, "Recession Rags: Japan's Young New Designers are Creating Functional Clothes with Conscience," in Newsweek, 9 July 2001.

*

My approach to fashion design is influenced by my daily life...my search for new means of expression. I feel that recently there has been a little more of an interest towards those who look for new ideas and who are searching for a new sense of values. My wish is to be able to continue my search for the new.

—Rei Kawakubo

* * *

Rei Kawakubo's work is both paradox and ideological imperative. Minimal, monochromatic, and modernist, her approach to fashion design challenges conventional beauty without forgoing stylish cloth, cut, and color. Her clothing is not so much about the body as the space around the body and the metaphor of self. Architectural in conception and decidedly abstract, the clothing nevertheless derives from Japanese traditional wear.

Kawakubo emerged as a clothing designer by an indirect route, from both a training in fine arts at Keio University in Tokyo and work in advertising for Asahi Kasei, a major chemical company that produced acrylic fibers—promoted through fashionable clothing. In 1967 she became a freelance stylist, a rarity in Japan at the time. Her dissatisfaction with available clothes for the fashion shoots provided the impetus for designing her own garments. She launched the Comme des Garçons women's collection in Tokyo in 1975 with her first shop in Minami-Aoyama and her first catalogue the same year. It was an especially fertile period for Japanese fashion design, with the concurrent rise of Issey Miyake and Yohji Yamamoto.

Kawakubo's themes combine the essence of Japanese traditional work-end streetwear, its simplicity of style, fabric, and color, with an admiration for modern architecture, especially the purism of Le Corbusier and Tadao Ando. Translated into clothing's rational construction, these affinities emphasize the idea of garment—the garment as a construction in space, essentially a structure to live in. The tradition of the kimono, with its architectural silhouette off the body and its many-layered complexity of body wrappings, combines with a graphic approach that is flat and abstract. It is a disarming look that requires a cognitive leap in wearability and social function.

The building block of Kawakubo's design is the fabric, the thread that produces the clothing structure. Her long-standing collaboration with specialty weaver Hiroshi Matsushita has allowed her to reformulate the actual fabric on the loom, the complexities of the weave, the imperfections, the texture of the fabric. Her 1981 launch of the Comme des Garçons line in Paris marked her first international exposure and the introduction of her loom-distressed weaves. What have been referred to as "rag-picker" clothes, an homage to the spontaneity and inventiveness of street people, was based on fabric innovation—cloth that crumpled and wrapped, that draped coarsely as layers, folded and buttoned at random. Most notable of these was her so-called "lace" knitwear of 1982, in which sweaters were purposely knitted to incorporate various-sized holes that appeared as rips and tears or intentionally intricate webs. This was an attack on lingering Victorianism in fashion, on the conventional, the precise, and the tight-laced. It offered a rational argument for antiform at a time when minimalism had lapsed into decorativeness.

Kawakubo's use of monochromatic black as her signature is analytical and subtle rather than sensual and brash. Black, which is often perceived as flattering, assumes the status of a noncolor—an absence rather than a presence. Her intent is to reject clothes as mere decoration for the body. Even with the later introduction of saturated color in the late 1980s lines, in which her clothes became slimmer, black was still a basic—evident in the Noir line as well as in Homme and Homme Plus, her menswear collections.

Her control of the presentation of Comme des Garçons in photography, catwalk shows, the design of store interiors, catalogues, and most recently a magazine is integral to the design concept that extends from the clothing. Kawakubo was the first to use nonprofessional models, art world personalities, and film celebrities, both in photography for catalogues and in catwalk shows. Her early catalogues from the 1970s featured noted figures from Japanese art and literature.

The 1988 introduction of the quarto-sized biannual magazine Six (for sixth sense) replaced the Comme des Garçons catalogues and pushed Kawakubo's antifashion ideas to extreme. These photographic essays became enigmatic vehicles for stream-of-consciousness, surrealism, exoticism, and Zen, which informs Kawakubo's sensibility and, ultimately, in a semiotic way, is imbued in her fashion designs. Kawakubo's ideas have explored the realm of possibilities associated with the production and selling of clothing. Her control of the environment of her stores—including the sparse design of the interiors (on which she collaborates with architect Takao Kawasaki), the industrial racks and shelves, the way the salespeople act and dress, and even the furnishings (which she designs and sells)—is total and defining. Her art is one of extending the boundaries of self-presentation and self-awareness into an environment of multivalent signs. It is an extension of fashion design into the realism of metaphysic, of "self in landscape," of which the clothing is a bare trace.

Controversy, for which the inventive icon was often criticized, sparked again when the "anti" designer introduced "Sleep," her Comme des Garçons men's pajama collection. Striped and available in layers, the pajamas came as a reminder of the Nazi death camps, for the show occurred on the 50th anniversary of the Holocaust. The line, described as being stamped with "identification numbers" displayed by "emaciated" models with "shaved heads," soon was removed by Kawakubo herself.

With her disputed pajama line behind her and experimental style still much a part of her work, Kawakubo continued to present obscure designs in her connoisseur show. This time floral prints took to the stage and, contrary to popular belief, screamed success—exactly the recognition the Japanese designer needed to regain her renowned reputation.

Nearing the end of 1996, Kawakubo introduced the concept that "body meets dress, dress meets body and becomes one." Experimenting with new forms and new bodies, the creator inserted basketball-sized pads into her clothing. These deformities, according to Kawakubo, exemplify the "actual" rather than the 'natural.' Critics claim the effect depends on the eye—to some, the eye adjusts and the look becomes real; to others, it is merely "strange."

Kawakubo's fashion is based on the event, not the clothes themselves. No music, no theatrics, and not even an audience are typical of the designer's shows. In 1998, the unpredictable artist designed outfits of unfinished patterns. The collection, as Kawakubo put it, was based on releasing energy through fusion. More recent, however, was the addition of her Comme des Garçons shop in the Chelsea district of New York City. The intimate, space-age interior occupies a bold, futuristic setting. The look is supposed to offer a highly personal experience of discovery. Described as mysterious, like its sculptor, the entranceway is hidden to imply exclusivity and says, "If you aren't in the know, then don't bother."

Next came Comme des Garçons Two, which opened in Tokyo, Kawakubo's first shop devoted strictly to clothing. This renovated boutique was inviting to outsiders, focusing on movement and interaction. A Paris shop followed, with "anti" perfumes as its focus. Kawakubo designed the new shops with Takao Kawasaki and Future Systems. Kawakubo's contemporary art and complex fashion trends later earned her the third recipient of the Harvard Graduate School of Design's annual Excellence in Design award.

—Sarah Bodine; updated by Diana Idzelis

KELLY, Patrick

American designer working in Paris

Born: Vicksburg, Mississippi, 24 September 1954. Education: Studied art history and black history at Jackson State University, Jackson, Mississippi, and fashion design at Parsons School of Design, New York. Career: Held various jobs in Atlanta, Georgia, including window dresser, Rive Gauche boutique; instructor, Barbizon School of Modeling; vintage clothing store proprietor, mid-1970s; moved to Paris, 1980; costume designer, Le Palais club, early 1980s; also freelance designer, 1980–90; Patrick Kelly, Paris, formed, and first ready-to-wear collection introduced, 1985; freelance sportswear designer, Benetton, 1986; opened first boutique in Paris, produced first couture collection, sold worldwide rights to ready-to-wear collections, 1987. Died: 1 January 1990, in Paris.

PUBLICATION

On KELLY:

Books

Stegemeyer, Anne, Who's Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.

Articles

Cocks, Jay, "The Color of New Blood: Some Snazzy Duds from Three Upstarts," Time, 10 November 1986.

Bain, Sally, "The King of Cling," in the Drapers Record (London), 16 May 1987.

Johnson, Bonnie, "In Paris, His Slinky Dresses Have Made Mississippi-born Designer Patrick Kelly the New King of Cling," in People, 15 June 1987.

George, Leslie, "Patrick Kelly: An American in Paris," in WWD, 15 January 1988.

Whitaker, Charles, "Black Designer Dazzles Paris," Ebony, February 1988.

Gross, Michael, "Kelly's Blackout," in New York, 23 May 1988.

Conant, Jennet, "Buttons and Billiard Balls: A Designer from the Deep South Captures Paris," in Newsweek (New York), 27 June 1988.

"Meet Patrick Kelly," in Vogue Patterns (New York and London), July 1988.

Dissly, Megan, in Christian Science Monitor, 25 August 1988.

Hornblower, Margot, "An Original American in Paris," in Time, 3 April 1989.

Goodwin, Betty, "Maverick and Mastermind," in the Los Angeles Times, 7 April 1989.

Johnson, Pamela, "Patrick Kelly: Prince of Paris," in Essence, May 1989.

"Glitz Tips: Do-it-Yourself Ideas from Glitzmeister Patrick Kelly," in Chatelaine (Toronto), September 1989.

Gross, Michael, "Patrick Kelly: Exuberant Style Animates the American Designer's Paris Atelier," in Architectural Digest (Los Angeles), September 1989.

"Patrick Kelly" (obituary), in the New York Times, 2 January 1990.

Moore, Jackie, "Patrick Kelly" (obituary), in The Independent (London), 11 January 1990.

"Designer Dies," in DR: The Fashion Business (London), 13 January 1990.

"Mississippi Couturier," in U.S. News and World Report (Washington), 15 January 1990.

"Designer Patrick Kelly Dies of Bone Marrow Disease," in Jet (New York), 22 January 1990.

"Patrick Kelly," in Current Biography (New York), March 1990.

Articles also in Women's Wear Daily (New York), 3 January 1990 and 2 April 1990.

* * *

According to a "Love List" published in Women's Wear Daily in March 1990, designer Patrick Kelly adored fried chicken, foie gras, and pearls. Kelly's designs celebrated pride in his spiritual upbringing in the American South and a tourist-like adoration of Paris. Not for the faint-hearted, his specialty was form-fitting knits irreverently decorated with oversized and mismatched buttons, watermelons, black baby dolls, and huge rhinestones densely silhouetting the Eiffel Tower.

Wearing too-big overalls and a biker's cap emblazoned "Paris," Kelly engendered folklore as important as the clothing he designed. Growing up in Mississippi where he was taught sewing by his grandmother, Kelly later sold vintage clothing in Atlanta, and failed to be hired on New York's Seventh Avenue. He bought a one-way ticket to Paris from a model/friend and the trip resulted in his being discovered while selling his own designs in a Paris flea market.

Kelly was exotic and different. He and his clothing charmed the French and the rest of the world, and he was the first American ever admitted to the elite Chambre Syndicale de la Couture Parisienne, the group of Paris-based designers permitted to show collections in the Louvre. Exuberantly witty, his first show at the Louvre began with Kelly spray painting a large red heart on a white canvas, and included dresses entitled "Jungle Lisa Loves Tarzan," a spoof of Mona Lisa featuring leopard-print gowns.

Kelly's designs remained unpretentious yet sexy, affordable while glamorous. Dresses were fun and unconstrained, yet Kelly paid great

Kawakubo's fashion is based on the event, not the clothes themselves. No music, no theatrics, and not even an audience are typical of the designer's shows. In 1998, the unpredictable artist designed outfits of unfinished patterns. The collection, as Kawakubo put it, was based on releasing energy through fusion. More recent, however, was the addition of her Comme des Garçons shop in the Chelsea district of New York City. The intimate, space-age interior occupies a bold, futuristic setting. The look is supposed to offer a highly personal experience of discovery. Described as mysterious, like its sculptor, the entranceway is hidden to imply exclusivity and says, "If you aren't in the know, then don't bother."

Next came Comme des Garçons Two, which opened in Tokyo, Kawakubo's first shop devoted strictly to clothing. This renovated boutique was inviting to outsiders, focusing on movement and interaction. A Paris shop followed, with "anti" perfumes as its focus. Kawakubo designed the new shops with Takao Kawasaki and Future Systems. Kawakubo's contemporary art and complex fashion trends later earned her the third recipient of the Harvard Graduate School of Design's annual Excellence in Design award.

—Sarah Bodine; updated by Diana Idzelis

KELLY, Patrick

American designer working in Paris

Born: Vicksburg, Mississippi, 24 September 1954. Education: Studied art history and black history at Jackson State University, Jackson, Mississippi, and fashion design at Parsons School of Design, New York. Career: Held various jobs in Atlanta, Georgia, including window dresser, Rive Gauche boutique; instructor, Barbizon School of Modeling; vintage clothing store proprietor, mid-1970s; moved to Paris, 1980; costume designer, Le Palais club, early 1980s; also freelance designer, 1980–90; Patrick Kelly, Paris, formed, and first ready-to-wear collection introduced, 1985; freelance sportswear designer, Benetton, 1986; opened first boutique in Paris, produced first couture collection, sold worldwide rights to ready-to-wear collections, 1987. Died: 1 January 1990, in Paris.

PUBLICATION

On KELLY:

Books

Stegemeyer, Anne, Who's Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.

Articles

Cocks, Jay, "The Color of New Blood: Some Snazzy Duds from Three Upstarts," Time, 10 November 1986.

Bain, Sally, "The King of Cling," in the Drapers Record (London), 16 May 1987.

Johnson, Bonnie, "In Paris, His Slinky Dresses Have Made Mississippi-born Designer Patrick Kelly the New King of Cling," in People, 15 June 1987.

George, Leslie, "Patrick Kelly: An American in Paris," in WWD, 15 January 1988.

Whitaker, Charles, "Black Designer Dazzles Paris," Ebony, February 1988.

Gross, Michael, "Kelly's Blackout," in New York, 23 May 1988.

Conant, Jennet, "Buttons and Billiard Balls: A Designer from the Deep South Captures Paris," in Newsweek (New York), 27 June 1988.

"Meet Patrick Kelly," in Vogue Patterns (New York and London), July 1988.

Dissly, Megan, in Christian Science Monitor, 25 August 1988.

Hornblower, Margot, "An Original American in Paris," in Time, 3 April 1989.

Goodwin, Betty, "Maverick and Mastermind," in the Los Angeles Times, 7 April 1989.

Johnson, Pamela, "Patrick Kelly: Prince of Paris," in Essence, May 1989.

"Glitz Tips: Do-it-Yourself Ideas from Glitzmeister Patrick Kelly," in Chatelaine (Toronto), September 1989.

Gross, Michael, "Patrick Kelly: Exuberant Style Animates the American Designer's Paris Atelier," in Architectural Digest (Los Angeles), September 1989.

"Patrick Kelly" (obituary), in the New York Times, 2 January 1990.

Moore, Jackie, "Patrick Kelly" (obituary), in The Independent (London), 11 January 1990.

"Designer Dies," in DR: The Fashion Business (London), 13 January 1990.

"Mississippi Couturier," in U.S. News and World Report (Washington), 15 January 1990.

"Designer Patrick Kelly Dies of Bone Marrow Disease," in Jet (New York), 22 January 1990.

"Patrick Kelly," in Current Biography (New York), March 1990.

Articles also in Women's Wear Daily (New York), 3 January 1990 and 2 April 1990.

* * *

According to a "Love List" published in Women's Wear Daily in March 1990, designer Patrick Kelly adored fried chicken, foie gras, and pearls. Kelly's designs celebrated pride in his spiritual upbringing in the American South and a tourist-like adoration of Paris. Not for the faint-hearted, his specialty was form-fitting knits irreverently decorated with oversized and mismatched buttons, watermelons, black baby dolls, and huge rhinestones densely silhouetting the Eiffel Tower.

Wearing too-big overalls and a biker's cap emblazoned "Paris," Kelly engendered folklore as important as the clothing he designed. Growing up in Mississippi where he was taught sewing by his grandmother, Kelly later sold vintage clothing in Atlanta, and failed to be hired on New York's Seventh Avenue. He bought a one-way ticket to Paris from a model/friend and the trip resulted in his being discovered while selling his own designs in a Paris flea market.

Kelly was exotic and different. He and his clothing charmed the French and the rest of the world, and he was the first American ever admitted to the elite Chambre Syndicale de la Couture Parisienne, the group of Paris-based designers permitted to show collections in the Louvre. Exuberantly witty, his first show at the Louvre began with Kelly spray painting a large red heart on a white canvas, and included dresses entitled "Jungle Lisa Loves Tarzan," a spoof of Mona Lisa featuring leopard-print gowns.

Kelly's designs remained unpretentious yet sexy, affordable while glamorous. Dresses were fun and unconstrained, yet Kelly paid great attention to design details. Bold, theatrical details such as white topstitching on black, low necklines, and dice buttons on a pin-striped business dress, silver fringe on a western skirt, and vibrant color combinations make one want to shimmy just looking at them. Kelly's art was in embellishment of women, young and old. Trims become jewelry; collars and hemlines become frames. Frills are exaggerated, enlarged, unexpected, and rethought, saucily decorating what would otherwise be rather simple designs.

A love-in atmosphere prevailed at an April 1989 show and lecture for students at New York's Fashion Institute of Technology. A standing-room-only crowd screamed, laughed, and applauded Kelly—his effervescence and his happiness were contagious. He showed a sassy and smart collection, including a tight black mini dress with shiny multicolored buttons outlining a perfect heart on the buttocks; wide, notched, off-the-shoulder collars; leopard-print trench coats and turtlenecked body suits; multicolored scarves suspended from the hip, swaying below abbreviated hemlines; and a trompe l'oeil bustier of buttons on a fitted mini dress. Kelly's models danced, even smiled, down the catwalk, delighted to be wearing his clothing (they modeled this show for free). The audience was delighted to be there: the clothing and designer seemed to be welcoming everyone to a good party, and everyone had a good time.

Kelly's personal attention to detail, his love of design, his spirit, sold his clothing. He stated "the ultimate goal is selling," but he did more than just sell. Wearing a Patrick Kelly dress meant embracing one's past, doing the best with what you have, triumphing over failure, and laughing at oneself. One could be part of Patrick Kelly's fairy tale and celebrate his joie de vivre. Kelly died too young, at age 35, of a brain tumor and bone-marrow disease, in Paris.

—Jane Burns

KENZO

Japanese designer working in Paris

Born: Kenzo Takada in Tokyo, Japan, 27 February 1939. Education: Bunka College of Fashion. Career: Designer for Sanai department store; pattern designer, Soen magazine, Tokyo, 1960–64; freelance designer, Paris, from 1965, selling to Féraud, Rodier, and several department stores; designer for Pisanti; established Jungle Jap boutique in Paris, 1970; opened Rue Cherche Midi Boutique, 1972; established Kenzo-Paris boutique, New York, 1983; launched menswear line, 1983; opened boutiques in Paris, Aix en Provence, Bordeaux, Lille, Lyon, Saint-Tropez, Copenhagen, London, Milan, and Tokyo, 1984–85; launched menswear and womenswear lines, Kenzo Jeans, and junior line, Kenzo Jungle, 1986; launched Kenzo Bed Linen and Bath Wear line, 1987; opened boutiques in Rome, New York, 1987; established childrenswear line, 1987; launched womenswear line, Kenzo City, 1988; opened boutique in Brussels, 1989, and Stockholm, 1990; launched line of bath products, Le Bain, 1990; opened boutique in Hong Kong, 1990, Bangkok, 1991, and Singapore, 1991; launched Kenzo Maison line, 1992; launched Bambou line, 1994. Perfumes: Kenzo, 1988; Parfum d'été, 1992; has also designed costumes for opera; film director. Company continued on after his retirement in 1999. Awards: Soen prize, 1960; Fashion Editors Club of Japan prize, 1972; Bath Museum of Costume Dress of the Year award, 1976, 1977; Chevalier de l'Ordre des Arts et des Lettres, 1984. Address: 3 Place des Victoires, 75002 Paris. Website: www.kenzo.com.

Kenzo, spring/summer 2002 ready-to-wear collection. © AFP/CORBIS.

PUBLICATIONS

On KENZO:

Books

- Milbank, Caroline Rennolds, Couture: The Great Designers, New York, 1985.
- Sparke, Penny, Japanese Design, London, 1987.
- Sainderichin, Ginette, Kenzo, Paris, 1989.
- Stegemeyer, Anne, Who's Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.

Articles

- "The JAP Designer," in Newsweek, 1 May 1972.
- Morris, Bernadine, "Designer Does What He Likes—and It's Liked," in the New York Times, 12 July 1972.
- _____, "Kenzo Displays His Imagination," in the New York Times, 4 April 1973.

attention to design details. Bold, theatrical details such as white topstitching on black, low necklines, and dice buttons on a pin-striped business dress, silver fringe on a western skirt, and vibrant color combinations make one want to shimmy just looking at them. Kelly's art was in embellishment of women, young and old. Trims become jewelry; collars and hemlines become frames. Frills are exaggerated, enlarged, unexpected, and rethought, saucily decorating what would otherwise be rather simple designs.

A love-in atmosphere prevailed at an April 1989 show and lecture for students at New York's Fashion Institute of Technology. A standing-room-only crowd screamed, laughed, and applauded Kelly—his effervescence and his happiness were contagious. He showed a sassy and smart collection, including a tight black mini dress with shiny multicolored buttons outlining a perfect heart on the buttocks; wide, notched, off-the-shoulder collars; leopard-print trench coats and turtlenecked body suits; multicolored scarves suspended from the hip, swaying below abbreviated hemlines; and a trompe l'oeil bustier of buttons on a fitted mini dress. Kelly's models danced, even smiled, down the catwalk, delighted to be wearing his clothing (they modeled this show for free). The audience was delighted to be there: the clothing and designer seemed to be welcoming everyone to a good party, and everyone had a good time.

Kelly's personal attention to detail, his love of design, his spirit, sold his clothing. He stated "the ultimate goal is selling," but he did more than just sell. Wearing a Patrick Kelly dress meant embracing one's past, doing the best with what you have, triumphing over failure, and laughing at oneself. One could be part of Patrick Kelly's fairy tale and celebrate his joie de vivre. Kelly died too young, at age 35, of a brain tumor and bone-marrow disease, in Paris.

—Jane Burns

KENZO

Japanese designer working in Paris

Born: Kenzo Takada in Tokyo, Japan, 27 February 1939. Education: Bunka College of Fashion. Career: Designer for Sanai department store; pattern designer, Soen magazine, Tokyo, 1960–64; freelance designer, Paris, from 1965, selling to Féraud, Rodier, and several department stores; designer for Pisanti; established Jungle Jap boutique in Paris, 1970; opened Rue Cherche Midi Boutique, 1972; established Kenzo-Paris boutique, New York, 1983; launched menswear line, 1983; opened boutiques in Paris, Aix en Provence, Bordeaux, Lille, Lyon, Saint-Tropez, Copenhagen, London, Milan, and Tokyo, 1984–85; launched menswear and womenswear lines, Kenzo Jeans, and junior line, Kenzo Jungle, 1986; launched Kenzo Bed Linen and Bath Wear line, 1987; opened boutiques in Rome, New York, 1987; established childrenswear line, 1987; launched womenswear line, Kenzo City, 1988; opened boutique in Brussels, 1989, and Stockholm, 1990; launched line of bath products, Le Bain, 1990; opened boutique in Hong Kong, 1990, Bangkok, 1991, and Singapore, 1991; launched Kenzo Maison line, 1992; launched Bambou line, 1994. Perfumes: Kenzo, 1988; Parfum d'été, 1992; has also designed costumes for opera; film director. Company continued on after his retirement in 1999. Awards: Soen prize, 1960; Fashion Editors Club of Japan prize, 1972; Bath Museum of Costume Dress of the Year award, 1976, 1977; Chevalier de l'Ordre des Arts et des Lettres, 1984. Address: 3 Place des Victoires, 75002 Paris. Website: www.kenzo.com.

Kenzo, spring/summer 2002 ready-to-wear collection. © AFP/CORBIS.

PUBLICATIONS

On KENZO:

Books

- Milbank, Caroline Rennolds, Couture: The Great Designers, New York, 1985.
- Sparke, Penny, Japanese Design, London, 1987.
- Sainderichin, Ginette, Kenzo, Paris, 1989.
- Stegemeyer, Anne, Who's Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.

Articles

- "The JAP Designer," in Newsweek, 1 May 1972.
- Morris, Bernadine, "Designer Does What He Likes—and It's Liked," in the New York Times, 12 July 1972.
- _____, "Kenzo Displays His Imagination," in the New York Times, 4 April 1973.

Kenzo, autumn/winter 1999–2000 ready-to-wear collection: wool knit ensemble. © AFP/CORBIS.

- “Lively Influence on Dull Paris Scene,” in the Times (London), 1 September 1976.
- “Mini Redux,” in Newsweek, 8 November 1976.
- Dorsey, Hebe, “Kenzo Grows Up,” in the New York Times Magazine, 14 November 1976.
- Talley, André Leon, “Kenzo: One Needs Folly to Work in Fashion,” in WWD, 17 February 1978.
- Tucker, Priscilla, “Designer Becomes a Superstar: Kenzo Marches to Different Tunes; All of Them Are Hits,” in the New York Daily News, 11 April 1978.
- McEvoy, Marian, “Kenzo Barges Up the Nile,” in WWD, 20 October 1978.
- Cleave, Maureen, “Makers of Modern Fashion: Kenzo,” in the Observer Magazine (London), 14 December 1980.
- “L’oeil de Vogue: l’anniversaire de Kenzo,” in Vogue (Paris) October 1985.
- Salvy, Gerard-Julien, “L’art d’être soi l-même,” in Vogue (Paris), February 1986.
- Boyd, Ann, “Cap by Denny, So Why Buy Kenzo?” in the Observer (London), 8 January 1987.
- “Kenzo: Créations Tous Azimuts,” in Profession Textile (Paris), 5 February 1988.

- Boriolli, Gisella, “Kenzo Back Home in Japan,” in Donna (Milan), July/August 1989.
- “Kenzo Modern Folklore,” in Elle (New York), September 1989.
- Baudot, Francois, “Le Pélerinage de Kenzo,” in Elle (Paris), 5 September 1989.
- Gwee, Elisabeth, “Kenzo Moves On,” in the Straits Times (Singapore), November 9, 2000.
- “Kenzo,” in Fashion Live, March 2001.
- “Kenzo Flirts with Red Poppy Flowers,” in the Jakarta Post, February 18, 2001.
- Gwee, Elisabeth, “Design on Kids: Brands ‘R’ Us,” in the Straits Times (Singapore), June 14, 2001.

* * *

In 1986 Kenzo Takada called his menswear collection “Around the World in Eighty Days,” but that expedition had long been underway in Kenzo’s clothes for women and men. Significantly, for more than 20 years, Kenzo has been the most prominent traveler in fashion but also the most multicultural and the most syncretistic, insisting on the diversity and compatibility of ethnic styles and cultural options from all parts of the world. Kenzo has steadfastly mixed styles. This Japanese tourist has rightly perceived and selected from all cultures and styles. In February 1978 he told Women’s Wear Daily, “I like to use African patterns and Japanese patterns together.” Kenzo interprets style and specific costume elements of various parts of the world, assimilating them into a peaceful internationalism more radical than other designers.

Various collections have included Romanian peasant skirts as inspiration as well as Mexican rebozos and heavy Scandinavian sweaters (1973); a Chinese coolie look combined with Portuguese purses, Riviera awning-striped beach shirts, and t-shirt dresses for full cultural diversity (1975); Native American stylings in a highly textural, colorful, and feather-inflected collection (1976); Egyptian leanings and patterns (1979); North African inspiration, with elements of an excursion to India for a modified Nehru suit (1984); an homage to Al Capone (1988).

Considered a Wunderkind and celebrity in 1970s fashion, Kenzo never fixed on one look, but preferred to view fashion as a creative, continuous adventure. Shyly, Kenzo said in 1978, “It pleases me when people say I have influence. But I am influenced by the world that says I influence it. The world I live in is my influence.” Other influences include American popular culture: Chinese tunics and wrappings, especially at the low-swung waist, batiks of East Asia, European peasant aprons and smocks, and Japanese woven textiles. For his 40th birthday, the designer became Minnie Mouse.

When asked by Joan Quinn about travels and ethnic clothing, Kenzo replied: “I prefer to travel only for vacations. I don’t go around looking for influences. The energy arrives.” In fact, Kenzo serves as “the prototype of the young designer, the designer with a sense of humor about fashion, culture, and life, as well as a lively curiosity about clothing itself,” as Caroline Milbank described, precisely because his theme collections and almost volcanic change imply a continuous stream of ideas. Kenzo, after all, emerged first as a designer of poor-boy-style skinny sweaters. Like Elsa Schiaparelli, who likewise began with ingenious knits, he has become a prodigious continuing talent. His fashion references seem never to be imposed upon clothing but are reasonable as a consequence of his design exploration. Military and ecclesiastical looks in 1978 simply streamlined and simplified his style.

In addition, Kenzo has been fascinated by painting, drawing upon Wassily Kandinsky and David Hockney for inspiration, as well as calligraphy. His pallet has always been internationally vibrant, filled with ethnic eruptions, play of pattern, and unorthodox color combinations. Kenzo's work, in fact, argues strongly for the harmony of cultural influences, the most disparate and distinct expressions of dress coming together in the styles of a designer who has himself raised barbed issues of ethnicity by insisting upon "Jap" for his early collections, encouraging a racist pejorative to be converted into a positive identity.

Kenzo demonstrates a sustained aesthetic of absorption, assimilating many global influences into an integrated and wholly modern style of his own. The flamboyance of Kenzo's art and life captured the popular imagination of fashion in the 1970s, but his abiding and exemplary contribution is his ability to digest many style traits and to achieve a powerful composite. Kenzo told André Leon Tally, writing for Women's Wear Daily in February 1978, "One needs a lot of folly to work in fashion." It is this sense of exuberance, creative excitement, and caprice that has marked Kenzo's work for more than two decades. Claude Montana once commented, "Kenzo gives much more to fashion than all the couturiers lumped together." Kenzo epitomized fashion energy and imagination in the 1970s: his brilliant creative assimilation brought street initiative and global creativity to fashion.

By the early 1990s, Kenzo's company, which boasted 37 boutiques worldwide and 124 sales outlets, was acquired by the LVMH (Moët Hennessy Louis Vuitton) family, quickly becoming LVMH's second-largest fashion house after Louis Vuitton. LVMH also owns Loewe, Celine, and Christian Dior. Plans for the Kenzo brand included branching into home furnishings and launching a new sportswear line called Kenzo Ki (Ki is Kenji for "energy").

Kenzo announced his retirement in 1999 and celebrated his 30-year career with a stadium celebration that included a Kenzo retrospective and his final collection, spring-summer 2000. Kenzo was replaced by head designers Gilles Rosier for womenswear and Roy Krejberg for menswear. Suzy Menkes of the International Herald Tribune called Rosier's first show, for fall-winter 2000–2001, "one of the smoothest and successful transitions of recent seasons."

Even with its namesake in retirement, the Kenzo brand continues to grow. In 2001 the company added a new fragrance, Flower by Kenzo to its line, and the company sought a new generation of Kenzo devotees with the launch of Kenzo Kids. Marketing director Timothy Yoong told Singapore's Straits Times that "anyone willing to pay $1,000 for a suit won't mind buying three to four items from the same brand for their children."

—Richard Martin; updated by Lisa Groshong

KHANH, Emmanuelle

French designer

Born: Renée Mezière in Paris, 12 September 1937. Family: Married designer Quasar Khanh (Manh Khanh Nguyen), 1957; children: Othello, Atlantique-Venus. Career: Model for the Balenciaga and Givenchy fashion houses, Paris, 1957–63; began creating own designs and with Christiane Bailly, 1962; created collections for Belletête, Missoni, Dorothée Bis, Laura, Cacharel, Pierre d'Alby, Krizia, Max Mara, and Le Bistrot du Tricot, 1963–69; founder/director, Emmanuelle

Khanh label and fashion garment and accessory company, from 1971; opened first Paris boutique, 1977; president, Emmanuelle Khanh International, from 1987. Awards: Chevalier des Arts et des Lettres, Paris, 1986. Address: Emmanuelle Khanh International, 45 Avenue Victor Hugo, 75116 Paris, France.

PUBLICATIONS

On KHANH:

Books

- Lynam, Ruth, ed., Paris Fashion: The Great Designers and Their Creations, London, 1972.
 Carter, Ernestine, With Tongue in Chic, London, 1974.
 —, The Changing World of Fashion: 1900 to the Present, London, 1977.
 Mulvagh, Jane, Vogue History of 20th-Century Fashion, London, 1988.
 Loebenthal, Joel, Radical Rags: Fashions of the Sixties, New York, 1990.

Articles

- "The Drop," in Vogue (London), February 1963.
 Gabbey, Regine, "The Ready-to-Dare Designers," in Réalités (Paris), January 1969.
 "Living in Heavenly Blue Blow-Up Space in Paris," in Vogue (London), February 1969.
 Toll, Marie-Pierre, "Where Beauty is Not a Luxury," in House & Garden (New York), September 1984.
 Witkin, Christian, "Options for the Office & After: Colors that Wake You Up for Work and Don't Fade After Five," in Mademoiselle, December 1995.
 Zesiger, Carey, "One of a Kind," in Far Eastern Economic Review, December 1995.

*

Women inspire me—fashions bore me.

My strength is to make clothes which are timeless. To create clothes for me is a wonderful way to participate and belong to my era.

—Emmanuelle Khanh

* * *

While Mary Quant was revolutionizing fashion in England at the beginning of the 1960s, Emmanuelle Khanh was at the vanguard of the young French ready-to-wear movement. From the French pronunciation of the Beatles' "Yeah, yeah, yeah," the emerging clothes were known as yé yé fashion.

Khanh began as a model for Balenciaga and Givenchy. In 1959 she realized that haute couture was appealing only to a small portion of a larger potential audience. She believed the time was right for rebellion against the strictures of haute couture, and she was not alone in this thinking—during this time, Daniel Hechter created a style between comfort and sportswear, Cacharel redesigned its shirts, Michele Rosier began to create a cosmic line of windbreakers and anoraks, Chantal Thomass created her minidresses, Elie and Jacqueline Jacobson created Dorothée Bis, and Sonia Rykiel launched her knitwear line.

In addition, Kenzo has been fascinated by painting, drawing upon Wassily Kandinsky and David Hockney for inspiration, as well as calligraphy. His pallet has always been internationally vibrant, filled with ethnic eruptions, play of pattern, and unorthodox color combinations. Kenzo's work, in fact, argues strongly for the harmony of cultural influences, the most disparate and distinct expressions of dress coming together in the styles of a designer who has himself raised barbed issues of ethnicity by insisting upon "Jap" for his early collections, encouraging a racist pejorative to be converted into a positive identity.

Kenzo demonstrates a sustained aesthetic of absorption, assimilating many global influences into an integrated and wholly modern style of his own. The flamboyance of Kenzo's art and life captured the popular imagination of fashion in the 1970s, but his abiding and exemplary contribution is his ability to digest many style traits and to achieve a powerful composite. Kenzo told André Leon Tally, writing for Women's Wear Daily in February 1978, "One needs a lot of folly to work in fashion." It is this sense of exuberance, creative excitement, and caprice that has marked Kenzo's work for more than two decades. Claude Montana once commented, "Kenzo gives much more to fashion than all the couturiers lumped together." Kenzo epitomized fashion energy and imagination in the 1970s: his brilliant creative assimilation brought street initiative and global creativity to fashion.

By the early 1990s, Kenzo's company, which boasted 37 boutiques worldwide and 124 sales outlets, was acquired by the LVMH (Moët Hennessy Louis Vuitton) family, quickly becoming LVMH's second-largest fashion house after Louis Vuitton. LVMH also owns Loewe, Celine, and Christian Dior. Plans for the Kenzo brand included branching into home furnishings and launching a new sportswear line called Kenzo Ki (Ki is Kenji for "energy").

Kenzo announced his retirement in 1999 and celebrated his 30-year career with a stadium celebration that included a Kenzo retrospective and his final collection, spring-summer 2000. Kenzo was replaced by head designers Gilles Rosier for womenswear and Roy Krejberg for menswear. Suzy Menkes of the International Herald Tribune called Rosier's first show, for fall-winter 2000–2001, "one of the smoothest and successful transitions of recent seasons."

Even with its namesake in retirement, the Kenzo brand continues to grow. In 2001 the company added a new fragrance, Flower by Kenzo to its line, and the company sought a new generation of Kenzo devotees with the launch of Kenzo Kids. Marketing director Timothy Yoong told Singapore's Straits Times that "anyone willing to pay $1,000 for a suit won't mind buying three to four items from the same brand for their children."

—Richard Martin; updated by Lisa Groshong

KHANH, Emmanuelle

French designer

Born: Renée Mezière in Paris, 12 September 1937. Family: Married designer Quasar Khanh (Manh Khanh Nguyen), 1957; children: Othello, Atlantique-Venus. Career: Model for the Balenciaga and Givenchy fashion houses, Paris, 1957–63; began creating own designs and with Christiane Bailly, 1962; created collections for Belletête, Missoni, Dorothée Bis, Laura, Cacharel, Pierre d'Alby, Krizia, Max Mara, and Le Bistrot du Tricot, 1963–69; founder/director, Emmanuelle

Khanh label and fashion garment and accessory company, from 1971; opened first Paris boutique, 1977; president, Emmanuelle Khanh International, from 1987. Awards: Chevalier des Arts et des Lettres, Paris, 1986. Address: Emmanuelle Khanh International, 45 Avenue Victor Hugo, 75116 Paris, France.

PUBLICATIONS

On KHANH:

Books

- Lynam, Ruth, ed., Paris Fashion: The Great Designers and Their Creations, London, 1972.
 Carter, Ernestine, With Tongue in Chic, London, 1974.
 —, The Changing World of Fashion: 1900 to the Present, London, 1977.
 Mulvagh, Jane, Vogue History of 20th-Century Fashion, London, 1988.
 Loebenthal, Joel, Radical Rags: Fashions of the Sixties, New York, 1990.

Articles

- "The Drop," in Vogue (London), February 1963.
 Gabbey, Regine, "The Ready-to-Dare Designers," in Réalités (Paris), January 1969.
 "Living in Heavenly Blue Blow-Up Space in Paris," in Vogue (London), February 1969.
 Toll, Marie-Pierre, "Where Beauty is Not a Luxury," in House & Garden (New York), September 1984.
 Witkin, Christian, "Options for the Office & After: Colors that Wake You Up for Work and Don't Fade After Five," in Mademoiselle, December 1995.
 Zesiger, Carey, "One of a Kind," in Far Eastern Economic Review, December 1995.

*

Women inspire me—fashions bore me.

My strength is to make clothes which are timeless. To create clothes for me is a wonderful way to participate and belong to my era.

—Emmanuelle Khanh

* * *

While Mary Quant was revolutionizing fashion in England at the beginning of the 1960s, Emmanuelle Khanh was at the vanguard of the young French ready-to-wear movement. From the French pronunciation of the Beatles' "Yeah, yeah, yeah," the emerging clothes were known as yé yé fashion.

Khanh began as a model for Balenciaga and Givenchy. In 1959 she realized that haute couture was appealing only to a small portion of a larger potential audience. She believed the time was right for rebellion against the strictures of haute couture, and she was not alone in this thinking—during this time, Daniel Hechter created a style between comfort and sportswear, Cacharel redesigned its shirts, Michele Rosier began to create a cosmic line of windbreakers and anoraks, Chantal Thomass created her minidresses, Elie and Jacqueline Jacobson created Dorothée Bis, and Sonia Rykiel launched her knitwear line.

Khanh began to make attractive clothing for the masses. Her individuality quickly caught on in France, where she modeled and sold the clothes herself. In 1960 the magazine IT carried an article about Khanh and her work and her modern fashions soon reached the U.S. and were in demand in major department stores. The clothes Khanh had been making for herself, with the help of her husband, Quasar Khanh, were then noticed by Elle magazine. This exposure led to Khanh's collaboration with another ex-Balenciaga model, Christiane Bailly, to design their own groundbreaking Emmachristie collection in 1962.

Khanh criticized haute couture for hiding the beauty of the body. For her own designs, she emphasized femininity by cutting clothes along the body's curves, to follow the movement of the body, unlike Balenciaga's gowns, which could practically stand alone regardless of the woman's body within them. Khanh created an architecturally classic mode with a twist: careful seaming, narrow armholes, a slim, close to the body "droop" silhouette. Her suits had the surprise element of skirts that were actually culottes. Innovations included dog-eared collars, long fitted jackets with droopy collars, and blouses and dresses with collars consisting of overlapping petal-like shapes along a U-shaped opening.

Khanh also had a democratic approach to fabric. She used denim and tie-dyeing, chenille, and plastic. A characteristic evening top in 1965 was made of crêpe appliquéd with fluorescent plastic circles. Khanh often used Shetland wools and Harris tweeds long favored by middle-class French women. In the late 1960s, she introduced ready-to-wear furs and tulle and lace lingerie. In cooperation with the Missonis, Khanh made fashions from Italian knit fabrics. The results of her work for the Paris ready-to-wear house of Cacharel, and her work with designer Dorothee Bis, resulted in dresses with a long, slim, flowing 1930s feeling. The use of Romanian hand embroidery became a hallmark of the clothes Khanh produced under her own label.

Keeping pace with the ethnic trend of the 1970s, Khanh created short, loose, peasant-style dresses out of colorful Italian gauze fabrics. Feminine blouses were be trimmed with scalloped embroidered edges, short skirts were frilled, and lace was used to trim soft linen in her designs of the period. Khanh also joined the likes of Guy Paulin, Anne Marie Beretta, Karl Lagerfeld, Luciano Soprani, and Jean Charles de Castelbajac designing clothing for Max Mara. Later in the 1970s Khanh turned to designing knitwear and skiwear. A casual summer look consisted of a wide, striped cotton skirt, buttoned down the front, worn with a matching halter top and wedge-heeled shoes of matching fabric. The matching shoes were a couture touch for ready-to-wear.

During the next decade, Khanh continued to freelance, making soft, individualistic fashions, bouncing creative ideas off her engineer, inventor, and interior-designer husband. Her signature line of boldly-rimmed glasses (à la Drew Carey) is one such example. She often tells her favorite story about how her glasses line came about: "I had always refused to wear glasses because I thought it was ugly and, as a consequence of this whim, I have experienced quite a few annoyances...But most embarrassing...as I was waiting for a taxi to pick me up some place, I got inside the personal car of someone I never met before!" Ever since, Khanh—now never seen without her own pair of glasses—admitted glasses were an essential accessory to her daily life.

Khanh is well known for her original eyewear designs and especially in her innovative use of genuine lizard, snake, ostrich, crocodile, and shark skin on the frames of her handmade "EK"-initialed glasses. Khanh's clear plastic umbrellas have also been successfully marketed around the world.

In the 1980s, her clothes had a retro feeling about them, with extended shoulders and cinched waistlines that flattered the figure. One outfit featured a very long, very loose camel hair coat falling freely from the shoulders, caught about the waist by a narrow leather belt, worn over a soft, dark brown, wool jersey jumpsuit. In 1982 Khanh released a line of clothing under her own name and, in 1987, created Emmanuelle Khanh International. Some 150 boutiques around the world attest to her lasting popularity.

Khanh continued to be active in the 1990s. For Jet Lag Showroom in 1990, she designed a suit consisting of a waist-length, tightly fitting jacket, worn with a long, full flannel skirt. She continued throughout the decade to create comfortable simple jackets and coats for special orders from the firm. Indisputably, this successful woman was one of the pioneers of ready-to-wear fashion of the 1960s and hopefully will continue to amaze the fashion world in the future.

—Therese Duzinkiewicz Baker; updated by Daryl F. Mallett

KIESELSTEIN-CORD, Barry

American jewelry and accessories designer, and artist

Born: New York City, 6 November 1943. Education: Studied at Parsons School of Design, New York University, and the American Craft Institute. Family: Married Elizabeth Anne (CeCe) Eddy in 1974 (divorced); children: Elizabeth. Career: Worked as art director/producer for various advertising agencies, 1966–70; founded company, 1972; divisions include jewelry, belts, handbags (from 1991), gloves, and home furnishings and accessories; opened in-store boutiques at Bergdorf Goodman, New York, 1985, Neiman Marcus, Beverly Hills, 1990, and Mitsukishi, Tokyo, 1990; opened shops in Italy, Germany, and Switzerland; introduced black gold jewelry, 1995; transformed 1920s mansion into residence, 1998; also an artist; director, Council of Fashion Designers of America, 1987. Collections: Metropolitan Museum of Art, New York; Louisiana State Museum. Awards: Hollywood Radio & Television Society award, 1965; two Art Directors Club awards, New York, late 1960s; Illustrators Society of New York award, 1969; Coty American Fashion Critics award, 1979, 1984; Council of Fashion Designers of America award, 1981. Address: 119 West 40th Street, New York, NY 10018, USA. Website: www.kieselstein-cord.com.

PUBLICATIONS

On KIESELSTEIN-CORD:

Books

Stegemeyer, Anne, Who's Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.

Articles

Talley, André Leon, "Double Jointed," in WWD, 14 November 1975.
 Crowley, Susan, "Jewelry's New Dazzle," in Newsweek, 4 April 1977.
 Grossman, Karen, "Barry Kieselstein-Cord, Artist and Designer," in People, September 1978.

Khanh began to make attractive clothing for the masses. Her individuality quickly caught on in France, where she modeled and sold the clothes herself. In 1960 the magazine IT carried an article about Khanh and her work and her modern fashions soon reached the U.S. and were in demand in major department stores. The clothes Khanh had been making for herself, with the help of her husband, Quasar Khanh, were then noticed by Elle magazine. This exposure led to Khanh's collaboration with another ex-Balenciaga model, Christiane Bailly, to design their own groundbreaking Emmachristie collection in 1962.

Khanh criticized haute couture for hiding the beauty of the body. For her own designs, she emphasized femininity by cutting clothes along the body's curves, to follow the movement of the body, unlike Balenciaga's gowns, which could practically stand alone regardless of the woman's body within them. Khanh created an architecturally classic mode with a twist: careful seaming, narrow armholes, a slim, close to the body "droop" silhouette. Her suits had the surprise element of skirts that were actually culottes. Innovations included dog-eared collars, long fitted jackets with droopy collars, and blouses and dresses with collars consisting of overlapping petal-like shapes along a U-shaped opening.

Khanh also had a democratic approach to fabric. She used denim and tie-dyeing, chenille, and plastic. A characteristic evening top in 1965 was made of crêpe appliquéd with fluorescent plastic circles. Khanh often used Shetland wools and Harris tweeds long favored by middle-class French women. In the late 1960s, she introduced ready-to-wear furs and tulle and lace lingerie. In cooperation with the Missonis, Khanh made fashions from Italian knit fabrics. The results of her work for the Paris ready-to-wear house of Cacharel, and her work with designer Dorothee Bis, resulted in dresses with a long, slim, flowing 1930s feeling. The use of Romanian hand embroidery became a hallmark of the clothes Khanh produced under her own label.

Keeping pace with the ethnic trend of the 1970s, Khanh created short, loose, peasant-style dresses out of colorful Italian gauze fabrics. Feminine blouses were be trimmed with scalloped embroidered edges, short skirts were frilled, and lace was used to trim soft linen in her designs of the period. Khanh also joined the likes of Guy Paulin, Anne Marie Beretta, Karl Lagerfeld, Luciano Soprani, and Jean Charles de Castelbajac designing clothing for Max Mara. Later in the 1970s Khanh turned to designing knitwear and skiwear. A casual summer look consisted of a wide, striped cotton skirt, buttoned down the front, worn with a matching halter top and wedge-heeled shoes of matching fabric. The matching shoes were a couture touch for ready-to-wear.

During the next decade, Khanh continued to freelance, making soft, individualistic fashions, bouncing creative ideas off her engineer, inventor, and interior-designer husband. Her signature line of boldly-rimmed glasses (à la Drew Carey) is one such example. She often tells her favorite story about how her glasses line came about: "I had always refused to wear glasses because I thought it was ugly and, as a consequence of this whim, I have experienced quite a few annoyances...But most embarrassing...as I was waiting for a taxi to pick me up some place, I got inside the personal car of someone I never met before!" Ever since, Khanh—now never seen without her own pair of glasses—admitted glasses were an essential accessory to her daily life.

Khanh is well known for her original eyewear designs and especially in her innovative use of genuine lizard, snake, ostrich, crocodile, and shark skin on the frames of her handmade "EK"-initialed

glasses. Khanh's clear plastic umbrellas have also been successfully marketed around the world.

In the 1980s, her clothes had a retro feeling about them, with extended shoulders and cinched waistlines that flattered the figure. One outfit featured a very long, very loose camel hair coat falling freely from the shoulders, caught about the waist by a narrow leather belt, worn over a soft, dark brown, wool jersey jumpsuit. In 1982 Khanh released a line of clothing under her own name and, in 1987, created Emmanuelle Khanh International. Some 150 boutiques around the world attest to her lasting popularity.

Khanh continued to be active in the 1990s. For Jet Lag Showroom in 1990, she designed a suit consisting of a waist-length, tightly fitting jacket, worn with a long, full flannel skirt. She continued throughout the decade to create comfortable simple jackets and coats for special orders from the firm. Indisputably, this successful woman was one of the pioneers of ready-to-wear fashion of the 1960s and hopefully will continue to amaze the fashion world in the future.

—Therese Duzinkiewicz Baker; updated by Daryl F. Mallett

KIESELSTEIN-CORD, Barry

American jewelry and accessories designer, and artist

Born: New York City, 6 November 1943. Education: Studied at Parsons School of Design, New York University, and the American Craft Institute. Family: Married Elizabeth Anne (CeCe) Eddy in 1974 (divorced); children: Elizabeth. Career: Worked as art director/producer for various advertising agencies, 1966–70; founded company, 1972; divisions include jewelry, belts, handbags (from 1991), gloves, and home furnishings and accessories; opened in-store boutiques at Bergdorf Goodman, New York, 1985, Neiman Marcus, Beverly Hills, 1990, and Mitsukishi, Tokyo, 1990; opened shops in Italy, Germany, and Switzerland; introduced black gold jewelry, 1995; transformed 1920s mansion into residence, 1998; also an artist; director, Council of Fashion Designers of America, 1987. Collections: Metropolitan Museum of Art, New York; Louisiana State Museum. Awards: Hollywood Radio & Television Society award, 1965; two Art Directors Club awards, New York, late 1960s; Illustrators Society of New York award, 1969; Coty American Fashion Critics award, 1979, 1984; Council of Fashion Designers of America award, 1981. Address: 119 West 40th Street, New York, NY 10018, USA. Website: www.kieselstein-cord.com.

PUBLICATIONS

On KIESELSTEIN-CORD:

Books

Stegemeyer, Anne, Who's Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.

Articles

Talley, André Leon, "Double Jointed," in WWD, 14 November 1975.
 Crowley, Susan, "Jewelry's New Dazzle," in Newsweek, 4 April 1977.
 Grossman, Karen, "Barry Kieselstein-Cord, Artist and Designer," in People, September 1978.

- Duka, John, "Postmodern Belt Buckles," in the New York Times, 11 October 1980.
- Talley, André Leon, "Barry Kieselstein-Cord," in Interview (New York), November 1981.
- Kingstone, Barbara, "New Status for Jewelry," in the Toronto Globe and Mail, March 1985.
- Goodwin, Betty, "Designer Takes Artist's Tact with Buckles," in the Los Angeles Times, 10 May 1985.
- Masse, Cheryl, "Moving Pieces," in Beverly Hills 213, 15 May 1985.
- Tsutagawa, K., "The Sculptor as Jeweler: Interview with Barry Kieselstein-Cord," in New York Style (Japan), July 1985.
- Allen, Jennifer, "Barry and CeCe Kieselstein-Cord," in Architectural Digest, September 1988.
- "Creative Collaborators," in Harper's Bazaar, June 1989.
- Ravel, Margo, "Barry Kieselstein-Cord: Pure Inspiration," in Beverly Hills 213, 20 September 1989.
- Menkes, Suzy, "Kieselstein-Cord: Anthropomorphic Chic," in the International Herald Tribune (Neuilly, France), 14 November 1989.
- Newman, Jill, "Kieselstein-Cord: Keeping It Tried and True," in Women's Wear Daily Accessories Magazine, January 1990.
- _____, "Kieselstein-Cord's Newest Luxury: Handbags," in Women's Wear Daily Accessories Magazine, 16 August 1991.
- _____, "A Bergdorf's Ace: Kieselstein-Cord," in Women's Wear Daily, 15 November 1991.
- Beard, Patricia, "To Have and to Hold," in Mirabella (New York), April 1992.
- Van Gelder, Lindsy, "Promenade Purse," in the New York Times, 7 June 1992.
- Goodman, Wendy, "Challenging the Gold Standard," in Harper's Bazaar, January 1995.
- Alhadoff, Gini, "House of Kieselstein-Cord," in Architectural Digest, July 1998.
- Post, Tom, "Crafty," in Forbes, 11 January 1999.

*

My life as an artist started when I was about eight. My primary interest at that moment was directed toward North American Indian art. This was my first influence between the ages of 8 and 14. I produced large-scale carvings and effigies and interpretations. Between 14 and 22 my focus had switched to painting and metalwork. At 14 I had also started to bury objects and metal in the ground to observe color and patina changes.

From the earliest moments I can recall fascination with all past cultures and an intense attraction to art and architecture, not surprising, as in their youth my mother had been an illustrator and father an architect. I still hold these fascinations and occasionally some recall slips into my work. I have rarely ever looked at the ornamentation of other artists; my primary influences come from entire cultures and periods.

I am not influenced by fashion, preferring to be an influencer. Some of my most successful collections took three to five years to create the impact needed to make them commercially successful—really my most successful pieces I could not give away until people developed a new appreciation for my directions. Naturally this has produced my greatest reward (influencing direction) as an artist. My intent is to capture the illusive mental image—a single example is if you are riding in a car down a country road at a good speed, and think you see something wonderful. You stop your car and back up...only to find a jumble that your mind saw as a completed image. This is my creative process: to capture the illusive image that was the correlation between the speed, your mind's eye, and what you thought you'd seen; to make it three-dimensional; and to fill space with something new that was not there before this creation.

As to contemporary fashion, the present mode of "anything goes" is quite wonderful. One can live out one's fantasy, bring it out of the closet and, if in good taste, be really very chic. I do like black ties on men and sexy elegant evening gowns on beautiful women. It quickens the pulse.

—Barry Kieselstein-Cord

* * *

In his affirmation "I don't make jewelry; I do sculptures for the body," Barry Kieselstein-Cord has described the independence and the ambition of his work. Like Elsa Peretti and other contemporary designers of jewelry, Kieselstein-Cord has sought to define an art that is autonomous from fashion, boldly sculptural in a way that makes a clear distinction from the wondrous but miniaturized repertory of a designer like Miriam Haskell, and historically aware without being subservient to past styles. His scarab minaudière, for example, is indebted to ancient Egypt, as well as to the art deco Egyptian revival, but with the curvy reduced modernism that characterizes his work.

His landmark—in law as in art, as their copyright was legally upheld from accessories' pirates—belt buckles, the Vaquero, and the Winchester, are both of the Old West but transmitted through art nouveau curvilinear interpretation. It is hard not to call Kieselstein-Cord's work jewelry, even as he avoids the term with "bodywork" or "sculpture," but the feeling is undeniably different from that of most jewelry. The designer argues that it comes from all the sculpture having as its Platonic ideal some large, even monumental form, surpassing its role on the human body.

Kieselstein-Cord has been one of the critical designers who, from the 1970s, has offered a jewelry that aspires to the condition of sculpture, allowing shapes to reclaim their ancient expressive, even spiritual or prophylactic, aspect in allowing jewelry to become something more than trivial adornment. After expressing his admiration for Easter Island statues, Kieselstein-Cord told André Leon Talley, "I also like things which are sophisticated in an innately primitive way. Things that are transformed into a past and present that you can't identify. I like some of Miró's giant sculptures, some by Lipchitz, Noguchi, and Brancusi. The last thing I look at for inspiration is jewelry of any kind or period." Peretti, Robert Lee Morris, and Tina Chow would all probably adhere to the same spiritual striving and monumental desire for jewelry. Kieselstein-Cord had liberated jewelry from being paltry and precious in scale.

Similarly, Kieselstein-Cord disavows fashion as an influence, maintaining that jewelry must hold its separate aesthetic and power. While wife and partner CeCe also produced jewelry for Perry Ellis and was a model and muse for the fashion designer, Kieselstein-Cord's work has never bent to specific demands of fashion. "My accessories are not meant to be fashion," he told Jill Newman from Women's Wear Daily Accessories Magazine in January 1990. "They are designed to augment fashion. Things made of precious metal are meant to last forever and a day." Indeed, many of Kieselstein-Cord's designs have been of such enduring interest they continue to be produced, while some collectors wait for each new sculptural edition in the manner of collecting any other artistic production. In the early 1980s he produced accessories for the home, and later expanded into high-quality handbags.

If Kieselstein-Cord takes his art seriously enough to declare it sculpture and not jewelry, he is nonetheless playful enough to realize diverse properties of materials and to bring some elements of non-Western culture to the vocabulary of jewelry. In 1976, for example, a coiled choker of silk cord was accented with a gold orb; gold was used with tortoise shell hair combs. In the same year, he created a splendidly reeling art nouveau antelope minaudière, sandblasted onto the gold body to give the feeling of fur. A 1981 duck bandolier was a little Pancho Villa, a little nursery frieze for a fantastic equivocation in jewelry. John Duka declared his spring 1981 belt buckles "postmodern," perhaps the first time that appellation was used for accessories. Bold concha belts, Celtic interlace, and Gauguin-inspired shapes have been featured in his collections.

Kieselstein-Cord began his work in the 1970s, when American alternative culture might have convinced almost any marijuana-smoking hippie of the probity of body sculpture—and he even used cowboys and Indians to prove the point. What Kieselstein-Cord has done is more important and far-reaching: he has convinced all of us of the probity of body sculpture, spiritual and symbolic; he has enlarged the tradition of jewelry, giving it a chunky, palpable integrity; he has declared jewelry sovereign from fashion; and he has given jewelry and related accessories a standard of luxury along with a contemporary vocabulary.

With more than 3,000 pieces of jewelry behind him, Kieselstein-Cord passionately continues in his exploration to extend the limits of design. One of his most recent creations—black gold—expresses his love for historical beauty or the idea that things get better with time. He is, after all, said to be one of the most patient designers; it took the untraditional artist five years to sell his matte gold finish jewelry. "I like the look of objects that have been used," he explains. "There is a sense of humanity, a sense of affection."

Just as Kieselstein-Cord's jewelry goes back to his early school days, so does his passion for interior design. Using modern technology, industrial methods, and a sense of romanticism, the designer transformed a 1920 Manhattan mansion into a residence and showroom. Uninhabited for nearly 40 years, the building has 20-foot-tall ceilings, green oversized radiators, and eclectic paintings reminiscent of 1920 Italian architecture. Kieselstein-Cord's fondness for historic beauty held true in his innovations just as it did with jewelry. The original owners of his mansion told him they would remove certain items if they risked being destroyed in the renovation. They didn't have to worry with Kieselstein-Cord—the older the better.

Furnished with steel-framed black leather armchairs and square glass-and-steel low tables, Kieselstein-Cord's real masterpiece is the bedroom. Proud to describe it as an Out of Africa feeling, with its white linen curtains, tribal rugs, and kilim pillows, Kieselstein-Cord's elements of design can all be found implemented in some way throughout the Manhattan residence. Although Kieselstein-Cord is quick to state, "I've achieved everything I've ever wanted to," his dreams have always been advertising, design, and art. It's been two out of three for the persistent and even aggressive innovator, but Kieselstein-Cord says he's not worried about fulfilling his dream of one day becoming an artist. "I know I'm going to do it," he says matter-of-factly.

—Richard Martin; updated by Diana Idzelis

KIM, Jun and Soyon

See ISANI

KLEIN, Anne

American designer

Born: Hannah Golofsky in Brooklyn, New York, 7 June 1923.

Education: Studied art at Girls' Commercial High School, New

Anne Klein, designed for Junior Sophisticates's 1964 collection.
© AP/Wide World Photos.

are designed to augment fashion. Things made of precious metal are meant to last forever and a day." Indeed, many of Kieselstein-Cord's designs have been of such enduring interest they continue to be produced, while some collectors wait for each new sculptural edition in the manner of collecting any other artistic production. In the early 1980s he produced accessories for the home, and later expanded into high-quality handbags.

If Kieselstein-Cord takes his art seriously enough to declare it sculpture and not jewelry, he is nonetheless playful enough to realize diverse properties of materials and to bring some elements of non-Western culture to the vocabulary of jewelry. In 1976, for example, a coiled choker of silk cord was accented with a gold orb; gold was used with tortoise shell hair combs. In the same year, he created a splendidly reeling art nouveau antelope minaudière, sandblasted onto the gold body to give the feeling of fur. A 1981 duck bandolier was a little Pancho Villa, a little nursery frieze for a fantastic equivocation in jewelry. John Duka declared his spring 1981 belt buckles "postmodern," perhaps the first time that appellation was used for accessories. Bold concha belts, Celtic interlace, and Gauguin-inspired shapes have been featured in his collections.

Kieselstein-Cord began his work in the 1970s, when American alternative culture might have convinced almost any marijuana-smoking hippie of the probity of body sculpture—and he even used cowboys and Indians to prove the point. What Kieselstein-Cord has done is more important and far-reaching: he has convinced all of us of the probity of body sculpture, spiritual and symbolic; he has enlarged the tradition of jewelry, giving it a chunky, palpable integrity; he has declared jewelry sovereign from fashion; and he has given jewelry and related accessories a standard of luxury along with a contemporary vocabulary.

With more than 3,000 pieces of jewelry behind him, Kieselstein-Cord passionately continues in his exploration to extend the limits of design. One of his most recent creations—black gold—expresses his love for historical beauty or the idea that things get better with time. He is, after all, said to be one of the most patient designers; it took the untraditional artist five years to sell his matte gold finish jewelry. "I like the look of objects that have been used," he explains. "There is a sense of humanity, a sense of affection."

Just as Kieselstein-Cord's jewelry goes back to his early school days, so does his passion for interior design. Using modern technology, industrial methods, and a sense of romanticism, the designer transformed a 1920 Manhattan mansion into a residence and showroom. Uninhabited for nearly 40 years, the building has 20-foot-tall ceilings, green oversized radiators, and eclectic paintings reminiscent of 1920 Italian architecture. Kieselstein-Cord's fondness for historic beauty held true in his innovations just as it did with jewelry. The original owners of his mansion told him they would remove certain items if they risked being destroyed in the renovation. They didn't have to worry with Kieselstein-Cord—the older the better.

Furnished with steel-framed black leather armchairs and square glass-and-steel low tables, Kieselstein-Cord's real masterpiece is the bedroom. Proud to describe it as an Out of Africa feeling, with its white linen curtains, tribal rugs, and kilim pillows, Kieselstein-Cord's elements of design can all be found implemented in some way throughout the Manhattan residence. Although Kieselstein-Cord is quick to state, "I've achieved everything I've ever wanted to," his dreams have always been advertising, design, and art. It's been two out of three for the persistent and even aggressive innovator, but Kieselstein-Cord says he's not worried about fulfilling his dream of one day becoming an artist. "I know I'm going to do it," he says matter-of-factly.

—Richard Martin; updated by Diana Idzelis

KIM, Jun and Soyon

See ISANI

KLEIN, Anne

American designer

Born: Hannah Golofsky in Brooklyn, New York, 7 June 1923.

Education: Studied art at Girls' Commercial High School, New

Anne Klein, designed for Junior Sophisticates's 1964 collection.
© AP/Wide World Photos.

York, and fashion at Traphagen School, New York, 1937–38. Family: Married Ben Klein (divorced, 1958); married Matthew Rubenstein, 1963. Career: Designer, Varden Petites, New York, 1938–40; designer, women's fashions for Maurice Rentner, 1940–47; founder/partner with Ben Klein, Junior Sophisticates, 1948–66; Anne Klein and Co., and Anne Klein Studio design firms established, 1968; firm bought by Takihyo Company after Klein's death, 1974; Donna Karan took over designing, 1973–85; Louis Dell'Olio, 1973–93; Richard Tyler, 1993–94; Patrick Robinson, 1995–98; Ken Kaufman and Isaac Franco, 1998–2001; sold by Takihyo to Kasper ASL Ltd., 1999; Charles Nolan hired as head designer, 2001. Exhibitions: Versailles, 1973; American Fashion on the World Stage, Metropolitan Museum of Art, New York, 1993. Awards: Mademoiselle Merit award, 1954; Coty American Fashion Critics award, 1955, 1969, 1971; Neiman Marcus award, 1959, 1969; Lord and Taylor award, 1964; National Cotton Council award, 1965. Died: 19 March 1974, in New York. Company Address: 205 West 39th St., New York, NY 10018, U.S.A.

PUBLICATIONS

On KLEIN:

Books

- New York and Hollywood Fashion: Costume Designs from the Brooklyn Museum Collection*, New York, 1986.
 Milbank, Caroline Rennolds, New York Fashion: The Evolution of American Style, New York, 1989.
 Stegemeyer, Anne, Who's Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.

Articles

- Beckett, Kathleen, "Runway Report: In-Kleined to Wow Fans: Anne Klein," in the New York Post, 1 November 1994.
 "New York: Anne Klein," in WWD, 1 November 1994.
 Ozzard, Janet, "Anne Klein: The Next Act," in WWD, 1 March 1995.
 Wadyka, Sally, "New Kid in Town," Vogue (New York), April 1995.
 Schiro, Anne-Marie, "Ralph Lauren Does What He Does Best," in the New York Times, 6 April 1995.
 "Anne Klein Said to Be Planning Revival of Designer Collection," in WWD, 18 December 1996.
 Gault, Ylonda, "Redesigning Klein," in Crain's New York Business, 17 March 1997.
 Parr, Karen, "Anne Klein's New Look," in WWD, 4 May 1998.
 Carmichael, Celia, "A Suave Design Team...at Anne Klein," in Footwear News, 17 August 1998.
 "Anne Klein's New Era: Kasper to Buy Name, Aims for Megabrand," in WWD, 17 March 1999.
 D'Innocenzo, Anne, "Anne Klein: New Owners, New Era," in WWD, 27 January 2000.
 McCants, Leonard, "Anne Klein: Bringing Back the Lion," in WWD, 6 June 2001.
 Wilson, Eric, "Building Anne Klein to Bite Back," in WWD, 4 October 2001.

* * *

Known as an American designer, Anne Klein often bragged she had never seen a European collection. Klein's philosophy was "not with what clothes might be but what they must be." Klein's career spanned three decades and her contributions to the industry were many. Like Claire McCordell before her, Klein helped to establish casual but elegant sportswear as defining American fashion.

Most notably, Klein transformed the junior-sized market from little-girl clothes designed with buttons and bows to clothes with a more sophisticated adult look. She also recognized that clothes for juniors should be designed for size rather than age. By analyzing the lifestyles of young women, Klein realized the fashions offered to them did not reflect their needs. In 1948, Klein and her first husband, Ben Klein, opened Junior Sophisticates, a company dedicated to this market, thus expanding the industry. Her first collection for Junior Sophisticates featured the skimmer dress with jacket; full, longer skirts; small waists; and pleated plaid skirts with blazers.

During the mid-1960s Klein freelanced for Mallory Leathers, where she established leather as a reputable dress fabric in the ready-to-wear market. She designed leather separates in bright colors and smartly styled silhouettes. In 1968 Anne Klein and Company and Anne Klein Studio were opened by Klein and her second husband, Chip Rubenstein. Focusing on sportswear with elegant styling, Klein established the concept of separates dressing. In doing this, she was teaching women a new way to dress. Klein proclaimed, “Do not buy haphazardly, but rather with a theme of coordination.” In the showing of the collections as well as in the stores, Klein emphasized how interchangeable the clothes were. Her designs were sold in boutiques called Anne Klein Corners, which were in major department stores. This marked the beginnings of the individual designer shops within retail environments. Accessories also became an important part of the overall look; Klein designed belts, chains, shoes, and scarves which complemented her clothes.

Anne Klein, 2001: matte gold paillette wrap gown, designed as an option for an Academy Award® nominee. © AP/Wide World Photos.

Klein focused on the needs of the American business woman in many of her collections for Anne Klein & Company. She relied on her own instincts to understand the diverse needs of the 1960s woman. By simplifying clothing, and showing women how to coordinate separates and accessorize, Klein taught the American woman how to dress with a minimum amount of fuss. The result was a finished, sophisticated look. The classic blazer was the central garment with shirtdresses, long midis and trousers introduced as well.

Anne Klein died in 1974. Designers Donna Karan and Louis Dell’Olio made significant contributions to fashion in her name, but left to pursue separate careers. Richard Tyler briefly came on board but did not fit with the Anne Klein aesthetic. Patrick Robinson, Ken Kaufman, and Isaac Franco designed over the next several years before Charles Nolan, formerly of Ellen Tracy, was hired as head designer in 2001. With Nolan at the helm, the Anne Klein name returned to the catwalk after an absence for several years. Jenny Baily, writing for the Fashion Windows website (22 September 2001), commented on Nolan’s second collection for Anne Klein, “Our favorite pieces...were the well-cut, slightly flared trousers, accented with side-stitching and two-inch slits at the bottom.” Baily also praised Nolan’s cocktail dresses and a neon orange linen coat.

—Margo Seaman; updated by Owen James

KLEIN, Calvin

American designer

Born: Bronx, New York, 19 November 1942. Education: Studied at Fashion Institute of Technology, New York, 1959–62. Family: Married Jayne Centre, 1964 (divorced 1974); child: Marci; married Kelly Rector, 1986 (separated). Career: Assistant designer, Dan Millstein, New York, 1962–64; freelance designer, New York, 1964–68; Calvin Klein Co. formed in partnership with Barry Schwartz, 1968, daughter Marci kidnapped (released unharmed), 1978; Brooke Shields jeans commercial debuted, 1980; men’s underwear introduced, 1982; purchased Puritan Jeans, 1983; Unilever secures fragrance license, 1989; company reorganized with help of music mogul David Geffen, 1992; debut of less expensive cK line, circa 1993; jeans and underwear businesses sold to Warnaco, 1994; flagship store opened on Madison Avenue, New York City, 1995; first freestanding cK store, Kent, 1999; second cK store, Manchester, 2000; trademark infringement suit filed against Warnaco, 2000; lawsuit against Warnaco settled, 2001; fragrances include Obsession, 1985, Eternity, 1988, cK one, 1994, cK be, 1996, also Escape, Contradiction, Truth Calvin

Klein. Awards: Coty American Fashion Critics award, 1973, 1974, 1975; Bath Museum of Costume Dress of the Year award, 1980; Council of Fashion Designers of America award, 1993; named one of the “25 Most Influential Americans” by Time, 1996; Lifetime Achievement award, Council of Fashion Designers of America, 2001. Address: 654 Madison Avenue, New York, NY 10021, USA.

PUBLICATIONS

On KLEIN:

Books

- Morris, Bernadine, and Barbara Walz, The Fashion Makers, New York, 1978.
- Perschitz, Lois, ed., W, The Designing Life, New York, 1987.
- Coleridge, Nicholas, The Fashion Conspiracy, London, 1988.
- Milbank, Caroline Rennolds, New York Fashion: The Evolution of American Style, New York, 1989.
- Howell, Georgina, Sultans of Style: Thirty Years of Fashion and Passion 1960–1990, London, 1990.
- McDowell, Colin, The Designer Scam, London, 1994.
- Gaines, Steven, and Sharon Churcher, Obsession: The Lives and Times of Calvin Klein, New York, 1995.
- Stegemeyer, Anne, Who’s Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.
- Le Dortz, Laurent, and Béatrice Deboscher, Stratégies des Leaders Américains de la Mode: Calvin Klein, Donna Karan, Liz Clairborne, Polo Ralph Lauren, et Tommy Hilfiger, Paris, 2000.

Articles

- Peer, Elizabeth, “Stylish Calvinism,” in Newsweek, 3 November 1975.
- Brown, Erica, “The Rag Trade to Riches Rise of Calvin Klein,” in the Sunday Times Magazine (London), 29 April 1980.
- Cleave, Maureen, “Calvin Klein,” in the Observer (London), 7 December 1980.
- Alter, Jonathan, and Ann Hughey, “Calvin and the Family Firm,” in Newsweek, 12 December 1983.
- Sherrid, Pamela, “Ragman,” in Forbes, 15 February 1982.
- Trachtenberg, Jeffrey A., “Between Me and My Calvins,” in Forbes, 9 April 1984.
- Morris, Bernadine, “Calvin Klein Keeps It Smart and Simple,” in the New York Times, 1 May 1985.
- Brady, James, “In Step with Calvin Klein,” in Parade (New York), 26 October 1986.
- Hume, Marion, “The Secret of My Success,” in Fashion Weekly (London), 27 August 1987.
- Brampton, Sally, “Drawing a Klein Line,” in Elle (London), January 1988.
- Gross, Michael, “The Latest Calvin: From the Bronx to Eternity,” in New York, 8 August 1988.
- Orth, Maureen, “A Star is Reborn,” in Vogue, September 1988.
- Howell, Georgina, “Mr. Klein Comes Clean,” in the Sunday Times Magazine (London), 10 September 1989.
- “Calvin Klein’s Obsession,” in Cosmopolitan, May 1991.

Klein's chameleon-like ability to be many things in the fashion industry. Years before, Michael Gross had already described Klein's life in New York magazine (8 August 1988) as "an extraordinary odyssey—a sort of one-man pilgrimage through the social history of modern America." Yet Klein is homegrown hero to young America, the elusive image of the creator as megapower and carnal charmer, the recurrent American worship of those few who achieve absolute power in a democracy. In his decades as a top designer, Klein has established himself as a veritable obsession. He has only intensified this stature in spiraling success that challenges, yet flourishes in, the very visible arenas of fashionable culture.

Is Klein a designer? Suffused with aura and surrounded by negotiation—commercial and social—Klein might seem to have sacrificed his essential métier as a designer. Significantly, he has not. His sensibility for minimalist aesthetics, in an active lifestyle with the ethos of sportswear, is as evident today as it ever was. Klein's clothing is as judicious as his marketing is advanced: streamlined clothes worn with ease prevail, with influences as far flung as Vionnet, Halston, di Sant' Angelo, and Armani. Klein's best eveningwear gives a first impression of delicacy and refinement, characteristically avoiding linings and complications, as the wearer enjoys an unexpected freedom and mobility.

Klein's fashion is the quintessence of American fashion expression and taste—his minimal construction promotes mass manufacturing; his ease allows comfortable dressing in all sizes and shapes; his penchant for quality wool, cashmere, cotton, and other feel-good textile luxuries affirms a sense of luxury in clothes otherwise so undistinguished in their simplicity as to pass unnoticed. Although in a 1994 press statement Klein avowed that "Everything begins with the cut," one does not think of cut and construction in the traditional fashion measure of Vionnet or Madame Grès. Klein's spare cut is not truly architectural; it is unobtrusive or, in the words of Bernadine Morris, writing in the New York Times in May of 1985, "without frills."

Klein's marketing of jeans, underwear, and fragrance were consistent in their aggressive even opportunistic address to gender and sexuality. Beginning with 1980 television advertising conceived by Richard Avedon and Klein using young model Brooke Shields, Klein steadily set and stretched the parameters of America's acceptance of overt sensuality in promotion of fashion and in public, with displays ranging from national television campaigns to Times Square billboards, and to print media. Klein's campaigns have been progressive, seeming in each instance to build upon and move beyond the first provocation and the inevitable acceptance of the prior campaign.

Defining the public protocols of the 1980s and 1990s, Klein made a distinct cultural contribution to advertising. He not only took the design of jeans and underwear to new heights, but brought gender into the fray as well. He was unerringly responsible for the surge of gender-sharing fragrances launched in the middle and late 1990s, as well as pushing the envelope with daringly sexual displays in advertising.

James Brady wrote of Klein in Parade in October 1986: "His success is so enormous, his income so vast, his lifestyle so lavish, that we tend to forget that in life there are no free rides." And so controversy has often surrounded Klein as much as celebrity; but it is incontrovertible that Klein altered the landscape of modern American fashion and its perception as only a genius and a giant can—in an epoch of uncertainty and recriminations, Klein's imperfect but ever-upward course prompted dispute and jealousy. Yet he demonstrated, over and over, that his unerring fashion sense would prevail.

Klein's enduring success has been a balance of the no-nonsense fashion designer with the pretentious and unpredictable commercialism of the fashion industry. Since 1994 Calvin Klein Inc. has grown into a fashion empire producing everything—including menswear, womenswear, fragrances and skincare products, eyewear, socks, and pillowcases (Calvin Klein Home, a home fashion collection, was introduced in April 1995). Bearing the Calvin Klein name has grown into a lifestyle revered around the world; it is known in countries even where his products are not sold. Klein believes American clothes are an advantage in the global marketplace; nearly 90-percent of his business is through worldwide licensing agreements.

Klein has continued to receive notoriety from the publicity surrounding his advertisements. In 1995 his cK Jeans advertising campaign was pulled because of accusations of child pornography. New York Mayor Rudy Giuliani led the uproar in 1999 over a Times Square billboard showing seminaked youngsters. Even though Klein's advertisements are seen as inappropriate, his design philosophy has remained consistent—to keep the clothes modern, sophisticated, sexy, clean, and minimal. He once told Time magazine, "I've never been one to see women in ruffles and all kinds of fanciful apparel. To me it's just silly."

Klein confirmed in 1999 that he was looking ways to expand his business. He hired financial advisers to seek opportunities to develop his business through a merger, or by selling or developing other strategic options. Confirmed reports said Prada, Gucci, LMVH, and Ralph Lauren showed interest in purchasing Calvin Klein, Inc. Warnco, which owned the Calvin Klein underwear and jeans businesses, made an offer but the parties failed to agree on control of Calvin Klein trademark usage. In a statement, Klein said the "strongest path to growth lay in remaining an independent, privately held entity." As of 2001, both Klein and his company remained independent and private.

—Richard Martin; updated by Donna W. Reamy

KLOSS, John

American designer

Born: John Klosowski in Detroit, Michigan, 13 June 1937. Educational: Studied architecture at Cass Technical High School, Detroit; studied fashion at Traphagen School of Fashion, New York. Career: Worked for couturier Bob Bugnand, Paris, 1957–58; established own business with signature boutique at Henri Bendel, New York, 1959; designer, Lily of France, New York, 1970s; designer, John Kloss for CIRA division of SLC Fashion Corporation, 1970s. Awards: Coty American Fashion Critics award, 1971, 1974; Knitted Textile Association Crystal Ball award, 1974. Died: 25 March 1987, in Stamford, Connecticut.

PUBLICATIONS

On KLOSS:

Books

Milbank, Caroline Rennolds, New York Fashion: The Evolution of American Style, New York, 1989.

Articles

- Molli, Jeanne, "Designer Works in Loft Amid Art and Greenery," in the New York Times, 19 March 1962.
- Taylor, Angela, "The Kloss Style: Modern Art and Jigsaw Puzzles," in the New York Times, 30 March 1966.
- "Inspiration Comes from People," in Intimate Apparel, August/September 1971.
- Shelton, P., "Fashion's Constant Nostalgia Kick Bores John Kloss," in Biography News, January 1974.
- "John Kloss, Designer, Dies," in WWD, 30 March 1987.

* * *

Dress and lingerie designer John Kloss (John Klosowski) was born in Detroit, Michigan, where he studied architecture at Cass Technical High School. He moved to New York and worked for Irving Trust Company on Wall Street. Kloss ultimately gained his fashion training when he attended the Traphagen School of Fashion in New York. At age 20, he apprenticed with American-born couturier Bob Bugnard in Paris and went on to work for Serge Matta. In 1959 Kloss turned down an offer to work with Nina Ricci and instead began to design with Lisa Fonssagrives and later worked on his own, designing collections for wholesale manufacturers. Some of his designs were manufactured and distributed by Bendel's Studio, a part of Henri Bendel of New York, a store noted for discovering and supporting young fashion designers.

In the early 1960s, Kloss designed sculpturally-shaped dresses constructed from fabrics such as cotton brocades, that could be formed and molded to enclose the body. By the late 1960s he was using chiffon, matte jersey, and crêpe de chine; fluid materials which moved gracefully with the wearer. Simple dress shapes were formed without darts that did not fit tightly to the body, but flowed seductively over its curves.

Kloss used vivid colors like lemon yellows, greens, amethyst, and ruby in abstract shapes reminiscent of abstract expressionist paintings. Sophisticated, simple, clean designs were detailed with top stitching, tiny rows of buttons, simple edge trims, or tie closures. These nonstructured designs were adapted for lingerie and loungewear marketed by Lily of France and CIRA. Included were designs for nightgowns and bras, both seamless and underwired, again without superfluous lace trimmings.

The most revolutionary of Kloss' designs came about as a reaction to the "ban the bra" movement in the 1970s. He designed a bra that appeared not to exist in 1974 for Lily of France, called the "glossie," which was made from stretchy, sheer, glittery material. The design was seamless, unconstructed, but underwired, so it provided support for those women who needed it, yet wanted the braless look. The "glossie" came in solid colors such as amethyst, indigo, ruby, and mocha.

Kloss received two Coty awards, one in 1971 and another in 1974, for his lingerie designs. His nightgowns were cut from nylon in nonboudoir colors, in sophisticated, seductive cuts that emulated some of his eveningwear. In addition, Kloss also designed leotards, pajamas, swimwear, and sportswear. Under various licenses, he designed foundation garments, lingerie, loungewear, hosiery, tenniswear, and home sewing patterns. He was affiliated with the Kreisler Group of young designers under the management of Stuart Kreisler.

Whether designing dresses or loungewear, John Kloss was aware of the fashion trends, moving from sculptural, molded forms, to the free flowing more casual looks of the late 1960s and 1970s. He avoided unnecessary details, relying instead on the cut of the garment and the materials used to provide the design. The garments moved and flowed with the wearer. His designs were simple, clean, and seductive.

Kloss committed suicide in 1987.

—Nancy House

KNECHT, Gabriele

American designer

Born: Munich, Germany, 8 January 1938. Education: Studied fine arts, majoring in fashion design, Washington University, St. Louis, 1956–60; synergetics, cosmology, physics, New School for Social Research, New York, 1977–80; reflective theory, Hayden Planetarium, New York; insect kinematics, Museum of Natural History, New York. Career: Bra designer, Formfit Co., Chicago, 1959; dress designer, Carlye Dress Co., St. Louis, 1960–61; designer, boyswear, Hummelsheim, Murnau, West Germany, 1961–62; designer, junior dresses, Big Ben Modelle, West Berlin, 1962; childrenswear collection, Bill Atkinson, Glen of Michigan, New York, 1963–67; designer, Sally Forth childrenswear, Boe Jests Inc., 1967–68; designer, S.W.A.K. children and preteen sportswear, Villager, 1968–69; designer, women's sportswear, Boe Jests Inc., 1969–70; owner/designer, operating mail order hand-knit kits, I Did it Myself, Mother, 1970–73; designer, children's sportswear, Gabriele Knecht label, Suntoga, Miami, Florida, 1971–73; author/designer knitting booklets, 1973–77; freelance designer, junior and children's knitwear, 1977–82; designer/producer, G.K. Forward Inc., from 1982; U.S. patent awarded for garments constructed with forward sleeves, 1984; lecturer, Fashion Institute of Technology and Parsons School of Design, New York; Washington State University; North Carolina State University; University of Cincinnati School of Design; Fashion Group of St. Louis; American Association of University Women; Fashion's Inner Circle. Collections: Fashion Institute of Technology, New York. Exhibitions: More Fashion Award Grand Prize-Winning Designs, Henderson Gallery, Yellow Springs, Ohio, 1985; Her Works Praise Her: Women as Inventors, Goldstein Gallery, University of Minnesota, St. Paul, 1988; A Woman's Place is in the Patent Office, U.S. Patent and Trademark Office, Washington, D.C., 1990. Awards: Outstanding Women in America listing, 1966; Best New Designer in Women's Clothing Field, More Fashion award, New York, 1984; National Endowment for the Arts grant, 1986. Address: G.K. Forward Inc., 264 West 35th Street, New York, NY 10001, U.S.A.

PUBLICATIONS

By KNECHT:

Books

Learn to Crochet and Learn to Knit booklets for Columbia Minerva Corporation, New York, from 1973.

Articles

- Molli, Jeanne, "Designer Works in Loft Amid Art and Greenery," in the New York Times, 19 March 1962.
- Taylor, Angela, "The Kloss Style: Modern Art and Jigsaw Puzzles," in the New York Times, 30 March 1966.
- "Inspiration Comes from People," in Intimate Apparel, August/September 1971.
- Shelton, P., "Fashion's Constant Nostalgia Kick Bores John Kloss," in Biography News, January 1974.
- "John Kloss, Designer, Dies," in WWD, 30 March 1987.

* * *

Dress and lingerie designer John Kloss (John Klosowski) was born in Detroit, Michigan, where he studied architecture at Cass Technical High School. He moved to New York and worked for Irving Trust Company on Wall Street. Kloss ultimately gained his fashion training when he attended the Traphagen School of Fashion in New York. At age 20, he apprenticed with American-born couturier Bob Bugnard in Paris and went on to work for Serge Matta. In 1959 Kloss turned down an offer to work with Nina Ricci and instead began to design with Lisa Fonssagrives and later worked on his own, designing collections for wholesale manufacturers. Some of his designs were manufactured and distributed by Bendel's Studio, a part of Henri Bendel of New York, a store noted for discovering and supporting young fashion designers.

In the early 1960s, Kloss designed sculpturally-shaped dresses constructed from fabrics such as cotton brocades, that could be formed and molded to enclose the body. By the late 1960s he was using chiffon, matte jersey, and crêpe de chine; fluid materials which moved gracefully with the wearer. Simple dress shapes were formed without darts that did not fit tightly to the body, but flowed seductively over its curves.

Kloss used vivid colors like lemon yellows, greens, amethyst, and ruby in abstract shapes reminiscent of abstract expressionist paintings. Sophisticated, simple, clean designs were detailed with top stitching, tiny rows of buttons, simple edge trims, or tie closures. These nonstructured designs were adapted for lingerie and loungewear marketed by Lily of France and CIRA. Included were designs for nightgowns and bras, both seamless and underwired, again without superfluous lace trimmings.

The most revolutionary of Kloss' designs came about as a reaction to the "ban the bra" movement in the 1970s. He designed a bra that appeared not to exist in 1974 for Lily of France, called the "glossie," which was made from stretchy, sheer, glittery material. The design was seamless, unconstructed, but underwired, so it provided support for those women who needed it, yet wanted the braless look. The "glossie" came in solid colors such as amethyst, indigo, ruby, and mocha.

Kloss received two Coty awards, one in 1971 and another in 1974, for his lingerie designs. His nightgowns were cut from nylon in nonboudoir colors, in sophisticated, seductive cuts that emulated some of his eveningwear. In addition, Kloss also designed leotards, pajamas, swimwear, and sportswear. Under various licenses, he designed foundation garments, lingerie, loungewear, hosiery, tenniswear, and home sewing patterns. He was affiliated with the Kreisler Group of young designers under the management of Stuart Kreisler.

Whether designing dresses or loungewear, John Kloss was aware of the fashion trends, moving from sculptural, molded forms, to the free flowing more casual looks of the late 1960s and 1970s. He avoided unnecessary details, relying instead on the cut of the garment and the materials used to provide the design. The garments moved and flowed with the wearer. His designs were simple, clean, and seductive.

Kloss committed suicide in 1987.

—Nancy House

KNECHT, Gabriele

American designer

Born: Munich, Germany, 8 January 1938. Education: Studied fine arts, majoring in fashion design, Washington University, St. Louis, 1956–60; synergetics, cosmology, physics, New School for Social Research, New York, 1977–80; reflective theory, Hayden Planetarium, New York; insect kinematics, Museum of Natural History, New York. Career: Bra designer, Formfit Co., Chicago, 1959; dress designer, Carlye Dress Co., St. Louis, 1960–61; designer, boyswear, Hummelsheim, Murnau, West Germany, 1961–62; designer, junior dresses, Big Ben Modelle, West Berlin, 1962; childrenswear collection, Bill Atkinson, Glen of Michigan, New York, 1963–67; designer, Sally Forth childrenswear, Boe Jests Inc., 1967–68; designer, S.W.A.K. children and preteen sportswear, Villager, 1968–69; designer, women's sportswear, Boe Jests Inc., 1969–70; owner/designer, operating mail order hand-knit kits, I Did it Myself, Mother, 1970–73; designer, children's sportswear, Gabriele Knecht label, Suntoga, Miami, Florida, 1971–73; author/designer knitting booklets, 1973–77; freelance designer, junior and children's knitwear, 1977–82; designer/producer, G.K. Forward Inc., from 1982; U.S. patent awarded for garments constructed with forward sleeves, 1984; lecturer, Fashion Institute of Technology and Parsons School of Design, New York; Washington State University; North Carolina State University; University of Cincinnati School of Design; Fashion Group of St. Louis; American Association of University Women; Fashion's Inner Circle. Collections: Fashion Institute of Technology, New York. Exhibitions: More Fashion Award Grand Prize-Winning Designs, Henderson Gallery, Yellow Springs, Ohio, 1985; Her Works Praise Her: Women as Inventors, Goldstein Gallery, University of Minnesota, St. Paul, 1988; A Woman's Place is in the Patent Office, U.S. Patent and Trademark Office, Washington, D.C., 1990. Awards: Outstanding Women in America listing, 1966; Best New Designer in Women's Clothing Field, More Fashion award, New York, 1984; National Endowment for the Arts grant, 1986. Address: G.K. Forward Inc., 264 West 35th Street, New York, NY 10001, U.S.A.

PUBLICATIONS

By KNECHT:

Books

Learn to Crochet and Learn to Knit booklets for Columbia Minerva Corporation, New York, from 1973.

On KNECHT:Articles

- "Gabriele Knecht Receives First More Fashion Award," in WWD, 2 May 1984.
- Peacock, Mary, "Gabriele Knecht's Patented Patterns and Other Fashion Breakthroughs," in Ms. (New York), March 1985.
- Harte, Susan, "Patterned for Perfection," in the Atlanta Journal & Constitution, 4 August 1985.
- Engelken, K., "Rethinking Sleeves," in Washington University Alumni News, March 1986.
- Sayers, Donna, "Armed Revolution," in the Cincinnati Enquirer, October 1988.
- Friedman, Arthur, "Knecht Steps Forward," in WWD, September 1991.
- Van Horne, Gladys, "Maestra's New Suit Stitched Just in Time," in the Wheeling News-Register, September 1992.

*

I started my own company of designer sportswear and coats after spending several years developing an original clothing concept which relates the structure of clothing to the unique way the human body moves. The technology for this concept has been fully documented in a United States patent. Unlike clothing which fits a body at rest or standing still, I base my designs on an underlying construction which anticipates the forward direction the body takes in movement, producing new fashion shapes.

I achieve my designs from a pattern-making system based on squares, working out the technical construction in miniature first, then enlarging the squares for the life-size version. My "K" trademark illustrates the difference between conventional construction and my forward-sleeve construction: the left part of the logo showing the top view of the body with sleeve direction of conventional garments; the right part of the logo showing the top view of the body with sleeve direction of garments based on my patented forward sleeve.

—Gabriele Knecht

* * *

New York designer Gabriele Knecht believes that if you want to change fashion and achieve new shapes, you must change the underlying foundation. So she did. Conventional construction methods used in the making of garments were hundreds of years old and based on the T-shape, or kimono pattern. This method assumed our arms and legs had an equal range of movement around the anterior and posterior of the body.

Knecht states that although the arms have a large range of movement around the body, this freedom is not equal in all directions. "We can hug ourselves and move our legs forward, but there is a limited or different movement toward the back of the body." Knecht has, possibly for the first time in history, looked at the real differences between the body's front and back range of movement, studying kinematics, synergetics, physics, and cosmology in addition to fashion design and fine arts. Combining these drastically different areas of study, she looked at how the differences of movement of the body affected fashion design, pattern making, and garment construction. The result was her "forward-sleeve" design.

Knecht's one-piece and multipiece forward-sleeve pattern brought the axis of the sleeve substantially forward of the body's lateral plane and into the arm's center range of movement. This was accomplished by moving the low point of the armhole forward while leaving the high point in the lateral plane of the body. By doing this, Knecht put a larger degree of ease and mobility in the side front area of her garments, where it was needed, yet with a closer body fit. The forward-sleeve design was an evolution in pattern making and construction, a process developed over a 10-year period that earned Knecht a U.S. patent in 1984 and foreign patents in Canada and Japan.

Using the forward-sleeve orientation as the basis for all of her work, Knecht has designed a line of chic, well-cut, and excellently proportional sportswear. The range of movement achieved with her forward-sleeve design allowed for a fitted, even tailored garment to have the movement and comfort of a much less constructed piece. Knecht's work, like that of American sportswear designer Claire McCardell, is simplified, reductive, and appealing to our human nature. Using geometrical shapes and diagonals to break or eliminate side seams and, when possible, only one pattern piece, she has created a design aesthetic and spirit all her own.

Although Knecht will not bow to the mandates of changing trends, her innate ability to design and her integrity of cut and construction have been evident in every garment with the Gabriele Knecht label. The Gabriele Knecht line has been sold in a number of major retail and specialty stores, such as Saks Fifth Avenue (exclusively for one season), Bonwit Teller, Macy's, Bergdorf Goodman, and Neiman Marcus, as well as in smaller stores such as Joanie's of Memphis. Knecht's work can be found alongside that of Yeohlee, Lida Baday, Peter Cohen, Ronaldus Shamask, Gentry Portifino, and Ann McKenna.

Maestra Rachel Worby of the Wheeling Symphony in West Virginia states, "The best feature is that the sleeves are attached in such a way that when I move my arms up and down as I am conducting, the jacket does not hike up too."

In 1984 Knecht was awarded the first-ever More Fashion award in New York. The event, hosted by Dynasty star Joan Collins, was sponsored by R.J. Reynolds Tobacco Co., maker of More cigarettes. Knecht beat out finalists Hino and Malee, Frans Haers, Tamotsu, and Frederico and Alfredo Viloria to win the top prize. The trophy was a wisp of vermeil on an ebony base...which fell off during the ceremony; Knecht took it in stride.

Knecht's spirit and singularity of purpose are best expressed by Susan Harte in the Atlanta Journal & Constitution (4 August 1985): "There is unlimited direction open to her now that she has set her fundamental precepts. She will design human clothes, not necessarily 'with-it' ones, and will do it autonomously, not deferentially."

—Fred Dennis; updated by Daryl F. Mallett

KOBAYASHI, Yukio

Japanese designer

Career: Designer, menswear line, Monsieur Nicole line, for Matsuda; joined Matsuda, 1976; took over as designer of Matsuda's menswear collection (known as Nicole in Japan), 1983; showed collection in New York for the first time, 1983; initial showing of collection in Paris, 1987; named chief designer, Matsuda's menwear and womenswear lines, 1995; opened Kobayashi Design Office Company to develop signature brands, late 1990s. Awards: Art Director's Club

On KNECHT:Articles

- "Gabriele Knecht Receives First More Fashion Award," in WWD, 2 May 1984.
- Peacock, Mary, "Gabriele Knecht's Patented Patterns and Other Fashion Breakthroughs," in Ms. (New York), March 1985.
- Harte, Susan, "Patterned for Perfection," in the Atlanta Journal & Constitution, 4 August 1985.
- Engelken, K., "Rethinking Sleeves," in Washington University Alumni News, March 1986.
- Sayers, Donna, "Armed Revolution," in the Cincinnati Enquirer, October 1988.
- Friedman, Arthur, "Knecht Steps Forward," in WWD, September 1991.
- Van Horne, Gladys, "Maestra's New Suit Stitched Just in Time," in the Wheeling News-Register, September 1992.

*

I started my own company of designer sportswear and coats after spending several years developing an original clothing concept which relates the structure of clothing to the unique way the human body moves. The technology for this concept has been fully documented in a United States patent. Unlike clothing which fits a body at rest or standing still, I base my designs on an underlying construction which anticipates the forward direction the body takes in movement, producing new fashion shapes.

I achieve my designs from a pattern-making system based on squares, working out the technical construction in miniature first, then enlarging the squares for the life-size version. My "K" trademark illustrates the difference between conventional construction and my forward-sleeve construction: the left part of the logo showing the top view of the body with sleeve direction of conventional garments; the right part of the logo showing the top view of the body with sleeve direction of garments based on my patented forward sleeve.

—Gabriele Knecht

* * *

New York designer Gabriele Knecht believes that if you want to change fashion and achieve new shapes, you must change the underlying foundation. So she did. Conventional construction methods used in the making of garments were hundreds of years old and based on the T-shape, or kimono pattern. This method assumed our arms and legs had an equal range of movement around the anterior and posterior of the body.

Knecht states that although the arms have a large range of movement around the body, this freedom is not equal in all directions. "We can hug ourselves and move our legs forward, but there is a limited or different movement toward the back of the body." Knecht has, possibly for the first time in history, looked at the real differences between the body's front and back range of movement, studying kinematics, synergetics, physics, and cosmology in addition to fashion design and fine arts. Combining these drastically different areas of study, she looked at how the differences of movement of the body affected fashion design, pattern making, and garment construction. The result was her "forward-sleeve" design.

Knecht's one-piece and multipiece forward-sleeve pattern brought the axis of the sleeve substantially forward of the body's lateral plane and into the arm's center range of movement. This was accomplished by moving the low point of the armhole forward while leaving the high point in the lateral plane of the body. By doing this, Knecht put a larger degree of ease and mobility in the side front area of her garments, where it was needed, yet with a closer body fit. The forward-sleeve design was an evolution in pattern making and construction, a process developed over a 10-year period that earned Knecht a U.S. patent in 1984 and foreign patents in Canada and Japan.

Using the forward-sleeve orientation as the basis for all of her work, Knecht has designed a line of chic, well-cut, and excellently proportional sportswear. The range of movement achieved with her forward-sleeve design allowed for a fitted, even tailored garment to have the movement and comfort of a much less constructed piece. Knecht's work, like that of American sportswear designer Claire McCardell, is simplified, reductive, and appealing to our human nature. Using geometrical shapes and diagonals to break or eliminate side seams and, when possible, only one pattern piece, she has created a design aesthetic and spirit all her own.

Although Knecht will not bow to the mandates of changing trends, her innate ability to design and her integrity of cut and construction have been evident in every garment with the Gabriele Knecht label. The Gabriele Knecht line has been sold in a number of major retail and specialty stores, such as Saks Fifth Avenue (exclusively for one season), Bonwit Teller, Macy's, Bergdorf Goodman, and Neiman Marcus, as well as in smaller stores such as Joanie's of Memphis. Knecht's work can be found alongside that of Yeohlee, Lida Baday, Peter Cohen, Ronaldus Shamask, Gentry Portifino, and Ann McKenna.

Maestra Rachel Worby of the Wheeling Symphony in West Virginia states, "The best feature is that the sleeves are attached in such a way that when I move my arms up and down as I am conducting, the jacket does not hike up too."

In 1984 Knecht was awarded the first-ever More Fashion award in New York. The event, hosted by Dynasty star Joan Collins, was sponsored by R.J. Reynolds Tobacco Co., maker of More cigarettes. Knecht beat out finalists Hino and Malee, Frans Haers, Tamotsu, and Frederico and Alfredo Viloria to win the top prize. The trophy was a wisp of vermeil on an ebony base...which fell off during the ceremony; Knecht took it in stride.

Knecht's spirit and singularity of purpose are best expressed by Susan Harte in the Atlanta Journal & Constitution (4 August 1985): "There is unlimited direction open to her now that she has set her fundamental precepts. She will design human clothes, not necessarily 'with-it' ones, and will do it autonomously, not deferentially."

—Fred Dennis; updated by Daryl F. Mallett

KOBAYASHI, Yukio

Japanese designer

Career: Designer, menswear line, Monsieur Nicole line, for Matsuda; joined Matsuda, 1976; took over as designer of Matsuda's menswear collection (known as Nicole in Japan), 1983; showed collection in New York for the first time, 1983; initial showing of collection in Paris, 1987; named chief designer, Matsuda's menwear and womenswear lines, 1995; opened Kobayashi Design Office Company to develop signature brands, late 1990s. Awards: Art Director's Club of New York for photo collaboration with Nan Goldin, 1996; Kuwazawa award, 1997. Address: Kobayashi Design Office Co. Ltd., 103, 2–30–9, Jingumae, Shibuya-Ku, Tokyo.

PUBLICATIONS

On KOBAYASHI:

Books

Phaidon Press (ed.), The Fashion Book, London, 1998.

Articles

Fressola, Peter, in DNR, 5 November 1986.

DNR, 5 February 1992.

Klensch, Elsa, “Matsuda Paints a Second Skin for Spring ‘97,” on CNN, 12 February 1997.

Ozzard, Janet, “Matsuda Out to Stake a Bigger Claim in U.S.,” in WWD, 12 February 1997.

* * *

Memory, both in the collective and crystalline form of history and in the ether of personal recollection, is the primary concern of Yukio Kobayashi’s menswear for Matsuda. Memory mingles in Kobayashi’s work with a desire for literary expression. Language blurts out irrepressibly in the work in frequent words, letters, and numbers. A lapel, for instance, may vanish into linear design or letters may become a surrealist free fall of pattern. Literature abides in another way: the clothing is laden with an evocative knowledge of the literary past, as if costuming for a Merchant-Ivory film (Kobayashi’s 1984 collections had reflected movie star elegance from the 1940s).

Kobayashi builds his clothing on the dandy’s proposition that all clothing is to be seen in a self-conscious spectatorship. Tailored clothing explores a repertory of early 20th-century menswear; sports-wear is supple and minimal, sometimes suggesting the Renaissance, Beau Brummel languor, or anticipating Utopia. Without contradiction to his historicism, Kobayashi is an apostle of advanced technology in synthetic fibers, often in startling juxtaposition with traditional materials and craft-domain handwork.

Kobayashi’s aesthetic made Matsuda menswear favored apparel for artists and intellectuals; the boulevardier dandyism of the clothing is due to its intellectual edge. Peter Fressola characterized Kobayashi’s work for Matsuda Men almost as an acquired, special taste in DNR (5 November 1986): “If you have never liked Matsuda, chances are good that you never will. But this designer has inspired the loyalty of a great many who willingly suspend judgement in favor of the rich, romantic, almost decadent aesthetic that is the world of his design.” In literary traits and audacious style, Kobayashi created the most romantic menswear of the 20th century.

Kobayashi’s aesthetic is invariably elegant, but he achieves his elegance not solely through refined materials but through the tactile satisfactions of fabric and pattern. A Norfolk jacket, a favorite template of Kobayashi’s design, is transformed by blocks of pattern at differing scale; robust outerwear becomes luxurious by the swelled proportions of the collar; in the 1990s, trousers were transfigured by their uninflected plainness, flat front, and cropped just above the ankle. Kobayashi generally mediates between the inherent elegance of his style and a simple design sincerity—treating the basics of clothing, like allowing jackets to move with loose fit, or in his exploration of soft velvety and corduroy materials.

In February 1992 DNR called the Kobayashi fall menswear collection “a modern, down-to-earth, very Matsuda look,” capturing its unpretentiousness. Even argyle-patterned Donegal tweeds, jackets with suppressed waists, seemed common, comfortable, and friendly. Thus Kobayashi achieves the dandy’s grace with none of the dandy’s disdain or arrogance: rugged materials, comfort, and vernacular borrowings are essential to his design. England and Scotland are the motherland of Kobayashi’s historicist vision.

In brilliant command of menswear history, Kobayashi has favored early 20th-century clothing, the time of menswear codification. Nonetheless, he is capable of reflecting with bravura elegance on Victorian tartanitis and in creating revelers from a Venetian masked carnival in modern form. Responding to a question in Details, Kobayashi said: “The early part of the century was a time when the way people thought about clothes was radically changing. But the period I enjoy speculating about most is the future.” Without such a sense of late-modern invention and adventure, the components of Kobayashi’s style might seem to fall into clever but tiring eclecticism. Instead, he keeps a sharp analytical edge and an unremitting sense of the new and vanguard about his clothing. After all, almost all other menswear designers have recourse to the same body of Anglophilic and Edwardian styles that inspire Kobayashi, but his energy is quicker, more intellectual, and more transforming.

Kobayashi and Matsuda have a reputation for looking at fashion as art. As part of this belief, they have paired with a number of well-known photographers, many of them outside the fashion industry, to create advertising and art photos that have been exhibited around the world. They have included drug-culture photographer Nan Goldin (whose series “Goldin Meets Yukio Kobayashi,” won an award from the Art Director’s Club of New York), performance artist Laurie Anderson, Jan Saudek, and Bruce Weber.

Kobayashi often lets fabric lead when he creates a line. From wool tweed, sponge and quilting, to body-hugging synthetics and sheer fabrics that emulate tattoos on the body, Kobayashi looks to the material to inspire his designs, which always emphasize comfort. Much of his work is gender-bending and age-blind and incorporates a broad range of colors. The designer combines experimentation with an adherence to traditional, classic styles.

Kobayashi had been designing Matsuda’s menswear lines since 1983 and, in 1995, took over the women’s collection as well, working closely with Matsuhiro Matsuda on its direction. At the time, Matsuda had 500 stores in Japan and had $230 million in wholesale volume; just one percent of this figure was attributable to the U.S. market, according to Women’s Wear Daily. The weekly publication further reported that Matsuda would focus on increasing its presence in the U.S. market in the late 1990s, using Kobayashi’s expanding and favorable reputation as a launching point.

While the Matsuda label is solely for export, the company markets ten labels under the Nicole banner in Japan. Nicole is licensed for home furnishings, tabletop products, eyewear, luggage, and small leather goods in Japan and around Asia, and Matsuda planned to expand its licensing efforts in the U.S. as well. In the late 1990s, Kobayashi opened his own Tokyo-based studio, Kobayashi Design Office Company Ltd., to develop his own labels. His intention, as he told Hideki Iwauchi on the Internet publication Insite-Tokyo, was to create clothing that was fun and free, designed for wearability rather than to be viewed on models.

—Richard Martin; updated by Karen Raugust

KONISHI, Yoshiyuki

Japanese knitwear designer

Born: 1950 in Tsu, Japan. Career: Established Ficce Uomo Co. Ltd. and introduced Ficce Uomo menswear line, 1981; introduced Yoshiyuki Konishi menswear line, 1987; introduced Ficce Jeans menswear line, 1988; introduced Ficce Donna womenswear line and Ficce Sport ski wear line, 1993; first New York runway show, 1997. Awards: Mainichi Fashion grand prix, 1991. Address: Ficce Uomo Co. Ltd., 4-3-11 Minami Azabu, Minato-Ku, Tokyo 106, Japan.

PUBLICATIONS

On KONISHI:

Books

Tokyo Collection, Tokyo, 1986.

Yoshiyuki Konishi's Knits, Tokyo, 1986.

Takeshi Beat Wears Knits of Yoshiyuki Konishi, Tokyo, 1992.

Yoshiyuki Konishi, spring 1998 collection. © Fashion Syndicate Press.

Articles

Ozzard, Janet, "New York at Bat," in WWD, 7 April 1997.

Greene, Walter, "Sexy Spring Fashions," in Black Elegance, April 1998.

*

The yarns I design are the vital essences of my finished products and the finished products are the radiators of my energy. The clothes I design—the multicolored, multitextured products—are the results of numerous experiments and challenges made and built up in the years I have lived and worked. The productions—yarn making, dyeing, knitting and weaving, and construction of the final product—all need to attain a level of equilibrium that must be maintained throughout the entire process.

In order to sustain originality, my designs begin from the productions of the single yarns and I do not believe in rationalization. Most of my handmade products require time-consuming and complicated procedures, but when artisan and spirit unite, a new world is introduced. The finished product—well-designed wearable clothes that include fantastic colors, materials, silhouettes, and shapes—function as comfortable clothes with evidence of my identity in every aspect of the product.

I hope to establish and stabilize my styles and at the same time I wish to analyze the world changes and affairs and translate them into my work.

—Yoshiyuki Konishi

* * *

Yoshiyuki Konishi is categorized as a men's sweater designer, but his sweater is not a sweater in the conventional sense. It may be called an objet d'art, an intricate tapestry, or a Jackson Pollock painting in three dimensions, but hardly an everyday variety of sweater. Not a few people see a similarity between Konishi's sweaters and Gaudi's architecture; a Japanese critic even had Konishi's sweaters photographed in front of Gaudi's buildings in Barcelona to prove the point.

"Until I saw those photos, I hadn't known anything about Gaudi. Later I looked at Gaudi's work and realized that some of my sweaters had a lot in common with Gaudi's baroque structures," says Konishi. He wonders if Gaudi shared his creative process. "I don't plan anything. I don't leaf through art books looking for an inspiration. An idea often comes to me while I stare vacantly at an empty wall," Konishi explains. "Once I get going, more ideas spring up, and I constantly add and change even after the production process has started. My production people think I am hopelessly disorganized."

Every aspect of a Konishi sweater is unusual and excessive. An average of 30 different colors are knit into a sweater, and he has used as many as 60 colors for a particularly elaborate one. He is obsessed with the quest for new materials, even experimenting with baling ropes, leather strips, vinyl tubes, and many other odd materials and still complains, "I wish I weren't making sweaters. The requirement for comfort prohibits the use of interesting materials." His staff processes and dyes raw materials such as silk, alpaca, and angora instead of buying already processed yarns. Konishi's knitting methods are as varied as his materials: machine knit, hand crochet, macramé, to name a few. Almost every season he comes up with new stitch patterns.

Yoshiyuki Konishi, spring 1998 collection. © Fashion Syndicate Press.

Obviously, Konishi is a black sheep in the fashion industry, albeit a cheerful and genial one. He does not mind being labeled a renegade or a rebel. "Actually," he confesses, "I feel embarrassed every time people call me a fashion designer. I am not sure if what I am making is fashion." But he was peeved when a French journalist called his work un-Japanese. "This person thought that black was a 'Japanese' color," he fumed. "But black is not traditionally Japanese. Look at kimonos and obis. Japanese have always loved a riot of radiant colors."

He should know, he grew up in Japan in an old feudal castle town called Tsu, where his maternal family had operated a kimono store for generations. "My childhood memories are all about kimonos," Konishi recalls. "A trip for me meant accompanying my mother on her buying trip, to Kyoto to select gorgeous obis, or to a trade show to look at hundreds of kimono fabrics." Konishi's penchant for color was probably nurtured by early experiences, but his design motifs are anything but traditionally Japanese, including such disparate inspirations as American cartoon characters, the Amazon jungle, or mythical ancient India. You cannot stay neutral about his sweaters; you either passionately love them or passionately hate them, which is fine with Konishi. He has a sizeable following among Japan's creative and professional circles. One ardent collector of Konishi sweaters asked Konishi to design his garden. Owning dozens of Konishi sweaters was not enough for him, he wanted even his house to enjoy a touch of Konishi. As long as he has such enthusiastic supporters, Konishi would happily consume his energies in pursuit of the perfect sweater.

In spring 1997, Konishi showed for the first time in New York, after a 25-year career as a designer in Japan, where, by the end of 1996 his wholesale business totaled $30 million in sales and he had developed a wide renown, according to Women's Wear Daily. His New York show reflected his use of lavish fabrics, from knits and brocade to mohair, crochet, and velvet, as well as his attention to details. Women's Wear Daily called his knits "elaborately detailed without becoming costumey."

His Asian-inspired looks—which were noted by the U.S. press even though many Japanese observers have long felt his designs did not reflect his heritage—attracted rave reviews from critics in the U.S., who commented on his elegant use of fabric and vibrant color palette. Noting that Konishi had never received the recognition in North America he deserved, critic Walter Greene wrote in Black Elegance (April 1998): "With a clear vision of the future, this designer moves into the 21st century with style and substance."

—Yoko Hamada; updated by Karen Raugust

KORS, Michael

American designer

Born: Long Island, New York, 9 August 1959. Education: Studied fashion design at Fashion Institute of Technology, New York, 1977.

Career: Sales assistant at Lothar's boutique, New York, 1977–78 (while studying at FIT), then designer and display director, 1978–80; established own label for women's sportswear, 1981; designer, Lyle & Scott, 1989; introduced lower-priced Kors line and menswear collection, 1990; designer, womenswear collection, for Erreuno J, from 1990; bridge line discontinued, company reorganized, 1993; hired as creative director for Celine, 1997; reintroduced own menswear collection label, 1998; took over all design responsibilities at Celine, 1998; created costumes for film The Thomas Crown Affair, 1999; one-third of business purchased by LMVH (Moët Hennessy Louis Vuitton), 1999; opened Manhattan store for own labels, 2000; stake in business acquired by Onward Kashiyama USA, 2000; introduced first fragrance, 2000; debuted licensed handbags, footwear, and eyewear, 2001. Awards: Dupont American Original award, 1983; Council of Fashion Designers Womenswear Designer of the Year, 1999; Featured Designer at Neiman Marcus Crystal Charity Ball luncheon, 2000. Address: 550 Seventh Avenue, New York, NY 10018, USA.

PUBLICATIONS

On KORS:

Books

Stegemeyer, Anne, Who's Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.

Yoshiyuki Konishi, spring 1998 collection. © Fashion Syndicate Press.

Obviously, Konishi is a black sheep in the fashion industry, albeit a cheerful and genial one. He does not mind being labeled a renegade or a rebel. "Actually," he confesses, "I feel embarrassed every time people call me a fashion designer. I am not sure if what I am making is fashion." But he was peeved when a French journalist called his work un-Japanese. "This person thought that black was a 'Japanese' color," he fumed. "But black is not traditionally Japanese. Look at kimonos and obis. Japanese have always loved a riot of radiant colors."

He should know, he grew up in Japan in an old feudal castle town called Tsu, where his maternal family had operated a kimono store for generations. "My childhood memories are all about kimonos," Konishi recalls. "A trip for me meant accompanying my mother on her buying trip, to Kyoto to select gorgeous obis, or to a trade show to look at hundreds of kimono fabrics." Konishi's penchant for color was probably nurtured by early experiences, but his design motifs are anything but traditionally Japanese, including such disparate inspirations as American cartoon characters, the Amazon jungle, or mythical ancient India. You cannot stay neutral about his sweaters; you either passionately love them or passionately hate them, which is fine with Konishi. He has a sizeable following among Japan's creative and professional circles. One ardent collector of Konishi sweaters asked Konishi to design his garden. Owning dozens of Konishi sweaters was not enough for him, he wanted even his house to enjoy a touch of Konishi. As long as he has such enthusiastic supporters, Konishi would happily consume his energies in pursuit of the perfect sweater.

In spring 1997, Konishi showed for the first time in New York, after a 25-year career as a designer in Japan, where, by the end of 1996 his wholesale business totaled $30 million in sales and he had developed a wide renown, according to Women's Wear Daily. His New York show reflected his use of lavish fabrics, from knits and brocade to mohair, crochet, and velvet, as well as his attention to details. Women's Wear Daily called his knits "elaborately detailed without becoming costumey."

His Asian-inspired looks—which were noted by the U.S. press even though many Japanese observers have long felt his designs did not reflect his heritage—attracted rave reviews from critics in the U.S., who commented on his elegant use of fabric and vibrant color palette. Noting that Konishi had never received the recognition in North America he deserved, critic Walter Greene wrote in Black Elegance (April 1998): "With a clear vision of the future, this designer moves into the 21st century with style and substance."

—Yoko Hamada; updated by Karen Raugust

KORS, Michael

American designer

Born: Long Island, New York, 9 August 1959. Education: Studied fashion design at Fashion Institute of Technology, New York, 1977.

Career: Sales assistant at Lothar's boutique, New York, 1977–78 (while studying at FIT), then designer and display director, 1978–80; established own label for women's sportswear, 1981; designer, Lyle & Scott, 1989; introduced lower-priced Kors line and menswear collection, 1990; designer, womenswear collection, for Erreuno J, from 1990; bridge line discontinued, company reorganized, 1993; hired as creative director for Celine, 1997; reintroduced own menswear collection label, 1998; took over all design responsibilities at Celine, 1998; created costumes for film The Thomas Crown Affair, 1999; one-third of business purchased by LMVH (Moët Hennessy Louis Vuitton), 1999; opened Manhattan store for own labels, 2000; stake in business acquired by Onward Kashiyama USA, 2000; introduced first fragrance, 2000; debuted licensed handbags, footwear, and eyewear, 2001. Awards: Dupont American Original award, 1983; Council of Fashion Designers Womenswear Designer of the Year, 1999; Featured Designer at Neiman Marcus Crystal Charity Ball luncheon, 2000. Address: 550 Seventh Avenue, New York, NY 10018, USA.

PUBLICATIONS

On KORS:

Books

Stegemeyer, Anne, Who's Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.

Michael Kors, fall 2001 collection: wool ruana over a merino pullover and stretch flannel britches. © AP/Wide World Photos.

Articles

- Sinclaire, Paul, and Lesley Jane Nonkin, "Designer, Client: The Modern Equation," in Vogue (New York), November 1987.
- Boehlert, Bart, "On Kors," in Connoisseur (New York), August 1988.
- Hochswender, Woody, "Designers on a Quiet Road to Success," in the New York Times, 1 November 1988.
- Reiger, Nancy, "Michael Kors Keeps It Cool," in Footwear News (New York), 30 July 1990.
- Worthington, Christa, "The Three Choicest Dudes in the USA," in the Sunday Times Magazine (London), 26 August 1990.
- Hochswender, Woody, "Casual, for the Car Pool (or Whatever)," in the New York Times, 9 September 1990.
- _____, "Amid the Scramble of the Style Race, Individuality Lives," in the New York Times, 1 November 1990.
- Darnton, Nina, "Acclaim for a New Mister Clean: Move Over, Calvin, and Make Room for Kors," in Newsweek, 3 December 1990.
- Baker, Martha, "Of Kors," in New York, 17 December 1990.
- Goodman, Wendy, "Upper-Deck Accommodations," in HG (New York), October 1991.
- Rudolph, Barbara, "Why Chic Is Now Cheaper," in Time, 11 November 1991.

- Smith, Liz, "Just the Way Mother Likes It," in the Times (London), 13 April 1992.
- Morris, Bernadine, "The Evolution of Leather's Gentler Image," in the New York Times, 28 April 1992.
- "New York: Michael Kors," in WWD, 7 November 1994.
- Lockwood, Lisa, "Kors Designing Bridge Line for Onward Kashiyama," in WWD, 7 February 1995.
- DeCaro, Frank, "Why Isn't He Calvin Klein? Michael Kors has Everything but Megastardom—So Far," in Newsweek, 29 July 1996.
- Hanson, Holly, "Life and Business is Looking Up for Designer Michael Kors," from Knight-Ridder/Tribune News Service, 12 September 1996.
- Weisman, Katherine, "Kors, Celine Confirm Post as Designer," in WWD, 24 November 1997.
- White, Constance C.R., "Another Design Talent is Lured Away to France," in the New York Times, 25 November 1997.
- "LMVH Buys 33-Percent Share in the Michael Kors Fashion House," in the New York Times, 17 February 1999.
- Givhan, Robin, "Best Western: Michael Kors Breathes New Life Into a Dusty Genre," in the Washington Post, 18 February 1999.
- Schiro, Anne-Marie, "An Ear for What Women Want," in the New York Times, 6 April 1999.
- Meers, Erik, and Nancy Matsumoto, "Of Kors: After 18 Years, Designer Michael Kors Becomes Fashion's Man of the Moment," in People, 9 August 1999.
- Edelson, Sharon, "Celine Plans Flagship for Madison Avenue," in WWD, 10 August 1999.
- Boytes, Kathleen, "Michael Kors: A Young Designer Stays on the Sane Side of Fashion," in WWD, 13 September 1999.
- "Michael Kors," in Current Biography, January 2000.
- Horyn, Cathy, "For Kors and Lauren, a Fondness for the Paddock," in the New York Times, 15 February 2000.
- Quintanilla, Michael, "Look, Ma! It's About More than Mutual Affection and Respect," in the Los Angeles Times, 12 May 2000.
- Comita, Jenny, "Kors Scores," in US Weekly, 18 September 2000.
- Haber, Holly, "Kors, Of Course," in WWD, 5 October 2000.
- Givhan, Robin, "Flirting With the Feminine: Paris Spring Collections Follow the Curves," in the Washington Post, 12 October 2000.
- Ozzard, Janet, "Kors Inks Deal with Kashiyama," in WWD, 13 November 2000.
- Hessen, Wendy, "Michael Kors Cadre Grows, with Eyewear for Spring," in WWD, 5 March 2001.
- Diamond, Kerry, "Michael Kors to Launch Men's Fragrance," in WWD, April 2001.

* * *

Perhaps the best summary of Michael Kors was offered by Woody Hochswender of the New York Times in November 1988 when he said, "Mr. Kors showed that simple doesn't have to be zero." Kors has been a minimalist working within a sportswear tradition. In this, he has perpetuated and advanced ideas of Halston, including strong sexuality. He particularly flattered the gym-toned body of the late 1980s and early 1990s in stretchy, simple dresses calling attention to the body within. Minimalists in art and architecture might seem to remove themselves from the figure and human proportion; the irony is that a fashion minimalist like Kors has drawn attention to the figure within.

Michael Kors, fall 2001 collection: "cashgora" ensemble. © AP/Wide World Photos.

Although he has shown patterns, Kors prefers neutral color fields and emphasizes the apparel of the fabric with luxurious wools and cashmere for fall-winter and stretch and cotton for spring-summer. Leather in shirts, skirts, and jackets is essential for any Kors fall-winter collection; trousers are critical in all collections; and layering is important, even light layers in spring-summer collections. Kors spoke the language of separates in arguing with Bernadine Morris of the New York Times in April 1992 stating, "Store buyers are zeroing in on the idea that women will probably not be shopping for entire new wardrobes. A single piece or two that will enliven everything else is what they will be searching for. Leather fills the bill—suede for times they are in a softer mood, smooth leather when they feel more aggressive." Kors' distinctive position as a leading minimalist in late 20th-century sportswear was achieved by the precise harmony of color and fabric in separates.

There has been some affinity between Kors and Donna Karan, both creating innovative bodysuits, sensual stretch skirts and tops, and other sportswear elements, as well as borrowings from menswear. In fact, Karan and Kors are somewhat similar in their menswear collections as well. They shared the dubious distinction of both offering bodyshirts (underwear attached to shirts) in menswear collections for fall 1992. If anything, Kors' minimalism was a little more referential than Karan's—he deliberately evoked the glamor and sportiness of the 1930s, the "Belafonte" shirt of the 1950s, or vinyl clothing of the late 1960s. Despite his proclivity to the most simple in shapes, he has produced clothes that are undeniably romantic and Kors admits to loving the movies, telling HG's Wendy Goodman in October 1991 that he believed he had only two choices in life: movie star or fashion designer.

Of Claire McCordell, Kors acknowledges his admiration of her clothes, seen in old magazines, "They were timeless. She was the first designer to look not to Paris for inspiration but to the needs of the American woman." A spring-summer silk shantung scarf blazer by Kors reminds one of the McCordell twists and ties but with all the sleek romance of a Noel Coward drawing room. Like the other sportswear designers, he learns from and responds to his clients and potential customers. He told Bart Boehlert of Connoisseur in August 1988 that he likes to talk with a variety of women from his office, customers, or his mother to ask what they most want in clothing.

His sportswear-based pragmatism has been particularly effective as a monitor to the sexuality of his clothing. A bare Kors dress or jumpsuit may be audaciously sexy, but tone it down with a neutral jacket or other cover-up and it can become suitable for the office. Conversely, Kors can take a simple skirt and blouse from the office setting into hot evening life with the addition of a leather jacket or a satin swing jacket. Only partly facetiously, he told Hochswender of the New York Times (September 1990) of his comfortable and chic Kors line, "In Texas they call it carpool couture. They all want to wear something pretty for the carpool." Kors creates the pretty, the sexy, and the highly practical, pure mastery in American sportswear.

Throughout Kors' decades as a designer, he has maintained the same casual-yet-luxurious sensibility he has been known for since launching his business in 1981. In the late 1990s and early 2000s, fashion trends caught up with his longtime focus on feminine, elegant simplicity, and he finally moved to the industry forefront. Whether taking inspiration from the equestrian world or from Native American culture, he has remained constant in his use of luxurious, often unique fabrics to create upscale yet wearable pieces.

Kors designs two lines simultaneously, his own labels and those of the French house Celine, for which he added design responsibilities in 1997. Both feature his identifiable signature look, yet each is distinct. As Kors told Jenny Comita in the US Weekly Style section (September 2000), Celine is slightly more indulgent, whereas Kors and the lower-priced Kors by Michael Kors are sharper and more efficient. The designer is credited with reviving the more than 50-year-old Celine brand. Additionally, his work for the French house has been cited as a key factor in a new freshness in his signature lines.

In 1999 LVMH (Moët Hennessy Louis Vuitton), owner of the Celine label, purchased a third of Kors' D5 signature business. Kors hoped the acquisition would boost his presence internationally as well as allow him to expand his licensing and advertising activity, neither of which he had pursued aggressively in the past. Wholesale sales for the Kors D5 signature labels in 1999 were $30 million, according to the New York Times, with sales growing 60 to 70 percent annually for two years.

Kors sold an additional tenth of his business in 2000 to Onward Kashiyama USA, a licensee for the Kors by Michael Kors bridge line (which was reintroduced in 1996 after having been discontinued several years earlier). The designer hoped the new relationship would support plans to expand further into Asia. Next came a Kors first—the introduction of a women's fragrance—launched in fall 2000 through licensee Parfums Givenchy. The debut was successful enough for Kors to expand into men's scents the following year. He had also begun showing men's clothing again, after a hiatus, as part of his women's runway show in spring 1998.

In 2001, Kors—who considers fragrances one of his most personal creations—and Parfums Givenchy developed three new scents called Notes from Michael which could be worn in any combination or alone. In addition to fragrance, Kors has focused on expanding the rest of his licensed products since the turn of the century, including handbags, footwear, and eyewear, which all debuted in spring 2001.

Some observers have criticized Kors for being bland and predictable and for never departing from his focus on casual luxury, either in his work for Celine or for his own labels. Yet many praise his confidence in sticking with what he believes his customers want and remaining unaffected by short-lived trends. He always creates pieces that can be mixed and matched in unexpected ways—day with night, summer with winter, big and bulky with silky and slim. Kors is proud his clothes are bought by a customer base that ranges from 20-somethings to much more mature women.

—Richard Martin; updated by Karen Raugust

KOSHINO, Hiroko

Japanese designer

Born: 15 January 1937 in Osaka. Education: Graduated from the Department of Design of Bunka Fashion College, Tokyo, 1961. Family: Married, 1960 (divorced, 1976); children: Yuka, Yuma. Career: Designer, Komatsu Department Store, Tokyo, 1961–63; owner and designer, Hiroko Koshino haute-couture, textile, prêt-à-porter, children's clothing, nightie accessories and objects, boutique, Tokyo, from 1964; chairperson, Hiroko Koshino International corporation, Tokyo, from 1982; president, Hiroko Koshino Design Office, Tokyo, from 1988; created branch lines Hiroko Koshino Resort, Hiroko Koshino, Hiroko Bis, Hiroko Homme, Hiroko Koshino Golf; closed Paris store and stopped showing in Paris, late 1990s; designed uniforms for Kintetsu Buffalos baseball team, 1997; held joint collection with sisters Junko and Michiko, 2000; perfume line launch, 2002. Exhibitions: Roma Alta Moda Collection, 1978; Three Sisters, Osaka, 1982; Shanghai, 1984; exhibition with Borek Sípek and Bambi Uden, Prague, 1994. Awards: Osaka City award for Cultural Merit, 1989; highest honors at Mainichi Fashion grand prix, 1997. Address: 1-24-1, Sendagaya, Shibuya-ku, 151 Tokyo, Japan.

PUBLICATIONS

On KOSHINO:

Books

The Tokyo Collection, Tokyo, 1986.

Articles

"Japan's Master Strokes," in The Guardian (London), 28 April 1988. "Architecture du Silence," in [special issue] of Vogue, September 1994.

Niwata, Manabu, "Designer Family Fueled by Competition," in Mainichi Shimbun, 16 October 2000.

Hiroko Koshino, spring/summer 2001 collection. © AP/Wide World Photos.

Saito, Mayumi, "Hiroko Koshino," available online at www.JapanToday.com, 6 April 2001.
Betros, Chris, with Maki Nibayashi, "Hiroko Koshino: Making the Right Cut," online at www.JapanToday.com, 27 April 2001.

*

I love Japan and have been attracted to traditional Japanese culture. I'm trying to express oriental sensitivities in a modern, Western framework. What I think, what I feel, my lifestyle—these are the starting points for my designs. They give me confidence in and a sense of identity with my creations.

—Hiroko Koshino

* * *

An established designer based in Japan, Hiroko Koshino first showed in Paris after the breakthrough of the more avant-garde Japanese group in 1983. A member of a very old and established

Kors to expand into men's scents the following year. He had also begun showing men's clothing again, after a hiatus, as part of his women's runway show in spring 1998.

In 2001, Kors—who considers fragrances one of his most personal creations—and Parfums Givenchy developed three new scents called Notes from Michael which could be worn in any combination or alone. In addition to fragrance, Kors has focused on expanding the rest of his licensed products since the turn of the century, including handbags, footwear, and eyewear, which all debuted in spring 2001.

Some observers have criticized Kors for being bland and predictable and for never departing from his focus on casual luxury, either in his work for Celine or for his own labels. Yet many praise his confidence in sticking with what he believes his customers want and remaining unaffected by short-lived trends. He always creates pieces that can be mixed and matched in unexpected ways—day with night, summer with winter, big and bulky with silky and slim. Kors is proud his clothes are bought by a customer base that ranges from 20-somethings to much more mature women.

—Richard Martin; updated by Karen Raugust

KOSHINO, Hiroko

Japanese designer

Born: 15 January 1937 in Osaka. Education: Graduated from the Department of Design of Bunka Fashion College, Tokyo, 1961. Family: Married, 1960 (divorced, 1976); children: Yuka, Yuma. Career: Designer, Komatsu Department Store, Tokyo, 1961–63; owner and designer, Hiroko Koshino haute-couture, textile, prêt-à-porter, children's clothing, nightie accessories and objects, boutique, Tokyo, from 1964; chairperson, Hiroko Koshino International corporation, Tokyo, from 1982; president, Hiroko Koshino Design Office, Tokyo, from 1988; created branch lines Hiroko Koshino Resort, Hiroko Koshino, Hiroko Bis, Hiroko Homme, Hiroko Koshino Golf; closed Paris store and stopped showing in Paris, late 1990s; designed uniforms for Kintetsu Buffalos baseball team, 1997; held joint collection with sisters Junko and Michiko, 2000; perfume line launch, 2002. Exhibitions: Roma Alta Moda Collection, 1978; Three Sisters, Osaka, 1982; Shanghai, 1984; exhibition with Borek Sípek and Bambi Uden, Prague, 1994. Awards: Osaka City award for Cultural Merit, 1989; highest honors at Mainichi Fashion grand prix, 1997. Address: 1-24-1, Sendagaya, Shibuya-ku, 151 Tokyo, Japan.

PUBLICATIONS

On KOSHINO:

Books

The Tokyo Collection, Tokyo, 1986.

Articles

"Japan's Master Strokes," in The Guardian (London), 28 April 1988. "Architecture du Silence," in [special issue] of Vogue, September 1994.

Niwata, Manabu, "Designer Family Fueled by Competition," in Mainichi Shimbun, 16 October 2000.

Hiroko Koshino, spring/summer 2001 collection. © AP/Wide World Photos.

Saito, Mayumi, "Hiroko Koshino," available online at www.JapanToday.com, 6 April 2001.
Betros, Chris, with Maki Nibayashi, "Hiroko Koshino: Making the Right Cut," online at www.JapanToday.com, 27 April 2001.

*

I love Japan and have been attracted to traditional Japanese culture. I'm trying to express oriental sensitivities in a modern, Western framework. What I think, what I feel, my lifestyle—these are the starting points for my designs. They give me confidence in and a sense of identity with my creations.

—Hiroko Koshino

* * *

An established designer based in Japan, Hiroko Koshino first showed in Paris after the breakthrough of the more avant-garde Japanese group in 1983. A member of a very old and established

Japanese family that spawned two other successful designers, Junko and Michiko, Koshino was brought up to respect the past and grew to love traditional Kabuki theatre. Her designs are based on the traditional clothing idiom of the Japanese kimono, following its aesthetics of volume and layering, an area of focus for other designers such as Kenzo Takada.

Koshino's clothes explore the tension between Western influences and Japanese values—a notion that still has currency, as a Western conception of fashion has only been in existence in Japan since 1945. The encroaching influence of the West has meant that many traditional Japanese aesthetic concepts have been explored and brought into the present by designers attempting to unite the modern with a strong sense of their own cultural continuity and concerns. Tradition and Westernized ideas of progress were historically separated in Japanese culture; for example, in the 19th century, modern Japanese painting (nihonga) and modern painting displaying a Western influence (yosa) were shown in different rooms—the dualism made physically apparent. Yet since the Meiji period (1868–1912), Japan's former cultural isolation vanished and there were concerted efforts to overcome the dichotomy of East and West to achieve what was hoped to be a more unified cultural pattern.

Koshino's attempts to overcome cultural duality can be deduced in her endeavors to remove the kimono from its 20th-century function as formal wear for weddings and other ceremonial occasions and to introduce more current ideas of fashion terminology into its traditional form—a concerted effort to reintroduce the kimono as a form of everyday dress. The tradition of the kimono in which Koshino intervenes is essentially a rectilinear two-dimensional one, which could be considered shapeless in comparison with Western female clothing that tends to fit the body and emphasize its shape. In traditional Japanese clothing, padding and quilting are used to create a space between the body and the wearer, a concept clearly seen in the contemporary ready-to-wear explorations of Rei Kawakubo's Comme des Garçons designs.

The patterns of the kimono follow equally strict rules, being derived from nature, yet nature is then stylized and made graphic. These traditions can be discerned in the work of Koshino, who employs bird or bamboo prints to counteract the uniformity of her garment's more modular construction. Koshino's overlarge tops, dresses, and trousers of silk, cotton, and linen look back to the traditions of the Japanese court in which styles became so exaggerated that enormous amounts of material were used to signify status. Copious amounts of fabric and many layered undergarments led to a stiffened style in which the body all but disappeared. Koshino retains this volume but by the use of natural fibers brings this traditional styling into the 20th century, though her clothing is more fitted to the demands of contemporary women. Her modular units are more voluminous and asymmetrical than tradition allows, and she is renowned for utilizing bright colors for decoration though within traditional Japanese color symbolism, bright colors are reserved for the young.

With the fashion media's focus on the more obviously radical side of Japanese fashion—Miyake, Yamamoto et al—Hiroko Koshino's more understated experimentation has been somewhat ignored. Her popularity among European women in particular testifies to the wearability of her designs. Koshino, who celebrated 40 years in the fashion business in 1997, continues to combine East and West, melding the futuristic with the classic (as seen in her 2001 autumn/winter collection, themed "Timeless Vintage.") Further, she balances the feminine and the masculine and uses contrasting fabrics from elegant furs to modern metallics. Her pragmatic view of fashion is reflected in her frequent acceptance of commissions for uniforms, such as for the Chosi City Girls School and the Kintetsu Buffalos baseball team.

Koshino's overall business, as of 1997, was estimated to generate $100 million a year. Clothes under her label, distributed through 200 stores in Japan, sold more in that country than products marketed under many other well-known global designer names. Although she has long had global recognition—Koshino was one of the first Japanese designers to show her collections in Rome and in Shanghai, for example—she spent the late 1990s focusing on her native Japanese market. She closed her Paris-based shop and discontinued showing Paris collections after more than a decade as a fixture there while continuing to show in Japan, not only in Tokyo but in other Japanese cities such as Osaka. In 2002, Koshino expects to launch a new perfume line, which, since it is being developed in Paris, may lead the designer to reintroduce her collections in France.

Many of Koshino's designs have elements in common with those of her sisters, Junko and Michiko. Although the three (and their mother, Ayako, also a designer) have led entirely separate careers, in 2000 they held a joint collection, for the first time in 17 years, in their native city of Kishiwada. Hiroko Koshino's daughter Yuma is also studying design.

—Caroline Cox; updated by Karen Raugust

KOSHINO, Junko

Japanese designer

Born: Osaka, Japan, 1939. Education: Studied fashion design, Bunka Fashion College, Tokyo, to 1961. Family: Married Hiroyuki Suzuki; children: Yoriyuki. Career: Opened first boutique in Tokyo, 1966; opened Boutique Junko Koshino, Tokyo, 1970; showed first ready-to-wear collection, Paris, 1978; introduced couture collection, 1978; launched Mr. Junko menswear collection, 1980; introduced home furnishings line, 1988; opened boutiques in China, 1985 and 1987; opened Paris boutique, 1989; opened New York boutique, 1992; opened Singapore boutique, 1993; has also designed costumes for opera productions, uniforms for sports teams, and corporations; showed collection in Havana, Cuba, 1996; launched Opera Sauvage brand of office coordinates, 1997; launched Jeu de Junko line of wigs, 1998; held joint fashion shows with sisters, Michiko and Hiroko, late 1990s. Exhibitions: Three Sisters, Osaka, 1982; Metropolitan Museum of Art, New York, 1990; Junko Koshino Design Exhibition, National Museum of Chinese History, Beijing, 1992; Modes Gitanes, Carrousel du Louvre, Paris, 1994. Awards: Soen prize, Bunka College, Japan, 1960; Fashion Editors Club prize, Paris, 1978. Address: 6–5–36 Minami-Aoyama, Minato-Ku, Tokyo, Japan.

PUBLICATIONS

On KOSHINO:

Books

Tokyo Collection, Tokyo, 1986.

Modes Gitanes: Exposition de 50 Createurs, Paris, 1994.

Japanese family that spawned two other successful designers, Junko and Michiko, Koshino was brought up to respect the past and grew to love traditional Kabuki theatre. Her designs are based on the traditional clothing idiom of the Japanese kimono, following its aesthetics of volume and layering, an area of focus for other designers such as Kenzo Takada.

Koshino's clothes explore the tension between Western influences and Japanese values—a notion that still has currency, as a Western conception of fashion has only been in existence in Japan since 1945. The encroaching influence of the West has meant that many traditional Japanese aesthetic concepts have been explored and brought into the present by designers attempting to unite the modern with a strong sense of their own cultural continuity and concerns. Tradition and Westernized ideas of progress were historically separated in Japanese culture; for example, in the 19th century, modern Japanese painting (nihonga) and modern painting displaying a Western influence (yosa) were shown in different rooms—the dualism made physically apparent. Yet since the Meiji period (1868–1912), Japan's former cultural isolation vanished and there were concerted efforts to overcome the dichotomy of East and West to achieve what was hoped to be a more unified cultural pattern.

Koshino's attempts to overcome cultural duality can be deduced in her endeavors to remove the kimono from its 20th-century function as formal wear for weddings and other ceremonial occasions and to introduce more current ideas of fashion terminology into its traditional form—a concerted effort to reintroduce the kimono as a form of everyday dress. The tradition of the kimono in which Koshino intervenes is essentially a rectilinear two-dimensional one, which could be considered shapeless in comparison with Western female clothing that tends to fit the body and emphasize its shape. In traditional Japanese clothing, padding and quilting are used to create a space between the body and the wearer, a concept clearly seen in the contemporary ready-to-wear explorations of Rei Kawakubo's Comme des Garçons designs.

The patterns of the kimono follow equally strict rules, being derived from nature, yet nature is then stylized and made graphic. These traditions can be discerned in the work of Koshino, who employs bird or bamboo prints to counteract the uniformity of her garment's more modular construction. Koshino's overlarge tops, dresses, and trousers of silk, cotton, and linen look back to the traditions of the Japanese court in which styles became so exaggerated that enormous amounts of material were used to signify status. Copious amounts of fabric and many layered undergarments led to a stiffened style in which the body all but disappeared. Koshino retains this volume but by the use of natural fibers brings this traditional styling into the 20th century, though her clothing is more fitted to the demands of contemporary women. Her modular units are more voluminous and asymmetrical than tradition allows, and she is renowned for utilizing bright colors for decoration though within traditional Japanese color symbolism, bright colors are reserved for the young.

With the fashion media's focus on the more obviously radical side of Japanese fashion—Miyake, Yamamoto et al—Hiroko Koshino's more understated experimentation has been somewhat ignored. Her popularity among European women in particular testifies to the wearability of her designs. Koshino, who celebrated 40 years in the fashion business in 1997, continues to combine East and West, melding the futuristic with the classic (as seen in her 2001 autumn/winter collection, themed "Timeless Vintage.") Further, she balances the feminine and the masculine and uses contrasting fabrics from elegant furs to modern metallics. Her pragmatic view of fashion is reflected in her frequent acceptance of commissions for uniforms, such as for the Chosi City Girls School and the Kintetsu Buffalos baseball team.

Koshino's overall business, as of 1997, was estimated to generate $100 million a year. Clothes under her label, distributed through 200 stores in Japan, sold more in that country than products marketed under many other well-known global designer names. Although she has long had global recognition—Koshino was one of the first Japanese designers to show her collections in Rome and in Shanghai, for example—she spent the late 1990s focusing on her native Japanese market. She closed her Paris-based shop and discontinued showing Paris collections after more than a decade as a fixture there while continuing to show in Japan, not only in Tokyo but in other Japanese cities such as Osaka. In 2002, Koshino expects to launch a new perfume line, which, since it is being developed in Paris, may lead the designer to reintroduce her collections in France.

Many of Koshino's designs have elements in common with those of her sisters, Junko and Michiko. Although the three (and their mother, Ayako, also a designer) have led entirely separate careers, in 2000 they held a joint collection, for the first time in 17 years, in their native city of Kishiwada. Hiroko Koshino's daughter Yuma is also studying design.

—Caroline Cox; updated by Karen Raugust

KOSHINO, Junko

Japanese designer

Born: Osaka, Japan, 1939. Education: Studied fashion design, Bunka Fashion College, Tokyo, to 1961. Family: Married Hiroyuki Suzuki; children: Yoriyuki. Career: Opened first boutique in Tokyo, 1966; opened Boutique Junko Koshino, Tokyo, 1970; showed first ready-to-wear collection, Paris, 1978; introduced couture collection, 1978; launched Mr. Junko menswear collection, 1980; introduced home furnishings line, 1988; opened boutiques in China, 1985 and 1987; opened Paris boutique, 1989; opened New York boutique, 1992; opened Singapore boutique, 1993; has also designed costumes for opera productions, uniforms for sports teams, and corporations; showed collection in Havana, Cuba, 1996; launched Opera Sauvage brand of office coordinates, 1997; launched Jeu de Junko line of wigs, 1998; held joint fashion shows with sisters, Michiko and Hiroko, late 1990s. Exhibitions: Three Sisters, Osaka, 1982; Metropolitan Museum of Art, New York, 1990; Junko Koshino Design Exhibition, National Museum of Chinese History, Beijing, 1992; Modes Gitanes, Carrousel du Louvre, Paris, 1994. Awards: Soen prize, Bunka College, Japan, 1960; Fashion Editors Club prize, Paris, 1978. Address: 6–5–36 Minami-Aoyama, Minato-Ku, Tokyo, Japan.

PUBLICATIONS

On KOSHINO:

Books

Tokyo Collection, Tokyo, 1986.

Modes Gitanes: Exposition de 50 Createurs, Paris, 1994.

Articles

- Bernstein, Fred A., "Junko Koshino: Style that Translates," in Metropolitan Home, March 1990.
- Berman, Phyllis, "Not for Everyone," in Forbes, 15 October 1990.
- "'Art Futur' Designer Coming to Manila," in the Manila Bulletin, 12 January 1994.
- "Japan's Junko Koshino: Imagining the 21st Century," in Business World, 14 March 1994.
- Furukawa, Tsukasa, "Casual Friday's Getting Tokyo's Business," in DNR, 22 January 1996.
- White, Renee Minus, "Junko Koshino Offers Feminine Geometric Shapes," in the New York Amsterdam News, 6 April 2000.
- Niwata, Manabu, "Designer Family Fueled by Competition," in Mainichi Shimbun, 16 October 2000.

* * *

Sleek color-blocked sports uniforms, distinctive forward-looking corporate and exposition uniforms, costumes of opera fantasy and grandiloquence, and future-aimed clothing characterize the work of Junko Koshino. While producing a fashion and lifestyle line for men and women, Koshino's notable strength derives from her strong play between the individual and the group. Ironically—at least to a conventional view of fashion as self-expression—Koshino's best works are her uniforms, collective vestments, not the elective garments of individuals. Her sports samurai are elegant and reductive, almost a kind of refashioned nudity streamlined by fashion as a shell. In outfitting sports teams, she has excelled, noting the aerodynamics of sports and applying those principles to her technology-aware garments.

Koshino's sports uniforms realize Marinetti's visionary comparison toward "new beauty" in his 1909 Futurist Manifesto of the racing car and the Victory of Samothrace. But she has also sought the individual identity of futurism, a clothing inspired by the 20th-century dynamic of projecting oneself into an even more technologically intense outlook. Cocoons and spirals, concentric circles, ribbed construction, and materials from plastic to metal to cloth are typical of Koshino's exploring mind.

Graduating from the Bunka Fashion School in Tokyo in 1961, Koshino chose not to go abroad with Kenzo and Matsuda and other Japanese designers of her generation but to create design in Tokyo, where she opened her first boutique in 1966. Helmeted figures, sculptural forms, and biomorphic futurism suggest that Koshino is inspired in part by Cardin and the tradition of futurist design, though Koshino remains distinctive. Her uniforms for the 1990 Beijing Asian Games and Japanese 1992 Olympic volleyball team have a Flash Gordon futurism about them, but they are also serviceable, sport-specific outfits creating a flag and semaphore-like reading on the competitive field. Corporate uniforms for many clients include Asahi Brewing, Mitsubishi Chemical, and Seibu Department Stores. A paradox of humanity's future expectation is that often we dream of—or, conversely, fear—the role of the collective in the future; Koshino gives garb to that vision: her work fosters an easy and elegant collective character, one of utopia.

Individual pieces are likewise utopian in vision. "Taikyoku" is the guiding philosophy of the work, signifying contrast and balance or harmony. Mystically and philosophically, the circle is most important to Koshino, who sees the form as complete and eternal, both ancient and futuristic. This symbolic approach to form animates not only

Koshino's view of apparel but the outreach of her work to lifestyle and environmental design. As a designer, she has convened an Art-Futur Committee of various artists, designers, and thinkers, but she has also gone back into history to provide costumes for Mozart's Magic Flute and has shown her work in the Museum of History in Beijing. Moreover, Koshino has played a major role, in the late 1980s and 1990s, in introducing fashion ideas to China.

Each of her foreign headquarters is designated a gallery, and Koshino insists upon the identity of these establishments as more than mere boutiques or retail establishments. Koshino challenges almost every preconception about fashion from the materials available for clothing to the way in which clothing serves the commonwealth and the individual. Philosophically (and she requires such thought), she is cognizant of the past but straining with futurist and utopian vision. She brings fashion into fuller and more fulfilled discourse with the other arts of design. It is the area of attainment that gives Koshino a distinctive and enduring place in the history of design.

Koshino continues to design functional garments featuring geometric, sometimes asymmetrical shapes, bright and contrasting hues, varied lengths, and fabrics that range from alpaca to materials incorporating gold powder. She emphasizes the natural and places a focus on the feminine, yet she is not adverse to trying something new, such as creating clothes from metals, as she did in her winter 2000 collection.

Although she is best known in Asia, her reputation has expanded worldwide. In 1996 Koshino showed her collection in Havana, Cuba, and in the same year, she launched a line called Junko Koshino Homme in Korea. The following year, 1997, she launched a line of office-appropriate coordinates under the Opera Sauvage brand, marketed in conjunction with two Japanese trading companies, Mitsukoshi and Daimaru. In 1998, she introduced a line of wigs called Jeu de Junko in Paris, where she had long participated in the Paris Collections. In Japan and throughout Asia, where Koshino's name attracts nearly universal recognition, her garments range from kimonos and yukatas to casualwear for the workplace. Her designer fragrance label is also strong throughout Asia.

Koshino has stressed functionality, an attribute that is nowhere more in evidence than in the many uniforms she has designed. Recent projects range from outfits worn by vegetable growers at a grocers' conventions to garments for sumo wrestlers and J-League soccer uniforms for the team Kawasaki Verdy. One of Kawasaki Verdy's leading team members has appeared in advertising for Koshino's Mr. Junko line of men's apparel.

Koshino holds periodic joint fashion shows in Japan with her two designing sisters, Michiko and Hiroko, especially in their home town of Kishiwada. Aside from her design work, Junko Koshino has kept busy lecturing, serving on various governmental and municipal committees in Japan, and appearing on television shows and in commercials.

—Richard Martin; updated by Karen Raugust

KOSHINO, Michiko

Japanese designer working in London

Born: Osaka, Japan, 1950. Education: Graduated from Bunka Fashion College, Tokyo, 1974. Career: Showed first collection,

Articles

- Bernstein, Fred A., "Junko Koshino: Style that Translates," in Metropolitan Home, March 1990.
- Berman, Phyllis, "Not for Everyone," in Forbes, 15 October 1990.
- "'Art Futur' Designer Coming to Manila," in the Manila Bulletin, 12 January 1994.
- "Japan's Junko Koshino: Imagining the 21st Century," in Business World, 14 March 1994.
- Furukawa, Tsukasa, "Casual Friday's Getting Tokyo's Business," in DNR, 22 January 1996.
- White, Renee Minus, "Junko Koshino Offers Feminine Geometric Shapes," in the New York Amsterdam News, 6 April 2000.
- Niwata, Manabu, "Designer Family Fueled by Competition," in Mainichi Shimbun, 16 October 2000.

* * *

Sleek color-blocked sports uniforms, distinctive forward-looking corporate and exposition uniforms, costumes of opera fantasy and grandiloquence, and future-aimed clothing characterize the work of Junko Koshino. While producing a fashion and lifestyle line for men and women, Koshino's notable strength derives from her strong play between the individual and the group. Ironically—at least to a conventional view of fashion as self-expression—Koshino's best works are her uniforms, collective vestments, not the elective garments of individuals. Her sports samurai are elegant and reductive, almost a kind of refashioned nudity streamlined by fashion as a shell. In outfitting sports teams, she has excelled, noting the aerodynamics of sports and applying those principles to her technology-aware garments.

Koshino's sports uniforms realize Marinetti's visionary comparison toward "new beauty" in his 1909 Futurist Manifesto of the racing car and the Victory of Samothrace. But she has also sought the individual identity of futurism, a clothing inspired by the 20th-century dynamic of projecting oneself into an even more technologically intense outlook. Cocoons and spirals, concentric circles, ribbed construction, and materials from plastic to metal to cloth are typical of Koshino's exploring mind.

Graduating from the Bunka Fashion School in Tokyo in 1961, Koshino chose not to go abroad with Kenzo and Matsuda and other Japanese designers of her generation but to create design in Tokyo, where she opened her first boutique in 1966. Helmeted figures, sculptural forms, and biomorphic futurism suggest that Koshino is inspired in part by Cardin and the tradition of futurist design, though Koshino remains distinctive. Her uniforms for the 1990 Beijing Asian Games and Japanese 1992 Olympic volleyball team have a Flash Gordon futurism about them, but they are also serviceable, sport-specific outfits creating a flag and semaphore-like reading on the competitive field. Corporate uniforms for many clients include Asahi Brewing, Mitsubishi Chemical, and Seibu Department Stores. A paradox of humanity's future expectation is that often we dream of—or, conversely, fear—the role of the collective in the future; Koshino gives garb to that vision: her work fosters an easy and elegant collective character, one of utopia.

Individual pieces are likewise utopian in vision. "Taikyoku" is the guiding philosophy of the work, signifying contrast and balance or harmony. Mystically and philosophically, the circle is most important to Koshino, who sees the form as complete and eternal, both ancient and futuristic. This symbolic approach to form animates not only

Koshino's view of apparel but the outreach of her work to lifestyle and environmental design. As a designer, she has convened an Art-Futur Committee of various artists, designers, and thinkers, but she has also gone back into history to provide costumes for Mozart's Magic Flute and has shown her work in the Museum of History in Beijing. Moreover, Koshino has played a major role, in the late 1980s and 1990s, in introducing fashion ideas to China.

Each of her foreign headquarters is designated a gallery, and Koshino insists upon the identity of these establishments as more than mere boutiques or retail establishments. Koshino challenges almost every preconception about fashion from the materials available for clothing to the way in which clothing serves the commonwealth and the individual. Philosophically (and she requires such thought), she is cognizant of the past but straining with futurist and utopian vision. She brings fashion into fuller and more fulfilled discourse with the other arts of design. It is the area of attainment that gives Koshino a distinctive and enduring place in the history of design.

Koshino continues to design functional garments featuring geometric, sometimes asymmetrical shapes, bright and contrasting hues, varied lengths, and fabrics that range from alpaca to materials incorporating gold powder. She emphasizes the natural and places a focus on the feminine, yet she is not adverse to trying something new, such as creating clothes from metals, as she did in her winter 2000 collection.

Although she is best known in Asia, her reputation has expanded worldwide. In 1996 Koshino showed her collection in Havana, Cuba, and in the same year, she launched a line called Junko Koshino Homme in Korea. The following year, 1997, she launched a line of office-appropriate coordinates under the Opera Sauvage brand, marketed in conjunction with two Japanese trading companies, Mitsukoshi and Daimaru. In 1998, she introduced a line of wigs called Jeu de Junko in Paris, where she had long participated in the Paris Collections. In Japan and throughout Asia, where Koshino's name attracts nearly universal recognition, her garments range from kimonos and yukatas to casualwear for the workplace. Her designer fragrance label is also strong throughout Asia.

Koshino has stressed functionality, an attribute that is nowhere more in evidence than in the many uniforms she has designed. Recent projects range from outfits worn by vegetable growers at a grocers' conventions to garments for sumo wrestlers and J-League soccer uniforms for the team Kawasaki Verdy. One of Kawasaki Verdy's leading team members has appeared in advertising for Koshino's Mr. Junko line of men's apparel.

Koshino holds periodic joint fashion shows in Japan with her two designing sisters, Michiko and Hiroko, especially in their home town of Kishiwada. Aside from her design work, Junko Koshino has kept busy lecturing, serving on various governmental and municipal committees in Japan, and appearing on television shows and in commercials.

—Richard Martin; updated by Karen Raugust

KOSHINO, Michiko

Japanese designer working in London

Born: Osaka, Japan, 1950. Education: Graduated from Bunka Fashion College, Tokyo, 1974. Career: Showed first collection,

Michiko Koshino, spring/summer 2000 collection. © AFP/CORBIS.

London, 1976; opened flagship store in Neal Street, London, closed 1994; introduced knitwear, luggage, denim, children's clothes lines; signed licensing deal with Mitsubishi Rayon for line of casual apparel, 1997; created costumes for "The Art of Barbie" exhibit, part of the doll's 40th anniversary celebration, 1999; signed licensing deal with Chiyoda Bussan for footwear, 2001. Exhibitions: Three Sisters, Osaka, 1982. Address: 2E MacFarlane Road, Shepherd's Bush, London W12 7JZ, England.

PUBLICATIONS

On KOSHINO:

Articles

- Hatfield, Julie, "The Bottom Line," in the Boston Globe, 14 May 1990.
- "Take Five Designers," in Clothes Show (London), February 1991.
- "New Textile Brand—Strategy," Mitsubishi Rayon press release, 10 February 1997.
- Niwata, Manabu, "Designer Family Fueled by Competition," in Mainichi Shimbun, 16 October 2000.
- "Michiko Koshino," available online at www.widemedia.com, London Fashion Week Fall/Winter 2000 coverage.

"Chiyoka Bussan Enters into Exclusive Manufacture and Sale Contract for Michiko London Koshino Shoes," Chiyoda Bussan press release, 18 January 2001.

"Michiko Koshino," online at www.widemedia.com, London Fashion Week Spring/Summer 2001 coverage.

Davis, Boyd, "Michiko Koshino's YWCA," available online at www.FashionWindows.com, London Fashion Week Fall 2001 coverage.

* * *

Michiko Koshino has come into her own since a switch in gear in the fashion world that began in the late 1980s. As sportswear became the major imperative of design, Koshino was one of the most successful in responding to customers' new needs, producing tightly thought-out collections that bridged the gap between sportswear and clubwear to appeal to a young streetwise consumer. Indeed, it seems to have been her aim to create a series of uniforms for the various London clubs with which she linked her name, and the logos she emblazoned them with had the same kind of recognizable impact as the established sports companies that were also increasingly popular.

Although Japanese by birth, Koshino eschews the more philosophical approach to fashion favored by her often more prominent counterparts, seeming to lean toward the quirkier modern side of the Japanese national character rather than its solemn traditions of harmony and balance. It was this that led Koshino to produce the infamous and much-copied inflatable rain jacket in the mid-1980s. This was itself based on the thickly quilted B-boy "goose" jackets so popular with clubbers at the time and clearly showed her ability to combine elements of both fun and functionalism.

In the 1990s, however, Koshino showed her design abilities could go much further than the witty garment for which she was most widely known. She consistently showed how closely attuned she was to the shifting sands of London's extensive club scene. Her past collections have responded to the growing wish for clothes reflecting a certain aspect of this scene, making the wearer an instant initiate. They give a kind of streetwise credibility that has as much to do with the tribalism of London's nightlife as with fashion itself. The need to feel and look good is enhanced by Koshino's use of stretch fabrics, comfortable to move in as well as being sexy, clingy but not restrictive.

Although she has embraced London culture as her own, she has not limited the appeal of her clothes. The very English Pukka Clobba tag she borrowed from the rave scene merely gave her designs a kind of brand-name authenticity that sells, albeit quietly, across the world and has enabled her to diversify. She produces funky accessories to complement each collection, from the sequin disco ball earrings to the ubiquitous ski hats so popular with ravers in the winter. There are also Koshino bags, umbrellas, shoes, and towels, all spreading her name by their very presence and adding to the brand-name feel of her very contemporary styles.

Koshino's collections also offer a selection of different types of clothes, to provide a whole wardrobe for her customers. Her flagship store in Covent Garden, London, with its DJ mixing tables providing a direct link with the clubs, always shows her full range, spanning the biker-inspired Motor King collection, its title often emblazoned on the stark contrast leathers, the designer name t-shirts and sweatshirts popular with tourists, the sharp, brightly colored suits, and the sexier, more overtly clubby Lycra, viscose, and leather of the Michiko London range.

Koshino's greatest talent is undoubtedly her ability to absorb changing emphasis in fashion and respond with sexy sports-based clothing targeted at the waiting customers of the club scene through marketing ploys like fashion shows in clubs and promotional wear for companies like Vidal Sassoon. Using her clever eye for striking designs and sexy styles, coupled with the kind of marketing skills that are anathema to many more traditional designers, she has developed an instantly recognizable style and loyal customer base among the often fickle younger fashion customer. And although Koshino has been described as "ultra-hip" and "cutting edge," she often incorporates classic fabrics such as tweed and denim (the latter a favorite) into her jackets, quilted coats, bags, and other items. At the same time, she does not ignore futuristic, high-tech fabrics such as silver reflectives. Her designs integrate her Eastern past with her Western surroundings, as she creates clothing that is oriental-inspired but with a sense of individualism associated more with the West.

Despite her long-time sojourn in London, she is a well-known name throughout Asia, both for her apparel and associated products such as cosmetics, sunglasses, watches, and underwear. Additionally, she claims to be the first designer to market condoms under her own brand name. Some of Koshino's licensees for her main brand umbrella, Michiko London, include Sudo for wool and acrylic scarves, Ta Feng for umbrellas, Shin Myung Mool San for lighters, Chiyoda Bussan for footwear, Mandom for cosmetics, Gunze for tights, and Mitsubishi Rayon for casual apparel.

Koshino's Motor King line of clothes were favored by participants in the London club scene of the early 1990s and are now collectors' items. In the 21st century she has a following among British and American musicians from David Bowie to Moby and is featured in not only fashion publications such as Vogue but in music and graphic design periodicals such as Face, Mixmag, Scene and i-D. In 1999 Koshino was one of the designers chosen to clothe the 40-year-old toy icon Barbie for the traveling exhibit "The Art of Barbie,"—she dressed the doll in one of her trademark puffa coats. She also created an environmentally friendly scooter for the Honda company in the late 1990s.

Koshino's focus in the 2000s has been on three lines: Main Collection, Yen Jeans, and her 100's line. For winter 2000/2001, she took her inspiration from the 1960s (Main Collection), Japanese workwear (100's), and Sumo culture (Yen Jeans); she was influenced by the 1970s' club scene in her fall 2001 men's line. Like much of her work, this collection appealed to both clubbers and aficionados of fashion.

—Rebecca Arnold; updated by Karen Raugust

KOUYATÉ, Lamine

Malian fashion designer working in Paris

Born: Bamako, Mali, circa 1963, son of a diplomat and a doctor; moved to Paris around 1986. Education: Studied architecture, Architecture School of Strasbourg, France, and at La Villette, Paris. Career: Designs under XULY.Bët label, based in Kouyaté's Funkin' Fashion Factory, Paris; became known for recycled, patched-together clothing; first New York runway show, 1997; opened store on New York's Orchard Street, 1997; changed New York store name to Fragile, 1999. Address: 8 Rouget-de-l'Isle, 93500 Pantin, Paris, France.

PUBLICATIONS

On KOUYATÉ:

Articles

- Spindler, Amy M., "Prince of Pieces," in the New York Times, 2 May 1993.
 Donovan, Carrie, "Paris Report," in the New York Times Magazine, 9 May 1993.
 Hume, Marion, "Coming Unstitched, or Just a Stitch-up?," in the Independent (London), 30 September 1993.
 Martin, Richard, "A Sweater as Quasi-Surreal Composition," in the Independent (London), 30 September 1993.
 Talley, Andre Leon, "Piecing It Together," in Vogue, October 1993.
 "The Last Word," in WWD, 14 March 1994.
 Jacobs, Patricia, "XÜLY Bet," in Essence, May 1994.
 White, Constance, "Two European Lines Take on America," in the New York Times, 21 October 1997.
 ———, "Inspiration from the Compelling Land of the Visionaries," in the New York Times, 6 November 1997.
 Greene, Walter, "Sexy Spring Fashions," in Black Elegance, April 1998.
 White, Renee Minus, "A Fashionable Bet From Paris to New York," in New York Amsterdam News, 15 April 1999.
 Colman, David, "After Pushcarts Comes a Catwalk," in the New York Times, 23 May 1999.
 Barnett, Amy Du Bois, "Portfolio: Bet on It," in Essence, August 1999.

* * *

In a Paris collections report under the rubric "The Last Word," Women's Wear Daily (14 March 1994) recounted: "Deadly heat, a grating live band and groupies lounging on the floor.... But it wasn't a Grateful Dead concert—just XULY.Bët's défilé at La Samaritaine department store." Lamine Kouyaté, designing for his label XULY.Bët, has all the characteristics of an avant-garde and disestablishment fashion, but one that at least assumes a fashion system and even shows good likelihood of becoming a positive and lasting element of the fashion system.

Recycling, collage, rags to riches economics, exposed seams and construction, a profoundly African sensibility, and artistic temperament all seem at odds with establishment fashion but have, in fact, brought XULY.Bët to the mainstream and major recognition. Praised as a fashion postmodernist and deconstructivist, Kouyaté's fashion coincides only with the intellectual postulation; his design creativity is more intuitive and personal, founded in his childhood in Mali, Africa, and the necessarily pastiched view of the world he perceived in a former French colony. The 1993 XULY.Bët collection was based on torn, dismembered, and reassembled surplus and flea market clothing, each a one-of-a-kind invention from the "given" of a distressed or discarded fashion object. Kouyaté's urban picturesque includes cropped jackets, bold African prints, graphics, and graffiti lacerated and reassembled, and long dresses that defy their own length in haphazard apertures, visible seaming, and a charming sense of coming apart. Kouyaté's dilapidated dresses and clothes are a romantic, enchanted vision.

As Kouyaté told Amy Spindler of the New York Times in May 1993, "At home, all the products come from foreign places. They're imported from everywhere, made for a different world, with another Koshino's greatest talent is undoubtedly her ability to absorb changing emphasis in fashion and respond with sexy sports-based clothing targeted at the waiting customers of the club scene through marketing ploys like fashion shows in clubs and promotional wear for companies like Vidal Sassoon. Using her clever eye for striking designs and sexy styles, coupled with the kind of marketing skills that are anathema to many more traditional designers, she has developed an instantly recognizable style and loyal customer base among the often fickle younger fashion customer. And although Koshino has been described as "ultra-hip" and "cutting edge," she often incorporates classic fabrics such as tweed and denim (the latter a favorite) into her jackets, quilted coats, bags, and other items. At the same time, she does not ignore futuristic, high-tech fabrics such as silver reflectives. Her designs integrate her Eastern past with her Western surroundings, as she creates clothing that is oriental-inspired but with a sense of individualism associated more with the West.

Despite her long-time sojourn in London, she is a well-known name throughout Asia, both for her apparel and associated products such as cosmetics, sunglasses, watches, and underwear. Additionally, she claims to be the first designer to market condoms under her own brand name. Some of Koshino's licensees for her main brand umbrella, Michiko London, include Sudo for wool and acrylic scarves, Ta Feng for umbrellas, Shin Myung Mool San for lighters, Chiyoda Bussan for footwear, Mandom for cosmetics, Gunze for tights, and Mitsubishi Rayon for casual apparel.

Koshino's Motor King line of clothes were favored by participants in the London club scene of the early 1990s and are now collectors' items. In the 21st century she has a following among British and American musicians from David Bowie to Moby and is featured in not only fashion publications such as Vogue but in music and graphic design periodicals such as Face, Mixmag, Scene and i-D. In 1999 Koshino was one of the designers chosen to clothe the 40-year-old toy icon Barbie for the traveling exhibit "The Art of Barbie,"—she dressed the doll in one of her trademark puffa coats. She also created an environmentally friendly scooter for the Honda company in the late 1990s.

Koshino's focus in the 2000s has been on three lines: Main Collection, Yen Jeans, and her 100's line. For winter 2000/2001, she took her inspiration from the 1960s (Main Collection), Japanese workwear (100's), and Sumo culture (Yen Jeans); she was influenced by the 1970s' club scene in her fall 2001 men's line. Like much of her work, this collection appealed to both clubbers and aficionados of fashion.

—Rebecca Arnold; updated by Karen Raugust

KOUYATÉ, Lamine

Malian fashion designer working in Paris

Born: Bamako, Mali, circa 1963, son of a diplomat and a doctor; moved to Paris around 1986. Education: Studied architecture, Architecture School of Strasbourg, France, and at La Villette, Paris. Career: Designs under XULY.Bët label, based in Kouyaté's Funkin' Fashion Factory, Paris; became known for recycled, patched-together clothing; first New York runway show, 1997; opened store on New York's Orchard Street, 1997; changed New York store name to Fragile, 1999. Address: 8 Rouget-de-l'Isle, 93500 Pantin, Paris, France.

PUBLICATIONS

On KOUYATÉ:

Articles

- Spindler, Amy M., "Prince of Pieces," in the New York Times, 2 May 1993.
 Donovan, Carrie, "Paris Report," in the New York Times Magazine, 9 May 1993.
 Hume, Marion, "Coming Unstitched, or Just a Stitch-up?," in the Independent (London), 30 September 1993.
 Martin, Richard, "A Sweater as Quasi-Surreal Composition," in the Independent (London), 30 September 1993.
 Talley, Andre Leon, "Piecing It Together," in Vogue, October 1993.
 "The Last Word," in WWD, 14 March 1994.
 Jacobs, Patricia, "XÜLY Bet," in Essence, May 1994.
 White, Constance, "Two European Lines Take on America," in the New York Times, 21 October 1997.
 ———, "Inspiration from the Compelling Land of the Visionaries," in the New York Times, 6 November 1997.
 Greene, Walter, "Sexy Spring Fashions," in Black Elegance, April 1998.
 White, Renee Minus, "A Fashionable Bet From Paris to New York," in New York Amsterdam News, 15 April 1999.
 Colman, David, "After Pushcarts Comes a Catwalk," in the New York Times, 23 May 1999.
 Barnett, Amy Du Bois, "Portfolio: Bet on It," in Essence, August 1999.

* * *

In a Paris collections report under the rubric "The Last Word," Women's Wear Daily (14 March 1994) recounted: "Deadly heat, a grating live band and groupies lounging on the floor.... But it wasn't a Grateful Dead concert—just XULY.Bët's défilé at La Samaritaine department store." Lamine Kouyaté, designing for his label XULY.Bët, has all the characteristics of an avant-garde and disestablishment fashion, but one that at least assumes a fashion system and even shows good likelihood of becoming a positive and lasting element of the fashion system.

Recycling, collage, rags to riches economics, exposed seams and construction, a profoundly African sensibility, and artistic temperament all seem at odds with establishment fashion but have, in fact, brought XULY.Bët to the mainstream and major recognition. Praised as a fashion postmodernist and deconstructivist, Kouyaté's fashion coincides only with the intellectual postulation; his design creativity is more intuitive and personal, founded in his childhood in Mali, Africa, and the necessarily pastiched view of the world he perceived in a former French colony. The 1993 XULY.Bët collection was based on torn, dismembered, and reassembled surplus and flea market clothing, each a one-of-a-kind invention from the "given" of a distressed or discarded fashion object. Kouyaté's urban picturesque includes cropped jackets, bold African prints, graphics, and graffiti lacerated and reassembled, and long dresses that defy their own length in haphazard apertures, visible seaming, and a charming sense of coming apart. Kouyaté's dilapidated dresses and clothes are a romantic, enchanted vision.

As Kouyaté told Amy Spindler of the New York Times in May 1993, "At home, all the products come from foreign places. They're imported from everywhere, made for a different world, with another culture in mind. A sweater arrives in one of the hottest moments of the year. So you cut the sleeves off it to make it cooler. Or a woman will get a magazine with a Chanel suit in it, and she'll ask a tailor to make it out of African fabric. It completely redirects the look." Adaptation and alteration are paramount in XULY.Bët's work, beginning with the patchwork of distressed, repaired, and patched garments of 1993 and his 1994 compounds of cultures and fabrics.

Like the Futurist demand that sculpture relinquish its pedestal, material unity, and high-art status, Kouyaté's fashion demands that high fashion come to the streets and flea markets to renew itself. It is, of course, a demolition for the purpose of rejuvenation, but an extreme of ruin that some find difficult to accept. Yet few could deny the beauty of Kouyaté's vision: sensuous patching, often skin tight, gives dresses a sense of tattoo or body decoration more than of party dressing. His 1993 show sent African models out in Caucasian-colored "skin-tone" Band-Aids to reinforce the impression of scarification and the necessary politics of adornment.

If Kouyaté's œuvre shares principles with Martin Margiela's pensive and poetic deconstruction in fashion and both owe some debt to Rei Kawakubo's pioneering deconstructions of the early 1980s and again in the late 1980s, Kouyaté's African roots and sensibility set him apart, mingling rich pattern mix with the concept of collage. Kouyaté requires different eyes—the XULY.Bët name means the equivalent of "keep your eyes open," as with alertness and wonderment—and a Western willingness to accept an African aesthetic.

The reluctance to fully accept Kouyaté's innovative work resides less in its épater les bourgeois scorn for tradition and deliberate inversion of the economic order, for both of these are standard gambits of fashion novelty. The greater difficulty is probably in seeing improvised and aesthetically coarse (in Western terms and fashion's propensity to refinement) creation of fashion. But what Kouyaté proves is that the colonial disadvantage he might supposedly have begun with is an opportunity and offers its own aesthetic. The lesson to old imperialisms is obvious, and fashion must know better than to be one of the ruined empires. A few tatters, some exposed junctures, and disheveled first impressions may be tonic and certainly far more interesting than an inflexible and rarefied status for fashion. Like Jean-Michel Basquiat's brilliant and lasting impact on American art, Kouyaté is showing the "real thing" of an African taste rendered in his own meeting with Western terms, not merely rich peasants or tourist views of a Third-World pageantry. Kouyaté's aesthetic is irrefutably an eye-opener for fashion.

Kouyaté and XULY.Bët have made as much of an impression in the U.S. since their first New York runway show in 1997 as they did on their introduction to the Parisian fashion community in 1992. American fashion critics, musicians from INXS to Neneh Cherry, and more important, the youthful public, have embraced Kouyaté's multiethnic, flea market-driven style.

Kouyaté has continued to rely on bargain basement-found pieces as the basis for his designs, transforming them into colorful, fashionable items that have been described as sensual and glamorous, despite their origin as thrift shop underwear or crocheted blankets. His architecturally-driven visible seams, along with his large, outer labels, have become trademarks of his otherwise diverse work. As Constance White pointed out in the New York Times in November 1997, his skill and conviction—and his lack of reliance on fashion trends—are what make his work stand out.

Kouyaté's choice of New York's Orchard Street rather than SoHo for his first U.S. store, called XULY.Bët Funkin' Fashion, fit perfectly with his street-based sensibility. The store hosted graffiti contests and featured a changing roster of guest designers in addition to the XULY.Bët label. In 1999 the store, run by Damien Serrazin, changed its name to Fragile; it began featuring XULY.Bët as its lead line, along with other designers such as Punk Empire and Dexter Wong. It remains an off-the-beaten-track magnet for multicultural youth, always influenced by the active street culture surrounding it.

For the future, Kouyaté told Essence magazine in August 1999 that he hopes to expand into more department stores and shops—he has had success in Europe in retail chains such as Galeries Lafayette—as well as into other products such as footwear, accessories, and even housewares. Yet Kouyaté's primary focus will remain on what Women's Wear Daily called his "lively, mismatched patterned clothes" (1 April 1998), which appeal to both devotees of fashion and the street-smart customers who inspire him.

—Richard Martin; updated by Karen Raugust

KRIZIA

See MANDELLI, Mariuccia

LACHASSE

British fashion house

Founded: by Fred Singleton as couture sportswear branch of Gray, Paulette and Singleton, 1928; company incorporated as Lachasse Ltd., 1946. Company History: Chief designers include Digby Morton, 1928–33, Hardy Amies, 1934–39, Michael Donellan, 1941–52; Peter Lewis-Crown (born, 1930) joined Lachasse as apprentice, 1948; became director, 1964; later became designer and sole owner; Lachasse has also produced clothes for theatre, film and television productions. Collections: Victoria & Albert Museum, London; Costume Gallery, Castle Howard, York; Costume Museum, Bath, England. Company Address: 29 Thurloe Place, London SW7 2HQ, England.

PUBLICATIONS

On LACHASSE:

Books

Ewing, Elizabeth, History of 20th Century Fashion, London, 1974. McDowell, Colin, McDowell's Directory of 20th Century Fashion, London, 1984.

* * *

Lachasse Ltd. was often referred to as London's tailoring stable and it saw a succession of British designers who completed their training there after Digby Morton established the couture house in 1928. The house of Lachasse was renowned primarily for its tailored suits which, in the tradition of British tailoring, were said to mature like vintage wine. Lachasse was representative of the distinctive type of British tailoring that evolved from the masculine style as opposed to the softer dressmaker tailoring employed in Paris.

The early success of Lachasse owed much to the popularity of sportswear during the 1920s, as advocated by Coco Chanel who also promoted the use of British wools and tweeds for these clothes. Certain other factors played a significant role in establishing Lachasse—Digby Morton presented his first collection there in 1929, the year of the Wall Street Crash, which saw a dramatic fall in the number of American buyers at the Paris couture houses. Many overseas buyers turned to London, attracted by the new generation of couturiers and the lower prices.

According to Peter Lewis-Crown, who joined Lachasse in 1949 and became the couture house's owner, its three main designers, all of whom left their mark, were Digby Morton, who popularized Donegal tweed for womenswear; Hardy Amies, who gave the tailored suit a geometrical approach by using the fabric selvedge around the body instead of downwards, and Michael Donellan, who made the tailored suit an acceptable mode of dress from morning through to evening.

Hardy Amies joined the house of Lachasse after Morton's departure in 1934, learning about the construction of tailored suits by examining copies of Morton's models. Michael Donellan followed Amies to Lachasse where he trained until he established his own house in 1953. Originally a milliner, Donellan was the only designer to have his name on the label, which read "Michael at Lachasse." The Irish-born designer was also likened to Balenciaga because of his strong, uncompromising signature. In the postwar period Lachasse enjoyed a sizeable export trade, particularly with America. The firm used to send a doll called Virginia around the world, dressed in the latest clothing by Lachasse, and took orders for her couture outfits. As a member of the Incorporated Society of London Fashion Designers (ISLFD), the house also partook in the export and publicity ventures organized by the ISLFD.

Lachasse was exclusively a couture house until 1981 when Peter Lewis-Crown opened a mini-boutique on the premises. He was also responsible for introducing more dresses and feminine clothes to the house, once famed principally for its tailored suits. Former attempts to introduce eveningwear had been unsuccessful. Hardy Amies describes Lachasse's La Soirée department as "un-epoch-making" and it was closed down, with many of the evening gowns unsold. While Lachasse can make no claims to breaking any fashion barriers, it is one of the longest-surviving couture houses and continues to attract an international clientèle to its Kensington premises.

—Catherine Woram

LACOSTE SPORTSWEAR

French sportswear company

Founded: in Paris, 1933, by René Lacoste (1904–96); son Bernard Lacoste (born 1931), chairman/managing director since 1963. Company History: Manufactures tennis, golf, and leisure clothing, technical products for tennis and golf; launched first Lacoste shirts, 1933; sent first exports to Italy and addition of color range to shirts, 1951; first exports to U.S., 1952; established first collection for children, 1959; René Lacoste invented first steel racket, 1963; first exports to Japan, 1964; licensed deal with Patou for Lacoste Eau de Toilette, 1968; licensed L'Amy S.A. for Lacoste sunglasses and frames, 1981; opened first Lacoste boutique, Paris, 1981; launched new line of men's toiletries with Patou, 1984; developed Lacoste tennis shoes, 1985; developed Land and Eau de Sport fragrances, with Patou license, 1991 and 1994, respectively; opened Lacoste boutiques in New Delhi, Madras, and Bombay, 1993; opened Lacoste corners at Saks and Barney's in New York, Neiman Marcus in Dallas, 1994;

LACHASSE

British fashion house

Founded: by Fred Singleton as couture sportswear branch of Gray, Paulette and Singleton, 1928; company incorporated as Lachasse Ltd., 1946. Company History: Chief designers include Digby Morton, 1928–33, Hardy Amies, 1934–39, Michael Donellan, 1941–52; Peter Lewis-Crown (born, 1930) joined Lachasse as apprentice, 1948; became director, 1964; later became designer and sole owner; Lachasse has also produced clothes for theatre, film and television productions. Collections: Victoria & Albert Museum, London; Costume Gallery, Castle Howard, York; Costume Museum, Bath, England. Company Address: 29 Thurloe Place, London SW7 2HQ, England.

PUBLICATIONS

On LACHASSE:

Books

Ewing, Elizabeth, History of 20th Century Fashion, London, 1974.
McDowell, Colin, McDowell's Directory of 20th Century Fashion, London, 1984.

* * *

Lachasse Ltd. was often referred to as London's tailoring stable and it saw a succession of British designers who completed their training there after Digby Morton established the couture house in 1928. The house of Lachasse was renowned primarily for its tailored suits which, in the tradition of British tailoring, were said to mature like vintage wine. Lachasse was representative of the distinctive type of British tailoring that evolved from the masculine style as opposed to the softer dressmaker tailoring employed in Paris.

The early success of Lachasse owed much to the popularity of sportswear during the 1920s, as advocated by Coco Chanel who also promoted the use of British wools and tweeds for these clothes. Certain other factors played a significant role in establishing Lachasse—Digby Morton presented his first collection there in 1929, the year of the Wall Street Crash, which saw a dramatic fall in the number of American buyers at the Paris couture houses. Many overseas buyers turned to London, attracted by the new generation of couturiers and the lower prices.

According to Peter Lewis-Crown, who joined Lachasse in 1949 and became the couture house's owner, its three main designers, all of whom left their mark, were Digby Morton, who popularized Donegal tweed for womenswear; Hardy Amies, who gave the tailored suit a geometrical approach by using the fabric selvedge around the body instead of downwards, and Michael Donellan, who made the tailored suit an acceptable mode of dress from morning through to evening.

Hardy Amies joined the house of Lachasse after Morton's departure in 1934, learning about the construction of tailored suits by examining copies of Morton's models. Michael Donellan followed Amies to Lachasse where he trained until he established his own house in 1953. Originally a milliner, Donellan was the only designer to have his name on the label, which read "Michael at Lachasse." The Irish-born designer was also likened to Balenciaga because of his strong, uncompromising signature. In the postwar period Lachasse enjoyed a sizeable export trade, particularly with America. The firm used to send a doll called Virginia around the world, dressed in the latest clothing by Lachasse, and took orders for her couture outfits. As a member of the Incorporated Society of London Fashion Designers (ISLFD), the house also partook in the export and publicity ventures organized by the ISLFD.

Lachasse was exclusively a couture house until 1981 when Peter Lewis-Crown opened a mini-boutique on the premises. He was also responsible for introducing more dresses and feminine clothes to the house, once famed principally for its tailored suits. Former attempts to introduce eveningwear had been unsuccessful. Hardy Amies describes Lachasse's La Soirée department as "un-epoch-making" and it was closed down, with many of the evening gowns unsold. While Lachasse can make no claims to breaking any fashion barriers, it is one of the longest-surviving couture houses and continues to attract an international clientèle to its Kensington premises.

—Catherine Woram

LACOSTE SPORTSWEAR

French sportswear company

Founded: in Paris, 1933, by René Lacoste (1904–96); son Bernard Lacoste (born 1931), chairman/managing director since 1963. Company History: Manufactures tennis, golf, and leisure clothing, technical products for tennis and golf; launched first Lacoste shirts, 1933; sent first exports to Italy and addition of color range to shirts, 1951; first exports to U.S., 1952; established first collection for children, 1959; René Lacoste invented first steel racket, 1963; first exports to Japan, 1964; licensed deal with Patou for Lacoste Eau de Toilette, 1968; licensed L'Amy S.A. for Lacoste sunglasses and frames, 1981; opened first Lacoste boutique, Paris, 1981; launched new line of men's toiletries with Patou, 1984; developed Lacoste tennis shoes, 1985; developed Land and Eau de Sport fragrances, with Patou license, 1991 and 1994, respectively; opened Lacoste boutiques in New Delhi, Madras, and Bombay, 1993; opened Lacoste corners at Saks and Barney's in New York, Neiman Marcus in Dallas, 1994; opened first Lacoste freestanding boutique in U.S., 1995; launched men's Booster toiletries under Patou license, 1996; introduced Lacoste 2000 for men and Lacoste for Women, 1999; signed license agreement with Samsonite for bags, travel items, and small leather goods, 2000; licensing deal with Procter & Gamble Prestige Beauté for Lacoste fragrance and beauty products, 2001; designer Christophe Lemaire's first collection, 2001; Lacoste includes, as manufacturer and sales partners, Jean Patou for toiletries, Dunlop France for tennis and golf equipment, Roventa-Henex and Vimont for watches. Exhibitions: L'Art de Vivre en France, Teien Museum, Tokyo, 1985; Haus der Kunst, Munich, 1987; De Main de Maître, Grand Palais, Paris, 1988; Vraiment Faux, Fondation Cartier, Paris, 1988; Decorative Art and Design in France, Cooper Hewitt Museum, New York, 1989; Veramente Falso, Rotonda di Via Besona, Milan, and Villa Stuck, Munich, 1991; designer renditions of Lacoste sportswear, Pompidou Center, Paris, 2001. Collections: Tennis Hall of Fame, Newport, Rhode Island; Museum of Modern Art, New York; Musée de la Mode, Paris; Musée du Sport, Paris. Awards: Design award, 1984; Innovation award, 1988; Global Recognition Trophy, the American Cotton Institute, 1995; Meryl award for sportswear, Venice, 1997; René Lacoste: Officier de la Legion d'Honneur, France; Bernard Lacoste: Chevalier de l'Ordre National de la Legion d'Honneur; Chevalier de l'Ordre National du Mérité. Company Address: 8 rue de Castiglione, 75001 Paris, France. Company Website: www.lacoste.com.

PUBLICATIONS

By LACOSTE:

Books

Tennis, France, 1928.
Plaisir du Tennis, France, 1981.

On LACOSTE:

Books

Cornfeld, B., and O. Edwards, Quintessence: The Quality of Having It, New York, 1983.
 Chapais, B., and E. Herscher, Qualité, Objets d'en France, Paris, 1989.
 Koda, Harold, and Richard Martin, Jocks and Nerds: Men's Style in the Twentieth Century, New York, 1989.
 Duhamel, J., Grand Inventaire du Génie Français en 365 Objets, Paris, 1993.
A Historic Look at Izod Lacoste Sportswear, Southport, CT, 1993.
The Story Behind Izod, Southport, CT, 1993.
Le Dictionnaire de la Mode au Vingtième Siècle, France, 1994.
International Directory of Company Histories, London, 1994.

Articles

"Le 'Crocodile,' Dieu des Loisirs," in Le Figaro (Paris), 5 July 1991.
 Hartlein, Robert, "Izod Women's Changes and Drops Croc," in WWD, 29 April 1992.
 "Real Men, Real Style, René Lacoste," in Esquire (Japan), October 1992.
 "Les Mousquetaires: Down to Two, Still Riding High," in the International Herald Tribune, 21 May 1993.

"Bon Anniversaire Monsieur Lacoste," in Figaro Madame (Paris), 5 June 1993.

"La Chemise Lacoste," in Marie-France (Paris), June 1993.

"Lacoste, Retour de Chine," in Le Figaro (Paris), 30 May 1994.

"Lacoste's Legacy," in the Financial Times, 14 October 1996.

"Lacoste Puts Teeth into Environmental Activism," in the Los Angeles Times, 20 November 1998.

Duffy, Tara Suilen, "Lacoste is Trying to Protect Its Crocodile in Hong Kong," in the Commercial Appeal (Memphis, TN), 14 October 1999.

Menkes, Suzy, "Lacoste: How Doth the Little Crocodile," in the International Herald Tribune, 3 July 2001.

*

The only way we consider fashion is color. Beyond fashion trends, because of our historic roots in tennis and golf, because we design activewear which must be comfortable, we try to provide the consumer with basics he can wear for many years as our products are durable. A brand remains powerful if it has a strong concept and adds on new lines of products solely when it has something new and worthwhile to offer to its existing consumers.

The quality of our products and the optimum price-to-quality ratio is the result of the quality of the men who create, manufacture, and sell and—moreover, the quality of teams prepared to work together in the same spirit. Quality is not controlling but manufacturing.

Even if I assume the final responsibility in the Company, I believe we form a true team, and it is this point which I am especially proud of, that allows us to be what we are today.

—Bernard Lacoste

* * *

Lacoste's seminal fashion impact rests on the cotton knit tennis shirt with alligator symbol developed in the 1920s by Jean René Lacoste. Lacoste, a popular French tennis player in a sports-mad and style-conscious era, was nicknamed "Le Crocodile" for his aggressive play and long nose. Back then, spectators and fashion editors eagerly noted what sports stars and celebrities wore to and from the matches. On the courts, players wore the unexciting standard tennis whites of flannel trousers and woven buttoned shirts with their long sleeves rolled up.

Lacoste challenged this traditional uniform by playing in short sleeve knit shirts with a crocodile monogrammed on them. He designed his shirts for comfort and good looks during the rigors of the court. The short cuffed sleeve ended the problem of sleeves rolling down. The soft turned down collar loosened easily via the buttoned placket. The pullover cotton knit breathed, and the longer shirt tail prevented the shirt from pulling out.

Not content merely to introduce the style for his own use, Lacoste turned to producing and marketing them, following his retirement from tennis in the early 1930s. The shirts he commissioned from friends in the textile industry included an embroidered crocodile on the left breast at a time when few clothes had symbols. Lacoste's renown and photos of Riviera and Palm Beach notables in this type of shirt popularized the style for recreational wear, especially in the United States.

Although white remained traditional on tennis courts, the Lacoste shirt went technicolor on the American golf links in the 1950s. The same characteristics that made it comfortable for tennis, especially the longer shirt tail, made it the sought-after style. Licensed to American manufacturer David Crystal Inc., the crocodile swam on colored piqué knit versions of the original model. Munsingwear came out with a comparable style, dubbed the Grand Slam golf shirt.

As memories of René Lacoste faded, the crocodile trademark was increasingly referred to as an “alligator.” The alligator symbol, like the country clubs at which it was seen, acquired an upscale reputation. David Crystal further enhanced this image by melding the Lacoste and Izod names. Izod derived from a British tailor who outfitted British royal family members. To update and increase its appeal in the late 1960s, Crystal made the shirt in double knit, easy-care Dacron polyester, but cotton had perennial appeal. The colors followed current fashion’s whimsy, including the worn and faded look. As the shirt settled into an enduring style for sport and casual wear, other companies, including U.S. mass merchandiser Sears, Roebuck and Co., brought out their own variations with two- to four-button plackets and their own symbols. Ralph Lauren’s polo shirt is a notable successful upscale rendition.

The preppy look of the 1970s ignited the alligator shirt’s popularity and sales and gave it cachet among men, teenagers, and children. They wore the shirt differently—shirt tails were out and the ribbed collars open and flipped up. In the 1980s, collars went back down and all buttons were buttoned. Women sported feminine versions or wore their partner’s. The alligator appeared on related garments with the name Izod Lacoste. At times, the symbol was revamped or removed. The shirt, or a facsimile, was a staple of the American middle class wardrobe. The phrase “Lacoste shirt” came to be a generic alternative term for a tennis or polo-style shirt.

Ultimately, the shirt and its trademark were hurt by overmarketing, copies, and caricature in the form of a satiric upside down “dead alligator” symbol. Lacoste began turning toward other items with the launching of numerous perfumes, men’s toiletries, and even luggage and travel items through a contract with Samsonite in 1999 and 2000. The expansion marked the company’s willingness to innovate and explore items outside the sportshirt in order to maintain and grow the prestige of its distinct symbol. Another move in this direction was the appointment of designer Christophe Lemaire, who showed his first collection in 2001. Lemaire, who believes in “affordable elegance,” wowed Parisians with a limited edition black Lacoste shirt with a silver crocodile, which according to Suzy Menkes of the International Herald Tribune (3 July 2001), “sold up a storm.”

—Debra Regan Cleveland; updated by Carrie Snyder

LACROIX, Christian

French fashion designer

Born: Christian Marie Marc Lacroix in Arles, France, 16 May 1951. Education: Studied art history at Paul Valéry University, Montpellier, and museum studies at the Sorbonne, Paris, 1973–76. Family: Married Françoise Rosensthiel, 1974. Career: Freelance fashion sketcher, 1976–78; assistant at Hermès, Paris, 1978–80; assistant to Guy Paulin, 1980; designer/artistic director, Jean Patou, 1981–87; opened own couture and ready-to-wear house, 1987; established

Christian Lacroix, fall/winter 2001–02 ready-to-wear collection.
© AP/Wide World Photos.

Christian Lacroix haute couture and salons in Paris, 1987; developed cruise collection, 1988; designed ready-to-wear collection for Genny SpA, 1988, followed by menswear collection and boutique; introduced seven accessory lines, from 1989; line of ties and hosiery, 1992; launched C'est la Vie! perfume, 1990; designed costumes for American Ballet Theater's Gaieté Parisienne, New York, 1988; “Bazar” collection, 1994; launched Jeans Lacroix, 1994; introduced Christian Lacroix collection of fine china, 1997; created jewelry line, 2000; debuted “Enfants de Christian Lacroix,” children’s line, 2001.

Awards: Dé d’Or award, 1986, 1988; Council of Fashion Designers of America award, 1987; Molière award (for costumes for Phedre), 1995. Address: 73 rue du Faubourg St Honoré, 75008 Paris, France. Website: www.christian-lacroix.fr.

PUBLICATIONS

By LACROIX:

Books

Pieces of a Pattern, Lacroix by Lacroix, with Patrick Mauries, London, 1992.
Lacroix, New York, 1992.

Although white remained traditional on tennis courts, the Lacoste shirt went technicolor on the American golf links in the 1950s. The same characteristics that made it comfortable for tennis, especially the longer shirt tail, made it the sought-after style. Licensed to American manufacturer David Crystal Inc., the crocodile swam on colored piqué knit versions of the original model. Munsingwear came out with a comparable style, dubbed the Grand Slam golf shirt.

As memories of René Lacoste faded, the crocodile trademark was increasingly referred to as an “alligator.” The alligator symbol, like the country clubs at which it was seen, acquired an upscale reputation. David Crystal further enhanced this image by melding the Lacoste and Izod names. Izod derived from a British tailor who outfitted British royal family members. To update and increase its appeal in the late 1960s, Crystal made the shirt in double knit, easy-care Dacron polyester, but cotton had perennial appeal. The colors followed current fashion’s whimsy, including the worn and faded look. As the shirt settled into an enduring style for sport and casual wear, other companies, including U.S. mass merchandiser Sears, Roebuck and Co., brought out their own variations with two- to four-button plackets and their own symbols. Ralph Lauren’s polo shirt is a notable successful upscale rendition.

The preppy look of the 1970s ignited the alligator shirt’s popularity and sales and gave it cachet among men, teenagers, and children. They wore the shirt differently—shirt tails were out and the ribbed collars open and flipped up. In the 1980s, collars went back down and all buttons were buttoned. Women sported feminine versions or wore their partner’s. The alligator appeared on related garments with the name Izod Lacoste. At times, the symbol was revamped or removed. The shirt, or a facsimile, was a staple of the American middle class wardrobe. The phrase “Lacoste shirt” came to be a generic alternative term for a tennis or polo-style shirt.

Ultimately, the shirt and its trademark were hurt by overmarketing, copies, and caricature in the form of a satiric upside down “dead alligator” symbol. Lacoste began turning toward other items with the launching of numerous perfumes, men’s toiletries, and even luggage and travel items through a contract with Samsonite in 1999 and 2000. The expansion marked the company’s willingness to innovate and explore items outside the sportshirt in order to maintain and grow the prestige of its distinct symbol. Another move in this direction was the appointment of designer Christophe Lemaire, who showed his first collection in 2001. Lemaire, who believes in “affordable elegance,” wowed Parisians with a limited edition black Lacoste shirt with a silver crocodile, which according to Suzy Menkes of the International Herald Tribune (3 July 2001), “sold up a storm.”

—Debra Regan Cleveland; updated by Carrie Snyder

LACROIX, Christian

French fashion designer

Born: Christian Marie Marc Lacroix in Arles, France, 16 May 1951. Education: Studied art history at Paul Valéry University, Montpellier, and museum studies at the Sorbonne, Paris, 1973–76. Family: Married Françoise Rosensthiel, 1974. Career: Freelance fashion sketcher, 1976–78; assistant at Hermès, Paris, 1978–80; assistant to Guy Paulin, 1980; designer/artistic director, Jean Patou, 1981–87; opened own couture and ready-to-wear house, 1987; established

Christian Lacroix, fall/winter 2001–02 ready-to-wear collection.
© AP/Wide World Photos.

Christian Lacroix haute couture and salons in Paris, 1987; developed cruise collection, 1988; designed ready-to-wear collection for Genny SpA, 1988, followed by menswear collection and boutique; introduced seven accessory lines, from 1989; line of ties and hosiery, 1992; launched C'est la Vie! perfume, 1990; designed costumes for American Ballet Theater's Gaieté Parisienne, New York, 1988; “Bazar” collection, 1994; launched Jeans Lacroix, 1994; introduced Christian Lacroix collection of fine china, 1997; created jewelry line, 2000; debuted “Enfants de Christian Lacroix,” children’s line, 2001.

Awards: Dé d’Or award, 1986, 1988; Council of Fashion Designers of America award, 1987; Molière award (for costumes for Phedre), 1995. Address: 73 rue du Faubourg St Honoré, 75008 Paris, France. Website: www.christian-lacroix.fr.

PUBLICATIONS

By LACROIX:

Books

Pieces of a Pattern, Lacroix by Lacroix, with Patrick Mauries, London, 1992.
Lacroix, New York, 1992.

Christian Lacroix, spring/summer 2001 haute couture collection:
silk evening dress. © AP/Wide World Photos.

Your World—and Welcome to It: A Rogue's Gallery of Interior Design, New York, 1998.

On LACROIX:

Books

- Coleridge, Nicholas, The Fashion Conspiracy, London, 1988.
 Mulvagh, Jane, Vogue History of Twentieth Century Fashion, London, 1988.
 Wilson, Elizabeth, and Lou Taylor, Through the Looking Glass, London, 1988.
 Howell, Georgina, Sultans of Style: Thirty Years of Fashion and Passion, 1960–90, London, 1990.
 Guillen, Yves-Pierre, and Jacqueline Claude, The Golden Thimble: French Haute Couture, Paris, 1990.
 Martin, Richard, and Harold Koda, Bloom, Metropolitan Museum of Art, 1995.
 Mauries, Patrick, Christian Lacroix: The Diary of a Collection, New York, 1996.
 Stegemeyer, Anne, Who's Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.
 Baudot, François, Christian Lacroix, New York, 1997.

Articles

- Verdier, Rosy, "Jean Patou et Christian Lacroix," in L'Officiel (Paris), November 1984.
 "Lacroix: The New Paris Star," in WWD, 31 July 1986.
 McEvoy, Marian, "Blithe Spirit," in Connoisseur (London), November 1986.
 Harbrecht, Ursula, "Christian Lacroix: Nouvelle Étoile au Firmament de Paris," in Textiles Suisses (Lausanne), March 1987.
 Baumgold, Julie, "Dancing on the Lip of the Volcano: Christian Lacroix's Crash Chic," in New York, 30 April 1987.
 Baudet, François, "Christian Lacroix: La Nouvelle Couture," in Elle (Paris), August 1987.
 Brampton, Sally, "Lacroix's Grand Entrance," in the Sunday Express Magazine (London), 30 August 1987.
 Paquin, Paquita, and Francis Dorleans, "Christian Lacroix: Fièvre Inaugurale," in L'Officiel (Paris), September 1987.
 Howell, Georgina, "How Lacroix Took Paris by Storm," in the Sunday Times Magazine (London), 4 October 1987.
 Mestiri, Mohand, "Christian Lacroix: Portrait Chinois d'un Provincial Cosmopolite," in Connaissance des Arts (Paris), October 1987.
 "Lacroix Designs for Us," in Connoisseur, October 1987.
 Brubach, Holly, "Lacroix Goes to the Ballet," in Vogue, February 1988.
 Garmaise, Freda, "Chic Frills," in Ms. (New York), February 1988.
 "Christian Lacroix," in Current Biography (New York), April 1988.
 "Les Trésors de Christian Lacroix," in L'Officiel (Paris), March 1989.
 Grossman, Lloyd, "The Wider Side of Paris," in Harpers & Queen (London), May 1989.
 Donovan, Carrie, "The Three Who are Key: Couture's Future," in the New York Times Magazine, 27 August 1989.
 "A Day in the Life of Christian Lacroix," in the Sunday Times Magazine (London), 27 August 1989.
 Gerrie, Anthea, "Lacroix's Business Scents," in the Sunday Express Magazine (London), 18 March 1990.
 Rafferty, Diane, "Christian Lacroix: The Art of Sensuality," in Connoisseur, June 1990.
 "Lacroix's Fan Club," in WWD, 18 December 1990.
 Levin, Angela, "Christian Lacroix," in You magazine of the Mail on Sunday (London), 10 February 1991.
 Rolf, Gail, "Racy and Lacy...A Perfect Paris Match from Lacroix," in the Daily Mail (London), 20 July 1993.
 Menkes, Suzy, "Sweetness and Light by Lacroix," in the International Herald Tribune (Paris), 27 January 1995.
 Spindler, Amy M., "Olé: Lacroix Conquers the Couture," in the New York Times, 27 January 1995.
 Schiro, Anne-Marie, "Lacroix and Rykiel: Classics," in the New York Times, 18 March 1995.
 Mirabella, Grace, "Grace Mirabella on the Lacroix Nanosecond," in the Washington Post, 10 September 1995.
 Johnson, Eunice W., "Comfort With a Touch of Luxe," in Ebony, February 1999.
 Kadri, Françoise "Christian Lacroix, a Twenty-Year Love Affair with Japan," in Agence France Presse, 24 June 2000.
 Shard, Sarah, "Lacroix in Full Technicolor for Next Winter," in Agence France Presse, 11 March 2001.
 Lowthorpe, Rebecca, "Excess All Areas," in the Independent on Sunday, 1 July 2001.

Alexander, Hilary, "Couture Tales Off on a Magic Carpet Ride," in the Daily Telegraph, 11 July 2001.

*

In a way I just love to mix everything for the sake of mixing. For many people fashion is being dressed as your neighbor, your best friend. But, for me, fashion is expressing your own deep individuality; that is why I have always done noticeable things.

—Christian Lacroix

* * *

There is a prevalent myth in French haute couture that only once every decade does a new star emerge. Writer Nicholas Coleridge traced this path of succession from Paul Poiret, to Chanel, to Balenciaga, to Saint Laurent, then Lagerfeld (The Fashion Conspiracy, London, 1988). Judging by the buzz and excitement that preceded the launch of his first collection in the Salon Impérial Suite of the Hotel Intercontinental in July 1987, there could be no doubt Christian Lacroix was a new star.

Quite why Lacroix became the new star of couture is debatable, but his timing was definitely right. There had been no opening of a couture house since 1961 with Saint Laurent (Lagerfeld had become a star by resuscitating the established house of Chanel.) As the chairperson and financial director of the new house, Paul Audrain was to declare, "We had a very strong presentiment that the climate was right for a new couture house." New social and cultural changes had reversed the values of the 1970s; the jeans and t-shirt dressing, so prevalent during that decade, had changed. A new sexual identity had emerged. The entrepreneurial spirit of the 1980s created new money, and Lacroix's debut was in time to capitalize on this trend.

Lacroix had begun his career with an aspiration to be a museum curator. After moving to Paris from Arles in the early 1970s, he met his future wife Françoise Rosenstiel, who encouraged his interest in fashion, which led to his taking positions at Hermès and Guy Paulin. He became the designer for Jean Patou in 1981, revitalizing the flagging couture house and upping sales from thirty dresses a season to 100. He seduced the fashion press with spectacular shows, reviving fashion staples such as the frou-frou petticoat and the puffball skirt. In 1987, with the backing of five million francs from the textile conglomerate Financière Agache, Lacroix opened his new couture house.

As a designer, Lacroix throws caution to the wind, providing the sort of luxurious product that, at first, justified the amount of "new money" spent on him. His collections are always an exotic, lavish cornucopia of influences, ranging from the primitive, rough naïveté of the paintings of the Cobra movement, to an homage to Lady Diana Cooper, to modern gypsies, travelers, and nomads. He uses the most luxurious fabrics in often unexpected mixes or even patchwork, embroidered brocades, fur, reembroidered lace, ethnic prints and embroideries, even gold embroidery. Nothing is considered too expensive or too outré to be included in the clothes.

An extravagant technicolor musical from the golden age of Hollywood would perhaps be an understatement when describing the impact of a Lacroix collection. As an artist, he is not afraid to plunder junk shops, museums, the theater and opera, or the glamor of the bullfight to create designs that astound yet are always stylish in their eclectic clutter. There are many strong retrospective references from the 1950s, 1960s, and 1970s in a Lacroix collection, like the detached hauteur or waiflike gestures of fashion models from the period. The unapproachable allure of movie stars like Tippi Hedren or Capucine, or real-life personalities who embody these qualities, all inspire his designs, often resulting in eccentric accessories, colors, and poses.

Lacroix recognizes that contemporary couture is often only a public relations exercise for money-spinning ventures such as perfume or licensing deals using a designer name to sell a product. Lacroix, however, is fully aware of the value couture has in pushing fashion, projecting a dream, and making dramatically important fashion statements. This is essential if fashion is to survive commercially, because the ready-to-wear and mass-market manufacturers always see designers as the inspirations that direct the movement of fashion. Before his first show, Lacroix seemed to synthesize this point of view when he said, "I want to get back to the position where the couture becomes a kind of laboratory of ideas, the way it was with Schiaparelli 40 years ago."

The minimalist 1990s saw not only a downturn in interest in Lacroix's over-the-top extravagance but also in couture itself. Fashion critics said the Lacroix moment had been the 1980s, and it was over. Lacroix continued to design, however, with a signature collection of tableware and homeware, eventually turning to costume and designing for theater, ballet, opera, and finally film, for all of which his creations have always been well suited. His work in costume has received many awards. Through the changing climes of the fashion world and his own fortunes, however, Lacroix's central interest has remained couture, and he has continued to create one-of-a-kind couture for a cadre of wealthy clients. And as is ever the case in fashion, his moment was destined to come again.

With collections skewed a little younger, less "heavy, outdated, obsolete," in Lacroix's words, and more casual, the designer's shows again became a hot ticket as the decade turned and the 1990s gave way to the 21st century. And whatever the changes, the collections are still everything one expects from Lacroix—an exuberant riot of color, ecstatic, nearly surreal details, and rich fabric upon rich fabric. Trompe-l'oeil collars, a lacquered chiffon dress with rhinestones, fluffy pom-poms in hot pink or lemon, and hems dangling fringes of pastel-colored mink tails show that the designer has not given up his delight in "the cross-fertilization of styles."

—Kevin Almond; updated by Jessica Reisman

LADICORBIC, Zoran

See ZORAN

LAGERFELD, Karl

German designer

Born: Hamburg, 10 September 1938; immigrated to Paris in 1952.
Career: Design assistant at Balmain, 1955–58; art director, Patou, 1958–63; freelance designer for Chloé, Krizia, Ballantyne, Timwear, Charles Jourdan, Valentino, Fendi, Cadette, Max Mara and others, from 1964; launched Parfums Lagerfeld, 1975; director of collections and ready-to-wear, Chanel, from 1983; Karl Lagerfeld and KL ready-to-wear firms established in Paris and Germany, 1984; Karl Lagerfeld, S.A., acquired by Chloé parent company, Dunhill Plc., 1992; broke ties with Chloé and Dunhill (part of the Vendome Group), 1997;

Alexander, Hilary, "Couture Tales Off on a Magic Carpet Ride," in the Daily Telegraph, 11 July 2001.

*

In a way I just love to mix everything for the sake of mixing. For many people fashion is being dressed as your neighbor, your best friend. But, for me, fashion is expressing your own deep individuality; that is why I have always done noticeable things.

—Christian Lacroix

* * *

There is a prevalent myth in French haute couture that only once every decade does a new star emerge. Writer Nicholas Coleridge traced this path of succession from Paul Poiret, to Chanel, to Balenciaga, to Saint Laurent, then Lagerfeld (The Fashion Conspiracy, London, 1988). Judging by the buzz and excitement that preceded the launch of his first collection in the Salon Impérial Suite of the Hotel Intercontinental in July 1987, there could be no doubt Christian Lacroix was a new star.

Quite why Lacroix became the new star of couture is debatable, but his timing was definitely right. There had been no opening of a couture house since 1961 with Saint Laurent (Lagerfeld had become a star by resuscitating the established house of Chanel.) As the chairperson and financial director of the new house, Paul Audrain was to declare, "We had a very strong presentiment that the climate was right for a new couture house." New social and cultural changes had reversed the values of the 1970s; the jeans and t-shirt dressing, so prevalent during that decade, had changed. A new sexual identity had emerged. The entrepreneurial spirit of the 1980s created new money, and Lacroix's debut was in time to capitalize on this trend.

Lacroix had begun his career with an aspiration to be a museum curator. After moving to Paris from Arles in the early 1970s, he met his future wife Françoise Rosenstiel, who encouraged his interest in fashion, which led to his taking positions at Hermès and Guy Paulin. He became the designer for Jean Patou in 1981, revitalizing the flagging couture house and upping sales from thirty dresses a season to 100. He seduced the fashion press with spectacular shows, reviving fashion staples such as the frou-frou petticoat and the puffball skirt. In 1987, with the backing of five million francs from the textile conglomerate Financière Agache, Lacroix opened his new couture house.

As a designer, Lacroix throws caution to the wind, providing the sort of luxurious product that, at first, justified the amount of "new money" spent on him. His collections are always an exotic, lavish cornucopia of influences, ranging from the primitive, rough naïveté of the paintings of the Cobra movement, to an homage to Lady Diana Cooper, to modern gypsies, travelers, and nomads. He uses the most luxurious fabrics in often unexpected mixes or even patchwork, embroidered brocades, fur, reembroidered lace, ethnic prints and embroideries, even gold embroidery. Nothing is considered too expensive or too outré to be included in the clothes.

An extravagant technicolor musical from the golden age of Hollywood would perhaps be an understatement when describing the impact of a Lacroix collection. As an artist, he is not afraid to plunder junk shops, museums, the theater and opera, or the glamor of the bullfight to create designs that astound yet are always stylish in their eclectic clutter. There are many strong retrospective references from the 1950s, 1960s, and 1970s in a Lacroix collection, like the detached hauteur or waiflike gestures of fashion models from the period. The unapproachable allure of movie stars like Tippi Hedren or Capucine, or real-life personalities who embody these qualities, all inspire his designs, often resulting in eccentric accessories, colors, and poses.

Lacroix recognizes that contemporary couture is often only a public relations exercise for money-spinning ventures such as perfume or licensing deals using a designer name to sell a product. Lacroix, however, is fully aware of the value couture has in pushing fashion, projecting a dream, and making dramatically important fashion statements. This is essential if fashion is to survive commercially, because the ready-to-wear and mass-market manufacturers always see designers as the inspirations that direct the movement of fashion. Before his first show, Lacroix seemed to synthesize this point of view when he said, "I want to get back to the position where the couture becomes a kind of laboratory of ideas, the way it was with Schiaparelli 40 years ago."

The minimalist 1990s saw not only a downturn in interest in Lacroix's over-the-top extravagance but also in couture itself. Fashion critics said the Lacroix moment had been the 1980s, and it was over. Lacroix continued to design, however, with a signature collection of tableware and homeware, eventually turning to costume and designing for theater, ballet, opera, and finally film, for all of which his creations have always been well suited. His work in costume has received many awards. Through the changing climes of the fashion world and his own fortunes, however, Lacroix's central interest has remained couture, and he has continued to create one-of-a-kind couture for a cadre of wealthy clients. And as is ever the case in fashion, his moment was destined to come again.

With collections skewed a little younger, less "heavy, outdated, obsolete," in Lacroix's words, and more casual, the designer's shows again became a hot ticket as the decade turned and the 1990s gave way to the 21st century. And whatever the changes, the collections are still everything one expects from Lacroix—an exuberant riot of color, ecstatic, nearly surreal details, and rich fabric upon rich fabric. Trompe-l'oeil collars, a lacquered chiffon dress with rhinestones, fluffy pom-poms in hot pink or lemon, and hems dangling fringes of pastel-colored mink tails show that the designer has not given up his delight in "the cross-fertilization of styles."

—Kevin Almond; updated by Jessica Reisman

LADICORBIC, Zoran

See ZORAN

LAGERFELD, Karl

German designer

Born: Hamburg, 10 September 1938; immigrated to Paris in 1952.
Career: Design assistant at Balmain, 1955–58; art director, Patou, 1958–63; freelance designer for Chloé, Krizia, Ballantyne, Timwear, Charles Jourdan, Valentino, Fendi, Cadette, Max Mara and others, from 1964; launched Parfums Lagerfeld, 1975; director of collections and ready-to-wear, Chanel, from 1983; Karl Lagerfeld and KL ready-to-wear firms established in Paris and Germany, 1984; Karl Lagerfeld, S.A., acquired by Chloé parent company, Dunhill Plc., 1992; broke ties with Chloé and Dunhill (part of the Vendome Group), 1997; bought back Karl Lagerfeld S.A., 1997; created fragrances Lagerfeld, for Elizabeth Arden, 1975, Chloé-Lagerfeld, 1978, KL for women, 1983, KL for men, 1984; Lagerfeld Photo, 1990; Sun Moon Stars, 1994; Jako, 1997; Lagerfeld Femme, 2001. Exhibitions: Karl Lagerfeld: Fotografien, Galerie Hans Mayer, Dusseldorf, 1989. Awards: Second prize, International Wool Secretariat design contest, 1954; Neiman Marcus award, 1980; Bath Museum of Costume Dress of the Year award, 1981; 20th Dé d'or, 1986; Council of Fashion Designers of America award, 1991; Fashion Footwear Association of New York award, 1991. Address: 14 Boulevard de la Madeleine, 75008 Paris, France.

Karl Lagerfeld, fall/winter 2001 ready-to-wear collection. © AP/Wide World Photos.

PUBLICATIONS

By LAGERFELD:

Selected Books

Karl Lagerfeld: A Fashion Journal—A Visual Record of Anna Piaggi's Creative Dressing and Self-Editing, with Anna Piaggi, New York, London & Stuttgart, 1986.

Gilbert Poillerat, Maître Ferronnier, with François Baudot, Paris, 1992.

Karl Lagerfeld: Off the Record, Göttingen, Germany, 1994, 1995.

Chanel, Paris, 1995.

Karl Lagerfeld: Grunewald, Göttingen, 1995.

Claudia Schiffer, London, 1995.

Visionen, Göttingen, 1996.

Body Parts, Cologne, 1997.

Karl Lagerfeld: Parti Pris, Bonn, 1998.

The House in the Trees and Casa Malaparte, both with Eric Pfrunder and Gerhard Steidl, both Göttingen, 1998.

Aktstrakt, Göttingen, 2000.

Escape From Circumstances, Göttingen & London, 2000.

editor, Iwao Yamawaki, Göttingen & London, 2001.

Modern Italian Architecture, Göttingen & London, 2001.

On LAGERFELD:

Books

Milbank, Caroline Rennolds, Couture: The Great Designers, New York, 1985.

Piaggi, Anna, Karl Lagerfeld: A Fashion Journal, London, 1986.

Perschetz, Lois, ed., W, The Designing Life, New York, 1987.

Howell, Georgina, Sultans of Style: Thirty Years of Fashion and Passion 1960–1990, London, 1990.

Stegemeyer, Anne, Who's Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.

Articles

Buck, J., "How Karl Lagerfeld Changed Some Lives," in Interview (New York), March 1973.

"Great Designers of the World: Karl Lagerfeld," in Vogue (London), 1 March 1975.

Menkes, Suzy, "The Man Who Takes Over at Chanel," in the Times (London), 31 January 1983.

Shapiro, Harriet, "Tout Paris Applauds the Fashionable Vision of Karl Lagerfeld," in People, 11 June 1984.

"Karl Lagerfeld: The Many Faceted Man," in Vogue (Paris), October 1985.

Dryansky, G.Y. "Baroque to His Bones," in Connoisseur, December 1985.

Barron, Pattie, "Playing Court to Kaiser Karl," in Cosmopolitan (London), October 1986.

"A Life in the Day of Karl Lagerfeld," in the Sunday Times Magazine (London), 8 November 1987.

Barker, Rafaella, "Karlsberg," in House & Garden, December 1987.

Lobrany, Alexander, "Lagerfeld Logs On: At 50, King Karl Makes a Foray into Men's Wear," in DNR, 6 April 1988.

Brook, Danae, "King Karl," in the Sunday Express Magazine (London), 15 May 1988.

Talley, André Leon, "Petit Palais," in Vogue, April 1989.

Ciavarella, Michele, "Karl Lagerfeld: A Burst of Genius," in Maglieria Italiana (Modena), April/June 1989.

Bowles, Hamish, "Reviving the Past," in Harpers & Queen (London), September 1989.

"A Lagerfeld Extravagance," in the Independent (London), 28 September 1989.

Mynott, Lawrence, "Kaiser Karl: The Darling Dictator," in the Independent, 24 May 1990.

- Etherington-Smith, Meredith, "He Came, He Drew, He Conquered," in Harpers & Queen, September 1990.
- Mower, Sarah, "Karl Lagerfeld," in Vogue (London), April 1991.
- Mayer, Margit, "King Karl," in WWD, 20 November 1991.
- Orth, Maureen, "Kaiser Karl: Behind the Mask," in Vanity Fair, February 1992.
- "The Kaiser's Empire," in WWD, 2 June 1992.
- Lane, Anthony, "The Last Emperor," in the New Yorker, 7 November 1994.
- Menkes, Suzy, "Chanel: Beauty Without Gimmicks," in the International Herald Tribune, 25 January 1995.
- Spindler, Amy M., "Four Who Have No Use for Trends," in the New York Times, 20 March 1995.
- White, Constance C.R., "Lagerfeld's Poetic License," in the New York Times, 24 June 1997.
- Gabor, Lisa, "No Clothing, No Kidding," in In Style, March 1998.
- White, Constance C.R., "Lagerfeld's Lesson for Younger Designers: Stay Relevant," in the New York Times, 16 March 1999.
- Menkes, Suzy, "Magnificent Chanel Defines the Season," in the International Herald Tribune, 4 March 2000.
- _____, "Class and Classics at Chanel," in the International Herald Tribune, 24 January 2001.
- Horyn, Cathy, "A Slimmer Karl Lagerfeld Makes his Concession to Fashion," in the New York Times, 19 June 2001.
- Menkes, Suzy, "Chanel Goes to the Head of the Class," in the International Herald Tribune, 11 July 2001.

* * *

Universally recognized as one of the most prolific and high-profile designers of the last 20 years, Karl Lagerfeld has maintained his reputation through consistently strong work for the numerous lines he produces every year. Each label has its own distinct look, while clearly bearing the bold, uncompromising Lagerfeld signature that guarantees the success of everything he produces.

Moving between several main collections, Lagerfeld designs with consummate ease, displaying the skills he learned from his couture background in fine tailoring and flashes of surreal detailing. He has functioned best as a catalyst, reinvigorating labels and broadening their customer base. Since 1983 he most spectacularly demonstrated this capability at Chanel, where, despite some criticism, Lagerfeld brought the label back to the pinnacle of high fashion. He produced endless innovative variations on the signature tweed suits that often mix street style references, such as teaming the traditional Chanel jacket with denim miniskirts and the signature gilt buttons and chains.

Lagerfeld also stretched the Chanel look to embrace younger customers, with club-influenced black fishnet bodystockings, the traditional Chanel camellia placed cheekily over the breasts, and hefty lace-up boots set against flowing georgette skirts and leather jackets. This combination of wit with recognizable Chanel symbols rejuvenated the house, making Lagerfeld's fashion word an inspirational message to a new generation. His experiments have been at their most fantastic in the vibrant lines of the couture show, made more accessible in the ready-to-wear range. Only Lagerfeld could put the Chanel label on panties (1993) and camellia-trimmed cotton vests (1992) to make them the most talked-about elements of the Paris collections. Yet this quirkiness was underpinned by the quality of Lagerfeld's designs and the mix of classic separates that have always been an undercurrent in his work.

Karl Lagerfeld, spring/summer 2001 ready-to-wear collection. © AFP/CORBIS.

His own name label, KL, highlights these skills. Bold tailoring, easy-to-wear cardigan jackets in his favorite bright colors, combined with softly shaped knitwear, showed the breadth of his talents and ensured the longevity of his appeal. If his more outrageous combinations at Chanel have enabled him to outlive the excesses of the 1970s that trapped some of his contemporaries, then his clever manipulation of fabric and color has prolonged the life of his clothes still further.

During the 1970s Lagerfeld's work for Chloë was equally influential, his love of eveningwear coming to the fore, albeit in a more restrained form than at Chanel. The main look of this period was flowing pastel chiffon draped onto the body to give a highly feminine feel and trimmed with silk flowers. He recreated this style for his return to the label in spring-summer 1993, complete with models wearing Afro wigs. At first coolly received by the fashion press, it went on to inspire many with its floaty silhouette and flower-child air, reviving ethereal dresses with no linings, unnecessary seams, or extraneous detail.

While he continued to move from label to label, never quite losing the freelance mentality of his early days, it is only the occasional lack of editing in his collections betraying how widely his talents are spread. Idea follows idea, frequently inspired by his current model muse as he reinterprets garments to create very modern styles. At Fendi this desire to continually push forward to greater modernity, absorbing the influences around him and seeking greater perfection in his work, led to his taking the furriers' trade a step further. The lightness of touch that had established his name as early as 1970 led him to strip the Fendi sisters' signature fur coats to the thinnest possible layer. He removed the need for heavy linings by treating the pelts to produce supple lightweight coats shown in 1973 with raglan sleeves and tie belts, which complemented the sporty feel of the knitwear he also produces for the company.

Lagerfeld has proven he is equally adept in his bold strokes at Chanel as in his delicate shaping at Fendi, or in the vibrant classics of his own lines. Though he severed his ties with Chloé and the Vendome Group in 1997 (and regained ownership of the company bearing his name), Lagerfeld had more than enough designing to keep him busy. He also continued to indulge in another passion, photography, producing a pictorial of nude celebrities for Visionaire magazine in 1998. He has published a growing collection of books on art, architecture, and photography, and collaborated with authors the likes of Helmut Lang, Peter Lindbergh, and Madonna.

Lagerfeld's consummate skills as a designer have enabled him to push the fashion beyond its constraints by combining the immediacy of ready-to-wear with the splendor and elegance of couture. Nearly two decades ago, in June 1984, Lagerfeld told People magazine's Harriet Shapiro, "I would like to be a one-man multinational fashion phenomenon." In both the 20th and 21st centuries, Karl Lagerfeld has more than achieved his goal.

—Rebecca Arnold; updated by Sydonie Bénet

LAM, Ragence

British fashion designer

Born: Lam Kwok Fai in Hong Kong, 24 January 1951. Education: Harrow School of Art, London, 1971–74, and at the Royal College of Art, London, 1974–76. Career: Designer for Fiorucci, Milan, 1976; designer/owner, Ragence Lam, London, 1977–83; Ragence, Hong Kong, 1980–83; Ragence Lam Ltd., Hong Kong, from 1983; founding member of Hong Kong Fashion Designers Association, 1984, chairman, 1985–88. Exhibitions: Ragence Lam Fashion Design Exhibition, Hong Kong Arts Center, 1985. Awards: Hong Kong Artist Guild Fashion Designer of the Year award, 1988; China Fashion Exhibition Competition gold prize, 1990. Address: 83085 Wongnei Chong Road, 17th Floor, Linden Court, Happy Valley, Hong Kong, China.

PUBLICATIONS

On LAM:

Articles

Kivestu, Pat, "Best of Hong Kong Fashions: The New Fashion Generation," in WWD (Hong Kong supplement), 1 December 1986.

Biography Resource Center, from the Gale Group, available online at www.galenet.galegroup.com, 4 October 2001.

Minghu, Gao, "Toward A Transnational Modernity: An Overview of the Exhibition: Inside Out," in Chinese Type Online Magazine, available online at www.chinese-art.com, 2001.

*

Growing up in a Chinese family in the British Colony of Hong Kong at the tip of south China, I have always felt the need to define my identity. Western culture was pervasive in my daily life. European art and history were part of my education and training, and so I had no difficulty adapting when I went to study at the Royal College of Art in London and then to work as a designer in Italy. But, paradoxically, it was when I was enjoying my first early success in the Western world, particularly in London where I had my own label, that I became keenly aware of my Chinese origins. I am not only modern and Western, but also Chinese, and I felt that unless my designs could capture my identity, they will never be entirely satisfying to me.

My work in the 1980s, when I returned to Hong Kong and opened my own shop with my own label, covered a wide diversity of styles. I frequently used unusual materials such as fishnet, or rattan mats. But in a way they were just random experiments, without my knowing exactly what I wanted. As designs they had merit and originality, but as self-expression they were to me lacking and uncertain. Then followed a period of contemplation and reassessment. I began to examine a tremendous amount of Chinese art forms—architecture, painting, sculpture, ceramics, textiles, furniture—whatever I could lay hands on, from all historical periods of China.

Not only did their immense richness astonish me, but I discovered I felt instinctively toward them an affinity, such as I never felt about Western art. It is as if I appreciate the Western sense of beauty only intellectually through my training, but the Chinese sense of beauty is in my blood. I also traveled to China. The vibrancy of the people and the often bold and witty way in which they seek expression in fashion struck me as entirely encouraging.

It became perfectly clear to me that what I wanted as a designer was to express the Chinese sense of beauty in contemporary and international fashion language. It must be contemporary; I want not historical revival but development, to carry...the great Chinese tradition of art and costume truncated by traumatic events in China's recent history. It must be international, because only then can it enter the mainstream and have real impact. Above all it must have depth and meaning, and not just superficial borrowings here and there from folk or court art or theatre or whatever. It must be truly new.

I see this as my life's work. In the exploration of the Chinese sense of beauty, I have an inexhaustible source of infinite variety, from the floating lines of elegant Sung-style robes to the elaborate bejeweled and embroidered Q'ing artefacts. Then there is something religious or ceremonial in this beauty—in Buddhist statues, in a monk's habit—an austerity and tranquility that deeply appeals to me. In addition, there are China's traditional fabrics and craftsmanship, the numerous techniques of embroidery, tapestry, ornamentation which could be put to exciting new use and create a totally new look.

My artistic aim, the identity I have sought to express, are all bound up with the history and the unique society of Hong Kong, and with its future. As Hong Kong's link with China grows in the coming years, I see my work growing with a strong sense of direction and inner purpose.

—Ragence Lam

Fendi this desire to continually push forward to greater modernity, absorbing the influences around him and seeking greater perfection in his work, led to his taking the furriers' trade a step further. The lightness of touch that had established his name as early as 1970 led him to strip the Fendi sisters' signature fur coats to the thinnest possible layer. He removed the need for heavy linings by treating the pelts to produce supple lightweight coats shown in 1973 with raglan sleeves and tie belts, which complemented the sporty feel of the knitwear he also produces for the company.

Lagerfeld has proven he is equally adept in his bold strokes at Chanel as in his delicate shaping at Fendi, or in the vibrant classics of his own lines. Though he severed his ties with Chloé and the Vendome Group in 1997 (and regained ownership of the company bearing his name), Lagerfeld had more than enough designing to keep him busy. He also continued to indulge in another passion, photography, producing a pictorial of nude celebrities for Visionaire magazine in 1998. He has published a growing collection of books on art, architecture, and photography, and collaborated with authors the likes of Helmut Lang, Peter Lindbergh, and Madonna.

Lagerfeld's consummate skills as a designer have enabled him to push the fashion beyond its constraints by combining the immediacy of ready-to-wear with the splendor and elegance of couture. Nearly two decades ago, in June 1984, Lagerfeld told People magazine's Harriet Shapiro, "I would like to be a one-man multinational fashion phenomenon." In both the 20th and 21st centuries, Karl Lagerfeld has more than achieved his goal.

—Rebecca Arnold; updated by Sydonie Bénet

LAM, Ragence

British fashion designer

Born: Lam Kwok Fai in Hong Kong, 24 January 1951. Education: Harrow School of Art, London, 1971–74, and at the Royal College of Art, London, 1974–76. Career: Designer for Fiorucci, Milan, 1976; designer/owner, Ragence Lam, London, 1977–83; Ragence, Hong Kong, 1980–83; Ragence Lam Ltd., Hong Kong, from 1983; founding member of Hong Kong Fashion Designers Association, 1984, chairman, 1985–88. Exhibitions: Ragence Lam Fashion Design Exhibition, Hong Kong Arts Center, 1985. Awards: Hong Kong Artist Guild Fashion Designer of the Year award, 1988; China Fashion Exhibition Competition gold prize, 1990. Address: 83085 Wongnei Chong Road, 17th Floor, Linden Court, Happy Valley, Hong Kong, China.

PUBLICATIONS

On LAM:

Articles

Kivestu, Pat, "Best of Hong Kong Fashions: The New Fashion Generation," in WWD (Hong Kong supplement), 1 December 1986.

Biography Resource Center, from the Gale Group, available online at www.galenet.galegroup.com, 4 October 2001.

Minghu, Gao, "Toward A Transnational Modernity: An Overview of the Exhibition: Inside Out," in Chinese Type Online Magazine, available online at www.chinese-art.com, 2001.

*

Growing up in a Chinese family in the British Colony of Hong Kong at the tip of south China, I have always felt the need to define my identity. Western culture was pervasive in my daily life. European art and history were part of my education and training, and so I had no difficulty adapting when I went to study at the Royal College of Art in London and then to work as a designer in Italy. But, paradoxically, it was when I was enjoying my first early success in the Western world, particularly in London where I had my own label, that I became keenly aware of my Chinese origins. I am not only modern and Western, but also Chinese, and I felt that unless my designs could capture my identity, they will never be entirely satisfying to me.

My work in the 1980s, when I returned to Hong Kong and opened my own shop with my own label, covered a wide diversity of styles. I frequently used unusual materials such as fishnet, or rattan mats. But in a way they were just random experiments, without my knowing exactly what I wanted. As designs they had merit and originality, but as self-expression they were to me lacking and uncertain. Then followed a period of contemplation and reassessment. I began to examine a tremendous amount of Chinese art forms—architecture, painting, sculpture, ceramics, textiles, furniture—whatever I could lay hands on, from all historical periods of China.

Not only did their immense richness astonish me, but I discovered I felt instinctively toward them an affinity, such as I never felt about Western art. It is as if I appreciate the Western sense of beauty only intellectually through my training, but the Chinese sense of beauty is in my blood. I also traveled to China. The vibrancy of the people and the often bold and witty way in which they seek expression in fashion struck me as entirely encouraging.

It became perfectly clear to me that what I wanted as a designer was to express the Chinese sense of beauty in contemporary and international fashion language. It must be contemporary; I want not historical revival but development, to carry...the great Chinese tradition of art and costume truncated by traumatic events in China's recent history. It must be international, because only then can it enter the mainstream and have real impact. Above all it must have depth and meaning, and not just superficial borrowings here and there from folk or court art or theatre or whatever. It must be truly new.

I see this as my life's work. In the exploration of the Chinese sense of beauty, I have an inexhaustible source of infinite variety, from the floating lines of elegant Sung-style robes to the elaborate bejeweled and embroidered Q'ing artefacts. Then there is something religious or ceremonial in this beauty—in Buddhist statues, in a monk's habit—an austerity and tranquility that deeply appeals to me. In addition, there are China's traditional fabrics and craftsmanship, the numerous techniques of embroidery, tapestry, ornamentation which could be put to exciting new use and create a totally new look.

My artistic aim, the identity I have sought to express, are all bound up with the history and the unique society of Hong Kong, and with its future. As Hong Kong's link with China grows in the coming years, I see my work growing with a strong sense of direction and inner purpose.

—Ragence Lam

* * *

In his native Hong Kong, Ragence Lam has been referred to as the Little Giant. He is one of the few local designers to have achieved an international reputation, and it is well deserved. For two decades, Lam has been developing his own lines and helping to promote the status of his fellow designers.

Lam's interest in fashion began as a child, but he never seriously considered it as a career. He became a fashion student at Harrow School of Art and the Royal College of Art, having never studied art. He went to London originally to study law, but became bored. At the Royal College of Art, his talent developed quickly and led to him winning a number of student competitions. After graduating he spent a short time in Milan, designing for Fiorucci, before setting up his own label in London and then in Hong Kong.

During the 1980s Lam evolved a look characterized by well-defined shapes and cut that revealed his passion for structure and three-dimensional forms. He highlighted his collections with quality fabrics, often from Italy or Japan, to provide an individual look. Frequently he experimented with unusual materials to create unique statements; he was never afraid of being experimental, even outrageous. Pure commercialism was not his goal, though, he was much more a provider of ideas. Lam became known, and loved by the press, as an innovator.

Toward the end of the 1980s, Lam began to change direction. The look became more minimal, with fewer dramatic details. The clothes were simpler but more versatile; customers appreciated the opportunity to be able to dress them up or down. He was moving away from the avant-garde to create something more stylish and lasting. For autumn-winter 1989–90, he featured knots and ties on simple silhouettes, interpreted in wool, Lycra, and jersey, using a subtle palette of textures and patterns. In the same collection, he created eveningwear and cocktail dresses in taffeta and lace. His designs have sold in Europe, Southeast Asia, and Japan. For a time, his collections, including both womenswear and menswear, were available in his own exclusive boutique in Hong Kong.

A testament to his achievement came in 1989 when he was invited to contribute to an international symposium as part of the World Fashion Fair in Japan. He formed part of a prestigious panel that included Issey Miyake, Sybilla, and Romeo Gigli. Lam has also acted as a consultant to fashion design education in Hong Kong. As a founder and one-time chairman of the Hong Kong Fashion Designers Association, he has helped to support and encourage young designers. He is not, however, a natural committee person; designing is his major interest and motivation.

At the beginning of the 1990s, Lam underwent a period of reassessment. Original though his work was, it did not provide the means of self-expression that he found he was seeking. To try and establish his fundamental identity, he began to examine his Chinese roots. He found a genuine affinity for Chinese art and culture and wanted to reflect this in his own work and a totally new direction began to evolve. This was not a mere pastiche of Chinese traditional dress but a more fundamental attempt to carry the great traditions of Chinese art into the late 20th century. Lam hoped to create an international fashion look reflecting his own Chinese identity and was committed to achieving this goal.

In the 21st century Lam was one of a coterie of painters, dramatists, dancers, and designers who enhanced Hong Kong's emerging Asian spirit. According to Gao Minghu's "Inside Out," an essay for Chinese Type Online Magazine, Lam commented, "I am beginning to feel a sense of belonging. I don't really have any roots, but now that we see more of the mainland Chinese I feel a need to identify."

—Hazel Clark; updated by Mary Ellen Snodgrass

LANE, Kenneth Jay

American jewelry and accessories designer

Born: Detroit, Michigan, 22 April 1932. Education: Studied at the University of Michigan, 1950–52, and at Rhode Island School of Design, Providence, 1953–54. Family: Married Nicola Samuel Waymouth, 1975 (divorced, 1977). Career: Art staff member, Vogue (New York), 1954–55; assistant designer, Delman Shoes, New York, 1956–58; associate designer, Christian Dior Shoes, New York, 1958–63; founder/designer, Kenneth Jay Lane, New York, from 1963; Kenneth Jay Lane shops located in the U.S., UK, France, and Austria. Awards: Coty American Fashion Critics special award, 1966; Tobé Coburn award, 1966; Harper's Bazaar International award, 1967; Maremodo di Capri-Tiberio d'Oro award, 1967; Neiman Marcus award, 1968; Swarovski award, 1969; Brides Magazine award, 1990. Address: 20 West 37th Street, New York, NY 10018, USA.

PUBLICATIONS

By LANE:

Books

Faking It, with Harrice Simons Miller, photographs by John Bigelow Taylor, New York, 1996.

On LANE:

Books

Bender, Marylin, The Beautiful People, New York, 1967.
Morris, Bernadine, and Barbara Walz, The Fashion Makers, New York, 1978.

Shields, Jody, All That Glitters, New York, 1987.
Becker, Vivienne, Fabulous Fakes, London, 1988.
Ball, Joanne Dubbs, Costume Jewelry: The Golden Age of Design, Schiffer, PA, 1990.

Stegemeyer, Anne, Who's Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.

Articles

- Lynden, Patricia, "Kenneth Jay Lane: Faking It with Style," in Northwestern, November 1986.
Lane, Jane F., "Ballad of Kenny Lane," in W, August 1987.
Mehta, Gita, "The Fast Lane at Home," in Vanity Fair, November 1988.
Hawkins, Timothy, "Excellent Adventure," in Egg, March 1991.
Rubin, Robert H., "Kenneth Jay Lane," in Night, March 1991.

* * *

In his native Hong Kong, Ragence Lam has been referred to as the Little Giant. He is one of the few local designers to have achieved an international reputation, and it is well deserved. For two decades, Lam has been developing his own lines and helping to promote the status of his fellow designers.

Lam's interest in fashion began as a child, but he never seriously considered it as a career. He became a fashion student at Harrow School of Art and the Royal College of Art, having never studied art. He went to London originally to study law, but became bored. At the Royal College of Art, his talent developed quickly and led to him winning a number of student competitions. After graduating he spent a short time in Milan, designing for Fiorucci, before setting up his own label in London and then in Hong Kong.

During the 1980s Lam evolved a look characterized by well-defined shapes and cut that revealed his passion for structure and three-dimensional forms. He highlighted his collections with quality fabrics, often from Italy or Japan, to provide an individual look. Frequently he experimented with unusual materials to create unique statements; he was never afraid of being experimental, even outrageous. Pure commercialism was not his goal, though, he was much more a provider of ideas. Lam became known, and loved by the press, as an innovator.

Toward the end of the 1980s, Lam began to change direction. The look became more minimal, with fewer dramatic details. The clothes were simpler but more versatile; customers appreciated the opportunity to be able to dress them up or down. He was moving away from the avant-garde to create something more stylish and lasting. For autumn-winter 1989–90, he featured knots and ties on simple silhouettes, interpreted in wool, Lycra, and jersey, using a subtle palette of textures and patterns. In the same collection, he created eveningwear and cocktail dresses in taffeta and lace. His designs have sold in Europe, Southeast Asia, and Japan. For a time, his collections, including both womenswear and menswear, were available in his own exclusive boutique in Hong Kong.

A testament to his achievement came in 1989 when he was invited to contribute to an international symposium as part of the World Fashion Fair in Japan. He formed part of a prestigious panel that included Issey Miyake, Sybilla, and Romeo Gigli. Lam has also acted as a consultant to fashion design education in Hong Kong. As a founder and one-time chairman of the Hong Kong Fashion Designers Association, he has helped to support and encourage young designers. He is not, however, a natural committee person; designing is his major interest and motivation.

At the beginning of the 1990s, Lam underwent a period of reassessment. Original though his work was, it did not provide the means of self-expression that he found he was seeking. To try and establish his fundamental identity, he began to examine his Chinese roots. He found a genuine affinity for Chinese art and culture and wanted to reflect this in his own work and a totally new direction began to evolve. This was not a mere pastiche of Chinese traditional dress but a more fundamental attempt to carry the great traditions of Chinese art into the late 20th century. Lam hoped to create an international fashion look reflecting his own Chinese identity and was committed to achieving this goal.

In the 21st century Lam was one of a coterie of painters, dramatists, dancers, and designers who enhanced Hong Kong's emerging Asian spirit. According to Gao Minghu's "Inside Out," an essay for Chinese Type Online Magazine, Lam commented, "I am beginning to feel a sense of belonging. I don't really have any roots, but now that we see more of the mainland Chinese I feel a need to identify."

—Hazel Clark; updated by Mary Ellen Snodgrass

LANE, Kenneth Jay

American jewelry and accessories designer

Born: Detroit, Michigan, 22 April 1932. Education: Studied at the University of Michigan, 1950–52, and at Rhode Island School of Design, Providence, 1953–54. Family: Married Nicola Samuel Waymouth, 1975 (divorced, 1977). Career: Art staff member, Vogue (New York), 1954–55; assistant designer, Delman Shoes, New York, 1956–58; associate designer, Christian Dior Shoes, New York, 1958–63; founder/designer, Kenneth Jay Lane, New York, from 1963; Kenneth Jay Lane shops located in the U.S., UK, France, and Austria. Awards: Coty American Fashion Critics special award, 1966; Tobé Coburn award, 1966; Harper's Bazaar International award, 1967; Maremodo di Capri-Tiberio d'Oro award, 1967; Neiman Marcus award, 1968; Swarovski award, 1969; Brides Magazine award, 1990. Address: 20 West 37th Street, New York, NY 10018, USA.

PUBLICATIONS

By LANE:

Books

Faking It, with Harrice Simons Miller, photographs by John Bigelow Taylor, New York, 1996.

On LANE:

Books

Bender, Marylin, The Beautiful People, New York, 1967.
Morris, Bernadine, and Barbara Walz, The Fashion Makers, New York, 1978.

Shields, Jody, All That Glitters, New York, 1987.
Becker, Vivienne, Fabulous Fakes, London, 1988.
Ball, Joanne Dubbs, Costume Jewelry: The Golden Age of Design, Schiffer, PA, 1990.

Stegemeyer, Anne, Who's Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.

Articles

Lynden, Patricia, "Kenneth Jay Lane: Faking It with Style," in Northwestern, November 1986.

Lane, Jane F., "Ballad of Kenny Lane," in W, August 1987.
Mehta, Gita, "The Fast Lane at Home," in Vanity Fair, November 1988.

Hawkins, Timothy, "Excellent Adventure," in Egg, March 1991.
Rubin, Robert H., "Kenneth Jay Lane," in Night, March 1991.

- Shaw, Daniel, "Confessions of an Extra Man," in Avenue (New York), November 1991.
- Nemy, Enid, "The King of Junque," in the New York Times, 27 June 1993.
- Espen, Hal, "Portrait of a Dress," in the New Yorker, 7 November 1994.
- Spindler, Amy M., "A Mature Mugler, Demeulemeester and Lang," in the New York Times, 18 March 1995.
- Menkes, Suzy, "On the Road with Kenny Lane Jewels," in the International Herald Tribune, 10 June 1997.
- Doran, Pat, "Kenneth Jay Lane at the Museum at FIT," in Fashion Planet, September 1998.
- Menkes, Suzy, "Kenny Lane, Unreserved," in the International Herald Tribune, 3 April 2001.

* * *

Acclaimed by Time magazine as "the undisputed King of Costume jewelry" and called "one of the three great costume jewelers of the 20th century" by Women's Wear Daily, Kenneth Jay Lane transformed a previously undistinguished field into the height of fashion. "I believe that every woman has the right to be glamorous and have always believed that a woman can be just as glamorous in costume jewelry as million-dollar bangles and beads," Lane has said. "Style has little to do with money and expensive possessions; attitude and flair make all the difference."

Born in Detroit, Michigan, Lane attended the University of Michigan for two years, then went east to earn a degree in advertising design from the Rhode Island School of Design. After a brief stint in the art department at Vogue in New York, he went on to become the fashion coordinator at Delman Shoes, New York. Later, while working as an associate designer for Christian Dior Shoes, he spent part of each summer in Paris under the tutelage of the preeminent French shoe designer, Roger Vivier. He also designed a shoe collection for Arnold Scaasi in New York. In 1963 while adorning shoes with rhinestones and jeweled ornaments, he began to experiment with making jewelry.

"A whole new group of beautiful people began to exist," Lane said. "They started dressing up and costume jewelry was rather dull. I believed it didn't have to be." The thought that fake jewelry could be as beautiful as the real thing grew on Lane. He bought some plastic bangles at the dime store, covered them with rhinestones, crystals, leopard and zebra patterns and stripes, and a new era in costume jewelry was born.

In 1963, while still designing shoes, he worked nights and weekends creating jewelry. "I started moonlighting jewelry," he said. Since he was being paid by Genesco, Delman's parent firm, to design shoes, "I thought it would be in better taste to use my own initials and not my name for jewelry." His work was enthusiastically received, written about, and photographed by the fashion magazines. Neiman Marcus in Dallas and Bonwit Teller in New York placed orders for rhinestone earrings. Within a year, his jewelry was bringing in $2,000 a month wholesale and by June 1964 sales had risen to $10,000 a month wholesale. His part-time jewelry business became a full-time career. In 1969 Kenneth Jay Lane Inc. became part of Kenton Corporation, an organization that includes Cartier, Valentino, Mark Cross, and other well-known names in fashion. Lane repurchased the company in 1972.

Lane considers himself a fine jeweler and eschews the traditional methods of making costume jewelry. First, he fabricates his designs in wax by carving or twisting the metal. He often sets the designs with opulent stones highlighted by their cut and rich colors. Many of these stones, particularly the larger ones, he has created for himself. "I want to make real jewelry with not-real materials," he noted. He sees plastic as the modern medium: lightweight, available in every color, and perfect for simulating real gems. He likes to see his jewelry intermixed with the real gems worn by his international roster of celebrity customers. Lane is proud of the fidelity of his reproductions and claims some of his "faque" stones look better than the real ones.

"I work in less commercial ways than most manufacturers of costume jewelry," says Lane. He is realistic about the source of his designs. "My designs are all original—original from someone," he said. "There are original ideas, but a lot of good designing is editorial, choosing what is available idea-wise and applying these ideas practically. I think it's called 'having the eye'. It isn't necessarily reinventing the wheel."

Lane is as much a showman as a talented designer. In addition to receiving numerous fashion awards, his jewelry was regularly featured on several soap operas, including Another World, Guiding Light, and Days of Our Lives. He has also created jewelry for the Costume Institute exhibitions at the Metropolitan Museum of Art in New York.

In addition to being a fixture on the social circuit, Lane is frequently named on the International Best Dressed Men's List. "All you need is one person and you can meet the world," he said. Dinner partner and friend to some of the world's most fashionable women, his clients have included Jacqueline Kennedy Onassis, Princess Margaret, the Duchess of Windsor, Elizabeth Taylor, Audrey Hepburn, Nancy Reagan, Joan Collins, Babe Paley, Brooke Astor, and Lee Radziwill Ross. Former First Lady Barbara Bush wore his "pearls" to her husband's inauguration, and the triple-strand became an integral part of her signature style. He sent his $21 saxophone pin to another former First Lady, Hillary Rodham Clinton.

In 1993 Lane celebrated his 30th anniversary in business. The New York Times called him "the man who made costume jewelry chic and, more important to his bank account, readily available to what is loosely referred to as the masses. Chanel had done it earlier, but to a more affluent clientèle" (27 June 1993). Additionally, Lane is wildly popular on QVC, the cable television home-shopping network. In 1997 Lane took in about $1.5 million during each four-hour, bimonthly appearance.

Through his designing and socializing, Lane has achieved a level of fame comparable to the women he adorns. Faking It is Lane's 1996 memoir of his 30-plus years as faux jewelry master. Written with Harrice Simons Miller, the book is full of Lane's recollections of his many adventures and friendships with society women. The book includes photographs by John Bigelow Taylor. Lane followed the launch of the book with a European road show, celebrating with hundreds of fans in Rome, Madrid, London, and Paris.

Suzy Menkes asked Lane why he never made the switch to real jewels. He cited security, recalling the famous mock-up necklace he created for Jackie Kennedy Onassis so she could leave the original in the safe. With priceless gems, "You don't have the freedom," he told Menkes. "And I'm too lazy to pick up an emerald if it falls on the floor!"

Further proof of Lane's lasting influence on the fashion world came in 1998 when the Museum at New York's Fashion Institute of Technology (FIT) presented an exhibition of the Lane collection, showcasing everything from his 1960s pieces to recent designs. The FIT museum contains the world's largest collection of costumes, textiles, and accessories.

—Janet Markarian; updated by Lisa Groshong

LANG, Helmut

Austrian designer

Born: Vienna, Austria, 10 March 1956. Career: Grew up in Austrian Alps and Vienna; became acquainted with Viennese art scene; established own fashion studio in Vienna, 1977; opened made-to-measure shop in Vienna, 1979; developed ready-to-wear collections, 1984–86; presented Helmut Lang womenswear, 1986, and Helmut Lang menswear, 1987, as part of Paris Fashion Week; established license business, 1988; moved several times between Paris and Vienna, 1988–93; professor of Fashion Masterclass, University of Helmut Lang, spring 2001 collection. © AP/Wide World Photos.

Applied Arts, Vienna, from 1993; other lines include underwear, 1994, eyewear, 1995, and jeans, 1997; sold 51-percent stake of company to Prada, 1999; introduced first fragrance, Helmut Lang, and Helmut Lang Parfums flagship store, 2000; launched bath and body lines, 2001. Collections: Museum of Applied Arts, Vienna. Exhibitions: "Vienne 1880–1939: L'Apocalypse Joyeuse," at the Pompidou, Vienna, 1986. Awards: New York Magazine New York award, 1998; CFDA's Menswear Designer of the Year, 2000. Addresses: Press Office, c/o Michele Montagne, 184 rue St. Maur, F-75010 Paris, France; Helmut Lang New York, 80 Greene Street, New York, NY 10012, USA. Website: www.helmutlang.com.

PUBLICATIONS

On LANG:

Articles

- Cressole, Michel, "Une Lancinante Variation En Jersey Zippé," in Liberation (Paris), 24 March 1986.
- Kaupp, Katia D., "Une Manif Pour Helmut Lang," in Le Nouvel Observateur (Paris), 29 March 1990.
- Blumenberg, H. C., "Der Retter des Einfachen," in Zeit Magazin (Hamburg), 1 March 1991.
- Tredre, Roger, "The Maker's Culture: The Wearer's Imprint," in the Independent (London), 9 September 1993.
- Mair, Avril, "Designs of the Times," in i-D (London), December 1993.
- Mower, Sarah, "Brilliant," in Harper's Bazaar, February 1994.
- Spindler, Amy M., "Lang Points the Way to a New Elegance," in the New York Times, 7 March 1994.
- Brampton, Sally, "Langevity," in the Guardian (London), 20 August 1994.
- Watson, Shane, "Cool Hand Lang," in Elle (London), September 1994.
- Espen, Hal, "Portrait of a Dress," in the New Yorker, 7 November 1994.
- Spindler, Amy M., "A Mature Mugler, Demeulemeester, and Lang," in the New York Times, 18 March 1995.
- Teller, Jeurgen, "Langfroid," in ArtForum International, October 1995.
- Hirschberg, Lynn, "The Little Rubber Dress, Among Others: The Fashion Desgins of Helmut Lang," in the New York Times Magazine, 2 February 1997.
- "Helmut Lang," in Current Biography, April 1997.
- Spindler, Amy M., "Three With the Touch to Inherit the Crown," in the New York Times, 18 October 1997.
- Kaplan, James, "A New Yorker by Design: Helmut Lang...," in New York, 27 July 1998.
- Horyn, Cathy, "New Wrinkles at Lang and Sui," in the New York Times, 11 February 2000.
- Seabrook, John, "The Invisible Designer: Helmut Lang," in the New Yorker, 18 September 2000.
- "A Delicate Balance: It's a Balancing Act," in WWD, 16 February 2001.
- "Helmut Lang Creates First Body Line," in Cosmetics International, April 2001.

Technology (FIT) presented an exhibition of the Lane collection, showcasing everything from his 1960s pieces to recent designs. The FIT museum contains the world's largest collection of costumes, textiles, and accessories.

—Janet Markarian; updated by Lisa Groshong

LANG, Helmut

Austrian designer

Born: Vienna, Austria, 10 March 1956. Career: Grew up in Austrian Alps and Vienna; became acquainted with Viennese art scene; established own fashion studio in Vienna, 1977; opened made-to-measure shop in Vienna, 1979; developed ready-to-wear collections, 1984–86; presented Helmut Lang womenswear, 1986, and Helmut Lang menswear, 1987, as part of Paris Fashion Week; established license business, 1988; moved several times between Paris and Vienna, 1988–93; professor of Fashion Masterclass, University of Helmut Lang, spring 2001 collection. © AP/Wide World Photos.

Applied Arts, Vienna, from 1993; other lines include underwear, 1994, eyewear, 1995, and jeans, 1997; sold 51-percent stake of company to Prada, 1999; introduced first fragrance, Helmut Lang, and Helmut Lang Parfums flagship store, 2000; launched bath and body lines, 2001. Collections: Museum of Applied Arts, Vienna. Exhibitions: "Vienne 1880–1939: L'Apocalypse Joyeuse," at the Pompidou, Vienna, 1986. Awards: New York Magazine New York award, 1998; CFDA's Menswear Designer of the Year, 2000. Addresses: Press Office, c/o Michele Montagne, 184 rue St. Maur, F-75010 Paris, France; Helmut Lang New York, 80 Greene Street, New York, NY 10012, USA. Website: www.helmutlang.com.

PUBLICATIONS

On LANG:

Articles

- Cressole, Michel, "Une Lancinante Variation En Jersey Zippé," in Liberation (Paris), 24 March 1986.
- Kaupp, Katia D., "Une Manif Pour Helmut Lang," in Le Nouvel Observateur (Paris), 29 March 1990.
- Blumenberg, H. C., "Der Retter des Einfachen," in Zeit Magazin (Hamburg), 1 March 1991.
- Tredre, Roger, "The Maker's Culture: The Wearer's Imprint," in the Independent (London), 9 September 1993.
- Mair, Avril, "Designs of the Times," in i-D (London), December 1993.
- Mower, Sarah, "Brilliant," in Harper's Bazaar, February 1994.
- Spindler, Amy M., "Lang Points the Way to a New Elegance," in the New York Times, 7 March 1994.
- Brampton, Sally, "Langevity," in the Guardian (London), 20 August 1994.
- Watson, Shane, "Cool Hand Lang," in Elle (London), September 1994.
- Espen, Hal, "Portrait of a Dress," in the New Yorker, 7 November 1994.
- Spindler, Amy M., "A Mature Mugler, Demeulemeester, and Lang," in the New York Times, 18 March 1995.
- Teller, Jeurgen, "Langfroid," in ArtForum International, October 1995.
- Hirschberg, Lynn, "The Little Rubber Dress, Among Others: The Fashion Desgins of Helmut Lang," in the New York Times Magazine, 2 February 1997.
- "Helmut Lang," in Current Biography, April 1997.
- Spindler, Amy M., "Three With the Touch to Inherit the Crown," in the New York Times, 18 October 1997.
- Kaplan, James, "A New Yorker by Design: Helmut Lang...," in New York, 27 July 1998.
- Horyn, Cathy, "New Wrinkles at Lang and Sui," in the New York Times, 11 February 2000.
- Seabrook, John, "The Invisible Designer: Helmut Lang," in the New Yorker, 18 September 2000.
- "A Delicate Balance: It's a Balancing Act," in WWD, 16 February 2001.
- "Helmut Lang Creates First Body Line," in Cosmetics International, April 2001.

Deeny, Godfrey, "Helmut Lang: The Spark of a New Look," available online at Fashion Windows, www.fashionwindows.com. "Interview with Helmut Lang," online at www.ocf.berkeley.edu.

*

At a moment of conflicting demands, people want modernity and identity, street style and savviness. Fashion now is fast, downbeat, and relentlessly urban. Because of that, I have been developing a particular vision, what I call a nonreferential view of fashion. It is all about today. It has to do with my personality, with my life, and with the idea that quality doesn't go out of style every six months.

Working effectively with fashion means adding pieces to a continuing story, evolving fluently year after year. The basis of really effortless style is found in minimal exaggeration. A perfect economy of cut and exacting attention to finish is sometimes lost to the careless eye, which gives it precisely the sort of anonymous status that the truly knowing admire. If you have to ask, you don't get it, in either sense. Downbeat elegance is founded in precise proportions and clean tailoring; balancing hi-tech fabrics with real clothing. The result is fashion put into a different context to become something known, unknown.

Helmut Lang, fall/winter 2001 collection. © Reuters NewMedia Inc./CORBIS.

—Helmut Lang

* * *

An attenuated, urban aesthetic, embodied by subtle mixes of luxury fabrics and post-punk synthetics, dominates Helmut Lang's confident designs. Both his menswear and womenswear are uncompromisingly modern: stark minimalist pieces in somber city shades are combined with harsh metallics and slippery transparent layers, questioning the restrictions of traditional tailored clothing.

Although Lang's work is avant-garde, he is not afraid to use sharply cut suiting, or have a punklike disregard for accepted fabric use, as cigarette trousers and three-buttoned jackets come in shiny PVC with clingy net t-shirts worn underneath. He enjoys the surprise of such cheap fabrics being lent a certain chic through their combination with their more luxurious counterparts, and often backs silk with nylon to give a liquid, shifting opacity to column dresses and spaghetti-strapped slips.

For all the deconstructed glamor of his clothes, they remain essentially understated, drawing their interest from the layering of opaques and transparencies in sinuous strong lines, rather than unnecessary details that might dull their impact. Even the sexuality of his figure-hugging womenswear is tempered by a nonchalance and apparent disregard for the impact the clothes have. This parallels the growing sense of independence and confidence of women over the years Lang has been designing.

If his stylistic reference points originated touching the past, then his distillation of them is always utterly contemporary. In line with and often ahead of current trends, he honed his skills during the 1980s, contradicting the decade's often overblown characteristics and charming first the Parisian, then the international fashion scene, which was impressed by the modernity of his work. He remains a hero of the cognoscenti, influencing mainstream fashion.

The simplicity of the cut of a Lang garment is deceptive. The slim mannish-shaped trousers he favors for women may be timeless enough, but the surprise of rendering them in hot red stretch synthetic in 1992 and creating an urban warrior look with halter top and boned breastplate meant they appealed to the stylishly unconventional, who were not afraid to slip from day to night, informal to formal, disregarding the normal restrictions of what is appropriate to wear.

Lang's emphasis on the importance of innovative textiles is as prevalent in his menswear. He has been at the forefront of a shift in this area, which has gathered momentum during the 1990s. He has pushed for a crossover of fabrics from womenswear and a narrower line, shown in 19th-century cut, three-piece single-breasted suits, more attuned to the times than the big triangular silhouette of the 1980s. His deconstructed close-fit tops with visible seaming and layered angora tank tops over untucked shirts increased his popularity as fashion became tired of its own overpowering dogma in the early 1990s.

Lang's work continues to maintain a high profile in fashion magazines and the industry. The deceptive simplicity of his clothes, complicated by his constant comparisons of clear and opaque, matte and shiny, silky-smooth and plastic-hard, carried him successfully into the 1990s and enabled him to be part of a movement in fashion toward a redefinition of glamor and beauty in the early 2000s. For the 21st century, calling for a “new sensibility,” Lang began to use classical natural fabrics such as satin and tweed while continuing with his characteristic shapes but changing his fabrics—such as rubberized lace replaced by real lace. Not wanting to confuse a subtle touch with sheer softness, Lang admitted that his change in fabric choice has something to do with romance and love, with “not being afraid, being able to live these different needs and different moods.”

Not only did Lang shock the fashion world with his change of aesthetic, but he also moved up his spring 2000 show from November to September 1999, the same month he sold a 51-percent stake in his design firm to Prada. In essence, Lang continues to remain predictably cutting edge; he searches for hidden harmony and poetry in the multifarious, often dissonant, realms of everyday experience. Although still striving to merge and reconcile hard and fluid textures, he is now using cashmere, silk, and satin.

In 2000 and 2001 Lang ventured into fragrance and skincare products for both men (cologne, deodorant, shower gel, aftershave) and women (perfume, shower gel, body lotion). An eponymous fragrance was released in the fall of 2000, which coincided with the opening of a flagship perfumery, Helmut Lang Parfums, in New York City. After Helmut Lang came a complementary fragrance, Velvonia, which can be worn separately or along with other Lang body products. Helmut Lang fragrances and skincare products are available at Lang Parfumeries in Munich, Vienna, Hong Kong, and New York, as well as in high-end department stores worldwide.

—Rebecca Arnold; updated by Christine Miner Minderovic

Lanvin, fall/winter 2001–02 ready-to-wear collection designed by Cristina Ortiz. © AP/Wide World Photos.

LANVIN

French fashion house

Founded: in Paris in 1890 by Jeanne Lanvin (1867–1946). Company History:

Began with offering custom children’s clothing; offered women’s clothing, 1909, introduced first fragrances, 1925; men’s clothing, women’s sportswear, furs, and accessories, from 1926; upon Lanvin’s death, daughter Marie-Blanche de Polignac took reins of company, 1946–58; launched women’s ready-to-wear, 1982; Jeanne Lanvin S.A. purchased by Orcofi and L’Oreal, 1989; couture collections discontinued, 1992; introduced bath and body lines, Ligne Deliceuse, 1994; designers have included Antonio del Castillo (1950–62), Jules-François Crahay (1963–85), Maryll Lanvin (from 1982), Claude Montana (1990), Dominique Morlotti (from 1992), Ocimar Versolato (1996–98), Cristina Ortiz, (from 1998); sold by L’Oreal to Harmonie SA, 2001; fragrances include My Sin, 1925, Arpège, 1927 (reintroduced 1994), Scandal, 1931, Runeur, 1934, Pretexts, 1937, Crescendo, 1960, L’Homme, 1997, Oxygene, 2001.

Exhibitions: Paris Couture—Années Trente, Musée de la Mode et du Costume, Palais Galliera, Paris. Collections: Victoria & Albert Museum, London; Fashion Institute of Technology, New York; Costume Institute of the Metropolitan Museum of Art, New York; Musée de la Mode et du Costume, Paris; Musée des Arts de la Mode, Paris. Awards: Jeanne Lanvin: Chevalier de la Légion d’Honneur, 1926; Officier de la Légion d’Honneur, 1938. Company Address: 15 rue du Faubourg St.-Honoré, 75008 Paris, France.

PUBLICATIONS

On LANVIN:

Books

- Bourdet, Denise, Art et Style: Les Fées, Paris, 1946.
- Bertin, Celia, Paris à la mode, London, 1956.
- Pickens, Mary Brooks, and Dora Loues Miller, Dressmakers of France, New York, 1956.
- Contini, Mila, Fashion From Ancient Egypt to the Present Day, Milan, New York, 1965.
- Lynam, Ruth, Couture, Garden City, New York, 1972.
- Milbank, Caroline Rennolds, Couture: The Great Designers, New York, 1985.
- Garnier, Guillaume, Paris Couture—Années Trente [exhibition catalogue], Paris, 1987.
- Martin, Richard, and Harold Koda, The Historical Mode: Fashion and Art in the 1980s, New York, 1989.

into the 1990s and enabled him to be part of a movement in fashion toward a redefinition of glamor and beauty in the early 2000s. For the 21st century, calling for a “new sensibility,” Lang began to use classical natural fabrics such as satin and tweed while continuing with his characteristic shapes but changing his fabrics—such as rubberized lace replaced by real lace. Not wanting to confuse a subtle touch with sheer softness, Lang admitted that his change in fabric choice has something to do with romance and love, with “not being afraid, being able to live these different needs and different moods.”

Not only did Lang shock the fashion world with his change of aesthetic, but he also moved up his spring 2000 show from November to September 1999, the same month he sold a 51-percent stake in his design firm to Prada. In essence, Lang continues to remain predictably cutting edge; he searches for hidden harmony and poetry in the multifarious, often dissonant, realms of everyday experience. Although still striving to merge and reconcile hard and fluid textures, he is now using cashmere, silk, and satin.

In 2000 and 2001 Lang ventured into fragrance and skincare products for both men (cologne, deodorant, shower gel, aftershave) and women (perfume, shower gel, body lotion). An eponymous fragrance was released in the fall of 2000, which coincided with the opening of a flagship perfumery, Helmut Lang Parfums, in New York City. After Helmut Lang came a complementary fragrance, Velvonia, which can be worn separately or along with other Lang body products. Helmut Lang fragrances and skincare products are available at Lang Parfumeries in Munich, Vienna, Hong Kong, and New York, as well as in high-end department stores worldwide.

—Rebecca Arnold; updated by Christine Miner Minderovic

Lanvin, fall/winter 2001–02 ready-to-wear collection designed by Cristina Ortiz. © AP/Wide World Photos.

LANVIN

French fashion house

Founded: in Paris in 1890 by Jeanne Lanvin (1867–1946). Company History:

Began with offering custom children’s clothing; offered women’s clothing, 1909, introduced first fragrances, 1925; men’s clothing, women’s sportswear, furs, and accessories, from 1926; upon Lanvin’s death, daughter Marie-Blanche de Polignac took reins of company, 1946–58; launched women’s ready-to-wear, 1982; Jeanne Lanvin S.A. purchased by Orcofi and L’Oreal, 1989; couture collections discontinued, 1992; introduced bath and body lines, Ligne Deliceuse, 1994; designers have included Antonio del Castillo (1950–62), Jules-François Crahay (1963–85), Maryll Lanvin (from 1982), Claude Montana (1990), Dominique Morlotti (from 1992), Ocimar Versolato (1996–98), Cristina Ortiz, (from 1998); sold by L’Oreal to Harmonie SA, 2001; fragrances include My Sin, 1925, Arpège, 1927 (reintroduced 1994), Scandal, 1931, Runeur, 1934, Pretexts, 1937, Crescendo, 1960, L’Homme, 1997, Oxygene, 2001.

Exhibitions: Paris Couture—Années Trente, Musée de la Mode et du Costume, Palais Galliera, Paris. Collections: Victoria & Albert Museum, London; Fashion Institute of Technology, New York; Costume Institute of the Metropolitan Museum of Art, New York; Musée de la Mode et du Costume, Paris; Musée des Arts de la Mode, Paris. Awards: Jeanne Lanvin: Chevalier de la Légion d’Honneur, 1926; Officier de la Légion d’Honneur, 1938. Company Address: 15 rue du Faubourg St.-Honoré, 75008 Paris, France.

PUBLICATIONS

On LANVIN:

Books

- Bourdet, Denise, Art et Style: Les Fées, Paris, 1946.
- Bertin, Celia, Paris à la mode, London, 1956.
- Pickens, Mary Brooks, and Dora Loues Miller, Dressmakers of France, New York, 1956.
- Contini, Mila, Fashion From Ancient Egypt to the Present Day, Milan, New York, 1965.
- Lynam, Ruth, Couture, Garden City, New York, 1972.
- Milbank, Caroline Rennolds, Couture: The Great Designers, New York, 1985.
- Garnier, Guillaume, Paris Couture—Années Trente [exhibition catalogue], Paris, 1987.
- Martin, Richard, and Harold Koda, The Historical Mode: Fashion and Art in the 1980s, New York, 1989.

Lanvin, spring/summer 1968 collection: "Charade," a shantung shirt under a waistcoat decorated with multi-colored beads and striped silk evening pants. © AP/Wide World Photos.

Stegemeyer, Anne, Who's Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.

Articles

"Living in Heavenly Blue Blow-Up Space in Paris," in Vogue (London), February 1969.

Toll, Marie-Pierre, "Where Beauty is Not a Luxury," in House & Garden, September 1984.

Bernier, O., "Art Deco Rooms at the Musée des Arts," in Magazine Antiques, October 1987.

Aillaud, C., "A Lanvin Legacy," in Architectural Digest, September 1988.

Penn, I., and C.C. de Dudzeele, "Rock 'n' Royalty," in Vogue, October 1990.

Johnson, E.W., and I. Hammond, "Cocktail Craze," in Ebony, January 1991.

Morris, B., "Saint Laurent Finds Beauty in a Perfect Cut," in the New York Times, 30 January 1992.

- James, Laurie, "The State of Montana," in Harper's Bazaar, October 1992.
- Deeny, Godfrey, "Lanvin Realigns Flagship to Include HQ and Staff," in DNR, 20 September 1993.
- D'Aulnay, Sophie, "Their Man Armand," in DNR, 31 March 1994.
- _____, "Lanvin: There is a Doctor in the House," in DNR, 16 May 1994.
- Testino, Mario, "The Skimp," in Harper's Bazaar, June 1994.
- Larenaudie, Sarah R., "Asaria Gets Top Post at Lanvin," in DNR, 14 December 1994.
- D'Aulnay, Sophie, "The Plan for Lanvin," in DNR, 13 February 1995.
- _____, "Men's Furnishings," in DNR, 21 April 1995.
- Ehlert, Athena, "Arpège—The Gift of a Gifted Mother," in Victoria, May 1995.
- Hoppe, Karen, "The Last Word," in DCI, November 1995.
- White, Constance C.R., "Beautiful Flight or Dizzy Free Fall," in Fashion, March 1996.
- _____, "Patterns," in the New York Times, 14 October 1997.
- Lennon, Christine, "Under the Influence," in Harper's Bazaar, December 1997.
- Place, Jennifer, "1998 New Fragrance," in Soap & Cosmetics Specialties, March 1998.
- Duncan, David Ewing, and Mark Connolly, "Something Old, Something New," in Condé Nast Traveler, March 1999.
- Shea, Christine, "Fresh Air," in Harper's Bazaar, February 2001.

* * *

The youthful look identified with Lanvin came from Jeanne Lanvin's earliest couture, children's dresses; the many decorations were inspired by a trip to Spain during her childhood. The memory of the play on shadows and light would influence her choice of embroidery, such as multineedle sewing machine stitching and quilting. She had three embroidery ateliers. Beading and appliquéd were also applied. With dyes she ombréed textiles. She had her own dye works—Lanvin Blue, inspired by stained glass was developed there. These decorations were applied to all categories, including millinery, couture, menswear, and accessories.

Lanvin did not drape or sketch but gave verbal instructions to the sketchers. Approved drawings were sent to ateliers for execution. Although Art Déco-style embroideries continued well into the 1930s, ideas came from all periods of art. She found inspiration everywhere—from her painting collection containing Vuillard, Renoir, Fantin-Latour, and Odilon Redon—as well as from books, fruit, gardens, museums, travel, and costume collections. She had her own costume archives dating from 1848 to 1925. Nothing was taken literally, but interpreted.

The chemise as women's dress was introduced in 1913. Her best known innovation, the robe de style, was an adaptation of the 18th-century pannier. Introduced in the 1920s, it was repeated in a variety of fabrics: silk taffeta, velvet, metallic lace with organdy, chiffon, and net. New models were presented for two decades. She showed tea gowns, dinner pajamas, dolman wraps, hooded capes, and Zouave bloomer skirts that were either youthful, classic, or romantic. Her clear colors were subtle and feminine: begonia, fuchsia, cerise, almond green, periwinkle blue, cornflower blue. Silver was combined with black or white. Adjusting to World War II, Lanvin created the split coat for bicycling and bright-colored felt gas mask cases. During the Liberation, she presented showings for American soldiers.

Lanvin, fall/winter 2001 ready-to-wear collection designed by Dominique Morlotti. © AFP/CORBIS.

In 1927 Lanvin created a fragrance for her only child, Countess Marie-Blanche de Polignac, an opera singer. A heady mix of honeysuckle, jasmine, and patchouli, Arpège became a sensation, with fans including Rita Hayworth and Princess Diana. Relaunched in 1994, it continues to this day to be a bestselling classic.

Jeanne Lanvin died in 1946; her daughter continued the business after her death. Designer Antonio del Castillo, arriving in 1950, attempted to adapt to the house image. His Spanish background influenced his choice of brighter colors, light and heavy combinations of fabrics, and more severe, sophisticated styles. His successor, Jules-François Crahay, arriving in 1963, returned to the collections the youthful quality that remains today. Other major designers who have worked for Lanvin include Ocimar Versolato, Dominique Morlotti, Alberto Morillas, and most recently, Cristina Ortiz.

In 1989 Orcofi and L’Oreal, in a joint venture, together purchased Lanvin, one of the world’s oldest fashion and fragrance houses. Over the years, L’Oreal—itself partially owned by Gesparal, which in turn was partly owned by Nestlé S.A.—slowly bought out Orcofi, and Lanvin became a part of the L’Oreal stable (until sold in 2001 to Harmonie SA), which includes such companies and brand names as Maybelline, Redken, Biotherm, Cacharel, Lancôme Paris, Le Club des Créatures de Beauté, and Vichy Labs.

In 2001 Lanvin introduced its 26th fragrance, called Oxygene, “the first,” according to Christophe Toumit, general director of Lanvin Parfums, “since Arpège to come to America.” So, more than half a century after her death, Jeanne Lanvin’s legacy continues to grow.

—Betty Kirke; updated by Daryl F. Mallett

LAROCHE, Guy

French designer

Born: La Rochelle, France, 16 July 1921. Career: Began working as a milliner, Paris; began working for Jean Dessès, became his assistant, 1949; traveled to the U.S. to study ready-to-wear manufacturing, 1955; established first Paris salon, 1956; opened Guy Laroche couture house and introduced ready-to-wear collection, Paris, 1961; created first fragrance, 1966; added menswear line, 1966; second boutique opened, 1973; launch of additional boutiques, in France and elsewhere, 1974; designed last collection, 1989. Fragrances include Fidji, 1966; Eau Folle, 1970; J’ai Osé, 1977; Drakkar, 1972; Drakkar Noir, 1982; Clandestine, 1986; fragrance division sold to L’Oréal, company sold to Société Bic. Awards: Macy’s outstanding creativity award, New York, 1959; Dé d’Or award, Paris, 1986, 1989; Chevalier de la Légion d’Honneur, 1987. Died: 17 February 1989, in Paris. Company Address: 29 Avenue Montaigne, Paris 75008, France. Company Website: www.guy-laroche.de.

PUBLICATIONS

On LAROCHE:

Books

Stegemeyer, Anne, Who’s Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.

Articles

Parinaud, A. editor, “La Haute Couture intéresse-t-elle les peintres,” in Galerie des Arts, March 1979.

“A chacon son Dé d’Or,” in Vogue (Paris), February 1986.

“Guy Laroche à Bordeaux: le style de l’élégance,” in Vogue (Paris), May 1987.

Obituary, “France’s Guy Laroche, Leading French Designer Dies,” in Chicago Tribune, 18 February 1989.

Obituary, in the Daily Telegraph (London), 18 February 1989.

Obituary, in The Independent (London), 18 February 1989.

“Couturier Guy Laroche Dead at 67,” in WWD, 21 February 1989.

“Un Dé d’Or au doigt de Guy Laroche,” in Vogue (Paris), March 1989.

Benaim, Laurence, “Une griffe demeure: Guy Laroche un grand couturier,” in Elle (Paris), 6 March 1989.

“Guy Laroche: l’album sur mesure,” in Vogue (Paris), April 1989.

Premoli, Francesca, “The Realm of Illusion,” in Casa Vogue (Milan), November 1989.

Beurdeley, Laurence, “Guy Laroche: l’esprit de la Renaissance,” in L’Officiel (Paris), August 1990.

Givhan, Robin, “Nothing New Under the Paris Sun: Even the Best Doesn’t Stand Out from the Rest,” in the Washington Post, 12 March 1999.

Lanvin, fall/winter 2001 ready-to-wear collection designed by Dominique Morlotti. © AFP/CORBIS.

In 1927 Lanvin created a fragrance for her only child, Countess Marie-Blanche de Polignac, an opera singer. A heady mix of honeysuckle, jasmine, and patchouli, Arpège became a sensation, with fans including Rita Hayworth and Princess Diana. Relaunched in 1994, it continues to this day to be a bestselling classic.

Jeanne Lanvin died in 1946; her daughter continued the business after her death. Designer Antonio del Castillo, arriving in 1950, attempted to adapt to the house image. His Spanish background influenced his choice of brighter colors, light and heavy combinations of fabrics, and more severe, sophisticated styles. His successor, Jules-François Crahay, arriving in 1963, returned to the collections the youthful quality that remains today. Other major designers who have worked for Lanvin include Ocimar Versolato, Dominique Morlotti, Alberto Morillas, and most recently, Cristina Ortiz.

In 1989 Orcofi and L'Oréal, in a joint venture, together purchased Lanvin, one of the world's oldest fashion and fragrance houses. Over the years, L'Oréal—itself partially owned by Gesparal, which in turn was partly owned by Nestlé S.A.—slowly bought out Orcofi, and Lanvin became a part of the L'Oréal stable (until sold in 2001 to Harmonie SA), which includes such companies and brand names as Maybelline, Redken, Biotherm, Cacharel, Lancôme Paris, Le Club des Créatures de Beauté, and Vichy Labs.

In 2001 Lanvin introduced its 26th fragrance, called Oxygene, "the first," according to Christophe Toumit, general director of Lanvin Parfums, "since Arpège to come to America." So, more than half a century after her death, Jeanne Lanvin's legacy continues to grow.

—Betty Kirke; updated by Daryl F. Mallett

LAROCHE, Guy

French designer

Born: La Rochelle, France, 16 July 1921. Career: Began working as a milliner, Paris; began working for Jean Dessès, became his assistant, 1949; traveled to the U.S. to study ready-to-wear manufacturing, 1955; established first Paris salon, 1956; opened Guy Laroche couture house and introduced ready-to-wear collection, Paris, 1961; created first fragrance, 1966; added menswear line, 1966; second boutique opened, 1973; launch of additional boutiques, in France and elsewhere, 1974; designed last collection, 1989. Fragrances include Fidji, 1966; Eau Folle, 1970; J'ai Osé, 1977; Drakkar, 1972; Drakkar Noir, 1982; Clandestine, 1986; fragrance division sold to L'Oréal, company sold to Société Bic. Awards: Macy's outstanding creativity award, New York, 1959; Dé d'Or award, Paris, 1986, 1989; Chevalier de la Légion d'Honneur, 1987. Died: 17 February 1989, in Paris. Company Address: 29 Avenue Montaigne, Paris 75008, France. Company Website: www.guy-laroche.de.

PUBLICATIONS

On LAROCHE:

Books

Stegemeyer, Anne, Who's Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.

Articles

Parinaud, A. editor, "La Haute Couture intéresse-t-elle les peintres," in Galerie des Arts, March 1979.

"A chacon son Dé d'Or," in Vogue (Paris), February 1986.

"Guy Laroche à Bordeaux: le style de l'élegance," in Vogue (Paris), May 1987.

Obituary, "France's Guy Laroche, Leading French Designer Dies," in Chicago Tribune, 18 February 1989.

Obituary, in the Daily Telegraph (London), 18 February 1989.

Obituary, in The Independent (London), 18 February 1989.

"Couturier Guy Laroche Dead at 67," in WWD, 21 February 1989.

"Un Dé d'Or au doigt de Guy Laroche," in Vogue (Paris), March 1989.

Benaim, Laurence, "Une griffe demeure: Guy Laroche un grand couturier," in Elle (Paris), 6 March 1989.

"Guy Laroche: l'album sur mesure," in Vogue (Paris), April 1989.

Premoli, Francesca, "The Realm of Illusion," in Casa Vogue (Milan), November 1989.

Beurdeley, Laurence, "Guy Laroche: l'esprit de la Renaissance," in L'Officiel (Paris), August 1990.

Givhan, Robin, "Nothing New Under the Paris Sun: Even the Best Doesn't Stand Out from the Rest," in the Washington Post, 12 March 1999.

Guy Laroche design, 1965: coq feather bonnet tied with a chiffon kerchief. © AP/Wide World Photos.

_____, "In Paris, Runway of Gossip; Show Wrinkled by Talk of Change," in the Washington Post, 8 October 1999.

* * *

Before entering the industry in the 1940s, Guy Laroche had no formal training in fashion design. He soon, however, built up a varied portfolio of experience, beginning with styling and millinery in New York followed by work in fashion and merchandising on Seventh Avenue. Returning to Paris he was offered a job as design assistant at the fashion house of Jean Dessès. Dessès was famous for designing the stole and distinctive draped chiffon evening gowns in striking colors. He also designed one of the first diffusion lines in 1950 and this marked the beginning of ready-to-wear in French haute couture. Laroche was involved in these innovations and in 1955 traveled to the U.S. to study new fabrication methods for ready-to-wear.

Larouche opened his own couture house in 1956 on Avenue Franklin Roosevelt in Paris, at the age of 37. His first collection, shown in his apartment, was one of subtle sophistication, reminiscent of Balenciaga's restrained elegance: simple tops that spread into huge bouffant skirts with baroque inspired, twisted drapes, or relaxed short evening dresses in black silk chiffon, with elegant capes bordered in satin ribbon. Later collections were more feminine, fun, and younger in feel: short puffed hems and schoolgirl dresses or delicate gathered drapes and scallop-effect necklines. Guy Laroche clothes were particularly noted for their skillful cutting and tailoring.

By the early 1960s Laroche had launched a ready-to-wear line and opened a boutique. His reputation as a creative but shrewd businessman grew as his company expanded. Capitalizing on his following amongst actresses and socialites, the company moved swiftly into licensing and perfumes. The major perfume, Fidji, was introduced in 1966 to immediate success and the men's aftershave Drakkar Noir was introduced in 1982, to complement the previously established men's ready-to-wear clothing.

Licensed goods promoted the reputation of the Guy Laroche name internationally, particularly in the lucrative Middle Eastern markets where the allure of Paris on a label sold goods. Lingerie, nightwear, hats, ties, bags, scarves, and jersey knits were exported and sold in 250 boutiques worldwide.

During the late 1960s, Laroche sold a large amount of shares in his business to Bernard Cornfeld and to L'Oréal, the hair and beauty product manufacturers. The perfume side of the business then became a division of the L'Oréal beauty company. Licensing deals throughout Europe, Asia, and South America helped maintain a high profile for Guy Laroche products, including intimate apparel, footwear, luggage, sunglasses, and outerwear, while the company itself was later bought by French pen and razor manufacturer, Société Bic.

Guy Laroche, the legendary designer, died in 1989, while his company struggled under successive designers, including Michael Klein, Elber Albaz, and Ronald van der Kemp. Albaz, widely credited with rejuvenating the company, left to head up Yves Saint Laurent in 1997. Dutch designer Ronald van der Kemp was hired to succeed Albaz, but was fired after this first collection was panned by fashion critics. By 1999 Bic announced its intention of selling Guy Laroche, due to falling profits and currency rate fluctuations. After the departure of Albaz, the company lost much of its sheen; subsequent collections were the product of a design team and lacked the élan usually associated with the name Guy Laroche. Yet in 2001 the Guy Laroche name was still alive and well, and Bic had, apparently, decided to hold on to its investment for the foreseeable future.

—Kevin Almond; updated by Nelly Rhodes

LARS, Byron

American designer

Born: Oakland, California, 19 January 1965. Education: Studied at the Brooks Fashion Institute, Long Beach, 1983–85; Fashion Institute of Technology, 1986–87; selected to represent USA at the International Concours des Jeunes Créateurs de Mode, Paris, 1986, and at the Festival du Lin, Monte Carlo, 1989. Career: Freelance sketcher and pattern maker, Kevan Hall, Gary Gatyas, Ronaldus Shamask, Nancy Crystal Blouse Co., New York, 1986–91; showed first collection, 1991; first full-scale New York show, 1992; designer, En Vogue fashion collection, from 1993; signed licensing deal with San Siro for Shirttails collection, 1995 (agreement nullified in court, 1997); Cinabarin Sensation Barbie, 1996; signed with Mattel for new line of African American Barbies with designer clothes, 1997; backer pulled funds and firm closed, 1997; launched new collection, Green T, 1999. Exhibitions: Byron Lars' Illustrations, Ambassador Gallery, New

Guy Laroche design, 1965: coq feather bonnet tied with a chiffon kerchief. © AP/Wide World Photos.

_____, "In Paris, Runway of Gossip; Show Wrinkled by Talk of Change," in the Washington Post, 8 October 1999.

* * *

Before entering the industry in the 1940s, Guy Laroche had no formal training in fashion design. He soon, however, built up a varied portfolio of experience, beginning with styling and millinery in New York followed by work in fashion and merchandising on Seventh Avenue. Returning to Paris he was offered a job as design assistant at the fashion house of Jean Dessès. Dessès was famous for designing the stole and distinctive draped chiffon evening gowns in striking colors. He also designed one of the first diffusion lines in 1950 and this marked the beginning of ready-to-wear in French haute couture. Laroche was involved in these innovations and in 1955 traveled to the U.S. to study new fabrication methods for ready-to-wear.

Larouche opened his own couture house in 1956 on Avenue Franklin Roosevelt in Paris, at the age of 37. His first collection, shown in his apartment, was one of subtle sophistication, reminiscent of Balenciaga's restrained elegance: simple tops that spread into huge bouffant skirts with baroque inspired, twisted drapes, or relaxed short evening dresses in black silk chiffon, with elegant capes bordered in satin ribbon. Later collections were more feminine, fun, and younger in feel: short puffed hems and schoolgirl dresses or delicate gathered drapes and scallop-effect necklines. Guy Laroche clothes were particularly noted for their skillful cutting and tailoring.

By the early 1960s Laroche had launched a ready-to-wear line and opened a boutique. His reputation as a creative but shrewd businessman grew as his company expanded. Capitalizing on his following amongst actresses and socialites, the company moved swiftly into licensing and perfumes. The major perfume, Fidji, was introduced in 1966 to immediate success and the men's aftershave Drakkar Noir was introduced in 1982, to complement the previously established men's ready-to-wear clothing.

Licensed goods promoted the reputation of the Guy Laroche name internationally, particularly in the lucrative Middle Eastern markets where the allure of Paris on a label sold goods. Lingerie, nightwear, hats, ties, bags, scarves, and jersey knits were exported and sold in 250 boutiques worldwide.

During the late 1960s, Laroche sold a large amount of shares in his business to Bernard Cornfeld and to L'Oréal, the hair and beauty product manufacturers. The perfume side of the business then became a division of the L'Oréal beauty company. Licensing deals throughout Europe, Asia, and South America helped maintain a high profile for Guy Laroche products, including intimate apparel, footwear, luggage, sunglasses, and outerwear, while the company itself was later bought by French pen and razor manufacturer, Société Bic.

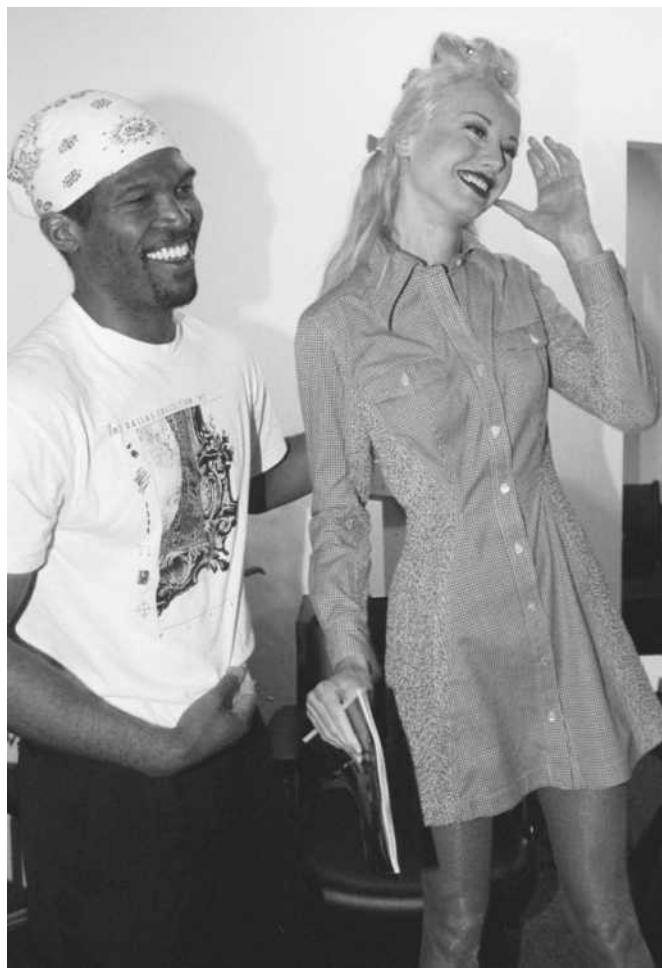

Guy Laroche, the legendary designer, died in 1989, while his company struggled under successive designers, including Michael Klein, Elber Albaz, and Ronald van der Kemp. Albaz, widely credited with rejuvenating the company, left to head up Yves Saint Laurent in 1997. Dutch designer Ronald van der Kemp was hired to succeed Albaz, but was fired after this first collection was panned by fashion critics. By 1999 Bic announced its intention of selling Guy Laroche, due to falling profits and currency rate fluctuations. After the departure of Albaz, the company lost much of its sheen; subsequent collections were the product of a design team and lacked the élan usually associated with the name Guy Laroche. Yet in 2001 the Guy Laroche name was still alive and well, and Bic had, apparently, decided to hold on to its investment for the foreseeable future.

—Kevin Almond; updated by Nelly Rhodes

LARS, Byron

American designer

Born: Oakland, California, 19 January 1965. Education: Studied at the Brooks Fashion Institute, Long Beach, 1983–85; Fashion Institute of Technology, 1986–87; selected to represent USA at the International Concours des Jeunes Créateurs de Mode, Paris, 1986, and at the Festival du Lin, Monte Carlo, 1989. Career: Freelance sketcher and pattern maker, Kevan Hall, Gary Gatyas, Ronaldus Shamask, Nancy Crystal Blouse Co., New York, 1986–91; showed first collection, 1991; first full-scale New York show, 1992; designer, En Vogue fashion collection, from 1993; signed licensing deal with San Siro for Shirttails collection, 1995 (agreement nullified in court, 1997); Cinabarin Sensation Barbie, 1996; signed with Mattel for new line of African American Barbies with designer clothes, 1997; backer pulled funds and firm closed, 1997; launched new collection, Green T, 1999. Exhibitions: Byron Lars' Illustrations, Ambassador Gallery, New

Byron Lars posing with one of his ensembles from his "Shirt Tales" show, spring 1996. © AP/Wide World Photos.

York, 1992. Awards: Vogue Cecil Beaton award for Illustration, London, 1990. Address: 202 West 40th Street, New York, NY 10018, U.S.A.

PUBLICATIONS

On LARS:

Books

Stegemeyer, Anne, Who's Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.

Articles

White, Constance C.R., "Rookie of the Year," in WWD, 24 April 1991.

Washington, Elsie B., "Now: Brothers on Seventh Avenue," in Essence, November 1991.

Gerber, Robert, "Byron Lars: Elmer Fudd Fab," in Interview (New York), December 1991.

"Byron Takes Off," in WWD, 15 April 1992.

Schiros, Anne-Marie, "The Sweet Smile of Success," in the New York Times, 7 June 1992.

Darnton, Nina, "The Rainbow Coalition," in Newsweek, 13 July 1992.

Walt, Vivienne, "From Rags to Riches," in the San Francisco Examiner, 9 August 1992.

Piaggi, Anna, "By Air," in Vogue (Milan), August 1992.

Jaffe, Deborah, "Great Style," in Elle (New York), September 1992. "Working It!" in Essence, September 1992.

Baker, Martha, "(Byronic) Poses," in New York, 12 October 1992.

Donovan, Carrie, and Ruven Afanador, "New York," in the New York Times Magazine, 1 November 1992.

Rubenstein, Hal, "Return to Gilligan's Island," in the New York Times Magazine, 17 January 1993.

Donovan, Carrie, and Mark Peterson, "It's Lyrical on Seventh Avenue," in the New York Times Magazine, 28 March 1993.

Praeger, Emily, "Neither Virgin Nor Siren," in the New York Times, 14 November 1993.

Bellafante, Ginia, "En Vogue in Vogue?" in Time, 6 December 1993.

MacIntosh, Jeane, "His Dance Cards are Full," in DNR, 28 February 1994.

Johnson, Eunice W., "Spotlightin' Legs," in Ebony, April 1994.

Houston, Ruth, "The All-Important Jacket," in Black Elegance, April 1994.

Menkes, Suzy, "A Touch of Modern Exotica," in the New York Times, 24 April 1994.

Dunn-Lee, Ionia, "Well Suited," in Black Elegance, October 1994.

White, Constance C.R., "Patterns," in the New York Times, 28 February 1995.

_____, "Patterns," in the New York Times, 4 April 1995.

"New York: Byron Lars," in WWD, 4 April 1995.

White, Constance C.R., "Fur Tradition Versus Fur Fun," in the New York Times, 23 May 1995.

_____, "Vision for Changing Times," in the New York Times, 4 November 1995.

_____, "Patterns," in the New York Times, 23 January 1996.

_____, "Three Successes, and So American," in the New York Times, 3 April 1996.

White, Renee Minus, "Byron Lars Designs for Dolls—Barbies and Real Ones," in the New York Amsterdam News, 20 April 1996.

Dunn-Lee, Ionia, "Fashion Innovators on Seventh," in Black Elegance, September 1996.

"Bryon Lars Sues San Siro Over Contract, Trademark," in DNR, 27 December 1996.

"Byron's Secret," in WWD, 18 February 1997.

"Byron Loves Barbie," in WWD, 7 May 1997.

Gite, Lloyd, "Breaking into the Fashion Biz: Career Opportunities," in Black Enterprise, June 1997.

Williamson, Rusty, "Byron Lars Comes Back with Spring Green T Line," in WWD, 20 July 2000.

Williamson, Rusty, "Back in the New York Groove; Hot 1990s Designer Byron Lars...," in WWD, 3 August 2000.

* * *

The career of Byron Lars took wing with his fall 1992 collection inspired by legendary aviatrix Amelia Earhart, but Lars had already been one of the most closely watched and praised newcomers in New York for several years. Mary Ann Wheaton, who worked with Patrick Byron Lars, fall 1996 collection: ribbed knit dress with a hairdryer hat. © AP/Wide World Photos.

Kelly during his Paris years and took him from $700,000 in business to $7.5 million in 18 months, took Lars under her wing in February 1991 and placed his clothes in top stores within a week.

The fall 1992 collection, Lars' first full-scale New York show, consolidated his reputation (and, not coincidentally, his business circumstances, including backing from C. Itoh & Company) and was built on the same strengths that had characterized his earlier work. In an interview in Essence (September 1992), Lynn Manulis, president of Martha International (which became one of the first stores to carry Lars' work), said, "It was the best and most original collection that happened during the entire fashion week." Lars also attracted the attention of dance legend Merce Cunningham, with whom he became friends.

Appropriating from menswear, with a special interest in the men's dress shirts and in stripes and patterns especially associated with menswear, melding isolated elements of exaggeration with conventional dress in a dry irony, and responding to high fashion and street influence, Lars developed a signature style while still in his twenties. According to Anne-Marie Schiro (New York Times, 7 June 1992), stores "love his clothes, which can be quirky yet classic, streetwise but never vulgar. His inspiration may come from baseball or aviation, from rappers or schoolgirls. And the accessories are outrageous: caps with oversize crowns and two foot-long peaks, lunch boxes or boom boxes as handbags. They make you smile."

Designer Jeffrey Banks called Lars "the African-American Christian Francis Roth," relating the former's incongruity with the latter's paradoxes of sophisticated innocence in clothing. Roth and Lars share yet another characteristic: they are both consummate masters of the cut, enjoying the construction of the garment almost in the manner of the couture. Lars is not merely making a joke of men's shirts cross-dressed for women, but took the shirttail as a constructive element, reshaped the bust, and deconstructed the shirt to be worn by a woman. It is as much a tour de force in construction as it is an apt idea of 1990s gender transaction. If Lars' clothes were merely facetious, they would succeed as great fun; but they succeed as great fashion because they are beautifully cut.

In adapting menswear, Lars is attentive to feminine outcomes, offering a kind of enhanced sensuality in the presence of male and female in one garment. In many instances, peplums emphasize waist and hips (but not with the 1980s power look), and the sartorial nuancing of shirt and jacket for women directs attention to a broadened expanse of the bust. Often including even men's ties, the result is unequivocally feminine when Lars includes a built-in bra for shaping. Even as he used airplane motifs in textiles in his epochal fall 1992 collection, his fantasy was not a little boy's—aviator jackets had a curvaceous femininity approximating Azzedine Alaïa while shorts, short skirts, and leggings emphasized the female. A duck hunter's outfit in plaid (with a duck decoy made into a handbag), seemingly destined for the L.L. Bean catalogue before a perverse, savvy drollery rendered it chic, and it was featured in the Tribute to the Black Fashion Museum exhibition at the Fashion Institute of Technology, New York, in spring 1992.

Even before the Earhart collection, Lars was influenced by the 1940s. His twists of menswear in the best Rosie-the-Riveter tradition and his fascination with the sarong recall the period. Both shirts and sarongs depended upon tying, a sense of the improvised wrap, that the designer built into the garment. In this, Lars seemed an antecedent in Claire McCordell, whose lifelong interest in casual wraps is similar to Lars' fascination with the shaping and informality afforded by tying. He has also been influenced by pop singers, such as the 1993 En Vogue collection, inspired by the group of the same name. The following year, he created a collection based on African themes; the next, 1995, he had fun with fur, joining other designers such as Yeohlee Teng, Ben Kahn and various others in designing fur collections; and in 1996 Mattel asked Lars to design a collectible Barbie doll, complete with her own fashion wardrobe. His collection that year was a result of being inspired by Barbie, with charcoal gray and cocoa brown colors gracing the line. The Barbie foray proved so successful Mattel asked Lars in 1997 to develop an entire line of African American Barbie dolls, all dressed in designer duds. The same year Lars negotiated with Victoria's Secret to design a collection of sexy, fun cotton lingerie separates and silk robes bearing the firm's logo.

Unfortunately for Lars, the walls came crashing down in late 1997 despite a slew of promising licensing deals. After his financial backing was withdrawn, Lars had little more than the Mattel Barbie collaboration to keep him going. Commenting on the dry period to Women's Wear Daily (20 July 2000), "I freelanced with lots of different types of companies and stretched my creative wings." Yet the times were far from rosy, and he learned a tough lesson on licensing deals. "I'd rather flip burgers at McDonald's than go through that again," he declared. Lars did, however, orchestrate a comeback with a new funky collection in 1999, called Green T, with his name conspicuously absent from the label. "With Green T, we intentionally left my name off the label because we wanted to see if it could fly without a designer angle. We just wanted to do a really great product with design integrity at a really great price."

Lars is only one of many African American designers achieving prominence in New York in the last decade. Others include C.D. Greene, Gordon Henderson, Michael McCollum, Tracy Reese, and Kevin Smith, all inspired by the works of previous designers such as Stephen Burrows, Patrick Kelly, Thierry Mugler, and Willi Smith. If still considered a prodigy today, since he is only in his thirties, Byron Lars is making clever yet important clothes, wearable ideas, wondrous social transplants and mutations, and some of the most sensitively and sensuously cut garments in America.

—Richard Martin; updated by Daryl F. Mallett and Owen James

LAUG, André

French designer working in Rome

Born: Alsace, France, 29 December 1931. Career: Moved to Paris, 1958, to begin working for Raphaël fashion house; designer, Nina Ricci, Paris, early 1960s; worked freelance, from 1962, selling designs to Venet; collaborated with Courrèges until 1963, when he moved to Rome; designed nine collections of haute couture and five of ready-to-wear for Maria Antonelli, 1964–68; opened own couture house and showed own collection, Rome, 1968; house continued for a few years after his death, then closed. Died: December 1984, in Rome.

PUBLICATIONS

On LAUG:

Books

Lambert, Eleanor, World of Fashion: People, Places, Resources, New York, 1976.

Soli, Pia, Il genio antipatico, Milan, 1984.

Stegemeyer, Anne, Who's Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.

Articles

McEvoy, Marian, "Rome Laurels to Laug, Valentino," in WWD, 20 July 1978.

Talley, André Leon, "André Laug," in Vogue (Paris), January 1981.

Morris, Bernadine, "André Laug, Stylist," [obituary] in the New York Times, 18 December 1984.

"Milan Steers a More Balanced Course Back to Sanity After Two Seasons of Turbulence," in the Chicago Tribune, 17 March 1985.

"André Laug: chiaro, lieve con quel preciso stile," in Vogue (Milan), March 1987.

"Roma alta moda: André Laug," in Vogue (Milan), March 1988.

* * *

In July 1978, am enthused retailer told Women's Wear Daily about André Laug's latest couture collection: "The suits, the suits, the suits. His suits are divine.... These clothes are so neat, so technically perfect, so sharp." For the client of keenest interest in impeccable tailoring along with a kind of restraint and temperate elegance about her style, Laug was the perfect expression of the Roman couture. From the 1960s until his death in 1984, Laug produced definitive collections of Roman style combining expertise in tailoring and the richest materials with a sober moderation.

For the American clientèle in particular, Laug suits held a Daisy Miller enchantment in an equilibrium between European sensuality and luxury and American simplicity. Americans may have, in general, expected the fireworks of extravagant Roman couture in the 1970s, but Laug provided an aesthetic closer to Roman Holiday—a reserved beauty. Moreover, the designer's success in the couture occasioned a lively, if somewhat less characteristic ready-to-wear business in the late 1970s and 1980s.

Tailored clothing by Laug was sufficiently elegant to move from cocktails to evening. A simple Laug black jacket with mushroom-like shoulders would have worked for daywear, but clearly would pass as evening dress. In his final collection, a charcoal quilted wool and silk evening jacket with black velvet trousers certainly would have sufficed for an elegant day as much as for evening. Laug knew the ethos of casual clothing in the 1970s and created an eveningwear that accommodated the social change of the period toward informality.

His American clientèle was typically old-guard and even conservative, the high-quality and high-comfort sense of the Philadelphia Main Line (his discreet good taste sold especially well at Nan Duskin in Philadelphia). As Bernadine Morris noted, "His designs were not the spectacular kind that change the shape of fashion. They were conservative day and evening clothes, which made women feel comfortable. They reflected the way Mr. Laug himself dressed, like a banker."

Trustworthy chic of Laug's kind was often compared to menswear in opposition to the fluctuations of women's fashion in the 1970s. By avoiding excess, in allowing for a mix of day and evening elements, Laug allowed his clients to develop a sensible, abiding wardrobe. Like menswear, trousers and jackets were basic for both day and evening. Jackets were clearly tailored for women with a defined waist. Ironically, Laug's design interests and his personal sense of forbearance were pursued by many other designers by the time of Laug's death at the age of 53. His love of black was almost the same as the prevalence of fashion black in the 1980s. The swanky luxury of his understated garments began with the textiles, lining jackets with rich and vivid textiles to inflect the relative moderation of the exterior. Further, the abstemious chic of a Laug suit would assume apparent luxury as accompanied by its silk blouse.

In the subtle distinctions among those designers who influence their colleagues and establish wardrobes for the most stylish women, as opposed to the most flamboyant and visible, André Laug represented the achievement of fashion as a well-bred, well-made design art. His catwalk shows were extravagant and showy, but not so the clothing. He sought no vanguard and claimed no new invention, but he made undeniably beautiful clothing for the most selective clients practicing a lifestyle of utmost urbanity and discretion.

At the time of his death, Laug had completed more than a dozen design sketches for his next fall/winter collection. His staff reproduced these designs, which were, according to the Chicago Tribune licensing deals. "I'd rather flip burgers at McDonald's than go through that again," he declared. Lars did, however, orchestrate a comeback with a new funky collection in 1999, called Green T, with his name conspicuously absent from the label. "With Green T, we intentionally left my name off the label because we wanted to see if it could fly without a designer angle. We just wanted to do a really great product with design integrity at a really great price."

Lars is only one of many African American designers achieving prominence in New York in the last decade. Others include C.D. Greene, Gordon Henderson, Michael McCollum, Tracy Reese, and Kevin Smith, all inspired by the works of previous designers such as Stephen Burrows, Patrick Kelly, Thierry Mugler, and Willi Smith. If still considered a prodigy today, since he is only in his thirties, Byron Lars is making clever yet important clothes, wearable ideas, wondrous social transplants and mutations, and some of the most sensitively and sensuously cut garments in America.

—Richard Martin; updated by Daryl F. Mallett and Owen James

LAUG, André

French designer working in Rome

Born: Alsace, France, 29 December 1931. Career: Moved to Paris, 1958, to begin working for Raphaël fashion house; designer, Nina Ricci, Paris, early 1960s; worked freelance, from 1962, selling designs to Venet; collaborated with Courrèges until 1963, when he moved to Rome; designed nine collections of haute couture and five of ready-to-wear for Maria Antonelli, 1964–68; opened own couture house and showed own collection, Rome, 1968; house continued for a few years after his death, then closed. Died: December 1984, in Rome.

PUBLICATIONS

On LAUG:

Books

Lambert, Eleanor, World of Fashion: People, Places, Resources, New York, 1976.

Soli, Pia, Il genio antipatico, Milan, 1984.

Stegemeyer, Anne, Who's Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.

Articles

McEvoy, Marian, "Rome Laurels to Laug, Valentino," in WWD, 20 July 1978.

Talley, André Leon, "André Laug," in Vogue (Paris), January 1981.

Morris, Bernadine, "André Laug, Stylist," [obituary] in the New York Times, 18 December 1984.

"Milan Steers a More Balanced Course Back to Sanity After Two Seasons of Turbulence," in the Chicago Tribune, 17 March 1985.

"André Laug: chiaro, lieve con quel preciso stile," in Vogue (Milan), March 1987.

"Roma alta moda: André Laug," in Vogue (Milan), March 1988.

* * *

In July 1978, am enthused retailer told Women's Wear Daily about André Laug's latest couture collection: "The suits, the suits, the suits. His suits are divine.... These clothes are so neat, so technically perfect, so sharp." For the client of keenest interest in impeccable tailoring along with a kind of restraint and temperate elegance about her style, Laug was the perfect expression of the Roman couture. From the 1960s until his death in 1984, Laug produced definitive collections of Roman style combining expertise in tailoring and the richest materials with a sober moderation.

For the American clientèle in particular, Laug suits held a Daisy Miller enchantment in an equilibrium between European sensuality and luxury and American simplicity. Americans may have, in general, expected the fireworks of extravagant Roman couture in the 1970s, but Laug provided an aesthetic closer to Roman Holiday—a reserved beauty. Moreover, the designer's success in the couture occasioned a lively, if somewhat less characteristic ready-to-wear business in the late 1970s and 1980s.

Tailored clothing by Laug was sufficiently elegant to move from cocktails to evening. A simple Laug black jacket with mushroom-like shoulders would have worked for daywear, but clearly would pass as evening dress. In his final collection, a charcoal quilted wool and silk evening jacket with black velvet trousers certainly would have sufficed for an elegant day as much as for evening. Laug knew the ethos of casual clothing in the 1970s and created an eveningwear that accommodated the social change of the period toward informality.

His American clientèle was typically old-guard and even conservative, the high-quality and high-comfort sense of the Philadelphia Main Line (his discreet good taste sold especially well at Nan Duskin in Philadelphia). As Bernadine Morris noted, "His designs were not the spectacular kind that change the shape of fashion. They were conservative day and evening clothes, which made women feel comfortable. They reflected the way Mr. Laug himself dressed, like a banker."

Trustworthy chic of Laug's kind was often compared to menswear in opposition to the fluctuations of women's fashion in the 1970s. By avoiding excess, in allowing for a mix of day and evening elements, Laug allowed his clients to develop a sensible, abiding wardrobe. Like menswear, trousers and jackets were basic for both day and evening. Jackets were clearly tailored for women with a defined waist. Ironically, Laug's design interests and his personal sense of forbearance were pursued by many other designers by the time of Laug's death at the age of 53. His love of black was almost the same as the prevalence of fashion black in the 1980s. The swanky luxury of his understated garments began with the textiles, lining jackets with rich and vivid textiles to inflect the relative moderation of the exterior. Further, the abstemious chic of a Laug suit would assume apparent luxury as accompanied by its silk blouse.

In the subtle distinctions among those designers who influence their colleagues and establish wardrobes for the most stylish women, as opposed to the most flamboyant and visible, André Laug represented the achievement of fashion as a well-bred, well-made design art. His catwalk shows were extravagant and showy, but not so the clothing. He sought no vanguard and claimed no new invention, but he made undeniably beautiful clothing for the most selective clients practicing a lifestyle of utmost urbanity and discretion.

At the time of his death, Laug had completed more than a dozen design sketches for his next fall/winter collection. His staff reproduced these designs, which were, according to the Chicago Tribune

(17 March 1985), "in the designer's timeless tradition of classic, elegant, ladylike suits and dresses...distinguished by waist definition and the use of bright jewel tones." After the collection debuted, Laug's staff sought a French-speaking designer to continue the late designer's legacy. Though the fashion house remained in business for a few years, no one ever filled the void left by André's death, and the company closed.

—Richard Martin

LAUREN, Ralph

American designer

Born: Ralph Lifschitz, Bronx, New York, 14 October 1939. Education: Studied business science, City College of New York, late 1950s. Military Service: Served in the U.S. Army, 1962–64. Family: Married Ricky Low-Bear, circa 1964; children: Andrew, David, Dylan. Career: Part-time sales assistant, Alexanders Stores, New York, 1956–57; assistant menswear buyer, Allied Stores, New York, 1958–61; salesperson, Bloomingdale's and Brooks Brothers, New York, 1962; traveling salesperson in New England for A. Rivetz, neckwear manufacturer, Boston, circa 1964–66; designer, Polo Neckwear Division, Beau Brummel, New York, 1967; founder/designer and chairman, Polo Fashions, New York, from 1968; Ralph Lauren Womenswear, from 1971; Polo Leather Goods, from 1979; Polo/Ralph Lauren Luggage, from 1982; Polo Ralph Lauren Corp., from 1986; introduced diffusion line, Chaps, 1972; introduced Ralph, Double RL, and Polo Sport lines, 1993; established Polo/Ralph Lauren stores in Beverly Hills, 1971, Lawrence, MA, 1983, Paris, 1986, flagship store in New York, 1986, Costa Mesa, CA, 1987, East Hampton, NY, 1989; Polo Sport, New York, 1993; launched fragrances Polo and Lauren, 1978, Chaps and Tuxedo, 1979, Safari, 1990, Polo Crest, 1991; new line of contemporary casualwear launched by Polo Jeans Co., 1996; offered collection of 400 colors of house paint, 1996; Polo Ralph Lauren became a publicly traded company on the New York Stock Exchange (NYSE: RL), 1997; introduced Polo Sport RLX line, 1998; opened RL restaurant, Chicago, 1999; introduced RALPH line, 1999; acquired Canadian-based Club Monaco, 1999; launched Pink Pony Campaign to help reduce disparities in cancer care, 2000; established Ralph Lauren Center for Cancer Prevention and Care at North General Hospital in Harlem, 2000; Ralph Lauren Media opened Polo.com, 2000. Exhibitions: Retrospective, Denver Art Museum, 1983. Collections: Fashion Institute of Technology, New York. Awards: Coty American Fashion Critics award, 1970, 1973, 1974, 1976, 1977, 1981, 1984; Neiman Marcus distinguished service award, 1971; American Printed Fabrics Council "Tommy" award, 1977; Council of Fashion Designers of America award, 1981; Coty Hall of Fame award, 1981; Retailer of the Year award, 1986, 1992; Museum of American Folk Art Pioneering Excellence award, 1988; Council of Fashion Designers of America Lifetime Achievement award, 1992; Woolmark award, 1992; CFDA Womenswear Designer of the Year, 1996; Honorary Doctorate of Letters from Brandeis University, 1996; Nina Hyde Center for Breast Cancer Research Humanitarian award presented by Diana, Princess of Wales, 1996; CFDA Menswear Designer of the Year, 1997; CFDA award for humanitarian leadership, 1998; inducted into the Fashion Walk of Fame, 2000. Address: 650 Madison Avenue, New York, NY 10022, USA. Website: www.Polo.com.

PUBLICATIONS

On LAUREN:

Books

- Morris, Bernadine, and Barbara Walz, The Fashion Makers, New York, 1978.
Diamondstein, Barbaralee, Fashion: The Inside Story, New York, 1985.
Milbank, Caroline Rennolds, Couture: The Great Designers, New York, 1985.
Perschetz, Lois, ed., W: The Designing Life, New York, 1987.
Coleridge, Nicholas, The Fashion Conspiracy, London, 1988.
Trachtenberg, Jeffrey, Ralph Lauren: The man Behind the Mystique, Boston, 1988.
Milbank, Caroline Rennolds, New York Fashion: The Evolution of American Style, New York, 1989.
Canaedo, Anne, Ralph Lauren: Master of Fashion, Ada, Oklahoma, 1992.
Stegemeyer, Anne, Who's Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.

Ralph Lauren, fall 2001 collection: cashmere coat over a cashmere dress. © AP/Wide World Photos.

(17 March 1985), "in the designer's timeless tradition of classic, elegant, ladylike suits and dresses...distinguished by waist definition and the use of bright jewel tones." After the collection debuted, Laug's staff sought a French-speaking designer to continue the late designer's legacy. Though the fashion house remained in business for a few years, no one ever filled the void left by André's death, and the company closed.

—Richard Martin

LAUREN, Ralph

American designer

Born: Ralph Lifschitz, Bronx, New York, 14 October 1939. Education: Studied business science, City College of New York, late 1950s. Military Service: Served in the U.S. Army, 1962–64. Family: Married Ricky Low-Bear, circa 1964; children: Andrew, David, Dylan. Career: Part-time sales assistant, Alexanders Stores, New York, 1956–57; assistant menswear buyer, Allied Stores, New York, 1958–61; salesperson, Bloomingdale's and Brooks Brothers, New York, 1962; traveling salesperson in New England for A. Rivetz, neckwear manufacturer, Boston, circa 1964–66; designer, Polo Neckwear Division, Beau Brummel, New York, 1967; founder/designer and chairman, Polo Fashions, New York, from 1968; Ralph Lauren Womenswear, from 1971; Polo Leather Goods, from 1979; Polo/Ralph Lauren Luggage, from 1982; Polo Ralph Lauren Corp., from 1986; introduced diffusion line, Chaps, 1972; introduced Ralph, Double RL, and Polo Sport lines, 1993; established Polo/Ralph Lauren stores in Beverly Hills, 1971, Lawrence, MA, 1983, Paris, 1986, flagship store in New York, 1986, Costa Mesa, CA, 1987, East Hampton, NY, 1989; Polo Sport, New York, 1993; launched fragrances Polo and Lauren, 1978, Chaps and Tuxedo, 1979, Safari, 1990, Polo Crest, 1991; new line of contemporary casualwear launched by Polo Jeans Co., 1996; offered collection of 400 colors of house paint, 1996; Polo Ralph Lauren became a publicly traded company on the New York Stock Exchange (NYSE: RL), 1997; introduced Polo Sport RLX line, 1998; opened RL restaurant, Chicago, 1999; introduced RALPH line, 1999; acquired Canadian-based Club Monaco, 1999; launched Pink Pony Campaign to help reduce disparities in cancer care, 2000; established Ralph Lauren Center for Cancer Prevention and Care at North General Hospital in Harlem, 2000; Ralph Lauren Media opened Polo.com, 2000. Exhibitions: Retrospective, Denver Art Museum, 1983. Collections: Fashion Institute of Technology, New York. Awards: Coty American Fashion Critics award, 1970, 1973, 1974, 1976, 1977, 1981, 1984; Neiman Marcus distinguished service award, 1971; American Printed Fabrics Council "Tommy" award, 1977; Council of Fashion Designers of America award, 1981; Coty Hall of Fame award, 1981; Retailer of the Year award, 1986, 1992; Museum of American Folk Art Pioneering Excellence award, 1988; Council of Fashion Designers of America Lifetime Achievement award, 1992; Woolmark award, 1992; CFDA Womenswear Designer of the Year, 1996; Honorary Doctorate of Letters from Brandeis University, 1996; Nina Hyde Center for Breast Cancer Research Humanitarian award presented by Diana, Princess of Wales, 1996; CFDA Menswear Designer of the Year, 1997; CFDA award for humanitarian leadership, 1998; inducted into the Fashion Walk of Fame, 2000. Address: 650 Madison Avenue, New York, NY 10022, USA. Website: www.Polo.com.

PUBLICATIONS

On LAUREN:

Books

- Morris, Bernadine, and Barbara Walz, The Fashion Makers, New York, 1978.
- Diamondstein, Barbaralee, Fashion: The Inside Story, New York, 1985.
- Milbank, Caroline Rennolds, Couture: The Great Designers, New York, 1985.
- Perschitz, Lois, ed., W: The Designing Life, New York, 1987.
- Coleridge, Nicholas, The Fashion Conspiracy, London, 1988.
- Trachtenberg, Jeffrey, Ralph Lauren: The man Behind the Mystique, Boston, 1988.
- Milbank, Caroline Rennolds, New York Fashion: The Evolution of American Style, New York, 1989.
- Canaedo, Anne, Ralph Lauren: Master of Fashion, Ada, Oklahoma, 1992.
- Stegemeyer, Anne, Who's Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.

Ralph Lauren, fall 2001 collection: cashmere coat over a cashmere dress. © AP/Wide World Photos.

Ralph Lauren, fall 2001 collection: cashmere blend coat over a cashmere turtleneck and leather skirt. © AP/Wide World Photos.

Le Dertz, Laurent, and Muriel Lartigue, Profil et dynamique du groupe Polo Ralph Lauren, Paris, 1999.

Le Dertz, Laurent, and Béatrice Deboscher, Stratégies des leaders américains de la mode: Calvin Klein, Donna Karan, Liz Clairborne, Polo Ralph Lauren, et Tommy Hilfiger, Paris, 2000.

Articles

Wohlfert, Lee, "What Do Woody, Bob, and Diane Have in Common? Money, Yes, But Designer Ralph Lauren Too," in People, 6 February 1978.

Ling, F., "Ralph Lauren's Polo Game," in Forbes, 26 June 1978.
"Profile of a Designer: Ralph Lauren," in the Sunday Times (London), 13 September 1981.

Langway, L., and L. R. Prout, "Lauren's Frontier Chic," in Newsweek, 21 September 1981.

Ettorre, Barbara, "Give Ralph Lauren All the Jets He Wants," in Forbes, 28 February 1983.

"Beyond the Name Game: New Design World from Halston and Ralph Lauren," in Vogue, September 1983.

Feretti, Fred, "The Business of Being Ralph Lauren," in the New York Times Magazine, 18 September 1983.

Trachtenberg, Jeffrey A., "You Are What You Wear," in Forbes, 21 April 1986.

Cocks, Jay, "Born and Worn in the U.S.A.," in Time, 16 June 1986.

Infantino, Vivian, "Interview: Ralph Lauren," in Footwear News (New York), July 1986.

Koepp, Stephen, "Selling a Dream of Elegance and the Good Life," in Time, 1 September 1986.

Skenazy, Lenore, "Lauren Gets Honorable Mansion," in Advertising Age, 20 October 1986.

Tornabene, Lyn, "The World According to Ralph Lauren," in Cosmopolitan, February 1987.

Brubach, Holly, "Ralph Lauren's Achievement," in Atlantic Monthly, August 1987.

"Ralph Lauren: The Dream Maker," in U.S. News & World Report, 8 February 1988.

Aronson, Steven M. L., "High Style in Jamaica," in House & Garden, October 1988.

Dowling, Claudia Glenn, "Ralph Lauren," in Life, May 1989.

"A Big Time Safari for Ralph Lauren," in WWD, 27 October 1989.

Mower, Sarah, "The Unspeakable Chic of Summer," in the Independent (London), 19 April 1990.

Hume, Marion, "In the Swing," in the Sunday Times (London), 29 April 1990.

Parola, Robert, "Polo/Ralph Lauren," in DNR, 17 October 1990.

_____, "Polo/Ralph Lauren: At the Crossroads," in DNR, 29 October 1990.

Buck, Joan Juliet, "Everybody's All-American," in Vogue (New York), February 1991.

Spevack, Rachel, "Polo and Izod: Adding New Luster to Knit Logos," in DNR, 12 March 1991.

Born, Pete, "Polo Crest Takes Fashion Approach to Fragrance," in DNR, 26 July 1991.

Forbes, Malcolm S., Jr., "Dressing Us with His Dreams," in Forbes, 2 September 1991.

Slonim, Jeffrey, "Ralph Lauren: October 14," in Interview (New York), October 1991.

Talley, Andre Leon, "Everybody's All-American," in Vogue, February 1992.

Born, Pete, "New Men's Lauren Fragrance to Debut," in DNR, 6 March 1992.

Siroto, Janet, "Ralph Lauren—Looking Back," in Mademoiselle, May 1992.

Moin, David, "Ralph Lauren is Back at Saks in a Big Way," in WWD, 14 October 1992.

Donaton, Scott, and Pat Sloan, "Ralph Lauren Sets Magazine Test," in Advertising Age, 2 November 1992.

Gross, Michael, "The American Dream," in New York, 21 December 1992.

Goldman, Kevin, "More Made-in-the-USA Claims, Surprisingly, are Showing Up," in Wall Street Journal, 15 January 1993.

Gross, Michael, "Ralph's World," in New York, 20 September 1993.

Mower, Sarah, "Ralph Lauren's New World of Sport," in Harper's Bazaar, October 1993.

Rutberg, Sidney, "Goldman, Sachs Buys into Ralph," in WWD, 24 August 1994.

Gill, Brendan, "Lauren's Home Movies," in the New Yorker, 7 November 1994.

Schiros, Anne-Marie, "Ralph Lauren Does What He Does Best," in the New York Times, 6 April 1995.

- Menkes, Suzy, "Lauren: An Oscar for Polish," in the International Herald Tribune, 9 April 1995.
- "Einer fur alle: Ralph Lauren, der Lifestyle-Spezialist," in Vogue Manner (Munich), April 1995.
- Malone, Maggie, and John Leland, "Of Walls and Wanting," in Newsweek, 8 January 1996.
- Goldstein, Lauren, "Ralph Lauren, Prince Charles, and You!" in Fortune, 9 November 1998.
- "Polo Ralph Lauren Gets License Agreement with Danskin," in United Press International, 2 February 1999.
- Keith, Andrew, and Elaine Marshall, "Ralph's Rough Ride," in Time, 15 March 1999.
- "Food is Fashion," in Restaurants & Institutions, 15 April 1999.
- Furman, Phyllis, "Ralph Lauren Teams with NBC for E-Commerce Company," in the Daily News, 7 February 2000.
- Baker, John F., "A Fashion Statement," in Publishers Weekly, 27 March 2000.
- Weldon, Kristi, "Polo Sprints into the 21st Century," in Apparel Industry Magazine, June 2000.
- Rubenstein, Hal, "The Look of Ralph Lauren," in In Style, 1 September 2000.
- Geller, Adam, "Luxury Retailer Closing Polo Stores," in AP Online, 5 October 2000.
- "Style Guides," in Forbes, 9 October 2000.
- "Lauren Creates the Polo Line, October 18, 1969," in DISCovering U.S. History, available online at galenet.gale.com, 17 October 2000.
- "Ralph Lauren," in DISCovering U.S. History, online at galenet.gale.com, 17 October 2000.
- Deeny, Godfrey, "Ralph's Riders," in Fashion Wire Daily, online at fashionwindows.com, 14 February 2001.
- Horyn, Cathy, "For Kors and Lauren, A Fondness for the Paddock," in the New York Times, 15 February 2001.
- Limander, Armand, "Fall 2001 Ready-to-Wear," online at Style.com, 17 February 2001.
- Davis, Boyd, "Ralph Lauren," online at fashionwindows.com, 2 June 2001.
- Redstone, Susan, "Menwear Spring 2001," in online at fashionwindows.com, 2 June 2001.

* * *

Style, as opposed to fashion, is the major imperative underlying Ralph Lauren's work. Initially a designer of the high-quality ties that started the Polo label, Lauren soon directed his talents to menswear. Inspired by such notable dressers as the Duke of Windsor, Cary Grant, and Fred Astaire, he began to produce classic lines derivative of the elegant man about town or the country squire of a bygone age. A love of the fashions of the F. Scott Fitzgerald era led him to introduce wide neckties and bold shirt patterns. In 1974 Lauren achieved world acclaim as the designer of the men's fashions in the film version of F. Scott Fitzgerald's novel The Great Gatsby.

When he turned to womenswear, Lauren applied the same qualities of timeless elegance to his designs. By using uniformly high-quality tweeds, tailoring down men's trousers and jackets, and producing shirts in finer cottons, Lauren created clothes for the active woman of the 1970s, as epitomized in the Annie Hall look. These classic, tailored garments have changed little since they were first introduced but continue to epitomize long-lasting quality and style.

Another side of Lauren is seen in his Roughwear clothing. Directly inspired by the tradition of America's past, Roughwear takes the form of long tweed or plain skirts combined with colorful, hand-knitted, Fair Isle or sampler sweaters, tartan scarves, trilby hats, and lumberjack's wind cheaters and brushed cotton shirts. The origins are easy to trace, but the result is an updated, truly American style. Romantic touches of Edwardian and Victorian times occur in lace-trimmed jabots and large collars delicately held together with aging cameo brooches. Shades of the classic English riding costume appear in his tailored tweed jackets. Lauren's contribution to fashion can perhaps best be summed up on the names that he gave to his cosmetics introduced in 1981: Day, Night, and Active.

In the 1990s, Lauren continued to tune into contemporary life. The Double RL label featured new, high-quality clothes that looked old as a response to the craze for the vintage and second-hand. For increasingly fitness-conscious women, he produced informal clothes with a strong fashion input. To appeal to the youthful interests of younger customers, Polo Jeans launched a line of contemporary casualwear in 1996. Two years later, Lauren's trademark aesthetic sensibility and superior craftsmanship was applied to the Polo Sport RLX line of high-performance athletic apparel.

As the new millennium approached, the Ralph Lauren Company began moving from Ivy League to pop culture by acquiring Canadian-based Club Monaco, marketing contemporary apparel, home furnishings, accessories, and cosmetics for the hip, urban crowd. In 2000, Ralph Lauren Media launched the Polo.com website, offering "comprehensive online access to the Ralph Lauren American lifestyle with clothing, accessories, fragrances, vintage items, travel, style tips, multimedia information and entertainment, world-class customer service and more." With son David Lauren as creative director, Polo.com aimed to "spread the upper-crust Ralph Lauren image to a new generation of shoppers," wrote Phyllis Furman in a February 2000 article in the Daily News.

Still, Lauren's womenswear for fall 2001 came full circle, offering the classic styling of equestrian looks from the country estate such as hacking jackets, taupe and ebony pants with suede knee patches, sleek crocodile belts with thoroughbred buckles, and riding boots with oilcloth spats. For the menswear spring 2001 collection, the timeless Polo line was updated with slim polo shirts and lime green, Nantucket red, and hot orange fuchsia-front trousers. The more dressed up Purple Line offered suits with sculpted waists and soft natural shoulders, paired with striped ties, creating the classic Lauren look.

Lauren's skill and experience has enabled him to design for women and men, their children, and their homes. As a native New Yorker, Lauren has promoted a truly American casual style in his prairie look while developing classic, uncluttered lines that have brought him international fame. Along with colleagues Bill Blass, Geoffrey Beene, and six other designers, Lauren earned a white bronze and granite marker along the Fashion Walk of Fame in New York City. This worldwide notoriety will also be the subject of a new biography of Lauren, the story, according to a March 2000 article in Publishers Weekly, of "a poor Russian Jewish immigrant boy who began in Seventh Avenue fashion house stock rooms and became a billionaire."

For Ralph Lauren, fashion is something that lasts for more than one season. It is this timelessness, abetted by inspirations deep in the soil of America's past, that distinguishes his work and won him a Lifetime Achievement award from the Council of Fashion Designers of America in 1992.

—Hazel Clark; updated by Jodi Essey-Stapleton

LAURENT, Yves Saint

See SAINT LAURENT, Yves

LEATHERS, Peter

See PETER HOGGARD

LEE, Mickey

Chinese designer

Education: Graduated in commercial and industrial design from Hong Kong Polytechnic, 1973, interior design from Leeds Polytechnic, England, 1976, and advanced fashion and illustration, St. Martin's School of Art and Design, London, 1977. Career: Fashion designer for various Hong Kong garment manufacturers, 1978–83; established own design studio, mainly providing fashions and illustration for promotional projects, 1983; fashion consultant, then head of design and merchandise, Hwa Kay Thai Development Company for Puma; graphic and interior designer of Puma boutiques; director/fashion consultant of own company, Highmax International Ltd.; launched fashion and lifestyle product range for young people, Living Basic. Address: Highmax International Ltd., 13/F Zoroastrian Building, 101 Leighton Road, Hong Kong.

PUBLICATIONS

On LEE:

Articles

- “The Puma Suede,” in the New York Times, 21 February 1993.
- “Doyle Swaps Sneaker Accounts,” in the New York Times, 29 April 1994.
- “Puma AG: Pretax Profit is Reported for Year’s First Five Months,” in the Wall Street Journal, 21 June 1994.
- McAllister, Bob, “Can Hollywood Raise Puma’s U.S. Growl?” in Footwear News, 2 December 1996.
- Lefton, Terry, “Puma Nears Four-Year NBA Deal; Reborn Browns Ink McD’s and BK,” in Brandweek, 31 May 1999.
- Carr, Debra, “To The Max: Athletic Companies are Taking Sporty Design to the Next Level,” in Footwear News, 31 July 2000.
- “Closing In,” in Footwear News, 20 November 2000.
- Feitberg, Rosemary, “Labels Try the Training Game,” in WWD, 22 March 2001.

* * *

In 1983, Hwa Kay Thai (Hong Kong) Ltd. bought the design and merchandising licence for Puma Hong Kong from its Herzogenaurach, Germany-based parent company, Puma AG Rudolph Dassler Sport. Mickey Lee was employed as their design consultant and so began a design success story. The business has expanded geographically to encompass Thailand, Singapore, and China, and the product range has developed likewise. Lee has taken Puma from basic sportswear into a complete range of leisurewear and accessories. He created the concept of a healthy and energetic lifestyle especially, for Hong Kong young people. “Live the Puma life,” is the slogan catching on with Hong Kong’s younger generation.

Lee became director, in charge of the design of the products, merchandising, and even the window displays of the Puma shops, with five assistants at his beck and call. For the greater part of his time with the company, he did most of the designing, consisting of two annual fashion collections and an accessory collection, plus promotional materials. Lee spearheaded the creation of a market-orientated image very different from Puma AG’s original vision. Germany now controls only the quality of the workmanship and influences technological aspects, like the composition of sports shoes.

From the original tracksuits and swimsuits, Puma’s clothing range grew to include jeans and other forms of leisurewear. The clothes are medium priced and mass-market, functional, but enlivened with fashion details and up-to-date cutting. The original bags gave way to lively accessories suited to the particular demands of Hong Kong. Backpacks and weekend bags in bright colors or sensible black are much in demand in a place where people tend to go away for short trips, such as nearby Macau or China. Around 80 percent of Puma’s merchandise is for men; black and white are the staple colors, with sprinklings of seasonal color trends. The image is masculine and sporty, and the womenswear aims to project a feminine but equally healthy look. Lee pays attention to international design directions but does not consciously follow trends; his strongest inspiration comes from Japan, whose young people provide style models for Hong Kong.

Puma offers a totally coordinated image—everything relates. The garments and accessories have their own color scheme, characterized by brights. The first Puma boutiques were opened in Hong Kong, and there one experiences the full impact of Lee’s total design image. In addition to the clothing design and store decor, he was also responsible for the promotion and publicity materials. Television commercials and brochures have an annual theme; set in faraway locations such as Kenya, Egypt, or Moscow, they are exciting and create an impact.

Lee has complete artistic control; his varied background, in graphic, interior, and fashion design has served Puma well. He credits himself with developing the swimsuit, jeans, and accessory ranges, but this is underplaying his influence. He has increased the company’s profits by creating a lively design image. It has proved just right for its target market, but is strong enough to be equally successful further afield.

Due to the ever-prevailing influences of Lee, Puma has made great strides in capturing more of the global footwear and activewear trade. Although not as popular in the U.S. as the company is abroad, Puma has been moving in the fast lane of the athleticwear market. In 1996 film producer Arnon Milchan supplied investment capital to help place Puma into the mainstream athletic footwear scene via Hollywood connections. The producer of such well known films as Free Willy, JFK, and A Time to Kill, Milchan had the power to help boost Puma’s sales in America.

In 1998, with a quarter stake of Logo Athletic clothing, Puma leapt into the licensed sports clothing market. The “jumping cat” logo of Puma progressed as far as the NBA courts and the NFL, stepping in where their predecessor, Starter, had failed (Starter declared bankruptcy in 1999, providing a golden opportunity for the Lee-enhanced Puma image). In addition, Puma sponsored sports camps and clinics targeted at young male and female athletes, and signed high-profile athletes, including tennis star Serena Williams, to endorse its products.

With their NBA move, Puma began competing with its rival German brand, Adidas (owned by the brother of Puma AG’s CEO Rudolf Dassler), and was instantly catapulted into the U.S. retail limelight. Puma opened two concept stores in California, the first in Santa Monica and the second in San Francisco, to great success. The company also began offering signature collections and limited editions, entrenching itself as a staple of footwear and apparel suppliers. Puma continues to be known for the quality, comfort, and durability of its products; even its up-to-date lacing systems are in keeping with the fashionable quest for the perfect all-terrain shoe. Thanks to the innovative contributions of a modest designer, Mickey Lee, Puma regained its status as not only a Western and European phenomenon but also as a global contender in the athleticwear arena.

—Hazel Clark; updated by Sandra Schroeder

LÉGER, Hervé

French fashion designer

Born: Bapaume, Pas de Calais, France, 30 May 1957. Education: Studied in Paris until 1975. Career: Designed hats for Venus et Neptune, Pablo Delia, Dick Brandsma, 1975–77; assistant for Tan

Hervé Léger walking down the catwalk with his models after showing his autumn/winter 1999–2000 ready-to-wear collection.
© AFP/CORBIS.

Giudicelli, couture and ready-to-wear, 1977–80; assistant to Karl Lagerfeld, furs, ready-to-wear, swimsuits, and accessories at Fendi, 1980–82; designer for Chanel, 1982–83; designer for Cadette, Milan, 1983–85; founded own company, MCH Diffusion, 1985; opened boutique on rue Pelican, Paris, assistant at Lanvin for couture and ready-to-wear, and assistant to Diane von Furstenberg, 1985; designed fur collection for Chloé, 1987; created accessory collection for Swarovski (Vattens, Austria) and ready-to-wear collections for Charles Jourdan, 1988–92; partnership with G.H. Mumm & Compagnie, 1992; designed theatre costumes for Les Troyens, Milan, 1992; first ready-to-wear collection for Hervé Léger S.A., 1993; costumes for Trois Ballets, Opéra de Paris, 1994; Mumm controlling interest sold to BCBG Max Azria, 1998; Léger left company, 1999; opened boutique in Left Bank, 2000.

PUBLICATIONS

On LÉGER:

Books

Stegemeyer, Anne, Who's Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.

Articles

"Day for Night Body Dresses Make All the Right Moves," in Elle (New York), May 1991.

Carter, Charla, "Hervé Legér, Paris' Newest Design Talent Proves He Knows How to Throw a Curve," in Vogue, March 1992.

Spindler, Amy, "Alaïa and Legér Loosen Up a Bit," in the New York Times, 20 March 1993.

Deitch, Brian, "Hervé's Legerdemain," in Women's Fashion Europe, December/January 1993–94.

Quick, Harriet, "Legér Wear," in Elle (London), April 1994.

Doe, Tamasin, "Splashing Out on that Curvy Feeling," in the Evening Standard (London), 21 June 1994.

Min, Janet, and K. Nolan, "King of Cling: Fashion Designer Hervé Legér," in People Weekly, 31 October 1994.

Menkes, Suzy, "Paris Silhouette in Flux," in the International Herald Tribune, 15 October 1996.

White, Constance C.R., "Azria Backs Hervé Léger," in the New York Times, 11 August 1998.

Avins, Mimi, "L.A.'s BCBG Takes Control of France's Hervé Léger," in the Los Angeles Times, 11 August 1998.

Walton, A. Scott, "Paris Fashion Week: Valentino, Celine and Léger: The End—For Now," in the Atlanta Journal-Constitution, 19 October 1998.

Menkes, Suzy, "Yohji Yamamoto Defines the Spring Season with Tenderness and Wit," in the International Herald Tribune, 20 October 1998.

Lowthorpe, Rebecca, "Designer Loses His Own Label," in the Independent (London), 21 April 1999.

"The Chic of It! Ex-Model Gets the Designer Boot," in the The Guardian (London), 17 September 1999.

Menkes, Suzy, "For 'Young' Designers, 40 is a Dangerous Age," in the International Herald Tribune, 7 October 1999.

Walton, A. Scott, "Fashion Week: Léger's New Look Emphasizes Youth," in the Atlanta Journal-Constitution, 5 October 1999.

Donnally, Trish, "Shop Talk," in the San Francisco Chronicle, 4 January 2000.

limelight. Puma opened two concept stores in California, the first in Santa Monica and the second in San Francisco, to great success. The company also began offering signature collections and limited editions, entrenching itself as a staple of footwear and apparel suppliers. Puma continues to be known for the quality, comfort, and durability of its products; even its up-to-date lacing systems are in keeping with the fashionable quest for the perfect all-terrain shoe. Thanks to the innovative contributions of a modest designer, Mickey Lee, Puma regained its status as not only a Western and European phenomenon but also as a global contender in the athleticwear arena.

—Hazel Clark; updated by Sandra Schroeder

LÉGER, Hervé

French fashion designer

Born: Bapaume, Pas de Calais, France, 30 May 1957. Education: Studied in Paris until 1975. Career: Designed hats for Venus et Neptune, Pablo Delia, Dick Brandsma, 1975–77; assistant for Tan

Hervé Léger walking down the catwalk with his models after showing his autumn/winter 1999–2000 ready-to-wear collection.
© AFP/CORBIS.

Giudicelli, couture and ready-to-wear, 1977–80; assistant to Karl Lagerfeld, furs, ready-to-wear, swimsuits, and accessories at Fendi, 1980–82; designer for Chanel, 1982–83; designer for Cadette, Milan, 1983–85; founded own company, MCH Diffusion, 1985; opened boutique on rue Pelican, Paris, assistant at Lanvin for couture and ready-to-wear, and assistant to Diane von Furstenberg, 1985; designed fur collection for Chloé, 1987; created accessory collection for Swarovski (Vattens, Austria) and ready-to-wear collections for Charles Jourdan, 1988–92; partnership with G.H. Mumm & Compagnie, 1992; designed theatre costumes for Les Troyens, Milan, 1992; first ready-to-wear collection for Hervé Léger S.A., 1993; costumes for Trois Ballets, Opéra de Paris, 1994; Mumm controlling interest sold to BCBG Max Azria, 1998; Léger left company, 1999; opened boutique in Left Bank, 2000.

PUBLICATIONS

On LÉGER:

Books

Stegemeyer, Anne, Who's Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.

Articles

"Day for Night Body Dresses Make All the Right Moves," in Elle (New York), May 1991.

Carter, Charla, "Hervé Legér, Paris' Newest Design Talent Proves He Knows How to Throw a Curve," in Vogue, March 1992.

Spindler, Amy, "Alaïa and Legér Loosen Up a Bit," in the New York Times, 20 March 1993.

Deitch, Brian, "Hervé's Legerdemain," in Women's Fashion Europe, December/January 1993–94.

Quick, Harriet, "Legér Wear," in Elle (London), April 1994.

Doe, Tamasin, "Splashing Out on that Curvy Feeling," in the Evening Standard (London), 21 June 1994.

Min, Janet, and K. Nolan, "King of Cling: Fashion Designer Hervé Legér," in People Weekly, 31 October 1994.

Menkes, Suzy, "Paris Silhouette in Flux," in the International Herald Tribune, 15 October 1996.

White, Constance C.R., "Azria Backs Hervé Léger," in the New York Times, 11 August 1998.

Avins, Mimi, "L.A.'s BCBG Takes Control of France's Hervé Léger," in the Los Angeles Times, 11 August 1998.

Walton, A. Scott, "Paris Fashion Week: Valentino, Celine and Léger: The End—For Now," in the Atlanta Journal-Constitution, 19 October 1998.

Menkes, Suzy, "Yohji Yamamoto Defines the Spring Season with Tenderness and Wit," in the International Herald Tribune, 20 October 1998.

Lowthorpe, Rebecca, "Designer Loses His Own Label," in the Independent (London), 21 April 1999.

"The Chic of It! Ex-Model Gets the Designer Boot," in the The Guardian (London), 17 September 1999.

Menkes, Suzy, "For 'Young' Designers, 40 is a Dangerous Age," in the International Herald Tribune, 7 October 1999.

Walton, A. Scott, "Fashion Week: Léger's New Look Emphasizes Youth," in the Atlanta Journal-Constitution, 5 October 1999.

Donnally, Trish, "Shop Talk," in the San Francisco Chronicle, 4 January 2000.

- Menkes, Suzy, "The Comeback Kids: Customers, Old and New, Track Down Fashion's Hidden Assets," in the International Herald Tribune, 13 June 2000.
- _____, "In Paris, a Craving for the Exotic," in the International Herald Tribune, 17 July 2001.

*

In interviews I try systematically to dodge the connotation "artist, designer." The French word créateur seems to me particularly bombastic. I usually avoid theories on fashion in terms of "art" and I hate definitions on style. On the other hand, I always insist on the quality of my work. People will always appreciate quality. Quoting Madeleine Vionnet, to her niece, I used to say, "We are not rich enough to buy cheap."

The quality "hand-sewn," or "good investment," or "good value," is a rather original attitude when one thinks about it. The dissertation on fashion has a tendency to glorify the short-lived, the novel, the whim, ostentatious consumption rather than the everlasting. I think it's a pity.

Two consumer types exist for me: the first, "crazy about fashion," or "fashion victim," will irrevocably conform to the fashion of the designers and systematically adopt their outlook. The second type of woman, the one I prefer, is fed up with the vagaries of fashion. She will not act as a guinea pig for the designer's "experiments." She does not give a damn about the trends, she refuses to be a feminine clothes hanger. My fashion is made for that woman, to help her to express herself. I do not use women to express my world vision.

—Hervé Léger

* * *

If any designer heralded the shift away from the deconstructed, loose, long shapes of the early 1990s it was Hervé Léger. His clothes, based on the deceptively simple principles of Lycra and spandex-rich fabrics pulling the body into the desired hourglass shape, have made him the darling of the fashion world. Tired of the austerity of recession dressing and eager for a contrary style that would revive a sense of glamor and flatter the wearer with its overblown femininity, Léger's work was warmly embraced during the 1990s both by fashion opinion-makers and the rock stars, models, and minor royalty who are his most publicized clients.

His dresses have the properties formally associated with foundation garments: the ability to mold the body and keep it in place. They enhance the figure, metamorphosing the wearer into cartoonlike proportions with full bust and hips. If this exaggeratedly feminine image is in direct contradiction to the narrow adolescent silhouette that had preceded and has run parallel with Léger's vision, it has nevertheless struck a chord with women wishing to relish their sexuality and are unafraid of displaying their redefined body in the modern equivalent to tight-laced corsetry.

Chiming in with the postfeminist doctrine of Naomi Wolf and Camille Paglia, which promotes the reclaiming of the right to enhance and emphasize the figure, this trend, labeled new glamor, is unashamed in its devotion to the female form. It is the latter that undoubtedly inspires Léger, his creations geared toward maximizing the purity of the curving lines of his models. His most obvious predecessor is the Algerian designer Azzedine Alaïa, who rose to fame in the late 1980s with his clingy Lycra creations, which Léger so clearly referred to in the overt sexiness of his own work.

Léger, however, developed the style further, exploiting the stretchy qualities of Lycra and spandex to the full, so that the dresses became more restrictive and better able to maintain the desired shape. His signature outfits, known as "bender" dresses, are composed of narrow strips of these elastic materials combined with rayon, which are sewn horizontally like bandages to form the whole shape of the garment, sometimes with extra bands curving over the hips and across the bust to add emphasis. Even on the hanger, therefore, they have a three-dimensional quality, so reliant are they on the Olympian figure they at once create and emulate.

Léger produces innumerable variations of this "bender" style, all equally flattering, the fabric eliminating any faults in the figure to produce smooth hourglasses. For all their glamor, his clothes avoid brashness through their lack of any unnecessary detail or decoration; their interest is in their shaping and the subtle Parisian tones in which they are produced. He concentrates on classic black, navy, white, and cream, tempered by stripes of burnt orange on halter dresses reminiscent of 1930s swimwear and delicate pastels with dark bodices.

By the middle of the 1990s, Léger had softened the banded look a bit. His 1997 spring/summer line included dresses with elegant cutout midriffs and sailor suits with light organza jackets. Léger's evening line has always been strong, so during this time his challenge was to create a daywear line to hold its own. Transforming women into Amazonian figures or goddesslike nymphs, his name gained importance with the increasing desire to express rather than obscure the potential sexuality of clothing. His dresses have adorned the likes of Halle Berry, Tyra Banks, Celine Dion, Fran Drescher, Christine Lahti, and Gillian Anderson. The downside, however, to creating such a well-defined signature style is the perception of becoming repetitive. Léger was able to adapt his look to the latest trend but was still seen by some critics as being in a rut.

In 1998 Los Angeles-based BCBG Max Azria purchased a controlling interest in the Hervé Léger fashion house from G.H. Mumm & Compagnie (itself a subsidiary of Seagram & Co.). Azria felt the addition of Léger's line would strengthen his company's global presence. Léger remained the designer of his line and was promised "unconditional support." The relationship soured, however, when BCBG cut the budget and Léger refused to cooperate. He was fired just six months after the takeover, forcing him to start from scratch. Léger initiated a lawsuit to regain his name and set out in a new direction; he signed a contract in 1999 to design clothing for Wolford, an Austrian company known for its hosiery. The line debuted in the company's first store, based in San Francisco, in the spring of 2000 with ready-to-wear designs made of merino wool and viscose.

The following year, 2001, marked the opening of Léger's own shop under the name Hervé L. Leroux in Paris. Former clients, still enthusiastic about his work, have managed to locate him by word of mouth. The designer remains focused on eveningwear and creates custom pieces for clients who have the desire and the means (which usually run around $7,000). Leroux (Léger) continues to spotlight his innovative designs, now with an even fresher outlook. His summer 2001 presentation in Paris featured draped dresses, cut with tucks in the bodice, forcing the fabric to hug the neck, leaving the back strikingly bare.

Léger's concentration on the ability of clothing to create the desired flattering silhouette, through manipulation of fabrics and eye-arresting details, owes its legacy to his couture background. His time at great houses like Chanel, Fendi, and Chloé enabled him to witness the power of a thoughtfully cut ensemble to transform the wearer. His homage to the goddesslike form touched on the desire to demonstrate beauty through strong, clear lines and sexually charged imagery that his clinging dresses so literally embodied.

—Rebecca Arnold; updated by Carrie Snyder

LEHL, Jürgen

German designer working in Japan

Born: Poland, 1944. Education: Trained as textile designer, 1962–66; freelance designer in France, 1967–69; moved to New York, 1969; moved to Japan, 1971. Career: Textile designer, 1970–74; formed Jürgen Lehl Co. Ltd., 1972; showed first ready-to-wear collection, 1974; also designer, bed and bath Tint collections. Exhibitions: Contemporary Fabric Exhibition, Kyoto International Conference Center, 1992; Seasonal Exhibition, Tokyo; Cooper-Hewitt Museum, New York; Koromo-Stoffe Zwischen Zwei Welten (Fabrics Between Two Worlds), Museum für Angewandte Kunst, Cologne, 1998; Fashions by Jürgen Lehl, Gemeentemuseum den Haag (The Hague), 2000; Jürgen Lehl: A Personal View, London, 2001. Awards: Creative prize, 1991; Best Advertisement award, 1993. Address: 3–1–7 Kiyosumi, Koto-ku, Tokyo 135, Japan.

PUBLICATIONS

On LEHL:

Books

- Tadanori, Yokoo, Made in Japan—The Textiles of Jürgen Lehl, Tokyo, 1983.
 Koren, Leonard, New Fashion Japan, Tokyo, 1984.
 Martin, Richard, and Harold Koda, Flair: Fashion Collected by Tina Chow, New York, 1992.
 Fleischmann, Isa, and Brigitte Tietzel, Koroma-Stoffe Zwischen Zwei Welten, [exhibition catalogue], 1998.
Fashion by Jürgen Lehl, [exhibition catalogue], 2000.

Articles

- “Fashions by Jürgen Lehl,” available online at Gemeentemuseum Den Haag, www.gemeentemuseum.nl, 25 July 2001.
 “Artist Biographies,” Museum of Modern Art, online at www.moma.org, 25 July 2001.
 Featured in “Japan Newsletter,” Embassy of Japan in the U.K., Japan Information and Culture Center, online at www.embjapan.org.uk, 17 October 2000.

* * *

Jürgen Lehl represents a cultural amalgam that is reflected in his design philosophy. Born in Poland of German nationality, he has lived in Japan since 1971. He founded his textile design company, Jürgen Lehl Co. Ltd., in 1972, producing a ready-to-wear line of clothing in 1974.

His clothes convey united elements of both Eastern and Western fashion. In 1982 Lehl’s contemporaries Yohji Yamamoto and Rei Kawakubo of Comme des Garçons founded a fashion revolution when they showed their respective collections in Paris, introducing clothes that were Asian in origin and inspiration, with few concessions to traditional Western ideas of dressing. The clothes presented a design theory that contradicted established Western modes yet immediately became essential dressing for any serious follower of 1980s fashion.

The Japanese invasion permanently altered concepts of fashion in the West. These clothes seemed to owe nothing to trend, reaction, or retrospection but were rather a constantly evolving and refined version of the traditional kimono shape. Multilayered and elaborate in its simplicity, the kimono represents the basis of all Japanese fashion thinking. Lehl’s clothing married Eastern and Western fashion. A man’s jacket in black wool from 1986 combined the notion of Western tailoring with the band neckline of a kimono jacket. His radical minimalism is reflected with a single button that fastens the jacket, with a simplistic buttonhole created logically between the band and the body of the jacket. Lehl is intellectually reductive in his approach to design, reexamining and reducing details to produce unpretentious simplicity.

Lehl is also culturally eclectic in his textile designs, introducing concepts from high art or native idioms in both Western and Asian customs. He is inspired by the unexpected; chance discoveries of old shop signs or even an upturned shoe are applied to his design mechanism of refinement and reduction.

Japanese designers often seem subtle when compared with their Western contemporaries. Their logical, controlled approach has a mathematical precision, a calculation accurately solved. Fabric, texture, and proportion are of supreme importance to the designer. Kansai Yamamoto admits to spending as much as seventy-percent of his time working with textiles, which explains perhaps why Lehl’s career expanded into clothing from his textile design origins.

Lehl’s creations are popular in Japan and are sold there in 44 boutiques. His garments are always made of natural materials—cotton, linen, silk, and wool—and he uses the traditional Japanese dyeing techniques of ikat and shibori. When a major assessment is made of the influence of Japanese designers on contemporary fashion, it should be remembered that the East-to-West design passage is not all one way. Lehl represents the rare phenomenon of a Western designer working in the East.

—Kevin Almond; updated by Carrie Snyder

LEIBER, Judith

American handbag and accessories designer

Born: Judith Peto in Budapest, 11 January 1921; immigrated to the U.S. and moved to New York, 1947. Education: Studied in England, 1938–39; apprenticed with Hungarian Handbag Guild, 1939, became journeyman and first woman Meister. Family: Married Gerson Leiber, 1946. Career: Designer in New York for Nettie Rosenstein, 1948–60, Richard Kort, 1960–61, and Morris Moskowitz Co., 1961–62; launched own firm, 1963; added costume jewelry, mid-1990s; opened Madison Avenue boutique, 1996; retired, 1998; sold business to Time Products, Inc., 1998; resold to Pegasus Apparel Group, 2000; Pegasus Apparel Group became The Leiber Group, 2001. Exhibitions: The Artist and Artisan: Gerson and Judith Leiber, Fine Arts Museum of power of a thoughtfully cut ensemble to transform the wearer. His homage to the goddesslike form touched on the desire to demonstrate beauty through strong, clear lines and sexually charged imagery that his clinging dresses so literally embodied.

—Rebecca Arnold; updated by Carrie Snyder

LEHL, Jürgen

German designer working in Japan

Born: Poland, 1944. Education: Trained as textile designer, 1962–66; freelance designer in France, 1967–69; moved to New York, 1969; moved to Japan, 1971. Career: Textile designer, 1970–74; formed Jürgen Lehl Co. Ltd., 1972; showed first ready-to-wear collection, 1974; also designer, bed and bath Tint collections. Exhibitions: Contemporary Fabric Exhibition, Kyoto International Conference Center, 1992; Seasonal Exhibition, Tokyo; Cooper-Hewitt Museum, New York; Koromo-Stoffe Zwischen Zwei Welten (Fabrics Between Two Worlds), Museum für Angewandte Kunst, Cologne, 1998; Fashions by Jürgen Lehl, Gemeentemuseum den Haag (The Hague), 2000; Jürgen Lehl: A Personal View, London, 2001. Awards: Creative prize, 1991; Best Advertisement award, 1993. Address: 3–1–7 Kiyosumi, Koto-ku, Tokyo 135, Japan.

PUBLICATIONS

On LEHL:

Books

- Tadanori, Yokoo, Made in Japan—The Textiles of Jürgen Lehl, Tokyo, 1983.
 Koren, Leonard, New Fashion Japan, Tokyo, 1984.
 Martin, Richard, and Harold Koda, Flair: Fashion Collected by Tina Chow, New York, 1992.
 Fleischmann, Isa, and Brigitte Tietzel, Koroma-Stoffe Zwischen Zwei Welten, [exhibition catalogue], 1998.
Fashion by Jürgen Lehl, [exhibition catalogue], 2000.

Articles

- “Fashions by Jürgen Lehl,” available online at Gemeentemuseum Den Haag, www.gemeentemuseum.nl, 25 July 2001.
 “Artist Biographies,” Museum of Modern Art, online at www.moma.org, 25 July 2001.
 Featured in “Japan Newsletter,” Embassy of Japan in the U.K., Japan Information and Culture Center, online at www.embjapan.org.uk, 17 October 2000.

* * *

Jürgen Lehl represents a cultural amalgam that is reflected in his design philosophy. Born in Poland of German nationality, he has lived in Japan since 1971. He founded his textile design company, Jürgen Lehl Co. Ltd., in 1972, producing a ready-to-wear line of clothing in 1974.

His clothes convey united elements of both Eastern and Western fashion. In 1982 Lehl’s contemporaries Yohji Yamamoto and Rei Kawakubo of Comme des Garçons founded a fashion revolution when they showed their respective collections in Paris, introducing clothes that were Asian in origin and inspiration, with few concessions to traditional Western ideas of dressing. The clothes presented a design theory that contradicted established Western modes yet immediately became essential dressing for any serious follower of 1980s fashion.

The Japanese invasion permanently altered concepts of fashion in the West. These clothes seemed to owe nothing to trend, reaction, or retrospection but were rather a constantly evolving and refined version of the traditional kimono shape. Multilayered and elaborate in its simplicity, the kimono represents the basis of all Japanese fashion thinking. Lehl’s clothing married Eastern and Western fashion. A man’s jacket in black wool from 1986 combined the notion of Western tailoring with the band neckline of a kimono jacket. His radical minimalism is reflected with a single button that fastens the jacket, with a simplistic buttonhole created logically between the band and the body of the jacket. Lehl is intellectually reductive in his approach to design, reexamining and reducing details to produce unpretentious simplicity.

Lehl is also culturally eclectic in his textile designs, introducing concepts from high art or native idioms in both Western and Asian customs. He is inspired by the unexpected; chance discoveries of old shop signs or even an upturned shoe are applied to his design mechanism of refinement and reduction.

Japanese designers often seem subtle when compared with their Western contemporaries. Their logical, controlled approach has a mathematical precision, a calculation accurately solved. Fabric, texture, and proportion are of supreme importance to the designer. Kansai Yamamoto admits to spending as much as seventy-percent of his time working with textiles, which explains perhaps why Lehl’s career expanded into clothing from his textile design origins.

Lehl’s creations are popular in Japan and are sold there in 44 boutiques. His garments are always made of natural materials—cotton, linen, silk, and wool—and he uses the traditional Japanese dyeing techniques of ikat and shibori. When a major assessment is made of the influence of Japanese designers on contemporary fashion, it should be remembered that the East-to-West design passage is not all one way. Lehl represents the rare phenomenon of a Western designer working in the East.

—Kevin Almond; updated by Carrie Snyder

LEIBER, Judith

American handbag and accessories designer

Born: Judith Peto in Budapest, 11 January 1921; immigrated to the U.S. and moved to New York, 1947. Education: Studied in England, 1938–39; apprenticed with Hungarian Handbag Guild, 1939, became journeyman and first woman Meister. Family: Married Gerson Leiber, 1946. Career: Designer in New York for Nettie Rosenstein, 1948–60, Richard Kort, 1960–61, and Morris Moskowitz Co., 1961–62; launched own firm, 1963; added costume jewelry, mid-1990s; opened Madison Avenue boutique, 1996; retired, 1998; sold business to Time Products, Inc., 1998; resold to Pegasus Apparel Group, 2000; Pegasus Apparel Group became The Leiber Group, 2001. Exhibitions: The Artist and Artisan: Gerson and Judith Leiber, Fine Arts Museum of power of a thoughtfully cut ensemble to transform the wearer. His homage to the goddesslike form touched on the desire to demonstrate beauty through strong, clear lines and sexually charged imagery that his clinging dresses so literally embodied.

—Rebecca Arnold; updated by Carrie Snyder

LEHL, Jürgen

German designer working in Japan

Born: Poland, 1944. Education: Trained as textile designer, 1962–66; freelance designer in France, 1967–69; moved to New York, 1969; moved to Japan, 1971. Career: Textile designer, 1970–74; formed Jürgen Lehl Co. Ltd., 1972; showed first ready-to-wear collection, 1974; also designer, bed and bath Tint collections. Exhibitions: Contemporary Fabric Exhibition, Kyoto International Conference Center, 1992; Seasonal Exhibition, Tokyo; Cooper-Hewitt Museum, New York; Koromo-Stoffe Zwischen Zwei Welten (Fabrics Between Two Worlds), Museum für Angewandte Kunst, Cologne, 1998; Fashions by Jürgen Lehl, Gemeentemuseum den Haag (The Hague), 2000; Jürgen Lehl: A Personal View, London, 2001. Awards: Creative prize, 1991; Best Advertisement award, 1993. Address: 3–1–7 Kiyosumi, Koto-ku, Tokyo 135, Japan.

PUBLICATIONS

On LEHL:

Books

- Tadanori, Yokoo, Made in Japan—The Textiles of Jürgen Lehl, Tokyo, 1983.
 Koren, Leonard, New Fashion Japan, Tokyo, 1984.
 Martin, Richard, and Harold Koda, Flair: Fashion Collected by Tina Chow, New York, 1992.
 Fleischmann, Isa, and Brigitte Tietzel, Koroma-Stoffe Zwischen Zwei Welten, [exhibition catalogue], 1998.
Fashion by Jürgen Lehl, [exhibition catalogue], 2000.

Articles

- “Fashions by Jürgen Lehl,” available online at Gemeentemuseum Den Haag, www.gemeentemuseum.nl, 25 July 2001.
 “Artist Biographies,” Museum of Modern Art, online at www.moma.org, 25 July 2001.
 Featured in “Japan Newsletter,” Embassy of Japan in the U.K., Japan Information and Culture Center, online at www.embjapan.org.uk, 17 October 2000.

* * *

Jürgen Lehl represents a cultural amalgam that is reflected in his design philosophy. Born in Poland of German nationality, he has lived in Japan since 1971. He founded his textile design company, Jürgen Lehl Co. Ltd., in 1972, producing a ready-to-wear line of clothing in 1974.

His clothes convey united elements of both Eastern and Western fashion. In 1982 Lehl’s contemporaries Yohji Yamamoto and Rei Kawakubo of Comme des Garçons founded a fashion revolution when they showed their respective collections in Paris, introducing clothes that were Asian in origin and inspiration, with few concessions to traditional Western ideas of dressing. The clothes presented a design theory that contradicted established Western modes yet immediately became essential dressing for any serious follower of 1980s fashion.

The Japanese invasion permanently altered concepts of fashion in the West. These clothes seemed to owe nothing to trend, reaction, or retrospection but were rather a constantly evolving and refined version of the traditional kimono shape. Multilayered and elaborate in its simplicity, the kimono represents the basis of all Japanese fashion thinking. Lehl’s clothing married Eastern and Western fashion. A man’s jacket in black wool from 1986 combined the notion of Western tailoring with the band neckline of a kimono jacket. His radical minimalism is reflected with a single button that fastens the jacket, with a simplistic buttonhole created logically between the band and the body of the jacket. Lehl is intellectually reductive in his approach to design, reexamining and reducing details to produce unpretentious simplicity.

Lehl is also culturally eclectic in his textile designs, introducing concepts from high art or native idioms in both Western and Asian customs. He is inspired by the unexpected; chance discoveries of old shop signs or even an upturned shoe are applied to his design mechanism of refinement and reduction.

Japanese designers often seem subtle when compared with their Western contemporaries. Their logical, controlled approach has a mathematical precision, a calculation accurately solved. Fabric, texture, and proportion are of supreme importance to the designer. Kansai Yamamoto admits to spending as much as seventy-percent of his time working with textiles, which explains perhaps why Lehl’s career expanded into clothing from his textile design origins.

Lehl’s creations are popular in Japan and are sold there in 44 boutiques. His garments are always made of natural materials—cotton, linen, silk, and wool—and he uses the traditional Japanese dyeing techniques of ikat and shibori. When a major assessment is made of the influence of Japanese designers on contemporary fashion, it should be remembered that the East-to-West design passage is not all one way. Lehl represents the rare phenomenon of a Western designer working in the East.

—Kevin Almond; updated by Carrie Snyder

LEIBER, Judith

American handbag and accessories designer

Born: Judith Peto in Budapest, 11 January 1921; immigrated to the U.S. and moved to New York, 1947. Education: Studied in England, 1938–39; apprenticed with Hungarian Handbag Guild, 1939, became journeyman and first woman Meister. Family: Married Gerson Leiber, 1946. Career: Designer in New York for Nettie Rosenstein, 1948–60, Richard Kort, 1960–61, and Morris Moskowitz Co., 1961–62; launched own firm, 1963; added costume jewelry, mid-1990s; opened Madison Avenue boutique, 1996; retired, 1998; sold business to Time Products, Inc., 1998; resold to Pegasus Apparel Group, 2000; Pegasus Apparel Group became The Leiber Group, 2001. Exhibitions: The Artist and Artisan: Gerson and Judith Leiber, Fine Arts Museum of Long Island, 1991; Judith Leiber, The Artful Handbag, Museum at the Fashion Institute of Technology, New York, 1994; Spring Retroactive, Atlanta, GA, 2001; Collections: Permanent displays in the Metropolitan Museum of Art (New York), Smithsonian Institution (Washington, D.C.), and the Victoria and Albert Museum (London). Awards: Swarovski Great Designer award; Coty American Fashion Critics award, 1973; Neiman Marcus award, 1980; Foundation for the Fashion Industries award, New York, 1991; Silver Slipper award, Houston Museum of Fine Arts Costume Institute, 1991; Handbag Designer of the Year award, 1992; Council of Fashion Designers of America award, 1993; Council of Fashion Designers of America Lifetime Achievement award, 1994; Dallas Fashion award for Excellence. Address: 20 West 33rd Street, New York, NY 10001, USA.

PUBLICATIONS

On LEIBER:

Books

- Martin, Richard, The Artist & Artisan: Gerson and Judith Leiber, [exhibition catalogue], Hempstead, NY, 1991.
 Nemy, Enid, Judith Leiber, [exhibition catalogue], New York, 1994.
 ———, Judith Leiber: The Artful Handbag, New York, 1995.
 Stegemeyer, Anne, Who's Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.

Articles

- Jakobson, Cathryn, "Clutch Play: In Judith Leiber's Line of Work, the Fun Is in the Bag," in Manhattan, Inc., February 1986.
 Newman, Jill, "Judith Leiber: The Art of the Handbag," in WWD, August 1986.
 Johnson, Bonnie, "Judith Leiber's Customers are left Holding the Bag," in People Weekly, 20 April 1987.
 Harris, Leon, and Matthew Klein, "Judith's Jewels," in Town & Country, December 1988.
 Van Gelder, Lindsey, "It's in the Bag," in Connoisseur (New York), April 1990.
 Morris, Bernadine, "Flights of Fancy Take Shape in Lush Evening Bags," in the New York Times, 18 December 1990.
 "Houston Costume Museum to Honor Leiber Saturday," in WWD, 25 January 1991.
 Peacock, Mary, "The Whimsy of Judith Leiber's Handbag Designs Comes Through in the Clutch," in Departures, December/January 1991–92.
 "Splurge: Judith Leiber's Handbags," in the New Yorker, 25 May 1992.
 Newman, Jill, "Judith Leiber; Leader in Luxury," in WWD, 6 November 1992.
 ———, "British Watch Giant Buys Judith Leiber," in WWD, 8 March 1993.
 Menkes, Suzy, "Just a Handful of Art," in the International Herald Tribune, 22 November 1994.
 Morris, Bernadine, "The Portable Art of Leiber Handbags," in the New York Times, 25 November 1994.
 White, Constance C.R., "A Leiber Jewelry Line," in New York Times, 9 May 1995.

Witchel, Alex, "Handbags That Make Headlines," in the New York Times, 1 May 1996.

———, "Handbag Designer Leiber Proves Talent More Than Skin-Deep," in Commercial Appeal (Memphis, TN), 9 June 1996.

"Judith Leiber," in Current Biography, September 1996.

Klensch, Elsa, "Leiber's Delightfully Deluxe Bags," available online at CNN Style, www.cnn.com, 19 December 1997.

Bold, Kathryn, "Accessories: For Many Women, Dressing to Impress is Simply in the Bag," in the Los Angeles Times, 26 December 1997.

Schiro, Anne-Marie, "Judith Leiber is Retiring," in the New York Times, 13 January 1998.

Barron, Susannah, "Style: Off the Cuff," in The Guardian (London), 21 January 1998.

Brown, Hero, "Is it Worth it?" in the Independent Sunday (London), 24 May 1998.

"Prize Purses," in the Tampa Tribune, 23 March 1999.

"Bag Maker for Sale," in the Times (London), 19 June 1999.

"Time Products Pounds 9m Disposal," in the Times (London), 29 September 2000.

"Diary of a Dainty Duffel: Laura Bush's Bag Lady Has Lots of Experience Accessorizing First Ladies," in the New York Post, 18 January 2001.

Walton, A. Scott, "Style: Leiber Bags Reign as Fine Art Holdings," in the Atlanta Journal-Constitution, 18 March 2001.

"New Name and CEO for Troubled Pegasus," in Fashion Wire Daily, online at Tradeweave Retail Network, www.insight-tradeweave.com, 22 May 2001.

*

I love to design beautiful objects that can be worn of course, whether it is made of alligator, ostrich, lizard or silk, or a great metal box/minaudière that can be held in the lady's hand. Top quality is a great concern and it pleases me greatly to keep that paramount. Today's fashions really cry out for beautiful accessories, be they belts, handbags or great jewelry.

—Judit Leiber

* * *

Judith Leiber talks of herself as a technician and prides herself on the Budapest-trained craft tradition she exemplifies and continues. But her skill and the consummate perfection of her workshop are only one aspect of the recognition of her work. She is steadfast in advancing the artistic possibility of the handbag, and she is unceasing in her own artistic pursuits of this goal. Yet, as Mary Peacock averred, "A sense of whimsy is integral to Leiber's vision," as the committed pursuit of craft is matched with a stylish wit and the cultural cleverness that is akin to craft's creativity. A Leiber handbag is an item of expert handiwork and engineering, but it is also a charm, a potent amulet, and a beguiling object of beauty. Each bag takes six to seven days to create and can range in price from $700 to $7,000. The names of Leiber admirers are far too long to list but include Queen Elizabeth and every First Lady from Pat Nixon through Laura Bush.

Technique is central to the Leiber concept. A Leiber minaudière, for example, might seem at first glance like a Christmas tree ornament but in technique is more like an ecclesiastical censer, an object of perfection intended for long-lasting use. Her watermelon and citrus slices are farm fresh in their juicy handset rhinestone design, but these fruits will never perish. Cathryn Jakobson, writing in Manhattan Inc. in February 1986, described the sound and impeccable impact of closing a Leiber handbag, "The engineering is perfect: it is like closing the door on an excellent automobile."

Leiber's product may be jewellike and ladylike in scale, but her collectors are rightly as proud and avid about these small objects as any possessor of a Rolls Royce. There is perhaps one drawback to the Leiber evening bags: they hold very little. But Leiber's aesthetic more than mitigates the possible problem. If going out is a matter of saddlebags and gross excess, then Leiber's sweet purses and precious objects are not the answer. But if there is any truthful measure that the best things come in small packages, Leiber's beautiful clutches make the maxim true. Leiber's characteristic evening bags, in fact, compound their delicacy in scale with their solid form: these hardly seem, despite their elegance, to be places of cash and chattel. Leiber has achieved a carrier that is neither wallet nor winnings—it is something intimate and personal.

The ideas for her bags come from a variety of sources. Arguably, little is invented ex nihilo in Leiber's work, but is instead understood and applied from other arts. She acknowledges her love of finding objects in museums and even the objects in paintings that lend themselves to her imaginative formation as the handbag, realizing the capability of an object to serve as a container. Leiber's version of Fabergé eggs at substantial (but less than Romanov) prices are inherently about containment, but her inventions of the three-dimensional bunch of grapes or the frogs that open up or Chinese foo dogs with hollow insides are her own invention. Leiber has also looked to the arts of the East, especially netsuke purse toggles, for their wondrous world of invented objects and miniatures from nature. Leiber's first jeweled evening bag was a metal teardrop purse, an ironic play on the soft shape of the purse or money bag converted into a hard form.

Handbags by Leiber for the day employ beautiful reptile and ostrich skins, antique Japanese obis, and extraordinary embroideries. In the daytime bags she uses not only the softest materials and a colorist's palette, even in skins, but lightens the touch with supple pleats, braid, and whimsical trims and closings. Leiber makes elegantly simple envelope bags accented by a single point or line of decoration.

As attention-getting as her designs might be, the designer herself tends to be understated. As a young woman in Budapest, Leiber narrowly escaped the Nazi concentration camps. She was accepted to Kings College in London and intended to study chemistry, with a goal of developing skin creams. But World War II began, forcing her to remain in Hungary. She instead became an apprentice to a handbag maker, and from that point, her course was set. Alex Witchel of the New York Times wrote that after escaping the Nazis as a teen, "She has considered it a virtue to avoid the spotlight ever since. It seems only in her designs, whether the rich leather bags for daytime or the lush, detailed bags for evening, that the disparate elements of her own personality find release: whimsical yet functional (a yellow rose of Texas), stylish yet silly (a jeweled slice of watermelon), majestic yet devastatingly simple (a perfect seashell). She is a beguiling contradiction—a rather severe-looking matron with the artistic imagination, and freedom, of a girl."

Leiber never makes a subservient bag, but an autonomous object that whether egg, minaudière, or piggy, is the finality and finesse of style. In this, Leiber observes fashion as critically and cognizantly as she scours art for her selection of objects, but she never creates a tartan to be coordinated to a textile or a frog or other animal to fit into an established environment of garments. Rather, she creates commodities that enhance dress and create style because they are self-sufficient. Leiber creates objects that are undeniably, despite the creator's modesty, unique sculptures on a small scale.

—Richard Martin; updated by Carrie Snyder

LELONG, Lucien

French designer

Born: Paris, 11 October 1889. Education: Studied business, Hautes Études des Commerciales, Paris, 1911–13. Military Service: Performed military service, 1914–17, awarded Croix de Guerre. Family: Married Princess Natalie Paley (second wife). Career: Designed first collection, 1914; joined father's dressmaking firm, 1918; house of Lelong established, 1919; showed designs under own name, from 1923; Parfums Lucien Lelong established, 1926; Éditions Lucien Lelong ready-to-wear established, 1933; president, Chambre Syndicale de la Couture, 1937–47; retired from couture, 1948. Died: 10 May 1958, in Anglet, France.

PUBLICATIONS

On LELONG:

Books

- Picken, Mary Brooks, and Dora L. Miller, Dressmakers of France, New York, 1956.
 Latour, Anny, Kings of Fashion, London, 1958.
 Lynam, Ruth, ed., Couture, Garden City, New York, 1972.
 Ewing, Elizabeth, History of Twentieth Century Fashion, New York, 1974.
 Howell, Georgina, In Vogue, Middlesex, England, 1975.
 Glynn, Prudence, In Fashion, New York, 1978.
 Carter, Ernestine, Magic Names of Fashion, Englewood Cliffs, New Jersey, 1980.
 Garnier, Guillaume, Paris couture années trente, Paris, 1987.
 Stegemeyer, Anne, Who's Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.
Monsen and Baer Memories of Perfume: The Perfumes of Lucien Lelong and Masterpieces of Today, [auction catalogue], Vienna, 1998.

Articles

- "And the Winner is...," in Global Cosmetic Industry, December 1999.

* * *

While Lucien Lelong dressed many a fashionable lady during the 1920s and 1930s, he is most remembered for his heroic diplomatic perfection intended for long-lasting use. Her watermelon and citrus slices are farm fresh in their juicy handset rhinestone design, but these fruits will never perish. Cathryn Jakobson, writing in Manhattan Inc. in February 1986, described the sound and impeccable impact of closing a Leiber handbag, "The engineering is perfect: it is like closing the door on an excellent automobile."

Leiber's product may be jewellike and ladylike in scale, but her collectors are rightly as proud and avid about these small objects as any possessor of a Rolls Royce. There is perhaps one drawback to the Leiber evening bags: they hold very little. But Leiber's aesthetic more than mitigates the possible problem. If going out is a matter of saddlebags and gross excess, then Leiber's sweet purses and precious objects are not the answer. But if there is any truthful measure that the best things come in small packages, Leiber's beautiful clutches make the maxim true. Leiber's characteristic evening bags, in fact, compound their delicacy in scale with their solid form: these hardly seem, despite their elegance, to be places of cash and chattel. Leiber has achieved a carrier that is neither wallet nor winnings—it is something intimate and personal.

The ideas for her bags come from a variety of sources. Arguably, little is invented ex nihilo in Leiber's work, but is instead understood and applied from other arts. She acknowledges her love of finding objects in museums and even the objects in paintings that lend themselves to her imaginative formation as the handbag, realizing the capability of an object to serve as a container. Leiber's version of Fabergé eggs at substantial (but less than Romanov) prices are inherently about containment, but her inventions of the three-dimensional bunch of grapes or the frogs that open up or Chinese foo dogs with hollow insides are her own invention. Leiber has also looked to the arts of the East, especially netsuke purse toggles, for their wondrous world of invented objects and miniatures from nature. Leiber's first jeweled evening bag was a metal teardrop purse, an ironic play on the soft shape of the purse or money bag converted into a hard form.

Handbags by Leiber for the day employ beautiful reptile and ostrich skins, antique Japanese obis, and extraordinary embroideries. In the daytime bags she uses not only the softest materials and a colorist's palette, even in skins, but lightens the touch with supple pleats, braid, and whimsical trims and closings. Leiber makes elegantly simple envelope bags accented by a single point or line of decoration.

As attention-getting as her designs might be, the designer herself tends to be understated. As a young woman in Budapest, Leiber narrowly escaped the Nazi concentration camps. She was accepted to Kings College in London and intended to study chemistry, with a goal of developing skin creams. But World War II began, forcing her to remain in Hungary. She instead became an apprentice to a handbag maker, and from that point, her course was set. Alex Witchel of the New York Times wrote that after escaping the Nazis as a teen, "She has considered it a virtue to avoid the spotlight ever since. It seems only in her designs, whether the rich leather bags for daytime or the lush, detailed bags for evening, that the disparate elements of her own personality find release: whimsical yet functional (a yellow rose of Texas), stylish yet silly (a jeweled slice of watermelon), majestic yet devastatingly simple (a perfect seashell). She is a beguiling contradiction—a rather severe-looking matron with the artistic imagination, and freedom, of a girl."

Leiber never makes a subservient bag, but an autonomous object that whether egg, minaudière, or piggy, is the finality and finesse of style. In this, Leiber observes fashion as critically and cognizantly as she scours art for her selection of objects, but she never creates a tartan to be coordinated to a textile or a frog or other animal to fit into an established environment of garments. Rather, she creates commodities that enhance dress and create style because they are self-sufficient. Leiber creates objects that are undeniably, despite the creator's modesty, unique sculptures on a small scale.

—Richard Martin; updated by Carrie Snyder

LELONG, Lucien

French designer

Born: Paris, 11 October 1889. Education: Studied business, Hautes Études des Commerciales, Paris, 1911–13. Military Service: Performed military service, 1914–17, awarded Croix de Guerre. Family: Married Princess Natalie Paley (second wife). Career: Designed first collection, 1914; joined father's dressmaking firm, 1918; house of Lelong established, 1919; showed designs under own name, from 1923; Parfums Lucien Lelong established, 1926; Éditions Lucien Lelong ready-to-wear established, 1933; president, Chambre Syndicale de la Couture, 1937–47; retired from couture, 1948. Died: 10 May 1958, in Anglet, France.

PUBLICATIONS

On LELONG:

Books

- Picken, Mary Brooks, and Dora L. Miller, Dressmakers of France, New York, 1956.
 Latour, Anny, Kings of Fashion, London, 1958.
 Lynam, Ruth, ed., Couture, Garden City, New York, 1972.
 Ewing, Elizabeth, History of Twentieth Century Fashion, New York, 1974.
 Howell, Georgina, In Vogue, Middlesex, England, 1975.
 Glynn, Prudence, In Fashion, New York, 1978.
 Carter, Ernestine, Magic Names of Fashion, Englewood Cliffs, New Jersey, 1980.
 Garnier, Guillaume, Paris couture années trente, Paris, 1987.
 Stegemeyer, Anne, Who's Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.
Monsen and Baer Memories of Perfume: The Perfumes of Lucien Lelong and Masterpieces of Today, [auction catalogue], Vienna, 1998.

Articles

- "And the Winner is...," in Global Cosmetic Industry, December 1999.

* * *

While Lucien Lelong dressed many a fashionable lady during the 1920s and 1930s, he is most remembered for his heroic diplomatic efforts to sustain Parisian couture during World War II. He was, in every respect, a hero of both world wars fought during this century.

He received his call to serve during World War I two days short of showing his first collection at his father's already established dressmaking shop. He served from 1914 until 1917 when he was severely wounded. He was one of the first seven Frenchmen to be decorated with the Croix de Guerre for his heroism.

In 1918, after recuperating, he rejoined his father's firm. By 1923 he was designing under his own name. As a contemporary of such designers as Chanel, Vionnet, Molyneux, Lanvin, and Patou, he designed for café society during the 1920s and 1930s. His designs were characterized by classic lines, following the major silhouettes of each period. He was not particularly innovative, choosing rather to concentrate on fine workmanship and fabrication. He was, however, the first designer to introduce a lower priced line—he called it Édition—to cater to less wealthy clients in 1933. During the height of his career he employed 1,200 workers.

His election as president of the Chambre Syndicale de la Couture in 1937 proved to be his greatest challenge and contribution to fashion. Faced with threats to move the entire couture to Berlin and Vienna, Lelong negotiated, cajoled, and lied to the Germans throughout the occupation of Paris. "One of the first things the Germans did was break into the Syndicate offices and seize all documents pertaining to the French export trade. I told them that la couture was not a transportable industry, such as bricklaying."

When not one foreign buyer appeared in Paris after war was declared, Lelong sent an emissary to New York with gowns and models to prove couture was still a viable industry. In January 1940, despite having to be routed through Italy, 150 buyers appeared for the showings. By 1941 the Germans had issued textile cards, comprised of a point system, to every design house. It was obvious that compliance with these regulations would spell the end of Paris couture. Lelong, through difficult negotiations, obtained exemptions for 12 houses. "Unfortunately the Germans noticed at the end of six months that 92 houses were operating, which led to more discussions. Finally we succeeded in keeping 60." Madame Grès and Balenciaga both exceeded their yardage requirements one season and were ordered to close for two weeks. Banding together in a show of unity and force, the remaining houses finished these two collections so they could be shown on time.

Lelong is credited with saving over 12,000 workers from deportation into German war industries. "Over a period of four years, we had 14 official conferences with the Germans...at four of them they announced that la couture was to be entirely suppressed, and each time we avoided the catastrophe." Paris couture had won its own, private war.

Lelong, much as Hattie Carnegie did in the United States, employed talented young designers and gave them the opportunity to grow professionally. Christian Dior, Pierre Balmain, Hubert de Givenchy, Jean Ebel, Serge Kogan, and Jean Schlumberger were all employed by Lelong at one time or another. "It was from Lucien Lelong that I learned fabrics have personality, a behavior as varied as that of a temperamental woman," said Christian Dior.

Exhausted from his efforts during the war and his earlier wounds, Lelong retired in 1948 and died a decade later near Biarritz. He showed a total of 110 collections during his career, and though closed his couture business, he continued the fragrance business. While Lucien Lelong's clothes were elegantly conceived and executed, he will be remembered as fashion's leading diplomat during the German siege on Parisian couture.

More than half a century after Lelong retired, his exquisitely designed perfume bottles are among the most collected in the world. The fragrances themselves are still popular today, continuing the Lelong legacy.

—Mary C. Elliott; updated by Sydonie Benét

LEMPICKA, Lolita

French fashion designer

Family: Married to business partner Joseph-Marie; children: Elisa.

Career: Showed first collection, 1984; introduced Lolita Bis junior line, 1987; introduced signature leather collection and lines of knitwear, jewelry, and glasses; ready-to-wear designer, Cacharel. Awards:

Lolita Lempicka, fall/winter 2001–02 ready-to-wear collection: leather slip dress. © AP/Wide World Photos.

efforts to sustain Parisian couture during World War II. He was, in every respect, a hero of both world wars fought during this century.

He received his call to serve during World War I two days short of showing his first collection at his father's already established dressmaking shop. He served from 1914 until 1917 when he was severely wounded. He was one of the first seven Frenchmen to be decorated with the Croix de Guerre for his heroism.

In 1918, after recuperating, he rejoined his father's firm. By 1923 he was designing under his own name. As a contemporary of such designers as Chanel, Vionnet, Molyneux, Lanvin, and Patou, he designed for café society during the 1920s and 1930s. His designs were characterized by classic lines, following the major silhouettes of each period. He was not particularly innovative, choosing rather to concentrate on fine workmanship and fabrication. He was, however, the first designer to introduce a lower priced line—he called it Édition—to cater to less wealthy clients in 1933. During the height of his career he employed 1,200 workers.

His election as president of the Chambre Syndicale de la Couture in 1937 proved to be his greatest challenge and contribution to fashion. Faced with threats to move the entire couture to Berlin and Vienna, Lelong negotiated, cajoled, and lied to the Germans throughout the occupation of Paris. "One of the first things the Germans did was break into the Syndicate offices and seize all documents pertaining to the French export trade. I told them that la couture was not a transportable industry, such as bricklaying."

When not one foreign buyer appeared in Paris after war was declared, Lelong sent an emissary to New York with gowns and models to prove couture was still a viable industry. In January 1940, despite having to be routed through Italy, 150 buyers appeared for the showings. By 1941 the Germans had issued textile cards, comprised of a point system, to every design house. It was obvious that compliance with these regulations would spell the end of Paris couture. Lelong, through difficult negotiations, obtained exemptions for 12 houses. "Unfortunately the Germans noticed at the end of six months that 92 houses were operating, which led to more discussions. Finally we succeeded in keeping 60." Madame Grès and Balenciaga both exceeded their yardage requirements one season and were ordered to close for two weeks. Banding together in a show of unity and force, the remaining houses finished these two collections so they could be shown on time.

Lelong is credited with saving over 12,000 workers from deportation into German war industries. "Over a period of four years, we had 14 official conferences with the Germans...at four of them they announced that la couture was to be entirely suppressed, and each time we avoided the catastrophe." Paris couture had won its own, private war.

Lelong, much as Hattie Carnegie did in the United States, employed talented young designers and gave them the opportunity to grow professionally. Christian Dior, Pierre Balmain, Hubert de Givenchy, Jean Ebel, Serge Kogan, and Jean Schlumberger were all employed by Lelong at one time or another. "It was from Lucien Lelong that I learned fabrics have personality, a behavior as varied as that of a temperamental woman," said Christian Dior.

Exhausted from his efforts during the war and his earlier wounds, Lelong retired in 1948 and died a decade later near Biarritz. He showed a total of 110 collections during his career, and though closed his couture business, he continued the fragrance business. While Lucien Lelong's clothes were elegantly conceived and executed, he will be remembered as fashion's leading diplomat during the German siege on Parisian couture.

More than half a century after Lelong retired, his exquisitely designed perfume bottles are among the most collected in the world. The fragrances themselves are still popular today, continuing the Lelong legacy.

—Mary C. Elliott; updated by Sydonie Benét

LEMPICKA, Lolita

French fashion designer

Family: Married to business partner Joseph-Marie; children: Elisa.

Career: Showed first collection, 1984; introduced Lolita Bis junior line, 1987; introduced signature leather collection and lines of knitwear, jewelry, and glasses; ready-to-wear designer, Cacharel. Awards:

Lolita Lempicka, fall/winter 2001–02 ready-to-wear collection: leather slip dress. © AP/Wide World Photos.

Package of the Year award, 1998. Address: c/o Leonor International, 78 Avenue Marceau, 75008 Paris, France.

PUBLICATIONS

On LEMPICKA:

Articles

Hochswender, Woody, "Young French Designers Stretch Fashion's Rules," in the New York Times, 19 October 1990.

"Accent on Comfort: A Parisian Designs with Real Lives in Mind," in the Chicago Tribune, 12 January 1992.

Solis, Robbin Raskin, "Liquid Memory," in Harper's Bazaar, November 1998.

"Package of the Year 1998 and the Winner Is..." in Global Cosmetic Industry (New York), December 1998.

* * *

Pert, gamine, nostalgic, playful: these are just some of the words used to describe Lolita Lempicka collections. Since her debut in 1984, she has reintroduced a discarded Parisian elegance to fashion. Although her look is of the moment, young and modern, it has often echoed 1940s themes and styling: turbans, pearl chokers, tiny floral prints on viscose crêpes, piping, polka dots teamed with tiny stripes, contrast trims, pearl trims, and wedged shoes. Even the sepia-colored tones used in a distinctive promotional booklet for her 1991 spring-summer collection suggest the discovery of a utility frock, produced to the British government's austere guidelines for goods in World War II, in grandmother's attic, and the subsequent restyling and alteration of the garment to give it a naughtier, more risqué 1990s feel.

Lempicka places greatest importance on the use of meticulous detailing and the finest materials from international textile manufacturers. She is renowned for her precise and exquisitely-cut tailored suits that are never hard-edged but gently flatter the customer. Her look is very French, and she was the first of a new generation of female designers to emerge in Paris during the 1980s. Myrène de Premonville, Martine Sitbon, and Sophie Sitbon were others who promoted a fresh Parisian femininity with a classical base.

Lempicka's business has expanded into several areas since its inception. She created a junior diffusion line, Lolita Bis, in 1987, designed for nice and naughty young girls. She dedicated the line to her daughter, Elisa, whom she described as both "cute and feminine," like the Lolita Bis image. The company expanded rapidly in the international marketplace as well, aided by two agreements for fabrication and distribution; one with the Guy Laroche group for the main line collection and the other with the CGP group for Lolita Bis. She also had contracts with the Rinel group for Lolita Lempicka leather collections and the Italian company Alma for knitwear. Her other lines of jewelry and eyewear are licensed by Kashiyama, which directs Lolita Lempicka boutiques in Japan.

Lempicka sees her customers as ranging from schoolgirls and students, their mothers, and grandmothers. Her clothes need to be interesting and accessible for all ages. She dresses women gently and does not compromise characteristically clever detailing and sculptured cuts to fashion's whims. Her naughty but nice nature, however, doesn't stop at fashion. Tom McGee, a scientist at Givaudon Roure perfume house, released the contradictory licorice fragrance, Lolita Lempicka in 1998. In the U.S., licorice is thought of as the cherry red ropes people love and a candy of tradition; it was just as popular in the Lolita Lempicka, fall/winter 2001–02 ready-to-wear collection.

© AP/Wide World Photos.

1950s as it is today. In France, however, licorice often evokes the anise-flavored liquor commonly served at traditional French cafés and restaurants, hence giving the fragrance its “naughty” edge.

Not long after the naughty-and-nice fragrance was released it won DCI's Package of the Year award for 1998. The award was attributed to the fact that women respond to the scent, whereas other perfumes or colognes on the market were released with the idea of attracting the opposite sex. Described as the “fruit of our dreams,” Lolita Lempicka comes in an apple-shaped bottle with the Lempicka name engraved on it—a portrayal of the fine details she puts into her clothing. A combination of licorice flower, anise seeds, amarena, violets, vetiver, and tonka bean, the fragrance complements Lempicka's femininity and playful style.

While Lempicka had some lines that were deemed successful, the Lempicka fragrance has undoubtedly made Lolita Lempicka a name to remember. Because smell is the most primitive sense, scientists believe the scent alone has had a bigger impact on her career than any collection ever could.

—Kevin Almond; updated by Diana Idzelis

LENOIR, Jacques

See CHLOÉ

LESER, Tina

American designer

Born: Christine Wetherill Shillard-Smith in Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, 12 December 1910. Education: Studied art at the Pennsylvania Academy of Fine Arts, the School of Industrial Arts, Philadelphia, and at the Sorbonne. Family: Married Curtin Leser, 1931 (divorced, 1936); married James J. Howley, 1948; children: Georgina. Career: Sold designs through her own shop in Honolulu, Hawaii, 1935–42; also formed a company in New York, 1941–43; designer, Edwin H. Foreman Company, New York, 1943–53; designer, Tina Leser, Inc., New York, 1953–64; designed Signet men's ties, 1949, Stafford Wear men's sportswear, 1950, and industrial uniforms for Ramsey Sportswear Company, 1953; retired briefly, 1964–66; retired permanently, 1982. Awards: Fashion Critics award, New York, 1944; Neiman Marcus award, 1945; Coty American Fashion Critics award, 1945; Sports Illustrated Sportswear Design award, 1956, 1957; U.S. Chamber of Commerce citation, 1957; Philadelphia Festival of the Arts Fashion award, 1962. Member: National Society of Arts and Letters Fashion Group. Died: 24 January 1986, in Sands Point, Long Island.

PUBLICATIONS

On LESER:

Books

Stuart, Jessie, The American Fashion Industry, New York, 1951.
New York and Hollywood Fashion: Costume Designs from the Brooklyn Museum Collection, New York, 1986.

- Milbank, Caroline Rennolds, New York Fashion: The Evolution of American Style, New York, 1989.
 Steele, Valerie, Women of Fashion, New York, 1991.
Fashion for America! Designs in the Fashion Institute of Technology, New York, Haslemere, Surrey, 1992.
 Stegemeyer, Anne, Who's Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.

Articles

- “Southern Resort Fashions,” in Life (New York), 14 January 1946.
 “Women Designers Set New Fashions,” in Life (New York), 14 January 1946.
 Robin, Toni, “Global Fashions,” in Holiday (New York), November 1949.
 “Industrial Uniforms Get Beauty Treatment,” in American Fabrics (New York), Summer 1953.
 “Designer Tina Leser Dies; Services Will Be Held Today,” [obituary] in WWD, 27 January 1986.
 “Tina Leser, a Designer, Dies,” [obituary] in the New York Times, 27 January 1986.
 “Tina Leser,” in Current Biography, March 1986.

* * *

Tina Leser was an early and very successful proponent of an American design aesthetic inspired by textiles and clothing from non-Western cultures. She traveled through Asia, India, and Africa as a child, and lived in Hawaii after her first marriage in 1931, which may explain the ease with which she later adapted influences from those areas into her designs. Although she is remembered today primarily for this gift, her success was not confined to that genre, but also encompassed references to other folk and historical traditions.

Her earliest work was done in Hawaii, where she opened a shop in 1935 selling high quality ready-to-wear and playclothes of her own design. She used Hawaiian and Filipino fabrics, and even hand block-printed sailcloth. In 1940 she brought her work to New York where she was to open her own firm, but only began to be a force in fashion in 1943, when she joined the Edwin H. Foreman sportswear firm as designer.

Leser's work during World War II reflected the fabric scarcities of the wartime economy, and the limits of wartime travel. From Mexico she derived a printed flannel jacket with sequined trim; from Guatemala a strapless dress made from a handwoven blanket. Sarong-styled dresses and wrap skirts were an important part of her design vocabulary at this time, possibly stemming from her years in Hawaii. She varied these with less exotic styles, such as a tartan cotton playsuit with a matching shawl and kilted skirt, and wonderful wool flannel calf-length overalls—offspring of a very American idiom.

From the first Leser emphasized an uncluttered mode, and by the end of the war she had won awards from both Neiman Marcus and Coty for her contributions to American fashion. She had also widened her horizons to include India—very much in the news in the immediate postwar years—with her dhoti pants-dress, available in several versions for a variety of occasions. The facility with which she could adapt one model into many styles can be attributed to her artist's eye for proportion, and clean balance between line and form.

What was, in theory, an around-the-world honeymoon trip with her second husband in 1949 became, in practice, a way for Leser to collect fabrics, clothing, and antiques from a multitude of cultures. She based designs on objects as varied as an English game table, Siamese priest 1950s as it is today. In France, however, licorice often evokes the anise-flavored liquor commonly served at traditional French cafés and restaurants, hence giving the fragrance its “naughty” edge.

Not long after the naughty-and-nice fragrance was released it won DCI's Package of the Year award for 1998. The award was attributed to the fact that women respond to the scent, whereas other perfumes or colognes on the market were released with the idea of attracting the opposite sex. Described as the “fruit of our dreams,” Lolita Lempicka comes in an apple-shaped bottle with the Lempicka name engraved on it—a portrayal of the fine details she puts into her clothing. A combination of licorice flower, anise seeds, amarena, violets, vetiver, and tonka bean, the fragrance complements Lempicka's femininity and playful style.

While Lempicka had some lines that were deemed successful, the Lempicka fragrance has undoubtedly made Lolita Lempicka a name to remember. Because smell is the most primitive sense, scientists believe the scent alone has had a bigger impact on her career than any collection ever could.

—Kevin Almond; updated by Diana Idzelis

LENOIR, Jacques

See CHLOÉ

LESER, Tina

American designer

Born: Christine Wetherill Shillard-Smith in Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, 12 December 1910. Education: Studied art at the Pennsylvania Academy of Fine Arts, the School of Industrial Arts, Philadelphia, and at the Sorbonne. Family: Married Curtin Leser, 1931 (divorced, 1936); married James J. Howley, 1948; children: Georgina. Career: Sold designs through her own shop in Honolulu, Hawaii, 1935–42; also formed a company in New York, 1941–43; designer, Edwin H. Foreman Company, New York, 1943–53; designer, Tina Leser, Inc., New York, 1953–64; designed Signet men's ties, 1949, Stafford Wear men's sportswear, 1950, and industrial uniforms for Ramsey Sportswear Company, 1953; retired briefly, 1964–66; retired permanently, 1982. Awards: Fashion Critics award, New York, 1944; Neiman Marcus award, 1945; Coty American Fashion Critics award, 1945; Sports Illustrated Sportswear Design award, 1956, 1957; U.S. Chamber of Commerce citation, 1957; Philadelphia Festival of the Arts Fashion award, 1962. Member: National Society of Arts and Letters Fashion Group. Died: 24 January 1986, in Sands Point, Long Island.

PUBLICATIONS

On LESER:

Books

Stuart, Jessie, The American Fashion Industry, New York, 1951.
New York and Hollywood Fashion: Costume Designs from the Brooklyn Museum Collection, New York, 1986.

- Milbank, Caroline Rennolds, New York Fashion: The Evolution of American Style, New York, 1989.
 Steele, Valerie, Women of Fashion, New York, 1991.
Fashion for America! Designs in the Fashion Institute of Technology, New York, Haslemere, Surrey, 1992.
 Stegemeyer, Anne, Who's Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.

Articles

- “Southern Resort Fashions,” in Life (New York), 14 January 1946.
 “Women Designers Set New Fashions,” in Life (New York), 14 January 1946.
 Robin, Toni, “Global Fashions,” in Holiday (New York), November 1949.
 “Industrial Uniforms Get Beauty Treatment,” in American Fabrics (New York), Summer 1953.
 “Designer Tina Leser Dies; Services Will Be Held Today,” [obituary] in WWD, 27 January 1986.
 “Tina Leser, a Designer, Dies,” [obituary] in the New York Times, 27 January 1986.
 “Tina Leser,” in Current Biography, March 1986.

* * *

Tina Leser was an early and very successful proponent of an American design aesthetic inspired by textiles and clothing from non-Western cultures. She traveled through Asia, India, and Africa as a child, and lived in Hawaii after her first marriage in 1931, which may explain the ease with which she later adapted influences from those areas into her designs. Although she is remembered today primarily for this gift, her success was not confined to that genre, but also encompassed references to other folk and historical traditions.

Her earliest work was done in Hawaii, where she opened a shop in 1935 selling high quality ready-to-wear and playclothes of her own design. She used Hawaiian and Filipino fabrics, and even hand block-printed sailcloth. In 1940 she brought her work to New York where she was to open her own firm, but only began to be a force in fashion in 1943, when she joined the Edwin H. Foreman sportswear firm as designer.

Leser's work during World War II reflected the fabric scarcities of the wartime economy, and the limits of wartime travel. From Mexico she derived a printed flannel jacket with sequined trim; from Guatemala a strapless dress made from a handwoven blanket. Sarong-styled dresses and wrap skirts were an important part of her design vocabulary at this time, possibly stemming from her years in Hawaii. She varied these with less exotic styles, such as a tartan cotton playsuit with a matching shawl and kilted skirt, and wonderful wool flannel calf-length overalls—offspring of a very American idiom.

From the first Leser emphasized an uncluttered mode, and by the end of the war she had won awards from both Neiman Marcus and Coty for her contributions to American fashion. She had also widened her horizons to include India—very much in the news in the immediate postwar years—with her dhoti pants-dress, available in several versions for a variety of occasions. The facility with which she could adapt one model into many styles can be attributed to her artist's eye for proportion, and clean balance between line and form.

What was, in theory, an around-the-world honeymoon trip with her second husband in 1949 became, in practice, a way for Leser to collect fabrics, clothing, and antiques from a multitude of cultures. She based designs on objects as varied as an English game table, Siamese priest robes, an Italian peasant's vest, and a Manchu coat. Her mature work, from this date on, displayed a consistent sense of humor and intelligence in her choice of references.

Her collections included many "play" pieces but also contained relaxed day and evening clothes eminently suited to the needs and budgets of many postwar American women. Her variation on the ubiquitous 1950s sweater twinset was a halter with an embellished cardigan, and she is also credited with introducing the cashmere sweater dress. Sensitivity to the realities of life for working women induced her, in 1953, to design a line of industrial uniforms for Ramsey Sportswear Company. The trim fitting separates included a skirt to be worn over uniform slacks on the way to or from work.

Her fabric choices as well as her fashion inspirations were wide-ranging. Indian sari silks, Pringle woollens, Boussac floral prints, and embroidered Moygashel linens shared her stage with the "Modern Masters" print series made of Fuller cottons, Hope Skillman wovens, Galey & Lord ginghams, and Wesley Simpson prints. She championed denim as a fashion fabric, using it in 1945 for a two-piece swimsuit trimmed with chenille "bedspread flowers," in 1949 for coolie trousers and sleeveless jacket, and in the mid-1950s for a strapless bodice and wide cuffed pants. American bandanna prints or tablecloth fabrics were as likely to show up in her work as copies of Persian brocades, and they might equally be used for playsuits or cocktail dresses. One butterfly patterned batik print turned up as a swimsuit and cover-up skirt, capri trousers and strapless top, a sarong dress, and even as binding on a cardigan sweater.

Leser was active throughout the 1960s and into the 1970s, maintaining her flair for sportswear, loungewear, and bathing suits. Some of her best pieces from this period were slim toreador or stirrup trousers worn with long, boxy sweaters or baby-doll tunics, and her coordinated bathing suits and cover-ups remained strong. The details of her designs, however, are rather less important than the spirit she brought to them. Many young American designers carry on the referential style Leser helped establish—creating, as she did, something uniquely American from a melting-pot of cultural sources.

—Madelyn Shaw

LEVI-STRAUSS & CO.

American clothier company

Founded: by Levi Strauss (1829–1902) in the 1850s. Company History: Levi Strauss arrived in San Francisco in 1853, and began selling dry goods to gold prospectors. Strauss made and sold "waist-high overalls" out of material originally intended for sale as tent canvas; rivets used to reinforce seams and pockets, 1873; company passed to four nephews after Strauss' death, 1902; beige twill introduced, 1960s; corduroy jeans introduced, 1961; stretch jeans and Sta-Prest® slacks introduced, 1964; womenswear introduced, 1968; began manufacturing and marketing in Hong Kong, early 1970s; company went public, 1971 (family members retained controlling interest); official outfitters of U.S. Winter and Summer Olympic teams, and Los Angeles Olympic Games staff, 1984; publicly-held shares repurchased by family members, 1985; casual Dockers line of pants introduced, 1986; Slates dress slacks first marketed, 1996; Original Spin, custom jeans program, initiated 1998; first nonfamily member CEO takes reins, 1999; jeans and jackets with "wearable electronics" marketed in Europe, 2000. Collections: Smithsonian Institution, Washington, D.C. Awards: Coty Special award, 1971. Company Address: 1155 Battery Street, San Francisco, CA 94111, USA. Company Website: www.levistrauss.com.

PUBLICATIONS

On LEVI STRAUSS & CO.:

Articles

- Kurtz, Irma, "Levis: Not So Much a Pair of Pants, More a Nation's Heirloom," in Nova (London), September 1970.
 Willat, N., "The Levitation of Levi Strauss," in Management Today (London), January 1977.
 "Levi Strauss & Co.," in American Fabrics & Fashions (New York), No. 109, 1977.
 "Market Manipulation: The Levis 501 Experience," in International Textiles (London), July 1987.
 "Denim: Is the Party Over?" in Fashion Weekly (London), 14 January 1988.
 Bradley, Lisa, "A Modest Success," in Fashion Weekly (London), 14 January 1988.
 Simpson, Blaise, "Levi's Makes Push in Women's Wear," in WWD, 2 March 1988.
 Rowlands, Penelope, "Vintage Power: Levi's," in WWD, (London), 10 February 1992.
 Elliott, Stuart, "The Media Business: Levi's Two New Campaigns Aim at Who Fits the Jeans," in the New York Times, 27 July 1992.
 Magiera, Marcy, and Pat Sloan, "Levi's, Lee Loosen Up for Baby Boomers," in Advertising Age, 3 August 1992.
 "Fashion Statement," in San Francisco Business Magazine, October 1992.
 Elliott, Stuart, "The Media Business: Going Beyond Campaigns and into Sales and Marketing," in the New York Times, 18 November 1992.
 Ellsworth, Jo, "Engineering a Revival for Levi's," in Marketing (London), 19 October 2000.
 Kastor, Elizabeth, "Smarty-Pants Pants...and Shirts," in the Washington Post, 28 December 2000.
 Skolnik, Lisa "Once and Again American Ingenuity Puts a New Spin on Classic Designs," in Chicago Tribune, 15 April 2001.
 "Levi Strauss Reacquires A Pair of Jeans, at Markup," in the Wall Street Journal, 29 May 2001.

* * *

Levi's are an American icon; people of all ages, from countries as diverse as Japan, Russia, and the U.S. wear Levi's, buying them new or used. They are valued for both their enduring quality and wide array of designs.

Levi Strauss & Company was established in the 1850s in San Francisco, California, to sell the finest domestic and foreign dry goods, clothing, and household furnishings. Levi and his brothers Jonas and Louis as well as two brothers-in-law, William Sahlein and David Stern, ran the company. They had a ready market for their wares in the goldminers, cowboys, and lumberjacks, who had moved West to make their fortunes. Especially popular were the company's sturdy pants that stood up to the rugged work.

robes, an Italian peasant's vest, and a Manchu coat. Her mature work, from this date on, displayed a consistent sense of humor and intelligence in her choice of references.

Her collections included many "play" pieces but also contained relaxed day and evening clothes eminently suited to the needs and budgets of many postwar American women. Her variation on the ubiquitous 1950s sweater twinset was a halter with an embellished cardigan, and she is also credited with introducing the cashmere sweater dress. Sensitivity to the realities of life for working women induced her, in 1953, to design a line of industrial uniforms for Ramsey Sportswear Company. The trim fitting separates included a skirt to be worn over uniform slacks on the way to or from work.

Her fabric choices as well as her fashion inspirations were wide-ranging. Indian sari silks, Pringle woollens, Boussac floral prints, and embroidered Moygashel linens shared her stage with the "Modern Masters" print series made of Fuller cottons, Hope Skillman wovens, Galey & Lord ginghams, and Wesley Simpson prints. She championed denim as a fashion fabric, using it in 1945 for a two-piece swimsuit trimmed with chenille "bedspread flowers," in 1949 for coolie trousers and sleeveless jacket, and in the mid-1950s for a strapless bodice and wide cuffed pants. American bandanna prints or tablecloth fabrics were as likely to show up in her work as copies of Persian brocades, and they might equally be used for playsuits or cocktail dresses. One butterfly patterned batik print turned up as a swimsuit and cover-up skirt, capri trousers and strapless top, a sarong dress, and even as binding on a cardigan sweater.

Leser was active throughout the 1960s and into the 1970s, maintaining her flair for sportswear, loungewear, and bathing suits. Some of her best pieces from this period were slim toreador or stirrup trousers worn with long, boxy sweaters or baby-doll tunics, and her coordinated bathing suits and cover-ups remained strong. The details of her designs, however, are rather less important than the spirit she brought to them. Many young American designers carry on the referential style Leser helped establish—creating, as she did, something uniquely American from a melting-pot of cultural sources.

—Madelyn Shaw

LEVI-STRAUSS & CO.

American clothier company

Founded: by Levi Strauss (1829–1902) in the 1850s. Company History: Levi Strauss arrived in San Francisco in 1853, and began selling dry goods to gold prospectors. Strauss made and sold "waist-high overalls" out of material originally intended for sale as tent canvas; rivets used to reinforce seams and pockets, 1873; company passed to four nephews after Strauss' death, 1902; beige twill introduced, 1960s; corduroy jeans introduced, 1961; stretch jeans and Sta-Prest® slacks introduced, 1964; womenswear introduced, 1968; began manufacturing and marketing in Hong Kong, early 1970s; company went public, 1971 (family members retained controlling interest); official outfitters of U.S. Winter and Summer Olympic teams, and Los Angeles Olympic Games staff, 1984; publicly-held shares repurchased by family members, 1985; casual Dockers line of pants introduced, 1986; Slates dress slacks first marketed, 1996; Original Spin, custom jeans program, initiated 1998; first nonfamily member CEO takes reins, 1999; jeans and jackets with "wearable electronics" marketed in Europe, 2000. Collections: Smithsonian Institution, Washington, D.C. Awards: Coty Special award, 1971. Company Address: 1155 Battery Street, San Francisco, CA 94111, USA. Company Website: www.levistrauss.com.

PUBLICATIONS

On LEVI STRAUSS & CO.:

Articles

- Kurtz, Irma, "Levis: Not So Much a Pair of Pants, More a Nation's Heirloom," in Nova (London), September 1970.
 Willat, N., "The Levitation of Levi Strauss," in Management Today (London), January 1977.
 "Levi Strauss & Co.," in American Fabrics & Fashions (New York), No. 109, 1977.
 "Market Manipulation: The Levis 501 Experience," in International Textiles (London), July 1987.
 "Denim: Is the Party Over?" in Fashion Weekly (London), 14 January 1988.
 Bradley, Lisa, "A Modest Success," in Fashion Weekly (London), 14 January 1988.
 Simpson, Blaise, "Levi's Makes Push in Women's Wear," in WWD, 2 March 1988.
 Rowlands, Penelope, "Vintage Power: Levi's," in WWD, (London), 10 February 1992.
 Elliott, Stuart, "The Media Business: Levi's Two New Campaigns Aim at Who Fits the Jeans," in the New York Times, 27 July 1992.
 Magiera, Marcy, and Pat Sloan, "Levi's, Lee Loosen Up for Baby Boomers," in Advertising Age, 3 August 1992.
 "Fashion Statement," in San Francisco Business Magazine, October 1992.
 Elliott, Stuart, "The Media Business: Going Beyond Campaigns and into Sales and Marketing," in the New York Times, 18 November 1992.
 Ellsworth, Jo, "Engineering a Revival for Levi's," in Marketing (London), 19 October 2000.
 Kastor, Elizabeth, "Smarty-Pants Pants...and Shirts," in the Washington Post, 28 December 2000.
 Skolnik, Lisa "Once and Again American Ingenuity Puts a New Spin on Classic Designs," in Chicago Tribune, 15 April 2001.
 "Levi Strauss Reacquires A Pair of Jeans, at Markup," in the Wall Street Journal, 29 May 2001.

* * *

Levi's are an American icon; people of all ages, from countries as diverse as Japan, Russia, and the U.S. wear Levi's, buying them new or used. They are valued for both their enduring quality and wide array of designs.

Levi Strauss & Company was established in the 1850s in San Francisco, California, to sell the finest domestic and foreign dry goods, clothing, and household furnishings. Levi and his brothers Jonas and Louis as well as two brothers-in-law, William Sahlein and David Stern, ran the company. They had a ready market for their wares in the goldminers, cowboys, and lumberjacks, who had moved West to make their fortunes. Especially popular were the company's sturdy pants that stood up to the rugged work.

"The Original Levi's Store" in New York, 1999. © AP/Wide World Photos.

The pants were further improved thanks to Jacob W. Davis, a tailor who lived in Reno, Nevada. Davis sewed horse blankets, wagon covers, and tents from an off-white duck cloth bought from Levi Strauss & Co. He also made work clothes, though the miners and cowboys complained about pockets ripping off. As a result he tried riveting the pockets on the pants with the same copper rivets he used to attach straps to horse blankets. Davis made more riveted trousers using a 10-ounce duck twill and, by word-of-mouth advertising, a steady business grew.

Davis could not finance the patent necessary to protect his idea so he offered Levi Strauss & Co. half the right to sell all such riveted clothing in exchange for the $68 patent fee. The patent was granted to Davis and the Levi Strauss company on 20 May 1873. Levi Strauss & Co. soon made and marketed trousers, vests, and jackets using the rivets at stress points. White and brown duck twill and denim were used in the trousers Strauss called waist pantaloons or overalls, not "jeans."

The term jeans referred to trousers constructed from a fabric woven in Genoa, Italy, or "Genoese" cloth, while denim was derived from

"serge de Nimes," or cloth from Nimes, France. The fabrics were all shrunk to fit as a snug fit was desirable because wrinkles caused blisters when riding in a saddle. Suspender buttons, two in back, and four in front were used. There were no belt loops, though cinch straps and a buckle were sewn onto the back of the trousers to tighten the waist.

Strict price and quality standards were established at Levi Strauss, and fabric was furnished by Amoskeag, a New England mill. Orange linen thread was used for stitching because it matched the copper color rivets, and two curving Vs were stitched on back pockets to distinguish the Levi pants from those of competitors (this arcing row of stitches, however, did not become a registered clothing trademark until 1942). An oilcloth guarantee with the "Two Horse Brand" was tacked to the seat of the trousers. It had an engraving of two teamsters whipping a pair of dray horses trying to pull apart riveted trousers.

In 1886 a leather label with the two horse logo was permanently affixed with orange linen thread, and due to the quality of manufacturing and fabric, Levi Strauss was able to charge more than its competitors. The original XX 10-ounce denim trousers were known as the 501, and became the hallmark to be measured against. Levi's, as they became known, were functional, simple and above all durable.

The company grew and evolved to meet changing economic and societal needs brought about by world wars, the Depression, and unionization of the labor force. Clothing was sized to fit children as well as women; linen thread was replaced with a fine gauge version of the cord used to stitch shoes to make seams stronger, belt loops replaced suspender buttons on the original 501 design, the cinch belt was removed, 13.5-ounce denim came into use, a zipper fly was introduced, preshrunk fabric became the norm, and the red Levi tag was added to further distinguish the jeans from the competition. New lines of more dressy yet casual clothes were also introduced, such as Dockers and Slates.

The mystique and marketability of Levi's received a boost throughout the 20th century when worn by men and women with high profiles. James Dean wore Levi's in Rebel Without a Cause, and Marlon Brando was similarly outfitted in the Wild One. Director Steven Spielberg and software mogul Bill Gates both appeared frequently in jeans, while the corporate world's casual Fridays and even former President Bill Clinton have given Levi's both exposure and status.

Yet during the 1990s the market was inundated by branded jeans, from popular designers such as Calvin Klein, Ralph Lauren, Tommy Hilfiger, Dolce & Gabbana, Donna Karan, and many others, as well as store brands like Gap and Old Navy. Though Levi Strauss marketed a myriad of styles—from boot cut to flare to “loose” or wide-legged pants to stretch—distribution problems, discounters, and a weakened textile industry contributed to a serious loss in market share. To combat the slump, the company initiated a series of hip print and television ads, some with winning results. The introduction of the computerized Original Spin program in 1998, to help create the perfect custom-made pair of jeans, also brought a new market segment to the Levi's fold.

In the 21st century Levi's remain a staple in the wardrobes of many consumers worldwide, yet the company's overall sales and profits continued to slide. Japan and the U.S., once the company's strongest markets, were sadly lacking in 2000 and 2001. On a more positive note, the company acquired an original pair of work pants made in the early 1880s (probably sold for about $1 at the time) for more than $46,500 in 2001, from the eBay auction site. Additionally, the home of company founder Levi Strauss was restored and opened for touring in San Francisco.

The jeans of Levi Strauss & Co. will never go out of style and have achieved an iconic stature in the U.S. and around the world. For its part, the Levi Strauss company has created dozens of styles and variations of its stalwart products to transcend trends. More recent innovations included ergonomically engineered jeans as well as Levi's with built-in gadgets such as MP3 players and voice-activated cellular phones. Levi's—originally intended for use by goldminers and cowboys—have become an integral part of the American way of life. Yet as the world's number-one manufacturer of branded clothing, Levi Strauss is a name known and beloved in more than 80 countries.

—Nancy House; updated by Owen James

LEWIN, Lucille

See WHISTLES

LEWIS-CROWN, Peter

See LACHASSE

LEY, Wolfgang and Margarethe

See ESCADA

LIBERTY OF LONDON

British department store

Founded: by Arthur Lazenby Liberty (1843–1917) in 1875. Company History: Founded as oriental import emporium, “East India House,” 218A Regent Street, London; expanded, 1876, 1878, 1883, 1924; produced Liberty Art Fabrics, from 1878; introduced Umritza Cashmere, 1879; opened furnishing and decoration department, 1883; debuted costumes, 1884; introduced jewelry and metalwork, 1899; opened Birmingham branch, 1887; Paris, 1890; became public company, 1894; opened branch in Manchester, 1924; established Liberty and Company Ltd., wholesale company, 1939; acquired Dutch firm, Metz and Company, 1973; expanded men's offerings in flagship store, late 1990s; opened U.S. distribution center in Fort Worth, Texas, 2000; acquired by real estate company Marylebone Warwick Balfour, 2000. Exhibitions: Liberty's, 1875–1975, Victoria & Albert Museum, London, 1975; Art Nouveau, 1980–1914, Victoria & Albert Museum [traveling exhibit], 2000. Awards: Silver Medal, Rational Dress Exhibition, 1883; Gold Medal, Amsterdam Exhibition of 1883; Arthur Lazenby Liberty knighted, 1913. Company Address: Lasenby House, 32 Kingly Street, London W1R 5LA, England.

PUBLICATIONS

By LIBERTY OF LONDON:

Periodicals

Aglaia (journal of the Healthy and Artistic Dress Union), 1894.
Liberty Lamp (in-house magazine), 1925–32.

On LIBERTY OF LONDON:

Books

- Laver, James, The Liberty Story, London, 1959.
Adburgham, Alison, Liberty's: A Biography of a Shop, London, 1975.
Liberty's 1875–1975 [exhibition catalogue], London, 1975.
The Liberty Style, London, 1979.
Milbank, Caroline Rennolds, Couture: The Great Designers, New York, 1985.
Levy, Mervyn, Liberty Style, the Classic Years: 1898–1910, London, 1986.
Morris, Barbara, Liberty Design, 1874–1914, London, 1989.
Calloway, Stephen, ed., The House of Liberty: Masters of Style and Decoration, London, 1992.

as the 501, and became the hallmark to be measured against. Levi's, as they became known, were functional, simple and above all durable.

The company grew and evolved to meet changing economic and societal needs brought about by world wars, the Depression, and unionization of the labor force. Clothing was sized to fit children as well as women; linen thread was replaced with a fine gauge version of the cord used to stitch shoes to make seams stronger, belt loops replaced suspender buttons on the original 501 design, the cinch belt was removed, 13.5-ounce denim came into use, a zipper fly was introduced, preshrunk fabric became the norm, and the red Levi tag was added to further distinguish the jeans from the competition. New lines of more dressy yet casual clothes were also introduced, such as Dockers and Slates.

The mystique and marketability of Levi's received a boost throughout the 20th century when worn by men and women with high profiles. James Dean wore Levi's in Rebel Without a Cause, and Marlon Brando was similarly outfitted in the Wild One. Director Steven Spielberg and software mogul Bill Gates both appeared frequently in jeans, while the corporate world's casual Fridays and even former President Bill Clinton have given Levi's both exposure and status.

Yet during the 1990s the market was inundated by branded jeans, from popular designers such as Calvin Klein, Ralph Lauren, Tommy Hilfiger, Dolce & Gabbana, Donna Karan, and many others, as well as store brands like Gap and Old Navy. Though Levi Strauss marketed a myriad of styles—from boot cut to flare to “loose” or wide-legged pants to stretch—distribution problems, discounters, and a weakened textile industry contributed to a serious loss in market share. To combat the slump, the company initiated a series of hip print and television ads, some with winning results. The introduction of the computerized Original Spin program in 1998, to help create the perfect custom-made pair of jeans, also brought a new market segment to the Levi's fold.

In the 21st century Levi's remain a staple in the wardrobes of many consumers worldwide, yet the company's overall sales and profits continued to slide. Japan and the U.S., once the company's strongest markets, were sadly lacking in 2000 and 2001. On a more positive note, the company acquired an original pair of work pants made in the early 1880s (probably sold for about $1 at the time) for more than $46,500 in 2001, from the eBay auction site. Additionally, the home of company founder Levi Strauss was restored and opened for touring in San Francisco.

The jeans of Levi Strauss & Co. will never go out of style and have achieved an iconic stature in the U.S. and around the world. For its part, the Levi Strauss company has created dozens of styles and variations of its stalwart products to transcend trends. More recent innovations included ergonomically engineered jeans as well as Levi's with built-in gadgets such as MP3 players and voice-activated cellular phones. Levi's—originally intended for use by goldminers and cowboys—have become an integral part of the American way of life. Yet as the world's number-one manufacturer of branded clothing, Levi Strauss is a name known and beloved in more than 80 countries.

—Nancy House; updated by Owen James

LEWIN, Lucille

See WHISTLES

LEWIS-CROWN, Peter

See LACHASSE

LEY, Wolfgang and Margarethe

See ESCADA

LIBERTY OF LONDON

British department store

Founded: by Arthur Lazenby Liberty (1843–1917) in 1875. Company History: Founded as oriental import emporium, “East India House,” 218A Regent Street, London; expanded, 1876, 1878, 1883, 1924; produced Liberty Art Fabrics, from 1878; introduced Umritza Cashmere, 1879; opened furnishing and decoration department, 1883; debuted costumes, 1884; introduced jewelry and metalwork, 1899; opened Birmingham branch, 1887; Paris, 1890; became public company, 1894; opened branch in Manchester, 1924; established Liberty and Company Ltd., wholesale company, 1939; acquired Dutch firm, Metz and Company, 1973; expanded men's offerings in flagship store, late 1990s; opened U.S. distribution center in Fort Worth, Texas, 2000; acquired by real estate company Marylebone Warwick Balfour, 2000. Exhibitions: Liberty's, 1875–1975, Victoria & Albert Museum, London, 1975; Art Nouveau, 1980–1914, Victoria & Albert Museum [traveling exhibit], 2000. Awards: Silver Medal, Rational Dress Exhibition, 1883; Gold Medal, Amsterdam Exhibition of 1883; Arthur Lazenby Liberty knighted, 1913. Company Address: Lasenby House, 32 Kingly Street, London W1R 5LA, England.

PUBLICATIONS

By LIBERTY OF LONDON:

Periodicals

Aglaia (journal of the Healthy and Artistic Dress Union), 1894.
Liberty Lamp (in-house magazine), 1925–32.

On LIBERTY OF LONDON:

Books

- Laver, James, The Liberty Story, London, 1959.
Adburgham, Alison, Liberty's: A Biography of a Shop, London, 1975.
Liberty's 1875–1975 [exhibition catalogue], London, 1975.
The Liberty Style, London, 1979.
Milbank, Caroline Rennolds, Couture: The Great Designers, New York, 1985.
Levy, Mervyn, Liberty Style, the Classic Years: 1898–1910, London, 1986.
Morris, Barbara, Liberty Design, 1874–1914, London, 1989.
Calloway, Stephen, ed., The House of Liberty: Masters of Style and Decoration, London, 1992.

Arwas, Victor, Art Nouveau: From Mackintosh to Liberty, Windsor, England, 2000.

Articles

- Amaya, Victor, "Liberty and the Modern Style," in Apollo (London), February 1963.
- Boyd, A., and P. Radford, "The Draper Who Made History," in the Observer Magazine (London), 6 April 1975.
- Williams, Antonia, "Liberty Quality Centenary: At the Sign of the Purple Feather," in Vogue (London), June 1975.
- Banham, Reyner, "A Dead Liberty," in New Society (London), 7 August 1975.
- Nichols, Sarah, "Arthur Lazenby Liberty: A Mere Adjective?" in the Journal of Decorative and Propaganda Arts (Miami, Florida), Summer 1989.
- "Liberty of Regent Street in Big Men's Wear Push," in DNR, 3 April 1996.
- Curan, Catherine, "Liberty of London," in DNR, 27 September 1996.
- Menkes, Suzy, "Downsizing for the Upscale—Stores Cope with Consumer Caution in a Chilly Retail Climate," in the International Herald Tribune, 17 November 1998.
- "Liberty of London Unveils New Collection at Gift Fair," Trade Partners New Products Press Release, 2 July 2000.

* * *

Sir Arthur Lazenby Liberty, the founder of Liberty of London, contributed in 1894 to the Healthy and Artistic Dress Union's journal Aglaia, which stated his declared aim to "promote improvements in dress that would make it consistent with health, comfort and healthy appearance, but [dress] should not obviously depart from the conventional mode." Lazenby Liberty had left the Oriental Warehouse, famous among the leading artists and aesthetes of the day for its collections of blue and white porcelain and oriental fabrics in 1874 to set up on his own in half a shop in London's Regent Street. Lazenby Liberty presided over the shop's transformation from an Eastern bazaar to a department store that commissioned and sold modern design of all kinds.

"Liberty art fabrics" in subtle tones, which soon became known worldwide as "Liberty colors," (produced in collaboration from 1878 with the dyers and printers of Thomas Wardle) were the first step toward the creation of the shop's new image, and by the end of the century, Stile Liberty was synonymous in Italy with art nouveau. The quintessential fabric of the Aesthetic Movement was Liberty or Art silk and, aided by such popular successes as the Gilbert and Sullivan opera Patience (where the clothes were made from Liberty fabrics and Liberty artistic silks were advertised in the program) and the cartoons of George du Maurier—Liberty soon to became a household name.

In 1884 Lazenby Liberty opened the costume department, appointing as its first director the celebrated architect E.W.E. Godwin, whom Oscar Wilde once described as being "the greatest aesthete of us all." Godwin had made a study of historic dress and approached his task with almost missionary zeal, aiming to "establish the of dressmaking fame hygienic, intelligible and progressive basis."

Godwin's death three years later did not mean the end of his influence on Liberty dress, and the catalogues showed a wide range of Liberty Art costumes, ranging from a Grecian costume in Arabian cotton, to a peasant dress in thin Umritza cashmere, embroidered and smocked (a skill revived by Liberty and used on the finest materials).

Smocking was also a striking feature of the Kate Greenaway-influenced artistic dress for children, a range of clothes hugely popular with Liberty's customers from the late 1880s onwards.

In the 20th century, Liberty fabrics were used by the best known designers of each decade, from Paul Poiret to Yves Saint Laurent, from Cacharel to Jean Muir. The famous Liberty silk scarves and ties are sold all over the world, and the distinctive fabrics are still used by home dressmakers to create their own "Liberty style" in a fashion familiar from the time of their 19th-century forebears. Liberty also relaunched its own clothing collections, described as "contemporary yet classic. Simply yet beautifully styled, they could be worn by the modern girl or she of between-the-wars-era alike."

Of all the major London department stores, the character of Liberty's Regent Street flagship store and the quality and range of the goods it offers have changed least in recent years. In fashion terms, Liberty's offers a unique combination of its own entirely distinctive and yet ever-changing fabric and clothing designs for womenswear and menswear and the fashion collections of such distinctive contemporary designers as Nicole Farhi, Kenzo, Issey Miyake, and Paul Smith.

During the 1990s, Liberty of London expanded its Liberty consumer brand from mainly soft goods and apparel into a broader range of products encompassing home furnishings, decorative accessories, and gifts. At the same time, the Liberty brand has maintained as its centerpiece the colorful prints with which it has long been associated. To remain fresh, the company has continuously updated its designs under the Liberty of London label to achieve a more modern look, as it did with its men's ties and scarves (licensed to Salant in the U.S. and Mitchelson's in the UK) in 1997.

Although the company's brand division—which operates separately from its retail unit—drove significant sales and profit for Liberty in the late 1980s, its performance fell off in the 1990s. This trend had begun to reverse itself by 2001, thanks to the company's efforts to invigorate the brand. As of the early 2000s, the company was trying to rebuild its brand by focusing on three main product categories: women's fashions, gifts, and home furnishings. An in-house design team created Liberty of London-branded products for distribution in Liberty's own stores as well as in other retail locations throughout the world. The goal is to set trends with Liberty of London merchandise designs yet to remain true to the sensibility of founder Arthur Lazenby Liberty.

Liberty's 2000 giftware collection, shown at the New York International Gift Fair, was emblematic. Fifteen products, ranging from sleepwear to kitchen, bed, and bath products, featured floral-based prints in pinks and greens. Some favorite Liberty products, including kimonos and cosmetic bags, were focal points of the line. And as part of its objective of solidifying sales in the North American market, Liberty opened a Fort Worth distribution center in 2000 to enhance fulfillment in its U.S. operations.

The printed patterns highlighted in the Liberty of London giftware line typically reflect those in the company's fashion range. The label's spring 2001 women's apparel collection, as described in a review on the website supporting London Fashion Week, featured beachwear and daywear in a wide variety of colors, from solids to avant-garde prints to stripes. The site made note of the 1960s-influenced themes on the collection, which were updated for 2001.

Liberty has also been active in its department store operations, which comprise its largest division in terms of sales. Its flagship store on Regent Street—other Liberty stores are located in Windsor and at London's Heathrow Airport—expanded its men's offerings in the late 1990s, focusing on cutting-edge designers. These included names such as Dries van Noten, Helmut Lang, and Alexander McQueen, as well as designers considered classics “in Liberty’s terms” such as Yohji Yamamoto and Jean-Paul Gaultier, according the Daily News Record in April 1996. It also expanded its sportswear selection, which featured lines such as Mossimo and Griffin Laundry, and maintained its strong designer suit business featuring Ralph Lauren, Giorgio Armani, Hugo Boss, and others.

Despite all its activity in both its branded merchandise unit and its stores, Liberty suffered financial losses throughout the 1990s and, in 2000, was acquired by London property company Marylebone Warwick Balfour. The purchase marked the end of 125 years of family ownership. Marylebone set out first to renovate the Regent Street store and made clear its intention to rejuvenate and further develop the Liberty of London brand.

—Doreen Ehrlich; updated by Karen Raugust

LINARD, Stephen

British designer

Born: London, England, 1959. Education: Studied at Southend College of Technology, 1975–78, and St. Martin’s School of Art, London, 1978–81. Career: Designer, Notre Dame X, 1981–82; showed first two womenswear collections, 1982; introduced menswear line, 1983; designer, Bigi, Japan; designer, Georges Sand Range for Jun Co., Japan; designer, Beyond Stephen Linard range for Bazaar; designer for Powder Blue, 1986; assistant designer, Drakes.

PUBLICATIONS

On LINARD:

Articles

- “Cue: Future Talent,” in Vogue (London), October 1981.
- Grieve, Amanda, “Quids In,” in Harper’s & Queen (London), April 1983.
- “Da Londra: Moda Come Provocazione Eclettica,” in L’Uomo Vogue (Milan), December 1985.
- Mower, Sarah, “It’s Westwood Redux in London 1980s Time Warp,” in the International Herald Tribune, 14 March 2001.

* * *

It would be difficult to exaggerate the impact of Stephen Linard’s degree collection when his models appeared on the catwalk at St. Martin’s School of Art in London in the summer of 1981. Linard was a menswear student, and his models were real men, with real muscle, stubble, tattoos, and the demeanor of East End toughs about to enter the boxing ring. The Reluctant Emigrés collection was a subtle mix of solid and transparent, the safely known and the unpredictable. Traditional pinstripe trousers had contrast patches at the derrière, solid dark waistcoat fronts and shadowy organza backs. Striped city shirts were seen to have curious underarm patches, and all was concealed beneath swirling black greatcoats. The clothes were instantly covetable, thoroughly masculine in an entirely new way, and electrifying in the way that only the truly innovative can be.

Linard was famous overnight, and his charisma and photogenic air ensured him an enthusiastic press. He joined a leading young design team known as Notre Dame X, with Richard Ostell and Darlajane Gilroy, among others. When he split from this group, backers set him up in a city studio, where he produced sought-after garments in esoterically titled collections—Angels with Dirty Faces, Les Enfants du Chemin de Fer. He was an early revivalist of bias cutting, and showed underwear as outerwear. He continued with an anarchic mix of fabrics and influences appealing to the glam-sex clubbers always in search of new heroes, and labels with cachet. These were great days of club couture, with punters in fierce competition over their evening toilettes. New heights of sartorial extravagance were scaled, with Linard and art-world personality Leigh Bowery in the running for chief mountaineer.

British rag-trade backing is notoriously fickle, however, and when Linard’s company collapsed, he went to Japan to join the stable of eccentric models at Men’s Bigi. The Japanese are always swiftly attracted to high-profile talent with high-profile personality, and Linard was soon designing the prestigious Georges Sand range for Jun Company selling in Japan, the Far East, and the United States. At home, he designed the Beyond Stephen Linard ranges for Bazaar in South Moulton Street, London. Starting Powder Blue in 1986, he designed the Chess and Innocents Abroad collections, the latter an eclectic mix of leopard skin, broderie Anglaise and Edwardian schoolgirls. Since teaching at Southend, his former college, and Middlesex, he has been the assistant designer at Drakes, producing exclusive menswear accessories in silk and cashmere.

Linard has long been involved in the fashion and music mix, designing for singers David Bowie and Boy George and for pop groups such as Fun Boy 3, Spandau Ballet, and the Pet Shop Boys. Neil Tennant of the Pet Shop Boys says on their website, “I wore [a black coat] in the first Opportunities video and for West End Girls. It’s designed by Stephen Linard who, interestingly enough, played Envy in the It’s a Sin video. Eric Watson, a friend of mine who does most of our photography, had one first; I loved it and got one, the last one they had. It’s made of black linen, so it creases all the time. I liked it because it was very, very severe, and I wanted to look a bit like a preacher from the Wild West. It’s what people associated us [the Pet Shop Boys] with in the beginning.”

Linard also hosted the “Total Fashion Victims” theme nights at the Wag club, introducing Sadé and Swing Out Sister, with John Maybury’s light installations dazzling the crowd. He has styled for The Face and interviewed for Blitz, two top London style magazines. In short, for more than a decade, he has lived and worked a life of glamour and style.

Though the industry has become accustomed to real men on the catwalk, some agencies—So Dam’ Tuf, for example—deal in nothing else. Yet back in the early 1980s, all this was new, and therein lies Linard’s contribution to his time—he did it first. At the dawn of the 21st century, two decades after his first collection stunned the fashion world, Linard is enjoying a resurgence of interest in his work. Along with the likes of designers and firms such as Bodysuit, Boy, PX, Richmond/Cornejo, and Vivienne Westwood, Linard’s work has come to the forefront as retro, gaining a whole new band of followers. The works of these seminal 1980s designers has also been catching the interest of new designers such as Maria Chen and Anthony Symonds, who grew up in the heyday of the fashion-industry-meets-music-industry-meets-the-club-scene era.

—Alan J. Flux; updated by Daryl F. Mallett

such as Dries van Noten, Helmut Lang, and Alexander McQueen, as well as designers considered classics “in Liberty’s terms” such as Yohji Yamamoto and Jean-Paul Gaultier, according the Daily News Record in April 1996. It also expanded its sportswear selection, which featured lines such as Mossimo and Griffin Laundry, and maintained its strong designer suit business featuring Ralph Lauren, Giorgio Armani, Hugo Boss, and others.

Despite all its activity in both its branded merchandise unit and its stores, Liberty suffered financial losses throughout the 1990s and, in 2000, was acquired by London property company Marylebone Warwick Balfour. The purchase marked the end of 125 years of family ownership. Marylebone set out first to renovate the Regent Street store and made clear its intention to rejuvenate and further develop the Liberty of London brand.

—Doreen Ehrlich; updated by Karen Raugust

LINARD, Stephen

British designer

Born: London, England, 1959. Education: Studied at Southend College of Technology, 1975–78, and St. Martin’s School of Art, London, 1978–81. Career: Designer, Notre Dame X, 1981–82; showed first two womenswear collections, 1982; introduced menswear line, 1983; designer, Bigi, Japan; designer, Georges Sand Range for Jun Co., Japan; designer, Beyond Stephen Linard range for Bazaar; designer for Powder Blue, 1986; assistant designer, Drakes.

PUBLICATIONS

On LINARD:

Articles

- “Cue: Future Talent,” in Vogue (London), October 1981.
- Grieve, Amanda, “Quids In,” in Harper’s & Queen (London), April 1983.
- “Da Londra: Moda Come Provocazione Eclettica,” in L’Uomo Vogue (Milan), December 1985.
- Mower, Sarah, “It’s Westwood Redux in London 1980s Time Warp,” in the International Herald Tribune, 14 March 2001.

* * *

It would be difficult to exaggerate the impact of Stephen Linard’s degree collection when his models appeared on the catwalk at St. Martin’s School of Art in London in the summer of 1981. Linard was a menswear student, and his models were real men, with real muscle, stubble, tattoos, and the demeanor of East End toughs about to enter the boxing ring. The Reluctant Emigrés collection was a subtle mix of solid and transparent, the safely known and the unpredictable. Traditional pinstripe trousers had contrast patches at the derrière, solid dark waistcoat fronts and shadowy organza backs. Striped city shirts were seen to have curious underarm patches, and all was concealed beneath swirling black greatcoats. The clothes were instantly covetable, thoroughly masculine in an entirely new way, and electrifying in the way that only the truly innovative can be.

Linard was famous overnight, and his charisma and photogenic air ensured him an enthusiastic press. He joined a leading young design team known as Notre Dame X, with Richard Ostell and Darlajane Gilroy, among others. When he split from this group, backers set him up in a city studio, where he produced sought-after garments in esoterically titled collections—Angels with Dirty Faces, Les Enfants du Chemin de Fer. He was an early revivalist of bias cutting, and showed underwear as outerwear. He continued with an anarchic mix of fabrics and influences appealing to the glam-sex clubbers always in search of new heroes, and labels with cachet. These were great days of club couture, with punters in fierce competition over their evening toilettes. New heights of sartorial extravagance were scaled, with Linard and art-world personality Leigh Bowery in the running for chief mountaineer.

British rag-trade backing is notoriously fickle, however, and when Linard’s company collapsed, he went to Japan to join the stable of eccentric models at Men’s Bigi. The Japanese are always swiftly attracted to high-profile talent with high-profile personality, and Linard was soon designing the prestigious Georges Sand range for Jun Company selling in Japan, the Far East, and the United States. At home, he designed the Beyond Stephen Linard ranges for Bazaar in South Moulton Street, London. Starting Powder Blue in 1986, he designed the Chess and Innocents Abroad collections, the latter an eclectic mix of leopard skin, broderie Anglaise and Edwardian schoolgirls. Since teaching at Southend, his former college, and Middlesex, he has been the assistant designer at Drakes, producing exclusive menswear accessories in silk and cashmere.

Linard has long been involved in the fashion and music mix, designing for singers David Bowie and Boy George and for pop groups such as Fun Boy 3, Spandau Ballet, and the Pet Shop Boys. Neil Tennant of the Pet Shop Boys says on their website, “I wore [a black coat] in the first Opportunities video and for West End Girls. It’s designed by Stephen Linard who, interestingly enough, played Envy in the It’s a Sin video. Eric Watson, a friend of mine who does most of our photography, had one first; I loved it and got one, the last one they had. It’s made of black linen, so it creases all the time. I liked it because it was very, very severe, and I wanted to look a bit like a preacher from the Wild West. It’s what people associated us [the Pet Shop Boys] with in the beginning.”

Linard also hosted the “Total Fashion Victims” theme nights at the Wag club, introducing Sadé and Swing Out Sister, with John Maybury’s light installations dazzling the crowd. He has styled for The Face and interviewed for Blitz, two top London style magazines. In short, for more than a decade, he has lived and worked a life of glamour and style.

Though the industry has become accustomed to real men on the catwalk, some agencies—So Dam’ Tuf, for example—deal in nothing else. Yet back in the early 1980s, all this was new, and therein lies Linard’s contribution to his time—he did it first. At the dawn of the 21st century, two decades after his first collection stunned the fashion world, Linard is enjoying a resurgence of interest in his work. Along with the likes of designers and firms such as Bodysuit, Boy, PX, Richmond/Cornejo, and Vivienne Westwood, Linard’s work has come to the forefront as retro, gaining a whole new band of followers. The works of these seminal 1980s designers has also been catching the interest of new designers such as Maria Chen and Anthony Symonds, who grew up in the heyday of the fashion-industry-meets-music-industry-meets-the-club-scene era.

—Alan J. Flux; updated by Daryl F. Mallett

LITTMAN, Helen and Judy

See ENGLISH ECCENTRICS

L.L. BEAN

American clothing manufacturer and mail order company

Founded: in 1912 by Leon Leonwood Bean (1872–1967), in Freeport, Maine. Company History: Company founded for mail order sales of Maine Hunting Shoe, patented 1911. Camping and fishing equipment offered, from 1920s; bicycles, cookware, watches, luggage offered, from 1930s; casual apparel offered, from 1980s; retail salesroom added to manufacturing plant, 1945; offered 24/7 service from 1951; first branch store opened, in Japan, 1991; began offering separate catalogues for men, 1998; opened first full-line retail store outside of Freeport, 2000; launched first women's skin care line, 2000; introduced SUV in partnership with Subaru, 2000. Awards: Coty American Fashion Critics award, 1975; American Catalogue Awards Gold award, 1987, 1989, for hunting specialties catalogue; American Catalogue Awards Silver award, 1989; American Catalogue Awards Gold award for women's outdoor specialties catalogue, 1989. Company Address: L.L. Bean, Inc., Freeport, Maine, 04033, USA. Company Website: www.llbean.com.

PUBLICATIONS

On L.L. BEAN:

Books

Montgomery, M. R., In Search of L.L. Bean, Boston, 1984.
Griffin, Carlene, Spillin' the Beans, Freeport, Maine, 1993.

Articles

- Dickson, Paul, "L.L. Bean," in Town and Country (New York), February 1977.
 Crews, Harry, "L.L. Bean Has Your Number, America!" in Esquire (New York), March 1978.
 Longsdorf, Robert, "L.L. Bean: Yankee Ingenuity and Persistence Transformed This Little Maine Boot Shop into a Veritable Sportsman's Candy Store," in Trailer Life (Agoura, CA), May 1986.
 Kerasole, Ted, "L.L. Bean: 75 Years," in Sports Afield (New York), October 1987.
 Zempke, Ron, and Dick Schaaf, "L.L. Bean," in the Service Edge (Minneapolis, MN), 1989.
 "Bean Sticks to Its Backyard," in the Economist, 4 August 1990.
 Kaplan, Michael, "Gumshoe," in GQ (Gentlemen's Quarterly), October 1992.
 Hirano, Koji, "L.L. Bean's First Japan Store," in Daily News Record (DNR), 13 November 1992.
 Symonds, William C., "Paddling Harder at L.L. Bean," in Business Week, 7 December 1998.
 Hays, Constance L., "L.L. Bean Casts About for Ways to Grow," in the New York Times, 14 August 1999.
 Palmieri, Jean E., and Melonee McKinney, "L.L. Bean Set to Open Second Full-Line Unit in Virginia," in DNR, 21 April 2000.
 Dodd, Annmarie and Jean E. Palmieri, "L.L. Bean Warms to Its Male Customer," in DNR, 12 November 2000.

* * *

The assimilation of the work of L.L. Bean into the world of fashion design is a direct result of the eclecticism in late 20th-century culture. Sportsman, businessman, and inventor Leon Leonwood Bean stood outside the world of fashion during his lifetime. His mail order company, based in Freeport, Maine, began before World War I selling sporting garments and accessories which were innovative, durable and, once perfected, consistent in appearance over many decades. They were, initially, the epitome of antifashion.

Founded on the innovative design of the Maine Hunting Shoe, patented in 1911, L.L. Bean's range of clothing came to include traditional articles such as leather moccasins, based on American Indian footwear, long red woollen underwear, and collections of well-made weekend clothes for sportsmen and sportswomen. The appeal was their comfort, durability, and timelessness of appearance.

Bean's early business success was aided by the U.S. Post Office's introduction in 1912 of a cheap parcel post service. Similarly, the construction of the national highway network and the expansion of private car ownership in the 1910s and 1920s promoted recreational travel for sportsmen and helped to create a need for the specific kinds of garments sold by Bean. Their shop in Freeport was open for business around the clock, 365 days a year, demonstrating a genuine devotion to customer service and an understanding of the particular needs of their specialist clientele. Through its marketing policies, L.L. Bean came to represent solid, ethical values of conduct in commerce. The personification of integrity, L.L. Bean tested his own equipment prior to marketing, as the company president does today.

A notion of the L.L. Bean style had developed by the 1920s, when the company's catalogue was known worldwide. The catalogue had, from the start, a unique look and quality. Written in L.L. Bean's personal descriptive style, it was presented in a casual, scrapbook format, with its familiar Cheltenham typeface, plain wholesome models, and cover illustrations by America's foremost painters of outdoor life. By the 1980s, the catalogue had become an institution and a symbol for a particular lifestyle. It attracted references in publications such as Lisa Birnbach's The Preppy Handbook, which dubbed Bean "Preppy Mecca," and it was parodied in a National Lampoon "Catalogue" which featured a range of items including an "Edible Moccasin" and a "Chloroform Dog Bed." The genuine catalogue layout has contained such surrealist juxtapositions as jackets, trousers, and duck decoys.

Following the death of L.L. Bean in 1967, the business passed into the hands of his grandson, Leon Gorman, who expanded and modernized both the operation and its products while maintaining its essential character, rooted in Down East hunting and fishing culture. But modernization had its dangers. Enthusiasm for their newly developed synthetic fibres, useful in extreme weather conditions, had carried over to the range of casual clothing of the 1960s and 1970s. During the 1980s, however, in keeping with the rising tide of environmentalism and a new public appreciation of the natural, as opposed to the synthetic, L.L. Bean returned to 100-percent natural materials in their traditional clothes.

Expansion from shoes and outdoor clothing to accessories and equipment such as snowshoes, fishing gear, and canoes showed a keen awareness of links between apparel and the utilitarian accoutrements of modern life. Later catalogues acknowledged the rise of the fitness movement, with new lines of garments for exercising, water sports, and accessories for activities such as roller skating and cross-country skiing.

In 1975 L.L. Bean was recognized as a bona fide member of the fashion world when it received the prestigious Coty award. This accolade signified an expansion of the meaning of fashion and confirmed its role as a mirror on contemporary culture. The genius of L.L. Bean had been to recognize the recreational potential in his local surroundings and to invent ways to cater, through clothing, first for the growth of outdoor sporting activities and, later, to the booming leisure market.

Since its founding, L.L. Bean clothes have reflected the social attitudes, leisure pursuits, and health awareness of America while also embodying a dream about the unspoiled American landscape and the values it represented. Yet in the late 1990s, L.L. Bean ran into financial trouble. Its sweaters, parkas, khakis, and boots were no longer perceived as fashion-forward, but rather as clinging to the same outdoor and preppy looks that had been behind the company's success in the 1970s and 1980s. Analysts felt Bean's management had not kept up with changes in the mail-order and apparel industries. Many of its competitors—of which there were an ever-growing number—had moved into the children's market, for example, but Bean had not. It also was out of sync with the industry in its continued direct response-only strategy. Therefore, despite a strong brand name, a high level of service and customer satisfaction, a reputation for quality, and a sophisticated warehousing system, sales were flat.

The company took several steps to effect a turnaround. While its original product, the Bean Boot, remained one of its bestsellers, it undertook to update its apparel and footwear styles. It also began to put profitability on an equal footing with customer service—as opposed to its traditional belief that with good service, profit would follow—and increased marketing expenditures. Bean began to release catalogues for specific market niches, such as the Freeport Studio casual clothing and accessories catalogue targeted female Baby Boomers. Separate men's catalogues were introduced in 1998 and, by 2000, Bean issued six men's-only catalogues per year, emphasizing detailing and color palettes. The company similarly segmented children's and home products and now publishes 50 catalogues per year.

Meanwhile, Bean added new products and product categories that tied in with its brand image. In 2000 it introduced skin care products to its women's catalogue, focusing on items that protect the skin in the midst of an outdoor lifestyle. One of Bean's more unusual product extensions is a sport utility vehicle, the Subaru Outback Limited Special L.L. Bean Edition, also introduced in 2000. Bean also began expanding its distribution. In 2000, Bean opened its second full-line store (after its Freeport flagship). The launch marked the first step in a conservative retail strategy encompassing three to five new stores in the Northeast U.S. over three or four years. L.L. Bean also operates 10 outlet stores in the U.S. and 20 retail shops in Japan. Its stores feature both soft and hard goods, including the L.L. Bean Home collection. The company was an early entrant into e-commerce and has seen success with its Internet program, being rated among the top sites for sales and customer satisfaction.

Despite all the changes, Bean has remained focused on its core brand attributes. It is not attempting to become a designer brand—which it feels would alienate its loyal customers—but rather to create a more cohesive presentation and a greater emphasis on lifestyle. L.L. Bean had parlayed this focus into sales well above $1 billion by the turn of the century.

—Gregory Votolato; updated by Karen Raugust

LLOYD, Alison

See ALLY CAPELLINO

LORCAN MULLANY

See BELLVILLE SASOON-LORCAN MULLANY

LOUIS VUITTON

French luxury retailer and part of LVMH

Founded: by Louis Vuitton (1811–92) in Paris, 1854. Company History: Vuitton was apprenticed to several luggage makers; began designing flat luggage for use on new railways, diverging from traditional iron hooped trunks used on horse-drawn coaches; LV monogram introduced, 1896; opened stores in England, then in the U.S., 1897–1900; Henry Racamier became director, 1977; merged

Louis Vuitton, spring/summer 2002 ready-to-wear collection.
© Reuters NewMedia Inc./CORBIS.

In 1975 L.L. Bean was recognized as a bona fide member of the fashion world when it received the prestigious Coty award. This accolade signified an expansion of the meaning of fashion and confirmed its role as a mirror on contemporary culture. The genius of L.L. Bean had been to recognize the recreational potential in his local surroundings and to invent ways to cater, through clothing, first for the growth of outdoor sporting activities and, later, to the booming leisure market.

Since its founding, L.L. Bean clothes have reflected the social attitudes, leisure pursuits, and health awareness of America while also embodying a dream about the unspoiled American landscape and the values it represented. Yet in the late 1990s, L.L. Bean ran into financial trouble. Its sweaters, parkas, khakis, and boots were no longer perceived as fashion-forward, but rather as clinging to the same outdoor and preppy looks that had been behind the company's success in the 1970s and 1980s. Analysts felt Bean's management had not kept up with changes in the mail-order and apparel industries. Many of its competitors—of which there were an ever-growing number—had moved into the children's market, for example, but Bean had not. It also was out of sync with the industry in its continued direct response-only strategy. Therefore, despite a strong brand name, a high level of service and customer satisfaction, a reputation for quality, and a sophisticated warehousing system, sales were flat.

The company took several steps to effect a turnaround. While its original product, the Bean Boot, remained one of its bestsellers, it undertook to update its apparel and footwear styles. It also began to put profitability on an equal footing with customer service—as opposed to its traditional belief that with good service, profit would follow—and increased marketing expenditures. Bean began to release catalogues for specific market niches, such as the Freeport Studio casual clothing and accessories catalogue targeted female Baby Boomers. Separate men's catalogues were introduced in 1998 and, by 2000, Bean issued six men's-only catalogues per year, emphasizing detailing and color palettes. The company similarly segmented children's and home products and now publishes 50 catalogues per year.

Meanwhile, Bean added new products and product categories that tied in with its brand image. In 2000 it introduced skin care products to its women's catalogue, focusing on items that protect the skin in the midst of an outdoor lifestyle. One of Bean's more unusual product extensions is a sport utility vehicle, the Subaru Outback Limited Special L.L. Bean Edition, also introduced in 2000. Bean also began expanding its distribution. In 2000, Bean opened its second full-line store (after its Freeport flagship). The launch marked the first step in a conservative retail strategy encompassing three to five new stores in the Northeast U.S. over three or four years. L.L. Bean also operates 10 outlet stores in the U.S. and 20 retail shops in Japan. Its stores feature both soft and hard goods, including the L.L. Bean Home collection. The company was an early entrant into e-commerce and has seen success with its Internet program, being rated among the top sites for sales and customer satisfaction.

Despite all the changes, Bean has remained focused on its core brand attributes. It is not attempting to become a designer brand—which it feels would alienate its loyal customers—but rather to create a more cohesive presentation and a greater emphasis on lifestyle. L.L. Bean had parlayed this focus into sales well above $1 billion by the turn of the century.

—Gregory Votolato; updated by Karen Raugust

LLOYD, Alison

See ALLY CAPELLINO

LORCAN MULLANY

See BELLVILLE SASOON-LORCAN MULLANY

LOUIS VUITTON

French luxury retailer and part of LVMH

Founded: by Louis Vuitton (1811–92) in Paris, 1854. Company History: Vuitton was apprenticed to several luggage makers; began designing flat luggage for use on new railways, diverging from traditional iron hooped trunks used on horse-drawn coaches; LV monogram introduced, 1896; opened stores in England, then in the U.S., 1897–1900; Henry Racamier became director, 1977; merged

Louis Vuitton, spring/summer 2002 ready-to-wear collection.
© Reuters NewMedia Inc./CORBIS.

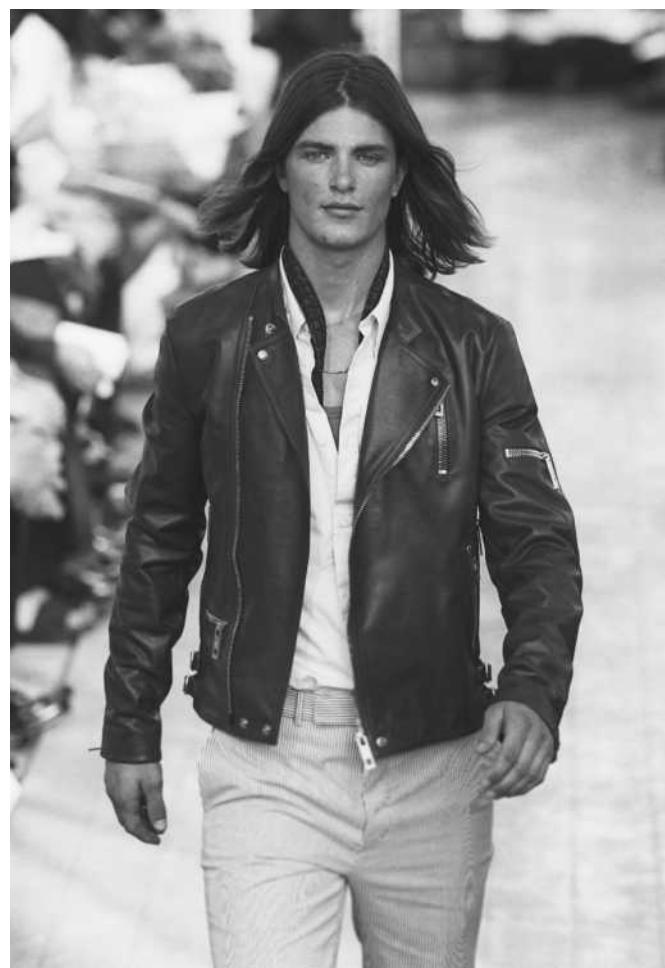

with Moët-Hennessey to become LVMH, 1987; LVMH bought Givenchy, 1988; Bernard Arnault acquired firm and became chairman, 1989; Recamier departed and started Orcofi SA, 1990; acquired many design houses and brands, from 1993; Marc Jacobs signed as artistic director, 1997; ready-to-wear line launched, 1997; introduced menswear, and opened megastores in New York, Paris, and London, 1998; opened second Hong Kong flagship, 2000. Company Address: 2 Rue du Pont Neuf, Paris 75001, France. Company Website: www.vuitton.com; www.lvmh.com.

PUBLICATIONS

On LOUIS VUITTON:

Books

- Lartigue, Jacques-Henri, 125 Years of Louis Vuitton, Paris, 1980.
A Journey Through Time: A Louis Vuitton Retrospective Exhibition, Paris, 1983.
Louis Vuitton, Traveling Through Time, Paris, 1984, 1996.
 Vuitton, Henry L., La malle aux souvenirs [A Trunkful of Memories], Paris, 1984, 1989.
 Forestier, Nadège, The Taste of Luxury: Bernard Arnault and the Moët-Hennessey Louis Vuitton Story, London, 1992.

Louis Vuitton, spring/summer 2002 collection. © AFP/CORBIS.

Sebag-Montefiore, Hugh, Kings on the Catwalk: The Louis Vuitton and Moët-Hennessey Affair, Chapmans 1992.

Articles

- “French Capital Markets: Bags of Bubbly,” in Euromoney, January 1987.
 “Fashionable Takeover,” in the Economist, 16 July 1988.
 Toy, Stewart, “Avant le Deluge at Moët Hennessy Louis Vuitton,” in Business Week, 24 April 1989.
 Carson-Parker, John, “Dese, Doms and Diors,” in Chief Executive, November/December 1989.
 Toy, Stewart, “Meet Monsieur Luxury,” in Business Week, 30 July 1990.
 Berman, Phyllis, and Zina Sawaya, “Life Begins at 77,” in Forbes, 27 May 1991.
 Caulkin, Simon, “A Case of Incompatibility,” in Management Today, February 1993.
 “Vuitton’s 100-Year Dash,” in WWD, 22 January 1996.
 Singer, Natasha, “The Rush to Russia,” in WWD, 20 January 1998.
 Raper, Sarah, and Katherine Weisman, “Vuitton’s Big Adventure,” in WWD, 19 February 1998.
 Barrett, Amy, “Vuitton Aims Makeover at Youth: Leather House Launches Megastores,” in the Wall Street Journal, 10 March 1998.
 “First Look at Louis Vuitton Menswear,” in DNR, 23 March 1998.
 Edelson, Sharon, “Vuitton: Upscale Downtown,” in WWD, 15 September 1998.
 Lloyd, Simon, “Louis Vuitton Breezes Along in an Expansive Mood,” in Business Review Weekly, 29 October 1999.
 Hammond, Teena, “On Rodeo: A Bigger, Better Vuitton,” in WWD, 23 December 1999.
 Daswani, Kavita, “Louis Vuitton’s Asian Rise,” in WWD, 29 March 2000.

* * *

The French firm of Louis Vuitton, making prestigious luggage and leather accessories since the middle of the 19th century, has been much overshadowed by its merger with Moët-Hennessey to become Moët-Hennessey Louis Vuitton (LVMH). Yet long before the merging of like-minded luxury companies, Louis Vuitton had established itself as an enduring purveyor of quality goods for the most discerning clientèle.

Young Louis Vuitton first came to Paris in 1837, in the year in which stage and mail coach travel was to be transformed by the opening of the first railway line in France, from Paris to St. Germain, to passenger traffic. Vuitton became an apprentice layetier, or luggage packer, to the prominent households of Paris at a time when journeys could take many months and require endless changes of wardrobe. He established such a reputation in this work that he was appointed by the Emperor of France, Napoleon III, as official layetier to his wife, the Empress Eugenie.

Vuitton acquired expert knowledge of what made a good traveling case and started to design luggage, opening his workshops to the general public in 1854 to provide luggage suitable for a new age of travel. Vuitton designed the first flat trunks that could be easily stacked in railway carriages and in the holds of ocean liners. Made of wood and covered in a new distinctive canvas called “Trianon Grey,” this particular traveling trunk superseded the dome-shaped, cumbersome trunks originally designed for the stage coach.

So successful and prestigious was this luggage that other trunk makers began to copy Vuitton's style and designs, a problem the firm bearing his name was still dealing with over a century later. In 1876 Vuitton responded to the imitators by changing the Trianon Grey canvas to a striped design in beige and brown. The problem, however, persisted and in 1888, Vuitton adopted another canvas—a checkerboard pattern with the words "Marque déposée Louis Vuitton" interwoven through the material.

When George Vuitton took over the family firm on his father's death in 1892, imitation of company products was still a major problem, and four years later he designed and took out worldwide patents on the now legendary Louis Vuitton canvas featuring his father's initials against background motifs of stars and flowers. This innovative design had the effect of stopping all imitations until the 1960s, when counterfeiting became a serious problem once again. The firm launched an offensive, employing a team of lawyers and special investigation agencies to actively pursue offenders through law courts all over the world, which continues to this day.

Methods of manufacture have changed little since the 19th century. Suitcases are still made by hand; the craftsmen line up the leather and canvas, tapping in the tiny nails one by one and securing the five-lever solid pick-proof brass locks with an individual handmade key, designed to allow the traveler to have only one key for all his or her luggage. The wooden frames of each trunk are made of 30-year-old poplar dried for at least four years. Each trunk has a serial number and can take up to 60 hours to make, and a suitcase as many as 15 hours.

Although the luggage collection has always offered extensive choice, Louis Vuitton has been creating special made-to-order hard-sided luggage since 1854. Congo explorer Pierre Savorgnan de Brazza (1852–1905) commissioned a combined trunk and bed from the company, and in 1936 for American conductor Leopold Stokowski's travels, Gaston Vuitton designed a traveling secrétaire. When opened, the extraordinary design revealed two shelves for books, three drawers for documents and musical scores, and a vertical compartment to store a typewriter. The gate-legged table which completed the instant workstation folded into the door.

To celebrate the 100th anniversary of the Louis Vuitton logo, the founder's son George invited a who's who of designers to create items from its trademarked striped fabric. Azzedine Alaïa, Manolo Blahnik, Helmut Lang, Isaac Mizrahi, Romeo Gigli, Vivienne Westwood, and Sybilla all fashioned limited edition carry-alls, from small cases to large bags for sale at select Vuitton stores, as well as other items.

In the 21st century some 200 Louis Vuitton boutiques in the major cities of Europe, the U.S., and Far East supplied prestigious luggage, elegant apparel, and a wide range of accessories to its distinguished clientèle. As part of the LVMH empire, the Vuitton brand was nestled among an ever-expanding number of design houses including Christian Lacroix, Givenchy, Emilio Pucci, Kenzo, Fendi, Michael Kors, and Donna Karan.

—Doreen Ehrlich and Owen James

M

MA, Walter

Chinese designer

Born: Hong Kong, China, 28 August 1951. Education: Graduated from Hong Kong Institute of Design, 1975. Family: Married to Joyce Ma; children: Adrienne. Career: Worked for a fashion company for eight months before opening his own first shop, Vee Boutique; founder/owner, with wife Joyce, Hong Kong-based Joyce Boutique Holdings, circa 1980; sold interest in Joyce to Holding di Partecipazioni Industriali, 1998; Ad Hoc younger collection introduced by Joyce Ma; agreed to sell majority stake in Joyce to Wheelock & Company, 2000; also served as vice chairman, Hong Kong Fashion Designers Association. Address: Unit 11, 8/F, Tower 1, Harbour Centre, Hok Cheung Street, Hung Hom, Kowloon, Hong Kong, China. Website: www.Joyce.com.

PUBLICATIONS

On MA:

Articles

- "HDP Builds Its Presence in Far East," in WWD, 1 December 1998.
"Sincere Celebrates 100 Years," in the South China Morning Post, 24 January 2000.
Sito, Peggy, "Investment Firm Takes Joyce Control," in the South China Morning Post, 5 April 2000.
Daswani, Kavita, "Internet Firm to Control Joyce Boutique," in WWD, 17 April 2000.
Chung, Yulanda, "Business Buzz: A Hong Kong Family Affair," in AsiaWeek, 1 July 2000.
Walton, Chris, "Fashion in Motion," available online at TotallyHK.com, www.totallyhk.com, 2001.

* * *

Walter Ma is very much a home-grown designer. Born and educated in Hong Kong, he has been a pillar of fashion for the young and fashion-conscious for more than a quarter-century now. One of the first graduates of Hong Kong's Institute of Fashion Design, Ma began working immediately to establish himself as one of the foremost local designers.

At the time he graduated from the Institute, it was the normal practice for graduates to work within the industry or to go abroad for further training. But after a very short stint working for an export company, Ma took the risky step of opening his own shop. It paid off—his boutiques, Gee and Vee, are now found in major shopping locations, and his workshops employ over a hundred people. He, along with Judy Mann, was among the first local designers to create his own label, became a pioneer in the field, and helped transform Hong Kong from a cheap garment factory into an upscale fashion cosmopolitan. He also served as vice chairman of the Hong Kong Fashion Designers Association, which was cofounded by Judy Mann.

Walter Ma, fall/winter 2001 collection. © AP/Wide World Photos.

Ma designs for four labels: Gee, Vee, Front First, and Walter Ma. Each offers a distinct look: Vee is the most up-market and offers sophisticated party and daywear, the clothes are feminine, detailed, and dressy; Gee is an easy-to-wear, middle-priced line aimed at the career woman with an emphasis on quality fabric and neutral shades that mix and match; Front First line is Ma's most outrageous, a casual, fun line providing mainly separates for fashionable young men and women; and the Walter Ma line, which is designer clothing. Together they cater to the needs of Hong Kong people, from leisurewear to clothes for special occasions such as graduate parties and the annual Chinese New Year celebrations. As a consequence, Walter describes himself as being client-led. His regular customers are women whose ages range from 20 to 40 and over. "She is a career woman who knows what she wants," he says. He also designs one-off eveningwear for regular customers, who include local film stars, pop singers, and society figures.

Walter Ma, fall/winter 2001 collection. © AP/Wide World Photos.

Designing for the Hong Kong market is no easy task, for although there is a regular demand for new items, it is a small clientèle and they are quite difficult to please. Ma, along with other local designers such as Bonita Chung, Lulu Cheung, Vivienne Tam, William Tang, Cecelia Yau, Danny Yu and others, dominate the local scene. Giorgio Armani, Ferragamo, and Prada also are quite visible with their modern twists on the classic figure-hugging cheongsam.

Ma designs around a dozen basics produced in very small quantities, on average from 6 to 24 pieces per design. Comfort is always an important consideration in his work, but the clothes are never safe or dowdy. Ma's look is distinctive with inspiration coming from European fashion capitals like Paris and Milan, modified for the local market. Pinstripes and checks are popular fabrics, suits are a staple. Unusual cutting reveals unexpected parts of the body.

His "two-in-one" look coalesces the ease of a single garment with the appearance of two. Combinations of black and white have become another part of his signature. This is applied, somewhat unusually, to jumpsuits and other leisurewear, rather than to business attire. Embroidery and beading are other constant features Ma employs, and locally he has become so influential others frequently mimic his look. He regards this both as an irritation and a compliment. Copyists can threaten a designer's reputation, but they also represent the success of a look or a direction. Hong Kong has also been infamous for designer rip-offs, which also damage the reputation of the credible designers.

Ma has long created fashionable clothing for a market he knows and understands; both he and wife Joyce are preeminent representatives in the Asian design world. The two founded Joyce Boutique Holdings, a Hong Kong-based luxury goods distributor, bringing Giorgio Armani, Hugo Boss, Dolce & Gabbana and Jil Sander clothes into Asia. Yet due to a retail slump in the Far East, Walter and Joyce decided to sell a 20-percent stake in Joyce to Italy's Holding di Partecipazioni Industriali (HdP) in 1998. The infusion of cash helped the struggling firm, but not enough—its star import line, Giorgio Armani, withdrew its lines from Joyce stores. This in turn led to selling a majority interest in Joyce to Strategic Capital Group (SCG), an investment group, in 2000. Yet this too went sour, and the Ma family finally found a buyer in Wheeck and Company.

For Walter and Joyce Ma, the move to sell most of the family's shares in Joyce was a firm step into the future—since the errant SCG as well as the new white knight Wheeck specialized in commerce over the Internet. As Joyce Ma told Women's Wear Daily (17 April 2000), "We will continue to be a fashion retailer," she explained, "The advantage...from this is that we will not be just an old-economy retailer, but we will also have e-commerce which, in essence, is much wider exposure for our brand name. We were the first to bring luxury European brand names to Asia," she continued. "Now we will be the first to bring the same level of service to our Asian consumers, online, in the new economy."

—Hazel Clark; updated by Daryl F. Mallett and Owen James

MACKIE, Bob

American designer

Born: Robert Gordon Mackie in Monterey Park, California, 24 March 1940. Education: Studied advertising and illustration at Pasadena City College; costume design at Chouinard Art Institute, Los Angeles, 1958–60. Family: Married Marianne Wolford in 1960 (divorced, 1963); children: Robin. Career: Sketch artist for film designers Frank Thompson, Jean Louis, and Edith Head, 1960–63; worked in television as assistant designer to Ray Aghayan, receiving his first screen credit for The Judy Garland Show, 1963; designer for The King Family Show, 1965, Mitzi Gaynor's night club acts, from 1966, The Carol Burnett Show, 1967–78, The Sonny and Cher Comedy Hour, 1971–74, and The Sonny and Cher Show, 1976–77; designed swimwear for Cole of California, 1976; independent designer of ready-to-wear fashions, with own label Bob Mackie Originals, New York, from 1982; created 1950s costumes for Moon Over Buffalo, 1995; introduced fall collection, 1996; designed 1970s women; and the Walter Ma line, which is designer clothing. Together they cater to the needs of Hong Kong people, from leisurewear to clothes for special occasions such as graduate parties and the annual Chinese New Year celebrations. As a consequence, Walter describes himself as being client-led. His regular customers are women whose ages range from 20 to 40 and over. "She is a career woman who knows what she wants," he says. He also designs one-off eveningwear for regular customers, who include local film stars, pop singers, and society figures.

Walter Ma, fall/winter 2001 collection. © AP/Wide World Photos.

Designing for the Hong Kong market is no easy task, for although there is a regular demand for new items, it is a small clientèle and they are quite difficult to please. Ma, along with other local designers such as Bonita Chung, Lulu Cheung, Vivienne Tam, William Tang, Cecelia Yau, Danny Yu and others, dominate the local scene. Giorgio Armani, Ferragamo, and Prada also are quite visible with their modern twists on the classic figure-hugging cheongsam.

Ma designs around a dozen basics produced in very small quantities, on average from 6 to 24 pieces per design. Comfort is always an important consideration in his work, but the clothes are never safe or dowdy. Ma's look is distinctive with inspiration coming from European fashion capitals like Paris and Milan, modified for the local market. Pinstripes and checks are popular fabrics, suits are a staple. Unusual cutting reveals unexpected parts of the body.

His "two-in-one" look coalesces the ease of a single garment with the appearance of two. Combinations of black and white have become another part of his signature. This is applied, somewhat unusually, to jumpsuits and other leisurewear, rather than to business attire. Embroidery and beading are other constant features Ma employs, and locally he has become so influential others frequently mimic his look. He regards this both as an irritation and a compliment. Copyists can threaten a designer's reputation, but they also represent the success of a look or a direction. Hong Kong has also been infamous for designer rip-offs, which also damage the reputation of the credible designers.

Ma has long created fashionable clothing for a market he knows and understands; both he and wife Joyce are preeminent representatives in the Asian design world. The two founded Joyce Boutique Holdings, a Hong Kong-based luxury goods distributor, bringing Giorgio Armani, Hugo Boss, Dolce & Gabbana and Jil Sander clothes into Asia. Yet due to a retail slump in the Far East, Walter and Joyce decided to sell a 20-percent stake in Joyce to Italy's Holding di Partecipazioni Industriali (HdP) in 1998. The infusion of cash helped the struggling firm, but not enough—its star import line, Giorgio Armani, withdrew its lines from Joyce stores. This in turn led to selling a majority interest in Joyce to Strategic Capital Group (SCG), an investment group, in 2000. Yet this too went sour, and the Ma family finally found a buyer in Wheeck and Company.

For Walter and Joyce Ma, the move to sell most of the family's shares in Joyce was a firm step into the future—since the errant SCG as well as the new white knight Wheeck specialized in commerce over the Internet. As Joyce Ma told Women's Wear Daily (17 April 2000), "We will continue to be a fashion retailer," she explained, "The advantage...from this is that we will not be just an old-economy retailer, but we will also have e-commerce which, in essence, is much wider exposure for our brand name. We were the first to bring luxury European brand names to Asia," she continued. "Now we will be the first to bring the same level of service to our Asian consumers, online, in the new economy."

—Hazel Clark; updated by Daryl F. Mallett and Owen James

MACKIE, Bob

American designer

Born: Robert Gordon Mackie in Monterey Park, California, 24 March 1940. Education: Studied advertising and illustration at Pasadena City College; costume design at Chouinard Art Institute, Los Angeles, 1958–60. Family: Married Marianne Wolford in 1960 (divorced, 1963); children: Robin. Career: Sketch artist for film designers Frank Thompson, Jean Louis, and Edith Head, 1960–63; worked in television as assistant designer to Ray Aghayan, receiving his first screen credit for The Judy Garland Show, 1963; designer for The King Family Show, 1965, Mitzi Gaynor's night club acts, from 1966, The Carol Burnett Show, 1967–78, The Sonny and Cher Comedy Hour, 1971–74, and The Sonny and Cher Show, 1976–77; designed swimwear for Cole of California, 1976; independent designer of ready-to-wear fashions, with own label Bob Mackie Originals, New York, from 1982; created 1950s costumes for Moon Over Buffalo, 1995; introduced fall collection, 1996; designed 1970s

Bob Mackie posing with some of his designs at the “Unmistakably Mackie” retrospective at the Fashion Institute of Technology in New York, 1999. © AP/Wide World Photos.

costumes and scenery in the Cleveland San Jose Ballet’s Blue Suede Shoes, 1997; designed late-1960s costumes for musical Pete & Keely. Awards: Emmy award, 1967 (with Ray Aghayan), 1969, 1976, 1978, 1985; Costume Designers Guild award, 1968; American Fashion award, 1975. Address: Bob Mackie Originals, 225 West 29th Street, New York, NY 10001, USA

PUBLICATIONS

By MACKIE:

Books

Dressing for Glamor (with Gerry Brenner), New York, 1979.

On MACKIE:

Books

Morris, Bernadine, and Barbara Walz, The Fashion Makers, New York, 1978.

Maeder, Edward, et al., Hollywood and History: Costume Design in Film, New York, 1987.

Pecktal, Lynn, Costume Design: Techniques of Modern Masters, New York, 1993.

Stegemeyer, Anne, Who’s Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.

DeCaro, Frank, Unmistakably Mackie: The Fantasy and Fashion of Bob Mackie, New York, 1999.

Articles

- Thomas, Kay, “Spotlighting Two Designers Who Took Broadway by Storm,” in the New York Daily News, 28 November 1971.
- “Bob and Ray,” in Newsweek, 11 June 1973.
- Moore, Didi, “Designing Man,” in US, 19 January 1982.
- Rittersporn, Liz, “Bob Mackie: The World’s Most Visible Designer,” in the New York Daily News, 5 May 1985.
- Oney, Steve, “Bob Mackie: Daring, Dazzling Designer to the Stars,” in Cosmopolitan (London), April 1986.
- Milbank, Caroline Rennolds, “Bob Mackie,” in Interview (New York), December 1986.
- Michaels, Debra, “Bob Mackie: Cashing in on the Glamor,” in WWD, 19 April 1988.
- “Bob Mackie,” in Current Biography (New York), October 1988.
- Mansfield, Stephanie, “Bob Mackie, the Boogie-Woogie Bugle Band Boy of Seventh Avenue, Wants to Be Taken Seriously,” in Vogue (New York), February 1990.
- Finke, Nikki, “Trouble in the House of Mackie,” in Vanity Fair, June 1993.
- Chase, Anthony, “Designer Sketchbook: Moon Over Buffalo,” in TCI (New York), November 1995.
- Schiro, Anne-Marie, “Into the Evening with Elegance,” in the New York Times, 2 April 1996.
- Slingerland, Amy L., “Blue Suede Shoes,” in TCI (New York), March 1997.
- DeCaro, Frank, “Fashion Chat,” in TV Guide, 22 March 1997.
- “Bob Mackie,” in People, 16 February 1998.
- Barbour, David, “ED Designer Sketchbook: Stayin’ Alive,” in Entertainment Design (New York), February 2001.
- Szabo, Julia, “All Hams on Deck,” in the New York Times Magazine, Spring 2001.

* * *

Bob Mackie is one of a handful of designers to work with success in the related but disparate fields of theater and fashion design. He is probably best known for the wittily revealing, glamorous beaded and feathered ensembles he designed for actress and singer Cher since the early 1970s. This collaborative image remains so strong that to visualize Cher is to see her dressed by Mackie. His true genius as an interpretative designer, however, can best be seen in his work for comedian Carol Burnett.

For 11 years, Mackie designed costumes and wigs for Burnett’s weekly variety show, including full-scale production numbers to showcase guest artists in elaborate parodies of such classic cult films as Sunset Boulevard or Mildred Pierce. These character sketches were written for Burnett’s company of regular performers, with ongoing stories starring Burnett as one of her various alter egos. In Mrs. Wiggins, for example, Mackie and Burnett created the archetypal “keep busy while doing nothing” secretary, complete with overlong fingernails, brass spittoon-colored perm, stiletto heels, and a skirt so tight walking seemed doubtful and sitting impossible. In this case, the costume first defined the character and thus gave direction to the ensuing scripts. Visually, audiences were led away from the personality of the performer and toward that of the character portrayed. In contrast, Mackie’s designs for guest artists always enhanced their visual trademarks, so their personalities remained the focus, supported by wig and costume, even when they played comic or character roles.

Bob Mackie, fall 2001 “Foreign Intrigue” collection: beaded slip top minidress with an ostrich coat. © AP/Wide World Photos.

When he turned to ready-to-wear in 1982, Mackie’s name had been before the television viewing public for 15 years. Women who had admired the casual but elegant tailored outfits Burnett wore to open and close her show or the dramatic allure of Cher’s gowns formed an eager and ready market for the first designs from Bob Mackie Originals. The fashion press took rather longer to convince that the aptly dubbed “sultan of sequins, rajah of rhinestones” had the necessary seriousness of purpose to sustain a career on Seventh Avenue. Yet Mackie has always designed day and evening clothing in addition to his theatrical work. As early as 1969, he and partners Ray Aghayan and Elizabeth Courtney established their Beverly Hills boutique, Elizabeth the First, which in turn spawned the short-lived wholesale firm Ray Aghayan/Bob Mackie.

In his 1979 book, Dressing for Glamor, Mackie states his belief that glamor is “a state of mind, a feeling of self-confidence.” His strength as a designer is an intuitive understanding of what makes a woman feel self-confident and well dressed—solid craftsmanship, attention to detail, clothes that combine wit and artistry with a sense of flair and drama.

In 1995 Moon Over Buffalo took to the stage. With Mackie’s outstanding costume design and makeup artistry, the Broadway production became a hit. Directed by Tom Moore, the play featured Carol Burnett and Philip Bosco yearning for Hollywood careers. It takes place in the 1950s, in a time where actresses never went anywhere without being made up. Mackie had his work cut out for him: costumes were bold in color and contrasted with room schemes. Referring to a purple-and-white ensemble and a bright green suit, Mackie says, “Those colors are accurate to the period. Clothes were a lot more flamboyant in the 1950s than we’re used to seeing now.”

In March 1997 TV Guide sat down with Mackie to discuss the importance of shock value in fashion. “It gives you something to talk about at the office the next day,” the designer explained. But when it comes to hairstyles, Mackie said to stick with what you know. “It’s like on your wedding day, don’t try a new hairdo. You should look like yourself. My idea of a real movie star is someone who you know who they are, no matter what they play or where they are.”

With costuming Vegas showgirls, disco divas, Cher, and numerous Broadway productions in his past, Mackie took his career to a new and different level—ballet. Danced to master recordings of Elvis Presley songs, the Cleveland San Jose Ballet’s Blue Suede Shoes was the first project in which Mackie designed not only costumes but the sets as well. He is, in fact, one of the few costume designers who has expanded his work into set design.

Responsible for 230 costumes and 12 sets, Mackie’s flashy style fit right in with the 1970 trends. With men in bell-bottomed pantsuits and showgirls in brightly sequined body stockings, the show’s well-deserved applause speaks for itself. In the off-Broadway musical Pete & Keely, Mackie once again nailed the era—the 1960s—perfectly in his designs.

Renowned for costume design after costume design and even set design after set design, Mackie is the first to admit he can’t take all the credit. The modest legend claims, “I was showing lingerie while everybody else was showing evening gowns. I was rather well known because of all the people I dressed at the time.” That may be true, Mackie, but now perhaps, you’re the reason others become known.

—Whitney Blausen; updated by Diana Idzelis

MAD CARPENTIER

American design house

Founded: by Mad Maltezos and Suzie Carpentier in Paris, 1939 (taking over from Vionnet after her retirement). Company History: House closed, 1957.

PUBLICATIONS

On MAD CARPENTIER:

Books

Perkins, Alice K., Paris Couturiers and Milliners, New York, 1949.
Picken, Mary Brooks, and Dora Loues Miller, Dressmakers of France: The Who, How and Why of the French Couture, New York, 1956.

Bob Mackie, fall 2001 "Foreign Intrigue" collection: beaded slip top minidress with an ostrich coat. © AP/Wide World Photos.

visual trademarks, so their personalities remained the focus, supported by wig and costume, even when they played comic or character roles.

When he turned to ready-to-wear in 1982, Mackie's name had been before the television viewing public for 15 years. Women who had admired the casual but elegant tailored outfits Burnett wore to open and close her show or the dramatic allure of Cher's gowns formed an eager and ready market for the first designs from Bob Mackie Originals. The fashion press took rather longer to convince that the aptly dubbed "sultan of sequins, rajah of rhinestones" had the necessary seriousness of purpose to sustain a career on Seventh Avenue. Yet Mackie has always designed day and evening clothing in addition to his theatrical work. As early as 1969, he and partners Ray Aghayan and Elizabeth Courtney established their Beverly Hills boutique, Elizabeth the First, which in turn spawned the short-lived wholesale firm Ray Aghayan/Bob Mackie.

In his 1979 book, Dressing for Glamor, Mackie states his belief that glamor is "a state of mind, a feeling of self-confidence." His strength as a designer is an intuitive understanding of what makes a woman feel self-confident and well dressed—solid craftsmanship, attention to detail, clothes that combine wit and artistry with a sense of flair and drama.

In 1995 Moon Over Buffalo took to the stage. With Mackie's outstanding costume design and makeup artistry, the Broadway production became a hit. Directed by Tom Moore, the play featured Carol Burnett and Philip Bosco yearning for Hollywood careers. It takes place in the 1950s, in a time where actresses never went anywhere without being made up. Mackie had his work cut out for him: costumes were bold in color and contrasted with room schemes. Referring to a purple-and-white ensemble and a bright green suit, Mackie says, "Those colors are accurate to the period. Clothes were a lot more flamboyant in the 1950s than we're used to seeing now."

In March 1997 TV Guide sat down with Mackie to discuss the importance of shock value in fashion. "It gives you something to talk about at the office the next day," the designer explained. But when it comes to hairstyles, Mackie said to stick with what you know. "It's like on your wedding day, don't try a new hairdo. You should look like yourself. My idea of a real movie star is someone who you know who they are, no matter what they play or where they are."

With costuming Vegas showgirls, disco divas, Cher, and numerous Broadway productions in his past, Mackie took his career to a new and different level—ballet. Danced to master recordings of Elvis Presley songs, the Cleveland San Jose Ballet's Blue Suede Shoes was the first project in which Mackie designed not only costumes but the sets as well. He is, in fact, one of the few costume designers who has expanded his work into set design.

Responsible for 230 costumes and 12 sets, Mackie's flashy style fit right in with the 1970 trends. With men in bell-bottomed pantsuits and showgirls in brightly sequined body stockings, the show's well-deserved applause speaks for itself. In the off-Broadway musical Pete & Keely, Mackie once again nailed the era—the 1960s—perfectly in his designs.

Renowned for costume design after costume design and even set design after set design, Mackie is the first to admit he can't take all the credit. The modest legend claims, "I was showing lingerie while everybody else was showing evening gowns. I was rather well known because of all the people I dressed at the time." That may be true, Mackie, but now perhaps, you're the reason others become known.

—Whitney Blausen; updated by Diana Idzelis

MAD CARPENTIER

American design house

Founded: by Mad Maltezos and Suzie Carpentier in Paris, 1939 (taking over from Vionnet after her retirement). Company History: House closed, 1957.

PUBLICATIONS

On MAD CARPENTIER:

Books

Perkins, Alice K., Paris Couturiers and Milliners, New York, 1949.
Picken, Mary Brooks, and Dora Loues Miller, Dressmakers of France: The Who, How and Why of the French Couture, New York, 1956.

Mad Carpentier, 1946 collection: chiffon evening gown. © Genevieve Naylor/CORBIS.

Articles

“Carpentier Likes to Work with Folds,” in WWD, 14 April 1948.

* * *

There were matters far more urgent in the late 1930s than that which led to the creation of the house of Mad Carpentier in January 1940. The firm’s two partners—Mad Maltezos and Suzie Carpentier—banded together when Madeleine Vionnet, their former employer, closed in 1939.

In the unexamined cliché in fashion history and for a number of clients, the two women represented a continuation of Vionnet’s bias cut and elegance in fashion combined with a discreet social model, always proper. Twins seized from a most inspired rib, two women balanced to equal one, and perseverance through the war years established an interesting mystique around Mad Carpentier. As Mary

Mad Carpentier, 1946 collection: silk blouse. © Genevieve Naylor/CORBIS.

Brooks Picken and Dora Loues Miller, authors of Dressmakers of France: The Who, How, and Why of the French Couture (New York, 1956) passionately enthused, “When it was almost impossible to think of luxury, of the richness of colors, of the beauty of fabrics, in a city without joy and without light...these two talented women carried on.”

Like Antoine de Saint-Exupéry heroines, Maltezos, designer and creative spirit, and Carpentier, refined and cordial proprietress, formerly a Vionnet vendeuse, sustained some of the ideas of Vionnet in soft evening clothes, but there were two special and autonomous distinctions for Mad Carpentier. In the late 1940s, Mad Carpentier created evening dresses of extraordinary historical fantasy, attenuating the body with faux bustles and creating the new sumptuousness of postwar evening clothes determined chiefly by silhouette. If these gowns did not achieve the flamboyant success of Fath and Dior in the same years, it is because the Mad Carpentier gowns are too redolent of the past and failed to capture the spirit of the “new” necessary to the marketing and imagination of the postwar era. Though Fath and Dior were both influenced by the past, the belle époque could scarcely be revived in this era without, at least, the veneer of the newest and most extravagant. A Mad Carpentier gown photographed in L'Officiel at Christmas in 1947 has New Look traits, but maintains the aura of a Victorian past.

Another hallmark of the house of Mad Carpentier were its remarkable coats, long surpassing the Vionnet tradition. The bravura shapes of Mad Carpentier coats in robust textures were immensely popular in the 1940s and 1950s independent of the Vionnet tradition. In particular, the coats were much imitated by Seventh Avenue, New York manufacturers, often rivaling the ever-popular Balenciaga coats for copying. B. Altman & Co., New York, for example, advertised a romantically sweeping long coat with high collar as “Mad Carpentier’s famous coat...beautifully copied in all-wool fleece” in Vogue, January 1947. Amplitude, rugged materials, and the swaggering grandeur of riding coats gave both assertiveness and grace to the Mad Carpentier creations.

At Mad Carpentier, the Vionnet tradition was maintained in ease, a desire for easy shaping and even for tying. In the dresses, the full three-dimensionality emphasized by Vionnet was often compromised by an interest in details at the side, as if to reinstate planarity, but in the coats, the effect was to create soft, large volumes. Women's Wear Daily (14 April 1948) commented, “the firm has gone its quiet way, and now ranks as a house for clothes of distinctive character rather than one taking an active or publicized role in the general development of the Paris couture. Carpentier clothes have the handmade air of Vionnet, but do not always follow the bias technique of that school of dressmaking.”

Linked to Vionnet’s innovations in dressmaking, but in fact functioning with little inclination to their inventiveness, Mad Carpentier turned out to be a house of the most traditional dresses, genteel tailoring, and of sensational coats. Its understated, highly proper sensibility was at odds with advanced and aggressive postwar fashion and only in the exuberance of its sculptural coats did the imagination and reputation soar.

—Richard Martin

MADRAZO, Mariano Fortuny y

See FORTUNY (y MADRAZO), Mariano

MAINBOCHER

American designer

Born: Main Rousseau Bocher in Chicago, Illinois, 24 October 1890; adopted name Mainbocher, circa 1929. Education: Studied at the Lewis Institute, Chicago, 1907; Chicago Academy of Fine Arts, 1908–09, and at the Art Students’ League, New York, 1909–11; attended University of Chicago, 1911, and Königliche Kunstgewerbemuseum, Munich, 1911–12; studied painting with E. A. Taylor, Paris, 1913–14. Military Service: American Ambulance Corps, and Intelligence Corps, Paris, 1917–18. Career: Lithographer, part-time, New York, 1909–11; sketch artist for clothing manufacturer E.L. Mayer, New York, 1914–17; illustrator, Harper's Bazaar, Paris, 1917–21; fashion correspondent, then editor, French Vogue, 1922–29; established couturier firm, Paris, 1930–39, and New York, 1939–71; also designed stage costumes, from 1932, and uniforms for American WAVES (U.S. Navy), 1942; American Girl Scouts, 1946; American Red Cross, 1948; U.S. Women’s Marine Corps, 1951. Exhibitions: Fashion on Stage: Couture for the Broadway Theater, 1910–55, New York, 1999. Collections: Mainbocher

Mad Carpentier, 1946 collection: silk blouse. © Genevieve Naylor/CORBIS.

Brooks Picken and Dora Loues Miller, authors of Dressmakers of France: The Who, How, and Why of the French Couture (New York, 1956) passionately enthused, “When it was almost impossible to think of luxury, of the richness of colors, of the beauty of fabrics, in a city without joy and without light...these two talented women carried on.”

Like Antoine de Saint-Exupéry heroines, Maltezos, designer and creative spirit, and Carpentier, refined and cordial proprietress, formerly a Vionnet vendeuse, sustained some of the ideas of Vionnet in soft evening clothes, but there were two special and autonomous distinctions for Mad Carpentier. In the late 1940s, Mad Carpentier created evening dresses of extraordinary historical fantasy, attenuating the body with faux bustles and creating the new sumptuousness of postwar evening clothes determined chiefly by silhouette. If these gowns did not achieve the flamboyant success of Fath and Dior in the same years, it is because the Mad Carpentier gowns are too redolent of the past and failed to capture the spirit of the “new” necessary to the marketing and imagination of the postwar era. Though Fath and Dior were both influenced by the past, the belle époque could scarcely be revived in this era without, at least, the veneer of the newest and most extravagant. A Mad Carpentier gown photographed in L'Officiel at Christmas in 1947 has New Look traits, but maintains the aura of a Victorian past.

Another hallmark of the house of Mad Carpentier were its remarkable coats, long surpassing the Vionnet tradition. The bravura shapes of Mad Carpentier coats in robust textures were immensely popular in the 1940s and 1950s independent of the Vionnet tradition. In particular, the coats were much imitated by Seventh Avenue, New York manufacturers, often rivaling the ever-popular Balenciaga coats for copying. B. Altman & Co., New York, for example, advertised a romantically sweeping long coat with high collar as “Mad Carpentier’s famous coat...beautifully copied in all-wool fleece” in Vogue, January 1947. Amplitude, rugged materials, and the swaggering grandeur of riding coats gave both assertiveness and grace to the Mad Carpentier creations.

At Mad Carpentier, the Vionnet tradition was maintained in ease, a desire for easy shaping and even for tying. In the dresses, the full three-dimensionality emphasized by Vionnet was often compromised by an interest in details at the side, as if to reinstate planarity, but in the coats, the effect was to create soft, large volumes. Women's Wear Daily (14 April 1948) commented, “the firm has gone its quiet way, and now ranks as a house for clothes of distinctive character rather than one taking an active or publicized role in the general development of the Paris couture. Carpentier clothes have the handmade air of Vionnet, but do not always follow the bias technique of that school of dressmaking.”

Linked to Vionnet’s innovations in dressmaking, but in fact functioning with little inclination to their inventiveness, Mad Carpentier turned out to be a house of the most traditional dresses, genteel tailoring, and of sensational coats. Its understated, highly proper sensibility was at odds with advanced and aggressive postwar fashion and only in the exuberance of its sculptural coats did the imagination and reputation soar.

—Richard Martin

MADRAZO, Mariano Fortuny y

See FORTUNY (y MADRAZO), Mariano

MAINBOCHER

American designer

Born: Main Rousseau Bocher in Chicago, Illinois, 24 October 1890; adopted name Mainbocher, circa 1929. Education: Studied at the Lewis Institute, Chicago, 1907; Chicago Academy of Fine Arts, 1908–09, and at the Art Students’ League, New York, 1909–11; attended University of Chicago, 1911, and Königliche Kunstgewerbemuseum, Munich, 1911–12; studied painting with E. A. Taylor, Paris, 1913–14. Military Service: American Ambulance Corps, and Intelligence Corps, Paris, 1917–18. Career: Lithographer, part-time, New York, 1909–11; sketch artist for clothing manufacturer E.L. Mayer, New York, 1914–17; illustrator, Harper's Bazaar, Paris, 1917–21; fashion correspondent, then editor, French Vogue, 1922–29; established couturier firm, Paris, 1930–39, and New York, 1939–71; also designed stage costumes, from 1932, and uniforms for American WAVES (U.S. Navy), 1942; American Girl Scouts, 1946; American Red Cross, 1948; U.S. Women’s Marine Corps, 1951. Exhibitions: Fashion on Stage: Couture for the Broadway Theater, 1910–55, New York, 1999. Collections: Mainbocher sketchbooks, Costume Institute at the Metropolitan Museum of Art.

Mainbocher, 1949 collection: satin gown. © Genevieve Naylor/CORBIS.

Died: 27 December 1976.

PUBLICATIONS

On MAINBOCHER:

Books

Levin, Phyllis Lee, The Wheels of Fashion, New York, 1965.

Lee, Sarah Tomerlin, editor, American Fashion: The Life and Lines of Adrian, Mainbocher, McCardell, Norell, and Trigère, New York, 1975, 1987.

Milbank, Caroline Rennolds, Couture: The Great Designers, New York, 1985.

_____, New York Fashion: The Evolution of American Style, New York, 1989.

Stegemeyer, Anne, Who's Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.

Mainbocher, spring 1958 collection: wool suit with a halter top of lace over shantung. © Bettmann/CORBIS.

Articles

- “Mainbocher,” in Current Biography, February 1942.
- “Mainbocher,” special monograph issue of Harper’s Bazaar, July 1967.
- “Mainbocher: Great Gentleman of Fashion,” in Harper’s Bazaar, June 1971.
- “Mainbocher,” [obituary], in the Times (London), 5 January 1977.
- “The Career of Mainbocher Discussed,” in the Times, 14 January 1977.
- Lawford, Valentine, “A Look Back in Fashion,” in Architectural Digest (Los Angeles), September 1988.
- Cunningham, Bill, “An Elegant Blast From the Past,” in the New York Times, 24 September 2000.

* * *

The snob appeal of patronizing an American couturier with a French sounding name—extremely successful in Paris for a decade before his arrival in the United States—appealed to the socially élite trade in 1940 New York. No less appealing was the fact that Mainbocher had designed the Duchess of Windsor’s trousseau upon her marriage in 1937. In 1930, after several years as editor of French Vogue, Mainbocher suddenly decided to channel his artistic sensibilities into the establishment of a couture salon in Paris. Editorial experience enabled him to sense what would become fashionable and to package himself as an exclusive designer to the wealthy and the titled.

From the start, Mainbocher specialized in simple, conservative, elegant, and extremely expensive fashions, the luxury of cut, materials, and workmanship that could only be recognized by those in the know. Most importantly, the clothes, exquisitely finished inside and out, gave self-confidence to the women who wore them.

Mainbocher considered his contemporary Chanel too plebeian, and Schiaparelli too avant-garde. Instead, he admired Vionnet and borrowed her bias-cut technique for his own simple slip evening dresses in the 1930s. Twenty years later, a very similar slip design was employed by Mainbocher, produced in a signature elegant silk velvet fabric. From Augustabernard, another 1920s French dress designer, Mainbocher was inspired not only to form his name, but to use godets in skirts, and shoulder bows to catch the folds of draped bodices. Frequent Mainbocher suit treatments in the 1930s included short capelet effects or dropped shoulders widening into full sleeves. The designer knew his clientèle personally and designed for the lives they led, specializing in evening clothes. For resort wear he ventured into a mix-and-match ensemble consisting of matching top, skirt, bathing suit, and hat. Slim, demure black wool dresses for daytime would sport white chiffon interest at the throat.

While Mainbocher did use some Japanese-like kimonos as eveningwear during this period, his hallmark was nonaggressive, not exaggerated or period dressing. A touch of labor-intensive luxury would be bestowed by all-over sequins on an evening jacket or on a bare top worn discreetly under a jacket. The grayish-blue, “Wallis blue,” of the Duchess of Windsor’s wedding dress, as well as the long, fluid crêpe dress itself, was widely copied. The simple, conservative elegance of Mainbocher’s style, feminine but not fussy, perfectly suited the slim, severe good looks of the Duchess and wealthy women like her. Additionally, she was honoring a fellow American.

In 1934 Mainbocher introduced the boned strapless bodice, and before the war forced him to leave Paris, a waist cincher, forming tiny waisted, pleated and skirted dresses that presaged Dior’s postwar New Look. Mainbocher’s arrival in New York coincided perfectly with the city élite’s love for French couture, for though he epitomized it, he satisfied their patriotism because he was actually an American. Society matrons such as C.Z. Guest and the Vanderbilts, and stage actresses such as Mary Martin, avidly patronized this “most expensive custom dressmaker” who made women look and feel exquisitely well-bred.

Accidance to wartime economies resulted in Mainbocher’s short evening dresses, and versatile cashmere sweaters—beaded, lined in silk, and closed by jeweled buttons—designed to keep women warm in their bare evening gowns. Another practical wartime innovation, the “glamor belt,” an apron-like, sequined or bead-encrusted accessory, could be added to embellish any plain costume. Practically gratis, Mainbocher designed uniforms for the U.S. Women’s Marine Corps, the WAVES (Navy), the American Red Cross, and the Girl Scouts.

As the years progressed, Mainbocher continued to design exclusively on a made-to-order basis, refusing to license his name. La Galerie, a department in his salon, did produce clothes in standard sizes, a compromise for busy women without time for lengthy fittings. The reverse snobbery of the humble pastel gingham or cotton piqué used for fancy dresses appealed to Mainbocher’s clientèle, as did refined tweed suits with subtle dressmaker touches such as curved bands or fabric appliqués, worn with coordinating bare-armed blouses. A Mainbocher standby was the little black "nothing" sheath dress.

By the 1950s and 1960s, old guard Mainbocher customers enjoyed wearing impeccably made classic coats and suits of wool, often fur-lined, in the midst of nouveau-riche ostentation. The typical ladylike daytime Mainbocher look was accessorized by a plain velvet bow in the hair instead of a hat, a choker of several strands of real pearls, white gloves, and plain pumps with matching handbag. The integrity of luxurious fabrics, intricate cut, quality workmanship and materials, elegance and classicism, were cherished and worn for years by Mainbocher's upper crust customers.

—Therese Duzinkiewicz Baker

MALDEN MILLS INDUSTRIES, INC.

American textile manufacturer

Founded: in Malden, Massachusetts, by Henry Feuerstein as Malden Knitting, 1906. Company History: Malden Knitting expanded to include Malden Spinning and Dyeing, 1923; provided U.S. Army uniforms during World War I and II; company moved to Lawrence, Massachusetts, 1950s; developed synthetic fabric (later named Polarfleece), 1979; betted heavy on fake fur and lost, 1981; Polarfleece products selling under Polartec label flourish, 1980s; clothed the U.S. Winter Olympics team, 1992; fire wiped out major operations, 1995; opened rebuilt state-of-the-art mill facility, 1996; closed upholstery division and satellite mill, 1998; settled suit against company, 2000; forced to declare bankruptcy, 2001. Awards: citation from President Clinton, 1996; Workforce Magazine Optimas award for Managing Change, 1997. Company Address: 46 Stafford Street, Lawrence, MA 01841.

PUBLICATIONS

On MALDEN MILLS:

Articles

- "Performance Fleece Fabrics Force New Insulating Frontiers," in Sporting Goods Business, September 1991.
- Rotenier, Nancy, "The Golden Fleece," in Forbes, 24 May 1993.
- Diesenhouse, Susan, "A Textile Maker Thrives by Breaking All the Rules," in the New York Times, 24 July 1994.
- Lee, Melissa, "Malden Looks Spiffy in New England Textile Gloom," in the Wall Street Journal, 10 November 1995.
- Herszenhorn, David M., "A Plume of Hope Rises from Factory Ashes..." in the New York Times, 16 December 1995.
- Witkowski, Tim, "The Glow From a Fire," in Time, 8 January 1996.
- Jerome, Richard, and Stephen Sawicki, "Holding the Line," in People, 5 February 1996.
- Teal, Thomas, "Not a Fool; Not a Saint," in Fortune, 11 November 1996.
- Owens, Mitchell, "A Mill Community Comes Back to Life," in the New York Times, 26 December 1996.
- Goldberg, Carey, "A Promise is Kept," in the New York Times, 16 September 1997.

Luscombe, Belinda, "Good Old Factory Values," in Time, 29 September 1997.

"Malden Mills Workers Sue Employer," in Claims, February 2000.

* * *

Henry Feuerstein, a Hungarian immigrant, bought a small mill in Malden, Massachusetts, in 1906. At Malden Knitting, Feuerstein set about making wool "workmen's" sweaters and bathing suits. His enterprise flourished and expanded, adding Malden Spinning and Dyeing in 1923 to produce uniforms for the U.S. Army throughout World Wars I and II. By the end of the World War II, Feuerstein's son Samuel had taken the reins of the company, and Malden Knitting had begun exploring new kinds of textiles to increase production.

In the mid-1950s the company moved to Lawrence, Massachusetts, and within a decade had opened several branch mills. Samuel was succeeded by his son, Aaron, who took Malden Mills into the future with automation and increased research into synthetic fabrics. Though going into fake fur proved a near-fatal blunder and the company was forced into Chapter 11 in 1981, Aaron Feuerstein and Malden Mills soon revolutionized the textile industry with a new product called Polarfleece. Originally created in 1979, Polarfleece was 100-percent polyester, capable of drawing moisture away from the body while providing warmth, and became the fabric of choice for high-performance athletic and aerobic apparel. Among Malden's first major customers was outerwear producer Patagonia, which ordered a myriad of garments made from the unusual shearling knit. Soon outfitters from across the country were bombarding Malden with orders.

With its Chapter 11 woes behind it and an incredible surge of business due to Polarfleece, Malden created several new lines of high-performance, technically advanced fabrics to service the outdoor crowd. Customized colors, thicknesses, and textures were made for clients, though imitators were many. By the end of the 1980s Malden Mills had expanded into Europe; by the end of the following decade Polarfleece, marketed and trademarked Polartec, was available in over 1,000 patterns, 5,000 colors, and 100 products—from underwear, bike shorts, and sweatshirts to jackets, wet suits, and gloves. Polartec was the industry leader; its Polarfleece was fast wicking, easily dyed, durable, partially made from recycled materials, and had one of the only nonpilling finishes. Clients like Eddie Bauer, Land's End, L.L. Bean, Ralph Lauren, and many others often based their entire outdoor or athletic collections on Polartec fabrics.

Malden began producing natural jacquard velvets in 1992, which were used in clothing as well as a number of upholstery applications, including furniture and car and infant seats. Sold the world over, the upholstery business rivaled the Polarfleece operations, but the latter initiated the Polartec Performance Challenge, sponsoring outdoor adventures like the Trango Towers Expedition in Southern Pakistan and a 4,000-mile trek in China. Malden also supported the 1992 Winter Olympics by providing Polartec fabric for the official garments worn by U.S. athletes.

Everything changed in 1995; the U.S. Consumer Products Safety Commission televised reports of fleece fabrics catching fire in March, and though the products were not Polartec, consumers across the nation began returning Polartec products. Malden fired a salvo of its own, launching a massive ($8.5 million) advertising campaign outlining the company's standards and its government inflammability tests (passed with flying colors). Not long after the company solidified plans for the textile manufacturing plant in Germany (as a companion to an existing Rotterdam facility), tragedy struck in December 1995.

refined tweed suits with subtle dressmaker touches such as curved bands or fabric appliqués, worn with coordinating bare-armed blouses. A Mainbocher standby was the little black "nothing" sheath dress.

By the 1950s and 1960s, old guard Mainbocher customers enjoyed wearing impeccably made classic coats and suits of wool, often fur-lined, in the midst of nouveau-riche ostentation. The typical ladylike daytime Mainbocher look was accessorized by a plain velvet bow in the hair instead of a hat, a choker of several strands of real pearls, white gloves, and plain pumps with matching handbag. The integrity of luxurious fabrics, intricate cut, quality workmanship and materials, elegance and classicism, were cherished and worn for years by Mainbocher's upper crust customers.

—Therese Duzinkiewicz Baker

MALDEN MILLS INDUSTRIES, INC.

American textile manufacturer

Founded: in Malden, Massachusetts, by Henry Feuerstein as Malden Knitting, 1906. Company History: Malden Knitting expanded to include Malden Spinning and Dyeing, 1923; provided U.S. Army uniforms during World War I and II; company moved to Lawrence, Massachusetts, 1950s; developed synthetic fabric (later named Polarfleece), 1979; betted heavy on fake fur and lost, 1981; Polarfleece products selling under Polartec label flourish, 1980s; clothed the U.S. Winter Olympics team, 1992; fire wiped out major operations, 1995; opened rebuilt state-of-the-art mill facility, 1996; closed upholstery division and satellite mill, 1998; settled suit against company, 2000; forced to declare bankruptcy, 2001. Awards: citation from President Clinton, 1996; Workforce Magazine Optimas award for Managing Change, 1997. Company Address: 46 Stafford Street, Lawrence, MA 01841.

PUBLICATIONS

On MALDEN MILLS:

Articles

- "Performance Fleece Fabrics Force New Insulating Frontiers," in Sporting Goods Business, September 1991.
- Rotenier, Nancy, "The Golden Fleece," in Forbes, 24 May 1993.
- Diesenhouse, Susan, "A Textile Maker Thrives by Breaking All the Rules," in the New York Times, 24 July 1994.
- Lee, Melissa, "Malden Looks Spiffy in New England Textile Gloom," in the Wall Street Journal, 10 November 1995.
- Herszenhorn, David M., "A Plume of Hope Rises from Factory Ashes..." in the New York Times, 16 December 1995.
- Witkowski, Tim, "The Glow From a Fire," in Time, 8 January 1996.
- Jerome, Richard, and Stephen Sawicki, "Holding the Line," in People, 5 February 1996.
- Teal, Thomas, "Not a Fool; Not a Saint," in Fortune, 11 November 1996.
- Owens, Mitchell, "A Mill Community Comes Back to Life," in the New York Times, 26 December 1996.
- Goldberg, Carey, "A Promise is Kept," in the New York Times, 16 September 1997.

Luscombe, Belinda, "Good Old Factory Values," in Time, 29 September 1997.

"Malden Mills Workers Sue Employer," in Claims, February 2000.

* * *

Henry Feuerstein, a Hungarian immigrant, bought a small mill in Malden, Massachusetts, in 1906. At Malden Knitting, Feuerstein set about making wool "workmen's" sweaters and bathing suits. His enterprise flourished and expanded, adding Malden Spinning and Dyeing in 1923 to produce uniforms for the U.S. Army throughout World Wars I and II. By the end of the World War II, Feuerstein's son Samuel had taken the reins of the company, and Malden Knitting had begun exploring new kinds of textiles to increase production.

In the mid-1950s the company moved to Lawrence, Massachusetts, and within a decade had opened several branch mills. Samuel was succeeded by his son, Aaron, who took Malden Mills into the future with automation and increased research into synthetic fabrics. Though going into fake fur proved a near-fatal blunder and the company was forced into Chapter 11 in 1981, Aaron Feuerstein and Malden Mills soon revolutionized the textile industry with a new product called Polarfleece. Originally created in 1979, Polarfleece was 100-percent polyester, capable of drawing moisture away from the body while providing warmth, and became the fabric of choice for high-performance athletic and aerobic apparel. Among Malden's first major customers was outerwear producer Patagonia, which ordered a myriad of garments made from the unusual shearling knit. Soon outfitters from across the country were bombarding Malden with orders.

With its Chapter 11 woes behind it and an incredible surge of business due to Polarfleece, Malden created several new lines of high-performance, technically advanced fabrics to service the outdoor crowd. Customized colors, thicknesses, and textures were made for clients, though imitators were many. By the end of the 1980s Malden Mills had expanded into Europe; by the end of the following decade Polarfleece, marketed and trademarked Polartec, was available in over 1,000 patterns, 5,000 colors, and 100 products—from underwear, bike shorts, and sweatshirts to jackets, wet suits, and gloves. Polartec was the industry leader; its Polarfleece was fast wicking, easily dyed, durable, partially made from recycled materials, and had one of the only nonpilling finishes. Clients like Eddie Bauer, Land's End, L.L. Bean, Ralph Lauren, and many others often based their entire outdoor or athletic collections on Polartec fabrics.

Malden began producing natural jacquard velvets in 1992, which were used in clothing as well as a number of upholstery applications, including furniture and car and infant seats. Sold the world over, the upholstery business rivaled the Polarfleece operations, but the latter initiated the Polartec Performance Challenge, sponsoring outdoor adventures like the Trango Towers Expedition in Southern Pakistan and a 4,000-mile trek in China. Malden also supported the 1992 Winter Olympics by providing Polartec fabric for the official garments worn by U.S. athletes.

Everything changed in 1995; the U.S. Consumer Products Safety Commission televised reports of fleece fabrics catching fire in March, and though the products were not Polartec, consumers across the nation began returning Polartec products. Malden fired a salvo of its own, launching a massive ($8.5 million) advertising campaign outlining the company's standards and its government inflammability tests (passed with flying colors). Not long after the company solidified plans for the textile manufacturing plant in Germany (as a companion to an existing Rotterdam facility), tragedy struck in December 1995.

Aaron Feuerstein was celebrating his 70th birthday in a Boston restaurant when there was a tremendous explosion at Malden Mills. Fire swept through three of the company's nine buildings, injuring 33 employees and causing some $500 million in damage. Feuerstein had rushed to the scene and immediately vowed to rebuild; within a few days he had set 2 January 1996 as the company's reopening date. Feuerstein stated he not only would pay all employees their regular salaries for the next month or more, while continuing health benefits for the next three months during rebuilding, but would give all employees a small Christmas bonus.

Some called Feuerstein a saint; others a fool for not taking the insurance money and running. But most were so impressed, including Malden clients and neighboring businesses, that they too chipped in to rebuild and support the community's workers. All in all, it was a risky endeavor, but within three weeks the factory was reopened and half of Malden's workforce was in place. The new Malden Mills complex reopened in September 1996 and all was well for about a year. Then came the closure of its upholstery division in 1998, which had lost its footing after being completely destroyed. With a mild winter and an overseas recession that rocked the usually stalwart Polartec sales, Feuerstein was forced to close a satellite mill in Bridgeton and lay off hundreds of workers (who were, true to the Malden spirit, given generous severance packages).

The story of Malden Mills continued to be an eventful one; in January 2000, employees who had been injured in the 1995 fire bit the hand that had fed and clothed them—suing Feuerstein and the company for negligence. The employees had just days earlier settled an $18 million lawsuit against several Malden suppliers who they blamed for the fire. Malden itself had been cleared in a 22-month investigation by the Massachusetts Fire Marshal and in a similar investigation by the Industrial Accidents Board. Feuerstein and the disgruntled employees settled the lawsuit in December 2000; terms were not disclosed. Though Feuerstein valiantly tried to prevent it, Malden Mills was forced to declare bankruptcy in late 2001. Given the firm's history of rising from its ashes, hopefully this is another temporary lull from which Feuerstein and his employees would emerge anew.

Malden Mills will forever be remembered for two things: the generosity of Aaron Feuerstein and his unswerving belief in his company and its products. Polartec fleece products, which are now made from 100-percent recycled materials, revolutionized the textile industry and remain the fabric of choice among discriminating clothiers.

—Owen James

MALTEZOS, Mad

See MAD CARPENTIER

MANDELLI, Mariuccia

Italian fashion designer

Born: Bergamo, Italy, 1933. Family: Married to Aldo Pinto. Career: Elementary school teacher, Milan, 1952–54, designer/founder, with Flora Dolci, of Krizia fashion firm, Milan, from 1954; showed first collection, Krizia, 1957; first major fashion show, 1964; founded Kriziamaglia knitwear, 1966, and Kriziababy children's clothes, 1968; subsequently established Krizia boutiques in Milan, Tokyo, London, New York, Detroit, Houston; owner, the K Club, West

Mariuccia Mandelli, designed for Krizia's fall/winter 2001–02 Top luxury line collection. © AP/Wide World Photos.

Indies, from 1996; launched home collection, 1997; signed with Grace Silver to open three Krizia stores in China, 1998; several new licensing agreements, including Krizia World, Krizia Eyewear, Segreti di Krizia, and Krizia Kids, 1999; introduced new fragrance, Easy Krizia, 1999; Alber Elbaz hired as design consultant, then replaced by Jean-Paul Knott, 2000; new boutique opened in Moscow, 2000.

Exhibitions: Italian Revolution, La Jolla Museum of Art, California, 1982; 40 Years of Italian Fashion, Trump Towers, New York, 1983; traveling retrospective, Grey Art Gallery, New York, 1999. Awards: Fashion Press award, Florence, 1964; made a Knight of the Italian Republic, Rome, 1986; named "Ideal Woman Leader of the Year," St. Vincent, Italy, 1987. Address: Krizia SpA, Via Manin 19, 20121 Milan, Italy. Website: www.krizia.net.

PUBLICATIONS

On MANDELLI:

Books

Lambert, Eleanor, The World of Fashion: People, Places, Resources, New York & London, 1976.

Aaron Feuerstein was celebrating his 70th birthday in a Boston restaurant when there was a tremendous explosion at Malden Mills. Fire swept through three of the company's nine buildings, injuring 33 employees and causing some $500 million in damage. Feuerstein had rushed to the scene and immediately vowed to rebuild; within a few days he had set 2 January 1996 as the company's reopening date. Feuerstein stated he not only would pay all employees their regular salaries for the next month or more, while continuing health benefits for the next three months during rebuilding, but would give all employees a small Christmas bonus.

Some called Feuerstein a saint; others a fool for not taking the insurance money and running. But most were so impressed, including Malden clients and neighboring businesses, that they too chipped in to rebuild and support the community's workers. All in all, it was a risky endeavor, but within three weeks the factory was reopened and half of Malden's workforce was in place. The new Malden Mills complex reopened in September 1996 and all was well for about a year. Then came the closure of its upholstery division in 1998, which had lost its footing after being completely destroyed. With a mild winter and an overseas recession that rocked the usually stalwart Polartec sales, Feuerstein was forced to close a satellite mill in Bridgeton and lay off hundreds of workers (who were, true to the Malden spirit, given generous severance packages).

The story of Malden Mills continued to be an eventful one; in January 2000, employees who had been injured in the 1995 fire bit the hand that had fed and clothed them—suing Feuerstein and the company for negligence. The employees had just days earlier settled an $18 million lawsuit against several Malden suppliers who they blamed for the fire. Malden itself had been cleared in a 22-month investigation by the Massachusetts Fire Marshal and in a similar investigation by the Industrial Accidents Board. Feuerstein and the disgruntled employees settled the lawsuit in December 2000; terms were not disclosed. Though Feuerstein valiantly tried to prevent it, Malden Mills was forced to declare bankruptcy in late 2001. Given the firm's history of rising from its ashes, hopefully this is another temporary lull from which Feuerstein and his employees would emerge anew.

Malden Mills will forever be remembered for two things: the generosity of Aaron Feuerstein and his unswerving belief in his company and its products. Polartec fleece products, which are now made from 100-percent recycled materials, revolutionized the textile industry and remain the fabric of choice among discriminating clothiers.

—Owen James

MALTEZOS, Mad

See MAD CARPENTIER

MANDELLI, Mariuccia

Italian fashion designer

Born: Bergamo, Italy, 1933. Family: Married to Aldo Pinto. Career: Elementary school teacher, Milan, 1952–54, designer/founder, with Flora Dolci, of Krizia fashion firm, Milan, from 1954; showed first collection, Krizia, 1957; first major fashion show, 1964; founded Kriziamaglia knitwear, 1966, and Kriziababy children's clothes, 1968; subsequently established Krizia boutiques in Milan, Tokyo, London, New York, Detroit, Houston; owner, the K Club, West

Mariuccia Mandelli, designed for Krizia's fall/winter 2001–02 Top luxury line collection. © AP/Wide World Photos.

Indies, from 1996; launched home collection, 1997; signed with Grace Silver to open three Krizia stores in China, 1998; several new licensing agreements, including Krizia World, Krizia Eyewear, Segreti di Krizia, and Krizia Kids, 1999; introduced new fragrance, Easy Krizia, 1999; Alber Elbaz hired as design consultant, then replaced by Jean-Paul Knott, 2000; new boutique opened in Moscow, 2000.

Exhibitions: Italian Revolution, La Jolla Museum of Art, California, 1982; 40 Years of Italian Fashion, Trump Towers, New York, 1983; traveling retrospective, Grey Art Gallery, New York, 1999. Awards: Fashion Press award, Florence, 1964; made a Knight of the Italian Republic, Rome, 1986; named "Ideal Woman Leader of the Year," St. Vincent, Italy, 1987. Address: Krizia SpA, Via Manin 19, 20121 Milan, Italy. Website: www.krizia.net.

PUBLICATIONS

On MANDELLI:

Books

Lambert, Eleanor, The World of Fashion: People, Places, Resources, New York & London, 1976.

Mariuccia Mandelli, designed for Krizia's fall/winter 2001 collection. © AP/Wide World Photos.

- Mulassano, Adrianna, I Mass-Moda: Fatti e Personaggi dell'Italian Look, Florence, 1979.
- Aragno, B.G., compiler, 40 Years of Italian Fashion [exhibition catalogue], Rome, 1983.
- Kennett, Frances, The Collector's Book of Twentieth Century Fashion, London & New York, 1983.
- McDowell, Colin, McDowell's Directory of Twentieth Century Fashion, London, 1984.
- O'Hara, Georgia, Encyclopedia of Fashion from 1840 to the 1980s, London, 1986.
- Sparke, Penny, et al., The Design Source Book, London, 1986.
- Vercelloni, Isa, Krizia: A Story, Milan, 1995.
- Stegemeyer, Ann, Who's Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.

Articles

- "Nostalgia and Romance in Italy," in the New York Times, 11 March 1992.
- "Sleek as a Leopard, Bold as a Zebra: When Animal Prints are Your Second Skin," in Harper's Bazaar, September 1992.

- Lindbergh, Peter, "Don't Be Fooled by the Small Prints," in Harper's Bazaar, March 1993.
- Morris, Bernadine, "Soft, Sexy Fashion in Milan," in the New York Times, 10 March 1993.
- Gellers, Stan, "Expanding on Krizia's Platonic Ideal," in Daily News Record, 13 December 1993.
- Forden, Sara Gay, "Krizia's Mandelli Details Story of Forced Pay-off," in DNR, 22 September 1994.
- Salfino, Catherine, and Sara Gay Forden, "Designing Women," in DNR, 18 January 1995.
- Ashby, Don, "Dressing Long and Lean," in the New York Times Magazine, 26 February 1995.
- Menkes, Suzy, "Berets are Off to Krizia," in the International Herald Tribune, 7 March 1995.
- Alhadoff, Gini, "La Beauté Platonicienne de Krizia," in Vogue (Paris), April 1995.
- Forden, Sara Gay, "Some Top Italian Designers Facing Criminal Indictments Over Bribes," in DNR, 8 June 1995.
- _____, "Milanese Designers to Present United Defense in Bribe Case," in DNR, 11 September 1995.
- "Krizia's Spring Collection Hits All the Right Buttons," in Elle, March 1996.
- Brown, Alix, and Jennifer Jackson, "Special K(rizia)," in Harper's Bazaar, May 1996.
- Forden, Sara Gay, "Designer Bribe Trial Gets Started in Milan," in WWD, 8 July 1996.
- Conti, Samantha, "Ferré, Santo Versace and Mandelli Sentenced to 14 Months; Under Italian Law, Prison Terms Will be Suspended," in DNR, 5 May 1997.
- _____, "Verdict Against Milan Designers Overturned," in WWD, 26 January 1998.
- "Krizia," in WWD, 24 February 1998.
- Ilari, Alessandra, "Krizia's 45-Year Variety Show," in WWD, 14 April 1999.
- Socha, Miles, "Krizia Eyes U.S. Comeback," in WWD, 2 February 2000.
- "Krizia Bows in Moscow," in WWD, 22 November 2000.
- Colavita, Courtney, "Elbaz Leaves Krizia After Three Months," in WWD, 30 November 2000.
- "Sexpots and Prairie Babes...Mariuccia Mandelli's Krizia and Jean-Paul Knott's Krizia Top Collections," in WWD, 1 October 2001.

* * *

The success of the Milanese firm Krizia and, in fact, the prominence of Milanese fashion that occurred during the 1980s and 1990s are both largely due to the efforts of Krizia's founder and designer, Mariuccia Mandelli. Originally an elementary school teacher, Mandelli cofounded the company in 1957 with Flora Dolci and took its name from Plato's dialogue on female vanity. Mandelli was an originator of the major contrast trend in which simple, classic tailoring was punctuated with original and amusing accents to create a new face for stylish ready-to-wear that was both eminently wearable and exuberantly youthful.

Among Krizia's early, important presentations was a showing at Orsini's on the invitation of Jean Rosenberg, vice president of Bendel's. It was on this occasion that Mandelli was labeled Crazy Krizia by the fashion press for her combinations of simple shapes with madcap details. In 1976 Bergdorf Goodman featured stock by Krizia and other Milan designers, providing the final step necessary for the Italians' rise to the forefront of the fashion industry.

Representative of what has been called Krizia's "rough and sweet" look are Mandelli's 1977 outfitting consisting of nylon undershirts topped by matching rose-colored, dove-gray mohair bed jackets, or cardigans in open-knit weaves worn with dropped-waist ballerina skirts of scalloped lace. Mandelli's daywear tends toward the practical. She has, for example, put elastic waistbands on her skirts for comfortable ease of movement, and her 1982 group of sports suits of loose tweeds and checks were plain, loose, and stylized. Mandelli's use of her signature "improbable contrasts," however, abound most openly in her evening clothes, such as the mixes of satin skirts with sporty Angora sweaters. She has also presented simple slip dresses accompanied by characteristic touches of humorous flamboyance such as a long, feathered stoles or quilted jackets of satin faced in a different shade of the same color.

Mandelli has often used jodhpur pants. One 1977 outfit consisted of loose, draping jodhpurs in silk charmeuse worn with a lacy mohair camisole, the whole enlivened by the glowing berry colors she featured that year. Also among Mandelli's original fashion accomplishments is her development of what she named "harmonica pleats," which combine vertical and horizontal pleatings. Outstanding among Mandelli's designs are her knits, which include items such as her 1977 lacy, mushroom-colored evening sweater teamed with silk and eyelet taffeta and jodhpur pants. In 1981, she showed subtly sophisticated shiny knits and white Angoras bedecked with yokes of pearls.

Often appearing on Mandelli's knitwear have been her signature animal motifs, such as a jacquard crêpe blouse with the front view of a tiger on its front and rear tiger-view on its back. Not limiting herself to knitwear, Mandelli has also put highly colorful birds and parrots on that season's summer tote bags and shoulder purses. For 1984 it was the Dalmatian, sharing the scene with more streamlined suits and double-dresses such as a back-buttoned flare over a bit longer slim skirt.

In the mid-1990s, the Italian fashion world was rocked by the exposure of a bribery scandal that supposedly occurred in 1990. Top officials from Italian design houses, including Giorgio Armani, Santo Versace, Gianfranco Ferré, Mandelli, and Giralomo Etro were investigated for bribing tax officials, but the designers argued the money was nothing more than extortion by those same officials. The nasty court battle ended in 1997 when Mandelli, Versace, and Ferré were convicted and sentenced; luckily for the defendants, the sentences were suspended and in 1998 the convictions overturned.

During the infamous court proceedings, Mandelli continued to do what she did best—showing in 1996 a collection based on traditional Chinese shapes, Indian saris, Mongolian leather, and Japanese design. "It's all about very pure, simple straight lines," Mandelli said in a CNN interview. Around the same time, Mandelli fell in love with the Caribbean island of Barbuda. There she built the K Club, described by TravelWizard.com as "a personalized retreat of square, white bungalows with louvered windows and characteristic spired roofs." The cottages were designed by architect Gianni Gamondi, and the interiors reflected "Krizia's design taste right down to the doorknobs. Wooden cathedral ceilings, 14 feet high, and white ceramic tile floors add to the sense of spaciousness in the rooms."

In the fashion world, many men design clothing for women; the reverse, women designing clothing for men, is not so prominent. Mandelli is among the few women who are well known for their men's clothing lines. The small sorority of designers includes Jhane Barnes, Laura Biagiotti, Katharine Hamnett, Donna Karan, Rei

Kawakubo, and Nicole Miller. Mandelli repeatedly delivers though, as the Daily News Record (15 January 1997) enthused over a Milan menswear showing, "This collection showed what buyers really come to Milan for—sharp, comfortable clothes that make any man look good."

In the last years of the century, Mandelli sought design help from several sources. The most high profile was Alber Elbaz, formerly of Yves Saint Laurent, who was hired as a consultant in 2000. The collaboration, however, lasted only three months; Elbaz left, citing his wish to return to Paris and denying any friction with Mandelli. Elbaz was soon replaced by Jean-Paul Knott, who had also worked at Yves Saint Laurent before launching his own label. For nearly five decades, Krizia has remained an integral part of the Italian fashion scene, and one of the few independent design houses left. Mariuccia Mandelli and her Krizia empire, with close to 60 worldwide boutiques and more than three-dozen licensing agreements, combines highly original designs with nervy eccentricity and wit.

—Barbara Cavaliere; updated by Owen James and Daryl F. Mallett

MANN, Judy

Chinese designer

Born: Mann Lai-Yin in Hong Kong, China, 13 August 1946. Education: Good Hope School, Hong Kong, 1962–65. Family: Married David Hsu Kin, 1974. Career: Model; Fashion coordinator and merchandiser, 1972, junior stylist, 1973, chief designer for Roncelli and R-2 labels, 1974–77; formed own company, Cheetah Management, June 1977, with Judy Mann, J.M. Diffusion, and Cheetah labels; showed first collection in London and Paris, 1979; opened first boutique, Taipei, 1984; cofounder, 1984, chair, 1984–85, 1989–95, Hong Kong Fashion Designers Association; marketing, advertising and promotion consultant, Continental Jewellery Ltd., Hong Kong, 1989–91; chief editor, Videofashion (Chinese version), Hong Kong, 1990–91; fashion consultant, Romano Group, Hong Kong, 1991–92; formed Beijing Charisma Fashion Co. Ltd., a joint venture company with the Chinese government, with outlets in Beijing & Shanghai, a production factory in Canton, 1993; formed the Consultant Group, 1998; signature fragrance, Judy Mann. Exhibitions: Hong Kong Design Gallery (permanent collection). Awards: Ten Best Dressed Personalities award, 1977. Address: Cheetah Management Co. Ltd., 5/F East Wing, 14–24 Wellington Street Central, Hong Kong, China; Website: www.judymann.com.

PUBLICATIONS

On MANN:

Articles

Russell, Tara, "Judy Mann Builds on Her Reputation," in Style, July 1987.

Cheung, Raymond, "Sketches of Designers: Judy Mann," in New Wave, June 1988.

"Hong Kong Designers: Perseverance Is Paying Off," in WWD (Asia), 22 July 1988.

Gopinath, Sharmila, "Vanity under the Rose, Vanity on the Go," in Lifestyle Asia, September 1988.

and other Milan designers, providing the final step necessary for the Italians' rise to the forefront of the fashion industry.

Representative of what has been called Krizia's "rough and sweet" look are Mandelli's 1977 outfitting consisting of nylon undershirts topped by matching rose-colored, dove-gray mohair bed jackets, or cardigans in open-knit weaves worn with dropped-waist ballerina skirts of scalloped lace. Mandelli's daywear tends toward the practical. She has, for example, put elastic waistbands on her skirts for comfortable ease of movement, and her 1982 group of sports suits of loose tweeds and checks were plain, loose, and stylized. Mandelli's use of her signature "improbable contrasts," however, abound most openly in her evening clothes, such as the mixes of satin skirts with sporty Angora sweaters. She has also presented simple slip dresses accompanied by characteristic touches of humorous flamboyance such as a long, feathered stoles or quilted jackets of satin faced in a different shade of the same color.

Mandelli has often used jodhpur pants. One 1977 outfit consisted of loose, draping jodhpurs in silk charmeuse worn with a lacy mohair camisole, the whole enlivened by the glowing berry colors she featured that year. Also among Mandelli's original fashion accomplishments is her development of what she named "harmonica pleats," which combine vertical and horizontal pleatings. Outstanding among Mandelli's designs are her knits, which include items such as her 1977 lacy, mushroom-colored evening sweater teamed with silk and eyelet taffeta and jodhpur pants. In 1981, she showed subtly sophisticated shiny knits and white Angoras bedecked with yokes of pearls.

Often appearing on Mandelli's knitwear have been her signature animal motifs, such as a jacquard crêpe blouse with the front view of a tiger on its front and rear tiger-view on its back. Not limiting herself to knitwear, Mandelli has also put highly colorful birds and parrots on that season's summer tote bags and shoulder purses. For 1984 it was the Dalmatian, sharing the scene with more streamlined suits and double-dresses such as a back-buttoned flare over a bit longer slim skirt.

In the mid-1990s, the Italian fashion world was rocked by the exposure of a bribery scandal that supposedly occurred in 1990. Top officials from Italian design houses, including Giorgio Armani, Santo Versace, Gianfranco Ferré, Mandelli, and Giralomo Etro were investigated for bribing tax officials, but the designers argued the money was nothing more than extortion by those same officials. The nasty court battle ended in 1997 when Mandelli, Versace, and Ferré were convicted and sentenced; luckily for the defendants, the sentences were suspended and in 1998 the convictions overturned.

During the infamous court proceedings, Mandelli continued to do what she did best—showing in 1996 a collection based on traditional Chinese shapes, Indian saris, Mongolian leather, and Japanese design. "It's all about very pure, simple straight lines," Mandelli said in a CNN interview. Around the same time, Mandelli fell in love with the Caribbean island of Barbuda. There she built the K Club, described by TravelWizard.com as "a personalized retreat of square, white bungalows with louvered windows and characteristic spired roofs." The cottages were designed by architect Gianni Gamondi, and the interiors reflected "Krizia's design taste right down to the doorknobs. Wooden cathedral ceilings, 14 feet high, and white ceramic tile floors add to the sense of spaciousness in the rooms."

In the fashion world, many men design clothing for women; the reverse, women designing clothing for men, is not so prominent. Mandelli is among the few women who are well known for their men's clothing lines. The small sorority of designers includes Jhane Barnes, Laura Biagiotti, Katharine Hamnett, Donna Karan, Rei

Kawakubo, and Nicole Miller. Mandelli repeatedly delivers though, as the Daily News Record (15 January 1997) enthused over a Milan menswear showing, "This collection showed what buyers really come to Milan for—sharp, comfortable clothes that make any man look good."

In the last years of the century, Mandelli sought design help from several sources. The most high profile was Alber Elbaz, formerly of Yves Saint Laurent, who was hired as a consultant in 2000. The collaboration, however, lasted only three months; Elbaz left, citing his wish to return to Paris and denying any friction with Mandelli. Elbaz was soon replaced by Jean-Paul Knott, who had also worked at Yves Saint Laurent before launching his own label. For nearly five decades, Krizia has remained an integral part of the Italian fashion scene, and one of the few independent design houses left. Mariuccia Mandelli and her Krizia empire, with close to 60 worldwide boutiques and more than three-dozen licensing agreements, combines highly original designs with nervy eccentricity and wit.

—Barbara Cavaliere; updated by Owen James and Daryl F. Mallett

MANN, Judy

Chinese designer

Born: Mann Lai-Yin in Hong Kong, China, 13 August 1946. Education: Good Hope School, Hong Kong, 1962–65. Family: Married David Hsu Kin, 1974. Career: Model; Fashion coordinator and merchandiser, 1972, junior stylist, 1973, chief designer for Roncelli and R-2 labels, 1974–77; formed own company, Cheetah Management, June 1977, with Judy Mann, J.M. Diffusion, and Cheetah labels; showed first collection in London and Paris, 1979; opened first boutique, Taipei, 1984; cofounder, 1984, chair, 1984–85, 1989–95, Hong Kong Fashion Designers Association; marketing, advertising and promotion consultant, Continental Jewellery Ltd., Hong Kong, 1989–91; chief editor, Videofashion (Chinese version), Hong Kong, 1990–91; fashion consultant, Romano Group, Hong Kong, 1991–92; formed Beijing Charisma Fashion Co. Ltd., a joint venture company with the Chinese government, with outlets in Beijing & Shanghai, a production factory in Canton, 1993; formed the Consultant Group, 1998; signature fragrance, Judy Mann. Exhibitions: Hong Kong Design Gallery (permanent collection). Awards: Ten Best Dressed Personalities award, 1977. Address: Cheetah Management Co. Ltd., 5/F East Wing, 14–24 Wellington Street Central, Hong Kong, China; Website: www.judymann.com.

PUBLICATIONS

On MANN:

Articles

Russell, Tara, "Judy Mann Builds on Her Reputation," in Style, July 1987.

Cheung, Raymond, "Sketches of Designers: Judy Mann," in New Wave, June 1988.

"Hong Kong Designers: Perseverance Is Paying Off," in WWD (Asia), 22 July 1988.

Gopinath, Sharmila, "Vanity under the Rose, Vanity on the Go," in Lifestyle Asia, September 1988.

- "Winter Fashion: Back to Classics," in the Bulletin (Hong Kong), September 1989.
- Chen, Kent, "Cultural Obstacles Block Local Talent," in the South China Morning Post, 22 April 1990.
- Bartlett, Frances, "Settings for Love: Judy Mann," in Beautiful Home, October 1990.
- Allemann, Angela, "Hong Kong: Frauen Ganz Oben. Fünf mal Erfolg," in Annabelle, 13 November 1990.
- Bourke, Marion, "Designs on Hong Kong," in Eve Magazine (Hong Kong), January 1991.
- Chu, Kennis, "Top Designer Prepares for Fashion Week," in the Sunday Morning Post (Hong Kong), 13 January 1991.
- Stravinsky, Sonya, "Judy Mann: Designing," in Boutique, Summer 1991.
- McDonald, Claire, "Image is Everything," available online at TimesNet Asia, www.web3.asia1.com.sg, 1999.
- Crampton, Thomas, "Master Mimics of Hong Kong," in the International Herald Tribune, 16 March 2001.

*

I design for young executive women who are alert to fashion trends, but by no means a slave to them; who know what suits them and want to look presentable and efficient, yet stylish and sophisticated. My objective is to offer quality clothes at affordable prices.

My designs have to reach most women, not just a limited number.... My collection very much reflects my own lifestyle, a working woman of the modern days. I like very simple silhouettes with perfect cut, quality fabric, and good color coordination. I prefer separates and coordinates to dresses, as they give customers more flexibility; colors you don't easily get tired of, which will last more than one season, and still look elegant and stylish; clothes that you can always change the look of by adding different accessories.

I don't believe that only intricately designed clothes can make a woman look outstanding. A well-coordinated, simple outfit can achieve the same effect, or better.... As a designer, it is important to know your clientèle, to know how to put a collection together—concept, sampling, fabrication, coloring—and make sure it can be put into production. We are not from the tailoring era. We are the age of mass- or semimass production. My design inspiration comes mainly from the lifestyle of modern women, things happening around me, and the culture of my own race and that of others.

—Judy Mann

* * *

Judy Mann is an influential figure in Hong Kong fashion. As a designer, fashion merchandiser, and coordinator, cofounder and two-time former chair of the Hong Kong Fashion Designers Association, she knows her business very well. After graduating from the Good Hope School in Hong Kong in 1965, Mann became a model, a job that helped her learn the importance of market awareness and of being aware of her clientèle. As Mann herself says, "Most women are not built like catwalk models, so I believe in workable styles, easy to make and easy to wear." She quickly moved behind the scenes, taking a job as a fashion coordinator and merchandiser at Thayer International New York in 1972, and worked her way up the chain to junior stylist (1973), and then becoming the chief designer for the Roncelli and R-2 labels of that company from 1974 to 1977. Along the way, however, she did find time to get married, to David Hsu Kin, in 1974. Three years later, Mann formed her own company, Cheetah Management Co. Ltd., beginning with the Judy Mann, J.M. Diffusion, and Cheetah labels. She showed her first collection, mostly made of silk, in London and Paris in 1979. Mann worked hard over the next five years, designing her own lines and eventually opening her own boutique in Taipei, Taiwan, in 1984.

Mann has also worked hard to help promote Hong Kong as a creative fashion center. In 1984 she was a founding member of the Hong Kong Fashion Designers Association, which she has chaired twice. The group has done enormous work over the last 15 years to dispel the image of Hong Kong as a production base by encouraging and promoting local fashion designers. Annual fashion shows, its "Young Talent award," Hong Kong Fashion Week, and regular contact between members have helped strengthen the designer's position in the industry. "Being a designer in Hong Kong is not easy—you have to struggle and struggle," for although there is a regular demand for new items, it is a small clientèle and they are quite difficult to please. Mann's position as a role model and a champion for more support of the local industry has paid off in spades with greater encouragement by the local media and increased financial backing than in years past. The worldwide exposure gained by local talent on the Internet has also helped immensely. Now, designers like Bonita Chung, Lulu Cheung, Arthur Lam, Walter Ma, Vivienne Tam, William Tang, and Danny Yu dominate the local scene and enjoy some international success as well. Hong Kong fashion has come a long way in a short time and is poised to achieve much more in the new century.

Designing fashion garments has not been the only focus of Mann's career. She was the first Hong Kong designer to have her own perfume, Judy Mann, produced for her in Switzerland. She spent two years working with Continental Jewelry Ltd. as a part-time consultant responsible for marketing, advertising, and promotion. She had a brief stint as the chief editor of the Chinese edition of VideoFashion. She started her own fashion consultancy with the Romano Group, which owned over a dozen retail outlets in Hong Kong specializing in European menwear and womenswear. At the same time, she licensed her label to a local garment manufacturer, who produced three collections a year, founded a joint venture with the Chinese government called Beijing Charisma Fashion Co. Ltd., and opened outlets in Beijing and Shanghai and a production factory in Canton.

Although a businesswoman as well as a designer, Mann does know her customers very well. They are young professional women who want to appear efficient yet stylish. She specializes in coordinated daywear, separates, and informal eveningwear. It is a young, sophisticated look, which she calls "casual chic." The image reflects her own way of dressing. Simple silhouettes, quality fabrics, and colors that can mix and match are her trademark. Although her collections reflect seasonal trends and colors, half are classics, in neutral easy-to-match colors that are guaranteed to sell. And yet, because Mann is a professional woman herself, sales are her motivation. "Every sketch I make has to be thought out, rethought, and then designed with a view to selling."

Mann works for export, chiefly to Europe, where she is fast gaining a reputation. Japan, Australia, and the Middle East are other major foreign markets where her garments can be found in specialty boutiques and stores. She designs a little for the U.S., but only in silk, a fabric not subject to quota restrictions. For the same reason, her first European collection under her own label, Cheetah, was also in silk. Nowadays she likes working in jersey, Swiss cotton, and Italian linens and wools, fabrics that are comfortable and travel well. Designing for export poses creative challenges; colors have to be chosen carefully to complement different skin tones. A neutral palette provides the basis for each season. In winter, black dominates, and in summer, white is heightened by brighter shades. The designs of Judy Mann continue to represent and champion the Hong Kong fashion scene.

—Hazel Clark; updated by Daryl F. Mallett

MANSON, Glen

See FENN WRIGHT MANSON

MARA, Max

See MAX MARA SpA

MARAMOTTI, Achille

See MAX MARA SpA

MARC, Andrew

American designer

Family: Married Suzanne Schwartz. Career: Launched the Andrew Marc line, 1981; developed leather and fur bomber jacket designs, 1981; founded Precision International for watch manufacture and distribution, 1986. Address: 390 Fifth Avenue, Suite 606, New York, NY 10018, USA.

PUBLICATIONS

On MARC:

Articles

- “Marc’s New Man,” in WWD, 1 September 1998.
- “Andrew Marc Said Near Pact for Levi’s Dockers Outwear,” in Daily News Record, 23 September 1998.
- Gilbert, Daniela, “The Newest Faces,” in WWD, 3 January 2001.

* * *

Fine leather apparel and luxurious watches are the trademarks that put Andrew Marc in the luxury fashion industry. Beginning in 1981 with the introduction of his famous leather and fur bomber jacket, Marc has climbed the fashion ladder by setting his designs apart from the rest. He quickly developed leather and cloth outerwear collections based on the concepts driven by his jackets. By doing so, he has become a leader in setting style rather than following the trends of the time.

Marc’s company performs all design work in-house and generally begins the design process up to one year in advance of the selling season. His apparel is described as upscale, but secondary labels such as Marc and Andrew Marc Additions are used for upper-moderately priced and bridge designs. With this marketing strategy, Marc is best known for having a strong sense of his customers.

Andrew Marc Schwartz is partnered with his wife, Suzanne Schwartz. Together they combine their unique abilities to cater to the masculine and the feminine. The result is high-quality, mass-appeal fashion. When working with leather, the Andrew Marc collection uses all techniques for designs, including waxing, distress, tie-dye, and water-color. With today’s technology, Marc can produce a very thin and supple coat of wax, which gives the skin a smooth polished finish to the touch, but which is still sturdy. In 2000, as wearing suede and leather became more of a year-round fashion trend, Marc’s jackets and skirts were in higher demand. For the spring 2001 collection, Marc will offer the waxed leathers in a variety of pastel colors.

In 1986 Marc began producing elegant timepiece watches under the Precision International company. The look and design of the rugged yet exquisite watches were inspired by the Marc bomber jackets. The watches are unique by virtue of their styling and quality is assured by its Swiss-made components and stainless steel construction. Jewels such as synthetic sapphires and rubies are located in the places most subject to wear due to friction. All watches are water-resistant to 330 feet and targeted to consumers who are fashion-oriented, yet want a watch to be sporty, refined, and with easy-to-read features.

By 1998 Marc ventured out to produce a collection of leather and cloth outerwear under the Levi’s Dockers label. The new line consisted of women’s leather and cloth Dockers outerwear, as well as men’s leather Dockers outerwear. Marc continues to develop leather and cloth apparel as well as his unique and elegant watches. His style is modern and chic. He has always been a trendsetter, never a follower in the fashion industry. He takes both the masculine and the feminine to create looks that are unique and appealing to all customers. Andrew Marc designs are created to last through time.

—Kimbally A. Medeiros

MARCASIANO, Mary Jane

American designer

Born: Morristown, New Jersey, 23 September 1955. Education: Attended Montclair State College, Montclair, New Jersey; graduated from Parsons School of Design, New York, 1978. Career: Showed first collection, 1979; launched Mary Jane Marcasiano Company, New York, from 1980; introduced menswear line, 1982; licenses from 1985 include shoes and jewelry; business bought by Hampshire Designs, New York, 1995; Marisa Christina, Inc. acquires label, 1998. Exhibitions: All American: A Sportswear Tradition, Fashion Institute of Technology, April-June 1985. Collections: Fashion Institute of Technology, New York City. Awards: Cartier Stargazer award, 1981; Wool Knit Association award, 1983; Dupont Most Promising Designer award, 1984; Cutty Sark Most Promising Menswear Designer award, 1984. Address: 138 Spring Street, New York, NY 10018, USA.

and wools, fabrics that are comfortable and travel well. Designing for export poses creative challenges; colors have to be chosen carefully to complement different skin tones. A neutral palette provides the basis for each season. In winter, black dominates, and in summer, white is heightened by brighter shades. The designs of Judy Mann continue to represent and champion the Hong Kong fashion scene.

—Hazel Clark; updated by Daryl F. Mallett

MANSON, Glen

See FENN WRIGHT MANSON

MARA, Max

See MAX MARA SpA

MARAMOTTI, Achille

See MAX MARA SpA

MARC, Andrew

American designer

Family: Married Suzanne Schwartz. Career: Launched the Andrew Marc line, 1981; developed leather and fur bomber jacket designs, 1981; founded Precision International for watch manufacture and distribution, 1986. Address: 390 Fifth Avenue, Suite 606, New York, NY 10018, USA.

PUBLICATIONS

On MARC:

Articles

- “Marc’s New Man,” in WWD, 1 September 1998.
- “Andrew Marc Said Near Pact for Levi’s Dockers Outwear,” in Daily News Record, 23 September 1998.
- Gilbert, Daniela, “The Newest Faces,” in WWD, 3 January 2001.

* * *

Fine leather apparel and luxurious watches are the trademarks that put Andrew Marc in the luxury fashion industry. Beginning in 1981 with the introduction of his famous leather and fur bomber jacket, Marc has climbed the fashion ladder by setting his designs apart from the rest. He quickly developed leather and cloth outerwear collections based on the concepts driven by his jackets. By doing so, he has become a leader in setting style rather than following the trends of the time.

Marc’s company performs all design work in-house and generally begins the design process up to one year in advance of the selling season. His apparel is described as upscale, but secondary labels such as Marc and Andrew Marc Additions are used for upper-moderately priced and bridge designs. With this marketing strategy, Marc is best known for having a strong sense of his customers.

Andrew Marc Schwartz is partnered with his wife, Suzanne Schwartz. Together they combine their unique abilities to cater to the masculine and the feminine. The result is high-quality, mass-appeal fashion. When working with leather, the Andrew Marc collection uses all techniques for designs, including waxing, distress, tie-dye, and water-color. With today’s technology, Marc can produce a very thin and supple coat of wax, which gives the skin a smooth polished finish to the touch, but which is still sturdy. In 2000, as wearing suede and leather became more of a year-round fashion trend, Marc’s jackets and skirts were in higher demand. For the spring 2001 collection, Marc will offer the waxed leathers in a variety of pastel colors.

In 1986 Marc began producing elegant timepiece watches under the Precision International company. The look and design of the rugged yet exquisite watches were inspired by the Marc bomber jackets. The watches are unique by virtue of their styling and quality is assured by its Swiss-made components and stainless steel construction. Jewels such as synthetic sapphires and rubies are located in the places most subject to wear due to friction. All watches are water-resistant to 330 feet and targeted to consumers who are fashion-oriented, yet want a watch to be sporty, refined, and with easy-to-read features.

By 1998 Marc ventured out to produce a collection of leather and cloth outerwear under the Levi’s Dockers label. The new line consisted of women’s leather and cloth Dockers outerwear, as well as men’s leather Dockers outerwear. Marc continues to develop leather and cloth apparel as well as his unique and elegant watches. His style is modern and chic. He has always been a trendsetter, never a follower in the fashion industry. He takes both the masculine and the feminine to create looks that are unique and appealing to all customers. Andrew Marc designs are created to last through time.

—Kimbally A. Medeiros

MARCASIANO, Mary Jane

American designer

Born: Morristown, New Jersey, 23 September 1955. Education: Attended Montclair State College, Montclair, New Jersey; graduated from Parsons School of Design, New York, 1978. Career: Showed first collection, 1979; launched Mary Jane Marcasiano Company, New York, from 1980; introduced menswear line, 1982; licenses from 1985 include shoes and jewelry; business bought by Hampshire Designs, New York, 1995; Marisa Christina, Inc. acquires label, 1998. Exhibitions: All American: A Sportswear Tradition, Fashion Institute of Technology, April-June 1985. Collections: Fashion Institute of Technology, New York City. Awards: Cartier Stargazer award, 1981; Wool Knit Association award, 1983; Dupont Most Promising Designer award, 1984; Cutty Sark Most Promising Menswear Designer award, 1984. Address: 138 Spring Street, New York, NY 10018, USA.

and wools, fabrics that are comfortable and travel well. Designing for export poses creative challenges; colors have to be chosen carefully to complement different skin tones. A neutral palette provides the basis for each season. In winter, black dominates, and in summer, white is heightened by brighter shades. The designs of Judy Mann continue to represent and champion the Hong Kong fashion scene.

—Hazel Clark; updated by Daryl F. Mallett

MANSON, Glen

See FENN WRIGHT MANSON

MARA, Max

See MAX MARA SpA

MARAMOTTI, Achille

See MAX MARA SpA

MARC, Andrew

American designer

Family: Married Suzanne Schwartz. Career: Launched the Andrew Marc line, 1981; developed leather and fur bomber jacket designs, 1981; founded Precision International for watch manufacture and distribution, 1986. Address: 390 Fifth Avenue, Suite 606, New York, NY 10018, USA.

PUBLICATIONS

On MARC:

Articles

- “Marc’s New Man,” in WWD, 1 September 1998.
- “Andrew Marc Said Near Pact for Levi’s Dockers Outwear,” in Daily News Record, 23 September 1998.
- Gilbert, Daniela, “The Newest Faces,” in WWD, 3 January 2001.

* * *

Fine leather apparel and luxurious watches are the trademarks that put Andrew Marc in the luxury fashion industry. Beginning in 1981 with the introduction of his famous leather and fur bomber jacket, Marc has climbed the fashion ladder by setting his designs apart from the rest. He quickly developed leather and cloth outerwear collections based on the concepts driven by his jackets. By doing so, he has become a leader in setting style rather than following the trends of the time.

Marc’s company performs all design work in-house and generally begins the design process up to one year in advance of the selling season. His apparel is described as upscale, but secondary labels such as Marc and Andrew Marc Additions are used for upper-moderately priced and bridge designs. With this marketing strategy, Marc is best known for having a strong sense of his customers.

Andrew Marc Schwartz is partnered with his wife, Suzanne Schwartz. Together they combine their unique abilities to cater to the masculine and the feminine. The result is high-quality, mass-appeal fashion. When working with leather, the Andrew Marc collection uses all techniques for designs, including waxing, distress, tie-dye, and water-color. With today’s technology, Marc can produce a very thin and supple coat of wax, which gives the skin a smooth polished finish to the touch, but which is still sturdy. In 2000, as wearing suede and leather became more of a year-round fashion trend, Marc’s jackets and skirts were in higher demand. For the spring 2001 collection, Marc will offer the waxed leathers in a variety of pastel colors.

In 1986 Marc began producing elegant timepiece watches under the Precision International company. The look and design of the rugged yet exquisite watches were inspired by the Marc bomber jackets. The watches are unique by virtue of their styling and quality is assured by its Swiss-made components and stainless steel construction. Jewels such as synthetic sapphires and rubies are located in the places most subject to wear due to friction. All watches are water-resistant to 330 feet and targeted to consumers who are fashion-oriented, yet want a watch to be sporty, refined, and with easy-to-read features.

By 1998 Marc ventured out to produce a collection of leather and cloth outerwear under the Levi’s Dockers label. The new line consisted of women’s leather and cloth Dockers outerwear, as well as men’s leather Dockers outerwear. Marc continues to develop leather and cloth apparel as well as his unique and elegant watches. His style is modern and chic. He has always been a trendsetter, never a follower in the fashion industry. He takes both the masculine and the feminine to create looks that are unique and appealing to all customers. Andrew Marc designs are created to last through time.

—Kimbally A. Medeiros

MARCASIANO, Mary Jane

American designer

Born: Morristown, New Jersey, 23 September 1955. Education: Attended Montclair State College, Montclair, New Jersey; graduated from Parsons School of Design, New York, 1978. Career: Showed first collection, 1979; launched Mary Jane Marcasiano Company, New York, from 1980; introduced menswear line, 1982; licenses from 1985 include shoes and jewelry; business bought by Hampshire Designs, New York, 1995; Marisa Christina, Inc. acquires label, 1998. Exhibitions: All American: A Sportswear Tradition, Fashion Institute of Technology, April-June 1985. Collections: Fashion Institute of Technology, New York City. Awards: Cartier Stargazer award, 1981; Wool Knit Association award, 1983; Dupont Most Promising Designer award, 1984; Cutty Sark Most Promising Menswear Designer award, 1984. Address: 138 Spring Street, New York, NY 10018, USA.

PUBLICATIONSOn MARCASIANO:*Books

Stegemeyer, Anne, Who's Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.

Articles

"Making It Big in Prime Time," in Harper's Bazaar, April 1988.

Boyes, Kathleen, "Mary Jane Marcasiano: Staying in the Arts," in WWD, 6 June 1988.

Starzinger, Page Hill, "Smart Women, Smart Clothes," in Vogue, September 1988.

Matousek, Mark, "Mary Jane Marcasiano," in Harper's Bazaar, October 1988.

Socha, Miles, "Marcasiano's Luxury Revival," in WWD, 25 February 1998.

D'Innocenzio, Anne, "New Designs for Marcasiano," in WWD, 12 May 1999.

*

My design philosophy and how I want to look as a woman have always been intertwined. My first collection came out of a desire to wear something that didn't exist yet. There is always a dual purpose when I design—the aesthetics of the line and color have to coexist with wearability. Therefore, I test all the yarns and fabrics first on myself.

Color is where I start when I'm working on a new collection, simultaneously matching color with the surface of the yarn or fabric to enhance the color impact. My goal is to create a wearable surface of color, texture, and light. My shapes are simple. I like the ease of knitwear, giving enough room for the garment to move around the body, both covering and revealing it. Necklines are very important to my designs. I use simple geometric shapes to create a presentation of the face, neck, and décolleté.

I am designing for the lifestyle of the modern woman who needs clothes that can take her from day into evening, cold to warm weather, sexy to serious. I want a woman to be as comfortable in all of my designs as she is wearing her favorite sweater. Complete knitwear dressing combined with Lycra-blend stretch fabrics are how I achieve this.

I don't impose a "look" on my customer—my customer has her own style or I help her to discover her own. This is one of the great satisfactions in designing.

—Mary Jane Marcasiano

* * *

Mary Jane Marcasiano began her business as primarily a sweater knit house, a focus she has maintained throughout her years in business. The company, located in the SoHo district of New York, has grown and now includes woven fabrics as well as knits. When beginning a new collection, Marcasiano starts with color, simultaneously matching the color with the yarn or fabric to enhance the impact of the completed look. The yarns she prefers are rayon, cotton, silk, linen, and blends of these fibers. In woven fabrics, rayons and silks are favored, owing to their lightness and draping ability.

At a more experimental level, she also utilizes yarns and fabrics with Lycra and superior uses of polyester and nylon. Her ultimate goal is to create a wearable surface of color, texture, and light. Shapes are always simple, as required by the needs of her specific knitwear designs. Beginning with the neckline, Marcasiano uses a variety of geometric shapes to create a pleasing presentation of the face, neck, and décolleté. The ease of wearing her knitwear as well as the woven elements of the collection allow the garments to flow around the body, both covering and revealing it.

Throughout the years Marcasiano's designs have been influenced by a wide variety of historical and artistic movements. The ancient cultures of Egypt, North Africa, Greece, and Rome, with clothes that were the ultimate in simplicity, are an obvious influence on her minimalist designs. Etruscan and Roman jewelry and the Neo-Etruscan movement in Europe have also influenced her designs.

Her target market is women who buy designer-price clothing and appreciate quality, comfort, and ease in their garments. Many professional women, women in the arts, and women involved in the fashion industry wear the Marcasiano label. Exclusive department stores such as Bergdorf Goodman in New York and Neiman Marcus in Dallas have recognized Marcasiano's talent for understanding and designing for the American woman.

Marcasiano and her designs began receiving more exposure, due to business deals that launched her label into new retailers. First, in 1995, Hampshire Designs, a New York sweater firm, bought Marcasiano's business. Then in 1998, Marisa Christina, Inc. acquired the label. Under the new ownership, Marcasiano is producing products accessible to a spectrum of consumers in a range of prices and has been able to penetrate new markets, introducing her quality knit designs to a wider audience.

In her desire to create beautiful and wearable knitwear, Marcasiano follows in the footsteps of women designers such as Coco Chanel, Sonia Rykiel, and Jacqueline Jacobsen (Dorothée Bis)—typical of women designers in Europe who have influenced her work. Her personal innovations in the advancement of knit dressing in America, through the use of unusual yarns, stitches, and simplification of the shape of sweaters, is an inspiration to a new generation of young independent designers working on their own.

—Roberta Hochberger Gruber; updated by Megan Stacy

MARCIANO, Paul, Georges, Maurice, and Armand

See GUESS, INC.

MARGIELA, Martin

Belgian designer

Born: Louvain, Belgium, 9 April 1957. Education: Royale Académie of Fine Arts, Antwerp, 1977–80. Career: Freelance designer, Milan, 1980–81; freelance fashion stylist, Antwerp, 1982–85; design assistant to Gaultier, 1985–87; showed first major collection under own label in Paris, 1988; launched knitwear line manufactured by Miss Deanna Spa, Italy, 1992; appointed artistic director for Hermès' ready-to-wear women's division, 1997. Exhibitions: Le monde selon

PUBLICATIONSOn MARCASIANO:*Books

Stegemeyer, Anne, Who's Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.

Articles

"Making It Big in Prime Time," in Harper's Bazaar, April 1988.

Boyes, Kathleen, "Mary Jane Marcasiano: Staying in the Arts," in WWD, 6 June 1988.

Starzinger, Page Hill, "Smart Women, Smart Clothes," in Vogue, September 1988.

Matousek, Mark, "Mary Jane Marcasiano," in Harper's Bazaar, October 1988.

Socha, Miles, "Marcasiano's Luxury Revival," in WWD, 25 February 1998.

D'Innocenzio, Anne, "New Designs for Marcasiano," in WWD, 12 May 1999.

*

My design philosophy and how I want to look as a woman have always been intertwined. My first collection came out of a desire to wear something that didn't exist yet. There is always a dual purpose when I design—the aesthetics of the line and color have to coexist with wearability. Therefore, I test all the yarns and fabrics first on myself.

Color is where I start when I'm working on a new collection, simultaneously matching color with the surface of the yarn or fabric to enhance the color impact. My goal is to create a wearable surface of color, texture, and light. My shapes are simple. I like the ease of knitwear, giving enough room for the garment to move around the body, both covering and revealing it. Necklines are very important to my designs. I use simple geometric shapes to create a presentation of the face, neck, and décolleté.

I am designing for the lifestyle of the modern woman who needs clothes that can take her from day into evening, cold to warm weather, sexy to serious. I want a woman to be as comfortable in all of my designs as she is wearing her favorite sweater. Complete knitwear dressing combined with Lycra-blend stretch fabrics are how I achieve this.

I don't impose a "look" on my customer—my customer has her own style or I help her to discover her own. This is one of the great satisfactions in designing.

—Mary Jane Marcasiano

* * *

Mary Jane Marcasiano began her business as primarily a sweater knit house, a focus she has maintained throughout her years in business. The company, located in the SoHo district of New York, has grown and now includes woven fabrics as well as knits. When beginning a new collection, Marcasiano starts with color, simultaneously matching the color with the yarn or fabric to enhance the impact of the completed look. The yarns she prefers are rayon, cotton, silk, linen, and blends of these fibers. In woven fabrics, rayons and silks are favored, owing to their lightness and draping ability.

At a more experimental level, she also utilizes yarns and fabrics with Lycra and superior uses of polyester and nylon. Her ultimate goal is to create a wearable surface of color, texture, and light. Shapes are always simple, as required by the needs of her specific knitwear designs. Beginning with the neckline, Marcasiano uses a variety of geometric shapes to create a pleasing presentation of the face, neck, and décolleté. The ease of wearing her knitwear as well as the woven elements of the collection allow the garments to flow around the body, both covering and revealing it.

Throughout the years Marcasiano's designs have been influenced by a wide variety of historical and artistic movements. The ancient cultures of Egypt, North Africa, Greece, and Rome, with clothes that were the ultimate in simplicity, are an obvious influence on her minimalist designs. Etruscan and Roman jewelry and the Neo-Etruscan movement in Europe have also influenced her designs.

Her target market is women who buy designer-price clothing and appreciate quality, comfort, and ease in their garments. Many professional women, women in the arts, and women involved in the fashion industry wear the Marcasiano label. Exclusive department stores such as Bergdorf Goodman in New York and Neiman Marcus in Dallas have recognized Marcasiano's talent for understanding and designing for the American woman.

Marcasiano and her designs began receiving more exposure, due to business deals that launched her label into new retailers. First, in 1995, Hampshire Designs, a New York sweater firm, bought Marcasiano's business. Then in 1998, Marisa Christina, Inc. acquired the label. Under the new ownership, Marcasiano is producing products accessible to a spectrum of consumers in a range of prices and has been able to penetrate new markets, introducing her quality knit designs to a wider audience.

In her desire to create beautiful and wearable knitwear, Marcasiano follows in the footsteps of women designers such as Coco Chanel, Sonia Rykiel, and Jacqueline Jacobsen (Dorothée Bis)—typical of women designers in Europe who have influenced her work. Her personal innovations in the advancement of knit dressing in America, through the use of unusual yarns, stitches, and simplification of the shape of sweaters, is an inspiration to a new generation of young independent designers working on their own.

—Roberta Hochberger Gruber; updated by Megan Stacy

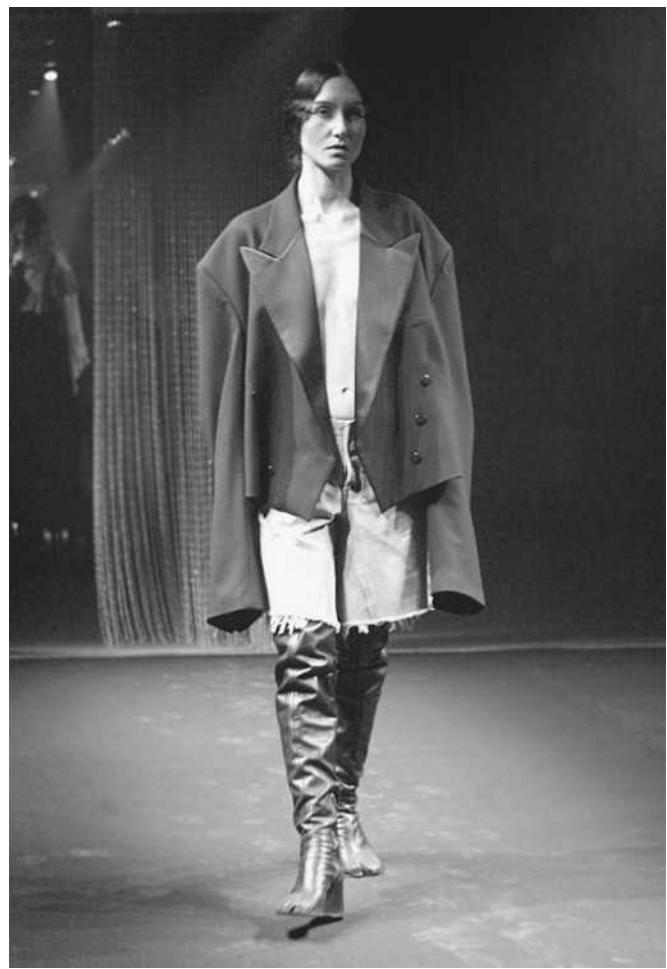

MARCIANO, Paul, Georges, Maurice, and Armand

See GUESS, INC.

MARGIELA, Martin

Belgian designer

Born: Louvain, Belgium, 9 April 1957. Education: Royale Académie of Fine Arts, Antwerp, 1977–80. Career: Freelance designer, Milan, 1980–81; freelance fashion stylist, Antwerp, 1982–85; design assistant to Gaultier, 1985–87; showed first major collection under own label in Paris, 1988; launched knitwear line manufactured by Miss Deanna Spa, Italy, 1992; appointed artistic director for Hermès' ready-to-wear women's division, 1997. Exhibitions: Le monde selon

Martin Margiela, fall 2001 collection. © AP/Wide World Photos/
Fashion Wire Daily.

ses créateurs, Musée de la Mode et du Costume, Palais Galliera, Paris, 1991; Infra-Apparel, Metropolitan Museum of Art, 1993; Belgian Fashion: Antwerp Style, Fashion Institute of Technology, New York City; Martin Margiela: 9/4/1615, Rotterdam, 1997. Address: 13 Boulevard St Denis, 75002 Paris, France.

PUBLICATIONS

By MARGIELA:

Books

Margiela et al, Martin Margiela: 9/4/1615, [exhibition catalogue], Rotterdam, 1997.
Maison Martin Margiela Street, Special Edition, Volumes 1 & 2, Paris, 1999.

On MARGIELA:

Books

Le monde selon ses créateurs [exhibition catalogue], Paris, 1991.
Martin, Richard, and Harold Koda, Infra-Apparel [exhibition catalogue], New York, 1993.

- Stegemeyer, Anne, Who's Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.
Borthwick, Mark, 2000–1: La maison Martin Margiela, Paris, 1998.

Articles

- Allen, Elizabeth, "Marvelous Martin," in WWD, 22 March 1989.
Cunningham, Bill, "The Collections," in Details (New York), March 1989.
Paz, Ricardo Martinez, "Los Margenes de Margiela," in Impar (Spain), No. 3, 1991.
Voight, Rebecca, "Martin Margiela Champions the Seamy Side of French Fashion," in Blitz (London), March 1991.
O'Shea, Stephen, "Recycling: An All-New Fabrication of Style," in Elle (London), April 1991.
"La Mode Destroy," in Vogue (Paris), May 1992.
Betts, Katherine, "La Nouvelle Vague," in Vogue, September 1992.
Spindler, Amy M., "Coming Apart," in the New York Times, 25 July 1993.
_____, "Four Designers in the Vanguard Hold the Line," in the New York Times, 11 October 1993.
Zahm, Olivier, "Before and After Fashion," in ArtForum (New York), March 1995.
Spindler, Amy M., "Beyond Sweet, Beyond Black, Beyond 2001," in the New York Times, 17 March 1995.
Evans, Caroline, "The Golden Dustman," in Fashion Theory, Vol. 2, 1998.
Mead, Rebecaa, "The Crazy Professor: Why Was Paris Persuaded That the Radical Martin Margiela Was Right for the Venerable House of Hermès" in the New Yorker, 30 March 1998.
Mower, Sarah, "Margiela Does Hermès," in Harper's Bazaar, June 1998.
Braunstein, Chloe, "Martin Margiela, Couturier," in L'Architecture d'aujourd'hui, January 1999.
Alexander, Hilary, "At Last: Margiela by Mail Order," in the Daily Telegraph (London), 19 July 1999.
Murphy, Robert, "Margiela: Time to Step Up," in WWD, 15 February 2001.
White, Jackie, "The Belgian Influence on Display: Designers Focus on Innovation and Design," in the Kansas City Star, 18 February 2001.

*

a creativity: unfailing and inexhaustible (force) where everything fits an energy: that makes things move an extremity: that calls into question again an action: carried out and provoking reactions a force: that every time again provokes emotions a fantasy: that makes one dream a sensitivity: that makes you want to be part of it a proposal: everyone has the choice to interpret a subtlety: that makes everything possible a sensuality: that makes everything acceptable an authenticity: that restores the true or right values of things again a professionalism: that makes one interested, curious, and inquisitive a positivity: that gives hope for the future.

—Jenny Meirens for Martin Margiela

Martin Margiela, fall 2001 collection. © AP/Wide World Photos/
Fashion Wire Daily.

* * *

Martin Margiela is a powerful talent in avant-garde fashion. Formerly an assistant to Jean-Paul Gaultier, the Belgian-born Margiela showed his first collection in 1989 and immediately achieved cult status. He was heralded as fashion's latest bad boy genius and the most notorious exponent of la mode destroy. He dislikes the term "destroy fashion" and has insisted he does not regard it as destructive when he slashes old clothes. On the contrary, he told Elle in April 1991 that it is his way of "bringing them back to life in a different form."

The idea of cutting up clothes goes back to the ripped t-shirts of the Punks and the subsequent street style of slicing jeans with razor blades. But the new deconstruction goes much further. Margiela has unravelled old army socks and made them into sweaters, transformed tulle ball gowns into jackets, recut secondhand black leather coats in the form of dresses, even made plastic laundry bags into clothes. He has designed jackets—beautifully tailored and lined with three different kinds of fabrics—with the sleeves ripped off.

Although conservative members of the fashion industry cringed, young trendsetters enthusiastically embraced Margiela's radical look, which had nothing to do with traditional forms of ostentatious elegance and everything to do with creativity and what he calls

"authenticity." Exposed linings and frayed threads testify to the internal construction of the garments, whereas the deliberate deconstruction of garments implicitly raises questions about our assumptions regarding fashion. Detached sleeves, for example, hark back to the way clothes were made in the Middle Ages, when mercenaries first slashed their silken garments. A cloven-toed boot-shoe and fingers laced in ribbons are rebellious statements in a world of high fashion orthodoxy.

The freedom of Margiela's imagination also evokes the sartorial liberty of the 1970s (a decade Margiela views in a positive light), especially in contrast to the opulent and conservative 1980s. Like the hippies who pillaged flea markets, Margiela gave a second life to old and rejected garments, recycling them, and giving a priority to individual creativity rather than consumerism. Opposed to the status-hungry cult of the designer so ubiquitous in the 1980s, Margiela chose for his label a blank piece of white fabric, and resisted talking to the press about what his clothes "mean."

Clothing per se interests him less than how styles are created and interpreted. In this respect, he is very much a conceptual and postmodern designer. Yet, like his former mentor Gaultier, Margiela is an excellent tailor who really knows how to sew, and his clothes, although undeniably strange, are beautifully (de)constructed. Margiela's aesthetic also extends to his fashion shows. He staged one show in an abandoned lot in a poor immigrant neighborhood of Paris, with local children dancing down the improvised catwalk along with the models. Another show was held at a Salvation Army hall, at the edge of the city, so that an international crew of fashion journalists found themselves wandering around, hopelessly lost, trying to read the hand-drawn map—and when they finally made it there, they had to perch on secondhand furniture and drink wine in plastic cups. Further, he held two simultaneous shows (one of all-black clothes, the other white) at the edge of a cemetery, with crowds of admirers fighting to get in.

Symbolically powerful colors like black, white, and red have dominated Margiela's palette. In his atelier are posted dictionary definitions of these colors, with red, for example, being associated with wine, blood, and rubies. His atelier itself, on the Boulevard Saint Denis, is near the red-light district of Paris. Like his clothes, his studio is a masterpiece of bricolage. Graffiti decorates the walls, and the floors are covered with copies of old magazine and newspaper articles, which on close inspection turn out to be reviews of his collections.

With Margiela steeped so deeply in the avant-garde sensibility, it came as a perplexing surprise in 1997 when he was appointed artistic director of womenswear for Hermès (which also happens to own a third of Gaultier's business), long associated with luxury and restraint. But the pairing has proved successful, with Margiela continuing the Hermès tradition of quality craftsmanship while playing with conventions of clothing construction and function. His collections for Hermès have been luxurious and subdued but still push the conceptual limits of structure. Dresses are soft and minimalist, sweaters are reversible, and coats double as capes.

Margiela has also continued with his own label, and revenues in recent years have steadily increased, allowing La Maison Martin Margiela to expand. The label moved into mail order sales in 1999 and opened its first freestanding boutique in Tokyo in 2000, with further openings projected.

Margiela himself is famously reclusive, communicating infrequently with the press and then only by fax. In keeping with his ideological convictions, he prefers not to become a public fashion personality, allowing the craftsmanship and design aesthetic of all his fashion collections to communicate his conceptual visions for him.

—Valerie Steele; updated by Megan Stacy

MARIMEKKO

Finnish textile and clothing design firm

Founded: by Armi Ratia (1912–79) and Viljo Ratia in Helsinki in 1951. Company History: Fabrics introduced in the U.S. by Design Research stores, from 1951; ventured into the U.S., early 1960s; signed licensing agreement with Dan River company for bed linens, 1976; wallpaper and home furnishing lines introduced, 1978; firm acquired by Amergroup, Finland, 1985, stopped selling directly to U.S., 1989; sold to Kristi Paakkonen, in 1991; new Helsinki flagship shop opened, 1993; opened store in Mexico City, 1994; signed new licenses for rugs and children's dinnerware, 1994; exclusive product placement with Mervyn's and Crate & Barrel, 1996; launched new bed linen collections exclusively with Crate & Barrel, 1998; signed with DelGreco Textiles for fabrics in U.S., 1999; new wallcovering and coordinating fabric agreement with Imperial Home Decor, 2000. Company Address: Marimekko Oy, Puusepankatu 4, Helsinki 00810, Finland.

PUBLICATIONS

By MARIMEKKO:

Books

Marimekko-Printex Oy, The Marimekko Story, Helsinki, 1964.

Marimekko, New York, 1980, 1989.

Marimekko Oy Architect Collection, Helsinki, 1982.

On MARIMEKKO:

Books

Beer, Eileen Harrison, Scandinavian Design: Objects of a Life Style, New York, 1975.

Lambert, Eleanor, World of Fashion: People, Places, Resources, New York & London, 1976.

Suomen Taideteollisuusyhdistys, Women Who Create, Helsinki, 1984.

Suhonen, Pekka, Phenomenon Marimekko, Helsinki, 1986.

Ainamo, Antti, Industrial Design and Business Performance: A Case Study of Design Management in a Finnish Fashion Firm, Helsinki, 1996.

Articles

Davies, David, "Fabrics by Marimekko," in Design (London), August 1968.

Lintman, Jaako, "Finland Marches Forward," in Design, No. 245, May 1969.

"Bright Spell Forecast," in Design, October 1973.

Tulberg, Diana, "That Old Marimekko Magic," in Designed in Finland 1975 (Helsinki), 1975.

Holm, Aase, "Marimekko," in Mobilia (Amsterdam), No. 284, 1979.

Apple, R.W., "Finland's Spirited Designer," in the New York Times, 2 August 1979.

Slesin, Suzanne, "Finnish and Muted," in the New York Times, 16 September 1979.

"Armi Ratia, Marimekko Founder and Innovator in Printed Fabrics," [obituary] in the New York Times, 4 October 1979.

Furman, Phyllis, "Marimekko's Designs on a Turnaround," in Crain's New York Business, 5 September 1988.

Fraser, Mark, "Marimekko on the Move in America," in HFN (Weekly Home Furnishings Newspaper), 20 November 1989.

Boyle-Schwartz, Donna, "Thoroughly Modern Marimekko," in HFN (Weekly Home Furnishings Newspaper), 26 July 1993.

_____, "Marimekko Inks Newmark, Selandia," in HFN (Weekly Home Furnishings Newspaper), 24 October 1994.

Orenstein, Alison F., "Marimekko Revs Up," in HFN (Weekly Home Furnishings Newspaper), 24 June 1996.

Boyle-Schwartz, Donna, "A Crate & Barrel Exclusive...for Bedding with Marimekko Designs," in HFN (Weekly Home Furnishings Newspaper), 26 January 1998.

Gilbert, Daniela, "Marimekko Back in Spotlight," in HFN (Weekly Home Furnishings Newspaper), 13 July 1998.

_____, "Marimekko Set to Re-Cover North America in Fabric," in HFN (Weekly Home Furnishings Newspaper), 25 January 1999.

"The Finnish Line," in Interior Design, November 1999.

"Marimekko Ready for Spring," in HFN (Weekly Home Furnishings Newspaper), 17 January 2000.

Stevens, Kimberly, and William L. Hamilton, "Trying on Those Supergraphics Again," in the New York Times, 31 July 2001.

* * *

A strong Finnish design movement emerged after World War II and was given decisive impetus by the International Triennales of 1951 and 1954 which defined the concept of "Finish design." By formally integrating design into manufacturing, textiles from Marimekko acquired international attention through their identification of an exclusive market responsive to the strong Finnish design aesthetic.

Marimekko was founded by Armi and Viljo Ratia in 1951 and has since established a reputation for producing quality textiles for home furnishings and clothing. The Finland-based company actually began in 1949 by acquiring Printex Oy—an oilcloth factory in the suburbs of Helsinki. After a refit, the factory reintroduced the craft-based technique of hand silk-screen printing on cotton sheeting. The technique, which was recognized by resulting irregularities and repeat lines, evoked a human feel to each design. Although production techniques at Marimekko were mechanized long ago, the company maintains hand-crafted quality in its printing. Its use of decorative designs and natural fibers strengthened its commitment to the Scandinavian affinity to nature.

Under the design direction of Armi Ratia, the company broke ranks with conventional Finnish textile designers and implemented a range of nonfigurative patterns, using abstract graphic designs of art colleagues. The first collection of simply cut dresses, introduced in 1951 ideological convictions, he prefers not to become a public fashion personality, allowing the craftsmanship and design aesthetic of all his fashion collections to communicate his conceptual visions for him.

—Valerie Steele; updated by Megan Stacy

MARIMEKKO

Finnish textile and clothing design firm

Founded: by Armi Ratia (1912–79) and Viljo Ratia in Helsinki in 1951. Company History: Fabrics introduced in the U.S. by Design Research stores, from 1951; ventured into the U.S., early 1960s; signed licensing agreement with Dan River company for bed linens, 1976; wallpaper and home furnishing lines introduced, 1978; firm acquired by Amergroup, Finland, 1985, stopped selling directly to U.S., 1989; sold to Kristi Paakkonen, in 1991; new Helsinki flagship shop opened, 1993; opened store in Mexico City, 1994; signed new licenses for rugs and children's dinnerware, 1994; exclusive product placement with Mervyn's and Crate & Barrel, 1996; launched new bed linen collections exclusively with Crate & Barrel, 1998; signed with DelGreco Textiles for fabrics in U.S., 1999; new wallcovering and coordinating fabric agreement with Imperial Home Decor, 2000. Company Address: Marimekko Oy, Puusepankatu 4, Helsinki 00810, Finland.

PUBLICATIONS

By MARIMEKKO:

Books

Marimekko-Printex Oy, The Marimekko Story, Helsinki, 1964.

Marimekko, New York, 1980, 1989.

Marimekko Oy Architect Collection, Helsinki, 1982.

On MARIMEKKO:

Books

Beer, Eileen Harrison, Scandinavian Design: Objects of a Life Style, New York, 1975.

Lambert, Eleanor, World of Fashion: People, Places, Resources, New York & London, 1976.

Suomen Taideteollisuusyhdistys, Women Who Create, Helsinki, 1984.

Suhonen, Pekka, Phenomenon Marimekko, Helsinki, 1986.

Ainamo, Antti, Industrial Design and Business Performance: A Case Study of Design Management in a Finnish Fashion Firm, Helsinki, 1996.

Articles

Davies, David, "Fabrics by Marimekko," in Design (London), August 1968.

Lintman, Jaako, "Finland Marches Forward," in Design, No. 245, May 1969.

"Bright Spell Forecast," in Design, October 1973.

Tulberg, Diana, "That Old Marimekko Magic," in Designed in Finland 1975 (Helsinki), 1975.

Holm, Aase, "Marimekko," in Mobilia (Amsterdam), No. 284, 1979.

Apple, R.W., "Finland's Spirited Designer," in the New York Times, 2 August 1979.

Slesin, Suzanne, "Finnish and Muted," in the New York Times, 16 September 1979.

"Armi Ratia, Marimekko Founder and Innovator in Printed Fabrics," [obituary] in the New York Times, 4 October 1979.

Furman, Phyllis, "Marimekko's Designs on a Turnaround," in Crain's New York Business, 5 September 1988.

Fraser, Mark, "Marimekko on the Move in America," in HFN (Weekly Home Furnishings Newspaper), 20 November 1989.

Boyle-Schwartz, Donna, "Thoroughly Modern Marimekko," in HFN (Weekly Home Furnishings Newspaper), 26 July 1993.

_____, "Marimekko Inks Newmark, Selandia," in HFN (Weekly Home Furnishings Newspaper), 24 October 1994.

Orenstein, Alison F., "Marimekko Revs Up," in HFN (Weekly Home Furnishings Newspaper), 24 June 1996.

Boyle-Schwartz, Donna, "A Crate & Barrel Exclusive...for Bedding with Marimekko Designs," in HFN (Weekly Home Furnishings Newspaper), 26 January 1998.

Gilbert, Daniela, "Marimekko Back in Spotlight," in HFN (Weekly Home Furnishings Newspaper), 13 July 1998.

_____, "Marimekko Set to Re-Cover North America in Fabric," in HFN (Weekly Home Furnishings Newspaper), 25 January 1999.

"The Finnish Line," in Interior Design, November 1999.

"Marimekko Ready for Spring," in HFN (Weekly Home Furnishings Newspaper), 17 January 2000.

Stevens, Kimberly, and William L. Hamilton, "Trying on Those Supergraphics Again," in the New York Times, 31 July 2001.

* * *

A strong Finnish design movement emerged after World War II and was given decisive impetus by the International Triennales of 1951 and 1954 which defined the concept of "Finish design." By formally integrating design into manufacturing, textiles from Marimekko acquired international attention through their identification of an exclusive market responsive to the strong Finnish design aesthetic.

Marimekko was founded by Armi and Viljo Ratia in 1951 and has since established a reputation for producing quality textiles for home furnishings and clothing. The Finland-based company actually began in 1949 by acquiring Printex Oy—an oilcloth factory in the suburbs of Helsinki. After a refit, the factory reintroduced the craft-based technique of hand silk-screen printing on cotton sheeting. The technique, which was recognized by resulting irregularities and repeat lines, evoked a human feel to each design. Although production techniques at Marimekko were mechanized long ago, the company maintains hand-crafted quality in its printing. Its use of decorative designs and natural fibers strengthened its commitment to the Scandinavian affinity to nature.

Under the design direction of Armi Ratia, the company broke ranks with conventional Finnish textile designers and implemented a range of nonfigurative patterns, using abstract graphic designs of art colleagues. The first collection of simply cut dresses, introduced in 1951 in Helsinki, originated as a promotional vehicle for the company's printed cotton fabrics. Wraparound and front-buttoned garments were included, accentuating the textiles rather than the styling of the garments. The collection was called Marimekko, combining the old-fashioned Finnish girl's name of Maria and the term mekko which described a tow shirt, open at the back and worn like a pinafore. Since then "Maria's little dress" expanded into home furnishing textiles, with overseas licensing agreements (initiated in 1968) for wall coverings, bedding, decorative fabrics, paper products, table linens, kitchenware, ceramics, glassware, rugs, and wallcoverings.

The textile patterns used by Marimekko have given the firm a unique identity throughout the world; inspired by elements, forms, and colors taken from Finland's landscape and national heritage. At the same time, however, Marimekko's textile designs embrace experimental ideas and contemporary graphic thinking, often resulting in bold patterns and saturated colors. Marimekko designs are based on an understanding of modernity, rather than concerns for contemporary fashion trends.

Marimekko's garments sought to incorporate functionalist ideas; comfort and timelessness were strikingly evident in the design of the fabrics themselves. Designs produced in the 1950s by Maiha Isola and Vuokko Nurmesniemi (founder of Vuokko in 1964) included small, simple stripes and nature-inspired graphic prints in black and white. By the 1960s there were oversized decorative graphics, flowers, and Op-Art-inspired prints, reflecting the playful and opulent mood of the period. By the end of the 1970s stripes were rendered primarily in bold primary colors as exemplified by the Peltomies series (1975–79). Similar designs continued to be produced through the next decade, with geometric patterns scaled for furniture in shades including mauve, opal, and midnight.

Marimekko's designs came full circle in the 1990s collections—Fujiwo Ishimoto (prints in celebration of the 75th anniversary of Finnish Independence), Jukka Rintala (womenswear), and Elina Helenius and Jatta Salonen (prints and patterns) returned to the natural patterns and colored world of Finland's seasons and landscape, which inspired original designs of the 1950s. By 1994 there were two dozen Marimekko stores worldwide, with 22 in Finland, one in Germany, and its first shop outside Europe opening in Mexico. The company, which had stopped direct selling to the U.S. at the end of the 1980s, staged comeback with two new licensing agreements with Selandia Designs and the Newmark Rug Company.

Selandia signed on to produce children's dinnerware, snack trays, and lunchbags coordinated to Marimekko's textile designs, while Newmark created rugs or all sized and shapes matching Marimekko kitchen and bath collections. Further U.S. exposure came from product placements with Mervyn's and Crate & Barrel in bed linens through its American distributor, Revman. Mervyn's began displaying Marimekko bed linens in its 297 stores in 1996; Crate & Barrel used simple leaf-designed collections of sheets, pillow cases, and comforters to showcase their beds. "Marimekko is what we use to decorate," Betty Kahn, a spokesperson for Crate & Barrel told HFN (Weekly Home Furnishings Network Newspaper) (24 June 1996). The popular ensemble, Kahn explained, became the "basic design element in our stores, so it's more than just selling [Marimekko's] sheets; we have a symbiotic relationship."

Marimekko and Crate & Barrel continued their association and in 1998 five new bedding ensembles and accessories debuted exclusively at Crate & Barrel stores. "Marimekko represents something unique and special," Carole Newton, product manager and textiles buyer for Crate & Barrel stated to HFN (26 January 1998). "Marimekko and Crate & Barrel go together very well; we have a similar philosophy.... There's a real synergy between our classic contemporary points of view."

By the end of the 20th century, Marimekko had engineered a major comeback in the U.S., with fabric (for both indoor and outdoor use), wallcoverings, bed linens, rugs and much more available to American buyers through a series of licenses. Though not as well known in America as many other textiles firms, Marimekko's bold, simple, classic print designs and characteristic use of color have established a permanently recognizable and highly individualistic identity that remains to this day.

—Teal Triggs; updated by Owen James

MARINA RINALDI SRL

Italian plus-size fashion company

Founded: by Achille Marmotti in Reggio Emilia, Italy, within the Max Mara Group, 1980 (named after his great-grandmother, Marina Rinaldi). Company History: Launched first collection of larger-sized fashions, 1980; Persona line introduced, 1985; Marina Sport launched, 1986; knitwear line, 1987; set up U.S. division and headquarters, 1993; opened flagship stores in New York and Beverly Hills, 1998; launched first U.S. magazine ads, 1998. Company Address: Via Mazzacurati 4, 42100 Reggio Emilia, Italy.

PUBLICATIONS

On MARINA RINALDI/MAX MARA:

Books

Alfonsi, Maria Vittoria, Leaders in Fashion, Bologna, 1983.
Soli, Pia, Il genio antipatico, Venice, 1984.

Articles

- "Che cosa di chi: Max Mara," in Vogue (Milan), October 1984.
- "Pianoforte di Max Mara: giunco e sabbia da turismo coloniale," in Vogue (Milan), February 1986.
- Mower, Sarah, "Chasing the Wise Monet," in The Guardian (London), 3 July 1986.
- Rumbold, Judy, "Grey Cells: Bright Ideas," in The Guardian, 7 September 1987.
- "Altre scelte da Max Mara," in Vogue (Milan), October 1987.
- Armstrong, Lisa, "The Max Factor," in Vogue (London), October 1988.
- Tredre, Roger, "A Piece of Cake," in Fashion Weekly (London), 1 December 1988.
- Livingston, Jennifer, "Big Stores, Big Opportunities," in WWD, 6 Sept 1995.
- Edelson, Sharon, "Once in Not Enough on Madison Avenue," in WWD, 19 August 1997.
- "Counter Punch," in WWD, 9 March 1998.

in Helsinki, originated as a promotional vehicle for the company's printed cotton fabrics. Wraparound and front-buttoned garments were included, accentuating the textiles rather than the styling of the garments. The collection was called Marimekko, combining the old-fashioned Finnish girl's name of Maria and the term mekko which described a tow shirt, open at the back and worn like a pinafore. Since then "Maria's little dress" expanded into home furnishing textiles, with overseas licensing agreements (initiated in 1968) for wall coverings, bedding, decorative fabrics, paper products, table linens, kitchenware, ceramics, glassware, rugs, and wallcoverings.

The textile patterns used by Marimekko have given the firm a unique identity throughout the world; inspired by elements, forms, and colors taken from Finland's landscape and national heritage. At the same time, however, Marimekko's textile designs embrace experimental ideas and contemporary graphic thinking, often resulting in bold patterns and saturated colors. Marimekko designs are based on an understanding of modernity, rather than concerns for contemporary fashion trends.

Marimekko's garments sought to incorporate functionalist ideas; comfort and timelessness were strikingly evident in the design of the fabrics themselves. Designs produced in the 1950s by Maiha Isola and Vuokko Nurmesniemi (founder of Vuokko in 1964) included small, simple stripes and nature-inspired graphic prints in black and white. By the 1960s there were oversized decorative graphics, flowers, and Op-Art-inspired prints, reflecting the playful and opulent mood of the period. By the end of the 1970s stripes were rendered primarily in bold primary colors as exemplified by the Peltomies series (1975–79). Similar designs continued to be produced through the next decade, with geometric patterns scaled for furniture in shades including mauve, opal, and midnight.

Marimekko's designs came full circle in the 1990s collections—Fujiwo Ishimoto (prints in celebration of the 75th anniversary of Finnish Independence), Jukka Rintala (womenswear), and Elina Helenius and Jatta Salonen (prints and patterns) returned to the natural patterns and colored world of Finland's seasons and landscape, which inspired original designs of the 1950s. By 1994 there were two dozen Marimekko stores worldwide, with 22 in Finland, one in Germany, and its first shop outside Europe opening in Mexico. The company, which had stopped direct selling to the U.S. at the end of the 1980s, staged comeback with two new licensing agreements with Selandia Designs and the Newmark Rug Company.

Selandia signed on to produce children's dinnerware, snack trays, and lunchbags coordinated to Marimekko's textile designs, while Newmark created rugs or all sized and shapes matching Marimekko kitchen and bath collections. Further U.S. exposure came from product placements with Mervyn's and Crate & Barrel in bed linens through its American distributor, Revman. Mervyn's began displaying Marimekko bed linens in its 297 stores in 1996; Crate & Barrel used simple leaf-designed collections of sheets, pillow cases, and comforters to showcase their beds. "Marimekko is what we use to decorate," Betty Kahn, a spokesperson for Crate & Barrel told HFN (Weekly Home Furnishings Network Newspaper) (24 June 1996). The popular ensemble, Kahn explained, became the "basic design element in our stores, so it's more than just selling [Marimekko's] sheets; we have a symbiotic relationship."

Marimekko and Crate & Barrel continued their association and in 1998 five new bedding ensembles and accessories debuted exclusively at Crate & Barrel stores. "Marimekko represents something unique and special," Carole Newton, product manager and textiles buyer for Crate & Barrel stated to HFN (26 January 1998). "Marimekko and Crate & Barrel go together very well; we have a similar philosophy.... There's a real synergy between our classic contemporary points of view."

By the end of the 20th century, Marimekko had engineered a major comeback in the U.S., with fabric (for both indoor and outdoor use), wallcoverings, bed linens, rugs and much more available to American buyers through a series of licenses. Though not as well known in America as many other textiles firms, Marimekko's bold, simple, classic print designs and characteristic use of color have established a permanently recognizable and highly individualistic identity that remains to this day.

—Teal Triggs; updated by Owen James

MARINA RINALDI SRL

Italian plus-size fashion company

Founded: by Achille Marmotti in Reggio Emilia, Italy, within the Max Mara Group, 1980 (named after his great-grandmother, Marina Rinaldi). Company History: Launched first collection of larger-sized fashions, 1980; Persona line introduced, 1985; Marina Sport launched, 1986; knitwear line, 1987; set up U.S. division and headquarters, 1993; opened flagship stores in New York and Beverly Hills, 1998; launched first U.S. magazine ads, 1998. Company Address: Via Mazzacurati 4, 42100 Reggio Emilia, Italy.

PUBLICATIONS

On MARINA RINALDI/MAX MARA:

Books

Alfonsi, Maria Vittoria, Leaders in Fashion, Bologna, 1983.
Soli, Pia, Il genio antipatico, Venice, 1984.

Articles

- "Che cosa di chi: Max Mara," in Vogue (Milan), October 1984.
- "Pianoforte di Max Mara: giunco e sabbia da turismo coloniale," in Vogue (Milan), February 1986.
- Mower, Sarah, "Chasing the Wise Monet," in The Guardian (London), 3 July 1986.
- Rumbold, Judy, "Grey Cells: Bright Ideas," in The Guardian, 7 September 1987.
- "Altre scelte da Max Mara," in Vogue (Milan), October 1987.
- Armstrong, Lisa, "The Max Factor," in Vogue (London), October 1988.
- Tredre, Roger, "A Piece of Cake," in Fashion Weekly (London), 1 December 1988.
- Livingston, Jennifer, "Big Stores, Big Opportunities," in WWD, 6 Sept 1995.
- Edelson, Sharon, "Once in Not Enough on Madison Avenue," in WWD, 19 August 1997.
- "Counter Punch," in WWD, 9 March 1998.

- Edelson, Sharon, "Marina Rinaldi Opens on Madison Avenue," in WWD, 28 October 1998.
- Curan, Catherine, "Clothiers See the Plus Side," in Crain's New York Business, 17 April 2000.
- Singer, Natasha, "Luxury Boutiques Start Pouring into Russia," in WWD, 28 November 2000.

* * *

Marina Rinaldi originated as part of the Max Mara group, named for its founder's great-grandmother, who once had her own atelier in Reggio Emilia, Italy. The firm's purpose, however, was to answer the needs of the vast population of Italian women sized 46 and over. The group's other ranges, including Weekend and Penny Black, already catered for larger sizes, until it was recognized that there was a significant gap in the market for a separate label specializing in plus sizes.

The aim was and continues to be about producing a womenswear range with the same fashion content as other Max Mara lines. Marina Rinaldi has the same quality of cut, manufacture, fabric, and color as other fashion brands but is only available from size 16 upwards. Established as a separate company, there are now several labels under its umbrella including Marina Rinaldi, Marina Sport (launched to target a younger clientele) and Persona. The label serves 400 points of sale worldwide, 100 of these are franchised, 80 being in Italy and 20 abroad (Paris, Tokyo, Brussels, and Amsterdam).

Marina Rinaldi has an ongoing Image Project aimed to establish a thorough understanding of its product, its customers, and the company's relationship to these customers. Larger women were identified as having very classic tastes, yet too afraid or too timid to try younger styles and modern silhouettes. For Rinaldi, sales personnel became recognized as an important link in establishing a trustworthy relationship with clients. The goal is make their customers feel good about themselves and to do so through fashionably forward, stylish clothing in a range of bigger sizes.

Designs are made to flatter heavier figures and the firm tries to incorporate as many fashion trends and styles as possible yet always with a range of classic items such as a sheepskin or suede jackets, cashmere overcoats, stretch jersey turtlenecks, brushed flannel suits, and jeans in many colors. An eveningwear look is always included with elegant smoking jackets and lounging suits, embroidered wraps and white evening shirts with assorted cufflinks. A summer beachwear collection incorporates essentials from the swimsuits to the terry cloth bathrobes and wraps.

Rinaldi also produces its own catalogue, MR Characters, designed to accompany the customer throughout the fashion seasons and intended as an introductory guide to a fashion lifestyle for women not entirely used to having a wide selection of outfits and separates. As well as advice on how to interpret High Street trends with the Marina Rinaldi look, it gives advice on cookery, personal problems, and travel.

It is often difficult to see much difference in Rinaldi's style from its sibling Max Mara collections, which is exactly the point. The quality of workmanship, styling, and fabrics are all there; the only real difference is in the sizing and the slightly rounder (but no less stunning) model used in the advertising. From a consumer point of view this is a measure of Marina Rinaldi's success. Figure-hugging basques and fitted strapless dresses are not included in the range, but then sexy, revealing dressing wasn't traditionally part of the Max Mara look either. Rinaldi represents a breakthrough in accessible fashion for all sizes, a business concept many other companies soon recognized.

By the 1990s, Rinaldi apparel was given much more space in high-end department stores like Saks Fifth Avenue, Bergdorf Goodman, Bloomingdale's, and Nordstrom due to the increased demand for retailing for larger women. With celebrity spokespersons like actor Camryn Mannheim and musician/television host Queen Latifah, plus sizes finally garnered respect from U.S. retailers and prominent fashion designers as well. Liz Claiborne, Givenchy, and Mondi were all offering plus-size collections, and Rinaldi was doing so well the firm opened two U.S. flagship stores in 1998. In New York, the first Rinaldi flagship was located just a block from sibling Max Mara's store on Madison Avenue. The second freestanding store, nestled snugly on Rodeo Drive in Beverly Hills, opened as part of a two-unit powerhouse, with Max Mara next door. To promote its new stores, Rinaldi also launched its first U.S. magazine advertising campaign, using the slogan, "Style is not a size, it's an attitude."

Marina Rinaldi in the 21st century was a respected womenswear design firm, offering plus-size women a myriad of stylish, exceptional apparel from eveningwear to casual separates. With stores around the world, from its flagships in the U.S. to shops in Russia where there is virtually no competition—Marina Rinaldi has been a pioneer in giving larger women fashion options in a retail world where there were few available.

—Kevin Almond; updated by Owen James

MARINO, Manuel Roberto

See VERINO, Roberto

MARKS, Stephen

See FRENCH CONNECTION

MARMOTTI, Achille

See MARINA RINALDI SrL

MARONGIU, Marcel

French designer

Born: Paris, France, 9 February 1962. Education: Studied economics and fashion design in Stockholm, Sweden. Career: Fashion illustrator for newspapers and magazines, 1980–82; assistant to France Andrevie, Paris, 1982–88; first signature collection, 1988; first catwalk show, Paris, 1989; founded company Permanent Vacation, Paris, 1989; showed collection at Cour Carré du Louvre, October

- Edelson, Sharon, "Marina Rinaldi Opens on Madison Avenue," in WWD, 28 October 1998.
- Curan, Catherine, "Clothiers See the Plus Side," in Crain's New York Business, 17 April 2000.
- Singer, Natasha, "Luxury Boutiques Start Pouring into Russia," in WWD, 28 November 2000.

* * *

Marina Rinaldi originated as part of the Max Mara group, named for its founder's great-grandmother, who once had her own atelier in Reggio Emilia, Italy. The firm's purpose, however, was to answer the needs of the vast population of Italian women sized 46 and over. The group's other ranges, including Weekend and Penny Black, already catered for larger sizes, until it was recognized that there was a significant gap in the market for a separate label specializing in plus sizes.

The aim was and continues to be about producing a womenswear range with the same fashion content as other Max Mara lines. Marina Rinaldi has the same quality of cut, manufacture, fabric, and color as other fashion brands but is only available from size 16 upwards. Established as a separate company, there are now several labels under its umbrella including Marina Rinaldi, Marina Sport (launched to target a younger clientele) and Persona. The label serves 400 points of sale worldwide, 100 of these are franchised, 80 being in Italy and 20 abroad (Paris, Tokyo, Brussels, and Amsterdam).

Marina Rinaldi has an ongoing Image Project aimed to establish a thorough understanding of its product, its customers, and the company's relationship to these customers. Larger women were identified as having very classic tastes, yet too afraid or too timid to try younger styles and modern silhouettes. For Rinaldi, sales personnel became recognized as an important link in establishing a trustworthy relationship with clients. The goal is make their customers feel good about themselves and to do so through fashionably forward, stylish clothing in a range of bigger sizes.

Designs are made to flatter heavier figures and the firm tries to incorporate as many fashion trends and styles as possible yet always with a range of classic items such as a sheepskin or suede jackets, cashmere overcoats, stretch jersey turtlenecks, brushed flannel suits, and jeans in many colors. An eveningwear look is always included with elegant smoking jackets and lounging suits, embroidered wraps and white evening shirts with assorted cufflinks. A summer beachwear collection incorporates essentials from the swimsuits to the terry cloth bathrobes and wraps.

Rinaldi also produces its own catalogue, MR Characters, designed to accompany the customer throughout the fashion seasons and intended as an introductory guide to a fashion lifestyle for women not entirely used to having a wide selection of outfits and separates. As well as advice on how to interpret High Street trends with the Marina Rinaldi look, it gives advice on cookery, personal problems, and travel.

It is often difficult to see much difference in Rinaldi's style from its sibling Max Mara collections, which is exactly the point. The quality of workmanship, styling, and fabrics are all there; the only real difference is in the sizing and the slightly rounder (but no less stunning) model used in the advertising. From a consumer point of view this is a measure of Marina Rinaldi's success. Figure-hugging basques and fitted strapless dresses are not included in the range, but then sexy, revealing dressing wasn't traditionally part of the Max Mara look either. Rinaldi represents a breakthrough in accessible fashion for all sizes, a business concept many other companies soon recognized.

By the 1990s, Rinaldi apparel was given much more space in high-end department stores like Saks Fifth Avenue, Bergdorf Goodman, Bloomingdale's, and Nordstrom due to the increased demand for retailing for larger women. With celebrity spokespersons like actor Camryn Mannheim and musician/television host Queen Latifah, plus sizes finally garnered respect from U.S. retailers and prominent fashion designers as well. Liz Claiborne, Givenchy, and Mondi were all offering plus-size collections, and Rinaldi was doing so well the firm opened two U.S. flagship stores in 1998. In New York, the first Rinaldi flagship was located just a block from sibling Max Mara's store on Madison Avenue. The second freestanding store, nestled snugly on Rodeo Drive in Beverly Hills, opened as part of a two-unit powerhouse, with Max Mara next door. To promote its new stores, Rinaldi also launched its first U.S. magazine advertising campaign, using the slogan, "Style is not a size, it's an attitude."

Marina Rinaldi in the 21st century was a respected womenswear design firm, offering plus-size women a myriad of stylish, exceptional apparel from eveningwear to casual separates. With stores around the world, from its flagships in the U.S. to shops in Russia where there is virtually no competition—Marina Rinaldi has been a pioneer in giving larger women fashion options in a retail world where there were few available.

—Kevin Almond; updated by Owen James

MARINO, Manuel Roberto

See VERINO, Roberto

MARKS, Stephen

See FRENCH CONNECTION

MARMOTTI, Achille

See MARINA RINALDI SrL

MARONGIU, Marcel

French designer

Born: Paris, France, 9 February 1962. Education: Studied economics and fashion design in Stockholm, Sweden. Career: Fashion illustrator for newspapers and magazines, 1980–82; assistant to France Andrevie, Paris, 1982–88; first signature collection, 1988; first catwalk show, Paris, 1989; founded company Permanent Vacation, Paris, 1989; showed collection at Cour Carré du Louvre, October

Marcel Marongiu, fall/winter 2001–02 ready-to-wear collection. © AP/Wide World Photos.

1991; received new backing, from Japan, 1996; opened Paris boutique, 1998; ended launched ceramics collection, 1999. Exhibitions: Stockholm Design Museum, retrospective, 1998. Awards: “Venus” Best Young Designer award for spring/summer collection, 1993; Designer of the Year, Elle Sweden, 1999. Address: 9 rue Scribe, Paris 75001 France. Website: www.marcel-marongiu.com.

PUBLICATIONS

On MARONGIU:

Articles

- Nilard, Sita, “Sita Nilard Meets Fashion Upstart,” in Fashion Weekly (London), 28 February 1991.
- Baker, Lynsey, “Glad Rags to Riches,” in The Guardian (London), 13 January 1992.
- Menkes, Suzy, “The North Wind Doth Blow,” in the International Herald Tribune, 13 March 1993.

- Gordon, Mary Ellen, “Marongiu’s Spare Shapes,” in WWD, 13 September 1993.
- Spindler, Amy, “In Paris, Clothes That Look Tough and Dangerous,” in the New York Times, 16 March 1995.
- Radsken, Jill, “Fashion; One World of Fashion,” in the Boston Herald, 17 September 1999.
- Stephans, Laura, “White-Out,” in the Minneapolis-St. Paul Magazine, April 2000.
- “Diversity Training,” in WWD, 11 October 2000.
- Biography Resource Center, available online at www.galenet.com, October 2001.
- “From Style Correspondent Elsa Klensch,” available online at www.cnn.com, October 2001.
- “Pleins Feux Sur la Femme de l’été,” online at Absolu Féminin, www.absolutfeminin.com, October 2001.
- “Marcel Marongiu,” online at First View, www.firstview.com, October 2001.
- “La Scandinavie à Paris,” available online at Planet@Paris, www.planetaparis.com, 4 October 2001.

*

I believe the 1980s was all about appearance, money and “power dressing.” The consumer was suddenly unimportant as media, photographers, and stylists went too far in seeking to shock and surprise each other through unreal supermodels.

We are facing a new era where a designer has once more to be in contact with the consumer and make them feel fashion can be fun and easy. Therefore I try to do interesting, personal clothes—easy to mix and at affordable prices. There is a new generation of women with a completely new attitude toward fashion. I believe clothes are an important and interesting way of communicating; therefore it is important to make the “user” comfortable and secure, to bring out the best in them.

Silhouette is my main preoccupation and everything is in the cut and the fabric. Details are secondary and should be avoided as much as possible.

—Marcel Marongiu

* * *

Marcel Marongiu sees fashion design as a genuine means of communication. He wants people to be able to live out their fantasies by wearing his clothes and to discover what he terms “la vie plus belle,” the beautiful life.

Marongiu designs clothes that are classically elegant yet also up to date, sexy, and carefree. His style is always strong and pronounced, the cut always clean and streamlined, emphasizing the contours and shape of the human body. Stretch fabrics and natural classic fabrics, often with a small Lycra percentage, help him achieve these silhouettes. His customer is a young, modern woman, slightly tongue-in-cheek and sexy, who refuses to dress expensively. Marongiu targets this clientèle in a logical, businesslike way, and in the short time since the company’s inception in 1991, the clothes are now sold in many boutiques throughout Sweden, Great Britain, Italy, France, Japan, and the United States.

Marongiu draws his inspiration from various sources; his favorite designers are Jacques Fath and Christian Dior, two men who had a huge influence on 1940s and 1950s fashion, a period to which Marcel particularly adheres when designing. He adores hard rock music and in 1991 even named his company after the title of an Aerosmith album, Permanent Vacation. Other favorite muses are painter Nicholas de Stael, writer Graham Greene, and filmmakers Martin Scorsese and Peter Greenaway.

Marcel Marongiu, fall/winter 2001–02 ready-to-wear collection.
© AP/Wide World Photos.

Comparing two Marongiu collections perhaps gives an indication of the designer's style. The spring-summer 1994 collection was a mixture of three styles: renaissance in the fluidity and lightness of the materials, baroque in its generous volume, and classical in its Greek and Roman influences. Constructed mainly around a basic dress shape, Marcel wanted to create a collection that was soft, serene, and human, in colors making reference to nature—reds and chestnuts, the blues of dusk and twilight, and the colors of sand, beige, and white. The fall-winter collection for 1994–95 moved on from the ruralistic feeling of spring-summer and was inspired by the lifestyle and atmosphere of European cities between World War I and World War II and contrasted with shapes inspired by the Ottoman Empire. Using striped fabrics, Prince of Wales checks, mock astrakhan, and pleats, Marongiu created baggy silhouettes and distinctively superimposed tunics, smocks, or waistcoats on dresses or trousers. He also introduced colors of orange, green, and saffron yellow to his usual palette of burgundies, aubergines, and grays.

Marongiu prides himself on the fact that his clothes are 100-percent French in production. The sample collection is produced in his Paris studio but is manufactured in the Vendée, retail prices are very reasonable for a designer label. As well as clothes, the company has diversified by producing a small line of accessories, shoes, necklaces, belts, boots, bags, and hats, all in the distinctive Marongiu style. As Paris is the base of Marongiu's activities, he is now established as one of the city's leading young designers. He looks set to expand his business further, because Paris, as he describes it, is a present-day city, full of energy and romance.

Marongiu reached the breaking point with Swedish backers in 1996 when he vacated his contract and reestablished his firm with Japanese backing. Within two years, he opened a Paris boutique on the exclusive rue Saint-Honoré and established his first vendor in Nagoya, Japan. In his ninth year in the business, he debuted a first collection of leather goods. In support of the Swedish fashion maven and his impact on world tastes, Stockholm's Design Museum honored him with a retrospective exhibit.

In 1998, when the emerging trend aimed for minimalism and dressing down with flair and attitude, Marongiu lauded a new freedom from tradition. His wearable European day outfits produced the ease and comfort that women demanded. Of the push for simplification, CNN cited his faith in a voguish breeziness, "It enabled us...to have a new approach to fashion."

The year 1999 saw Marongiu at his best. He branched out into understated asymmetrical Artoria porcelainware for Limoges, plus cushions and lingerie, and snagged Elle Sweden's Designer of the Year award. In Paris, he celebrated the first decade of his Composites brand. He insisted on New York City for unveiling his 10th fashion collection. According to the Boston Herald, he expressed confidence in the switch from European venues, "You just have to be in the right place at the right moment. And New York is the right moment."

In the trendy new millennium, when he introduced a secondary line, Marongiu avoided artistic pretension to focus on chic that sells. Layering military with rock, he centered jersey frocks with soldier belts, the indispensable accessory for the with-it Marongiu look. For everyday attire, he topped crisp cotton skirts with wrapped bodices. His theme held steady for affordable goods that span the seasons.

—Kevin Almond; updated by Mary Ellen Snodgrass

MATSUDA, Mitsuhiko

Japanese designer

Born: Tokyo, 1934. Education: Graduated from Waseda University, 1958; graduated with degree in fashion design from Bunka College of Fashion, 1961. Career: Ready-to-wear designer, Sanai Company, Japan, 1961–67; traveled to Paris and the U.S., 1965; freelance designer, then formed own company, Nicole, Ltd., Tokyo, 1971; introduced divisions Monsieur Nicole, 1974, Madame Nicole, 1976, Chambre de Nicole, 1978, formed Matsuda, USA, and opened New huge influence on 1940s and 1950s fashion, a period to which Marcel particularly adheres when designing. He adores hard rock music and in 1991 even named his company after the title of an Aerosmith album, Permanent Vacation. Other favorite muses are painter Nicholas de Stael, writer Graham Greene, and filmmakers Martin Scorsese and Peter Greenaway.

Marcel Marongiu, fall/winter 2001–02 ready-to-wear collection.
© AP/Wide World Photos.

Comparing two Marongiu collections perhaps gives an indication of the designer's style. The spring-summer 1994 collection was a mixture of three styles: renaissance in the fluidity and lightness of the materials, baroque in its generous volume, and classical in its Greek and Roman influences. Constructed mainly around a basic dress shape, Marcel wanted to create a collection that was soft, serene, and human, in colors making reference to nature—reds and chestnuts, the blues of dusk and twilight, and the colors of sand, beige, and white. The fall-winter collection for 1994–95 moved on from the ruralistic feeling of spring-summer and was inspired by the lifestyle and atmosphere of European cities between World War I and World War II and contrasted with shapes inspired by the Ottoman Empire. Using striped fabrics, Prince of Wales checks, mock astrakhan, and pleats, Marongiu created baggy silhouettes and distinctively superimposed tunics, smocks, or waistcoats on dresses or trousers. He also introduced colors of orange, green, and saffron yellow to his usual palette of burgundies, aubergines, and grays.

Marongiu prides himself on the fact that his clothes are 100-percent French in production. The sample collection is produced in his Paris studio but is manufactured in the Vendée, retail prices are very reasonable for a designer label. As well as clothes, the company has diversified by producing a small line of accessories, shoes, necklaces, belts, boots, bags, and hats, all in the distinctive Marongiu style. As Paris is the base of Marongiu's activities, he is now established as one of the city's leading young designers. He looks set to expand his business further, because Paris, as he describes it, is a present-day city, full of energy and romance.

Marongiu reached the breaking point with Swedish backers in 1996 when he vacated his contract and reestablished his firm with Japanese backing. Within two years, he opened a Paris boutique on the exclusive rue Saint-Honoré and established his first vendor in Nagoya, Japan. In his ninth year in the business, he debuted a first collection of leather goods. In support of the Swedish fashion maven and his impact on world tastes, Stockholm's Design Museum honored him with a retrospective exhibit.

In 1998, when the emerging trend aimed for minimalism and dressing down with flair and attitude, Marongiu lauded a new freedom from tradition. His wearable European day outfits produced the ease and comfort that women demanded. Of the push for simplification, CNN cited his faith in a voguish breeziness, "It enabled us...to have a new approach to fashion."

The year 1999 saw Marongiu at his best. He branched out into understated asymmetrical Artoria porcelainware for Limoges, plus cushions and lingerie, and snagged Elle Sweden's Designer of the Year award. In Paris, he celebrated the first decade of his Composites brand. He insisted on New York City for unveiling his 10th fashion collection. According to the Boston Herald, he expressed confidence in the switch from European venues, "You just have to be in the right place at the right moment. And New York is the right moment."

In the trendy new millennium, when he introduced a secondary line, Marongiu avoided artistic pretension to focus on chic that sells. Layering military with rock, he centered jersey frocks with soldier belts, the indispensable accessory for the with-it Marongiu look. For everyday attire, he topped crisp cotton skirts with wrapped bodices. His theme held steady for affordable goods that span the seasons.

—Kevin Almond; updated by Mary Ellen Snodgrass

MATSUDA, Mitsuhiko

Japanese designer

Born: Tokyo, 1934. Education: Graduated from Waseda University, 1958; graduated with degree in fashion design from Bunka College of Fashion, 1961. Career: Ready-to-wear designer, Sanai Company, Japan, 1961–67; traveled to Paris and the U.S., 1965; freelance designer, then formed own company, Nicole, Ltd., Tokyo, 1971; introduced divisions Monsieur Nicole, 1974, Madame Nicole, 1976, Chambre de Nicole, 1978, formed Matsuda, USA, and opened New York City store, 1981; opened boutique in Hong Kong, 1982; launched Nicole Club, 1982, and Nicole Club for Men, 1984; Séduction de Nicole, 1986; cosmetics line introduced and Paris store opened, 1987; closed original New York showroom and reopened on Fifth Avenue, 1989; hired Yukio Kobayashi as menswear designer; Kobayashi took over womenswear, 1995; hoped to open U.S. boutiques, including a flagship in New York, 1997. Awards: So-en prize. Address: 3-13-11 Higashi, Shibuya-ku, Tokyo 150, Japan.

PUBLICATIONS

By MATSUDA:

Books

Men & Women: Images From Nicole, with Bruce Weber, Tokyo, 1983.

On MATSUDA:

Books

Koba, Matsuda, et al., Matsuda, Tokyo, 1985.

Stegemeyer, Anne, Who's Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.

Articles

Kidd, J.D., "Matsuda Collects His Dues," in DNR, 1 November 1982.
Morris, Bernadine, "From Japan: New Faces, New Shapes," in the New York Times, 14 December 1982.

"Big, Bold and Black: The Japanese Fashion Invasion," in Life, April 1983.

Trucco, Terry, "Behind the Japanese Look," in Across the Board (New York), December 1983.

Kidd, J.D., "Matsuda: The Other Japanese," in WWD, 10 April 1984.

Vogel, Carol, "A Boutique as Glamorous as the Clothes Inside (Matsuda, New York)," in the New York Times, 14 September 1989.

"Matsuda," in WWD, 29 November 1989.

Ozzard, Janet, "Matsuda Moves to Build U.S. Volume," in WWD, 19 July 1995.

"Fall 1996 Sportswear Collections—New Republic's Bookish Look and Matsuda's Future Feature," in DNR, 6 March 1996.

White, Constance C.R., "Getting Real at Matsuda," in the New York Times, 11 June 1996.

Ozzard, Janet, "Matsuda Out to Stake a Bigger Claim in U.S.," in WWD, 12 February 1997.

* * *

Mitsuhiko Matsuda's designs are picturesque, evoking historical passages and a profound sense of connection with the past and place—but at the same time are transformed through Matsuda's personal style. In a November 1989 article, Women's Wear Daily commented, "Few can tread the fine line between sophistication and adventure the way Mitsuhiko Matsuda does." The designer who probably comes the closest, Romeo Gigli, brings a similar transfiguration to his clothing.

Matsuda, of course, precedes Gigli and also differs from him in an essential way: despite the whimsical romance of his clothing which could seem to suit a Brontë heroine, Matsuda observes a stern rule of practicality borrowed from menswear. His basic canon of separate elements—the signature Matsuda silk blouse, jackets (generally elongated), trousers of various kinds, vests, and sweaters often elaborated with embroidery or other textural play—affords a versatile set of components in the sportswear tradition. He is eminently pragmatic but irrepressibly romantic and sensuous, even in appropriations of menswear to womenswear. Matsuda defined a kind of practical aesthetic dress of the late 20th century, and continued to make unique fashion inroads in the early 2000s.

In the mid-1960s, Matsuda and Kenzo sailed from Japan to Europe to make their way to Paris, the great beacon of fashion. After some six months, Matsuda returned to Japan with no money, while Kenzo stayed. Matsuda's aesthetic and cultural allegiance outside of Japan is not to Paris, but to England and America. His first company outside of Nicole Company in Japan was Matsuda USA which opened a Madison Avenue boutique in 1982. Matsuda has delved into the Anglo-American sportswear traditions as ardently as any designer, even as much as Ralph Lauren. What differentiates Matsuda from Lauren, though, is his critical, slightly adverse edge on examining traditions.

Matsuda's famous fall 1982 collections showed the impeccable tailoring of the English jackets, heavy trousers, layering, and indulgent textiles of the English countryside for men adapted for women, but with the almost impish heterogeneity of canvas aprons serving as a sign of the working class and as a reminder of the transference from male to female, female to male. As an apron customarily signified the female, Matsuda both broke and then reemployed the image of the apron from female to male and back again.

In fall-winter 1984 Matsuda's collections were seemingly inspired by Edwardian England; in fall-winter 1985, the collections seemed to step out of Burne-Jones paintings; the Moroccan embroideries of 1989 could seemingly have costumed a Paul Bowles novel. There is a further literary aspect to Matsuda's work in his preoccupation with words and letters. His clothing has been favored by artists, writers, and other creatives who have recognized a kinship with this most literary image-making style and who enjoy the practicality of clothing that mixes so easily, even improvisationally, with other separates.

There seemed to be a continuous synthesis about Matsuda's work; in fall-winter 1992, he created a homage to jazz saxophonist Miles Davis. His collections have often been presented as performance and were even affiliated with dance or visual arts. His advertising and photography have been collaborative art, presenting the clothing in secondary status to the picture. Matsuda boutiques, too, projected the absolute austerity of the design and yet showcased the lasciviousness of the designer's details. In the mid-1990s Matsuda sought to expand its brand throughout the U.S. and Europe, which included moving menswear designer Yukio Kobayashi, who had begun designing some womenswear, to the head all of the women's labels (Madame Nicole, Nicole Club, Nicole Sport and Zelda) in 1995. Matsuda himself also continued to design for women, but for the Asian markets.

In 1996 the Daily News Records (6 March 1996) praised the latest Matsuda collection by Kobayashi, stating, "Synthetics rule, and there is an unabashed modern edge. But rather than being simply a technology-driven line, Matsuda offers a sensualist's version of classic silhouettes rendered in fabrics that are light years beyond most other designer lines." There were, as well, classic or "vintage" Matsuda separates which were also warmly received. The following year, on a trip to New York, Matsuda scouted locations for possible stores. Though the Nicole brands (Madame Nicole, Nicole Sport, Boutique Nicole and others) were available in Saks Fifth Avenue and Barneys, as well as 500 stores in Asia and Europe, Matsuda hoped to bring his unique designs and growing licensed products to the U.S. in company-owned boutiques. Matsuda clients are ardently loyal, and his creations are profoundly progressive—the perfect combination for New York fashion and beyond.

—Richard Martin; updated by Nelly Rhodes

MAXFIELD PARRISH

British design firm

Founded: by designer Nigel Preston, 1972. Preston born in Reading, Berkshire, 1946; studied painting and graphic art at Dartington Hall, then interior design; by late 1960s was designing for popular musicians. Company History: Maxfield Parrish cloth collection launched, 1983; signed Fashion Stage as distributor, 1991. Company Address: 5 Congreve St., London SE17 1TJ, England.

PUBLICATIONS

On MAXFIELD PARRISH:

Books

McDowell, Colin, McDowell's Directory of Twentieth Century Fashion, Englewood Cliffs, New Jersey, 1985.

Articles

d'Aulay, Sophie, "Cologne Delivers the Crowds; Three-Day German Show Had Excitement...," in DNR, 12 August 1994.

Socha, Miles, et al., "New York Trade Shows: Getting Fancy for Spring," in WWD, 30 September 1999.

* * *

For centuries it was believed that by adorning the body with the skin of an animal, the wearer was thereby encouraged to develop its attributes. Accordingly, a lion denoted strength and courage, while a rabbit implied a rather inferior metamorphosis. In time certain types of fur, especially those more difficult to find such as ermine, became symbols of wealth, power, privilege, and—ultimately—in Western culture, eroticism. The history of wearing animal skin is varied and responses to it differ from culture to culture and have changed with time. In contemporary Western culture, there is still a certain amount of prestige attached to the fur, yet less due to pressure by groups such as Lynx, the Green movement, and PETA (People for the Ethical Treatment of Animals).

Leather, however, and its more "well-bred" counterpart suede, are still generally acceptable; in fact a whole mythology exists for the rebellious black leather jacket. These seemingly arbitrary distinctions and distortions can be set against the continuing success of the company Maxfield Parrish, whose name for some brings to mind the production of well-cut and crafted suede, sheepskin, and leather garments. The company was founded twenty years ago by designer Nigel Hayter Preston who was born in Reading, Berkshire in 1946. After studying painting and graphic design at Dartington Hall, Devon, Preston moved into interior design, toyed for a time with music, and in turn began designing clothes for his friends in the record industry.

This low-key venture took off so successfully that by the end of the 1960s Preston was producing stage outfits for names such as Suzy Quatro and Emerson, Lake & Palmer. From these humble beginnings Maxfield Parrish was to become an international label, synonymous in womenswear with the design and production of suede, leather, and sheepskin clothing which displayed unusual combinations of color—thanks to Preston's studies in fine art—and classic relaxed styles whose defined cutting betrays the discipline of a training in graphic design.

During the production cycle of the company's definitive garments it is the choosing of the skins which is of the utmost importance for the designer. Those of the softest, supplest kind are selected so they can be cut into and shaped like cloth, one of the company's trademarks. Preston handles the materials confidently, using the same methods other designers would utilize with more malleable wool, seen in classically styled outerwear such as the 1982 voluminous loose coats and jackets in soft blues, faded rose or beige, worn over softly draped skirts and cropped trousers. One of his more innovative methods is to overlap several skins to produce a montaged patchwork textured effect. This is used as a bolt of cloth from which he cuts various garments such as tubular or sarong skirts and tops.

For years, Preston and partner Brenda Knight worked in a design studio based in a Normandy chateau to creates sample collections of elegant, easy to wear garments which are then manufactured and distributed from the company's administrative base in London. By the middle 1990s Maxfield Parrish had become an international brand name in retail; the goods bearing the name were available in boutiques and stores in Europe and the United States.

Despite the fragmented nature of women's fashion at the end of the 20th century with its changing styles and alternative looks, there have always been lower profile designers more interested in producing elegant styles in the most refined materials. Maxfield Parrish is one such firm; it has relied on the ongoing development of new techniques in the cut and construction of leather, suede, and sheepskin, using only the finest materials, and availing its luxurious garments to a certain segment of society for which wearing fur or related accoutrements is of the utmost importance.

—Caroline Cox; updated by Owen James

MAX MARA SPA

Italian fashion design company

Founded: in 1951 by Achille Maramotti. Company History: Launched Commerciale Abbigliamento Company, 1976, and Marina Rinaldi, designer lines." There were, as well, classic or "vintage" Matsuda separates which were also warmly received. The following year, on a trip to New York, Matsuda scouted locations for possible stores. Though the Nicole brands (Madame Nicole, Nicole Sport, Boutique Nicole and others) were available in Saks Fifth Avenue and Barneys, as well as 500 stores in Asia and Europe, Matsuda hoped to bring his unique designs and growing licensed products to the U.S. in company-owned boutiques. Matsuda clients are ardently loyal, and his creations are profoundly progressive—the perfect combination for New York fashion and beyond.

—Richard Martin; updated by Nelly Rhodes

MAXFIELD PARRISH

British design firm

Founded: by designer Nigel Preston, 1972. Preston born in Reading, Berkshire, 1946; studied painting and graphic art at Dartington Hall, then interior design; by late 1960s was designing for popular musicians. Company History: Maxfield Parrish cloth collection launched, 1983; signed Fashion Stage as distributor, 1991. Company Address: 5 Congreve St., London SE17 1TJ, England.

PUBLICATIONS

On MAXFIELD PARRISH:

Books

McDowell, Colin, McDowell's Directory of Twentieth Century Fashion, Englewood Cliffs, New Jersey, 1985.

Articles

d'Aulay, Sophie, "Cologne Delivers the Crowds; Three-Day German Show Had Excitement...," in DNR, 12 August 1994.

Socha, Miles, et al., "New York Trade Shows: Getting Fancy for Spring," in WWD, 30 September 1999.

* * *

For centuries it was believed that by adorning the body with the skin of an animal, the wearer was thereby encouraged to develop its attributes. Accordingly, a lion denoted strength and courage, while a rabbit implied a rather inferior metamorphosis. In time certain types of fur, especially those more difficult to find such as ermine, became symbols of wealth, power, privilege, and—ultimately—in Western culture, eroticism. The history of wearing animal skin is varied and responses to it differ from culture to culture and have changed with time. In contemporary Western culture, there is still a certain amount of prestige attached to the fur, yet less due to pressure by groups such as Lynx, the Green movement, and PETA (People for the Ethical Treatment of Animals).

Leather, however, and its more "well-bred" counterpart suede, are still generally acceptable; in fact a whole mythology exists for the rebellious black leather jacket. These seemingly arbitrary distinctions and distortions can be set against the continuing success of the company Maxfield Parrish, whose name for some brings to mind the production of well-cut and crafted suede, sheepskin, and leather garments. The company was founded twenty years ago by designer Nigel Hayter Preston who was born in Reading, Berkshire in 1946. After studying painting and graphic design at Dartington Hall, Devon, Preston moved into interior design, toyed for a time with music, and in turn began designing clothes for his friends in the record industry.

This low-key venture took off so successfully that by the end of the 1960s Preston was producing stage outfits for names such as Suzy Quatro and Emerson, Lake & Palmer. From these humble beginnings Maxfield Parrish was to become an international label, synonymous in womenswear with the design and production of suede, leather, and sheepskin clothing which displayed unusual combinations of color—thanks to Preston's studies in fine art—and classic relaxed styles whose defined cutting betrays the discipline of a training in graphic design.

During the production cycle of the company's definitive garments it is the choosing of the skins which is of the utmost importance for the designer. Those of the softest, supplest kind are selected so they can be cut into and shaped like cloth, one of the company's trademarks. Preston handles the materials confidently, using the same methods other designers would utilize with more malleable wool, seen in classically styled outerwear such as the 1982 voluminous loose coats and jackets in soft blues, faded rose or beige, worn over softly draped skirts and cropped trousers. One of his more innovative methods is to overlap several skins to produce a montaged patchwork textured effect. This is used as a bolt of cloth from which he cuts various garments such as tubular or sarong skirts and tops.

For years, Preston and partner Brenda Knight worked in a design studio based in a Normandy chateau to creates sample collections of elegant, easy to wear garments which are then manufactured and distributed from the company's administrative base in London. By the middle 1990s Maxfield Parrish had become an international brand name in retail; the goods bearing the name were available in boutiques and stores in Europe and the United States.

Despite the fragmented nature of women's fashion at the end of the 20th century with its changing styles and alternative looks, there have always been lower profile designers more interested in producing elegant styles in the most refined materials. Maxfield Parrish is one such firm; it has relied on the ongoing development of new techniques in the cut and construction of leather, suede, and sheepskin, using only the finest materials, and availing its luxurious garments to a certain segment of society for which wearing fur or related accoutrements is of the utmost importance.

—Caroline Cox; updated by Owen James

MAX MARA SPA

Italian fashion design company

Founded: in 1951 by Achille Maramotti. Company History: Launched Commerciale Abbigliamento Company, 1976, and Marina Rinaldi, designer lines." There were, as well, classic or "vintage" Matsuda separates which were also warmly received. The following year, on a trip to New York, Matsuda scouted locations for possible stores. Though the Nicole brands (Madame Nicole, Nicole Sport, Boutique Nicole and others) were available in Saks Fifth Avenue and Barneys, as well as 500 stores in Asia and Europe, Matsuda hoped to bring his unique designs and growing licensed products to the U.S. in company-owned boutiques. Matsuda clients are ardently loyal, and his creations are profoundly progressive—the perfect combination for New York fashion and beyond.

—Richard Martin; updated by Nelly Rhodes

MAXFIELD PARRISH

British design firm

Founded: by designer Nigel Preston, 1972. Preston born in Reading, Berkshire, 1946; studied painting and graphic art at Dartington Hall, then interior design; by late 1960s was designing for popular musicians. Company History: Maxfield Parrish cloth collection launched, 1983; signed Fashion Stage as distributor, 1991. Company Address: 5 Congreve St., London SE17 1TJ, England.

PUBLICATIONS

On MAXFIELD PARRISH:

Books

McDowell, Colin, McDowell's Directory of Twentieth Century Fashion, Englewood Cliffs, New Jersey, 1985.

Articles

d'Aulay, Sophie, "Cologne Delivers the Crowds; Three-Day German Show Had Excitement...," in DNR, 12 August 1994.

Socha, Miles, et al., "New York Trade Shows: Getting Fancy for Spring," in WWD, 30 September 1999.

* * *

For centuries it was believed that by adorning the body with the skin of an animal, the wearer was thereby encouraged to develop its attributes. Accordingly, a lion denoted strength and courage, while a rabbit implied a rather inferior metamorphosis. In time certain types of fur, especially those more difficult to find such as ermine, became symbols of wealth, power, privilege, and—ultimately—in Western culture, eroticism. The history of wearing animal skin is varied and responses to it differ from culture to culture and have changed with time. In contemporary Western culture, there is still a certain amount of prestige attached to the fur, yet less due to pressure by groups such as Lynx, the Green movement, and PETA (People for the Ethical Treatment of Animals).

Leather, however, and its more "well-bred" counterpart suede, are still generally acceptable; in fact a whole mythology exists for the rebellious black leather jacket. These seemingly arbitrary distinctions and distortions can be set against the continuing success of the company Maxfield Parrish, whose name for some brings to mind the production of well-cut and crafted suede, sheepskin, and leather garments. The company was founded twenty years ago by designer Nigel Hayter Preston who was born in Reading, Berkshire in 1946. After studying painting and graphic design at Dartington Hall, Devon, Preston moved into interior design, toyed for a time with music, and in turn began designing clothes for his friends in the record industry.

This low-key venture took off so successfully that by the end of the 1960s Preston was producing stage outfits for names such as Suzy Quatro and Emerson, Lake & Palmer. From these humble beginnings Maxfield Parrish was to become an international label, synonymous in womenswear with the design and production of suede, leather, and sheepskin clothing which displayed unusual combinations of color—thanks to Preston's studies in fine art—and classic relaxed styles whose defined cutting betrays the discipline of a training in graphic design.

During the production cycle of the company's definitive garments it is the choosing of the skins which is of the utmost importance for the designer. Those of the softest, supplest kind are selected so they can be cut into and shaped like cloth, one of the company's trademarks. Preston handles the materials confidently, using the same methods other designers would utilize with more malleable wool, seen in classically styled outerwear such as the 1982 voluminous loose coats and jackets in soft blues, faded rose or beige, worn over softly draped skirts and cropped trousers. One of his more innovative methods is to overlap several skins to produce a montaged patchwork textured effect. This is used as a bolt of cloth from which he cuts various garments such as tubular or sarong skirts and tops.

For years, Preston and partner Brenda Knight worked in a design studio based in a Normandy chateau to creates sample collections of elegant, easy to wear garments which are then manufactured and distributed from the company's administrative base in London. By the middle 1990s Maxfield Parrish had become an international brand name in retail; the goods bearing the name were available in boutiques and stores in Europe and the United States.

Despite the fragmented nature of women's fashion at the end of the 20th century with its changing styles and alternative looks, there have always been lower profile designers more interested in producing elegant styles in the most refined materials. Maxfield Parrish is one such firm; it has relied on the ongoing development of new techniques in the cut and construction of leather, suede, and sheepskin, using only the finest materials, and availing its luxurious garments to a certain segment of society for which wearing fur or related accoutrements is of the utmost importance.

—Caroline Cox; updated by Owen James

MAX MARA SPA

Italian fashion design company

Founded: in 1951 by Achille Maramotti. Company History: Launched Commerciale Abbigliamento Company, 1976, and Marina Rinaldi, Max Mara SpA, fall/winter 2001–02 collection. © AP/Wide World Photos.

1980; comprised of five companies by 1990; opened shop in Tokyo, 1993; opened flagship store, New York, and first South American store, in Caracas, 1994; launched cosmetics line, 1997; acquired stake in Marzotto, 1997; introduced Max Mara S, and Sportmax lines, 1999; opened new SoHo flagship and celebrated 50th annual collection, 2001. Company Address: Via Fratelli Cervi 66, 42100 Reggio Emilia, Italy.

PUBLICATIONS

On MAX MARA:

Books

Alfonsi, Maria Vittoria, Leaders in Fashion, Bologna, 1983.
Soli, Pia, Il genio antipatico, Venice, 1984.

Articles

“Che cosa di chi: MaxMara,” in Vogue (Milan), October 1984.
“Pianoforte di MaxMara: giunco e sabbia da turismo coloniale,” in Vogue (Milan), February 1986.
Mower, Sarah, “Chasing the Wise Monet,” in The Guardian (London), 3 July 1986.

- Rumbold, Judy, “Grey Cells: Bright Ideas,” in The Guardian (London), 7 September 1987.
“Altre scelte da Max Mara,” in Vogue (Milan), October 1987.
Armstrong, Lisa, “The Max Factor,” in Vogue (London), October 1988.
Tredre, Roger, “A Piece of Cake,” in Fashion Weekly (London), 1 December 1988.
Pogoda, Dianne M., “Max Mara Takes Madison,” in WWD, 7 September 1994.
Conti, Samantha, “Conquering New Worlds,” in WWD, 29 August 1995.
“Max Mara Buys into Marzotto,” in WWD, 12 June 1997.
Hammond, Teena, “Max Mara’s Double Life on Rodeo,” in WWD, 14 December 1998.
Edelson, Sharon, “Max Mara Joining the SoHo Brigade,” in WWD, 27 October 1999.
Zargani, Luisa, “The Family Business,” in WWD, 22 February 2000.
Singer, Natasha, “Luxury Boutiques Start Pouring into Russia,” in WWD, 28 November 2000.
“Easy and Breezy—Spirited Sportswear Starred at Both Max Mara and Sportmax,” in WWD, 1 October 2001.

* * *

The brainchild of Achille Maramotti, Max Mara was founded in 1951 and has since become one of Italy's most successful fashion companies. Like many Italian firms, Max Mara remains a family company although, interestingly, no member of the family is a fashion designer. Instead Max Mara operates by the highly successful formula of employing well-known fashion designers to create their collections—a method described by fashion critic Colin McDowell as a form of designer “moonlighting” and which is characteristic of a number of Italian ready-to-wear companies. Designers who have created collections for Max Mara include Anne Marie Beretta, Karl Lagerfeld, Luciano Soprani, Guy Paulin, and Jean-Charles de Castelbajac. The identity of more recent Max Mara designers was a jealously-guarded secret; they were, however, acknowledged in retrospect.

The first Max Mara shop was opened in Reggio Emilia in northern Italy in 1951 and the first collection consisted of two coats and a suit which were copies of Paris couture designs. Although Achille Maramotti was officially trained as a lawyer, his family background was firmly entrenched in dressmaking since his mother had founded a tailoring school in 1923. Maramotti's vision to produce designer fashion for the mass market was remarkably farsighted at a time when haute couture still dominated fashion and high fashion ready-to-wear clothing did not exist. Like the whole fashion industry during the early 1950s, Max Mara looked to Paris as inspiration for its designs and produced garments which combined Parisian designs with their quality manufacturing techniques.

By 1969 Maramotti introduced a new line called Sport Max to cater for its younger customers, an early forerunner of diffusion lines which were not an established part of most major fashion companies. Today the company has many labels, catering to clients of all ages and sizes. Max Mara proved to be as astute in its attitude towards the importance of advertising its product as it was in the early production of fashionable ready-to-wear. As early as 1970 the company commissioned photographer Sarah Moon to capture the mood of their collections for a series of advertisements. Since then the essence of Max Mara has been captured by prominent fashion photographers including Paolo Roversi, Oliviero Toscani, Steven Meisel, and Peter Lindbergh.

Max Mara SpA, fall/winter 2001–02 collection: suede jacket and pants. © AP/Wide World Photos.

The basis of the Max Mara design philosophy is understated, easy to wear clothes in luxury fabrics, with an emphasis placed on quality of cut and production. The company consistently emphasizes the requirements of the Max Mara customer and the importance of innovation has always been carefully balanced by wearability. Luigi Maramotti, Achille's son and a director of the Max Mara group, maintains, "Our customers are led by fashion, but are never its slaves." Tailoring is one of the company's strong points, although in the softer Italian mode as opposed to the stiff British style of tailoring. Max Mara is perhaps best recognized for its coats; these garments best illustrate the firm's simplicity of style, cut in soft wools or cashmere mixes.

According to Luigi, "Clothes must be designed with an understanding of the women who wear them and the demands of their life. Max Mara's highly successful policy of employing design consultants results in clothes which serve an international demand within an Italian design concept. It has always been Max Mara's aim to give the consumer a worthy product with a high ratio of content, price, and quality." By the dawn of the 21st century, the firm was certainly serving these needs, with 700 stores in 90 countries, most recently Russia, and a recent U.S. expansion which opened shops in New York, Los Angeles, Las Vegas, Chicago, Dallas, Boston, Beverly Hills, Houston, Miami, Palm Beach, San Francisco, and Seattle. Offering three dozen lines under the Max Mara umbrella, customers are sure to find apparel and a growing mix of accessories to their liking.

—Catherine Woram; updated by Nelly Rhodes

MAXWELL, Vera

American designer

Born: Vera Huppe in New York, 22 April 1903. Family: Married Raymond J. Maxwell, 1924 (divorced, 1937); married Carlisle H. Johnson (divorced, 1945); children: R. John Maxwell. Career: Danced with the Metropolitan Opera Ballet, 1919–24; studied tailoring in London and worked as a fitting model before beginning to design in 1929; designed for New York wholesale firms, including Adler & Adler, Max Milstein, Glenhurst, 1930s and 1940s; designer of sports and tailored clothes, Brows, Jacobson & Linde, from 1937; launched firm, Vera Maxwell Originals, New York, 1947; closed firm, 1985; designed collection for Peter Lynne division, Gulf Enterprises, 1986; retired to write her memoirs. Exhibitions: Smithsonian Institution, Washington, D.C., 1970 [retrospective]; Museum of the City of New York, 1978 [retrospective]. Awards: Coty American Fashion Critics award, 1951; Neiman Marcus award, Dallas, 1955. Died: 14 January 1995, in Rincon, Puerto Rico.

PUBLICATIONS

On MAXWELL:

Books

Milbank, Caroline Rennolds, Couture: The Great Designers, New York, 1985.

New York and Hollywood Fashion: Costume Designs from the Brooklyn Museum Collection, New York, 1986.

Milbank, Caroline Rennolds, New York Fashion: The Evolution of American Style, New York, 1989.

Fashion for America! Designs in the Fashion Institute of Technology, New York, Haselmere, Surrey, 1992.

Stegemeyer, Anne, Who's Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.

Articles

Curtis, Charlotte, "Vera Maxwell: The Designer with Many Interests," in the New York Times, 1 June 1961.

Morris, Bernadine, "Fashion Retrospective at the Smithsonian for Vera Maxwell," in the New York Times, 2 March 1970.

"Vera Maxwell," in Current Biography, July 1977.

Morris, Bernadine, "Timeless Fashions at Vera Maxwell Retrospective," in the New York Times, 12 December 1980.

Shapiro, Susan, "A Classic on Seventh Avenue," in the New York Times Magazine, 2 December 1984.

Max Mara SpA, fall/winter 2001–02 collection: suede jacket and pants. © AP/Wide World Photos.

collections for a series of advertisements. Since then the essence of Max Mara has been captured by prominent fashion photographers including Paolo Roversi, Oliviero Toscani, Steven Meisel, and Peter Lindbergh.

The basis of the Max Mara design philosophy is understated, easy to wear clothes in luxury fabrics, with an emphasis placed on quality of cut and production. The company consistently emphasizes the requirements of the Max Mara customer and the importance of innovation has always been carefully balanced by wearability. Luigi Maramotti, Achille's son and a director of the Max Mara group, maintains, "Our customers are led by fashion, but are never its slaves." Tailoring is one of the company's strong points, although in the softer Italian mode as opposed to the stiff British style of tailoring. Max Mara is perhaps best recognized for its coats; these garments best illustrate the firm's simplicity of style, cut in soft wools or cashmere mixes.

According to Luigi, "Clothes must be designed with an understanding of the women who wear them and the demands of their life. Max Mara's highly successful policy of employing design consultants results in clothes which serve an international demand within an Italian design concept. It has always been Max Mara's aim to give the consumer a worthy product with a high ratio of content, price, and quality." By the dawn of the 21st century, the firm was certainly serving these needs, with 700 stores in 90 countries, most recently Russia, and a recent U.S. expansion which opened shops in New York, Los Angeles, Las Vegas, Chicago, Dallas, Boston, Beverly Hills, Houston, Miami, Palm Beach, San Francisco, and Seattle. Offering three dozen lines under the Max Mara umbrella, customers are sure to find apparel and a growing mix of accessories to their liking.

—Catherine Woram; updated by Nelly Rhodes

MAXWELL, Vera

American designer

Born: Vera Huppe in New York, 22 April 1903. Family: Married Raymond J. Maxwell, 1924 (divorced, 1937); married Carlisle H. Johnson (divorced, 1945); children: R. John Maxwell. Career: Danced with the Metropolitan Opera Ballet, 1919–24; studied tailoring in London and worked as a fitting model before beginning to design in 1929; designed for New York wholesale firms, including Adler & Adler, Max Milstein, Glenhurst, 1930s and 1940s; designer of sports and tailored clothes, Brows, Jacobson & Linde, from 1937; launched firm, Vera Maxwell Originals, New York, 1947; closed firm, 1985; designed collection for Peter Lynne division, Gulf Enterprises, 1986; retired to write her memoirs. Exhibitions: Smithsonian Institution, Washington, D.C., 1970 [retrospective]; Museum of the City of New York, 1978 [retrospective]. Awards: Coty American Fashion Critics award, 1951; Neiman Marcus award, Dallas, 1955. Died: 14 January 1995, in Rincon, Puerto Rico.

PUBLICATIONS

On MAXWELL:

Books

- Milbank, Caroline Rennolds, Couture: The Great Designers, New York, 1985.
- New York and Hollywood Fashion: Costume Designs from the Brooklyn Museum Collection*, New York, 1986.
- Milbank, Caroline Rennolds, New York Fashion: The Evolution of American Style, New York, 1989.
- Fashion for America! Designs in the Fashion Institute of Technology*, New York, Haselmere, Surrey, 1992.
- Stegemeyer, Anne, Who's Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.

Articles

- Curtis, Charlotte, "Vera Maxwell: The Designer with Many Interests," in the New York Times, 1 June 1961.
- Morris, Bernadine, "Fashion Retrospective at the Smithsonian for Vera Maxwell," in the New York Times, 2 March 1970.
- "Vera Maxwell," in Current Biography, July 1977.
- Morris, Bernadine, "Timeless Fashions at Vera Maxwell Retrospective," in the New York Times, 12 December 1980.
- Shapiro, Susan, "A Classic on Seventh Avenue," in the New York Times Magazine, 2 December 1984.

Design by Vera Maxwell, 1963. © Bettmann/CORBIS.

Schiro, Anne-Marie, "Vera Maxwell, 93, Dies; Was Early Leader of American Sportswear Designs," in the New York Times, 20 January 1995.

Obituary, "Died, Vera Maxwell," in Time, 30 January 1995.

* * *

Throughout her long career, Vera Maxwell held steadfastly to her belief that good design is timeless; decade after decade her collections bore the fruit of this philosophy. In 1935 her career was launched with the goal of achieving softer tailoring in women's suits. The silhouette of those early designs would be quite fashionable today. In 1937 she joined Brows, Jacobson & Linde as a designer of sports and tailored clothes. Active sportswear was her specialty with emphasis on skiing and riding, and her shorts, jackets, slacks, and skirts became the foundation of American sportswear separates and the staple of the industry.

Maxwell was most famous, however, for her suits and topcoats, worn for both the city and the country and characterized by excellent tailoring, choice fabrics, beautiful colors, and pragmatism. One suit, designed under her own label in 1948, a year after she opened her own business, was designed for traveling. Called "the original flight suit," it consisted of a brown and white Irish tweed coat with a plastic-lined pocket for carrying a washcloth and toothbrush, worn over slacks and blouse of a coordinating cocoa wool jersey. Ease of movement and comfort while traveling were of great importance, but the effectiveness of the design with the close fitting jersey and the fingertip length full coat, gave this particular suit a timeless modernity.

Influences on Maxwell's designs came from many sources. One of her early memories was of a visit to Vienna with her father, an aide-de-camp to the Emperor Franz Joseph, where she was impressed with the beautifully dressed military officers. Chanel was also an important influence. Long considered a classicist by the industry, Maxwell's clothes were usually described as "handsome, interesting, and eminently wearable," according to a New York Times article from November 1964. In 1960, on the occasion of the 25th anniversary of her entry into the fashion business, Maxwell pulled together her favorite designs of the past and discovered she had trouble identifying them by year, an indication of the constancy of her work.

In 1935 Maxwell visited Albert Einstein and was inspired by his Harris tweed jacket which she adapted and paired with a gray flannel skirt and pants, giving an important boost to the concept of separates and what she called the "weekend wardrobe." During the 1940s she designed a coverall, which she considered the first jumpsuit for the women doing war work at the Sperry Gyroscope Corporation. In 1951 she was honored with a Coty Special award for coats and suits, and in 1955 came the Neiman Marcus award, both during one of her most prolific decades. In 1970 she was given a retrospective at the Smithsonian Institution.

Ever concerned with attractive and convenient clothes and wardrobes that could travel well, and always on the lookout for new means to achieve them, she took a significant risk in 1971 to purchase 30,000 yards of a new fabric called Ultrasuede produced by a company in Japan. Initially buyers were afraid to purchase clothes made of the new material, but time proved Maxwell right and the fabric became identified with her designs. Though Maxwell closed her business in 1985, she was again designing in 1986. Then she once again announced her retirement to set about writing her memoirs, which were never completed.

Vera Maxwell inspired a loyal following of fashion-conscious women who sought the timeless wearability of her clothes. She ranked among the top of the group of craftspeople-designers who flourished during the 1930s and 1940s in New York and who created the well-tailored but casual look long associated with American fashion.

—Jean Druesedow

McCARDELL, Claire

American designer

Born: Frederick, Maryland, 24 May 1905. Education: Attended Hood College, Maryland, 1923–25, and Parsons School of Design, New York and Paris, 1926–29. Family: Married Irving D. Harris, 1943. Career: Fashion model, knitwear designer, Robert Turk, Inc., New York, 1929–31; designer, Townley Frocks, New York, 1931–38; designer, Hattie Carnegie, New York, 1938–40; designer, Claire McCordell for Townley Frocks, New York, 1940–58; children's line, Baby McCordells, introduced, 1956. Exhibitions: Retrospective, Frank Perls Gallery, Beverly Hills, California, 1953; Innovative Contemporary Fashion: Adri and McCordell, Smithsonian Institution, Washington, D.C., 1971; Three Women: Madeleine Vionnet, Claire McCordell and Rei Kawakubo, Fashion Institute of Technology, New York, 1987. Awards: Mademoiselle Merit award, 1943; Coty American Fashion Critics award, 1944, 1958; Neiman Marcus award, 1948; Women's National Press Club award, 1950; Parsons

Design by Vera Maxwell, 1963. © Bettmann/CORBIS.

Schiro, Anne-Marie, "Vera Maxwell, 93, Dies; Was Early Leader of American Sportswear Designs," in the New York Times, 20 January 1995.

Obituary, "Died, Vera Maxwell," in Time, 30 January 1995.

* * *

Throughout her long career, Vera Maxwell held steadfastly to her belief that good design is timeless; decade after decade her collections bore the fruit of this philosophy. In 1935 her career was launched with the goal of achieving softer tailoring in women's suits. The silhouette of those early designs would be quite fashionable today. In 1937 she joined Brows, Jacobson & Linde as a designer of sports and tailored clothes. Active sportswear was her specialty with emphasis on skiing and riding, and her shorts, jackets, slacks, and skirts became the foundation of American sportswear separates and the staple of the industry.

Maxwell was most famous, however, for her suits and topcoats, worn for both the city and the country and characterized by excellent tailoring, choice fabrics, beautiful colors, and pragmatism. One suit, designed under her own label in 1948, a year after she opened her own business, was designed for traveling. Called "the original flight suit," it consisted of a brown and white Irish tweed coat with a plastic-lined pocket for carrying a washcloth and toothbrush, worn over slacks and blouse of a coordinating cocoa wool jersey. Ease of movement and comfort while traveling were of great importance, but the effectiveness of the design with the close fitting jersey and the fingertip length full coat, gave this particular suit a timeless modernity.

Influences on Maxwell's designs came from many sources. One of her early memories was of a visit to Vienna with her father, an aide-de-camp to the Emperor Franz Joseph, where she was impressed with the beautifully dressed military officers. Chanel was also an important influence. Long considered a classicist by the industry, Maxwell's clothes were usually described as "handsome, interesting, and eminently wearable," according to a New York Times article from November 1964. In 1960, on the occasion of the 25th anniversary of her entry into the fashion business, Maxwell pulled together her favorite designs of the past and discovered she had trouble identifying them by year, an indication of the constancy of her work.

In 1935 Maxwell visited Albert Einstein and was inspired by his Harris tweed jacket which she adapted and paired with a gray flannel skirt and pants, giving an important boost to the concept of separates and what she called the "weekend wardrobe." During the 1940s she designed a coverall, which she considered the first jumpsuit for the women doing war work at the Sperry Gyroscope Corporation. In 1951 she was honored with a Coty Special award for coats and suits, and in 1955 came the Neiman Marcus award, both during one of her most prolific decades. In 1970 she was given a retrospective at the Smithsonian Institution.

Ever concerned with attractive and convenient clothes and wardrobes that could travel well, and always on the lookout for new means to achieve them, she took a significant risk in 1971 to purchase 30,000 yards of a new fabric called Ultrasuede produced by a company in Japan. Initially buyers were afraid to purchase clothes made of the new material, but time proved Maxwell right and the fabric became identified with her designs. Though Maxwell closed her business in 1985, she was again designing in 1986. Then she once again announced her retirement to set about writing her memoirs, which were never completed.

Vera Maxwell inspired a loyal following of fashion-conscious women who sought the timeless wearability of her clothes. She ranked among the top of the group of craftspeople-designers who flourished during the 1930s and 1940s in New York and who created the well-tailored but casual look long associated with American fashion.

—Jean Druesedow

McCARDELL, Claire

American designer

Born: Frederick, Maryland, 24 May 1905. Education: Attended Hood College, Maryland, 1923–25, and Parsons School of Design, New York and Paris, 1926–29. Family: Married Irving D. Harris, 1943. Career: Fashion model, knitwear designer, Robert Turk, Inc., New York, 1929–31; designer, Townley Frocks, New York, 1931–38; designer, Hattie Carnegie, New York, 1938–40; designer, Claire McCordell for Townley Frocks, New York, 1940–58; children's line, Baby McCordells, introduced, 1956. Exhibitions: Retrospective, Frank Perls Gallery, Beverly Hills, California, 1953; Innovative Contemporary Fashion: Adri and McCordell, Smithsonian Institution, Washington, D.C., 1971; Three Women: Madeleine Vionnet, Claire McCordell and Rei Kawakubo, Fashion Institute of Technology, New York, 1987. Awards: Mademoiselle Merit award, 1943; Coty American Fashion Critics award, 1944, 1958; Neiman Marcus award, 1948; Women's National Press Club award, 1950; Parsons medal for Distinguished Achievement, 1956. Died: 22 March 1958, in New York.

Claire McCardell in 1940. © Bettmann/CORBIS.

PUBLICATIONS

By McCARDELL:

Books

What Shall I Wear? The What, Where, When, and How Much of Fashion, New York, 1956.

On McCARDELL:

Books

Williams, Beryl, Fashion is Our Business, Philadelphia, 1945.

Lee, Sarah Tomerlin, editor, American Fashion: The Life and Lines of Adrian, Mainbocher, McCardell, Norell, Trigère, New York, 1975.

Milbank, Caroline Rennolds, Couture: The Great Designers, New York, 1985.

New York and Hollywood Fashion: Costume Designs from the Brooklyn Museum Collection, New York, 1986.

Koda, Harold, Richard Martin and Laura Sinderbrand, Three Women: Madeleine Vionnet, Claire McCardell, and Rei Kawakubo (exhibition catalogue), New York, 1987.

- Milbank, Caroline Rennolds, New York Fashion: The Evolution of American Style, New York, 1989.
 Steele, Valerie, Women of Fashion: Twentieth Century Designers, New York, 1991.
 Stegemeyer, Anne, Who's Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.

Articles

- "Claire McCardell," in Current Biography (New York), November 1954.
 "Designers Who Are Making News," in American Fabrics and Fashions (New York), No. 38, 1956.
 "Claire McCardell" obituary, in the New York Times, 23 March 1958.
 Morris, Bernadine, "Looking Back at McCardell: It's a Lot Like Looking at Today," in the New York Times, 24 May 1972.
 Beckett, Kathleen, "Designing Women," in Vogue (New York), March 1987.
 Weinstein, Jeff, "Vionnet, McCardell, Kawakubo: Why There Are Three Great Women Artists," in Village Voice (New York), 31 March 1987.
 Drier, Deborah, "Designing Women," in Art in America (New York), May 1987.
 Yusuf, Nilgin, "Form and Function," in Elle, June 1990.
 "Claire McCardell: Designer of Fashion for All-American Beauties (The 100 Most Important Americans of the 20th Century)," Life, Fall 1990.
 Als, Hilton, "Suited for Leisure," in Artforum (New York), 4 November 1994.

* * *

Claire McCardell was the founder of American ready-to-wear fashion, and in doing so defined what has become known as the American Look. She created casual but sophisticated clothes with a functional design, which reflected the lifestyles of American women. McCardell's design philosophy was that clothes should be practical, comfortable, and feminine. Capitalizing on the World War II restrictions on the availability of French fashions and fabrics, McCardell designed simple, inexpensive clothes under the label Townley Frocks by Claire McCardell and later Claire McCardell Clothes by Townley.

The first successful silhouette McCardell designed was the Monastic, a dartless, waistless, bias-cut, tent-style dress that could be worn with or without a belt. McCardell had several other successful designs which stayed in her collections, with slight changes, for years. In 1942 McCardell introduced the Popover, a wrap around, unstructured, utilitarian denim dress to be worn over smarter clothes. This garment was made in response to a clothing request by Harper's Bazaar for women whose hired help had left for wartime factory work. The Popover evolved in later collections into dresses, coats, beach wraps, and hostess dresses.

McCardell was known for many other innovations and she experimented with unconventional fabrics for various silhouettes. Her wool jersey bathing suits and cotton-diaper swimsuit are examples of nontraditional fabric use. Madras cotton halter-style full-length hostess gowns were shown for evening. Her design trademarks were double top-stitching, brass hardware replacing buttons with decorative hooks, spaghetti ties, large patch pockets, and Empire waists. McCardell also brought denim to the fashion forefront as a dress fabric, as well as mattress ticking, calicos, and wool fleece. Manmade fibers, too, were a source of innovation. She also loved leotards, hoods, pedal pushers, and dirndl skirts. Surprising color combinations were indicative of McCardell's work.

Design by Claire McCardell, 1946. © Genevieve Naylor/CORBIS.

Ever resourceful, McCardell viewed the 1940s wartime restrictions as challenging. Shoes were heavily rationed, so McCardell promoted the ballet slipper as street wear, often covered in coordinating or matching fabrics to her clothing ensembles.

The inspirations for McCardell's designs were many. She relied primarily on her own intuition as a woman, believing that many other women had the same needs for their wardrobes. "Most of my ideas," stated McCardell, "come from trying to solve my own problems." She sought to find solutions by analyzing the various needs of women, concluding that essentially clothes must be functional. While skiing she found her head became quite cold and thus designed winter playclothes with hoods. She also recognized how cars and airplanes had changed the American travel lifestyle dramatically; women needed clothes that would travel well. Accordingly, McCardell designed a six-piece interchangeable and coordinated wardrobe of separates, enabling traveling woman to produce many combinations from just a few garments.

McCardell rarely looked to contemporary French fashion for inspiration, as many other American designers did before and after World War II. She recognized the differing needs of American women from the European couture client and the potential of the larger ready-to-wear market in the United States. In this way she was able to define the American style of casual elegance. Back in 1926 during her sophomore year at Parsons School of Design, McCardell studied in Paris. While there she was able to buy samples from the French couturier Madeleine Vionnet and study the pattern and cut of her garments. Vionnet's influence was evident in McCardell's work; though McCardell did not work in the couture tradition, she was able to create ready-to-wear clothing by simplifying Vionnet's cut. She incorporated the bias cut into her designs, both for aesthetic as well as functional effects. From Vionnet, McCardell said she learned "the way clothes worked, the way they felt."

The beauty of McCardell's clothes lay in the cut which then produced a clean, functional garment. Her clothes accentuated the female form without artificial understructures and padding. Rather than use shoulder pads, McCardell used the cut of the sleeve to enhance the shoulder. Relying on the bias cut, she created fitted bodices and swimsuits which flattered the wearer. Full circle skirts, neatly belted or sashed at the waist without crinolines underneath, a mandatory accessory for the New Look, created the illusion of the wasp waist. McCardell clothes often had adjustable components, such as drawstring necklines and waists, to accommodate many different body types.

Claire McCardell's greatest contribution to fashion history was in creating and defining the American Look. Her inspiration is evident in the work of the many fashion designers who followed her.

—Margo Seaman

McCARTNEY, Stella

English designer

Born: Notting Hill, England, 1972. Education: Attended Central St. Martin's College of Art & Design, London, graduated in 1995. Family: Daughter of musician Paul and photographer Linda (deceased) McCartney. Career: Interned for Christian Lacroix, apprenticed with Knightsbridge tailor Edward Sexton; launched her first line, "Stella," of lingerie-modeled dresses in London, 1995; became head designer of Chloé in Paris, 1997; first Paris show at the Ritz included her spring-summer collection, 1997; introduced spring collection, 1997; moved to Gucci, 2001; launched her own label, 2001. Awards: VH1 and Vogue Designer of the Year, 2001. Address: Eighth arrondissement near the Palais de L'Elysse, Paris, France.

Stella McCartney, spring/summer 2002 ready-to-wear collection.
© Reuters NewMedia Inc./CORBIS.

PUBLICATIONS

By McCARTNEY:

Articles

"My Chloé Diary," in Harper's Bazaar (New York), January 1998.

On McCARTNEY:

Articles

"Magical Mystery Couture," in People, 3 July 1995.

Mower, Sarah, "Chloe's Girl," in Harper's Bazaar (New York), June 1997.

"Stella McCartney," in People, 29 December 1997.

Bellafante, Ginia, "Romance," in Time, 6 April 1998.

Chambers, Veronica, "She Grooves; Will She Go?" in Newsweek, 18 October 1999.

"Women on Top," in Harper's Bazaar, April 2001.

Menkes, Suzy, "A Move to Gucci for McCartney," in the International Herald Tribune, 10 April 2001.

playclothes with hoods. She also recognized how cars and airplanes had changed the American travel lifestyle dramatically; women needed clothes that would travel well. Accordingly, McCardell designed a six-piece interchangeable and coordinated wardrobe of separates, enabling traveling woman to produce many combinations from just a few garments.

McCardell rarely looked to contemporary French fashion for inspiration, as many other American designers did before and after World War II. She recognized the differing needs of American women from the European couture client and the potential of the larger ready-to-wear market in the United States. In this way she was able to define the American style of casual elegance. Back in 1926 during her sophomore year at Parsons School of Design, McCardell studied in Paris. While there she was able to buy samples from the French couturier Madeleine Vionnet and study the pattern and cut of her garments. Vionnet's influence was evident in McCardell's work; though McCardell did not work in the couture tradition, she was able to create ready-to-wear clothing by simplifying Vionnet's cut. She incorporated the bias cut into her designs, both for aesthetic as well as functional effects. From Vionnet, McCardell said she learned "the way clothes worked, the way they felt."

The beauty of McCardell's clothes lay in the cut which then produced a clean, functional garment. Her clothes accentuated the female form without artificial understructures and padding. Rather than use shoulder pads, McCardell used the cut of the sleeve to enhance the shoulder. Relying on the bias cut, she created fitted bodices and swimsuits which flattered the wearer. Full circle skirts, neatly belted or sashed at the waist without crinolines underneath, a mandatory accessory for the New Look, created the illusion of the wasp waist. McCardell clothes often had adjustable components, such as drawstring necklines and waists, to accommodate many different body types.

Claire McCardell's greatest contribution to fashion history was in creating and defining the American Look. Her inspiration is evident in the work of the many fashion designers who followed her.

—Margo Seaman

McCARTNEY, Stella

English designer

Born: Notting Hill, England, 1972. Education: Attended Central St. Martin's College of Art & Design, London, graduated in 1995. Family: Daughter of musician Paul and photographer Linda (deceased) McCartney. Career: Interned for Christian Lacroix, apprenticed with Knightsbridge tailor Edward Sexton; launched her first line, "Stella," of lingerie-modeled dresses in London, 1995; became head designer of Chloé in Paris, 1997; first Paris show at the Ritz included her spring-summer collection, 1997; introduced spring collection, 1997; moved to Gucci, 2001; launched her own label, 2001. Awards: VH1 and Vogue Designer of the Year, 2001. Address: Eighth arrondissement near the Palais de L'Elysse, Paris, France.

Stella McCartney, spring/summer 2002 ready-to-wear collection.
© Reuters NewMedia Inc./CORBIS.

PUBLICATIONS

By McCARTNEY:

Articles

"My Chloé Diary," in Harper's Bazaar (New York), January 1998.

On McCARTNEY:

Articles

"Magical Mystery Couture," in People, 3 July 1995.

Mower, Sarah, "Chloe's Girl," in Harper's Bazaar (New York), June 1997.

"Stella McCartney," in People, 29 December 1997.

Bellafante, Ginia, "Romance," in Time, 6 April 1998.

Chambers, Veronica, "She Grooves; Will She Go?" in Newsweek, 18 October 1999.

"Women on Top," in Harper's Bazaar, April 2001.

Menkes, Suzy, "A Move to Gucci for McCartney," in the International Herald Tribune, 10 April 2001.

Stella McCartney, spring/summer 2002 ready-to-wear collection.
© Reuters NewMedia Inc./CORBIS.

* * *

The name itself implies fame, but it can't all be attributed to the ever-popular Beatles legend, Paul McCartney, or his photographer wife, the late Linda Eastman McCartney. Barely in her 30s, the British designer Stella McCartney had already introduced several clothing lines of her own, not to mention becoming head designer of the House of Chloé.

Living in her Notting Hill flat, McCartney seemed to have it all. Guests flocked to experience the inviting atmosphere and sensual modeling episodes. Sextop slips, metal-mesh minis, and revealing knit dresses were McCartney's greatest accomplishment up to 1997. But her carefree, living-for-the-moment lifestyle came to an end when the offer to head Chloé was presented before her—an offer any young designer couldn't refuse.

Hired only 18 months out of design school, McCartney's flirtatious style was a perfect fit with Chloé. Although young and inexperienced, her determination and bold personality earned her quite the success she deserved. In 1999 Chloé pulled in an amazing $421.4 million, not including the opening of its first subsidiary in 20 years, a Chloé boutique in Manhattan.

With the help of high-profile friends Naomi Campbell and Kate Moss, McCartney successfully took over veteran designer Karl Lagerfeld's place at Chloé. Whether it was for a fitting, fashion show, photo shoot, or merely moral support, Campbell and Moss helped pave the road for McCartney. "Stella's a friend of mine. I wanted to help her out on this," Campbell said in 1995 at the start of McCartney's career. While Chloé continued to thrive with newcomer McCartney, rumors still swirled about the young designer's path. People thought she was too young, didn't have an understanding of the design world, and even worse, was hired based on her father's name. "I don't think the Chloé chiefs would be stupid enough to ride a whole company on me because of who my father is. I'm the breath of fresh air that Chloé needs," McCartney told People in January 1998.

As McCartney transitioned from London to Paris, she kept a diary describing in detail her day-to-day experiences. Some inserts focused on Paris life in general, and some on what she was feeling. Learning the ins and outs of Paris seemed to come quickly for her; it was in the designing world she had yet to prove herself. Near the end of the journal, dated the morning of 5 October 1997, McCartney wrote: "To me, this spring-summer 1998 collection is more than a fashion show, it is a statement. Fashion shows come and go, don't they? They don't change the world, do they? But these clothes that you see parading by are my way of speaking to women, to the girls of my own generation, but even more to the women who are old enough to be my mother, and especially to my mother, Linda, to whom this collection is dedicated."

McCartney often commuted back and forth between London and Paris and also did a fair amount of travel within Paris. As she met more people and visited more design studios, it became clear she needed to reduce the gap between male and female clothing. The idea may not have surfaced completely, but what did develop was her 1998 spring-summer collection. The line resembled those of her London days yet with a flare of sophistication and modern maturity. Although other designers would agree that McCartney's designs portray a "girlish" and feminine style, the designer herself believes her collections have grown since her time in London and are based on romantic tradition. "My mom always collected thrift-shop stuff—especially Italian slips," McCartney commented in an April 1998 Time magazine article. "I've always loved underwear and antique fabrics and lace for all their soft texture."

Probably the greatest challenge McCartney faced at Chloé was her ability to appeal to both 25-year-olds as well as 45-year-olds. In her spring 1998 collection, McCartney featured garments that indicated sensuality. Wide-leg pantsuits, delicately patterned knee-length day dresses, lace-trimmed slip dresses, spaghetti-strap tops, and translucent minis are at the heart of what the designer loves most—femininity. But the look appealed to a much more youthful audience. With the influence of President Mounir Moufarrige and Lagerfeld, McCartney's level of detail helped her address the age-insensitive issue. Her styles became as popular among 20-somethings as they were to women in their 40s and 50s. McCartney's clothing portrays more than a fashion statement; her fashions often characterize a woman's personality, intellect, and sexuality. McCartney's young, flirtatious style has slowly transformed into elegant fun.

The question hanging in the air, however, was how long McCartney planned to stay at Chloé. The young and inspiring designer had only begun to set out on her career; opportunities were already bombarding the once "girlish" designer. As for her role at Chloé, some said it would soon diminish, as she has been known to move from one pursuit to another rather quickly in the past. McCartney took Chloé to a level most people never anticipated, which was exactly the reason many foresaw another major career move in the youthful designer's life. Industry insiders speculated there wasn't enough room for McCartney to grow at Chloé—at least not to the extent she desired. And they were right: life at Chloé was short-lived for McCartney. The designer's bold, captivating style intrigued Domenico De Sole, president and chief executive of the Gucci Group. In April 2001, Gucci announced it had signed McCartney, who would soon launch her own label under its banner.

—Diana Idzelis

McCLINTOCK, Jessica

American designer

Born: Jessica Gagnon in Presque Isle, Maine, 19 June 1930. Education: Studied at Boston University; received Bachelor of Arts degree, San Jose State University, California, 1963; no formal training in design. Family: Married Al Staples, 1949 (died, 1964); married Fred McClintock (divorced, 1967); children: Scott. Career: School teacher, Marblehead, Massachusetts, 1966–68, Long Island, New York, 1968, and Sunnyvale, California, 1964–65 and 1968–69; partner/designer, Gunne Sax Company, San Francisco, from 1969, company renamed Jessica McClintock, 1986; girls line and Jessica McClintock Contemporary line introduced, 1979; Romantic Renaissance bridal collection introduced, 1980; Scott McClintock line of women's clothes introduced, 1982; first sleepwear collection presented, 1985; Scott McClintock sportswear line introduced, 1986; Jessica McClintock Collection introduced, 1987; first boutique opened, San Francisco, 1980; second shop opened, Costa Mesa, California, 1986; signature fragrance introduced, 1987; Beverly Hills store opened, 1991; introduced fabrics; new Young at Heart bed and bath line, 1996; signed license with Barth & Dreyfuss for kitchen accessories line, 1996; opened two new stores, 1998; had 27 shops by 30th anniversary, 1999; signed license for 50-piece furniture collection, 2000; introduced area rugs, 2001; fragrances include Jessica McClintock, Jessica, and Jess. Awards: Ernie award, 1981; California Designers award, 1985; American Printed Fabrics Council Tommy award, 1986; Press Appreciation award, 1986; Dallas Fashion award, 1988; Merit award in Design, 1989. Address: 1400 16th Street, San Francisco, CA 94103, U.S.A. Website: www.jessicamcclintock.com.

PUBLICATIONS

On McCLINTOCK:

Books

- Delgado, Gary, How the Empress Gets New Clothes: Asian Immigrant Women Advocates vs. Jessica McClintock Inc., Oakland, California, 1994.
 Stegemeyer, Anne, Who's Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.

Articles

- Wilhelm, Maria, "Jessica McClintock Weaves Romantic Fashion," in People Weekly, 17 September 1984.
 Mercer, Marilyn, "Space to Dream," in Working Woman, May 1986.
 Evans, Karen, "Meet Designer Jessica McClintock," in Seventeen, April 1987.
 Simpson, Blaise, "Jessica McClintock: Marketing Romance," in WWD, 5 January 1988.
 Dunhill, Priscilla, "Jessica McClintock: An Endearing Quality," in Victoria (New York), August 1989.
 Frinton, Sandra, "The Younger Set: Bibb Gets McClintock to Woo the Girls," in HFN (The Weekly Newspaper for the Home Furnishing Network), 15 April 1996.
 Orenstein, Alison F., "A Brand Launch: Barth Label to Include New Licenses," in HFN (Weekly Newspaper for the Home Furnishing Network), 23 September 1996.
 Barrett, Joyce, "Labor Dept. Releases Quarterly Violations List," in WWD, 22 November 1996.
 "Pretty in Pink," in Time, 2 June 1997.
 "The Top 100," in WWD, 19 November 1997.
 Wilson, Eric, "Jessica McClintock at Thirty: From Rickback to Riches," in WWD, 9 March 1999.
 Power, Denise, "McClintock Revises its Web Site Strategy," in WWD, 19 January 2000.
 Goldbogen, Jessica, "McClintock: From Dresses to Dressers," in HFN (Weekly Newspaper for the Home Furnishing Network), 11 September 2000.
 "Bashian to Unveil Jessica McClintock Rug Collection at High Point Market," in HFN (Weekly Newspaper for the Home Furnishing Network), 17 September 2001.

* * *

At the height of the hippie movement, Jessica McClintock joined the San Franciscan Gunne Sax Company to design their long, calico, lace-trimmed dresses, very popular with the young. Besides "granny" dresses, McClintock also designed lace-trimmed denim clothes and combined lace with linen. By the 1970s she had added prom dresses and wedding gowns, continuing to use lavish lace trim, which had become her trademark.

When the more contemporary Jessica McClintock line was introduced in 1979, Gunne Sax became the little girls' division, for which the calico, ruffled lace trimmed dresses were eminently suitable. In her San Francisco shop McClintock sold accessories, cosmetics, and her higher-priced designs, but it was for her feminine alternative to the hard-edged emerging high tech trends in fashion that she became known. A moderately priced Scott McClintock line specialized in misses' dresses and sportswear, all with the romantic McClintock look, but more sophisticated than Gunne Sax.

Gunne Sax dresses for teenagers featured ribbons, ruffles, Victorian lace collars, ballerina length skirts. In the mid-1980s McClintock drew her inspiration for misses' dresses from the 1920s, combining straight silhouettes, loose enough for maternity wear, with Victorian details of lace insertions, peplums, or high collars. McClintock designed 2,500 outfits per year, each with her unique romantic touches and femininity. The Jessica McClintock label, aimed at would soon diminish, as she has been known to move from one pursuit to another rather quickly in the past. McCartney took Chloé to a level most people never anticipated, which was exactly the reason many foresaw another major career move in the youthful designer's life. Industry insiders speculated there wasn't enough room for McCartney to grow at Chloé—at least not to the extent she desired. And they were right: life at Chloé was short-lived for McCartney. The designer's bold, captivating style intrigued Domenico De Sole, president and chief executive of the Gucci Group. In April 2001, Gucci announced it had signed McCartney, who would soon launch her own label under its banner.

—Diana Idzelis

McCLINTOCK, Jessica

American designer

Born: Jessica Gagnon in Presque Isle, Maine, 19 June 1930. Education: Studied at Boston University; received Bachelor of Arts degree, San Jose State University, California, 1963; no formal training in design. Family: Married Al Staples, 1949 (died, 1964); married Fred McClintock (divorced, 1967); children: Scott. Career: School teacher, Marblehead, Massachusetts, 1966–68, Long Island, New York, 1968, and Sunnyvale, California, 1964–65 and 1968–69; partner/designer, Gunne Sax Company, San Francisco, from 1969, company renamed Jessica McClintock, 1986; girls line and Jessica McClintock Contemporary line introduced, 1979; Romantic Renaissance bridal collection introduced, 1980; Scott McClintock line of women's clothes introduced, 1982; first sleepwear collection presented, 1985; Scott McClintock sportswear line introduced, 1986; Jessica McClintock Collection introduced, 1987; first boutique opened, San Francisco, 1980; second shop opened, Costa Mesa, California, 1986; signature fragrance introduced, 1987; Beverly Hills store opened, 1991; introduced fabrics; new Young at Heart bed and bath line, 1996; signed license with Barth & Dreyfuss for kitchen accessories line, 1996; opened two new stores, 1998; had 27 shops by 30th anniversary, 1999; signed license for 50-piece furniture collection, 2000; introduced area rugs, 2001; fragrances include Jessica McClintock, Jessica, and Jess. Awards: Ernie award, 1981; California Designers award, 1985; American Printed Fabrics Council Tommy award, 1986; Press Appreciation award, 1986; Dallas Fashion award, 1988; Merit award in Design, 1989. Address: 1400 16th Street, San Francisco, CA 94103, U.S.A. Website: www.jessicamcclintock.com.

PUBLICATIONS

On McCLINTOCK:

Books

- Delgado, Gary, How the Empress Gets New Clothes: Asian Immigrant Women Advocates vs. Jessica McClintock Inc., Oakland, California, 1994.
 Stegemeyer, Anne, Who's Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.

Articles

- Wilhelm, Maria, "Jessica McClintock Weaves Romantic Fashion," in People Weekly, 17 September 1984.
 Mercer, Marilyn, "Space to Dream," in Working Woman, May 1986.
 Evans, Karen, "Meet Designer Jessica McClintock," in Seventeen, April 1987.
 Simpson, Blaise, "Jessica McClintock: Marketing Romance," in WWD, 5 January 1988.
 Dunhill, Priscilla, "Jessica McClintock: An Endearing Quality," in Victoria (New York), August 1989.
 Frinton, Sandra, "The Younger Set: Bibb Gets McClintock to Woo the Girls," in HFN (The Weekly Newspaper for the Home Furnishing Network), 15 April 1996.
 Orenstein, Alison F., "A Brand Launch: Barth Label to Include New Licenses," in HFN (Weekly Newspaper for the Home Furnishing Network), 23 September 1996.
 Barrett, Joyce, "Labor Dept. Releases Quarterly Violations List," in WWD, 22 November 1996.
 "Pretty in Pink," in Time, 2 June 1997.
 "The Top 100," in WWD, 19 November 1997.
 Wilson, Eric, "Jessica McClintock at Thirty: From Rickback to Riches," in WWD, 9 March 1999.
 Power, Denise, "McClintock Revises its Web Site Strategy," in WWD, 19 January 2000.
 Goldbogen, Jessica, "McClintock: From Dresses to Dressers," in HFN (Weekly Newspaper for the Home Furnishing Network), 11 September 2000.
 "Bashian to Unveil Jessica McClintock Rug Collection at High Point Market," in HFN (Weekly Newspaper for the Home Furnishing Network), 17 September 2001.

* * *

At the height of the hippie movement, Jessica McClintock joined the San Franciscan Gunne Sax Company to design their long, calico, lace-trimmed dresses, very popular with the young. Besides "granny" dresses, McClintock also designed lace-trimmed denim clothes and combined lace with linen. By the 1970s she had added prom dresses and wedding gowns, continuing to use lavish lace trim, which had become her trademark.

When the more contemporary Jessica McClintock line was introduced in 1979, Gunne Sax became the little girls' division, for which the calico, ruffled lace trimmed dresses were eminently suitable. In her San Francisco shop McClintock sold accessories, cosmetics, and her higher-priced designs, but it was for her feminine alternative to the hard-edged emerging high tech trends in fashion that she became known. A moderately priced Scott McClintock line specialized in misses' dresses and sportswear, all with the romantic McClintock look, but more sophisticated than Gunne Sax.

Gunne Sax dresses for teenagers featured ribbons, ruffles, Victorian lace collars, ballerina length skirts. In the mid-1980s McClintock drew her inspiration for misses' dresses from the 1920s, combining straight silhouettes, loose enough for maternity wear, with Victorian details of lace insertions, peplums, or high collars. McClintock designed 2,500 outfits per year, each with her unique romantic touches and femininity. The Jessica McClintock label, aimed at women in their 20s and 30s, offered special occasion ready-to-wear at relatively moderate designer label prices.

The use of man-made materials (polyester, acetate, nylon, rayon) made the lavishly decorated heirloom looks possible at a lower price. Cotton and linen are also used by McClintock, resulting in tea-gown-length Edwardian-inspired dresses in ecru, suitable not only for attendance at weddings, but for wear by the bride for a second or third, less formal, occasion. McClintock expanded into sleepwear, also romantic and nostalgic.

McClintock studied what teenagers wore to incorporate new trends, such as sundresses or the can-can skirts of 1987, and interpreted them in her own manner. Unlike Jeanne Lanvin's matching mother-daughter outfits, McClintock designed coordinating little girl-mother or older sister dresses. The fabrics, colors, and trims might be the same, but the styling and placement of trimmings differed. In keeping with mainstream fashion's more opulent evening looks, McClintock began adding deep color and black velvets into her collection, creating long, unabashedly romantic gowns. Tight décolleté bodices edged with heavy white or metallic gold Venetian lace contrasted with lush velvets falling to the floor, sometimes with a bustle effect, were more demurely echoed in little girls' dresses reminiscent of The Little Princess.

McClintock dresses were the sort that might be taken out of a trunk to be worn over and over again when a woman tires of her mundane everyday clothes. For juniors, the Scott McClintock line even offered short black velvet halter dresses, without any lace, paired with black velvet jackets. Additional sophistication was developed by the use of velvets brocaded with metallic, stiff bouffant taffeta skirts topped by metallic floral brocade jackets. More recent additions were a short sexy strapless black lace dress sparkling with all-over paillettes.

The McClintock name ran into some trouble in the middle 1990s due to sweatshop allegations, especially with the group Asian Immigrant Women Advocates. One of the McClintock's contractors was investigated by the U.S. Department of Labor, and due to several violations the McClintock business was listed among the violators published in the quarterly Garment Enforcement Report. McClintock vowed to investigate the charges and problems, and in subsequent Dept. of Labor reports was on both the violators list as well as the Trendsetter's list of businesses setting an excellent labor example. Commenting to Women's Wear Daily (22 November 1996) on the firm's presence on both lists simultaneously, McClintock said, "You can try your best to solve all the problems, but it's almost impossible to monitor them all the time."

By the end of the 1990s McClintock frocks were still in style—both as new apparel and even more so as retro fashion. Prom gowns were a major hit in 1997 as pastels and flowers were again the favorites of young women. Even the Jessica McClintock fragrance, introduced years earlier, remained a perennial bestseller among new scents like Clavin Klein's CK One and CK Be, and Tommy Hilfiger's Tommy Girl. In a Women's Wear Daily survey of the Top 100 most recognized apparel and accessories brands in the industry, Jessica McClintock ranked a surprising seventh, behind such varied powerhouses as Cartier, Tiffany, and Timberland.

In the 21st century the McClintock look continued to be nostalgic dresses with a sense of mystery, appropriate for both mothers and daughters. Yet over the ensuing three decades, the McClintock brand had come to encompass far more than its well known dresses; the name graced a myriad of products including sportswear, separates, sleepwear, hosiery, baby bedding, fragrances, linens, bath collections, kitchen textiles, upholstery fabrics, furniture, and area rugs. Additionally, the company had joined of ranks of Internet retailers, introducing a website with style updates, store locations, and online sales.

—Therese Duzinkiewicz Baker; updated by Sydonie Benét

McFADDEN, Mary

American designer

Born: New York City, 1 October 1938. Education: Studied at the École Lubec, 1955–56, at the Sorbonne, Paris, 1956–57; studied fashion at the Traphagen School of Design, 1956; studied sociology at Columbia University and at the New School for Social Research, New York, 1958–60. Family: Married Philip Harari, 1965 (divorced); married Frank McEwan, 1968 (divorced, 1970); married Armin Schmidt, 1981 (divorced); married Kohle Yohannan, 1988

Mary McFadden, fall/winter 1999 collection: Mongolian wedding gown with beading and embroidery. © AP/Wide World Photos.

women in their 20s and 30s, offered special occasion ready-to-wear at relatively moderate designer label prices.

The use of man-made materials (polyester, acetate, nylon, rayon) made the lavishly decorated heirloom looks possible at a lower price. Cotton and linen are also used by McClintock, resulting in tea-gown-length Edwardian-inspired dresses in ecru, suitable not only for attendance at weddings, but for wear by the bride for a second or third, less formal, occasion. McClintock expanded into sleepwear, also romantic and nostalgic.

McClintock studied what teenagers wore to incorporate new trends, such as sundresses or the can-can skirts of 1987, and interpreted them in her own manner. Unlike Jeanne Lanvin's matching mother-daughter outfits, McClintock designed coordinating little girl-mother or older sister dresses. The fabrics, colors, and trims might be the same, but the styling and placement of trimmings differed. In keeping with mainstream fashion's more opulent evening looks, McClintock began adding deep color and black velvets into her collection, creating long, unabashedly romantic gowns. Tight décolleté bodices edged with heavy white or metallic gold Venetian lace contrasted with lush velvets falling to the floor, sometimes with a bustle effect, were more demurely echoed in little girls' dresses reminiscent of The Little Princess.

McClintock dresses were the sort that might be taken out of a trunk to be worn over and over again when a woman tires of her mundane everyday clothes. For juniors, the Scott McClintock line even offered short black velvet halter dresses, without any lace, paired with black velvet jackets. Additional sophistication was developed by the use of velvets brocaded with metallic, stiff bouffant taffeta skirts topped by metallic floral brocade jackets. More recent additions were a short sexy strapless black lace dress sparkling with all-over paillettes.

The McClintock name ran into some trouble in the middle 1990s due to sweatshop allegations, especially with the group Asian Immigrant Women Advocates. One of the McClintock's contractors was investigated by the U.S. Department of Labor, and due to several violations the McClintock business was listed among the violators published in the quarterly Garment Enforcement Report. McClintock vowed to investigate the charges and problems, and in subsequent Dept. of Labor reports was on both the violators list as well as the Trendsetter's list of businesses setting an excellent labor example. Commenting to Women's Wear Daily (22 November 1996) on the firm's presence on both lists simultaneously, McClintock said, "You can try your best to solve all the problems, but it's almost impossible to monitor them all the time."

By the end of the 1990s McClintock frocks were still in style—both as new apparel and even more so as retro fashion. Prom gowns were a major hit in 1997 as pastels and flowers were again the favorites of young women. Even the Jessica McClintock fragrance, introduced years earlier, remained a perennial bestseller among new scents like Clavin Klein's CK One and CK Be, and Tommy Hilfiger's Tommy Girl. In a Women's Wear Daily survey of the Top 100 most recognized apparel and accessories brands in the industry, Jessica McClintock ranked a surprising seventh, behind such varied powerhouses as Cartier, Tiffany, and Timberland.

In the 21st century the McClintock look continued to be nostalgic dresses with a sense of mystery, appropriate for both mothers and daughters. Yet over the ensuing three decades, the McClintock brand had come to encompass far more than its well known dresses; the name graced a myriad of products including sportswear, separates, sleepwear, hosiery, baby bedding, fragrances, linens, bath collections, kitchen textiles, upholstery fabrics, furniture, and area rugs. Additionally, the company had joined of ranks of Internet retailers, introducing a website with style updates, store locations, and online sales.

—Therese Duzinkiewicz Baker; updated by Sydonie Benét

McFADDEN, Mary

American designer

Born: New York City, 1 October 1938. Education: Studied at the École Lubec, 1955–56, at the Sorbonne, Paris, 1956–57; studied fashion at the Traphagen School of Design, 1956; studied sociology at Columbia University and at the New School for Social Research, New York, 1958–60. Family: Married Philip Harari, 1965 (divorced); married Frank McEwan, 1968 (divorced, 1970); married Armin Schmidt, 1981 (divorced); married Kohle Yohannan, 1988

Mary McFadden, fall/winter 1999 collection: Mongolian wedding gown with beading and embroidery. © AP/Wide World Photos.

(divorced); children: Justine. Career: Director of Public Relations, Dior New York, 1962–64; merchandising editor, Vogue, South Africa, 1964–65; travel and political columnist, Rand Daily Mail, South Africa, 1965–68; founder, Vukutu sculpture workshop, Rhodesia, 1968–70; also freelance editor for My Fair Lady, Cape Town, and Vogue, Paris, 1968–70; special projects editor, American Vogue, New York, 1970; freelance fashion and jewelry designer, New York, from 1973; Marii pleated fabric patented, 1975; president, Mary McFadden Inc., from 1976; home furnishings line introduced, 1978; lower priced line manufactured by Jack Mulqueen, from 1980; Mary McFadden Knitwear Company, launched 1981; also costume designer for Zooti, 1993; launched Mary McFadden Studio, 1995; began designing neckwear, 1999; Mary McFadden Collection, debuted 2001. Exhibitions: A Passion for Fashion: The Mortimer Collection, Wadsworth Atheneum, Hartford, Connecticut, 1993. Awards: Coty American Fashion Critics award, 1976, 1978, 1979; Audemars Piquet Fashion award, 1976; Rex award, 1977; Moore College of Art award, Philadelphia, 1977; Pennsylvania Governor's award, 1977; Roscoe award, 1978; Presidential Fellows award, Rhode Island School of Design, 1979; Neiman Marcus award, 1979; Doctor of Fine Arts, Miami International Fine Arts College, 1984; American Printed Fabrics Council Tommy award, 1991. Address: 240 West 35th St., New York, NY 10001, U.S.A.

PUBLICATIONS

On McFADDEN:

Books

- Morris, Bernadine, and Barbara Walz, The Fashion Makers, New York, 1978.
 Milbank, Caroline Rennolds, Couture: The Great Designers, New York, 1985.
 Diamonstein, Barbaralee, Fashion: The Inside Story, New York, 1985.
 Milbank, Caroline Rennolds, New York Fashion: The Evolution of American Style, New York, 1989.
 Stegemeyer, Anne, Who's Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.

Articles

- Tucker, Priscilla, "Mary Had a Little Dress," in the New York Daily News, 6 April 1980.
 Foley, Bridget, "Mary McFadden: A New Type of Tycoon," in New York Apparel News, March 1983.
 Rafferty, Diane, "Beyond Fashion," in Connoisseur (New York), October 1988.
 Thurman, Judith, "Power Gives You an Aura, Says Mary McFadden," in Mirabella, September 1989.
 Gross, Michael, "Mary, Mary, Quite Contrary: The Life and Loves of Mary McFadden," in New York, 26 March 1990.
 "The Designers Talk Passion, Whimsy and Picassos," in ARTnews (New York), September 1990.
 Horyn, Cathy, "A Mary-Tale Romance," in the Washington Post, 9 June 1991.
 "New York: Mary McFadden," in WWD, 4 November 1994.

Mary McFadden, fall/winter 1999 collection: sheared mink coat with a stenciled leopard print. © AP/Wide World Photos.

- Friedman, Arthur, "McFadden Exits Seventh on Sixth...," in WWD, 21 March 1995.
 "MMCF's New Society," in WWD, 25 July 1995.
 "Mary McFadden Launches Better Special-Occasion Line," in WWD, 19 September 1995.
 Monget, Karyn, "McFadden, Boutique Industries Renew Licensing Agreement," in WWD, 20 October 1997.
 McKinney, Melonee, "Women's Designer Mary McFadden to Do First-Ever Neckwear Collection," in WWD, 19 March 1999.
 "Joan Blumberger Olden Rejoins Mary McFadden," in WWD, 11 August 2000.
 Greenberg, Julee, "McFadden Expanding," in WWD, 5 September 2001.

* * *

With an artist's sensitivity to color, harmony, and proportion, Mary McFadden successfully designed original clothing for nearly 20 years. Her distinctive garments reflect an avid study of ancient and ethnic cultures. Inspired by the art and artifacts of Greece, Byzantium, South America and China, among others, as well as the distant cultures encountered during her own travels around the world,

McFadden built a foundation of pure, timeless silhouettes to which she added exotic details, decorations, in stunning fabrics, to culminate in elegant and flattering results.

When Vogue featured McFadden's simple tunics made of African prints and Oriental silks, clothes she had fashioned for herself out of necessity during her years spent in South Africa, the effect created sensation. While trousers had become accepted as daytime workwear during the 1970s, women were resigned to spongy polyester double-knits in mundane sherbet colors. McFadden's tunics, worn over silk Chinese pants, offered the comfort of natural fabrics and the eye appeal of vibrant colors and patterns. McFadden's first collection included quilted kimono-shaped jackets, flowing silk or chiffon trousers topped by loose togas made of stylized batik prints depicting Indonesian flowers and dragons, themes she was to repeat in a more luxurious manner in the fall of 1992. Bold, chunky, African-inspired jewelry made from various metals, plastic, and coral accented the eclectic mix.

Shimmering tunics resembling the shapes and patterns of butterfly wings followed, as McFadden developed her famous "Marii" pleating, recalling Fortuny's silk pleated fabrics, which were, in turn, based upon ancient Greek and Egyptian pleating. McFadden's pleated evening gowns were ideal for her wealthy, jet-setting clientèle since they were made of satin-backed polyester, which retained the pleats through hand-washing and travel. McFadden's awareness of modern technology had succeeded in making the pleats permanent.

Even her less expensive clothes, offered in the late 1970s, maintained an exotic feeling through the use of hand-painting on challis and suede, macramé yokes, quilting, and grosgrain ribbon binding. Herself a striking model for her creations, McFadden presented some black and white outfits in every collection, echoing her own straight black hair and very pale skin. Drama was created by the contrast, texture, and richness of fabric. The same sense of sophistication was imbued into McFadden's bedding and table linen licensing.

During the late 1970s her more expensive line of dresses included chiffon embroidered in gold, silver, and gold lamé, gold washed silks, foreshadowing the opulence of the 1980s. McFadden continued to design bold sculptured jewelry and braided belts to tie her gowns closer to the body or to use as edgings. Bolero jackets featured details from Portuguese tiles, an example of McFadden's ability to focus on a detail of a work of art, enlarge the motif, and incorporate it into her design.

Ever sensitive to the interplay of textures, the designer punctuated her columns of fine vertical pleating with beaded cuffs and collars, jewel encrusted panels, draped diagonals. Many of her garments came close to the surface richness of the art-to-wear movement but, eschewing the social statements inherent in the movement, her work was instead wearable art, to be collected and taken out to wear as one might precious jewelry. As evocative of the past as some of McFadden's designs may be, they stop short of looking like costumes. Pattern-upon-pattern mosaics of gold embroidery on sheer silk may highlight a Gustav Klimt-inspired collection, but the clothes have always been modern.

Despite the vagaries of fashion, McFadden maintained a consistent aesthetic. Her clothes offered something for almost everyone who could afford them. McFadden herself recommended, "chiffons for the heavy figures, the pleats for the thin ones, the velvets for everyone." By the end of the 1980s, McFadden had experimented with showing slits of bare skin in between swaths of pleated strips composing the bodices of her gowns. The columns closely outlined the curves of fit figures, for the cult of the body was in full swing. The designer shortened her skirts to above the knees, flippy skirts of rows of layered pleats dancing beneath sequined tops. A striking short dress in the spring of 1992 had a skirt encrusted with beads forming a panel from a Tiffany wisteria window, belted with a beaded belt beneath a diagonally Marii-pleated sleeveless bodice. Her Japanese collection followed, the mystery of the Orient conveyed through embroidered snakes and sinuous blossoms.

In 1995 McFadden shifted her secondary line from daywear to more occasion dressing and dresses wearable for day and evening, then created two new lines: the value-priced Mary McFadden Studio, featuring classic dresses and eveningwear, and Mary McFadden Collection, consisting of better suits and sportswear for younger women, which debuted in 2001. Additionally, McFadden, like other designers, had also become a popular guest on QVC. The McFadden accessories featured on the television shopping channel sold exceedingly well.

It may well be said of Mary McFadden that "she walks in beauty," especially since she wears her own designs. She has proven, however, that she is far more than a pretty face. As a preeminent designer she has used her unique skills to fashion an empire, supporting various charities, and overseeing numerous licenses for womenswear, sleepwear, footwear, eyewear, neckwear, and home furnishings.

—Therese Duzinkiewicz Baker; updated by Sydonie Benét

McQUEEN, Alexander

English fashion designer

Born: Lee McQueen, London, England. Education: Left school at the age of 16; apprenticed as a tailor with Saville Row tailors Anderson & Shepard and later Gieves & Hawkes, 1990–92; M.A., St. Martin's School of Art, 1992. Career: Briefly worked with Koji Tatsuno, 1992; assistant to Romeo Gigli, Milan, 1993–94; launched his own line, 1994; succeeded John Galliano as head designer of Givenchy, 1997; sold 51 percent of his own label to Gucci, 1997; fashions currently available in London, New York, Paris, and Japan. Awards: British Designer of the Year, 1996, 1997, 2001. Address: 47 Conduit Street, London, England, W1R 9FB. Website: www.alexandermcqueen.com.

PUBLICATIONS

On McQUEEN:

Articles

- “London Finale: Royalty and Rebellion,” in WWD, 14 March 1995.
- Fallon, James, “Totally British: A Trio of UK Apparel Designers Take the Plunge into Shoe Design,” in Footwear News, 1 January 1996.
- “McQueen Signs with Givenchy,” in WWD, 11 October 1996.

McFadden built a foundation of pure, timeless silhouettes to which she added exotic details, decorations, in stunning fabrics, to culminate in elegant and flattering results.

When Vogue featured McFadden's simple tunics made of African prints and Oriental silks, clothes she had fashioned for herself out of necessity during her years spent in South Africa, the effect created sensation. While trousers had become accepted as daytime workwear during the 1970s, women were resigned to spongy polyester double-knits in mundane sherbet colors. McFadden's tunics, worn over silk Chinese pants, offered the comfort of natural fabrics and the eye appeal of vibrant colors and patterns. McFadden's first collection included quilted kimono-shaped jackets, flowing silk or chiffon trousers topped by loose togas made of stylized batik prints depicting Indonesian flowers and dragons, themes she was to repeat in a more luxurious manner in the fall of 1992. Bold, chunky, African-inspired jewelry made from various metals, plastic, and coral accented the eclectic mix.

Shimmering tunics resembling the shapes and patterns of butterfly wings followed, as McFadden developed her famous "Marii" pleating, recalling Fortuny's silk pleated fabrics, which were, in turn, based upon ancient Greek and Egyptian pleating. McFadden's pleated evening gowns were ideal for her wealthy, jet-setting clientèle since they were made of satin-backed polyester, which retained the pleats through hand-washing and travel. McFadden's awareness of modern technology had succeeded in making the pleats permanent.

Even her less expensive clothes, offered in the late 1970s, maintained an exotic feeling through the use of hand-painting on challis and suede, macramé yokes, quilting, and grosgrain ribbon binding. Herself a striking model for her creations, McFadden presented some black and white outfits in every collection, echoing her own straight black hair and very pale skin. Drama was created by the contrast, texture, and richness of fabric. The same sense of sophistication was imbued into McFadden's bedding and table linen licensing.

During the late 1970s her more expensive line of dresses included chiffon embroidered in gold, silver, and gold lamé, gold washed silks, foreshadowing the opulence of the 1980s. McFadden continued to design bold sculptured jewelry and braided belts to tie her gowns closer to the body or to use as edgings. Bolero jackets featured details from Portuguese tiles, an example of McFadden's ability to focus on a detail of a work of art, enlarge the motif, and incorporate it into her design.

Ever sensitive to the interplay of textures, the designer punctuated her columns of fine vertical pleating with beaded cuffs and collars, jewel encrusted panels, draped diagonals. Many of her garments came close to the surface richness of the art-to-wear movement but, eschewing the social statements inherent in the movement, her work was instead wearable art, to be collected and taken out to wear as one might precious jewelry. As evocative of the past as some of McFadden's designs may be, they stop short of looking like costumes. Pattern-upon-pattern mosaics of gold embroidery on sheer silk may highlight a Gustav Klimt-inspired collection, but the clothes have always been modern.

Despite the vagaries of fashion, McFadden maintained a consistent aesthetic. Her clothes offered something for almost everyone who could afford them. McFadden herself recommended, "chiffons for the heavy figures, the pleats for the thin ones, the velvets for everyone." By the end of the 1980s, McFadden had experimented with showing slits of bare skin in between swaths of pleated strips composing the bodices of her gowns. The columns closely outlined the curves of fit figures, for the cult of the body was in full swing. The designer shortened her skirts to above the knees, flippy skirts of rows of layered pleats dancing beneath sequined tops. A striking short dress in the spring of 1992 had a skirt encrusted with beads forming a panel from a Tiffany wisteria window, belted with a beaded belt beneath a diagonally Marii-pleated sleeveless bodice. Her Japanese collection followed, the mystery of the Orient conveyed through embroidered snakes and sinuous blossoms.

In 1995 McFadden shifted her secondary line from daywear to more occasion dressing and dresses wearable for day and evening, then created two new lines: the value-priced Mary McFadden Studio, featuring classic dresses and eveningwear, and Mary McFadden Collection, consisting of better suits and sportswear for younger women, which debuted in 2001. Additionally, McFadden, like other designers, had also become a popular guest on QVC. The McFadden accessories featured on the television shopping channel sold exceedingly well.

It may well be said of Mary McFadden that "she walks in beauty," especially since she wears her own designs. She has proven, however, that she is far more than a pretty face. As a preeminent designer she has used her unique skills to fashion an empire, supporting various charities, and overseeing numerous licenses for womenswear, sleepwear, footwear, eyewear, neckwear, and home furnishings.

—Therese Duzinkiewicz Baker; updated by Sydonie Benét

McQUEEN, Alexander

English fashion designer

Born: Lee McQueen, London, England. Education: Left school at the age of 16; apprenticed as a tailor with Saville Row tailors Anderson & Shepard and later Gieves & Hawkes, 1990–92; M.A., St. Martin's School of Art, 1992. Career: Briefly worked with Koji Tatsuno, 1992; assistant to Romeo Gigli, Milan, 1993–94; launched his own line, 1994; succeeded John Galliano as head designer of Givenchy, 1997; sold 51 percent of his own label to Gucci, 1997; fashions currently available in London, New York, Paris, and Japan. Awards: British Designer of the Year, 1996, 1997, 2001. Address: 47 Conduit Street, London, England, W1R 9FB. Website: www.alexandermcqueen.com.

PUBLICATIONS

On McQUEEN:

Articles

- “London Finale: Royalty and Rebellion,” in WWD, 14 March 1995.
- Fallon, James, “Totally British: A Trio of UK Apparel Designers Take the Plunge into Shoe Design,” in Footwear News, 1 January 1996.
- “McQueen Signs with Givenchy,” in WWD, 11 October 1996.

Alexander McQueen, autumn/winter 2001–02 collection. © AP/Wide World Photos.

- Frankel, Susannah, "Bull in a Fashion Shop," in The Guardian, 15 October 1996.
Foley, Bridget, "The Word from McQueen," in WWD, 16 January 1997.
Luscombe, Belinda, "What Would Audrey Think?" in Time, 21 July 1997.
Foley, Bridget, "McQueen Renews Givenchy Contract," in WWD, 11 May 1998.
Raper, Sarah, "McQueen Eyes Shifting Show to New York," in WWD, 5 October 1998.
Horyn, Cathy, "McQueen's Audacity, Beene's Impishness," in the New York Times, 18 September 1999.
"African McQueen and Classic Burberry," in WWD, 17 February 2000.
Horyn, Cathy, "In London, Ho-Hum Ends in Smash Finale," in the New York Times, 1 October 2000.
Bellafante, Ginia, "Gucci Secures a Deal with Alexander McQueen," in the New York Times, 5 December 2000.
Givhan, Robin, "Givenchy's Loss, Gucci's Gain," in the Washington Post, 5 December 2000.

- Menkes, Suzy, "A Farewell from McQueen," in the International Herald Tribune, 20 March 2001.
Fallon, James, "Alexander McQueen," in WWD, 5 June 2001.
"YSL Beaute Secures Alexander McQueen Perfume License," in PR Newswire, 13 June 2001.
"YSL Still Gets Backing of Gucci Despite Significant Losses," in Cosmetics International, 10 July 2001.
Banks, Jeff, "The Top Brass," in the Independent on Sunday (London), 22 July 2001.
"Worldwatch Trade Fairs & Exhibitions," in Financial Times Business Limited, 1 November 2001.

* * *

Alexander McQueen is most notably known as the genius of various tailoring techniques. He has audaciously set a different fashion stage in England, where his outlandish fashion shows have brought energy and attention to a fairly quiet and conservative fashion market. The last extreme attention London received was back in the 1960s when Mary Quant entered with the mod look. McQueen's clothes are beautiful and wearable, but he receives most of his attention for his outrageous personality and vibrant character. He is a designer with the stamina to pursue and conquer the world of fashion; by the dawn of the 21st century, McQueen was a fashion icon in the making.

McQueen grew up in London, one of six children of a cab driver and a homemaker. His family struggled financially while McQueen was growing up, so to help the family along, he started making dresses for his three sisters. At this point, his desire to become a fashion designer began to evolve. He expressed an interest to his parents about a career in fashion, and they were against it. "I was the pink sheep of the family!" McQueen told Elle magazine. His parents later became extremely supportive of his career and very proud of his accomplishments.

McQueen has truly grown up in the eyes of the fashion press. He left school at the age of 16 and landed an apprenticeship with Saville Row tailors Anderson & Shepard, later working for Gieves & Hawkes. McQueen has said, "It is important to learn the basics of cut and proportion." Through his apprenticeships, he mastered six methods of pattern cutting, from the 16th century to the present; his talented tailoring techniques are well known within the fashion industry.

At 20, McQueen worked as an assistant to designer Romeo Gigli in Milan, who was extremely impressed with his skills. After a short period working for Gigli, McQueen returned to London to study at Central St. Martin's College of Art and Design. He wanted to be admitted into the Masters of Art program but lacked a formal education. He showed his portfolio to the director of the school, who was very impressed with the work, and admitted the fledgling designer immediately. McQueen's first international exposure came while presenting his final collection at St. Martin's, and he received an enormous amount of press coverage.

McQueen launched his own line in 1992 and on one occasion used crushed beetles and human hair in a fashion show. His presentations have always been full of unpredictable magic and madness. "In the past, he has dressed models in chadors and hoisted them into the air, where they did somersaults and pirouettes until finally miming their own electrocution," wrote the Washington Post in December 2000. In Alexander McQueen, autumn/winter 2001–02 collection. © AP/Wide World Photos.

1996 McQueen replaced John Galliano, ready-to-wear head designer at Givenchy's Haute Couture, but he was not embraced by the fashion press as a designer who was sophisticated enough to handle the Givenchy customer. He was viewed as too controversial and the same month he replaced Galliano, he also received notoriety as British Designer of the Year.

Within two years, McQueen was unhappy at Givenchy, and in an interview in Arena magazine, dared his employers to fire him. But before his contract expired, he sold a 51-percent stake in his own label to rival Gucci. Owning the remaining interest in his company still allowed him to have full creative independence. During the breakup with Givenchy, McQueen produced some of his most beautiful clothes to date in his career. The show once again was very controversial, with the setting in an insane asylum. The show, however, confirmed his reputation of producing fashion with an edge.

In the early 2000s, McQueen was concentrating on his own label under a Gucci-McQueen partnership. He was quoted in an article in WWD (5 June 2000) saying, "It hasn't been as easy as it seems leaving Givenchy and being able to focus strictly on McQueen. Now I'm seeing all the mistakes we made in the past.... At some stage, you have to grow up. It's important now that people focus on the clothes rather than someone in a clown suit." McQueen continued working on his own line, redesigning the label and packaging, a new store design, preparing the launch of a fragrance in 2003, considering a cosmetics line under the Gucci Group, as well as overseeing the licensing of his eyewear.

Alexander McQueen is a designer who has carved his own career path in the fashion industry. He is a workaholic who keeps moving forward despite the sometimes negative media surrounding him. He is an artist, not just a fashion designer, who does not let the commercial value of his clothing take away from the controversial presentation necessary to draw attention to his creations.

—Donna W. Reamy

MEDINA del CORRAL, José Luis

See VICTORIO Y LUCCHINO

MEISTER, David

American designer

Born: 23 February 1962 in Cincinnati, Ohio. Education: Bachelor of Design, magna cum laude, University of Cincinnati College of Design, Architecture, Art, and Planning, 1985. Career: Assistant Designer, Danskin 1986–88; designer, Silk Studio, Macy's Corporate Private Label, 1988–91; designer, Oleg Cassini Silk, 1992–93; designer, evening wear for Laundry, 1993; joined with ENC, a division of Kellwood Industries, to create a signature evening wear collection, 1998; introduced day dresses into his David Meister line, 2001. Address: 1307 East Temple Avenue, City of Industry, CA 91746; Showroom: 214 West 39th Street, Suite 203, New York, NY 10018.

PUBLICATIONS

On MEISTER:

Articles

- "Market Basket," in WWD, 29 December 1998.
- "SOS: Working the Next Wave," in WWD, 13 April 1999.
- Williamson, Rusty, "The Party Meister," in WWD, 19 May 1999.
- Hall, Len, "Running Hot and Cold on the Millennium," in WWD, 20 July 1999.
- Turk, Rose-Marie, and Eric Wilson, "In Day Dress Revival, a Starring Role for L.A.," in WWD, 31 August 1999.
- Wilson, Eric, "For Evening Vendors, the End Isn't Near," in WWD, 23 November 1999.
- Haber, Holly, and Rusty Williamson, "Stores Foresee a Strong Summer," in WWD, 12 January 2000.
- Wilson, Eric, and Rusty Williamson, "The Ups and Downs of Building a Dress Line," in WWD, 7 March 2000.

Alexander McQueen, autumn/winter 2001–02 collection. © AP/Wide World Photos.

1996 McQueen replaced John Galliano, ready-to-wear head designer at Givenchy's Haute Couture, but he was not embraced by the fashion press as a designer who was sophisticated enough to handle the Givenchy customer. He was viewed as too controversial and the same month he replaced Galliano, he also received notoriety as British Designer of the Year.

Within two years, McQueen was unhappy at Givenchy, and in an interview in Arena magazine, dared his employers to fire him. But before his contract expired, he sold a 51-percent stake in his own label to rival Gucci. Owning the remaining interest in his company still allowed him to have full creative independence. During the breakup with Givenchy, McQueen produced some of his most beautiful clothes to date in his career. The show once again was very controversial, with the setting in an insane asylum. The show, however, confirmed his reputation of producing fashion with an edge.

In the early 2000s, McQueen was concentrating on his own label under a Gucci-McQueen partnership. He was quoted in an article in WWD (5 June 2000) saying, "It hasn't been as easy as it seems leaving Givenchy and being able to focus strictly on McQueen. Now I'm seeing all the mistakes we made in the past.... At some stage, you have to grow up. It's important now that people focus on the clothes rather than someone in a clown suit." McQueen continued working on his own line, redesigning the label and packaging, a new store design, preparing the launch of a fragrance in 2003, considering a cosmetics line under the Gucci Group, as well as overseeing the licensing of his eyewear.

Alexander McQueen is a designer who has carved his own career path in the fashion industry. He is a workaholic who keeps moving forward despite the sometimes negative media surrounding him. He is an artist, not just a fashion designer, who does not let the commercial value of his clothing take away from the controversial presentation necessary to draw attention to his creations.

—Donna W. Reamy

MEDINA del CORRAL, José Luis

See VICTORIO Y LUCCHINO

MEISTER, David

American designer

Born: 23 February 1962 in Cincinnati, Ohio. Education: Bachelor of Design, magna cum laude, University of Cincinnati College of Design, Architecture, Art, and Planning, 1985. Career: Assistant Designer, Danskin 1986–88; designer, Silk Studio, Macy's Corporate Private Label, 1988–91; designer, Oleg Cassini Silk, 1992–93; designer, evening wear for Laundry, 1993; joined with ENC, a division of Kellwood Industries, to create a signature evening wear collection, 1998; introduced day dresses into his David Meister line, 2001. Address: 1307 East Temple Avenue, City of Industry, CA 91746; Showroom: 214 West 39th Street, Suite 203, New York, NY 10018.

PUBLICATIONS

On MEISTER:

Articles

- "Market Basket," in WWD, 29 December 1998.
- "SOS: Working the Next Wave," in WWD, 13 April 1999.
- Williamson, Rusty, "The Party Meister," in WWD, 19 May 1999.
- Hall, Len, "Running Hot and Cold on the Millennium," in WWD, 20 July 1999.
- Turk, Rose-Marie, and Eric Wilson, "In Day Dress Revival, a Starring Role for L.A.," in WWD, 31 August 1999.
- Wilson, Eric, "For Evening Vendors, the End Isn't Near," in WWD, 23 November 1999.
- Haber, Holly, and Rusty Williamson, "Stores Foresee a Strong Summer," in WWD, 12 January 2000.
- Wilson, Eric, and Rusty Williamson, "The Ups and Downs of Building a Dress Line," in WWD, 7 March 2000.

David Meister: jersey backless gown with ruching and front slit.
© Gale Group.

Greenberg, Julee, "Eveningwear's Next Millennium," in WWD, 22 August 2000.

McCants, Leonard, "New Day for Meister," in WWD, 22 August 2000.

Greenberg, Julee, and Leonard McCants, "Dollars and Dresses: The Ladies are Back and Sales Are Stirring," in WWD, 9 January 2001.

*

My collection is clean, modern, glamorous and sexy. It complements the needs of today's woman and her lifestyle.

—David Meister

* * *

David Meister understands many things. He understands fabrics and the way they flow over the female figure. He understands that a young heart might reside in a mature body. He is aware of the need for good, contemporary dresses for day and evening with price tags less than the national debt. He knows versatility is important. He understands what women want.

The M Collection by David Meister debuted for fall 1999. The 32-piece holiday and resort line included dresses and a wide range of evening separates. The sweater sets, multiple silhouettes in skirts and pants, tanks and novelty shirts, permit tremendous flexibility in evening dress. "The spectrum of styles shows that we're not addressing an age group but a state of mind. Women who appreciate fashion, but don't like fickle trends and those who love opulence but don't want to look over-the-top, will appreciate my line. It's a 21st century mind-set."

Meister's garments are feminine and elegant and cut with strong, clean, sexy silhouettes. Blatantly revisiting eras of glam and glitz with beading and sequins, his first collection offered the perfect attire for the modern siren. Fabrics ranged from simple matte jersey and crêpe to crinkled silks and organza. Outerwear included luxurious faux fur wraps. Stepping outside the usual black for evening, his palette included lilac, moss, dusty gold, ivory, peach and gray. Pegged as "a young designer to watch," the launch was an unqualified success, far outselling expectations.

A 12-year veteran of the fashion industry, Meister previously worked for Danskin, Macy's Corporate, and Oleg Cassini Silk. He spent the next six years at Podell Industries' Laundry Division building the social occasion and bridal area. In the fall of 1998, ENC, a division of Kellwood Industries, approached him about creating a signature evening collection. M by David Meister was introduced to the market in March 1999.

In his second year of business, Meister added a day dress line, "taking the next step in his desire to dress women while the sun is shining." Though he admits eveningwear is his first love, the new collection presented the opportunity to branch out. More tailored than his soft evening styles, the line is clean and modern. He plans to eventually expand to about 60 looks, but the premiere was primarily dresses and two-piece outfits with sweaters and skirts.

Maintaining his signature spare lines, Meister's spring 2001 day collection offered garments in linen, linen tweed, denim, and cotton. Some of the print dresses have a bold 1960s feel with strong graphic elements. His contemporary day dresses fill a void left by collections that have become too young, and the public response has been outstanding. Nieman Marcus' Gerald Barnes said, "The line is pretty and clean and on target," and Beverly Rice at Jacobsen's added, "The collection is very versatile and well made. The styling is updated and the fabrics are great. David Meister represents the fashion leadership and value that we love." Meister commented, "I want to take it as far as we possibly can. Hopefully with the success of the day dress line, I will be able to do sportswear. So you're dressing the same customer from day to evening to sportswear." His spring 2001 evening collection included little crêpe "classic cocktail" selections that were flying out the door, and his evening wear has continued to sell well.

David Meister has met a very difficult challenge: he has managed to understand women want well-made, beautiful clothing that show them at their best. They want garments that will be right for social occasions and versatile enough to be worn more than once, with a silhouette that will enhance a good figure, but with enough forgiveness to help conceal imperfections. Women want to feel pretty and feminine and sexy, at an affordable price. Not only does Meister understand, he delivers.

A native of Ohio, David Meister is well spoken and personable. He graduated magna cum laude from the fashion design program at the University of Cincinnati College of Design, Architecture, Art and Planning. A serious and committed student, Meister excelled academically and artistically. Remembered fondly by his professors, he retains his humility and approachability. In a competitive and fickle industry, it's refreshing to see that nice guys don't always finish last.

—Christina Lindholm

METT, Madame Torrente

See TORRENTE

MILLER, Nicole

American designer

Born: 1952, in Lenox, Massachusetts. Education: Graduated from Rhode Island School of Design, Providence; spent third year attending the École de la Chambre Syndicale Parisienne. Family: Married Kim Taipale, 1996; child: Palmer. Career: Designer, Rain Cheetahs, New York, 1975; head designer for Bud Konheim, P.J. Walsh

Nicole Miller, spring 2001 collection. © Reuters NewMedia Inc./CORBIS.

women's fashion company, New York, 1975–82; in partnership with Konheim, company renamed Nicole Miller, 1982; launched line of men's accessories, circa 1987; began licensing agreements for socks, tights, jeans, handbags, and men's formal wear; debuted footwear, 1992; fragrance and cosmetics collection, 1993; bridalwear 1995; Nicole line 1997; men's and women's at-home wear 1999; men's sportswear 2000. Opened boutiques in New York (1987), Mexico City and Naples, Florida (1991), Barcelona, Tokyo, Osaka, and Seville (1992), Los Angeles (1993). Awards: Dallas Fashion award, 1991; Girl Scouts of America award, New York, 1994. Address: 525 Seventh Avenue, New York, NY, 10018, USA. Website: www.nicolemiller.com.

PUBLICATIONS

On MILLER:

Articles and Video

- Schulte, Lucy, "A Real Fashion Outlaw," in New York, 16 February 1987.
- Hochswender, Woody, "A First Show with the Right Flair," in the New York Times, 3 November 1990.
- "Nicole Miller: Fashion's Wittiest High Roller," in People, 29 April 1991.
- Shand, Gayle, "Miller's Crossing," in Footwear News (New York), 3 February 1992.
- Rockwell, Abigail, and Sally V. Beaty, A Different Look: The Nicole Miller Story (video), RMI Productions, 1993.
- Ball, Aimee Lee, "Thoroughly Modern Miller," in New York, 8 March 1993.
- Drake, Laurie, "Can Nicole Eat Lunch in This Town?," in Los Angeles Magazine, May 1993.
- "Miller Time: Nicole Goes Retail," in Crain's New York Business, 15 June 1998.
- Mui, Nelson, "Nicole Miller Launches Sportswear Collection for Fall 2000," in DNR, 20 December 1999.
- Curan, Catherine, "Nicole Miller Redresses Strategy," in Crain's New York Business, 12 June 2000.
- Johnson, Hillary J., "A Fashionable Address," in InStyle (New York), November 2000.

* * *

Immense talent as a designer, fun, and an astute sense of fashion are the key to Nicole Miller's success. Miller is a hands-on designer, who pays particular attention to clothing construction throughout the entire design process. Her studies at a haute couture school in Paris taught her the importance of a well-engineered and well-fitting garment. Realizing that few women have perfect bodies, she has always made certain every body looks its best, camouflaging problem areas. Because of simple but unique details and superior cut, a woman wearing a Nicole Miller garment is assured of looking her best.

Nicole Miller has had her own women's line of clothing since 1982. The company is primarily known for great looking dresses in both solid and printed fabrics. However, due to an over-abundance of leftover fabric from a line of unsuccessful dresses, she opted to make retains his humility and approachability. In a competitive and fickle industry, it's refreshing to see that nice guys don't always finish last.

—Christina Lindholm

METT, Madame Torrente

See TORRENTE

MILLER, Nicole

American designer

Born: 1952, in Lenox, Massachusetts. Education: Graduated from Rhode Island School of Design, Providence; spent third year attending the École de la Chambre Syndicale Parisienne. Family: Married Kim Taipale, 1996; child: Palmer. Career: Designer, Rain Cheetahs, New York, 1975; head designer for Bud Konheim, P.J. Walsh

Nicole Miller, spring 2001 collection. © Reuters NewMedia Inc./CORBIS.

women's fashion company, New York, 1975–82; in partnership with Konheim, company renamed Nicole Miller, 1982; launched line of men's accessories, circa 1987; began licensing agreements for socks, tights, jeans, handbags, and men's formal wear; debuted footwear, 1992; fragrance and cosmetics collection, 1993; bridalwear 1995; Nicole line 1997; men's and women's at-home wear 1999; men's sportswear 2000. Opened boutiques in New York (1987), Mexico City and Naples, Florida (1991), Barcelona, Tokyo, Osaka, and Seville (1992), Los Angeles (1993). Awards: Dallas Fashion award, 1991; Girl Scouts of America award, New York, 1994. Address: 525 Seventh Avenue, New York, NY, 10018, USA. Website: www.nicolemiller.com.

PUBLICATIONS

On MILLER:

Articles and Video

- Schulte, Lucy, "A Real Fashion Outlaw," in New York, 16 February 1987.
- Hochswender, Woody, "A First Show with the Right Flair," in the New York Times, 3 November 1990.
- "Nicole Miller: Fashion's Wittiest High Roller," in People, 29 April 1991.
- Shand, Gayle, "Miller's Crossing," in Footwear News (New York), 3 February 1992.
- Rockwell, Abigail, and Sally V. Beaty, A Different Look: The Nicole Miller Story (video), RMI Productions, 1993.
- Ball, Aimee Lee, "Thoroughly Modern Miller," in New York, 8 March 1993.
- Drake, Laurie, "Can Nicole Eat Lunch in This Town?," in Los Angeles Magazine, May 1993.
- "Miller Time: Nicole Goes Retail," in Crain's New York Business, 15 June 1998.
- Mui, Nelson, "Nicole Miller Launches Sportswear Collection for Fall 2000," in DNR, 20 December 1999.
- Curan, Catherine, "Nicole Miller Redresses Strategy," in Crain's New York Business, 12 June 2000.
- Johnson, Hillary J., "A Fashionable Address," in InStyle (New York), November 2000.

* * *

Immense talent as a designer, fun, and an astute sense of fashion are the key to Nicole Miller's success. Miller is a hands-on designer, who pays particular attention to clothing construction throughout the entire design process. Her studies at a haute couture school in Paris taught her the importance of a well-engineered and well-fitting garment. Realizing that few women have perfect bodies, she has always made certain every body looks its best, camouflaging problem areas. Because of simple but unique details and superior cut, a woman wearing a Nicole Miller garment is assured of looking her best.

Nicole Miller has had her own women's line of clothing since 1982. The company is primarily known for great looking dresses in both solid and printed fabrics. However, due to an over-abundance of leftover fabric from a line of unsuccessful dresses, she opted to make the conversational black silk print, featuring colored ticket stubs in the foreground, into the Nicole Miller necktie sensation; hence the birth of the Nicole Miller men's accessories line. A dark cloud turned out to have a platinum lining and Miller blossomed into a leading men's accessory manufacturer. In the mid-1990s, the Miller ties, shirts, boxer shorts, and robes accounted for 20 percent of business.

Nicole Miller, spring 2001 collection. © Reuters NewMedia Inc./CORBIS.

Inspiration for Miller prints can come from anywhere. After seeing the off-Broadway hit Song of Singapore, Miller decided to create a special silk print in honor of the show. The company employs dozens of artists who develop a wide range of graphics. Designs incorporate everything from assorted candy, animals, or vegetables to the sports collection, which has featured basketballs, footballs, and baseballs. These prints have become so influential that knockoffs can be found at every level of the marketplace.

Miller has been prolific in other areas of design as well. She was involved in designing costumes for the Brooklyn Academy of Music's New Wave festival tribute to the late Carmen Miranda. Inspiration for the costumes was the peasant clothing of the Bahia region of Brazil visited by Miller.

Although she received a great deal of publicity for her prints, Miller's reputation was actually built with her dramatic pared-down silhouettes and her striking use of graphics. Some examples are her curvy, strapless pale linen chambray dresses, and her short white rompers and dresses stitched in red like a baseball. Flattering fit and drop-dead designs are not Miller's only strong points. She is one of the few American designers with fashion's sixth sense for setting the trends without resorting to fads; her clothes are young and fresh. In a time where many of the baby boomers have become more conservative, the Miller customer remains forever young.

While Miller's cocktail dress and men's novelty ties were the mainstays of her business in the 1980s, she oversees an extensive product line. Miller keeps close watch on her customers and expands her offering to meet their needs. While the core business for the Nicole Miller line remains the dress and dinner suit, she created a bridal line in 1995 after noticing prospective brides were ordering several copies of a particular dress for their bridesmaids. She also launched the Nicole line in 1997 to serve her younger buyers with more contemporary styles like t-shirt dresses.

Drawing on her relationship with the men who buy her ties, Miller launched a sportswear line in 2000 offering trendy clothes priced at a lower-bridge level, including pants, sweaters, shirts, and pajamas, all in characteristically bright, catchy colors. In addition, Miller's prodigious design talent has been applied to many more nontraditional products, including hospital gowns for Hackensack University Medical Center, ties for the NFL as well as the Komen Foundation to fight breast cancer, and a line of premium cigars and accessories.

The growth of the Nicole Miller line accelerated the company's move into retail. Responding to changes in the retail market during the 1990s, department stores began carrying more private labels than designer lines and turned to promotional techniques which some designers believed hurt their image and profits. By establishing Nicole Miller stores which would carry the entire collection, the company could control its identity to the customer. In 1998, Nicole Miller opened many stores outside of New York by licensing the designer's name and giving local owners a great deal of latitude to operate their businesses. Although some of the stores remain successful, the company also faced problems from bad locations, stores selling merchandise that wasn't Nicole Miller, and a case of credit card fraud. The company met the need for another expansion in 2000 more cautiously. All new stores were company-owned and a new director of retail coordinated their operation. In 2001, the company has 30 stores within the United States. Nicole Miller launched its web site for information only in 1994 and began selling online in 1998 at the Nicole Miller website and other sites dedicated to specific products, like its skincare line. Nicole Miller's design talent and her understanding of her customers will make her an important part of the fashion scene for years to come.

—Roberta H. Gruber; updated by Janette Goff Dixon

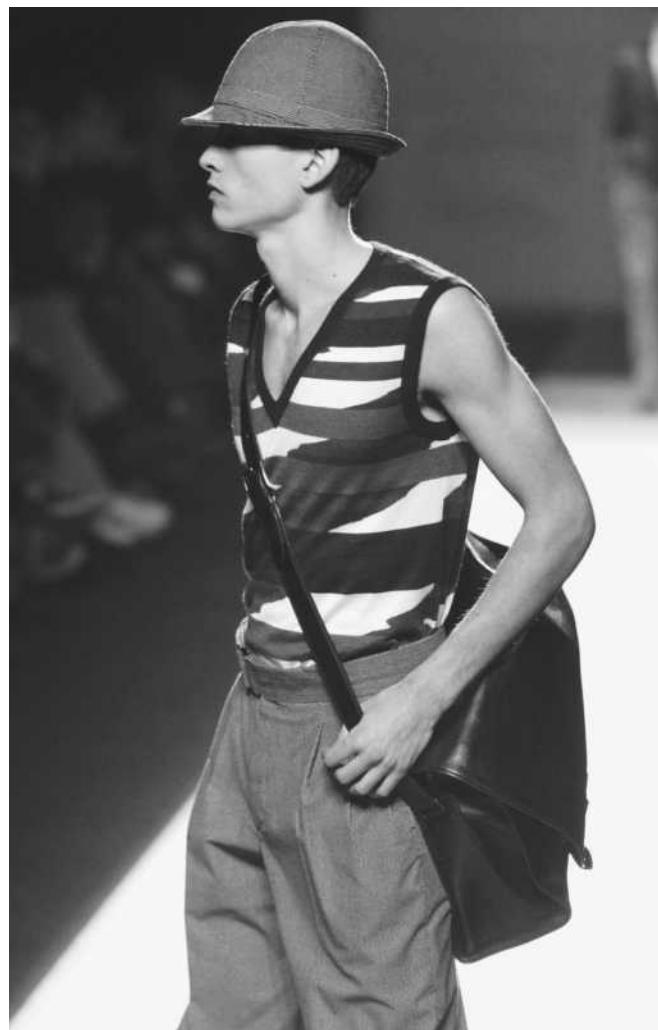

MISCHKA, James

See BADGLEY MISCHKA

MISSONI

Italian knitwear and fashion house

Founded: in Gallarate, Varese, Italy, 1953, by Ottavio Missoni (born in Dalmatia, 11 February 1921) and Rosita Jelmini Missoni (born in Lombardy, 20 November 1931). Company History: First collection produced for Rinascente Stores, 1954; Missoni label introduced, from 1958; first Paris showing, 1967; Missoni SpA workshop and factory established, Sumirago, 1968; first New York showing, 1969; first boutiques opened, Milan and New York, 1976; fragrance line introduced, 1981; Missoni Uomo and Missoni Sport lines introduced, 1985; Angela Missoni collection introduced, 1992; Angela took control of firm, 1997; launched footwear line, 1998; M Missoni debuted, spring-summer 1999; new flagships opened in New York and Paris. Exhibitions: Solo exhibition, Il Naviglio Gallery, Venice, 1975; retrospective, La Rotonda Gallery, Milan, and the Whitney Museum, New York, 1978; solo exhibition, Galleria del Naviglio, Milan, and the University of California, Berkeley, 1981; retrospective, Ridotto/Pergola Theatre, Pitti Immagine Filati, Florence, 1994. Awards: Neiman Marcus award, 1973; Bath Museum of Costume Dress of the Year award, 1974; American Printed Fabric Council Tommy award, 1976; Gold Medal of Civic Merit award, Milan, 1979; Fragrance Foundation award, 1982; Tai Missoni given Arancia award, 1986; Rosita Missoni named Commendatore al

Missoni, fall/winter 2001–02 collection. © AP/Wide World Photos.

Merito della Repubblica Italiana, 1986; Fashion Group International Design award, 1991; Munich Mode-Woche award, 1992; Dallas Historical Fashion Collectors Stanley award, 1999. Company Address: Via Luigi Rossi 52, 21040 Sumirago (Varese), Italy. Company Website: www.missoni.com.

PUBLICATIONS

On MISSONI:

Books

Mulassano, Adriana, The Who's Who of Italian Fashion, Florence, 1979.

Alfonsi, Maria Vittoria, Leaders in Fashion: I grandi personaggi della moda, Bologna, 1983.

Giacomozzi, Silvia, The Italian Look Reflected, Milan, 1984.

Aragno, Bonizza Giordani, Moda Italia: Creativity and Technology in the Italian Fashion System, Milan, 1988.

Tutino Vercelloni, Isa, editor, Missonologia: The World of Missoni, Milan, 1994.

The growth of the Nicole Miller line accelerated the company's move into retail. Responding to changes in the retail market during the 1990s, department stores began carrying more private labels than designer lines and turned to promotional techniques which some designers believed hurt their image and profits. By establishing Nicole Miller stores which would carry the entire collection, the company could control its identity to the customer. In 1998, Nicole Miller opened many stores outside of New York by licensing the designer's name and giving local owners a great deal of latitude to operate their businesses. Although some of the stores remain successful, the company also faced problems from bad locations, stores selling merchandise that wasn't Nicole Miller, and a case of credit card fraud. The company met the need for another expansion in 2000 more cautiously. All new stores were company-owned and a new director of retail coordinated their operation. In 2001, the company has 30 stores within the United States. Nicole Miller launched its web site for information only in 1994 and began selling online in 1998 at the Nicole Miller website and other sites dedicated to specific products, like its skincare line. Nicole Miller's design talent and her understanding of her customers will make her an important part of the fashion scene for years to come.

—Roberta H. Gruber; updated by Janette Goff Dixon

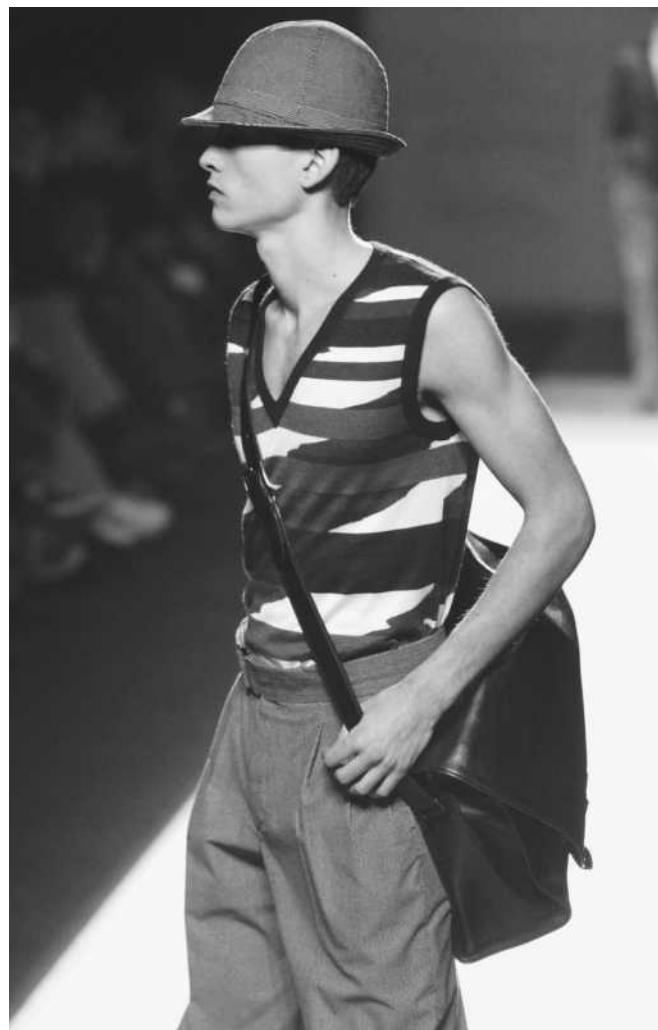

MISCHKA, James

See BADGLEY MISCHKA

MISSONI

Italian knitwear and fashion house

Founded: in Gallarate, Varese, Italy, 1953, by Ottavio Missoni (born in Dalmatia, 11 February 1921) and Rosita Jelmini Missoni (born in Lombardy, 20 November 1931). Company History: First collection produced for Rinascente Stores, 1954; Missoni label introduced, from 1958; first Paris showing, 1967; Missoni SpA workshop and factory established, Sumirago, 1968; first New York showing, 1969; first boutiques opened, Milan and New York, 1976; fragrance line introduced, 1981; Missoni Uomo and Missoni Sport lines introduced, 1985; Angela Missoni collection introduced, 1992; Angela took control of firm, 1997; launched footwear line, 1998; M Missoni debuted, spring-summer 1999; new flagships opened in New York and Paris. Exhibitions: Solo exhibition, Il Naviglio Gallery, Venice, 1975; retrospective, La Rotonda Gallery, Milan, and the Whitney Museum, New York, 1978; solo exhibition, Galleria del Naviglio, Milan, and the University of California, Berkeley, 1981; retrospective, Ridotto/Pergola Theatre, Pitti Immagine Filati, Florence, 1994. Awards: Neiman Marcus award, 1973; Bath Museum of Costume Dress of the Year award, 1974; American Printed Fabric Council Tommy award, 1976; Gold Medal of Civic Merit award, Milan, 1979; Fragrance Foundation award, 1982; Tai Missoni given Arancia award, 1986; Rosita Missoni named Commendatore al

Missoni, fall/winter 2001–02 collection. © AP/Wide World Photos.

Merito della Repubblica Italiana, 1986; Fashion Group International Design award, 1991; Munich Mode-Woche award, 1992; Dallas Historical Fashion Collectors Stanley award, 1999. Company Address: Via Luigi Rossi 52, 21040 Sumirago (Varese), Italy. Company Website: www.missoni.com.

PUBLICATIONS

On MISSONI:

Books

Mulassano, Adriana, The Who's Who of Italian Fashion, Florence, 1979.

Alfonsi, Maria Vittoria, Leaders in Fashion: I grandi personaggi della moda, Bologna, 1983.

Giacomozzi, Silvia, The Italian Look Reflected, Milan, 1984.

Aragno, Bonizza Giordani, Moda Italia: Creativity and Technology in the Italian Fashion System, Milan, 1988.

Tutino Vercelloni, Isa, editor, Missonologia: The World of Missoni, Milan, 1994.

Stegemeyer, Anne, Who's Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.

Articles

- Buck, Joan Juliet, "The Missoni Way," in WWD, 12 March 1975.
- Klensch, Elsa, "Knit Together for 25 Years," in the New York Post, 24 May 1978.
- Morris, Bernardine, "Missoni's Clothes a Hit As Milan Showings Open," in the New York Times, 26 March 1979.
- Buckley, Richard, "Tai and Rosita: Designing Missoni for the Future," in DNR, 4 January 1984.
- Piaggi, Anna, "Ottavio e Rosita Missoni: legati a doppio filo," in L'Uomo Vogue (Milan), October 1987.
- "Missoni in mostra: freschi di stampa," in Donna (Milan), February 1988.
- "In diretta da Milano: l'energia concentrata di Missoni," in Donna, October 1988.
- "The Missoni Story," in Donna supplement, October 1988.
- Menkes, Suzy, "Missoni: First Family of Knits," in the International Herald Tribune, 12 July 1994.
- Muir, Lucie, "Italian Designers Bring Body Conscious Looks Center Stage," in WWD, 18 September 1996.
- "Missoni," in WWD, 24 February 1998.
- Zargani, Luisa, "Missoni Planning New Bridge Line for Women," in WWD, 23 July 1998.
- Williamson, Rusty, "Missonis Win Stanley Award," in WWD, 20 May 1999.
- Sloan, Carole, "Missoni on a Mission," in Home Textiles Today, 13 November 2000.
- Jensen, Tanya, "Missoni's Fiery Femininity," online at Fashion Windows, www.fashionwindows.com, 2 October 2001.

* * *

Missoni exemplifies success in a specific fashion area, knitwear for men and women. In the knitwear business since 1953, the business begun by Ottavio (Tai) and Rosita Missoni took off with recognition by Anna Piaggi in 1965 and was one of the landmark enterprises of the Italian renaissance in postwar fashion products through the 1960s and 1970s. In 1968 and 1969, Missoni garnered worldwide attention for knit dresses, coats, and sweaters that revived the sensational appeal of knits in the 1920s. From a start in producing the finest knits, the Missoni repertory came to include pullovers, long coats, chemises, trousers, and skirts. Even more, in the 1970s, the Missonis' deliberate allegiance to Milan heralded that city's eminence as a fashion center and helped create Milan fashion week.

Primarily creators of exceptional knitwear, Missoni has been noted as an art as much as a business. Technology provides a range of fluid knits and special effects, but the identifying and indescribable aspect of the Missoni knits is color, the affinity to art. Most importantly, Missoni brought a vivid sense of imagination to knits, rescuing them from the heirlooms and old-fashioned aspects of handknits and from the conventional sameness of many machine-knitted products. Like many Italian products of the postwar period, the value of the product was not in its handwork, but in the unquestionable supremacy of design attained through machine. Today computers and sophisticated machines make the Missoni knits, yet they remain exceptional in their colors and texture and have become a staple in both menswear and womenswear.

Missoni, fall/winter 2001–02 collection: wool lame top and matching plaid pants. © AP/Wide World Photos.

Tai Missoni's introduction to the knitwear business was as an athlete. Knitwear was for active sports, but by 1958 a striped Missoni knit shirtdress was produced and the crossover from sports to casual living was underway. The sports heritage remains in some graphic boldness, including stripes and zig-zags and even patchwork. What enhances Missoni for daywear and even for evening (especially with Lurex) are the subtleties within. Rosita told Elsa Klensch, writing for the New York Post (24 May 1978), "Our philosophy since we went into business has been that a piece of clothing should be like a work of art. It should not be bought for a special occasion or because it's in fashion, but because a woman likes it...and feels she could wear it forever."

Little the Missonis have produced ever depended upon fashion. Instead, their knits seem perennial: a Missoni design might be worn with a favored color one season and still be compatible with other colors in other seasons. Bernardine Morris of the New York Times (26 March, 1979) believed the Missonis "elevated knitted clothes to a form of art," and as such they were recognized as visible status symbols in the 1970s and 1980s. By the middle 1990s the Missoni name graced a sexier style of apparel, brought about by Angela Missoni, who had begun designing her own signature collection in 1992. Celebrities flocked to buy the sensual knitwear, the new enthusiasts including Nicole Kidman, Jennifer Lopez, Ashley Judd, and Julia Roberts.

In 1997 Angela took the reins of the company and over the next few years increased brand awareness through a wide range of licensing, from rugs to footwear. New flagships in New York and Paris were opened, while a new bridge line, M Missoni, was introduced for spring-summer 1999. By the early 2000s, Missoni was more than a vital force in knitwear; the firm had gone far beyond its founders' original vision to encompass Missoni designs for an entire lifestyle.

—Richard Martin; updated by Owen James

MIYAKE, Issey

Japanese designer

Born: Kazumaru Miyake in Hiroshima, Japan, 22 April 1938. Education: Studied at Tama Art University, Tokyo, 1959–63, and at École de la Chambre Syndicale de la Couture Parisienne, 1965. Career: Design assistant, Guy Laroche, 1966–68, and Givenchy, 1968–69; designer, Geoffrey Beene in New York, 1969–70; established Miyake Design Studio in Tokyo, 1970; theater designer, from 1980; first U.S. boutique opened, New York, 1988; director, Issey Miyake International, Issey Miyake and Associates, Issey Miyake Europe, Issey Miyake USA, and Issey Miyake On Limits; lines include Issey Sport, Plantation, Pleats Please (introduced, 1993), and A-POC (introduced, 1999); A-POC stores opened in Tokyo and Paris, 2000; new HQ and store in TriBeCa, 2001; fragrances include L'Eau d'Issey, 1992; L'Eau d'Issey pour Homme, 1995; Le Feu d'Issey, 1998. Exhibitions: Issey Miyake and Twelve Black Girls, Tokyo and Osaka, 1976; Issey Miyake in the Museum, Seibu Museum, Tokyo, 1977; A Piece of Cloth, Tokyo, 1977; Fly With Issey Miyake, Tokyo and Kyoto, 1977; East Meets West, International Design Conference, Colorado, 1979; Les Tissus Imprimés d'Issey Miyake, Musée de l'Impression sur Étoffes, Mulhouse, 1979; Intimate Architecture: Contemporary Clothing, Massachusetts Institute of Technology, 1982; Bodyworks, international touring exhibition, 1983; A New Wave in Fashion: Three Japanese Designers, Phoenix Art Museum, Arizona, 1983; Issey Miyake Bodyworks: Fashion Without Taboos, Victoria and Albert Museum, London, 1985; À Un, Musée des Arts Décoratifs, Paris, 1988; Issey Miyake Pleats Please, Touko Museum of Contemporary Art, Tokyo, 1990; Ten Sen Men, Touko Museum of Contemporary Art, Tokyo, 1990; Twist, Naoshima Contemporary Art Museum, 1992; Making Things, Paris, 1999. Awards: Japan Fashion Editors Club award, 1974; Mainichi Newspaper Fashion award, 1976, 1984; Pratt Institute Design Excellence award, New York, 1979; Council of Fashion Designers of America award, 1983; Fashion Oscar, Paris, 1985; Mainichi Fashion Grand Prix, 1989, 1993; Officier de l'Ordre des Arts et Lettres, France, 1989; Asahi prize, 1992; Honorary Doctorate, Royal College of Art, London, 1993; Hiroshima Art prize, 1991; Chevalier de l'Ordre National de la Legion d'Honneur, Paris, 1993; Tokyo Creation award, 1994; Shiju Housho from the Japanese Government, 1997. Address: 1–23 Ohayamacho, Shibuya-ku, Tokyo 151, Japan. Websites: www.isseymiyake.com, www.pleatsplease.com

PUBLICATIONS

By MIYAKE:

Books

- East Meets West*, edited by Kazuko Koide and Ikko Tanaka, Tokyo, 1978.
- Bodyworks*, edited by Shozo Tsurumoto, Tokyo, 1983.
- Issey Miyake and Miyake Design Studio 1970–1985*, Tokyo, 1985.
- Pleats Please*, Tokyo, 1990.
- Inspired Flower Arrangements*, with Toshiro Kawase, Tokyo, 1990.
- Madeleine Vionnet*, with Betty Kirke, San Francisco, 1998.
- Making Things*, Paris, 1999.

On MIYAKE:

Books

- Deslandres, Yvonne, Les Tissus Imprimés d'Issey Miyake [exhibition catalogue], Mulhouse, 1979.
- Hayden Gallery, Massachusetts Institute of Technology, Intimate Architecture: Contemporary Clothing Design [exhibition catalogue], Cambridge, 1982.

Issey Miyake, spring/summer 2001 ready-to-wear collection. © AFP/CORBIS.

name graced a sexier style of apparel, brought about by Angela Missoni, who had begun designing her own signature collection in 1992. Celebrities flocked to buy the sensual knitwear, the new enthusiasts including Nicole Kidman, Jennifer Lopez, Ashley Judd, and Julia Roberts.

In 1997 Angela took the reins of the company and over the next few years increased brand awareness through a wide range of licensing, from rugs to footwear. New flagships in New York and Paris were opened, while a new bridge line, M Missoni, was introduced for spring-summer 1999. By the early 2000s, Missoni was more than a vital force in knitwear; the firm had gone far beyond its founders' original vision to encompass Missoni designs for an entire lifestyle.

—Richard Martin; updated by Owen James

MIYAKE, Issey

Japanese designer

Born: Kazumaru Miyake in Hiroshima, Japan, 22 April 1938. Education: Studied at Tama Art University, Tokyo, 1959–63, and at École de la Chambre Syndicale de la Couture Parisienne, 1965. Career: Design assistant, Guy Laroche, 1966–68, and Givenchy, 1968–69; designer, Geoffrey Beene in New York, 1969–70; established Miyake Design Studio in Tokyo, 1970; theater designer, from 1980; first U.S. boutique opened, New York, 1988; director, Issey Miyake International, Issey Miyake and Associates, Issey Miyake Europe, Issey Miyake USA, and Issey Miyake On Limits; lines include Issey Sport, Plantation, Pleats Please (introduced, 1993), and A-POC (introduced, 1999); A-POC stores opened in Tokyo and Paris, 2000; new HQ and store in TriBeCa, 2001; fragrances include L'Eau d'Issey, 1992; L'Eau d'Issey pour Homme, 1995; Le Feu d'Issey, 1998. Exhibitions: Issey Miyake and Twelve Black Girls, Tokyo and Osaka, 1976; Issey Miyake in the Museum, Seibu Museum, Tokyo, 1977; A Piece of Cloth, Tokyo, 1977; Fly With Issey Miyake, Tokyo and Kyoto, 1977; East Meets West, International Design Conference, Colorado, 1979; Les Tissus Imprimés d'Issey Miyake, Musée de l'Impression sur Étoffes, Mulhouse, 1979; Intimate Architecture: Contemporary Clothing, Massachusetts Institute of Technology, 1982; Bodyworks, international touring exhibition, 1983; A New Wave in Fashion: Three Japanese Designers, Phoenix Art Museum, Arizona, 1983; Issey Miyake Bodyworks: Fashion Without Taboos, Victoria and Albert Museum, London, 1985; À Un, Musée des Arts Décoratifs, Paris, 1988; Issey Miyake Pleats Please, Touko Museum of Contemporary Art, Tokyo, 1990; Ten Sen Men, Touko Museum of Contemporary Art, Tokyo, 1990; Twist, Naoshima Contemporary Art Museum, 1992; Making Things, Paris, 1999. Awards: Japan Fashion Editors Club award, 1974; Mainichi Newspaper Fashion award, 1976, 1984; Pratt Institute Design Excellence award, New York, 1979; Council of Fashion Designers of America award, 1983; Fashion Oscar, Paris, 1985; Mainichi Fashion Grand Prix, 1989, 1993; Officier de l'Ordre des Arts et Lettres, France, 1989; Asahi prize, 1992; Honorary Doctorate, Royal College of Art, London, 1993; Hiroshima Art prize, 1991; Chevalier de l'Ordre National de la Legion d'Honneur, Paris, 1993; Tokyo Creation award, 1994; Shiju Housho from the Japanese Government, 1997. Address: 1–23 Ohayamacho, Shibuya-ku, Tokyo 151, Japan. Websites: www.isseymiyake.com, www.pleatsplease.com

PUBLICATIONS

By MIYAKE:

Books

- East Meets West*, edited by Kazuko Koide and Ikko Tanaka, Tokyo, 1978.
- Bodyworks*, edited by Shozo Tsurumoto, Tokyo, 1983.
- Issey Miyake and Miyake Design Studio 1970–1985*, Tokyo, 1985.
- Pleats Please*, Tokyo, 1990.
- Inspired Flower Arrangements*, with Toshiro Kawase, Tokyo, 1990.
- Madeleine Vionnet*, with Betty Kirke, San Francisco, 1998.
- Making Things*, Paris, 1999.

On MIYAKE:

Books

- Deslandres, Yvonne, Les Tissus Imprimés d'Issey Miyake [exhibition catalogue], Mulhouse, 1979.
- Hayden Gallery, Massachusetts Institute of Technology, Intimate Architecture: Contemporary Clothing Design [exhibition catalogue], Cambridge, 1982.

Issey Miyake, spring/summer 2001 ready-to-wear collection. © AFP/CORBIS.

Issey Miyake, spring/summer 2001 ready-to-wear collection. © AP/Wide World Photos.

Phoenix Art Museum, A New Wave in Fashion: Three Japanese Designers [exhibition catalogue], Phoenix, 1983.

Koren, Leonard, New Fashion Japan, Tokyo and New York, 1984.

Milbank, Caroline Rennolds, Couture: The Great Designers, New York, 1985.

Sparke, Penny, Japanese Design, London, 1987.

Calloway, Nicholas, ed., Issey Miyake: Photographs by Irving Penn, Boston, 1988.

Coleridge, Nicholas, The Fashion Conspiracy, London, 1988.

Howell, Georgina, Sultans of Style: Thirty Years of Fashion and Passion 1960–1990, London, 1990.

Miyake Design Studio, eds., Ten Sen Men, Tokyo, 1990.

Miyake Design Studio, eds., Issey Miyake by Irving Penn 1991–1992, Tokyo, 1992.

Miyake Design Studio, eds., Issey Miyake by Irving Penn 1993–1995, Tokyo, 1995.

Hiesinger, Kathryn B., and Felice Fischer, Japanese Design: A Survey Since 1950, New York, 1995.

Jouve, Marie-Andrée, Issey Miyake, New York, 1997.

Holborn, Mark, introduction, Irving Penn Regards the Work of Issey Miyake: Photographs 1975–1998, Boston, 1999.

Watson, Linda, Vogue Twentieth Century Fashion: 100 Years of Style by Decade and Designer, London, 1999.

Articles

Lewis, J., "The Man Who Put Show in Fashion Shows," in the Far East Economic Review (Hong Kong), 22 January 1979.

Bancou, M., "Issey Miyake Revisited," in American Fabrics & Fashions (Columbia, SC), Spring 1979.

"Issey Miyake," in the New Yorker, 8 and 15 November 1982.

"Issey Miyake," in Art and Design (London), March 1985.

Popham, Peter, "The Emperor's New Clothes," in Blueprint (London), March 1985.

"Issey Miyake's Bodyworks," in Domus (Milan), May 1985.

White, Lesley, "Miyake's Marvelous But Issey Art," in Cosmopolitan (London), August 1985.

"Issey Miyake: Dateless Fashion," in Art and Design (London), October 1986.

Angel, Sally, "Zen and the Art of Fashion," in Blueprint, October 1987.

- Knafo, Robert, "Issey Miyake is Changing the Way Men View Clothes," in Connoisseur (New York), March 1988.
- "Eye of the Artists: Issey Miyake," in Vogue, October 1988.
- Brampton, Sally, "Modern Master," in Elle (London), June 1989.
- Martin, Richard, "The Cubism of Issey Miyake," in Textile & Text (New York), 12/4, 1990.
- Penn, Irving, and Ingrid Sischy, "Pleats Please," in Interview, September 1990.
- Tilton, Mary, "Issey Miyake: Designer for the Millennium," in Threads (Newtown, CT), June/July 1991.
- Gross, Michael, "Issey Does It," in New York, 22 July 1991.
- Bucks, Suzy, "Clothes That Grow on You," in the Independent on Sunday (London), 3 July 1994.
- Spindler, Amy M., "Art or Vanity? Fashion's Ambiguity," in the New York Times, 13 December 1994.
- Schiro, Anne-Marie, "Photogenic, But Out of Focus," in the New York Times, 20 March 1995.
- Menkes, Suzy, "Show, Not Clothes, Becomes the Message," in the International Herald Tribune, 20 March 1995.
- Wood, Dana, "Miyake's Lust for Life," in WWD, 18 December 1996.
- Edelson, Sharon, "Miyake Rides SoHo Wave," in WWD, 27 August 1997.
- Simon, Joan, "Miyake Modern," in Art in America (New York), 2 February 1999.
- Dam, Julie, "Issey Miyake," in Time International, 23 August 1999.
- Edelson, Sharon, "Miyake Moves Downtown: New Store, New Concept," in WWD, 19 July 2000.

* * *

Architect Arata Isozaki began an essay in Issey Miyake's East Meets West with the question, "What are clothes?" The question, perhaps too fundamental and unnecessary for most designers, is the matrix of Issey Miyake's clothing. Possibly more than any other designer of the 20th or 21st centuries, Miyake inquired into the nature of apparel, investigating adornment and dress functions from all parts of the world and from all uses and in all forms, to speculate about clothing. Aroused to question fashion's viability in the social revolution he observed in Paris in 1968, Miyake sought a clothing of particular lifestyle utility, of renewed coalition with textile integrity, and of wholly reconsidered form. In exploring ideas emanating from the technology of cloth, Miyake created great geometric shaping and the most effortless play of drapery on the bias to accommodate body motion since his paragon Madeleine Vionnet.

Miyake's highly successful Windcoats wrap the wearer in an abundance of cloth but also generate marvelously transformative shapes when compressed or billowing and extended. In these efforts, Miyake created garments redolent of human history but largely unprecedented in the history of dress. As a visionary, he often seemed to abandon commercial ideas of dress for more extravagantly new and ideal experiments, such as a 1976 knit square with sleeves, which became a coat with matching bikini; or fall/winter 1989–90 pleated collection which was a radical cubist vision of the human body and of its movement. Miyake has also worked with traditional kimonos, and has even experimented with paper and other materials to find the right medium for apparel. Despite unusual and some thoroughly utopian ideals, Miyake appeals to a clientèle of forward thinkers and designers who wear his clothing with the same zeal and energy from which they were created.

Miyake gives his work interpretative issues and contexts that contribute to their meaning, acknowledging the garments as prolific signs. His two earliest books East Meets West (Tokyo, 1978) and Bodyworks (Tokyo, 1983), were both accompanied by museum exhibitions of his many creations. Miyake can be anthropologically basic; again and again, he returns to tattooing as a basic body adornment, rendered in clothing and tights and bodysuits. He relishes the juxtaposition between the most rustic and basic and the most advanced, almost to prove human history a circle rather a linear progression. No other designer—with the possible exception of the more laconic Geoffrey Beene, for whom Miyake worked briefly and with whom he maintains a mutual admiration—interprets his work as deliberately and thoughtfully as Miyake.

Such allusiveness and context would have little value were it not for the abiding principles of Miyake's work. He relies upon the body as unerringly as a dancer might. He demands a freedom of motion that reveals its genesis in 1968. If Miyake's concept of the body is the root of all of his thinking, it is a highly conceptual, reasoned body. His books have customarily shown friends and clients—young and old—wearing his clothing. They come from East and West; they do not possess a perfect anatomy or the streamlined physique of body sculptures, but they are in some way ideals to Miyake.

Miyake's works have placed him in the worlds of both clothing designer and artist. His designs explore space and natural forms but are grounded in the understanding that they are to be worn. They exist in one form, only to be transformed when a body gives the piece a third dimension. This transforming power is evident in the endless variations of his pleats collection, which first appeared in his 1989 and was expanded into the Pleats Please line in 1993. Garments were constructed first and then pleated, a reversal of the standard process. Huge garments made of lightweight polyester were fed into a pleating machine and the resulting clothing was easy to wash, quick to dry, and wrinkle-resistant. This practicality reflected Miyake's dedication to the universality of his designs and proved to be a great commercial success. He opened the first Pleats Please store in SoHo in 1998, and the line is one of his most widely recognized.

Miyake's continual questioning and exploration of his own work led to another revolutionary concept in clothing design—mass-produced clothes designed to be individualized by each wearer. In 1999 he introduced the A-POC line, an abbreviation for A Piece of Cloth. In this line, the wearer takes scissors to a section of a continuous knitted tube with cutting guides to fashion her own garment, varying hem, sleeve lengths, and the neckline. The first store dedicated to the A-POC line opened in Tokyo in 1999. The A-POC line is but one example of how Miyake's designs originate with the fabric. His fascination with textiles continues to be the springboard for his work; whether the textiles are natural or synthetic, handwoven or high tech, Miyake transforms fabric into clothing that brings its wearer the joy of beauty and movement.

—Richard Martin; updated by Janette Goff Dixon

MIZRAHI, Isaac

American designer

Born: New York City, 14 October 1961. Education: Attended New York High School for the Performing Arts; graduated from Parsons School of Design, New York, 1982. Career: Assistant designer,

- Knafo, Robert, "Issey Miyake is Changing the Way Men View Clothes," in Connoisseur (New York), March 1988.
- "Eye of the Artists: Issey Miyake," in Vogue, October 1988.
- Brampton, Sally, "Modern Master," in Elle (London), June 1989.
- Martin, Richard, "The Cubism of Issey Miyake," in Textile & Text (New York), 12/4, 1990.
- Penn, Irving, and Ingrid Sischy, "Pleats Please," in Interview, September 1990.
- Tilton, Mary, "Issey Miyake: Designer for the Millennium," in Threads (Newtown, CT), June/July 1991.
- Gross, Michael, "Issey Does It," in New York, 22 July 1991.
- Bucks, Suzy, "Clothes That Grow on You," in the Independent on Sunday (London), 3 July 1994.
- Spindler, Amy M., "Art or Vanity? Fashion's Ambiguity," in the New York Times, 13 December 1994.
- Schiro, Anne-Marie, "Photogenic, But Out of Focus," in the New York Times, 20 March 1995.
- Menkes, Suzy, "Show, Not Clothes, Becomes the Message," in the International Herald Tribune, 20 March 1995.
- Wood, Dana, "Miyake's Lust for Life," in WWD, 18 December 1996.
- Edelson, Sharon, "Miyake Rides SoHo Wave," in WWD, 27 August 1997.
- Simon, Joan, "Miyake Modern," in Art in America (New York), 2 February 1999.
- Dam, Julie, "Issey Miyake," in Time International, 23 August 1999.
- Edelson, Sharon, "Miyake Moves Downtown: New Store, New Concept," in WWD, 19 July 2000.

* * *

Architect Arata Isozaki began an essay in Issey Miyake's East Meets West with the question, "What are clothes?" The question, perhaps too fundamental and unnecessary for most designers, is the matrix of Issey Miyake's clothing. Possibly more than any other designer of the 20th or 21st centuries, Miyake inquired into the nature of apparel, investigating adornment and dress functions from all parts of the world and from all uses and in all forms, to speculate about clothing. Aroused to question fashion's viability in the social revolution he observed in Paris in 1968, Miyake sought a clothing of particular lifestyle utility, of renewed coalition with textile integrity, and of wholly reconsidered form. In exploring ideas emanating from the technology of cloth, Miyake created great geometric shaping and the most effortless play of drapery on the bias to accommodate body motion since his paragon Madeleine Vionnet.

Miyake's highly successful Windcoats wrap the wearer in an abundance of cloth but also generate marvelously transformative shapes when compressed or billowing and extended. In these efforts, Miyake created garments redolent of human history but largely unprecedented in the history of dress. As a visionary, he often seemed to abandon commercial ideas of dress for more extravagantly new and ideal experiments, such as a 1976 knit square with sleeves, which became a coat with matching bikini; or fall/winter 1989–90 pleated collection which was a radical cubist vision of the human body and of its movement. Miyake has also worked with traditional kimonos, and has even experimented with paper and other materials to find the right medium for apparel. Despite unusual and some thoroughly utopian ideals, Miyake appeals to a clientèle of forward thinkers and designers who wear his clothing with the same zeal and energy from which they were created.

Miyake gives his work interpretative issues and contexts that contribute to their meaning, acknowledging the garments as prolific signs. His two earliest books East Meets West (Tokyo, 1978) and Bodyworks (Tokyo, 1983), were both accompanied by museum exhibitions of his many creations. Miyake can be anthropologically basic; again and again, he returns to tattooing as a basic body adornment, rendered in clothing and tights and bodysuits. He relishes the juxtaposition between the most rustic and basic and the most advanced, almost to prove human history a circle rather a linear progression. No other designer—with the possible exception of the more laconic Geoffrey Beene, for whom Miyake worked briefly and with whom he maintains a mutual admiration—interprets his work as deliberately and thoughtfully as Miyake.

Such allusiveness and context would have little value were it not for the abiding principles of Miyake's work. He relies upon the body as unerringly as a dancer might. He demands a freedom of motion that reveals its genesis in 1968. If Miyake's concept of the body is the root of all of his thinking, it is a highly conceptual, reasoned body. His books have customarily shown friends and clients—young and old—wearing his clothing. They come from East and West; they do not possess a perfect anatomy or the streamlined physique of body sculptures, but they are in some way ideals to Miyake.

Miyake's works have placed him in the worlds of both clothing designer and artist. His designs explore space and natural forms but are grounded in the understanding that they are to be worn. They exist in one form, only to be transformed when a body gives the piece a third dimension. This transforming power is evident in the endless variations of his pleats collection, which first appeared in his 1989 and was expanded into the Pleats Please line in 1993. Garments were constructed first and then pleated, a reversal of the standard process. Huge garments made of lightweight polyester were fed into a pleating machine and the resulting clothing was easy to wash, quick to dry, and wrinkle-resistant. This practicality reflected Miyake's dedication to the universality of his designs and proved to be a great commercial success. He opened the first Pleats Please store in SoHo in 1998, and the line is one of his most widely recognized.

Miyake's continual questioning and exploration of his own work led to another revolutionary concept in clothing design—mass-produced clothes designed to be individualized by each wearer. In 1999 he introduced the A-POC line, an abbreviation for A Piece of Cloth. In this line, the wearer takes scissors to a section of a continuous knitted tube with cutting guides to fashion her own garment, varying hem, sleeve lengths, and the neckline. The first store dedicated to the A-POC line opened in Tokyo in 1999. The A-POC line is but one example of how Miyake's designs originate with the fabric. His fascination with textiles continues to be the springboard for his work; whether the textiles are natural or synthetic, handwoven or high tech, Miyake transforms fabric into clothing that brings its wearer the joy of beauty and movement.

—Richard Martin; updated by Janette Goff Dixon

MIZRAHI, Isaac

American designer

Born: New York City, 14 October 1961. Education: Attended New York High School for the Performing Arts; graduated from Parsons School of Design, New York, 1982. Career: Assistant designer, Isaac Mizrahi taking a bow after showing his spring 1997 collection. © AP/Wide World Photos.

Perry Ellis, New York, 1982–83; womenswear designer, Jeffrey Banks, New York, 1984; designer, Calvin Klein, New York, 1985–87; formed own company, 1987; menswear collection introduced, 1990; began designing costumes for ballet and modern dance productions, from 1990; designed accessories line, 1992; handbags, 1993; shoes, 1997; lost backing and closed business, 1998; debut of one-man show, LES MIZrahi, 2000. Awards: Council of Fashion Designers of America award, 1988, 1989, 1991; Fashion Industry Foundation award, 1990; Michaelangelo Shoe award, New York, 1993; Dallas Fashion award for Excellence.

PUBLICATIONS

On MIZRAHI:

Books

Martin, Richard, and Harold Koda, Bloom, Metropolitan Museum of Art, 1995.

Stegemeyer, Anne, Who's Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.

Articles

"Mr. Clean: New Designer Isaac Mizrahi," in Vogue, February 1988.
Slonim, Jeffrey J., and Torkil Gudnason, "Retro-Active: Back to the 1960s with Isaac Mizrahi," in Interview, March 1988.

Foley, Bridget, "Isaac Mizrahi: Setting Out for Stardom," in WWD, 18 April 1988.

"Color Me Chic," in Connoisseur (New York), October 1988.

Hoare, Sarajane, "Vogue's Spy: Isaac Mizrahi," in Vogue (London), November 1988.

Bender, Karen, "Isaac Mizrahi," in Taxi (New York), February 1989.
Mansfield, Stephanie, "Nobody Beats the Miz," in Vogue, February 1989.

Mower, Sarah, "Isaac Mizrahi," in Vogue (London), September 1989.

Jeal, Nicola, "The Divine Mr. M.," in the Observer Magazine (London), 1 April 1990.

Hepple, Keith, "Plum in the Middle of the Pomegranate," in The Independent (London), 12 April 1990.

Menkes, Suzy, "Mizrahi: The Shooting Star," in the International Herald Tribune, 17 April 1990.

Wayne, George, "Brooklyn Kid K.O.s Couturiers," in Interview, June 1990.

Talley, André Leon, "The Kings of Color," in Vogue, September 1990.

Gross, Michael, "Slaves of Fashion: Isaac Mizrahi, the Great Hip Hope," in New York Magazine, 1 October 1990.

DeCaro, Frank, "Mizrahi Loves Company," in Mademoiselle (New York), January 1991.

"Isaac Mizrahi," in Current Biography, January 1991.

Bernhardt, Sandra, "I and Me," in Harper's Bazaar, March 1993.

- Foley, Bridget, "Hard Acts to Follow: Isaac Mizrahi," in WWD, 24 October 1994.
- Spindler, Amy M., "Cocktails, Anyone? Clothes that Strut," in the New York Times, 2 November 1994.
- Menkes, Suzy, "Mizrahi's All-American Swirls," in the International Herald Tribune, 3 November 1994.
- Ezesky, Lauren, "Isaac Unbound," in Paper (New York), March 1995.
- Spindler, Amy M., "Luxurious Armor by Karan, Klein, Mizrahi," in the New York Times, 8 April 1995.
- "Dueling Isaacs," in WWD, 10 April 1995.
- Pogrebin, Robin, "Mizrahi, Once Again the Main Attraction, Sings it Like it is," in the New York Times, 3 October 2000.
- Mattingly, Kate, "From Off the Rack to Off the Wall," in Dance Magazine, October 2000.
- Malkin, Marc S., "Isaac Mizrahi's Next Stage," in US Weekly, 6 November 2000.
- Comita, Jenny, "Life After Isaac," in Vogue, May 2001.

* * *

Isaac Mizrahi worked, upon graduation from Parsons School of Design, for Perry Ellis, Jeffrey Banks, and Calvin Klein. When he started his own business in 1987, he intimately knew the world of American sportswear at its best, but his work refined the sportswear model by a special sense of sophistication and glamor. His ideals, beyond those he worked for, were such American purists as Norell, Halston, Beene, and McCordell, each a designer of utmost sophistication. Suzy Menkes analyzed in the International Herald Tribune in April 1990: "The clean colors and Ivy League image of Perry Ellis sportswear might seem to be the seminal influence on Mizrahi. But he himself claims inspiration from his mother's wardrobe of all-American designers, especially the glamorous simplicity of Norman Norell."

It is as if Mizrahi was challenged by distilling the most well-bred form of each garment to an understated glamor, whether tartan taken to a sensuous evening gown but still buckled as if Balmoral livery; pocketbooks and luggage ingeniously incorporated into clothing with the practical pocket panache of McCordell; or versions of high style in adaptations of men's bathrobes or sweatshirting used for evening. While Mizrahi was often commended for the youthfulness of his clothing, the praise was for the freshness of his perception, his ability to recalculate a classic, not just a market for young women. His interest in the Empire waistline; his practicality of wardrobe separates in combination; and his leaps between day and evening addressed all women equally. In the early 1990s, many designers and manufacturers saw the value of simplification: Mizrahi sought the pure in tandem with the cosmopolitan.

When Sarah Mower of Vogue described Mizrahi in September 1989 as "that rare thing in contemporary design: a life-enhancing intelligence on the loose," she rightly characterized his revisionist, rational, distilling, pure vision. With his fall 1988 collection Mizrahi was immediately recognized by the New York Times as "this year's hottest new designer" in unusual color combinations (such as rust and mustard and orange-peel and pink) as well as the diversity of silhouettes from baby-doll dresses to evening jumpsuits to long dresses.

Mizrahi had clearly demonstrated the range of a commercially viable designer while at the same time demonstrating his simplifying glamor and the cool nonchalant charm of his smart (intellectually and aesthetically) clothing. The spa collection of 1988 included rompers and baseball jackets and playsuits as well as the debonair excess of trousers with paperbag waist. His spring 1989 collection assembled sources from all over the fashion spectrum to create a unified vision of elegance and appeal. The fall 1989 collection featured tartan (later developed by Mizrahi for a Twyla Tharp American Ballet Theater production in 1990) with most extraordinary accompaniment. In a notable instance, New York (21 August 1989) showed Mizrahi's tartan dress with his raccoon-trimmed silk taffeta parka in a perfect assembly of the wild and the urbane.

In 1990 Mizrahi showed a short-lived menswear line and sustained his color studies, creating double-faced wools and sportswear elements in watercolor-like colors, delicate yet deliberate. Spring 1990 was a typical Mizrahi transmogrification: black and white patterns recalling both art déco and the 1960s was, in fact, derived from costume for the Ballets Russes. In 1991 Mizrahi's themes were American, creating a kind of Puritan revival in dresses with collars and bows in spring/summer 1991 and an American ethnic parade in fall 1991, including Native American dress and a notable totem-pole dress inspired by Native American art.

Mizrahi's drive to find the most sophisticated version of each concept he developed was the leitmotif of his work. His spring 1991 collection examined motifs of the 1960s, but with a clever sharpness not observed in other designers of the same year looking back to the period. In 1991 his tube dresses with flounces were inspired by Norell, but given proportion. McCordell's audacious applications of cotton piqué are extended by Mizrahi's love of the same material and Halston's radical simplicity is inevitably a source for any designer longing to return to essential form. Mizrahi's color fields owed their consciousness to Perry Ellis, but the particular color sensibility was Mizrahi's own. Mizrahi's immaculate, ingenious modernism was as clearly aware of sources as it was pushed toward the clarification of form.

Mizrahi had referred to his style as a "classic New York look," which presumably meant a casual American idiom, but inflected with big-city reserve and refinement. Mizrahi captured something of Manhattan chic and glamor of the 1940s and 1950s. His fashion was indescribably beautiful in subtlety and sophistication. Yet Mizrahi soon gave it all up to pursue another dream—performing. From the early 1990s Mizrahi had begun collaborating with choreographers like Twyla Tharp and Mark Morris, and designed costumes for an increasing number of ballets, modern dance productions, and even film.

Mizrahi himself was the subject of a documentary film, Unzipped, detailing the assemblage of his 1994 fall collection, working with Douglas Keeve, who directed, and Michael Alden, who produced. Released commercially to raise funds for varied AIDS programs, the experience must have helped crystallize Mizrahi's direction for the future. In 1998, after Chanel pulled its backing, Mizrahi closed his fashion business and was suddenly with little to do. Within a year he turned in a new direction, writing a one-man show about his life. The funny, satiric cabaret show was LES MIZrahi, yet the only similarity to the long-running and much honored show, Les Misérables was in name only. LES MIZrahi, debuted in Greenwich House Theatre in New York in October 2000, and was well received by critics and audiences.

For those yearning for the perfectly designed Mizrahi dress or outfit, a former protégée, Behnaz Sarafpour, garnered raves for her debut collection in 2001. Amid the praise for the black and white collection, however, were comments about Mizrahi's obvious influence on her style. For his part, Mizrahi declared in the May 2001 Vogue, "She knows what people really want to wear.... She's a great editor of her own accord. I learned as much from her as she did from me."

Generous, funny, immensely talented—that's Isaac Mizrahi. Whether on the stage, behind it designing costumes, or dressing Hollywood's elite, he made an indelible mark on the fashion scene. When asked by US Weekly in November 2000 if he missed designing, Mizrahi admitted this was so but countered, "I don't miss the business side of it. Just the idea of doing that makes me cringe." But would he ever return to designing? "I can't say never," he told US's Marc Malkin, "There are all sorts of ways to sell clothes that feel more like me."

—Richard Martin; updated by Owen James

MOLINARI, Anna

See BLUMARINE

MOLYNEUX, Edward H.

British designer

Born: Hampstead, London, 5 September 1891. Military Service: Served as captain in the British Army, World War I. Career: Worked for couturier Lucile in London and the U.S., 1911–14; opened own house, Paris, 1919; added branches in Monte Carlo, 1925, Cannes, 1927, and London, 1932; moved business to London, 1939–46; returned to Paris, added furs, perfume, lingerie, and millinery, 1946–49; turned business over to Jacques Griffe and retired, 1950; reopened as Studio Molyneux, Paris, 1965; retired permanently soon thereafter. Fragrances included Numéro Cinq, 1926, Vivre, 1930, and Rue Royale, 1943. Died: 23 March 1974, in Monte Carlo.

PUBLICATIONS

On MOLYNEUX:

Books

- Balmain, Pierre, My Years and Seasons, London, 1964.
 Carter, Ernestine, Magic Names of Fashion, New York, 1980.
 Milbank, Caroline Rennolds, Couture: The Great Designers, New York, 1985.
 de Marly, Diana, The History of Haute Couture, London, 1988.
 Stegemeyer, Anne, Who's Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.

Articles

- "Captain Edward Molyneux," [obituary] in the Times (London), 25 March 1974.
 Dobbs, Michael, "National Gallery Vulnerable to Provenance Questions," in the Washington Post, 20 May 2000.

* * *

Captain Edward Molyneux embodied the style he created in the 1920s and 1930s—an idle, slim ("never too rich or too thin"), elegant style on the verge of dissipation, at the edge of the outrageous, and always refined. His friendship with Noel Coward was kismet, two personifications of the sophisticated style that made both drawing-room comedy and its grace. Caroline Milbank, writing in Couture: The Great Designers (1985), described Molyneux "as the designer to whom a fashionable woman would turn if she wanted to be absolutely 'right' without being utterly predictable in the 1920s and 1930s."

Molyneux's ineffable decorum had come as a privilege of his own style liberation from Lucile, Lady Duff Gordon. Lucile's trademark was her rich proliferation of fine details and adornment. One would not characterize Lucile as florid, but one would certainly characterize Molyneux as chaste. His military self-presentation and English background did, however, make him seem even more Spartan in the world of French couture. Molyneux banned all superfluous decoration in an early and intuited version of modernist international style akin to the architecture of the period. He was a "modern" in his adoration of line, avoidance of excessive decoration, as well as in his engaging manner; he was undeniably modern in his love of luxurious materials and his embrace of modern circumstances, including the automobile.

While his work was most often in black, navy blue, beige, and grey, he had the sophistication as an art collector to collect late Impressionist and post-Impressionist paintings, shown in 1952 at the National Gallery of Art in Washington, D.C., sold to Ailsa Mellon Bruce, and later bequeathed to the National Gallery. Unfortunately, in early 2000s the origin of many of Molyneux's paintings came into question, after it became known that his principal dealer had collaborated with the Nazis. While it was not discovered how much if any of the collection had been stolen, Molyneux was not named as a knowing member of any scheme.

Molyneux loved bourgeois scenes of beauty, but he also created motoring outfits and easy-to-wear slip-like evening dresses for the leisure class of his time and superbly cut evening pajamas that could have costumed any Noel Coward comedy. Molyneux would be a designer successful at designing for and determining the lifestyle of his own social class, participant-observer in what Pierre Balmain called Molyneux's international set. His curious Franco-English snobbism belonged to a time and place; his two post-World War II business enterprises were of limited success, so fully was he the product and model of a world already forgotten.

The modern charm of Molyneux's creation was appreciated by Balmain who apprenticed with Molyneux in Paris. Balmain wrote in My Years and Seasons (London, 1964) of his regret on departing his first fashion job in the late 1930s, at Molyneux's, what he described as a "temple of subdued elegance... [where] the world's well-dressed women wore the inimitable two-pieces and tailored suits with pleated skirts, bearing the label of Molyneux." Balmain further praised Molyneux's consistent, reserved, understated couture, one often barely noticed by the fashion press, yet which was the manifestation of a conservative, continuous style.

Molyneux also designed for the theater and was a friend of Gertrude Lawrence who wore his clothing with a West End and Broadway panache, but the costumes never subsumed the actress. Molyneux's international set wore his tailored suits by day, but also could be seen at night in one or both nightclubs owned by Molyneux in partnership with hostess Elsa Maxwell wearing furs, long gowns, beaded chemises, and other elegant outfits by the designer.

Today designers who mingle with their clients are often criticized for social climbing. There is no evidence that such charges were placed against Molyneux as he moved so effortlessly and with soigné flair among the ladies he dressed. Ernestine Carter, writing in Magic editor of her own accord. I learned as much from her as she did from me."

Generous, funny, immensely talented—that's Isaac Mizrahi. Whether on the stage, behind it designing costumes, or dressing Hollywood's elite, he made an indelible mark on the fashion scene. When asked by US Weekly in November 2000 if he missed designing, Mizrahi admitted this was so but countered, "I don't miss the business side of it. Just the idea of doing that makes me cringe." But would he ever return to designing? "I can't say never," he told US's Marc Malkin, "There are all sorts of ways to sell clothes that feel more like me."

—Richard Martin; updated by Owen James

MOLINARI, Anna

See BLUMARINE

MOLYNEUX, Edward H.

British designer

Born: Hampstead, London, 5 September 1891. Military Service: Served as captain in the British Army, World War I. Career: Worked for couturier Lucile in London and the U.S., 1911–14; opened own house, Paris, 1919; added branches in Monte Carlo, 1925, Cannes, 1927, and London, 1932; moved business to London, 1939–46; returned to Paris, added furs, perfume, lingerie, and millinery, 1946–49; turned business over to Jacques Griffe and retired, 1950; reopened as Studio Molyneux, Paris, 1965; retired permanently soon thereafter. Fragrances included Numéro Cinq, 1926, Vivre, 1930, and Rue Royale, 1943. Died: 23 March 1974, in Monte Carlo.

PUBLICATIONS

On MOLYNEUX:

Books

- Balmain, Pierre, My Years and Seasons, London, 1964.
 Carter, Ernestine, Magic Names of Fashion, New York, 1980.
 Milbank, Caroline Rennolds, Couture: The Great Designers, New York, 1985.
 de Marly, Diana, The History of Haute Couture, London, 1988.
 Stegemeyer, Anne, Who's Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.

Articles

- "Captain Edward Molyneux," [obituary] in the Times (London), 25 March 1974.
 Dobbs, Michael, "National Gallery Vulnerable to Provenance Questions," in the Washington Post, 20 May 2000.

* * *

Captain Edward Molyneux embodied the style he created in the 1920s and 1930s—an idle, slim ("never too rich or too thin"), elegant style on the verge of dissipation, at the edge of the outrageous, and always refined. His friendship with Noel Coward was kismet, two personifications of the sophisticated style that made both drawing-room comedy and its grace. Caroline Milbank, writing in Couture: The Great Designers (1985), described Molyneux "as the designer to whom a fashionable woman would turn if she wanted to be absolutely 'right' without being utterly predictable in the 1920s and 1930s."

Molyneux's ineffable decorum had come as a privilege of his own style liberation from Lucile, Lady Duff Gordon. Lucile's trademark was her rich proliferation of fine details and adornment. One would not characterize Lucile as florid, but one would certainly characterize Molyneux as chaste. His military self-presentation and English background did, however, make him seem even more Spartan in the world of French couture. Molyneux banned all superfluous decoration in an early and intuited version of modernist international style akin to the architecture of the period. He was a "modern" in his adoration of line, avoidance of excessive decoration, as well as in his engaging manner; he was undeniably modern in his love of luxurious materials and his embrace of modern circumstances, including the automobile.

While his work was most often in black, navy blue, beige, and grey, he had the sophistication as an art collector to collect late Impressionist and post-Impressionist paintings, shown in 1952 at the National Gallery of Art in Washington, D.C., sold to Ailsa Mellon Bruce, and later bequeathed to the National Gallery. Unfortunately, in early 2000s the origin of many of Molyneux's paintings came into question, after it became known that his principal dealer had collaborated with the Nazis. While it was not discovered how much if any of the collection had been stolen, Molyneux was not named as a knowing member of any scheme.

Molyneux loved bourgeois scenes of beauty, but he also created motoring outfits and easy-to-wear slip-like evening dresses for the leisure class of his time and superbly cut evening pajamas that could have costumed any Noel Coward comedy. Molyneux would be a designer successful at designing for and determining the lifestyle of his own social class, participant-observer in what Pierre Balmain called Molyneux's international set. His curious Franco-English snobbism belonged to a time and place; his two post-World War II business enterprises were of limited success, so fully was he the product and model of a world already forgotten.

The modern charm of Molyneux's creation was appreciated by Balmain who apprenticed with Molyneux in Paris. Balmain wrote in My Years and Seasons (London, 1964) of his regret on departing his first fashion job in the late 1930s, at Molyneux's, what he described as a "temple of subdued elegance... [where] the world's well-dressed women wore the inimitable two-pieces and tailored suits with pleated skirts, bearing the label of Molyneux." Balmain further praised Molyneux's consistent, reserved, understated couture, one often barely noticed by the fashion press, yet which was the manifestation of a conservative, continuous style.

Molyneux also designed for the theater and was a friend of Gertrude Lawrence who wore his clothing with a West End and Broadway panache, but the costumes never subsumed the actress. Molyneux's international set wore his tailored suits by day, but also could be seen at night in one or both nightclubs owned by Molyneux in partnership with hostess Elsa Maxwell wearing furs, long gowns, beaded chemises, and other elegant outfits by the designer.

Today designers who mingle with their clients are often criticized for social climbing. There is no evidence that such charges were placed against Molyneux as he moved so effortlessly and with soigné flair among the ladies he dressed. Ernestine Carter, writing in Magic

Names of Fashion, called Molyneux “dashing and debonair,” comparing him to Fred Astaire. That he dressed women of the greatest propriety and restraint made it clear that, in dwelling among them, he was of like sensibility and shared spirit. It was Molyneux’s place in international café-society that allowed him to cavort with Noel Coward and gave the sobriety of his design its sense of belonging. Given that fashion went through so many changes and excesses in the 1920s and 1930s, Molyneux was a constant model of cool elegance.

—Richard Martin

MONDI TEXTILE GMBH

German fashion and accessory firm

Founded: in Munich by Herwig Zahm, 1967. Company History: Accessory collections added, 1970s; fashion lines, mainly women’s ready-to-wear, included Elementi, Mondi, Portara, Patrizia S, Braun, and Chris (by Christa Zahm); opened freestanding shops in Budapest, 1989, and New York, 1993; company purchased by Investcorp, 1993; issued its own credit cards in U.S., 1997; lost Investcorp backing and forced into bankruptcy, 1999; Mondi trademarks and worldwide licensing rights bought by Fehmi Chama, 1999; Gilmar Group signed license for women’s apparel line, launching in 2000; Patrizia S collection set to debut with new German licensee, 2001. Awards: Forum prize of the textile industry, 1986; Igedo’s International Fashion Marketing award, 1988; Fashion Oscar, Munich, 1991.

PUBLICATIONS

On MONDI:

Articles

- Morais, Richard, “Who is First in the Market, Sells,” in Forbes, 16 September 1991.
- “Investcorp Buys Stake in Mondi, and Pushes Ahead with Circle K,” in the Middle East Economic Digest, 8 January 1993.
- Dreir, Melissa, “Mondi Making Major Revamp,” in WWD, 5 January 1995.
- “Telling It Like It Is,” in WWD, 21 July 1995.
- Ozzard, Janet, “Mondi Recharges Battery,” in WWD, 21 February 1996.
- “Mondi of U.S. Starts to Offer its Own Plastic,” in WWD, 18 February 1997.
- Drier, Melissa, “Two German Houses Update for Spring 1999,” in WWD, 21 July 1998.
- Socha, Miles, “Mondi Goes Soft and Modern,” in WWD, 23 December 1998.
- Drier, Melissa, and Miles Socha, “Mondi Seeks Backer, Files for Insolvency,” in WWD, 10 September 1999.
- “Without Financing, Mondi Cancels Spring Collection,” in WWD, 1 October 1999.
- Drier, Melissa, and Vivki Young, “Mondi Signs Licensing Pact for a Women’s Apparel Line,” in WWD, 3 November 1999.
- Manning, Margie, “Closing,” in the St. Louis Business Journal, 29 November 1999.

* * *

The fashion house of Mondi was established in Munich in 1968 by Herwig Zahm, selling exclusive fashion coordinates and accessory goods. By 1995 Mondi sold products in over 54 countries worldwide, through 2,300 independent speciality stores, almost 100 company-owned stores and 200 franchised stores, including a capsule collection on the prestigious cruise liner Queen Elizabeth II. The fates were not kind to the German firm, however, and it lost its footing at the end of the 20th century.

The Mondi group once encompassed six major labels, yet in its later years had begun expanding. The early powerhouse labels were Portara (sophisticated fashion); Mondi (the main label); Chris by Christa Zahm (designer collection); Patrizia S by Mondi (larger-sized fashions) and Braun (sport and golf wear). The overall appeal was cosmopolitan, designed for American, European, and Asian markets. The Mondi woman herself was difficult to categorize; she was undoubtedly strong, individual, and successful but also ageless.

There had always been a multicultural feel to Mondi collections, brought about by a diverse design team at the Munich headquarters, as well as at the company’s American unit. The designers’ varied backgrounds and experiences combined to create a look that was cosmopolitan, formal, and informal, adapting to the demands of city and country. Mondi collections were easily mixed and matched; different fashion themes were explored in each collection, then combined with each other. The customer had the freedom to interpret each look according to her own personality or the occasion for which she was dressing. The company’s goal was always to ensure that customers were in control and felt confident, yet individual, in Mondi outfits.

In the expanding but unstable fashion market, Mondi maintained a belief in strong design, bold color, and fashionability. Its wide appeal and distinctive multicultural approach was repeated in every collections, when several strong yet interrelated themes were available to the buyer. Spring/summer 1991 was just such an example, with Pure Paris (fresh summer elegance, with a distinctive Coco Chanel influence), Neo Geo (graphic, chic black-and-white combining lace, dogtooth check, and severe geometric lines), Colorissima (street-smart city silhouettes in primary colors and florals), and Polo Club (nautical, sporty looks in water colors, with embroidered polo emblems). Mondi style was modern yet traditional casual elegance, in sporty yet wearable designs.

In the late 1990s the European recession and Asian slump took its toll on many fashion houses; Mondi was no exception. The firm as well as its American unit, Mondi of America—which accounted for around half of its worldwide sales—suffered setbacks despite innovations to bolster sales. In an effort to revamp its image and retool operations in 1998, Mondi gave in to the increasingly casual atmosphere of apparel, carrying more sportswear and separates, especially at its nearly 50-freestanding U.S. stores. The American division hired a new designer, Maggie Norris, formerly of Ralph Lauren, expanded eveningwear, cut back on logos, and spruced up its advertising as well.

Although Mondi seemed well on its way to a turnaround, the company’s owner, Investcorp, had neither the patience or the inclination to see it through. In 1999 Investcorp pulled its financial backing and Mondi was forced to look elsewhere. No immediate backers were found, the firm cancelled its spring-summer 2000 showing, and filed

Names of Fashion, called Molyneux “dashing and debonair,” comparing him to Fred Astaire. That he dressed women of the greatest propriety and restraint made it clear that, in dwelling among them, he was of like sensibility and shared spirit. It was Molyneux’s place in international café-society that allowed him to cavort with Noel Coward and gave the sobriety of his design its sense of belonging. Given that fashion went through so many changes and excesses in the 1920s and 1930s, Molyneux was a constant model of cool elegance.

—Richard Martin

MONDI TEXTILE GMBH

German fashion and accessory firm

Founded: in Munich by Herwig Zahm, 1967. Company History: Accessory collections added, 1970s; fashion lines, mainly women’s ready-to-wear, included Elementi, Mondi, Portara, Patrizia S, Braun, and Chris (by Christa Zahm); opened freestanding shops in Budapest, 1989, and New York, 1993; company purchased by Investcorp, 1993; issued its own credit cards in U.S., 1997; lost Investcorp backing and forced into bankruptcy, 1999; Mondi trademarks and worldwide licensing rights bought by Fehmi Chama, 1999; Gilmar Group signed license for women’s apparel line, launching in 2000; Patrizia S collection set to debut with new German licensee, 2001. Awards: Forum prize of the textile industry, 1986; Igedo’s International Fashion Marketing award, 1988; Fashion Oscar, Munich, 1991.

PUBLICATIONS

On MONDI:

Articles

- Morais, Richard, “Who is First in the Market, Sells,” in Forbes, 16 September 1991.
- “Investcorp Buys Stake in Mondi, and Pushes Ahead with Circle K,” in the Middle East Economic Digest, 8 January 1993.
- Dreir, Melissa, “Mondi Making Major Revamp,” in WWD, 5 January 1995.
- “Telling It Like It Is,” in WWD, 21 July 1995.
- Ozzard, Janet, “Mondi Recharges Battery,” in WWD, 21 February 1996.
- “Mondi of U.S. Starts to Offer its Own Plastic,” in WWD, 18 February 1997.
- Drier, Melissa, “Two German Houses Update for Spring 1999,” in WWD, 21 July 1998.
- Socha, Miles, “Mondi Goes Soft and Modern,” in WWD, 23 December 1998.
- Drier, Melissa, and Miles Socha, “Mondi Seeks Backer, Files for Insolvency,” in WWD, 10 September 1999.
- “Without Financing, Mondi Cancels Spring Collection,” in WWD, 1 October 1999.
- Drier, Melissa, and Vivki Young, “Mondi Signs Licensing Pact for a Women’s Apparel Line,” in WWD, 3 November 1999.
- Manning, Margie, “Closing,” in the St. Louis Business Journal, 29 November 1999.

* * *

The fashion house of Mondi was established in Munich in 1968 by Herwig Zahm, selling exclusive fashion coordinates and accessory goods. By 1995 Mondi sold products in over 54 countries worldwide, through 2,300 independent speciality stores, almost 100 company-owned stores and 200 franchised stores, including a capsule collection on the prestigious cruise liner Queen Elizabeth II. The fates were not kind to the German firm, however, and it lost its footing at the end of the 20th century.

The Mondi group once encompassed six major labels, yet in its later years had begun expanding. The early powerhouse labels were Portara (sophisticated fashion); Mondi (the main label); Chris by Christa Zahm (designer collection); Patrizia S by Mondi (larger-sized fashions) and Braun (sport and golf wear). The overall appeal was cosmopolitan, designed for American, European, and Asian markets. The Mondi woman herself was difficult to categorize; she was undoubtedly strong, individual, and successful but also ageless.

There had always been a multicultural feel to Mondi collections, brought about by a diverse design team at the Munich headquarters, as well as at the company’s American unit. The designers’ varied backgrounds and experiences combined to create a look that was cosmopolitan, formal, and informal, adapting to the demands of city and country. Mondi collections were easily mixed and matched; different fashion themes were explored in each collection, then combined with each other. The customer had the freedom to interpret each look according to her own personality or the occasion for which she was dressing. The company’s goal was always to ensure that customers were in control and felt confident, yet individual, in Mondi outfits.

In the expanding but unstable fashion market, Mondi maintained a belief in strong design, bold color, and fashionability. Its wide appeal and distinctive multicultural approach was repeated in every collections, when several strong yet interrelated themes were available to the buyer. Spring/summer 1991 was just such an example, with Pure Paris (fresh summer elegance, with a distinctive Coco Chanel influence), Neo Geo (graphic, chic black-and-white combining lace, dogtooth check, and severe geometric lines), Colorissima (street-smart city silhouettes in primary colors and florals), and Polo Club (nautical, sporty looks in water colors, with embroidered polo emblems). Mondi style was modern yet traditional casual elegance, in sporty yet wearable designs.

In the late 1990s the European recession and Asian slump took its toll on many fashion houses; Mondi was no exception. The firm as well as its American unit, Mondi of America—which accounted for around half of its worldwide sales—suffered setbacks despite innovations to bolster sales. In an effort to revamp its image and retool operations in 1998, Mondi gave in to the increasingly casual atmosphere of apparel, carrying more sportswear and separates, especially at its nearly 50-freestanding U.S. stores. The American division hired a new designer, Maggie Norris, formerly of Ralph Lauren, expanded eveningwear, cut back on logos, and spruced up its advertising as well.

Although Mondi seemed well on its way to a turnaround, the company’s owner, Investcorp, had neither the patience or the inclination to see it through. In 1999 Investcorp pulled its financial backing and Mondi was forced to look elsewhere. No immediate backers were found, the firm cancelled its spring-summer 2000 showing, and filed for bankruptcy in quick succession. The American unit remained solvent for slightly longer, then fell into bankruptcy as well. There was, however, a bit of brightness—two licensing pacts were announced, one with the Italian Gilmar Group for a Mondi women's apparel line designed by freelancer Vera Schaal, and another for the Patrizia S larger-sized women's collection. The new Mondi collections were set to debut in 2000 and 2001, and their licensees had high hopes to carry on the Mondi tradition of elegant, wearable fashion.

—Kevin Almond and Nelly Rhodes

MONTANA, Claude

French designer

Born: Paris, 29 June 1949. Education: Studied chemistry and law. Family: Married Wallis Franken, 1993 (died 1996). Career: Freelance jewelry designer, London, 1971–72; designer, with Michelle Costas, ready-to-wear and accessories line for Idéal-Cuir, Paris, 1973; assistant designer, 1973, and head designer, 1974, MacDouglas Leathers, Paris; freelance designer, Complice, Ferrer y Sentis Knitwear,

Claude Montana, fall/winter 2001 ready-to-wear collection: faux fur coat with a matching mini-skirt. © AP/Wide World Photos.

Paris, from 1975; founded own company, 1979; Hommes Montana presented, 1981; first boutique opened, Paris, 1983; Montana Pour Femme fragrance introduced, 1986; signed with Gruppo GFT to license womenswear, 1987; Parfum d'Homme introduced, 1989; Parfum d'Elle introduced, 1990; designer in charge of haute couture, Lanvin, 1989–92; continues ready-to-wear collections under own name, diffusion line introduced, 1991; Parums Montana acquired by Clarins SA, 1995; left Gruppo GFT for Groupe Mendes, 1996; launched leather accessories, 1996; launched Just Me fragrance, 1997; sought protection from creditors, 1997; firm and name sold, 1998; Montana Blu collection introduced, 1998; Montana Blu fragrance debuted, 2001. Exhibitions: Intimate Architecture: Contemporary Clothing Design, Hayden Gallery, Massachusetts Institute of Technology, 1982. Awards: Prix Medicis, 1989; Fragrance Foundation award, 1990; Golden Thimble award, 1990, 1991. Address: 54 avenue Marceau, 75008 Paris, France. Website: www.claude-montana.com.

PUBLICATIONS

On MONTANA:

Books

Hayden Gallery, Massachusetts Institute of Technology, Intimate Architecture: Contemporary Clothing Design [exhibition catalogue], Cambridge, 1982.
Perschetz, Lois, ed., W, The Designing Life, New York, 1987.

Articles

- Talley, André Leon, "The State of Montana," in WWD, 13 March 1978.
McCarthy, Patrick, "Claude Reigns," in WWD, 4 September 1979.
"Paris Advance: Claude Montana," in WWD, 2 October 1980.
Brantley, Ben, "I, Claude," in WWD, 18 May 1984.
Brampton, Sally, "La règle du jeu," in the Observer (London), 5 May 1985.
Filmer, Denny, "Claude Montana," in Cosmopolitan (London), October 1988.
Knafo, Robert, "Claude Montana," in Connoisseur, November 1988.
Brubach, Holly, "Selling Montana," in the New Yorker, 23 January 1989.
Petkanas, Christopher, "Chez Claude," in Harper's Bazaar (New York), June 1989.
Gross, Michael, "The Great State of Montana," in New York, 31 July 1989.
"Montana: Then and Now," in WWD, 19 October 1989.
Thim, Dennis, "The New State of Montana," in WWD, 29 May 1990.
Vernes, Francine, "Viva Montana," in Elle (Paris), 13 August 1990.
Mulvagh, Jane, "Lanvin c'est moi," in the Sunday Times Magazine (London), 4 November 1990.
Spindler, Amy M., "Claude's New Adventure," in WWD, 26 February 1992.
James, Laurie, "The State of Montana," in Harper's Bazaar, October 1992.
Schiro, Anne-Marie, "Photogenic, But Out of Focus," in the New York Times, 20 March 1995.
"Montana Leaves GFT for Mendes," in WWD, 9 May 1996.
Weisman, Katherine, "Montana Leather Accessories Lines to Debut," in WWD, 9 September 1996.

for bankruptcy in quick succession. The American unit remained solvent for slightly longer, then fell into bankruptcy as well. There was, however, a bit of brightness—two licensing pacts were announced, one with the Italian Gilmar Group for a Mondi women's apparel line designed by freelancer Vera Schaal, and another for the Patrizia S larger-sized women's collection. The new Mondi collections were set to debut in 2000 and 2001, and their licensees had high hopes to carry on the Mondi tradition of elegant, wearable fashion.

—Kevin Almond and Nelly Rhodes

MONTANA, Claude

French designer

Born: Paris, 29 June 1949. Education: Studied chemistry and law. Family: Married Wallis Franken, 1993 (died 1996). Career: Freelance jewelry designer, London, 1971–72; designer, with Michelle Costas, ready-to-wear and accessories line for Idéal-Cuir, Paris, 1973; assistant designer, 1973, and head designer, 1974, MacDouglas Leathers, Paris; freelance designer, Complice, Ferrer y Sentis Knitwear,

Claude Montana, fall/winter 2001 ready-to-wear collection: faux fur coat with a matching mini-skirt. © AP/Wide World Photos.

Paris, from 1975; founded own company, 1979; Hommes Montana presented, 1981; first boutique opened, Paris, 1983; Montana Pour Femme fragrance introduced, 1986; signed with Gruppo GFT to license womenswear, 1987; Parfum d'Homme introduced, 1989; Parfum d'Elle introduced, 1990; designer in charge of haute couture, Lanvin, 1989–92; continues ready-to-wear collections under own name, diffusion line introduced, 1991; Parums Montana acquired by Clarins SA, 1995; left Gruppo GFT for Groupe Mendes, 1996; launched leather accessories, 1996; launched Just Me fragrance, 1997; sought protection from creditors, 1997; firm and name sold, 1998; Montana Blu collection introduced, 1998; Montana Blu fragrance debuted, 2001. Exhibitions: Intimate Architecture: Contemporary Clothing Design, Hayden Gallery, Massachusetts Institute of Technology, 1982. Awards: Prix Medicis, 1989; Fragrance Foundation award, 1990; Golden Thimble award, 1990, 1991. Address: 54 avenue Marceau, 75008 Paris, France. Website: www.claude-montana.com.

PUBLICATIONS

On MONTANA:

Books

Hayden Gallery, Massachusetts Institute of Technology, Intimate Architecture: Contemporary Clothing Design [exhibition catalogue], Cambridge, 1982.
Perschetz, Lois, ed., W, The Designing Life, New York, 1987.

Articles

- Talley, André Leon, "The State of Montana," in WWD, 13 March 1978.
McCarthy, Patrick, "Claude Reigns," in WWD, 4 September 1979.
"Paris Advance: Claude Montana," in WWD, 2 October 1980.
Brantley, Ben, "I, Claude," in WWD, 18 May 1984.
Brampton, Sally, "La règle du jeu," in the Observer (London), 5 May 1985.
Filmer, Denny, "Claude Montana," in Cosmopolitan (London), October 1988.
Knafo, Robert, "Claude Montana," in Connoisseur, November 1988.
Brubach, Holly, "Selling Montana," in the New Yorker, 23 January 1989.
Petkanas, Christopher, "Chez Claude," in Harper's Bazaar (New York), June 1989.
Gross, Michael, "The Great State of Montana," in New York, 31 July 1989.
"Montana: Then and Now," in WWD, 19 October 1989.
Thim, Dennis, "The New State of Montana," in WWD, 29 May 1990.
Vernes, Francine, "Viva Montana," in Elle (Paris), 13 August 1990.
Mulvagh, Jane, "Lanvin c'est moi," in the Sunday Times Magazine (London), 4 November 1990.
Spindler, Amy M., "Claude's New Adventure," in WWD, 26 February 1992.
James, Laurie, "The State of Montana," in Harper's Bazaar, October 1992.
Schiro, Anne-Marie, "Photogenic, But Out of Focus," in the New York Times, 20 March 1995.
"Montana Leaves GFT for Mendes," in WWD, 9 May 1996.
Weisman, Katherine, "Montana Leather Accessories Lines to Debut," in WWD, 9 September 1996.

Claude Montana after showing his fall/winter 2001 ready-to-wear collection. © AP/Wide World Photos.

Wilson, Eric, "Trademark Dispute Pits State of Montana vs. Claude Montana," in WWWD, 21 March 1997.

_____, "Ortenbergs Back Little Guy in Montana Wars," in WWWD, 22 April 1997.

Aktar, Alev, "Just Me: Montana's Next Fragrance Foray," in WWWD, 27 June 1997.

Raper, Sarah, and Katherine Weisman, "Claude Montana Files for Credit Protection; Restructuring Planned," in WWWD, 19 November 1997.

Pogoda, Dianne M., "The Year in Fashion," in WWWD, 15 December 1997.

Raper, Sarah, "Montana Has Possible Buyer in Ex-Ricci VP," in WWWD, 18 March 1998.

_____, "Claude Montana Hits Comeback Trail," in WWWD, 13 April 1998.

Weisman, Kathering, "Montana's New Blu," in WWWD, 1 October 1998.

"...Claude Montana Did Sexy Leathers and Glam Furs...", in WWWD, 19 March 2001.

"Fresh and Fragrant 'Blu' Breath of Air," in the New Straits Times, 24 May 2001.

* * *

In the late 1970s and 1980s Claude Montana was known for an outré silhouette and commanding sense of aggression that made him both enfant terrible in a cultural sense and yet fashion's most devoted adherent in design. Padded shoulders and leathers seemed to some observers a misogynist's view of women in the manner of a cartoon. To others, however, the same style renewed the shoulder-accented horizontal of Constructivism, or even the influence of Balenciaga's surgically acute cut. Little wonder, then, that Montana said in an interview in 1989, "I'm like a battlefield inside, a mass of contradictions." More than ever, Montana has proved in the late 1980s and 1990s how contradictory and how complex his style is, incapable of the kinds of knee-jerk reactions that many critics had initially. Few designers have been as virulently attacked as Montana has, sometimes for "gay-clone" proclivities to leather, for supposed misogyny, for impractical clothing, for excessive accoutrements. Leather jackets borrowed from menswear—bikers and the military—caused strong controversy in the American press and market in the 1980s when Montana appropriated them. A decade later, Ralph Lauren, Donna Karan, Calvin Klein, and Byron Lars were working with similar looks to no protest (and Saint Laurent had long borrowed from the male wardrobe to only mild demurral).

Few designers today can be equally admired for the surety of cut, the sensuousness of appearance, the femininity that is beneath the bold forms, the luxurious seductions of fabrics more varied than leather alone, and the continuous and consummate mastery of a fashion design that always plays between the abstract forms of art and the conventions of clothing. Indeed, Constructivism is a strong influence on Montana's work. Top-heavy geometry twirling into a narrow skirt or pencil-thin trousers was not commonplace until Montana offered the option. Reductive by nature, Montana has vacillated in terms of accessorizing, particularly in the mid-1980s, but by the 1990s he clearly preferred an austerity about clothing, approximating the linear probity and arc-based sculptural form. Like Constructivist drawings for the stage, Montana's designs come to life in the animation of gyrating proportions, often with exaggerated shoulders or collars, almost invariably with a very narrow waist, and the spin of a peplum over a narrow skirt. Cocoon coats could seem to be the nimbus of abstraction; spiralling line, alternately clinging to the body and spinning away, seemed a gesture of whole cloth, unpieced.

Montana's principal aesthetic contribution is silhouette; nonetheless, his materials, beginning historically with leather, and his color palette are beautiful and sensuous. What became the power look in women's clothing in the mid-1980s is derived from Montana's aesthetic, so persuasive was it as an option for assertive presence without sacrifice of the female form. Based on circuiting spirals and a few strong lines realized on the body, Montana's aesthetic was described by some critics as being too Space Age or futuristic, but recognized by its advocates for its invocation of the principles of Futurist abstraction. Moreover, after a signal collection for fall-winter 1984, in which Montana toned down the most extreme aspects of his style, he remained true to his aesthetic principles and interests, demonstrating that they were not merely the radical forms they had seemed at first, but the fundamental forms that fashion had known since Thayatt and Exter, Adrian and Balenciaga. As early as 1979, when many might have dismissed him as an iconoclast, Montana admitted to André Leon Talley of his admiration for Vionnet and Madame Grès, likewise two designers of utmost simplicity of form (Women's Wear Daily, 13 March 1978).

What had been extreme now seems pure. Even in that convention, Montana has emulated avant-garde art. As an artist-designer, he sustains his own predilections. For example, the gargantuan shoulders are reduced in the late 1980s and great, oversized collars keep the outspoken gesture to the top. Robert Knafo (Connoisseur, November 1988) describes that transition: "casting out the sharp-shouldered, fearlessly assertive Montana woman, installing in her place a mellower, softer-edged, more romantic figure, although no less self-assured." Indeed, it is some of the referentiality of fashion—association we make with clothing types and image—that has attributed the controversial profile to Montana as a designer. More importantly, he has been a steadfast practitioner of a kind of isolated, non-referential abstraction, obdurately and passionately and compellingly exploring fashion at its most distinct cut. Montana's design survival as a classic figure and a model with lasting impact on other advanced designers in modern fashion attests to that design primacy and perseverance.

After his Lanvin stint, Montana maintained his precise, inimitable approach to fashion. His fall 1995 Paris womenswear collection was presented in stunning, futuristic white. Women's Wear Daily (17 October 1995) applauded the line's "sharp edges, swirling seams and strict silhouettes," concluding "nobody beats Montana for his precision tailoring." The following year Montana moved the licensing of his two prominent womenswear lines, Montana Femme and State of Montana, from Gruppo GFT to French fashion firm Groupe Mendes. Montana menswear, however, remained with GFT. Additionally in 1996 Montana introduced a new leather collection including handbags, belts, travel bags, and other smaller accessories.

Unfortunately for Montana, brewing legal battles overshadowed his fashion contributions. The imbroglio stemmed from a 1995 tiff with a small firm named Montana Knits, which sought to trademark its name. Claude objected, having already trademarked his apparel lines (Montana, Claude Montana, and State of Montana), and believing Montana Knits would confuse buyers. The owners of Montana Knits, Tom and Ann Doolings, decided to take Claude to court over the matter. Suddenly, it was a cause célèbre, with high profile fashion icons like Liz Claiborne championing the underdog Doolings. The case was decided in favor of the Doolings; Montana then subsequently renamed his diffusion line, State of Montana, to Montana White Label.

If the lawsuit was troubling for Montana, what occurred on its heels was much more vexing: his firm was forced to seek protection from creditors in 1997 after several years of sliding sales, setbacks, and just plain bad luck. His woes had included lower margins after switching his Japanese licensee, losing prominent retailers Bloomingdale's and Henri Bendel, and being forced to close several stores for underperformance. The Montana name and the designer's skills, however, were never in question; he was still roundly praised by buyers and critics alike.

Montana finally decided it was time to sell, a decision many of his fellow designers had faced. He told Women's Wear Daily (12 December 1997), "There comes a moment in your life when you say, 'Now, what really interests me is my work and creating.' And so I'm ready now to open up...to an investor with whom I get along, and with whom I share the same ideas about future strategy." That investor turned out to be Jacques Berger, formerly of Nina Ricci, and two partners who paid $670,000 for 51-percent of the struggling fashion firm. Ironically, part of the agreement called for Montana to give up the rights to his name, something he had fought so vehemently for in the past. The designer would, however, maintain the right to design for the house for another ten years.

Montana seemed happy with his prospects, "This is going to give me much more freedom to travel, to sit down and talk with others in the studio about designs," he told Women's Wear Daily (13 April 1998). "Isolation is not very healthy for creativity.... In the end, my biggest role hasn't really changed," Montana explained, "I'm the artistic director for the house and now I will have more energy to throw into my work. That should be stimulating for everybody."

Free from the pressures of running a business, Montana rebounded quickly and unveiled Montana Blu, a younger, hipper collection for women in late 1998. The line seemed to stem from Montana's passion for contemporary art. "Sculpture and painting are inexhaustible inspiration sources," he noted in a biographical sketch at his website. In Montana Blu he has created perhaps the most profound designs bearing his signature; it was successful enough to spawn its own fragrance in 2001, while his signature line was praised by Women's

Wear Daily (19 March 2001), “Whatever the Claude Montana collection should be, whatever it could be or once was, for fall, the designer stuck to stuff he knows well—sexy leathers and glamorous furs.”

—Richard Martin and Nelly Rhodes

MORENI, Popy

French designer

Born: Annalisa Moreni in Turin, Italy, 3 December 1947. Education: Istituto Statale d’Arte, Moda e Costume, Turin, 1961–64. Family: Children: Amour, Aimée. Career: Moved to Paris, 1964; design assistant to Maïmé Arnaudin, 1964; designer in Arnaudin’s Mafia design studio, Paris, 1965–67, and in Promostyl, Paris, 1967–73; designer, Timmi, 1972; established own design and consulting office (working for Rhône-Poulenc Textile and Rasurel), from 1973; first boutique opened, Paris, 1976; first fashion collection, 1980; first creations for Swiss catalogues, 1981; ready-to-wear licensed, from 1982; childrenswear licensed, from 1987; introduced housewares, Popy Moreni, spring/summer 1996 ready-to-wear collection. © AP/Wide World Photos.

linens, furniture, and rugs; launched first signature fragrance, 1996; second scent, 1997; third fragrance, Cirque, 2000. Exhibitions: Popy Moreni, Collerettes x 13, Galerie des Femmes, Paris, 1985; Les Années 80, Musée des Arts de la Mode, Paris, 1989–90; Mode et Liberté, Musée des Arts de la Mode, Paris, 1992. Awards: Named Chevalier de l’Ordre des Arts et des Lettres, 1986. Address: 13, place des Vosges, 75004 Paris, France.

PUBLICATIONS

On MORENI:

Books

Deslandres, Yvonne, Histoire de la mode au XXme siècle, Paris, 1986.

Benaim, Laurence, L’Année de la mode, Paris, 1988.

Articles

Godard, Colette, “La mode comme le souvenir d’un bonheur,” in Le Monde (Paris), April 1986.

Seraglini, Marie, “Carte noire et blanche à Popy Moreni,” in Maison Française (Paris), July 1986.

Perrier, M.J., “Designer Close Up,” in Interior (London), March 1987.

Mont Servan, N., “Les 100 poids lourds de la mode,” in Passion (Paris), February 1990.

Born, Pete, “Scent Spout Wide Open,” in WWD, 11 October 1996.

“Martin Gras: A Master Perfumer at Work,” in Soap & Cosmetics, January 1999.

“Popy Moreni,” available online at Fashion Windows, www.fashion-windows.com, March 2001.

*

I hope to love everything, unfortunately I cannot yet do so. In fact, I tell myself that what I do not love is simply what I do not understand. So, potentially, I love everything: the real and the false, the authentic and the copied, the straight line and the curve, elegance and vulgarity, the good and the bad, the law-abiding and the outlaw. I would like to do everything! Not necessarily in order to do but in order to search.... I’m rather inquisitive and dissatisfied on the whole...so I persevere! I am active because the unknown is so potent...

For my work I like silence, white and black, open countryside, concrete, the morning, thick pencils...the ideas are in the pencil.... It is through drawing a lot that one makes discoveries.... You rarely get surprising results early on....

Work keeps me busy and prevents me asking myself too many questions. I am short of time to do everything I would like to.... So it is just a matter of choice and chance...

—Popy Moreni

* * *

Popy Moreni is an Italian designer working in Paris who has managed to combine distinctive style elements from both countries—a strong Italian sense of color and coordination, with a chic French

Wear Daily (19 March 2001), “Whatever the Claude Montana collection should be, whatever it could be or once was, for fall, the designer stuck to stuff he knows well—sexy leathers and glamorous furs.”

—Richard Martin and Nelly Rhodes

MORENI, Popy

French designer

Born: Annalisa Moreni in Turin, Italy, 3 December 1947. Education: Istituto Statale d’Arte, Moda e Costume, Turin, 1961–64. Family: Children: Amour, Aimée. Career: Moved to Paris, 1964; design assistant to Maïmé Arnaudin, 1964; designer in Arnaudin’s Mafia design studio, Paris, 1965–67, and in Promostyl, Paris, 1967–73; designer, Timmi, 1972; established own design and consulting office (working for Rhône-Poulenc Textile and Rasurel), from 1973; first boutique opened, Paris, 1976; first fashion collection, 1980; first creations for Swiss catalogues, 1981; ready-to-wear licensed, from 1982; childrenswear licensed, from 1987; introduced housewares,

Popy Moreni, spring/summer 1996 ready-to-wear collection. © AP/Wide World Photos.

linens, furniture, and rugs; launched first signature fragrance, 1996; second scent, 1997; third fragrance, Cirque, 2000. Exhibitions: Popy Moreni, Collerettes x 13, Galerie des Femmes, Paris, 1985; Les Années 80, Musée des Arts de la Mode, Paris, 1989–90; Mode et Liberté, Musée des Arts de la Mode, Paris, 1992. Awards: Named Chevalier de l’Ordre des Arts et des Lettres, 1986. Address: 13, place des Vosges, 75004 Paris, France.

PUBLICATIONS

On MORENI:

Books

Deslandres, Yvonne, Histoire de la mode au XXme siècle, Paris, 1986.
Benaim, Laurence, L’Année de la mode, Paris, 1988.

Articles

Godard, Colette, “La mode comme le souvenir d’un bonheur,” in Le Monde (Paris), April 1986.
Seraglini, Marie, “Carte noire et blanche à Popy Moreni,” in Maison Française (Paris), July 1986.
Perrier, M.J., “Designer Close Up,” in Interior (London), March 1987.
Mont Servan, N., “Les 100 poids lourds de la mode,” in Passion (Paris), February 1990.
Born, Pete, “Scent Spout Wide Open,” in WWD, 11 October 1996.
“Martin Gras: A Master Perfumer at Work,” in Soap & Cosmetics, January 1999.
“Popy Moreni,” available online at Fashion Windows, www.fashion-windows.com, March 2001.

*

I hope to love everything, unfortunately I cannot yet do so. In fact, I tell myself that what I do not love is simply what I do not understand. So, potentially, I love everything: the real and the false, the authentic and the copied, the straight line and the curve, elegance and vulgarity, the good and the bad, the law-abiding and the outlaw. I would like to do everything! Not necessarily in order to do but in order to search.... I’m rather inquisitive and dissatisfied on the whole...so I persevere! I am active because the unknown is so potent...

For my work I like silence, white and black, open countryside, concrete, the morning, thick pencils...the ideas are in the pencil.... It is through drawing a lot that one makes discoveries.... You rarely get surprising results early on....

Work keeps me busy and prevents me asking myself too many questions. I am short of time to do everything I would like to.... So it is just a matter of choice and chance...

—Popy Moreni

* * *

Popy Moreni is an Italian designer working in Paris who has managed to combine distinctive style elements from both countries—a strong Italian sense of color and coordination, with a chic French practicality. She was born into an artistic family in Turin, Italy; her mother was a sculptor and her father a painter. She studied costume and design in Italy at L'Istituto Statale d'Arte, Moda e Costume, then moved to Paris at 17 to pursue a career in fashion. Her first job was at Mafia, the design studio of Maïmé Arnaudin; next she worked for the Promostyl Organization and the Italian firm Timmi until 1972.

She opened her own design studio in 1973 and worked on consultancies with a range of clients that included Rhone-Poulenc Textile and Rasurel. In 1980 she showed her first collection on the catwalk. She quickly became known for her witty, carefree clothes. A taste for theatricality and the baroque gave her collections the recurrent theme of commedia dell'arte with harlequin prints and jagged-cut details, satin capes and Pierrot collars, all translated into inventive sportswear shapes. She has also been inspired from her artistic heritage, looking to abstract painters like Jackson Pollock and Hans Hartung when designing and choosing prints.

By 1985 the collections had grown in size and breadth, incorporating such details as petal shapes, corollas, and plush velvets. More recent innovations were oversize crisp white cotton shirts decorated with ruffled cuffs and necklines. Cheeky sleeveless striped suits again decorated with a huge ruff collar of satin, plus fun linen suits, printed with an asymmetric leaf detail. Her collection for autumn-winter 1993–94 showed a stark paring down of her carefree theatricality, with severe charcoal and black fit-and-flare dresses with unusual details like tiny cap sleeves or asymmetrical seaming. Accessory details like fingerless gloves, black nail polish, and a no-make-up look contributed to the austerity.

Expansion of the Moreni business began with the opening of her first boutique in the Les Halles district of Paris in 1976. In 1980 she began a joint collaboration with a French mail order firm, Les Trois Suisses, to design children's and women's clothes. She also developed a distinctive eveningwear line, as well as hat, shoe, and jewelry ranges. Of particular interest were her plastic shoes dyed to bright colors. A licensing agreement with Mitsukoshi Ltd. in Japan gave Moreni a lucrative Asian exposure and marketing of her name and products.

By the turn of the century Moreni continued to expand her business, introducing a wide range of products from housewares, linens, furniture, and rugs. Additionally, the third Moreni fragrance, Cirque, was launched in 2000.

—Kevin Almond

Popy Moreni, spring/summer 1996 ready-to-wear collection. © AP/Wide World Photos.

MORI, Hanae

Japanese designer

Born: Tokyo, 8 January 1926. Education: Graduated in literature from Tokyo Christian Women's University, 1947. Family: Married Kei Mori; children: Akira, Kei. Career: First atelier in Shinjuku, Tokyo, 1951; costume designer for films, 1954–circa 1961; first New York fashion show, 1965; showed in Monaco and Paris, 1975; established haute couture collection and fashion house in Paris, 1977; member of Le Chambre Syndicale de la Haute Couture Parisienne, 1977; opened Hanae Mori Boutique in Faubourg St. Honor, Paris, 1985; designed costumes for La Scala, Milan; designed costumes for Paris Opera Ballet, 1986; launched Hanae Mori Boutique, Monte Carlo, 1989; shows in Paris, Budapest, Moscow, and Kuala Lumpur, 1990; shows in Lausanne and Taipei, and member of Japan Olympic Committee and chairman of Cultural Affairs Promotion Committee of Tokyo Chamber of Commerce and Industry, 1991; eyewear added, 1993; fragrances added: Butterfly, 1995; HM (for men), 1997; Haute Couture, 1999; also designed accessories, home furnishings, textiles, and skiwear. Exhibitions: Avant-garde Japon, Centre Pompidou, Paris, 1986; Hanae Mori: 35 Years in Fashion, Tokyo, 1989, Monte Carlo, 1990, and Paris, 1990; Diana Vreeland: Immoderate Style, Metropolitan Museum of Art, New York, 1993–94; Japonism in Fashion, Kyoto Costume Institute, 1994; Japanese Design: A Survey Since 1950, Philadelphia Museum of Art, 1994; Orientalism, Metropolitan Museum of Art, New York, 1994–95. Awards: Neiman Marcus award, 1973; Medaille d'Argent, City of Paris, 1978; The Symbol of Man award, Minnesota Museum, 1978; Croix de Chevalier des Arts et Lettres, 1984; Purple Ribbon Decoration, Japan, 1988; Asahi prize as pioneer of Japanese Fashion, 1988; named Chevalier de la Légion d'Honneur, 1989; Person of Cultural Merit, Japan, 1989; Order of Culture, Japan, 1996. Address: 6–1, 3 Chome, Kita-Aoyama, Minato-ku, Tokyo, Japan. Website: www.morihanae.co.jp.

practicality. She was born into an artistic family in Turin, Italy; her mother was a sculptor and her father a painter. She studied costume and design in Italy at L'Istituto Statale d'Arte, Moda e Costume, then moved to Paris at 17 to pursue a career in fashion. Her first job was at Mafia, the design studio of Maïmé Arnaudin; next she worked for the Promostyl Organization and the Italian firm Timmi until 1972.

She opened her own design studio in 1973 and worked on consultancies with a range of clients that included Rhone-Poulenc Textile and Rasurel. In 1980 she showed her first collection on the catwalk. She quickly became known for her witty, carefree clothes. A taste for theatricality and the baroque gave her collections the recurrent theme of commedia dell'arte with harlequin prints and jagged-cut details, satin capes and Pierrot collars, all translated into inventive sportswear shapes. She has also been inspired from her artistic heritage, looking to abstract painters like Jackson Pollock and Hans Hartung when designing and choosing prints.

By 1985 the collections had grown in size and breadth, incorporating such details as petal shapes, corollas, and plush velvets. More recent innovations were oversize crisp white cotton shirts decorated with ruffled cuffs and necklines. Cheeky sleeveless striped suits again decorated with a huge ruff collar of satin, plus fun linen suits, printed with an asymmetric leaf detail. Her collection for autumn-winter 1993–94 showed a stark paring down of her carefree theatricality, with severe charcoal and black fit-and-flare dresses with unusual details like tiny cap sleeves or asymmetrical seaming. Accessory details like fingerless gloves, black nail polish, and a no-make-up look contributed to the austerity.

Expansion of the Moreni business began with the opening of her first boutique in the Les Halles district of Paris in 1976. In 1980 she began a joint collaboration with a French mail order firm, Les Trois Suisses, to design children's and women's clothes. She also developed a distinctive eveningwear line, as well as hat, shoe, and jewelry ranges. Of particular interest were her plastic shoes dyed to bright colors. A licensing agreement with Mitsukoshi Ltd. in Japan gave Moreni a lucrative Asian exposure and marketing of her name and products.

By the turn of the century Moreni continued to expand her business, introducing a wide range of products from housewares, linens, furniture, and rugs. Additionally, the third Moreni fragrance, Cirque, was launched in 2000.

—Kevin Almond

Popy Moreni, spring/summer 1996 ready-to-wear collection. © AP/Wide World Photos.

MORI, Hanae

Japanese designer

Born: Tokyo, 8 January 1926. Education: Graduated in literature from Tokyo Christian Women's University, 1947. Family: Married Kei Mori; children: Akira, Kei. Career: First atelier in Shinjuku, Tokyo, 1951; costume designer for films, 1954–circa 1961; first New York fashion show, 1965; showed in Monaco and Paris, 1975; established haute couture collection and fashion house in Paris, 1977; member of Le Chambre Syndicale de la Haute Couture Parisienne, 1977; opened Hanae Mori Boutique in Faubourg St. Honor, Paris, 1985; designed costumes for La Scala, Milan; designed costumes for Paris Opera Ballet, 1986; launched Hanae Mori Boutique, Monte Carlo, 1989; shows in Paris, Budapest, Moscow, and Kuala Lumpur, 1990; shows in Lausanne and Taipei, and member of Japan Olympic Committee and chairman of Cultural Affairs Promotion Committee of Tokyo Chamber of Commerce and Industry, 1991; eyewear added, 1993; fragrances added: Butterfly, 1995; HM (for men), 1997; Haute Couture, 1999; also designed accessories, home furnishings, textiles, and skiwear. Exhibitions: Avant-garde Japon, Centre Pompidou, Paris, 1986; Hanae Mori: 35 Years in Fashion, Tokyo, 1989, Monte Carlo, 1990, and Paris, 1990; Diana Vreeland: Immoderate Style, Metropolitan Museum of Art, New York, 1993–94; Japonism in Fashion, Kyoto Costume Institute, 1994; Japanese Design: A Survey Since 1950, Philadelphia Museum of Art, 1994; Orientalism, Metropolitan Museum of Art, New York, 1994–95. Awards: Neiman Marcus award, 1973; Medaille d'Argent, City of Paris, 1978; The Symbol of Man award, Minnesota Museum, 1978; Croix de Chevalier des Arts et Lettres, 1984; Purple Ribbon Decoration, Japan, 1988; Asahi prize as pioneer of Japanese Fashion, 1988; named Chevalier de la Légion d'Honneur, 1989; Person of Cultural Merit, Japan, 1989; Order of Culture, Japan, 1996. Address: 6–1, 3 Chome, Kita-Aoyama, Minato-ku, Tokyo, Japan. Website: www.morihanae.co.jp.

Hanae Mori, spring/summer 2001 haute couture collection: embroidered lace jacket over a tulle sheath. © AP/Wide World Photos.

Hanae Mori, spring/summer 2001 haute couture collection. © AP/Wide World Photos.

PUBLICATIONS

By MORI:

Books

- Designing for Tomorrow*, Tokyo, 1979.
A Glass Butterfly, Tokyo, 1984.
Hanae Mori 1960–1989, Tokyo, 1989.
Fashion—A Butterfly Crosses the Border, Tokyo, 1993.
Hanae Mori Style: Highlights from a Lifetime in Fashion, Tokyo, 2001.

On MORI:

Books

- Marcus, Stanley, Quest for the Best, New York, 1979.
Koren, Leonard, New Fashion Japan, Tokyo, 1984.
Sparke, Penny, Japanese Design, London, 1987.
Fairchild, John, Chic Savages, New York, 1989.

Stegemeyer, Anne, Who's Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.

Articles

- "Hanae Mori: Legend in Her Own Time," in American Fabrics and Fashions (Columbia, South Carolina), Spring 1974.
Whitehead, Ron, "Japan's Queen of Haute Couture," in Femina, May 1979.
Lohse, Marianne, "Hanae Mori," in Madame Figaro (Paris), April 1987.
Lalanne, Dorothee, "Hanae Mori Première!," in Vogue (Paris), March 1989.
Beurdeley, Laurence, "Hanae Mori," in L'Officiel (Paris), June 1989.
Menkes, Suzy, "Hanae Mori: Fashion that Fuses the East and West," in the International Herald Tribune, June 1989.
Bumiller, Elizabeth, "Japan's Madame Couturier," in the Washington Post, February 1990.
Davy, Philippe, "Un souffle nouveau," in L'Officiel, February 1990.
Davidson, Monique, "Univers Hanae Mori: Un Empire au Soleil Levant," in Joyce, March/April 1991.

- "Kei Mori, Chief of Hanae Mori, Dead at 84," in WWD, 22 October 1996.
- Menkes, Suzy, "For Hanae Mori, a 20th Birthday," in the International Herald Tribune, 15 July 1997.
- , "A New Spirit Takes Wing with Madame Butterfly," in the International Herald Tribune, 11 May 1999.
- Reitman, Valerie, "Daughter-in-law of Founder Slowly Inserts a Youthful Look into the Line," in the Los Angeles Times, 14 May 1999.
- Weil, Jennifer, "Saujet's Entrepreneurial Odyssey," in WWD, 19 January 2001.
- Young, Clara, "Hanae Mori," available online at Fashion Live, www.fashionlive.com, 19 March 2001.
- "Hanae Mori Style," available online at the Japan Page, www.thejapanpage.com, 23 August 2001.

*

I design primarily to enhance our lifestyle and make it richer and more enjoyable. Expression changes with the times; but the essence does not change. The history of the world is the story of men and women—how men relate to women and how they live. I would like to express that great sense of existence in clothing. I have been in pursuit of that all through my life.

I am true to my identity; I keep trying to be myself. I am Japanese, in Japan there is this beauty by itself which has been nurtured by tradition—fashion is an international language. What I have been trying to do is to express the wonderful beauty of Japan using international language.

—Hanae Mori

* * *

A delicate sense of feminine beauty, stemming from Hanae Mori's Japanese heritage, is married to an artistic use of color and fabric in all her work. She treads a careful line, balancing Eastern influences with Western ideals to produce consistently successful couture and ready-to-wear lines with international customers. If her clothes lack the more outrageous, attention-grabbing qualities of some of her couture counterparts, they compensate with the economy of their cut and base their appeal on the practical needs of the wealthy metropolitan women who wear them.

By stepping outside current trends and concentrating on conservative but always feminine daywear, Mori has established a niche for herself in the Parisian fashion arena. Integral to this is the sense of the longevity of her easy-to-wear separates, which even in the ready-to-wear line retain a delicacy of touch through the textiles used. Mori elaborates on the basic tenets of combining fine fabrics and flattering cut, adding her own feel for the dramatic to her eye-catching eveningwear. For this she makes optimum use of the lustrous printed textiles produced by her husband until his death in 1996. Although there is an air of restrained elegance to much of her design, symbolized by the fragile butterfly motif by which she is known, her eveningwear often breaks into more vibrant realms.

In 1981 Mori produced a languorous silk mouseline dress, the vampish leopard print and deep décolleté of which were balanced by the soft, sinuous fall of the fabric. Other examples used bright hot colors, juxtaposed in one ensemble to provide interest, bringing a strong Japanese feel to their narrow hues, frequently harking back to the kimono for their silhouette and cut. It is in this area that her work is most inspired, bringing together European tailoring and Japanese color and ideals of beauty. She uses the Japanese love of asymmetry to further develop her style and the linear patterns she prints onto her distinctive silks. She exploits the natural appeal of such fabrics with a well-defined sense of cut to illuminate her realistic styles. By doing so, Mori is providing both an alternative to and a definite rejection of the type of elaborate couture confections that mold the female form into fantastical shapes, ignoring the woman beneath the fabric.

The other main strand to Mori's design is her close involvement in the arts. Her early costuming of innumerable Japanese films enabled her sense of color to evolve, using each primary-hued textile to represent a different emotion, and sharpened her sense of the dramatic effect of dress. This has grown in her work for opera and ballet, the clothing full of delicacy and poise counterpointed with strong coloration, the arresting mixes representing the two worlds her design principles straddle.

Mori's wedding dresses are in particular demand and are always made to order. The designer is also a favorite of the Japanese royal family and Thailand's Queen Sirikit. A new influence is beginning to work its way into Mori's collections with the addition of her daughter-in-law, Pamela, as creative director of the ready-to-wear line since 1999. The younger Mori favors simpler, more understated clothing. She helped usher in the newer Studio Line to reach the next generation of Mori customers, both in Japan and internationally. Hanae Mori, despite her advancing years, remains actively involved with the company's daily affairs and still heads up the couture line and the more expensive ready-to-wear.

A firm grasp of the value of these cross-cultural reference points has enabled Mori to establish herself in Paris couture and develop an international market. Her understanding of the needs of contemporary women has lent a practical slant to her simply shaped, wearable clothes, while her theatrical preoccupations and Japanese background have inspired her love of rich, tactile fabrics in the vibrant prints and colors that are the hallmark of her design.

—Rebecca Arnold; updated by Carrie Snyder

MORRIS, Robert Lee

American jewelry and accessories designer

Born: Nuremberg, Germany, 7 July 1947. Education: Graduated from Beloit College, Beloit, WI. Family: Married Susan; children: Taylor. Career: Showed first collection in 1972; owner, Robert Lee Morris Gallery, since 1974; owner/manager, Artwear Gallery, 1977–93; introduced Robert Lee Morris Necessities mail order catalogue, 1993; also packaging designer, Elizabeth Arden, New York, from 1992.

Exhibitions: Artwear Gallery, New York, 1992; Good as Gold: Alternative Materials in American Jewelry, Smithsonian Institution (international touring exhibition), 1981–85; retrospective, Museum of the Fashion Institute of Technology, New York, 1995. Awards: Coty American Fashion Critics award, 1981; Council of Fashion Designers of America award, 1985, 1994; International Gold Council award, 1987; Woolmark award, 1992; American Accessories Achievement award, 1992; Grand Prix, Tahitian Pearl Trophy, North America, Necklace Category, 2000; Site of the Week award,

- "Kei Mori, Chief of Hanae Mori, Dead at 84," in WWD, 22 October 1996.
- Menkes, Suzy, "For Hanae Mori, a 20th Birthday," in the International Herald Tribune, 15 July 1997.
- , "A New Spirit Takes Wing with Madame Butterfly," in the International Herald Tribune, 11 May 1999.
- Reitman, Valerie, "Daughter-in-law of Founder Slowly Inserts a Youthful Look into the Line," in the Los Angeles Times, 14 May 1999.
- Weil, Jennifer, "Saujet's Entrepreneurial Odyssey," in WWD, 19 January 2001.
- Young, Clara, "Hanae Mori," available online at Fashion Live, www.fashionlive.com, 19 March 2001.
- "Hanae Mori Style," available online at the Japan Page, www.thejapanpage.com, 23 August 2001.

*

I design primarily to enhance our lifestyle and make it richer and more enjoyable. Expression changes with the times; but the essence does not change. The history of the world is the story of men and women—how men relate to women and how they live. I would like to express that great sense of existence in clothing. I have been in pursuit of that all through my life.

I am true to my identity; I keep trying to be myself. I am Japanese, in Japan there is this beauty by itself which has been nurtured by tradition—fashion is an international language. What I have been trying to do is to express the wonderful beauty of Japan using international language.

—Hanae Mori

* * *

A delicate sense of feminine beauty, stemming from Hanae Mori's Japanese heritage, is married to an artistic use of color and fabric in all her work. She treads a careful line, balancing Eastern influences with Western ideals to produce consistently successful couture and ready-to-wear lines with international customers. If her clothes lack the more outrageous, attention-grabbing qualities of some of her couture counterparts, they compensate with the economy of their cut and base their appeal on the practical needs of the wealthy metropolitan women who wear them.

By stepping outside current trends and concentrating on conservative but always feminine daywear, Mori has established a niche for herself in the Parisian fashion arena. Integral to this is the sense of the longevity of her easy-to-wear separates, which even in the ready-to-wear line retain a delicacy of touch through the textiles used. Mori elaborates on the basic tenets of combining fine fabrics and flattering cut, adding her own feel for the dramatic to her eye-catching eveningwear. For this she makes optimum use of the lustrous printed textiles produced by her husband until his death in 1996. Although there is an air of restrained elegance to much of her design, symbolized by the fragile butterfly motif by which she is known, her eveningwear often breaks into more vibrant realms.

In 1981 Mori produced a languorous silk mouseline dress, the vampish leopard print and deep décolleté of which were balanced by the soft, sinuous fall of the fabric. Other examples used bright hot colors, juxtaposed in one ensemble to provide interest, bringing a strong Japanese feel to their narrow hues, frequently harking back to the kimono for their silhouette and cut. It is in this area that her work is most inspired, bringing together European tailoring and Japanese color and ideals of beauty. She uses the Japanese love of asymmetry to further develop her style and the linear patterns she prints onto her distinctive silks. She exploits the natural appeal of such fabrics with a well-defined sense of cut to illuminate her realistic styles. By doing so, Mori is providing both an alternative to and a definite rejection of the type of elaborate couture confections that mold the female form into fantastical shapes, ignoring the woman beneath the fabric.

The other main strand to Mori's design is her close involvement in the arts. Her early costuming of innumerable Japanese films enabled her sense of color to evolve, using each primary-hued textile to represent a different emotion, and sharpened her sense of the dramatic effect of dress. This has grown in her work for opera and ballet, the clothing full of delicacy and poise counterpointed with strong coloration, the arresting mixes representing the two worlds her design principles straddle.

Mori's wedding dresses are in particular demand and are always made to order. The designer is also a favorite of the Japanese royal family and Thailand's Queen Sirikit. A new influence is beginning to work its way into Mori's collections with the addition of her daughter-in-law, Pamela, as creative director of the ready-to-wear line since 1999. The younger Mori favors simpler, more understated clothing. She helped usher in the newer Studio Line to reach the next generation of Mori customers, both in Japan and internationally. Hanae Mori, despite her advancing years, remains actively involved with the company's daily affairs and still heads up the couture line and the more expensive ready-to-wear.

A firm grasp of the value of these cross-cultural reference points has enabled Mori to establish herself in Paris couture and develop an international market. Her understanding of the needs of contemporary women has lent a practical slant to her simply shaped, wearable clothes, while her theatrical preoccupations and Japanese background have inspired her love of rich, tactile fabrics in the vibrant prints and colors that are the hallmark of her design.

—Rebecca Arnold; updated by Carrie Snyder

MORRIS, Robert Lee

American jewelry and accessories designer

Born: Nuremberg, Germany, 7 July 1947. Education: Graduated from Beloit College, Beloit, WI. Family: Married Susan; children: Taylor. Career: Showed first collection in 1972; owner, Robert Lee Morris Gallery, since 1974; owner/manager, Artwear Gallery, 1977–93; introduced Robert Lee Morris Necessities mail order catalogue, 1993; also packaging designer, Elizabeth Arden, New York, from 1992.

Exhibitions: Artwear Gallery, New York, 1992; Good as Gold: Alternative Materials in American Jewelry, Smithsonian Institution (international touring exhibition), 1981–85; retrospective, Museum of the Fashion Institute of Technology, New York, 1995. Awards: Coty American Fashion Critics award, 1981; Council of Fashion Designers of America award, 1985, 1994; International Gold Council award, 1987; Woolmark award, 1992; American Accessories Achievement award, 1992; Grand Prix, Tahitian Pearl Trophy, North America, Necklace Category, 2000; Site of the Week award, Professional Jeweler, January 2001. Address: Robert Lee Morris Gallery; 400 West Broadway; New York, NY 10012, USA. Website: www.robertleemorris.com.

PUBLICATIONS

By MORRIS:

Articles

“Nature as Inspiration,” in Professional Jeweler, January 2000.

On MORRIS:

Books

- Untracht, Oppi, Jewelry Concepts and Technology, Garden City, New York, 1982.
 Cartlidge, Barbara, Twentieth Century Jewelry, New York, 1985.
 Shields, Jody, All That Glitters, New York, 1987.
 Mulvagh, Jane, Costume Jewelry in Vogue, London, 1988.
 Blauer, Ettagale, Contemporary American Jewelry Design, New York, 1991.
 Cera, Deanne Farneti, Jewels of Fantasy: Costume Jewelry of the 20th Century, New York, 1992.
 Stegemeyer, Anne, Who's Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.

Articles

- “Artwear: Redefining Jewelry with a Modern Style,” in Vogue (New York), January 1984.
 Gross, Michael, “Jewelry Mirrors Its Designer,” in the New York Times, 7 April 1987.
 Johnson, Bonnie, “Jewelry Designer Robert Lee Morris Sinks His Claws Into Heavy Metal,” in People, 11 May 1987.
 Hochswender, Woody, “Attention-Getter,” in the New York Times, 25 April 1989.
 Hamilton, William L., “What Becalms a Legend Most,” in Metropolitan Home, May 1989.
 Greendorfer, Tere, “Going for the Bold,” in the Sunday Star Ledger (London), 2 July 1989.
 Newman, Jill, “On the Cutting Edge with Robert Lee Morris,” in WWD, 19 August 1989.
 “Freedom Saunters into Style; Polar Opposites, Isaac Mizrahi and Romeo Gigli Lead a Runaway Renaissance,” in People, Spring 1990.
 Myers, Coco, “Icon Maker,” in Mirabella (New York), October 1990.
 Sikes, Gini, “World Apart,” in Harper's Bazaar, October 1990.
 Greco, Monica, “Portrait of the Artist,” in Sportswear International (New York), 1991.
 Mower, Sarah, “Robert Lee Morris: A Multi-Faceted New York Jeweller Finds Inspiration in the British Isles,” in Vogue (London), November 1991.
 Slesin, Suzanne, “Inspiration is Only a Room Away,” in the New York Times, 9 January 1992.
 Schiro, Ann-Marie, “Paying Tribute to a Wearable Art,” in the New York Times, 26 April 1992.
 Spindler, Amy M., “Piety on Parade: Fashion Seeks Inspiration,” in the New York Times, 5 September 1993.
 Goodman, Wendy, “Breaking Ground,” in Harper's Bazaar, February 1994.

Menkes, Suzy, “A Jeweler’s Creed: Value is in the Design,” in the International Herald Tribune (Paris), 17 April 1995.

Reif, Rita, “A Fashion Maker Looks Beyond Seventh Avenue,” in the New York Times, 3 December 1995.

Blauer, Ettagale, “Robert Lee Morris,” in American Craft, April-May 1996.

“Sugar and Vice,” in Cosmopolitan, March 2000.

“New Money,” in International Jeweler, April-May 2000.

Marx, Linda, “Wear Art Thou?” in Simply the Best, December 2000.

D’Annunzio, Gracia, “Isn’t Jewelry Art?” in Vogue Gioiello (Italy), March 2001.

Karimzadeh, Marc, “Bridging the Gap,” in WWD, Summer 2001.

*

My jewelry is a distant cousin of ancient armor—those smooth, sensual body-conscious constructions that employ ingenious mechanics to allow for fluid movement. My inspiration has never been clothing or fashion trends, but rather the human need for personal intimacy, with tokens of spiritual potential that amulets and talismans provide.

I constantly seek to fine-tune, focus, purify, and strengthen my style, to make it more clear, more recognizable, and more understandable by people of any and all cultures. Mass fashion jewelry, in my mind, is purely decorative, employing a cacophony of glittery values to achieve a dazzling effect. This is as much a part of human culture as the bright plumage of birds, and will remain with us, as it should. But it has always been against this world that I design my work; placing value on classicism and heirloom status over the thrill of temporary trends. My forms and shapes lead my concepts. My concepts are generally anthropological and my attitude is “less is more.”

—Robert Lee Morris

* * *

“Wearable art,” as created by Robert Lee Morris, has become a symbol of style among young, modern, rebellious, sexy, and chic individuals. Morris has redefined the way people perceive jewelry. He entered the fashion scene some 20 years ago and has transformed the contemporary jewelry industry by drawing on symbols from antiquity in ways that underscore their relevance to our lives today. He remains fascinated by the meaning of art, the role of jewelry as a talisman of the spirit. Morris maintains a keen appreciation of a pure, powerful aesthetic.

Born in wartorn Nuremburg, Germany, the son of a U.S. Air Force colonel and a former fashion model, Morris was a world traveler at a young age. He was schooled in places like Brazil and Japan, as the family followed Morris’ father from post to post, moving over 25 times before Robert turned 18. Morris graduated from Beloit College in Wisconsin in 1969 with a degree in art. Soon thereafter, he joined an artists’ commune near Beloit and began designing jewelry.

Originally planning a career in anthropology, but recognizing his artistic talents, Morris combined his favorite discipline and added art, history, sculpture, filmmaking, and much more into the craft of jewelry making. As a self-taught artist, Morris developed a distinctive “Etruscan” gold finish by layering pure 24-carat gold over brass. As opposed to the high shine of 18-carat gold jewelry, the matte yellow gold has an unusual muted glow. Along the same lines, Morris created a green patina—a crude finish with the look of weathered stone. These creations not only established his style but filled a gap between costume jewelry and the “really real stuff.”

When the commune accidentally burned down, Morris fled to shelter for the winter at the home of his friend Tony in Vermont. As luck or fate would have it, the forced flight turned out to be quite fortuitous. While in Vermont at a local crafts fair, a prominent gallery owner purchased one of Morris’ necklaces. Within weeks, Morris was offered a contract to be represented by the chic gallery of famous artist jewelry, Sculpture to Wear, located in the lobby of the Plaza Hotel in New York City.

Morris relocated to New York in 1972 and found his work being displayed as artwork next to the likes of sculptor Alexander Calder (1898–1976), American pop artist Roy Lichtenstein (1923–97), and artist Louise Nevelson (1899–1988). It was here that his bold, minimalist, sculptural forms quickly became popular. Sales of his designs immediately outpaced such masters as Picasso, Braque, Calder, Max Ernst, and Man Ray. His Celtic crosses, cuffs, collars, disk belts, and heart-shaped brooches are treasured by the stylish glitterati, ranging from Hollywood celebrities and musicians—like Candice Bergen, Lisa Bonet, Cher, Bianca Jagger, Grace Jones, and Ali McGraw—to rich urban bikers and businessmen and women who are eager to express their individuality.

He opened his own gallery store, the Robert Lee Morris Gallery, described as “the very first ‘designer store’ of its kind,” in 1974 on West Broadway in New York City, just down the street from the famous SoHo Grand Hotel. Two years later, he was featured on the cover of Vogue, and has been a cornerstone of fashion and jewelry design since, winning just about every major award in the field.

In 1977, three years after he moved to New York, Morris launched an entire modern jewelry movement when he opened his own gallery, called Artwear. At Artwear, Morris created a showcase “for artists focusing on jewelry as their prime medium” and attracted public interest through merchandising techniques as unique as the gallery’s overall concept. The jewelry was displayed on dramatic plaster body casts resembling sculptural relics of ancient civilization. This concept was based on his belief that jewelry “comes alive on the body.” He also developed an image catalogue, featuring models covered in mud, sand, and flour, which instantly became a collector’s item. For 16 years, up to 1993, Morris’ Artwear provided a haven and at least three showcase locations for young, new talent in the jewelry industry.

The following year, 1994, Morris began collaborating with a wide variety of famous designers including Geoffrey Beene, Anne Klein, Calvin Klein, Michael Kors, Karl Lagerfeld, and Kansai Yamamoto. When Donna Karan went solo, she turned to Morris to accessorize her collection with his jewelry, beginning thus far a two-decade on and off collaboration. Karan’s fall 2001 collection featured Morris’ jewelry as featured items.

In October 2000 the World Gold Council launched a major new multipage, four-color co-op print campaign titled, “The Gold Fashioned Girls.” The $3-million media push featured Morris, Chimento, Roberto Coin, Tissot Watch, and AngloGold and appeared in various fashion, luxury, and lifestyle consumer magazines and jewelry trade publications.

In addition to being a successful jewelry designer and businessman, Morris designs handbags, belts, scarves, amulets, sconces, candlesticks, picture frames, packaging for beauty products (the latter for Elizabeth Arden), as well as his own fragrance, Verdigris, named for the ancient color that has become a signature of his mythic style.

Throughout his career, Morris has continually sought out new avenues for expression, collaborating with designers and contemporaries. In his own collections, he has invented a clean, pure, uniquely American style, launching such trends as “bold gold” and the green patina verdigris. Today Morris still lives in SoHo, New York, with his wife, Susan, and their daughter Taylor. A much sought-after lecturer, his philosophy has matured into “a synergy of anthropology, art, and spirituality shaped by a true and abiding love and understanding of beauty, and guided by the principles of Shamanism.”

—Roberta H. Gruber; updated by Daryl F. Mallett

MORTON, Digby

Irish designer

Born: Digby (Henry) Morton in Dublin, 27 November 1906. Education: Studied architecture at the Metropolitan School of Art and Architecture, Dublin, 1923; London Polytechnic. Family: Married Phyllis May Painting, 1936. Career: Worked as sketch artist, Jay’s fashion store, Oxford Street, London, 1928; founded tailoring firm of Lachasse in Farm St, Mayfair, London, 1928; own house established, 1934, closed, 1957; founded Reldan-Digby Morton, 1958; founding member of the Incorporated Society of London Fashion Designers, 1942; designer of Utility clothing for British government, 1942; film costume designer in Hollywood during World War II; established Digby Morton (Exports) Ltd. for marketing British womenswear to the U.S., 1947; Digby Morton for Jacqmar collection, 1950; designer, and vice president, 1955–58, Hathaway Shirt Company, New York; designer/director, Reldan-Digby Morton, 1958–73; designed Women’s Voluntary Services uniform, 1939. Awards: Aberfoyle International Fashion award, New York, 1956. Died: 1983, in London.

PUBLICATIONS

On MORTON:

Books

- Amies, Hardy, Just So Far, London, 1954.
- Carter, Ernestine, Tongue in Chic, London, 1974.
- Lambert, Eleanor, World of Fashion: People, Places, Resources, New York & London, 1976.
- Ginsburg, Madeleine, and Prudence Glynn, In Fashion, London, 1977.
- Amies, Hardy, Still Here, London, 1984.
- Mulvagh, Jane, Vogue History of 20th Century Fashion, London, 1988.

* * *

The fashion for sportswear during the 1920s was the ideal environment for Digby Morton to establish the London house of Lachasse, which specialized in the tailored sporting suit for women. Morton was brought in as chief sportswear designer of a dress establishment owned by businessman Fred Singleton. Morton later claimed his decision to call the new house Lachasse was because at that time British women would not consider anything but French labels in their wardrobes.

gold has an unusual muted glow. Along the same lines, Morris created a green patina—a crude finish with the look of weathered stone. These creations not only established his style but filled a gap between costume jewelry and the “really real stuff.”

When the commune accidentally burned down, Morris fled to shelter for the winter at the home of his friend Tony in Vermont. As luck or fate would have it, the forced flight turned out to be quite fortuitous. While in Vermont at a local crafts fair, a prominent gallery owner purchased one of Morris’ necklaces. Within weeks, Morris was offered a contract to be represented by the chic gallery of famous artist jewelry, Sculpture to Wear, located in the lobby of the Plaza Hotel in New York City.

Morris relocated to New York in 1972 and found his work being displayed as artwork next to the likes of sculptor Alexander Calder (1898–1976), American pop artist Roy Lichtenstein (1923–97), and artist Louise Nevelson (1899–1988). It was here that his bold, minimalist, sculptural forms quickly became popular. Sales of his designs immediately outpaced such masters as Picasso, Braque, Calder, Max Ernst, and Man Ray. His Celtic crosses, cuffs, collars, disk belts, and heart-shaped brooches are treasured by the stylish glitterati, ranging from Hollywood celebrities and musicians—like Candice Bergen, Lisa Bonet, Cher, Bianca Jagger, Grace Jones, and Ali McGraw—to rich urban bikers and businessmen and women who are eager to express their individuality.

He opened his own gallery store, the Robert Lee Morris Gallery, described as “the very first ‘designer store’ of its kind,” in 1974 on West Broadway in New York City, just down the street from the famous SoHo Grand Hotel. Two years later, he was featured on the cover of Vogue, and has been a cornerstone of fashion and jewelry design since, winning just about every major award in the field.

In 1977, three years after he moved to New York, Morris launched an entire modern jewelry movement when he opened his own gallery, called Artwear. At Artwear, Morris created a showcase “for artists focusing on jewelry as their prime medium” and attracted public interest through merchandising techniques as unique as the gallery’s overall concept. The jewelry was displayed on dramatic plaster body casts resembling sculptural relics of ancient civilization. This concept was based on his belief that jewelry “comes alive on the body.” He also developed an image catalogue, featuring models covered in mud, sand, and flour, which instantly became a collector’s item. For 16 years, up to 1993, Morris’ Artwear provided a haven and at least three showcase locations for young, new talent in the jewelry industry.

The following year, 1994, Morris began collaborating with a wide variety of famous designers including Geoffrey Beene, Anne Klein, Calvin Klein, Michael Kors, Karl Lagerfeld, and Kansai Yamamoto. When Donna Karan went solo, she turned to Morris to accessorize her collection with his jewelry, beginning thus far a two-decade on and off collaboration. Karan’s fall 2001 collection featured Morris’ jewelry as featured items.

In October 2000 the World Gold Council launched a major new multipage, four-color co-op print campaign titled, “The Gold Fashioned Girls.” The $3-million media push featured Morris, Chimento, Roberto Coin, Tissot Watch, and AngloGold and appeared in various fashion, luxury, and lifestyle consumer magazines and jewelry trade publications.

In addition to being a successful jewelry designer and businessman, Morris designs handbags, belts, scarves, amulets, sconces, candlesticks, picture frames, packaging for beauty products (the latter for Elizabeth Arden), as well as his own fragrance, Verdigris, named for the ancient color that has become a signature of his mythic style.

Throughout his career, Morris has continually sought out new avenues for expression, collaborating with designers and contemporaries. In his own collections, he has invented a clean, pure, uniquely American style, launching such trends as “bold gold” and the green patina verdigris. Today Morris still lives in SoHo, New York, with his wife, Susan, and their daughter Taylor. A much sought-after lecturer, his philosophy has matured into “a synergy of anthropology, art, and spirituality shaped by a true and abiding love and understanding of beauty, and guided by the principles of Shamanism.”

—Roberta H. Gruber; updated by Daryl F. Mallett

MORTON, Digby

Irish designer

Born: Digby (Henry) Morton in Dublin, 27 November 1906. Education: Studied architecture at the Metropolitan School of Art and Architecture, Dublin, 1923; London Polytechnic. Family: Married Phyllis May Painting, 1936. Career: Worked as sketch artist, Jay’s fashion store, Oxford Street, London, 1928; founded tailoring firm of Lachasse in Farm St, Mayfair, London, 1928; own house established, 1934, closed, 1957; founded Reldan-Digby Morton, 1958; founding member of the Incorporated Society of London Fashion Designers, 1942; designer of Utility clothing for British government, 1942; film costume designer in Hollywood during World War II; established Digby Morton (Exports) Ltd. for marketing British womenswear to the U.S., 1947; Digby Morton for Jacqmar collection, 1950; designer, and vice president, 1955–58, Hathaway Shirt Company, New York; designer/director, Reldan-Digby Morton, 1958–73; designed Women’s Voluntary Services uniform, 1939. Awards: Aberfoyle International Fashion award, New York, 1956. Died: 1983, in London.

PUBLICATIONS

On MORTON:

Books

- Amies, Hardy, Just So Far, London, 1954.
- Carter, Ernestine, Tongue in Chic, London, 1974.
- Lambert, Eleanor, World of Fashion: People, Places, Resources, New York & London, 1976.
- Ginsburg, Madeleine, and Prudence Glynn, In Fashion, London, 1977.
- Amies, Hardy, Still Here, London, 1984.
- Mulvagh, Jane, Vogue History of 20th Century Fashion, London, 1988.

* * *

The fashion for sportswear during the 1920s was the ideal environment for Digby Morton to establish the London house of Lachasse, which specialized in the tailored sporting suit for women. Morton was brought in as chief sportswear designer of a dress establishment owned by businessman Fred Singleton. Morton later claimed his decision to call the new house Lachasse was because at that time British women would not consider anything but French labels in their wardrobes.

Morton transformed the classic tweed suit into a fashionable garment through the carefully planned placing of seams that gave a more decorative line to the native Irish tweeds he used. Sir Hardy Amies acknowledges that Morton's intricate cutting technique and designs made the ordinary country tweed suit into a fashionable garment, worn confidently in town as well as the country. Morton's first collection, in 1929, featured Ardara tweeds, large herringbone wools, and diagonal stripes and checks in the then-unusual color combinations such as pale lime green and duck egg blue with dark brown. Morton used French printed silks by Rodier for blouses and linings which were clean cut and spare for detail, and far removed from what he called "postmistress blouses."

Morton's belief that British women could not successfully wear conspicuous clothes was evident in designs where he endeavored to "translate the trends of feminine fashion into the masculine medium of tailoring." His theory was that it was more difficult to eliminate details than to decorate garments, which resulted in simple lines that relied for effect upon his use of fabrics. Morton's preference for uncluttered designs was also reflected in his dislike of designing eveningwear, which he referred to as debutante clothes. When he began to introduce eveningwear into his collections in the late 1940s his designs were based on the tailored evening dress.

After five years at Lachasse, Morton established his own couture house in 1934. In 1939 he was invited to design the Women's Voluntary Service uniform and during World War II was an active member of the Incorporated Society of London Fashion Designers, established in 1942 to promote exports of British fashion. Morton also designed a collection of garments for the British government's Utility clothing scheme (no-trim standards for wartime clothing and household goods), which went into production anonymously in 1942.

Morton became more closely involved in the field of ready-to-wear clothing in the postwar period and enjoyed particular success in the American market during the 1950s. In 1953 he was asked to design the Lady Hathaway shirt collection for the Hathaway company—a manufacturer of top quality men's shirts. By copying the cut of men's shirts, with slight adjustments for the female form, Morton created the collection in brilliant colors and patterns with contrasting bowties. The success of this venture earned him the title of Daring Digby by Time magazine. This may have prompted Morton to close his couture house in 1957 and enter the field of ready-to-wear on a full-time basis. Morton always acknowledged he felt constrained by couture, and his real design career began when he started designing clothes for the average woman.

In 1958 Morton formed the company Reldan-Digby Morton with Nadler, a large fashion producer owned by Cyril Kern. Morton's ready-to-wear designs for Reldan-Digby Morton introduced ready-made garments with a couture image to the British public. The collection of separates was renamed Togethers and produced at the company's High Wycombe, Buckinghamshire factory. They were also successful in America where some of the more adventurous designs such as bright yellow-and-black striped suits and jet black beach coats appealed to a particular market.

In 1963 Morton began designing menswear, an area that had always appealed to him—he had personally adopted the neo-Edwardian style so fashionable for men in the 1950s. Morton designed his first menswear collection in Trevira cloth for the Cologne Fair, one of the most widely publicized garments of which was the Mesh-Over-Flesh Vestshirt which featured string vest fabric with formal shirting. Other designs played on the traditional image of the male suit, with unusual features such as curved side slits on formal trousers.

Primarily a designer of tailored clothes, Digby Morton was recognized for his use of traditional fabrics in unusual color combinations. His couture designs for women reflected his belief that the British couture customer required unobtrusive suits in good tweeds that were wearable rather than dramatic.

—Catherine Woram

MOSCHINO, Franco

Italian designer

Born: Abbiategrasso, 1950. Education: Studied fine art, Accademia delle Belle Arti, Milan, 1968–71. Career: Freelance designer and illustrator, Milan, 1969–70; sketcher for Versace, 1971–77; designer for Italian company Cadette, 1977–82; founded own company Moonshadow in 1983; launched Moschino Couture!, 1983; fragrance for women Moschino introduced, 1987; introduced diffusion line, Cheap & Chic, 1988; launched Uomo, menswear collection, 1986.

Franco Moschino, fall/winter 2001–02 collection. © AP/Wide World Photos.

Morton transformed the classic tweed suit into a fashionable garment through the carefully planned placing of seams that gave a more decorative line to the native Irish tweeds he used. Sir Hardy Amies acknowledges that Morton's intricate cutting technique and designs made the ordinary country tweed suit into a fashionable garment, worn confidently in town as well as the country. Morton's first collection, in 1929, featured Ardara tweeds, large herringbone wools, and diagonal stripes and checks in the then-unusual color combinations such as pale lime green and duck egg blue with dark brown. Morton used French printed silks by Rodier for blouses and linings which were clean cut and spare for detail, and far removed from what he called "postmistress blouses."

Morton's belief that British women could not successfully wear conspicuous clothes was evident in designs where he endeavored to "translate the trends of feminine fashion into the masculine medium of tailoring." His theory was that it was more difficult to eliminate details than to decorate garments, which resulted in simple lines that relied for effect upon his use of fabrics. Morton's preference for uncluttered designs was also reflected in his dislike of designing eveningwear, which he referred to as debutante clothes. When he began to introduce eveningwear into his collections in the late 1940s his designs were based on the tailored evening dress.

After five years at Lachasse, Morton established his own couture house in 1934. In 1939 he was invited to design the Women's Voluntary Service uniform and during World War II was an active member of the Incorporated Society of London Fashion Designers, established in 1942 to promote exports of British fashion. Morton also designed a collection of garments for the British government's Utility clothing scheme (no-trim standards for wartime clothing and household goods), which went into production anonymously in 1942.

Morton became more closely involved in the field of ready-to-wear clothing in the postwar period and enjoyed particular success in the American market during the 1950s. In 1953 he was asked to design the Lady Hathaway shirt collection for the Hathaway company—a manufacturer of top quality men's shirts. By copying the cut of men's shirts, with slight adjustments for the female form, Morton created the collection in brilliant colors and patterns with contrasting bowties. The success of this venture earned him the title of Daring Digby by Time magazine. This may have prompted Morton to close his couture house in 1957 and enter the field of ready-to-wear on a full-time basis. Morton always acknowledged he felt constrained by couture, and his real design career began when he started designing clothes for the average woman.

In 1958 Morton formed the company Reldan-Digby Morton with Nadler, a large fashion producer owned by Cyril Kern. Morton's ready-to-wear designs for Reldan-Digby Morton introduced ready-made garments with a couture image to the British public. The collection of separates was renamed Togethers and produced at the company's High Wycombe, Buckinghamshire factory. They were also successful in America where some of the more adventurous designs such as bright yellow-and-black striped suits and jet black beach coats appealed to a particular market.

In 1963 Morton began designing menswear, an area that had always appealed to him—he had personally adopted the neo-Edwardian style so fashionable for men in the 1950s. Morton designed his first menswear collection in Trevira cloth for the Cologne Fair, one of the most widely publicized garments of which was the Mesh-Over-Flesh Vestshirt which featured string vest fabric with formal shirting. Other designs played on the traditional image of the male suit, with unusual features such as curved side slits on formal trousers.

Primarily a designer of tailored clothes, Digby Morton was recognized for his use of traditional fabrics in unusual color combinations. His couture designs for women reflected his belief that the British couture customer required unobtrusive suits in good tweeds that were wearable rather than dramatic.

—Catherine Woram

MOSCHINO, Franco

Italian designer

Born: Abbiategrasso, 1950. Education: Studied fine art, Accademia delle Belle Arti, Milan, 1968–71. Career: Freelance designer and illustrator, Milan, 1969–70; sketcher for Versace, 1971–77; designer for Italian company Cadette, 1977–82; founded own company Moonshadow in 1983; launched Moschino Couture!, 1983; fragrance for women Moschino introduced, 1987; introduced diffusion line, Cheap & Chic, 1988; launched Uomo, menswear collection, 1986.

Franco Moschino, fall/winter 2001–02 collection. © AP/Wide World Photos.

and Cheap & Chic Uomo, 1991; Ok-Ko men's fragrance, 1991; firm continued after his death in 1994; formation of Franco Moschino Foundation, to help children with HIV and AIDS, 1994; Cheap & Chic fragrance debuted, 1995; opened shops in Rome and Beverly Hills, late 1995; Oh! de Moschino launched, 1996; opened New York Madison Avenue store, 1996; introduced Moschino Life sportswear, 1999; opened new London boutique, and hired Vincent Darre as designer, 2000; bought by Aeffe SpA, 2001. Exhibitions: X Years of Kaos! [retrospective], Museo della Permanente, Milan, 1993–94. Died: 18 September 1994. Company Address: Moonshadow SpA, Via Ceradini 11/A, 20129 Milan, Italy. Company Website: www.moschino.it.

PUBLICATIONS

By MOSCHINO:

Books

X Anni di Kaos! 1983–1993 [exhibition catalogue], with Lida Castelli, Milan, 1993.

Franco Moschino, fall/winter 2001 collection: patent leather suit.
© AP/Wide World Photos.

On MOSCHINO:

Books

Martin, Richard, and Harold Koda, Jocks and Nerds: Men's Style in the Twentieth Century, New York, 1989.

Stegemeyer, Anne, Who's Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.

Mazza, Samuele and Mariuccia Casadio, Moschino, Cort Madera, California, 1997.

Articles

Webb, Iain R., "Il Cattivo: Franco Moschino...", in Blitz (London), August 1987.

Eastoe, Jane, "Designer Chaos," in Fashion Weekly (London), 23 February 1989.

"Franco Moschino," in i-D (London), May 1989.

Mower, Sarah, "Dressing Down with the Joker," in the Independent (London), 16 November 1989.

Ducas, Jane, "An Italian in Love with All Things English," in the Sunday Times (London), 29 April 1990.

Born, Pete, "Frankly Franco," in WWD, 14 June 1991.

Casadio, Mariuccia, et al., "I Am Proud of the Odor of Garlic and Tomato in My Clothes," in Interview (New York), September 1991.

Goodman, Wendy, "Surrealist at Work," in House & Garden, March 1993.

Hochswender, Woody, "Pins and Needles," in Harper's Bazaar, October 1993.

"Moschino," in Mondo Vomo, July-August 1994.

Talley, André Leon, "Franco Moschino, 1950–1994," in Vogue, December 1994.

"Florence: Moschino," in DNR, 18 January 1995.

Hari, Alessandra, "Moschino's Troops March On," in WWD, 2 March 1995.

Conti, Samantha, "Moschino at the Crossroads," in WWD, 27 August 1996.

Zargani, Luisa, "Moschino Puts Some Life in Line Made for Comfort," in WWD, 2 June 1999.

Menkes, Suzy, "Aeffe Buys Moschino," in International Herald Tribune, 26 October 2001.

Ellism Kristi, "Moschino's Artistic Moment," in WWD, 27 October 1999.

* * *

"Fashion is full of chic," Franco Moschino once commented, was an ironic statement coming from one of Europe's most successful designers. Based in Milan, Moschino originally studied fine art, with ambitions to be a painter, but came to see that tailoring and fabrics could be just as valid a means of expression as paint and canvas. Consequently, his first job in fashion was with the Cadette label, for whom in 1977 he produced a simple range of stylish clothes.

Starting his own label in 1982, Moschino used his experience in the Italian fashion industry as a source for his philosophical ideas evolving a set of tactics designed to shake the fashion establishment out of its complacency. Much to his amazement, he was embraced with open arms as a new iconoclast by the very people he despised. Essentially Moschino was picking up where Schiaparelli had left off, displaying an interest in the surrealist tactic of displacement—he has for a long time professed a love of Magritte's use of the juxtaposition of incongruous imagery to produce a surrealism. This is aptly shown in designs such as his quilted black denim mini with plastic fried eggs decorating the hemline, quilted jacket decorated with bottle tops, plug-socket drop earrings, and bodices made out of safety pins. Moschino's 1989 fun fur collection included a winter coat of stitched together teddybear pelts and a scorch-mark printed silk shirt saying "too much ironing."

Although dubbed the Gaultier of Italian fashion, Moschino responded to fashion differently. Unlike Jean-Paul Gaultier who was interested in playing around with the shapes and the fabrics of fashion, Moschino used basic forms and traditional methods of construction to produce wearable, sexy clothes, cut to flatter and beautifully made. Dismissing his approach as visual and superficial, Moschino stressed he was a decorator, completely disinterested in clothing construction.

Believing he could criticize the business more effectively from the inside, the underlying theme of his work was the parodying of so-called fashion victims, those prepared to be seen in the most ridiculous clothes if they were the latest style, and a general protest against the materialism of capitalism. He did this with visual gags like a triple pearl choker with attached croissant or the Rolex necklace—the pearls and Rolex being traditional ways of displaying wealth—and by mixing cheap plastics with expensive fur.

This parodying of the conspicuous consumers of fashion was continued in 1990 with his use of jokey logos on a series of garments like the cashmere jacket with the words "Expensive jacket" embroidered in gold across its back, or "Bull chic" on a matador-styled outfit. Designs such as these were supposed to make the wearer feel duped into spending vast amounts of money on designer clothing, but after achieving a vast amount of publicity, the people he was attacking flocked to buy his clothes. The iconoclasm of Moschino was destined to become the choicest thing on the catwalk.

Calling for a "Stop to the Fashion System" through his advertising in high fashion magazines, Moschino displayed a classic Dada stance—for an end to the fashion system would mean the destruction of his own empire which came to encompass not just Moschino Couture! but the successful Cheap & Chic range—a diffusion line which was not actually all that cheap—and ranges of underwear, swimwear, jeans, children's clothes, accessories, and fragrances (the men's sold in a double-ended bottle so it can't stand up and the women's advertised with a model drinking it through a straw rather than dabbing it behind her ears).

Known for his theatrical fashion shows (in the past his models impersonated Tina Turner and Princess Margaret), Moschino mixed up and twisted classic styles and wrench them into the present by using humor. A fine example was a Chanel-type suit restyled with gold clothes pegs for buttons. Interestingly enough, his insults were rarely taken seriously. At one collection he pointedly mocked the top fashion editors by leaving moo-boxes on their seats, implying they were dull bovines with not an original thought in their heads, but they applauded all the more.

Moschino's ambition was to destroy the dictates of fashion so people could please themselves with what they chose to wear, and to produce more anonymous clothes once he completed the downfall of the industry. The irony is that Moschino became his own fashion-as-antifashion status symbol; yet his belief that fashion should be fun was valid and remains so today. Unfortunately for Franco Moschino, he was not around to see his plans to fruition—he died in 1994. His funky design firm was carried on after his death, and to dizzying heights of popularity. Soon after Moschino's death, the Franco Moschino Foundation was founded to help children battling HIV and AIDS, and the Moschino firm would routinely design for charities and fundraisers like Artwalk New York.

Fashionwise, Moschino designs lacked the sharpness of Franco's razor wit yet still provided laughs and sales. The company segued into fragrances with the launch of Cheap & Chic in 1995, and opened wildly funky boutiques in Rome and Beverly Hills near the end of the year. More hip shops, in New York City and London, bowed in 1996 and 2000 respectively, while a new sportswear range, Moschino Life, was introduced in 1999. Yet the biggest Moschino news was the firm's acquisition by Aeffe SpA, the burgeoning fashion empire founded by Alberta Ferretti in 2001, which had already produced several Moschino lines.

—Caroline Cox; updated by Sydonie Benét

MOSES, Rebecca

American designer

Born: New Jersey. Career: Developed her first collection at age 21; closed her New York-based design company, 1992; replaced Gianni Versace as designer for Donatella Girombelli's clothing label Genny Collection and Genny Platinum, 1993; continued as a consultant for Genny and Genny Platinum for some years; developed her current label, 1996; designed for the Gerani line, 2000; continues her clothing label to date. Address: 588 Broadway, New York, NY 10012, USA.

PUBLICATIONS

On MOSES:

Articles

- Biggs, Melissa E., "Carry-On Classics," in Town & Country.
- Gross, Michael, "The Subject is Moses: The Name Game," in New York, 14 March 1988.
- Mansfield, Stephanie, "In the World of Fashion, a Designer's Name Can Be Her Most Important Asset," in Vogue, December 1989.
- Quick, Harriet, "Rebecca Moses," in Harpers & Queen, January 1997.
- "Rebecca Moses: Keeping it Simple," in Eve, July 1997.
- "BG, Rebecca Moses Thinking Big," in WWD, 1998.
- Ilari, Alessandra, et al., "Rebecca Moses: The Bag Solution," in WWD, February 24, 1998.
- Ellis, Kristi, "Moses Show Brings $100,000 for Jeri Rice," in WWD, July 28, 1999.
- Zargani, Luisa, "Gilmar and Marzotto Take Different Paths," in WWD, November 9, 2000.
- "Sure Things," in WWD, 7 March 2001.
- "Elegance Made Easy," in Simply the Best, April 2001.

displaying an interest in the surrealist tactic of displacement—he has for a long time professed a love of Magritte's use of the juxtaposition of incongruous imagery to produce a surrealism. This is aptly shown in designs such as his quilted black denim mini with plastic fried eggs decorating the hemline, quilted jacket decorated with bottle tops, plug-socket drop earrings, and bodices made out of safety pins. Moschino's 1989 fun fur collection included a winter coat of stitched together teddybear pelts and a scorch-mark printed silk shirt saying "too much ironing."

Although dubbed the Gaultier of Italian fashion, Moschino responded to fashion differently. Unlike Jean-Paul Gaultier who was interested in playing around with the shapes and the fabrics of fashion, Moschino used basic forms and traditional methods of construction to produce wearable, sexy clothes, cut to flatter and beautifully made. Dismissing his approach as visual and superficial, Moschino stressed he was a decorator, completely disinterested in clothing construction.

Believing he could criticize the business more effectively from the inside, the underlying theme of his work was the parodying of so-called fashion victims, those prepared to be seen in the most ridiculous clothes if they were the latest style, and a general protest against the materialism of capitalism. He did this with visual gags like a triple pearl choker with attached croissant or the Rolex necklace—the pearls and Rolex being traditional ways of displaying wealth—and by mixing cheap plastics with expensive fur.

This parodying of the conspicuous consumers of fashion was continued in 1990 with his use of jokey logos on a series of garments like the cashmere jacket with the words "Expensive jacket" embroidered in gold across its back, or "Bull chic" on a matador-styled outfit. Designs such as these were supposed to make the wearer feel duped into spending vast amounts of money on designer clothing, but after achieving a vast amount of publicity, the people he was attacking flocked to buy his clothes. The iconoclasm of Moschino was destined to become the choicest thing on the catwalk.

Calling for a "Stop to the Fashion System" through his advertising in high fashion magazines, Moschino displayed a classic Dada stance—for an end to the fashion system would mean the destruction of his own empire which came to encompass not just Moschino Couture! but the successful Cheap & Chic range—a diffusion line which was not actually all that cheap—and ranges of underwear, swimwear, jeans, children's clothes, accessories, and fragrances (the men's sold in a double-ended bottle so it can't stand up and the women's advertised with a model drinking it through a straw rather than dabbing it behind her ears).

Known for his theatrical fashion shows (in the past his models impersonated Tina Turner and Princess Margaret), Moschino mixed up and twisted classic styles and wrenched them into the present by using humor. A fine example was a Chanel-type suit restyled with gold clothes pegs for buttons. Interestingly enough, his insults were rarely taken seriously. At one collection he pointedly mocked the top fashion editors by leaving moo-boxes on their seats, implying they were dull bovines with not an original thought in their heads, but they applauded all the more.

Moschino's ambition was to destroy the dictates of fashion so people could please themselves with what they chose to wear, and to produce more anonymous clothes once he completed the downfall of the industry. The irony is that Moschino became his own fashion-as-antifashion status symbol; yet his belief that fashion should be fun was valid and remains so today. Unfortunately for Franco Moschino, he was not around to see his plans to fruition—he died in 1994. His funky design firm was carried on after his death, and to dizzying heights of popularity. Soon after Moschino's death, the Franco Moschino Foundation was founded to help children battling HIV and AIDS, and the Moschino firm would routinely design for charities and fundraisers like Artwalk New York.

Fashionwise, Moschino designs lacked the sharpness of Franco's razor wit yet still provided laughs and sales. The company segued into fragrances with the launch of Cheap & Chic in 1995, and opened wildly funky boutiques in Rome and Beverly Hills near the end of the year. More hip shops, in New York City and London, bowed in 1996 and 2000 respectively, while a new sportswear range, Moschino Life, was introduced in 1999. Yet the biggest Moschino news was the firm's acquisition by Aeffe SpA, the burgeoning fashion empire founded by Alberta Ferretti in 2001, which had already produced several Moschino lines.

—Caroline Cox; updated by Sydonie Benét

MOSES, Rebecca

American designer

Born: New Jersey. Career: Developed her first collection at age 21; closed her New York-based design company, 1992; replaced Gianni Versace as designer for Donatella Girombelli's clothing label Genny Collection and Genny Platinum, 1993; continued as a consultant for Genny and Genny Platinum for some years; developed her current label, 1996; designed for the Gerani line, 2000; continues her clothing label to date. Address: 588 Broadway, New York, NY 10012, USA.

PUBLICATIONS

On MOSES:

Articles

- Biggs, Melissa E., "Carry-On Classics," in Town & Country.
- Gross, Michael, "The Subject is Moses: The Name Game," in New York, 14 March 1988.
- Mansfield, Stephanie, "In the World of Fashion, a Designer's Name Can Be Her Most Important Asset," in Vogue, December 1989.
- Quick, Harriet, "Rebecca Moses," in Harpers & Queen, January 1997.
- "Rebecca Moses: Keeping it Simple," in Eve, July 1997.
- "BG, Rebecca Moses Thinking Big," in WWD, 1998.
- Ilari, Alessandra, et al., "Rebecca Moses: The Bag Solution," in WWD, February 24, 1998.
- Ellis, Kristi, "Moses Show Brings $100,000 for Jeri Rice," in WWD, July 28, 1999.
- Zargani, Luisa, "Gilmar and Marzotto Take Different Paths," in WWD, November 9, 2000.
- "Sure Things," in WWD, 7 March 2001.
- "Elegance Made Easy," in Simply the Best, April 2001.

Rebecca Moses, fall/winter 2001–02 collection. © AP/Wide World Photos.

* * *

Women who are on the go and looking for simple style can always look to Rebecca Moses' designs for their fashion needs. Moses has developed a unique way of combining sheer elegance with ready-to-wear fashion by creating relaxed fits with sexy and womanly designs. Bias-cutting and plunging necklines in fine cashmere fabric is a trademark of Moses. She prides herself in using the finest quality cashmere in all her fashions and says that comfort should not negate looking sexy.

Moses' lines are always exquisite and seemingly weigh nothing on the body. They are comfortable and cool, lively and eye-popping. She uses cashmere almost exclusively in her newer collections, year-round. The secret to warmth in cashmere is to layer the paper-thin fabric during the chilling winter months. In 1997, Moses took the cashmere V-neck sweater to 30 opalescent shades, including pink, melon, lavender, and blue ice.

Moses uses vibrant colors, as well as neutrals, to balance women's wardrobes so that pieces can easily be mixed and matched. The colors and hues are inspired by everything around her, especially the flowers in her gardens. Hydrangeas, wisteria, red and pink roses, geraniums, rhododendrons, and azaleas are just a few of the inspiring florals for her creations. Large Scotch pines and a large American maple tree are also sources for inspirational color.

Rebecca Moses, fall/winter 2001–02 collection. © AP/Wide World Photos.

In the summer 1997 collection, Moses created colors of stone, glass, and classic black. The outfits were cool and fresh, and never tight-fitting. The collection included sexy halters and one-shouldered tops. For pants, jackets, and skirts, she enjoyed using neutral colors so that other pieces of the outfit could be used to add vibrant color. She believes a woman should have a base to her wardrobe and then work around the base by adding color. To go along with her sexy yet simple style, Moses created a sling-in-a-bag, cashmere roll-in-a-ball dress, which she called the "va-va voom" dress, to make traveling easier for the busy, modern woman.

Still paying close attention to working women, in 1998, Moses developed a collection of functional yet stylish bags. Practicality was the motivation for her designs, which meant there were compartments for cellular phones, calculators, and glasses. The bags were made out of either deer, lamb napa, or calfskin, and lined with flannel. Colors included black, mud, and toffee brown next to bronze, gray, and copper metallics.

Spring/summer 1999 marked the beginning of a new line of bigger sizes for Moses. She struck a deal with Bergdorf Goodman to develop a collection for plus sizes. The line was created to give plus-sizes the opportunity to feel sexy and modern, and included all of Moses' regular designs: cashmere knits with plunging necklines, cardigans, bias-cut dresses, tunics, and cigarette pants. To enhance the line, she used colors such as white, sand, stone, saturated pastels, and ocean blue.

For regular sizes, the spring/summer 1999 collection continued to address busy, on-the-go women. There were pieces of sportswear, a twinset, a clutch coat, the Capri, and sundresses. Accessories such as slipper shoes, bags, and scarves played a more significant role in the designs. Colors included saturated pastels highlighted against neutrals.

The spring/summer 2001 collection gave the feel and look of being on a leisurely vacation. The colors produced a warm, neutral and sensual glow. The silk and cashmere knits captured the feeling of tropical life. Moses also added one more touch to her cashmere designs: delightful brooches.

Rebecca Moses is a designer of versatility, sensuality, and comfort. She has made her mark as "the" designer of light cashmere clothes for busy, working women. Her attention to details, comfort, and style has given her the reputation as a designer who creates seemingly effortless luxurious styles.

—Kimbally A. Medeiros

MUGLER, Thierry

French designer

Born: Strasbourg, Alsace, France, 1948. Education: Studied at the Lycée Fustel de Coulangé, 1960–65, and at the School of Fine Arts, Strasbourg, 1966–67. Career: Dancer, Opéra de Rhin, Strasbourg, 1965–66; assistant designer, Gudule boutique, Paris, 1966–67; professional photographer, from 1967; designer, André Peters, London, 1968–69; freelance designer, Milan, Paris, 1970–73; created Café de Paris fashion collection, Paris, 1973; founder, Thierry Mugler, 1974, owner, from 1986; published Thierry Mugler, Photographer, Paris, London & New York, 1988; Thierry Mugler Perfumes, created 1990; Angel fragrance introduced, 1992; first couture collection shown, 1992; worked on film Prêt-à-Porter, 1994. Address: 130 rue du Faubourg St. Honoré, 75008 Paris, France.

PUBLICATIONS

By MUGLER:

Books

Thierry Mugler, Photographer, Paris, London & New York, 1988.

On MUGLER:

Books

Polhemus, Ted, and Lynn Proctor, Fashion and AntiFashion, London, 1978.

Martin, Richard, Fashion and Surrealism, New York, 1987.

Martin, Richard, and Harold Koda, Infra-Apparel, New York, 1993.

Stegemeyer, Anne, Who's Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.

Wargnier, Stéphanie, Thierry Mugler, Paris, 1997.

Baudot, François, Thierry Mugler, London, 1997, 1998.

Thierry Mugler, spring/summer 2001 collection. © AP/Wide World Photos.

Deloffre, Claudi, Thierry Mugler: Fashion Fetish Fantasy, Los Angeles, 1998.

Articles

Kuka, John, "Notes on Fashion," in the New York Times, 4 August 1981.

Morris, Bernadine, "The Directions of the Innovations," in the New York Times Magazine, 27 February 1983.

LaLanne, Dorothee, "Thierry Mugler et Macbeth," in Vogue (Paris), November 1985.

Tritteleno, Martine, "Thierry Mugler: L'Homme qui aimait les légendes," in L'Officie 1 (Paris), November 1986.

Morris, Bernadine, "Japanese Excitement in Paris," in the New York Times, 20 March 1987.

Gasperini, Nicoletta, "Traveling Goddesses," in Joyce (Hong Kong), March 1988.

Mory, Frederique, "De la mode à la photo," in Madame Figaro (Paris), 2 July 1988.

Baudot, François, "Double objectif de Thierry Mugler," in Elle (Paris), 7 November 1988.

Hochswender, Woody, "Thierry Mugler: Nuts, Bolts and Sequins," in the New York Times, 18 March 1989.

opportunity to feel sexy and modern, and included all of Moses' regular designs: cashmere knits with plunging necklines, cardigans, bias-cut dresses, tunics, and cigarette pants. To enhance the line, she used colors such as white, sand, stone, saturated pastels, and ocean blue.

For regular sizes, the spring/summer 1999 collection continued to address busy, on-the-go women. There were pieces of sportswear, a twinset, a clutch coat, the Capri, and sundresses. Accessories such as slipper shoes, bags, and scarves played a more significant role in the designs. Colors included saturated pastels highlighted against neutrals.

The spring/summer 2001 collection gave the feel and look of being on a leisurely vacation. The colors produced a warm, neutral and sensual glow. The silk and cashmere knits captured the feeling of tropical life. Moses also added one more touch to her cashmere designs: delightful brooches.

Rebecca Moses is a designer of versatility, sensuality, and comfort. She has made her mark as "the" designer of light cashmere clothes for busy, working women. Her attention to details, comfort, and style has given her the reputation as a designer who creates seemingly effortless luxurious styles.

—Kimbally A. Medeiros

MUGLER, Thierry

French designer

Born: Strasbourg, Alsace, France, 1948. Education: Studied at the Lycée Fustel de Coulangé, 1960–65, and at the School of Fine Arts, Strasbourg, 1966–67. Career: Dancer, Opéra de Rhin, Strasbourg, 1965–66; assistant designer, Gudule boutique, Paris, 1966–67; professional photographer, from 1967; designer, André Peters, London, 1968–69; freelance designer, Milan, Paris, 1970–73; created Café de Paris fashion collection, Paris, 1973; founder, Thierry Mugler, 1974, owner, from 1986; published Thierry Mugler, Photographer, Paris, London & New York, 1988; Thierry Mugler Perfumes, created 1990; Angel fragrance introduced, 1992; first couture collection shown, 1992; worked on film Prêt-à-Porter, 1994. Address: 130 rue du Faubourg St. Honoré, 75008 Paris, France.

PUBLICATIONS

By MUGLER:

Books

Thierry Mugler, Photographer, Paris, London & New York, 1988.

On MUGLER:

Books

Polhemus, Ted, and Lynn Proctor, Fashion and AntiFashion, London, 1978.

Martin, Richard, Fashion and Surrealism, New York, 1987.

Martin, Richard, and Harold Koda, Infra-Apparel, New York, 1993.

Stegemeyer, Anne, Who's Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.

Wargnier, Stéphanie, Thierry Mugler, Paris, 1997.

Baudot, François, Thierry Mugler, London, 1997, 1998.

Thierry Mugler, spring/summer 2001 collection. © AP/Wide World Photos.

Deloffre, Claudi, Thierry Mugler: Fashion Fetish Fantasy, Los Angeles, 1998.

Articles

Kuka, John, "Notes on Fashion," in the New York Times, 4 August 1981.

Morris, Bernadine, "The Directions of the Innovations," in the New York Times Magazine, 27 February 1983.

LaLanne, Dorothee, "Thierry Mugler et Macbeth," in Vogue (Paris), November 1985.

Tritteleno, Martine, "Thierry Mugler: L'Homme qui aimait les légendes," in L'Officie 1 (Paris), November 1986.

Morris, Bernadine, "Japanese Excitement in Paris," in the New York Times, 20 March 1987.

Gasperini, Nicoletta, "Traveling Goddesses," in Joyce (Hong Kong), March 1988.

Mory, Frederique, "De la mode à la photo," in Madame Figaro (Paris), 2 July 1988.

Baudot, François, "Double objectif de Thierry Mugler," in Elle (Paris), 7 November 1988.

Hochswender, Woody, "Thierry Mugler: Nuts, Bolts and Sequins," in the New York Times, 18 March 1989.

- _____, "Stripping Down to Basics," in the New York Times, 24 October 1989.
- Moutet, Anne-Elisabeth, "Hocus Focus," in Harper's Bazaar, June 1990.
- Gross, Michael, "The Wild One," in New York, 4 June 1990.
- Wrobel, Catherine, "Mugler à Moscou," in France-Soir (Paris), 26 June 1990.
- "Mugler, Clarins Link for a Scent," in WWD, 28 September 1990.
- Forestier, Nadège, "Thierry Mugler: L'Art de se faire une griffe," in Le Figaro (Paris), 6 October 1990.
- Polan, Brenda, "Mugler," in Elle (Paris), December 1990.
- von Unwerth, Ellen, "How to Look Good in Thierry Mugler," in Interview (New York), March 1991.
- Martin, Richard, "Fashion License: Clothing and the Car," in Textile and Text, 13 April 1991.
- Morris, Bernadine, "Voyages into Uncharted Waters," in the New York Times, 19 October 1991.
- "Mugler's Monster Show," in Elle (New York), November 1991.
- Morris, Bernadine, "Designer in Paris Seeks a Shake-Up," in the New York Times, 27 March 1992.
- Yarbrough, Jeff, "Thierry Mugler Talks Trends," in the Advocate (USA), 21 April 1992.
- Spindler, Amy, "Monsieur Mugler," in WWD, 22 July 1992.
- Morris, Bernadine, "Calm and Classy vs. Bluntly Sexual," in the New York Times, 31 July 1992.
- Casadio, Mauriccia, "Six Haute Designers: Pure Allure," in Interview (New York), December 1992.
- Brubach, Holly, "Whose Vision is It, Anyway?" in the New York Times Magazine, 17 July 1994.
- Spindler, Amy M., "Thierry Mugler on a Roll," in the New York Times, 18 October 1994.
- _____, "Waiting for Mugler," in the New York Times, 27 December 1994.
- "The Paris Collections: The Ideas of March: Thierry Mugler," in WWD, 17 March 1995.
- Spindler, Amy M., "A Mature Mugler, Demeulemeester, and Lang," in the New York Times, 18 March 1995.
- Luscombe, Belinda, "Running Wild on the Runway," in Time, 27 March 1995.
- Gaudoin, Tina, "Very Thierry," in Elle (London), April 1995.
- Spindler, Amy M., "In Paris, Ready for Their Close-Ups," in the New York Times, 14 October 1995.
- _____, "Giving More Weight to Lightness," in the New York Times, 24 January 1997.
- "Clarins in Talks with Fashion House," in the New York Times, 18 April 1997.
- White, Constance C. R., "Touches of Spice in a Tepid Stew," in the New York Times, 27 January 1998.
- _____, "Breezy Gaultier and Yamamoto," in the New York Times, 17 March 1998.

* * *

Rich in iconography, the work of Thierry Mugler has, since 1974, exploited wit and drama to convey an imaginary narrative that is at once erotic, amusing, and unsettling. His clothing spans the spectrum from vulgar ornamentalism to the most rigorous minimalism, denying the possibility of defining a Mugler style.

Born in 1948 in Strasbourg, Mugler was a child prodigy at the city's School of Fine Arts. At the age of 14, he began dancing with the Thierry Mugler, fall/winter 2001–02 ready-to-wear collection. © AP/Wide World Photos.

Rhine Opera Ballet. By 20, he had moved to Paris to begin work as an assistant designer for the Gudule boutique. Later he would design for André Peters in London before freelancing for other fashion houses in Milan and Paris. In 1973, he created his first label, Café de Paris, which featured dresses made of muslin and trimmed with fox. Mugler founded his own brand the following year and opened his own shop.

It is Mugler's imagery that most clearly identifies him within high fashion. His sources include Hollywood glamor, science fiction, sexual fetishism, political history, Detroit car styling of the 1950s, and various periods in the history of art and decoration. In this way, his work reflects the eclecticism of the art world during the 1970s and 1980s. Mugler has taken a particular delight in industrial styling, which he displayed in the precise geometries of ornamental detail and through his vocabulary of thematic references, which have included the jet age forms used in the fantastic automobiles devised by Harley Earl for General Motors during the 1950s.

Clothing designs that operate as costumes in a dramatic narrative have reinforced the importance of Mugler's link with the cinema and particularly with the American film costumes of designers such as Edith Head, Travis Banton, and Adrian. A love of glamor was evident in his extravagant 1992 collection, redolent of 1950s fashion at its most lavish and photographed among the Baroque roof sculptures of the old city of Prague. His interest in romance and the bizarre has often run counter to political ideologies. Against a backdrop of feminist reinterpretation of the female image, Mugler adopted an ironic, postmodern stance and exploited an array of erotic icons as themes for his collections.

Women who favor Mugler are often those who find themselves encased in rigid materials such as leather, latex, rubber, plastic, plexiglas, and chrome. Therefore, it is no surprise that Mugler is a big favorite of those involved in the corset and fetish worlds. His designs range from the insectoid to the medieval, from the fantastic to the science fictional. His "Carapace" ensemble, created from sculpted and embossed leather and silk chiffon, trimmed with beads and feathers, upon which he collaborated with leather designer Abel Villareal, resembles nothing if not the body armor of a medieval knight.

The London-based House of Harlot often works with Mugler to create outfits and accessories for his catwalk shows. Few if any designers have used rubber in such a provocative and consequential way. He has also worked with everything from taffeta, lace, muslin, and raffia to coconut fibers, chrome, latex, and color-changing, temperature-sensitive plastic. Difficult to characterize and appearing to work in opposition to current fashion and intellectual trends, Mugler has remained a controversial figure on the fashion scene.

Mugler's photographic talent may prove to be as important as his fashion designs. A book of his photographs, Thierry Mugler, Photographer, published in 1988, contained images comparable in their artifice, explosive glamor, and formal control to the cinematic images of Peter Greenaway. His photographs exploit grand vistas, deep interior spaces, and heroic monuments as settings upon which models perch like tiny ornaments, strongly defined by the extravagant outline of their costumes and asserting their presence through dramatic pose and gesture. His fashion photographs provide a narrative framework for Mugler's clothes, while relegating them to the role of costume within a larger dramatic context.

The broad-shouldered Russian collection of 1986, for example, was presented against backgrounds of heroic Soviet monuments or sweeping landscapes reminiscent of earlier 20th-century Social Realist painting and poster art. Mugler has also made photographic collages repeating and emphasizing the formal elements of his clothes in kaleidoscopic compositions that revealed his interest in abstract aesthetics. These images were conceived as pure works of art, in which the clothing became an element of the creative whole.

Not content to dabble just in clothing design and photography, Mugler introduced his first fragrance in 1993. Called Angel, it is a blue-hued, oriental scent with essences of chocolate, caramel, honey, and vanilla with sensual wood notes. Favored by music diva Diana Ross, the scent comes in a five-pointed star-shaped bottle. A second fragrance, Amen, followed some years later.

In 1994, Mugler worked on the film Prêt-à-Porter, starring Julia Roberts and Tim Robbins, a complicated film following about a half-dozen plots, all circling around the death of a much-hated leader in the fashion world.

Mugler's clothes are designed to be performed in. His major catwalk shows—featuring top models such as Esther Canadas—beginning in 1977, have been choreographed like the great Hollywood musicals of Busby Berkeley. Later exhibitions were held in huge sports stadiums, emulating the highly charged atmosphere of rock concerts. Mugler designs the offstage wardrobes of rock celebrities such as Madonna, as well as dressing famous women like

Danielle Mitterand, who require a more dignified appearance. His fall 2000 showing at the Louvre mixed demure organza and georgette evening dresses with outlandish latex and fluorescent creations.

Whether aggressively vulgar or caricatures of sobriety, Mugler's designs are consistently body conscious. His clothes can be read as essays in the aesthetic potential of extreme proportions; shoulder widths three times head height, wasp waists, and panniered hips are among the repertoire of distortions and exaggerations of the human figure to be found among his designs. Mugler's annual collections, for both women and men, consistently aim to provoke through their challenging themes and flamboyant formal qualities.

—Gregory Votolato; updated by Daryl F. Mallett

MUIR, Jean

British designer

Born: Jean Elizabeth Muir in London, circa 1930. Education: Dame Harper School, Bedford. Family: Married actor Harry Leuckert.

Jean Muir, autumn/winter 2001 collection. © Reuters NewMedia Inc./CORBIS.

in his extravagant 1992 collection, redolent of 1950s fashion at its most lavish and photographed among the Baroque roof sculptures of the old city of Prague. His interest in romance and the bizarre has often run counter to political ideologies. Against a backdrop of feminist reinterpretation of the female image, Mugler adopted an ironic, postmodern stance and exploited an array of erotic icons as themes for his collections.

Women who favor Mugler are often those who find themselves encased in rigid materials such as leather, latex, rubber, plastic, plexiglas, and chrome. Therefore, it is no surprise that Mugler is a big favorite of those involved in the corset and fetish worlds. His designs range from the insectoid to the medieval, from the fantastic to the science fictional. His "Carapace" ensemble, created from sculpted and embossed leather and silk chiffon, trimmed with beads and feathers, upon which he collaborated with leather designer Abel Villareal, resembles nothing if not the body armor of a medieval knight.

The London-based House of Harlot often works with Mugler to create outfits and accessories for his catwalk shows. Few if any designers have used rubber in such a provocative and consequential way. He has also worked with everything from taffeta, lace, muslin, and raffia to coconut fibers, chrome, latex, and color-changing, temperature-sensitive plastic. Difficult to characterize and appearing to work in opposition to current fashion and intellectual trends, Mugler has remained a controversial figure on the fashion scene.

Mugler's photographic talent may prove to be as important as his fashion designs. A book of his photographs, Thierry Mugler, Photographer, published in 1988, contained images comparable in their artifice, explosive glamor, and formal control to the cinematic images of Peter Greenaway. His photographs exploit grand vistas, deep interior spaces, and heroic monuments as settings upon which models perch like tiny ornaments, strongly defined by the extravagant outline of their costumes and asserting their presence through dramatic pose and gesture. His fashion photographs provide a narrative framework for Mugler's clothes, while relegating them to the role of costume within a larger dramatic context.

The broad-shouldered Russian collection of 1986, for example, was presented against backgrounds of heroic Soviet monuments or sweeping landscapes reminiscent of earlier 20th-century Social Realist painting and poster art. Mugler has also made photographic collages repeating and emphasizing the formal elements of his clothes in kaleidoscopic compositions that revealed his interest in abstract aesthetics. These images were conceived as pure works of art, in which the clothing became an element of the creative whole.

Not content to dabble just in clothing design and photography, Mugler introduced his first fragrance in 1993. Called Angel, it is a blue-hued, oriental scent with essences of chocolate, caramel, honey, and vanilla with sensual wood notes. Favored by music diva Diana Ross, the scent comes in a five-pointed star-shaped bottle. A second fragrance, Amen, followed some years later.

In 1994, Mugler worked on the film Prêt-à-Porter, starring Julia Roberts and Tim Robbins, a complicated film following about a half-dozen plots, all circling around the death of a much-hated leader in the fashion world.

Mugler's clothes are designed to be performed in. His major catwalk shows—featuring top models such as Esther Canadas—beginning in 1977, have been choreographed like the great Hollywood musicals of Busby Berkeley. Later exhibitions were held in huge sports stadiums, emulating the highly charged atmosphere of rock concerts. Mugler designs the offstage wardrobes of rock celebrities such as Madonna, as well as dressing famous women like

Danielle Mitterand, who require a more dignified appearance. His fall 2000 showing at the Louvre mixed demure organza and georgette evening dresses with outlandish latex and fluorescent creations.

Whether aggressively vulgar or caricatures of sobriety, Mugler's designs are consistently body conscious. His clothes can be read as essays in the aesthetic potential of extreme proportions; shoulder widths three times head height, wasp waists, and panniered hips are among the repertoire of distortions and exaggerations of the human figure to be found among his designs. Mugler's annual collections, for both women and men, consistently aim to provoke through their challenging themes and flamboyant formal qualities.

—Gregory Votolato; updated by Daryl F. Mallett

MUIR, Jean

British designer

Born: Jean Elizabeth Muir in London, circa 1930. Education: Dame Harper School, Bedford. Family: Married actor Harry Leuckert.

Jean Muir, autumn/winter 2001 collection. © Reuters NewMedia Inc./CORBIS.

Career: Sales assistant in lingerie and made-to-measure departments, Liberty, London, 1950–55; studied fashion drawing and modeled at St Martin's School of Art, London; joined Jacqmar then Jaeger, 1956–63; studied knitwear design and manufacture, especially jersey, and visited Paris collections; worked at Courtaulds, 1966–69; created own label, Jane & Jane, 1967; formed Jean Muir Ltd. with husband, 1986; sold majority interest to Coats Paton group; bought back 75-percent stake in company, 1989; Jean Muir department in Jaeger's flagship store, London. Awards: British Fashion Writers Group Dress of the Year award, 1964; Harper's Bazaar trophy; Ambassador award for Achievement, 1965; Maison Blanche Rex awards, 1967, 1968, 1974, 1976; Churchman's Fashion Designer of the Year award, 1970; Royal Society of Arts Royal Designer for Industry, 1972; elected fellow of RSA; Neiman Marcus award, 1973; elected fellow of Chartered Society of Designers, 1978; Bath Museum of Costume Dress of the Year award, 1979; named Honorary Doctor, Royal College of Art, 1981; appointed to the Design Council, London, 1983; made a Commander of the Order of the British Empire, 1984; awarded Hommage de la Mode, Fédération Française du Prêt-à-Porter Féminin; British Fashion Council award for Services to Industry, 1985; Chartered Society of Designers medal; Textile Institute Design medal, 1987; Australian Bicentennial award, 1988; The Ford award, 1989. Honorary Degree, Doctor of Literature, University of Newcastle. Died: 28 May 1995, in London.

PUBLICATIONS

By MUIR:

Books

Jean Muir, London, 1981.

Articles

"Getting Going," in The Designer (London), October 1979.

On MUIR:

Books

MacCarthy, Fiona, and Patrick Nuttgens, Eye for Industry: Royal Designers for Industry, 1936–1986, exhibition catalogue, London 1986.

Stegemeyer, Anne, Who's Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.

Articles and Video

"Jean Muir Designs," in The Times (London), 4 November 1971.

"1979 Design for Bath Museum," in the Sunday Times, 2 September 1979.

"Great British Design: Jean Muir," in Vogue (London), August 1981. Green, Felicity, "The Gospel According to St Muir," in the Sunday Telegraph Magazine (London), 8 March 1987.

"Designers Take Two," in Good Housekeeping (London), March 1988.

Lambert, Elizabeth, and Derry Moore, "The Essential Jean Muir: Composition in White for Her London Apartment," Architectural Digest, September 1988.

Maitliss, Nicky, "A Day in the Life of Jean Muir," in the Sunday Times Magazine (London), 13 November 1988.

Jean Muir, autumn/winter 2001 collection: silk multicolored dress.
© Reuters NewMedia Inc./CORBIS.

Dutt, Robin, "Jean Muir Interview," in Clothes Show (London), February 1989.

"Winter '89," in DR: The Fashion Business (London), 4 March 1989.

Klensch, Elsa, "Style with Elsa Klensch," (video), CNN Special Reports, 6 May 1989.

McCooey, Meriel, "The Prime of Miss Jean Muir," in the Sunday Times Magazine (London), 13 January 1991.

Webb, Ian R., "Secure with Miss Muir," in Harpers & Queen (London), March 1991.

van der Post, Lucia, "The Queen of Simple Chic," in the Financial Times (London), 9 March 1991.

Rawlinson, Richard, "Pure Miss Muir," in DR: The Fashion Business (London), 11 May 1991.

Menkes, Suzy, "Twenty-Five Years of Disciplined Design," in the International Herald Tribune (Paris), 21 May 1991.

_____, "Muir's Classical Rigor," in the International Herald Tribune (Paris), 30 May 1995.

Fallon, James, "UK Designer Jean Muir Dead at 66," in WWD, 30 May 1995.

Obituary, in Time, 12 June 1995.

Bowles, Hamish, "The Prime of Miss Jean Muir," in Vogue, September 1995.

* * *

Jean Muir was noted for simple, flattering, and extremely feminine clothes that were sophisticated yet retain a handcrafted look with diligent attention to detail. Her favorite fabrics—jersey, angora, wool crêpe, suede, and soft leather—reappeared time after time, regardless of trends. Her more famous clients included actresses Joanna Lumley and Patricia Hodge and writers and artists such as Lady Antonia Fraser and Bridget Riley.

Muir was renowned for producing clothes women really wanted to wear and felt comfortable in. She achieved this by modeling all the clothes and toiles herself at fittings, an advantage she believed she had over male designers. “If you’re going to make clothes, the first thing you have to understand is the female anatomy. When I try on a dress, I can feel if something is wrong; I can tell if it’s not sitting properly on the shoulders or the bust or the hip. I couldn’t tell these things if I saw it on a stand,” she had explained.

There was an air of the fashion headmistress in Jean Muir’s approach; her steadfast opinions could not be budged. Her tone was unrelenting when she stressed a need to restore a sense of pride in the technique of making clothes and her passion for “art, craft and design and the upholding of standards and quality, maintaining them and setting new ones.” She believed fashion was not art but industry. The word fashion, she said, suggested the “transient and the superficial,” hardly the best attributes for a commercial business. Muir described her work as being based on intuition, aesthetic appreciation, and mathematical technical expertise. Never at the cutting edge of fashion, the clothes were timeless, understated, and often dateless. Like Fortuny or Chanel, the company based its look on the evolution of a singular theme, a soft, supple fluidity of cut which created the form of a garment.

In person Muir epitomized the type of woman for whom she liked to design. Writer Antonia Fraser described her as a “modish Puck” with a white, powdered face with a mouth slashed in crimson lipstick. Muir had a wiry, bird-like frame and was always dressed in navy calf-length jersey dresses, with black stockings and Granny shoes. In her studio Muir had a reputation for perfectionism and exacting standards in all aspects of production. “There are tremendous activities involved in the making of clothes,” she declared in a television interview, with such conviction that the viewer was left in no doubt about her sincerity.

In the annals of fashion history Jean Muir should be remembered as a designer who liberated the body. While many designers have forced bodies into structured tailoring, boning, or restrictive interfaced fabrics, Muir’s fluid and easy clothes always provided an emancipated alternative; devoid of structure and underpinning, the clothes nevertheless remained womanly and melodious.

—Kevin Almond

MUJI

Japanese design firm

Founded: in 1983 by retail conglomerate Seiyu. Company History: Joint venture with Liberty Plc, 1991–97; opened first European outlet, London, 1991; spun off as part of Ryohin Keikaku Ltd., 1997; announced intention to open 40 stores in Germany over next decade, 1997; majority stake in Ryohin sold by Seiyu, 1999; launched company websites for online sales, 2000. Awards: D&AD Silver award, 1994; Design Week award for Retail Design, 1994. Company Address: Nikko Ikebukuro Building, 4–26–3 Higashi-Ikebukuro, Toshima-ku, Tokyo, Japan 170. Company Websites: www.muji.net (in Japan); www.MujiOnline.com (in North America).

PUBLICATIONS

On MUJI:

Articles

- Glancey, Jonathan, “No Labels, No Brand Names, No Nonsense,” in the Independent, July 1991.
- Nakamoto, Michiyo, “Life With Liberty in the Pursuit of Happiness and Joint Profits,” in the Financial Times, July 1991.
- Furness, Janine, “The Brand With No Name,” in Interior Design (London), September 1991.
- Louiek Elaine, “If You Want to Make an Understatement,” in the New York Times, November 1991.
- van der Post, Lucia, “New Worshippers for Japan’s Muji Cult,” in the Financial Times, June 1992.
- Thompson, Elspeth, “Selling a Lifestyle Without a Label,” in The Guardian, July 1992.
- Horsham, Michael, “Adoration of the Muji,” in The Guardian, 21 October 1994.
- “Japanese Retailing—Look Out Japanese Supermarket Chain Seiyu’s Restructuring Plans,” in the Economist, 24 October 1998.
- Nusbaum, Alexandra, “Seiyu to Sell Shares to Offset ¥88bn Charge,” in the Financial Times, 23 February 1999.
- “Japanese Retailing—A Yen for Cheap Chic,” in the Economist, 3 June 2000.
- “Muji Online Bows in North America,” in WWD, 6 November 2000.
- Nicksin, Carole, “Japan’s Muji Launches E-Commerce Site for U.S., Canada,” in HFN (Weekly Newspaper for the Home Furnishing Network), 13 November 2000.
- Terazono, Emiko, “Growing Pains are Natural as Muji Enters the Major League,” in the Financial Times, 5 April 2001.
- “New Daiei Store Heats Up Ginza Clothing War,” in Yomiuri Shimbun/Daily Yomiuri, 9 November 2001.

* * *

The company name signals its policy—Muji, short for Mujirushi Ryohin, is represented by four characters meaning “no-brand quality goods.” The concept is Japanese; its success has been international. Muji is proving a workable design formula for the 1990s and well into the 2000s.

In providing an antidote to the 1980s designer label obsession, Muji is consciously self-effacing; the policy is to sell quality products at reasonable prices. Clothes, household goods, food, and stationery are staples and the emphasis is on necessity, not superfluity—Muji caters to needs, not wants. The Muji concept is about lifestyle. “Kanketsu,” the belief in simplicity which forms the heart of the Japanese art of living, guides the design and retail of the products. Packaging is in simple brown paper bags, swing tags are made of recycled paper and clearly describe the product, in Japanese. The shops are strictly utilitarian: each one is different, but most of the materials and objects used in the construction are taken from local sources, such as scrapyards. The interiors, like the products, are pared

* * *

Jean Muir was noted for simple, flattering, and extremely feminine clothes that were sophisticated yet retain a handcrafted look with diligent attention to detail. Her favorite fabrics—jersey, angora, wool crêpe, suede, and soft leather—reappeared time after time, regardless of trends. Her more famous clients included actresses Joanna Lumley and Patricia Hodge and writers and artists such as Lady Antonia Fraser and Bridget Riley.

Muir was renowned for producing clothes women really wanted to wear and felt comfortable in. She achieved this by modeling all the clothes and toiles herself at fittings, an advantage she believed she had over male designers. “If you’re going to make clothes, the first thing you have to understand is the female anatomy. When I try on a dress, I can feel if something is wrong; I can tell if it’s not sitting properly on the shoulders or the bust or the hip. I couldn’t tell these things if I saw it on a stand,” she had explained.

There was an air of the fashion headmistress in Jean Muir’s approach; her steadfast opinions could not be budged. Her tone was unrelenting when she stressed a need to restore a sense of pride in the technique of making clothes and her passion for “art, craft and design and the upholding of standards and quality, maintaining them and setting new ones.” She believed fashion was not art but industry. The word fashion, she said, suggested the “transient and the superficial,” hardly the best attributes for a commercial business. Muir described her work as being based on intuition, aesthetic appreciation, and mathematical technical expertise. Never at the cutting edge of fashion, the clothes were timeless, understated, and often dateless. Like Fortuny or Chanel, the company based its look on the evolution of a singular theme, a soft, supple fluidity of cut which created the form of a garment.

In person Muir epitomized the type of woman for whom she liked to design. Writer Antonia Fraser described her as a “modish Puck” with a white, powdered face with a mouth slashed in crimson lipstick. Muir had a wiry, bird-like frame and was always dressed in navy calf-length jersey dresses, with black stockings and Granny shoes. In her studio Muir had a reputation for perfectionism and exacting standards in all aspects of production. “There are tremendous activities involved in the making of clothes,” she declared in a television interview, with such conviction that the viewer was left in no doubt about her sincerity.

In the annals of fashion history Jean Muir should be remembered as a designer who liberated the body. While many designers have forced bodies into structured tailoring, boning, or restrictive interfaced fabrics, Muir’s fluid and easy clothes always provided an emancipated alternative; devoid of structure and underpinning, the clothes nevertheless remained womanly and melodious.

—Kevin Almond

MUJI

Japanese design firm

Founded: in 1983 by retail conglomerate Seiyu. Company History: Joint venture with Liberty Plc, 1991–97; opened first European outlet, London, 1991; spun off as part of Ryohin Keikaku Ltd., 1997; announced intention to open 40 stores in Germany over next decade, 1997; majority stake in Ryohin sold by Seiyu, 1999; launched company websites for online sales, 2000. Awards: D&AD Silver award, 1994; Design Week award for Retail Design, 1994. Company Address: Nikko Ikebukuro Building, 4–26–3 Higashi-Ikebukuro, Toshima-ku, Tokyo, Japan 170. Company Websites: www.muji.net (in Japan); www.MujiOnline.com (in North America).

PUBLICATIONS

On MUJI:

Articles

- Glancey, Jonathan, “No Labels, No Brand Names, No Nonsense,” in the Independent, July 1991.
- Nakamoto, Michiyo, “Life With Liberty in the Pursuit of Happiness and Joint Profits,” in the Financial Times, July 1991.
- Furness, Janine, “The Brand With No Name,” in Interior Design (London), September 1991.
- Louiek Elaine, “If You Want to Make an Understatement,” in the New York Times, November 1991.
- van der Post, Lucia, “New Worshippers for Japan’s Muji Cult,” in the Financial Times, June 1992.
- Thompson, Elspeth, “Selling a Lifestyle Without a Label,” in The Guardian, July 1992.
- Horsham, Michael, “Adoration of the Muji,” in The Guardian, 21 October 1994.
- “Japanese Retailing—Look Out (Japanese Supermarket Chain Seiyu’s Restructuring Plans,” in the Economist, 24 October 1998.
- Nusbaum, Alexandra, “Seiyu to Sell Shares to Offset ¥88bn Charge,” in the Financial Times, 23 February 1999.
- “Japanese Retailing—A Yen for Cheap Chic,” in the Economist, 3 June 2000.
- “Muji Online Bows in North America,” in WWD, 6 November 2000.
- Nicksin, Carole, “Japan’s Muji Launches E-Commerce Site for U.S., Canada,” in HFN (Weekly Newspaper for the Home Furnishing Network), 13 November 2000.
- Terazono, Emiko, “Growing Pains are Natural as Muji Enters the Major League,” in the Financial Times, 5 April 2001.
- “New Daiei Store Heats Up Ginza Clothing War,” in Yomiuri Shimbun/Daily Yomiuri, 9 November 2001.

* * *

The company name signals its policy—Muji, short for Mujirushi Ryohin, is represented by four characters meaning “no-brand quality goods.” The concept is Japanese; its success has been international. Muji is proving a workable design formula for the 1990s and well into the 2000s.

In providing an antidote to the 1980s designer label obsession, Muji is consciously self-effacing; the policy is to sell quality products at reasonable prices. Clothes, household goods, food, and stationery are staples and the emphasis is on necessity, not superfluity—Muji caters to needs, not wants. The Muji concept is about lifestyle. “Kanketsu,” the belief in simplicity which forms the heart of the Japanese art of living, guides the design and retail of the products. Packaging is in simple brown paper bags, swing tags are made of recycled paper and clearly describe the product, in Japanese. The shops are strictly utilitarian: each one is different, but most of the materials and objects used in the construction are taken from local sources, such as scrapyards. The interiors, like the products, are pared down and intended to survive. Typical merchandise includes strongly-woven undyed towels, notebooks made from unbleached paper, reusable storage bottles, rice crackers sold in plain see-through packaging; each item is the result of a philosophy clearly echoed in the clothes.

Muji garments have been described as an “alternative to fashion.” Elegant and classic, they are, in the company language, “meant to be worn, not to adorn.” White cotton shirts, West Point trousers, Californian cotton rugger shirts, tracksuit bottoms, polo shirts, and Peruvian cotton socks are representative of the range. Clothes are designed to feel comfortable, to be easy to wear, pleasant to the touch and convenient to launder, sound almost anathema to fashion. The company does not use the term, “We would not call them fashion because they might make you think they are expensively designed with bits here and there thrown in for good measure,” company materials note. In Tokyo the garments have become an acceptable alternative to fashion; this phenomenon increasingly happened elsewhere.

Since 1983, when it was founded by the Japanese retail giant Seiyu, Muji has achieved cult status. When the first London shop opened in the summer of 1991, at the back of Liberty’s of Regent Street, consumer response was instantaneous. Items sold too rapidly to be immediately restocked from Japan. The next summer a second, bigger store followed and Muji clothing featured a strong development in “one mile wear,” meaning they were the comfortable clothes worn at home, or within a mile radius, for leisure or for popping out to the local shop. Traditional Japanese workwear inspired relaxed, deconstructed coordinates in comfortable, natural fabrics. Muji clothes are sensible, but not boring, austere but not dull. They mix well with other labels and their no-brand clothes have had designers, such as Masuro Amano, who trained at St. Martin’s School of Art in London.

The first ten years of trading in Japan provided Muji with a firm base and an established design philosophy; the next decade brought recognition and rocketing sales of its “spare chic” and accessories, with nearly 300 worldwide stores and dozens planned for the U.S. and Canada. But before the newest stores debuted, Muji brought its wares to North America via the Internet. Muji’s first website was launched exclusively in Japan, and a second was tested in America in 1999 and officially went online in 2000, as many Japanese retailers were recovering from a years-long recession. Even Muji’s ultimate parent, Seiyu, had been forced to sell all but five-percent of its stake in Muji’s immediate parent, Ryohin Keikaku Ltd., to offset losses in 1999.

As Muji expanded outside its home base of Japan, especially in the U.S. and Canada, its biggest competition came from brands like Gap and Abercrombie & Fitch. Both Gap and A&F were immensely popular with young men and women from teens to thirties, the same segment Muji had so enthralled in Asia. Yet even Muji finally succumbed to competition in Japan, as upstarts followed its lead into pared-down clothing and accessories. In 2001 Muji suffered its first loss since its creation, as two rivals—Y100 and Fast Retailing—lured away teenaged customers. Muji executives reacted quickly, reducing its products line (which had grown from 40 to over 6,000 items in 12 years) and shored up its image. Further, Muji decided to move from cult status to well-known retailer through advertising, not unlike the transformation of Gap years before.

Given Muji’s track record and emphasis on tradition and longevity, the Japanese no-brand leader would rally from its temporary woes. In the U.S., the firm was scouting locations to build its freestanding, no-nonsense stores in New York City, Los Angeles, and San Francisco. Muji stands for quality at reasonable prices; its message and its products have a broad international appeal, and the firm poses a healthy challenge to established preconceptions of fashion. Ironically, no-brand became the brand of the 1990s and beyond.

—Hazel Clark; updated by Sydonie Benét

MULBERRY COMPANY

British fashion and accessory firm

Founded: by Roger Saul and his mother, Joan, to produce leather accessories, 1971. Company History: Opened factory, Chilcompton, Bath, England, and set up wholesale operation in Australia, 1973; Mulberry Ltd. formed, 1974; London and New York showrooms open, and clothing line introduced, 1976; three-year contract signed with Sisheido, Japan, and first women’s ready-to-wear clothing collection introduced, 1978; freestanding shop opened in Paris, and first men’s shoe collection, 1982; men’s ready-to-wear collection introduced, 1985; launched men’s toiletry range, 1989; added home furnishings, 1991; Mulberry shops opened in Tamagawa and Hankyu Osaka, Japan, 1991, and in Russia, 1992; first edition Mulberry Life magazine, 1993; public offering marks 25th anniversary, 1996; Madison Avenue, New York, store opens, 1997; marketing gambit with Motorola, 1999; operated stores in 21 countries, 2000. Awards: Queen’s award to Industry and Export, 1979; Queen’s award for Export, 1987, 1989; British Knitting and Clothing Export Council award, 1988, 1991; Business in Europe “Best Consumer Company” award, 1989; Classic Designer of the Year, 1992, 1993. Company Address: 11–12 Gees Court, St Christopher’s Place, London W1M 5HQ, England.

PUBLICATIONS

By MULBERRY:

Books

Mulberry at Home: A New Approach to Luxurious Country Style, London, 1999.

On MULBERRY:

Articles

“Business in Europe Awards, 1989,” in Management Today, May 1989.

McDougall, Mary, “Rich and Romantic,” in Connoisseur (London), March 1991.

“Fashion into Furniture,” in Elle Decoration (London), September/October 1991.

“English Clothier Mulberry Plans Expansion into U.S.,” in Chicago Tribune, 17 March 1996.

Menkes, Suzy, “It’s Their Party...Mulberry at 25, Redefines the English Country Look,” in the International Herald Tribune, 21 May 1996.

* * *

Mulberry was founded in 1971 by Roger Saul through a gift of 50-pounds sterling from his mother Joan. Roger began by selling his own designs for leather chokers and belts to such high fashion shops as down and intended to survive. Typical merchandise includes strongly-woven undyed towels, notebooks made from unbleached paper, reusable storage bottles, rice crackers sold in plain see-through packaging; each item is the result of a philosophy clearly echoed in the clothes.

Muji garments have been described as an “alternative to fashion.” Elegant and classic, they are, in the company language, “meant to be worn, not to adorn.” White cotton shirts, West Point trousers, Californian cotton rugger shirts, tracksuit bottoms, polo shirts, and Peruvian cotton socks are representative of the range. Clothes are designed to feel comfortable, to be easy to wear, pleasant to the touch and convenient to launder, sound almost anathema to fashion. The company does not use the term, “We would not call them fashion because they might make you think they are expensively designed with bits here and there thrown in for good measure,” company materials note. In Tokyo the garments have become an acceptable alternative to fashion; this phenomenon increasingly happened elsewhere.

Since 1983, when it was founded by the Japanese retail giant Seiyu, Muji has achieved cult status. When the first London shop opened in the summer of 1991, at the back of Liberty’s of Regent Street, consumer response was instantaneous. Items sold too rapidly to be immediately restocked from Japan. The next summer a second, bigger store followed and Muji clothing featured a strong development in “one mile wear,” meaning they were the comfortable clothes worn at home, or within a mile radius, for leisure or for popping out to the local shop. Traditional Japanese workwear inspired relaxed, deconstructed coordinates in comfortable, natural fabrics. Muji clothes are sensible, but not boring, austere but not dull. They mix well with other labels and their no-brand clothes have had designers, such as Masuro Amano, who trained at St. Martin’s School of Art in London.

The first ten years of trading in Japan provided Muji with a firm base and an established design philosophy; the next decade brought recognition and rocketing sales of its “spare chic” and accessories, with nearly 300 worldwide stores and dozens planned for the U.S. and Canada. But before the newest stores debuted, Muji brought its wares to North America via the Internet. Muji’s first website was launched exclusively in Japan, and a second was tested in America in 1999 and officially went online in 2000, as many Japanese retailers were recovering from a years-long recession. Even Muji’s ultimate parent, Seiyu, had been forced to sell all but five-percent of its stake in Muji’s immediate parent, Ryohin Keikaku Ltd., to offset losses in 1999.

As Muji expanded outside its home base of Japan, especially in the U.S. and Canada, its biggest competition came from brands like Gap and Abercrombie & Fitch. Both Gap and A&F were immensely popular with young men and women from teens to thirties, the same segment Muji had so enthralled in Asia. Yet even Muji finally succumbed to competition in Japan, as upstarts followed its lead into pared-down clothing and accessories. In 2001 Muji suffered its first loss since its creation, as two rivals—Y100 and Fast Retailing—lured away teenaged customers. Muji executives reacted quickly, reducing its products line (which had grown from 40 to over 6,000 items in 12 years) and shored up its image. Further, Muji decided to move from cult status to well-known retailer through advertising, not unlike the transformation of Gap years before.

Given Muji’s track record and emphasis on tradition and longevity, the Japanese no-brand leader would rally from its temporary woes. In the U.S., the firm was scouting locations to build its freestanding, no-nonsense stores in New York City, Los Angeles, and San Francisco. Muji stands for quality at reasonable prices; its message and its products have a broad international appeal, and the firm poses a healthy challenge to established preconceptions of fashion. Ironically, no-brand became the brand of the 1990s and beyond.

—Hazel Clark; updated by Sydonie Benét

MULBERRY COMPANY

British fashion and accessory firm

Founded: by Roger Saul and his mother, Joan, to produce leather accessories, 1971. Company History: Opened factory, Chilcompton, Bath, England, and set up wholesale operation in Australia, 1973; Mulberry Ltd. formed, 1974; London and New York showrooms open, and clothing line introduced, 1976; three-year contract signed with Sisheido, Japan, and first women’s ready-to-wear clothing collection introduced, 1978; freestanding shop opened in Paris, and first men’s shoe collection, 1982; men’s ready-to-wear collection introduced, 1985; launched men’s toiletry range, 1989; added home furnishings, 1991; Mulberry shops opened in Tamagawa and Hankyu Osaka, Japan, 1991, and in Russia, 1992; first edition Mulberry Life magazine, 1993; public offering marks 25th anniversary, 1996; Madison Avenue, New York, store opens, 1997; marketing gambit with Motorola, 1999; operated stores in 21 countries, 2000. Awards: Queen’s award to Industry and Export, 1979; Queen’s award for Export, 1987, 1989; British Knitting and Clothing Export Council award, 1988, 1991; Business in Europe “Best Consumer Company” award, 1989; Classic Designer of the Year, 1992, 1993. Company Address: 11–12 Gees Court, St Christopher’s Place, London W1M 5HQ, England.

PUBLICATIONS

By MULBERRY:

Books

Mulberry at Home: A New Approach to Luxurious Country Style, London, 1999.

On MULBERRY:

Articles

“Business in Europe Awards, 1989,” in Management Today, May 1989.

McDougall, Mary, “Rich and Romantic,” in Connoisseur (London), March 1991.

“Fashion into Furniture,” in Elle Decoration (London), September/October 1991.

“English Clothier Mulberry Plans Expansion into U.S.,” in Chicago Tribune, 17 March 1996.

Menkes, Suzy, “It’s Their Party...Mulberry at 25, Redefines the English Country Look,” in the International Herald Tribune, 21 May 1996.

* * *

Mulberry was founded in 1971 by Roger Saul through a gift of 50-pounds sterling from his mother Joan. Roger began by selling his own designs for leather chokers and belts to such high fashion shops as Biba in London. His first collection of belts in suede and leather demonstrated the influence of saddlery techniques and traditional English crafts, and were worked to Saul's designs by local craftsmen housed in what was once an old forge in his parent's garden in Chilcompton, near Bath. The following year Saul made Mulberry's first significant export—an order of a thousand belts from the Paris department store Au Printemps, while Saul created a subsequent belt collection for Jean Muir. By 1975 Mulberry had expanded into Europe, with handbag designs for Kenzo in Paris and a special range for Bloomingdale's in New York.

The definitive English "hunting, shooting and fishing" look which is the hallmark of Mulberry's style was enhanced in 1976 by an expansion from accessories to clothes, with the first jacket design. Consisting of a cotton blouson with a leather collar, the distinctive Mulberry jacket was a worldwide success. The first women's ready-to-wear collection followed in 1978, and within a decade Mulberry was the largest manufacturer of designer quality leather accessories in Britain, with exports, including those to the United States, accounting for the majority of its production. Unfortunately, Mulberry's success in the U.S. market was shortlived, as the dollar drastically lost its value against the pound. Yet Mulberry rallied and was sustained by its European growth, where the company's tree logo was an established status symbol.

The end of the 1980s brought the Queen's award for Export in both 1987 and 1989 and by 1991 a new At Home collection of home furnishings was launched at Harvey Nichols, in Knightsbridge, London. Soon after, two shops opened in Japan, followed by stores in Russia, Italy, Chile, and South Africa. Mulberry continued to win awards and gain exposure, including the opening of another shop in London, on Bond Street.

In the late 1990s, Mulberry ventured back into the U.S. with renewed vigor, and toyed with a public offering on London's Alternative Investment Market to celebrate its 25th anniversary. By the end of the 20th century the English country elegance of Mulberry was increasingly well known, with a savvy marketing deal with Motorola (buy a phone, get a Mulberry leather wallet) and Saul writing a coffee-table book about the company's home furnishings. Mulberry at Home: A New Approach to Luxurious Country Style was published in 1999 and was enthusiastically received. With Mulberry stores in 21 countries worldwide, what Roger Saul characterized as the "spirit of Mulberry, with its witty English nostalgia, amusing eccentricity and uncompromising devotion to quality," had become synonymous with refined elegance in clothing, accessories, and home furnishings. As Saul so aptly put it, Mulberry has come to represent "a romantic but robust lifestyle."

—Doreen Ehrlich; updated by Nelly Rhodes

MULLANY, Lorcan

See BELLVILLE SASSOON-LORCAN MULLANY

MUSCARIELLO, Rocco

See BAROCCO, Rocco

N

NATORI, Josie Cruz

American designer

Born: Josie Cruz in Manila, Philippines, 9 May 1947. Education: Studied at Manhattanville College, Bronxville, New York, 1964–68, B.A., Economics. Family: Married Ken Natori, 1973; son: Kenneth. Career: Piano soloist, Manila Philharmonic Orchestra, 1956; stock-broker, Bache Securities, New York, Manila, 1968–71; investment banker, vice president, Merrill Lynch, New York, 1971–77; founder/president and designer, Natori Company, women's lingerie and daywear, from 1977; introduced at-homewear, 1983; introduced boudoir accessories and footwear lines, 1984; introduced bed and bath collections, 1991; delegate, Clinton Economic Summit Conference, and commissioner, White House Conference on Small Business, 1990s; Manhattanville College Board of Trustees; numerous licenses, including Avon, Bestform Foundations. Exhibitions: Asia Society's Philippine Style, New York, 2000. Awards: Harriet Alger award, 1987; Girls' Clubs of America award, 1990; Laboratory Institute of Merchandising award, 1990; National Organization of Women Legal Defense and Education Fund Buddy award, 1990; Philippine Independence Ball award, 1999. Address: 40 East 34th Street, New York, NY 10016, USA.

PUBLICATIONS

On NATORI:

Books

- Martin, Richard, and Harold Koda, Infra Apparel [exhibition catalogue], New York, 1993.
Enkelis, Liane, et al., On Our Own Terms, San Francisco, 1995.
Stegemeyer, Anne, Who's Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.
Crisostomo, Isabelo T., Filipino Achievers in the USA & Canada, Midlothian, VA, 1996.
Bautista, Veltisezar, The Filipino Americans (from 1763 to the Present): Their History, Culture and Traditions, Midlothian, VA, 1998.
Kim, Hyung-Chan, ed., Distinguished Asian Americans: A Biographical Dictionary, Westport, CT, 1999.

Articles

- Ballen, Kate, "Josie Cruz Natori," in Fortune, 2 February 1987.
Haynes, Kevin, "Three SA Women: How They Built Their Business Niches," in WWD, 10 April 1987.
Hochswender, Woody, "Lounge Wear for Cocooning," in the New York Times, 3 January 1989.

Klein, Fasy, "Beyond the Paycheck," in Dun & Bradstreet Reports, March/April 1989.

Morris, Bernadine, "Lingerie is Visible: So are its Designers," in the New York Times, 5 June 1990.

Goodman, Wendy, "Paris Ensemble," in HG (New York), September 1990.

Hofmann, Deborah, "Movie Star Pajamas for a VCR Public," in the New York Times, 21 October 1990.

Retter, Nancy Marx, "The Pajama Game," in Savvy Women (New York), February 1991.

Monroe, Valerie, "The Natori Story," in Mirabella (New York), March 1991.

"A Touch of Lingerie in Outerwear," in the New York Times, 28 April 1991.

Weisman, Katherine, "Cementing a Marriage," in Forbes, 22 July 1991.

"Josie Natori: Queen of the Nightgown," in Cosmopolitan, December 1991.

Dohrzynski, Judith H., "The Metropolitan's Natori-ous Display," in Business Week, 5 April 1993.

Hassan, Wendy, "The Mark of Natori," in WWD, 23 April 1993.

Willen, Janet A., "Fashioning a Business," in Nation's Business, February 1995.

Medford, Sarah, and Michel Arnaud, "Natori's Glory Days," in Town & Country, March 1995.

"Making a Fashion Statement that Revolutionized Lingerie," in Diversity Suppliers & Business Magazine, Fall 1996.

Schiro, Anne Marie, "Going Sheer But Not Going Overboard," in the New York Times, 14 January 1997.

Seno, Alexandra A., "It's My Party and I'll Spend if I Want to," in Asianweek, 6 June 1997.

"Ebony and Ivory: Not Just Negligee Colors," in Asianweek, 26 December 1997.

* * *

"I never think of men when I design my lingerie or my fragrances. My desire is to encourage women to appreciate and pamper themselves," Josie Cruz Natori told the Fragrance Foundation. The tiny Filipino-American designer has created a new model in the business of fashion. Founder and chief executive officer of the Natori Company, Natori eschews the designation "designer," though others have described her as an "international fashion magnate." It is not surprising, considering the unprecedented degree of her vision and tenacity.

Battling puritanism and body reticence, which stifled the concept of fashion developing from the inside out, Natori has taken lingerie from a barely visible inner layer of fashion to the entirety of fashion and, in the process, built a multimillion-dollar worldwide business, featuring numerous major international licenses. To build a major fashion house from the base of lingerie is unparalleled, visionary, and a sign of the very late 20th century in its ambition and success. Yet contemporary culture has taken to Natori's vision of exposing the beautiful details of lingerie within a fashion vocabulary, which previously denied such ornamentation.

The stunning growth of Natori's empire is due to her vision. In the 1980s, she realized her lingerie was increasingly exposed by the women who purchased it, so she created publicly wearable garments inspired by her lingerie. The resulting neologist crossover category "innerwear-as-outerwear" was never her corporate slogan, though it might serve. Natori brought boudoir apparel out of the bedroom, perhaps inevitably so at a moment in culture when all heretofore privileged and private matters of the bedroom seemed to become public discourse. As a visionary, she simply answers a client's question of "how or where should I wear this?" with "wherever you want," granting lingerie an opportunity to enter into every aspect of attire. It is an ironic turn of success for Natori since she first approached a Bloomingdale's buyer about making shirts; her destiny was set when the buyer recommended she make them longer to be sold as nightshirts.

Natori brought a richness of detail back to apparel, one she remembered from Philippine embroideries and appliqués. Natori shrewdly assesses the culture of the body, bringing stretch and bodysuits to the realm of lingerie and back to playwear, as well as the possibilities of feminine self-expression to dress for public circumstances. She neither suppresses nor proposes that the clothing she designs be mistaken for career wear, the operative description for much apparel of the 1980s. Instead she realizes the affiliation between private clothing, body expression, and eveningwear, all committed to comfort and to some degree of seduction and sensual pleasure.

To some, Natori might seem antifeminist; she argues, of course, that she is the true feminist delighting in and extending the category endemic to feminine traits and the female body. Talking with Woody Hochswender of the New York Times in January 1989, Natori said, "It's really a way for a woman to express herself. We've made women feel good without feeling sleazy." Indeed, all apparel addresses wearer and spectator; Natori's reassessment of the innerwear category has been refreshing for both men and women.

"Think of Katherine Hepburn, answering the doorbell," Natori offered to Deborah Hofmann, giving evocative pedigree to the ease-without-sleaze that she makes of her innerwear-as-outerwear. Natori is a perfect example for the woman who asserts authority in contemporary fashion: her first career was in investment banking; she herself wears couture (generally a tailored jacket and skirt) in impeccable taste; and she makes her way and her company's way in the fashion market with unmistakable respect for the women who wear her clothing. Natori's business acumen and design sensibility seem unerringly and culturally right—she created a fashion that satisfies women's feelings and practical needs in a culture and era of precious privacy and of women's expressions of themselves.

By the 1990s, Natori was involved in almost every aspect of fashion. Besides camisoles, thongs, panties, briefs, bras, and other lingerie items, Natori further developed her line of clothing to include chic pajamas, robes, pants, tank tops, tunics, sleepshirts, and more, made in a wide variety of fabrics, from cotton and satin to silk and polyester. Realizing the relationship between the feel of classy lingerie and scents, Natori began designing fragrances to complement her clothing, including her namesakes, Josie and Natori. "When I wear lingerie and fragrance, it's being sexy for me, not for someone else," she commented to the Fragrance Institute. "I never could use the word 'sexy'—for many years I was brought up to think it meant 'dirty,' but I've come to realize...it means feminine and sensual. There's nothing wrong with being both 24 hours a day." The company also manufactures home furnishings, accessories, jewelry, and eveningwear.

As one of the few early Asian designers to attain prominence in the international fashion world, Natori serves in a variety of roles, from businesswoman (in 1999, she was named number 40 in the Goldsea 100, America's 100 Top Asian Entrepreneurs list) to role model, from advocate for women's rights to delegate for business conferences (during the Clinton administration, she served as a delegate to the Economic Summit Conference in Little Rock, Arkansas, and as a commissioner to the White House Conference on Small Business).

—Richard Martin; updated by Daryl F. Mallett

NAVARRO, Sara

Spanish fashion designer

Born: Elda, Alicante, Spain, 17 August 1957. Education: Studied psychology, University of Valencia, Spain, 1974; shoe styling at Ars Sutoria Institute, Milan, 1978; fashion design, under Gianfranco Ferré, Domus Academy, Milan, 1987; business management at Escuela de Organizacion Industrial, Madrid; classical art at Dante Alighiere School, Florence. Career: Director of fashion, Kurhapias Group; head stylist, Sara Navarro Company, Alicante; launched first shop in Madrid, 1979; specializes in footwear, handbags, belts, and ready-to-wear in leather; collaborated with Fernandez, Vittorio y Luccino, and Robert Verino for footwear; first international collection, 1988; official designer for V-Centenario, 1991, and Expo 92, 1991–92; launched shoe collection with Martine Sitbon, Paris, 1992; director of fashion team Creaciones Exclusivas S.A. and Komfort Spain SL (now Komfort Spain SL); introduced Pretty Shoes and Via Sara Navarro lines. Exhibitions: GDS Show, Dusseldorf, 1985; Premiere Classe Show, Paris, 1987; Expo Universal, Seville, 1992; Luz Blanca Collection, Galeria Nieves Fernandez, Madrid, 1992. Collection: Museu del Calzado de Elda, Alicante, Spain. Awards: Fashion Oscar for footwear, 1978; Alipac de Oro award, 1979; Catalog-81 prize, 1981; Master International award, 1985; Premio Valencia Innovacion award, 1989. Address: c/o Komfort Spain, SL, P.O. Box 83; CP: 03600 Elda (Alicante), Spain.

PUBLICATIONS

On NAVARRO:

Books

Coad-Dent, Elizabeth, Spanish Design and Architecture, London, 1990.

McDowell, Colin, Shoes: Fashion and Fantasy, New York, 1989, 1994.

The Fashion Guide, Paris, 1990.

Articles

Barker, Barbara, "Two Spanish Designers Open Stores in Madrid Center," in Footwear News, 5 June 1989.

fashion house from the base of lingerie is unparalleled, visionary, and a sign of the very late 20th century in its ambition and success. Yet contemporary culture has taken to Natori's vision of exposing the beautiful details of lingerie within a fashion vocabulary, which previously denied such ornamentation.

The stunning growth of Natori's empire is due to her vision. In the 1980s, she realized her lingerie was increasingly exposed by the women who purchased it, so she created publicly wearable garments inspired by her lingerie. The resulting neologist crossover category "innerwear-as-outerwear" was never her corporate slogan, though it might serve. Natori brought boudoir apparel out of the bedroom, perhaps inevitably so at a moment in culture when all heretofore privileged and private matters of the bedroom seemed to become public discourse. As a visionary, she simply answers a client's question of "how or where should I wear this?" with "wherever you want," granting lingerie an opportunity to enter into every aspect of attire. It is an ironic turn of success for Natori since she first approached a Bloomingdale's buyer about making shirts; her destiny was set when the buyer recommended she make them longer to be sold as nightshirts.

Natori brought a richness of detail back to apparel, one she remembered from Philippine embroideries and appliqués. Natori shrewdly assesses the culture of the body, bringing stretch and bodysuits to the realm of lingerie and back to playwear, as well as the possibilities of feminine self-expression to dress for public circumstances. She neither suppresses nor proposes that the clothing she designs be mistaken for career wear, the operative description for much apparel of the 1980s. Instead she realizes the affiliation between private clothing, body expression, and eveningwear, all committed to comfort and to some degree of seduction and sensual pleasure.

To some, Natori might seem antifeminist; she argues, of course, that she is the true feminist delighting in and extending the category endemic to feminine traits and the female body. Talking with Woody Hochswender of the New York Times in January 1989, Natori said, "It's really a way for a woman to express herself. We've made women feel good without feeling sleazy." Indeed, all apparel addresses wearer and spectator; Natori's reassessment of the innerwear category has been refreshing for both men and women.

"Think of Katherine Hepburn, answering the doorbell," Natori offered to Deborah Hofmann, giving evocative pedigree to the ease-without-sleaze that she makes of her innerwear-as-outerwear. Natori is a perfect example for the woman who asserts authority in contemporary fashion: her first career was in investment banking; she herself wears couture (generally a tailored jacket and skirt) in impeccable taste; and she makes her way and her company's way in the fashion market with unmistakable respect for the women who wear her clothing. Natori's business acumen and design sensibility seem unerringly and culturally right—she created a fashion that satisfies women's feelings and practical needs in a culture and era of precious privacy and of women's expressions of themselves.

By the 1990s, Natori was involved in almost every aspect of fashion. Besides camisoles, thongs, panties, briefs, bras, and other lingerie items, Natori further developed her line of clothing to include chic pajamas, robes, pants, tank tops, tunics, sleepshirts, and more, made in a wide variety of fabrics, from cotton and satin to silk and polyester. Realizing the relationship between the feel of classy lingerie and scents, Natori began designing fragrances to complement her clothing, including her namesakes, Josie and Natori. "When I wear lingerie and fragrance, it's being sexy for me, not for someone else," she commented to the Fragrance Institute. "I never could use the word 'sexy'—for many years I was brought up to think it meant 'dirty,' but I've come to realize...it means feminine and sensual. There's nothing wrong with being both 24 hours a day." The company also manufactures home furnishings, accessories, jewelry, and eveningwear.

As one of the few early Asian designers to attain prominence in the international fashion world, Natori serves in a variety of roles, from businesswoman (in 1999, she was named number 40 in the Goldsea 100, America's 100 Top Asian Entrepreneurs list) to role model, from advocate for women's rights to delegate for business conferences (during the Clinton administration, she served as a delegate to the Economic Summit Conference in Little Rock, Arkansas, and as a commissioner to the White House Conference on Small Business).

—Richard Martin; updated by Daryl F. Mallett

NAVARRO, Sara

Spanish fashion designer

Born: Elda, Alicante, Spain, 17 August 1957. Education: Studied psychology, University of Valencia, Spain, 1974; shoe styling at Ars Sutoria Institute, Milan, 1978; fashion design, under Gianfranco Ferré, Domus Academy, Milan, 1987; business management at Escuela de Organizacion Industrial, Madrid; classical art at Dante Alighiere School, Florence. Career: Director of fashion, Kurhapias Group; head stylist, Sara Navarro Company, Alicante; launched first shop in Madrid, 1979; specializes in footwear, handbags, belts, and ready-to-wear in leather; collaborated with Fernandez, Vittorio y Luccino, and Robert Verino for footwear; first international collection, 1988; official designer for V-Centenario, 1991, and Expo 92, 1991–92; launched shoe collection with Martine Sitbon, Paris, 1992; director of fashion team Creaciones Exclusivas S.A. and Komfort Spain SL (now Komfort Spain SL); introduced Pretty Shoes and Via Sara Navarro lines. Exhibitions: GDS Show, Dusseldorf, 1985; Premiere Classe Show, Paris, 1987; Expo Universal, Seville, 1992; Luz Blanca Collection, Galeria Nieves Fernandez, Madrid, 1992. Collection: Museu del Calzado de Elda, Alicante, Spain. Awards: Fashion Oscar for footwear, 1978; Alipac de Oro award, 1979; Catalog-81 prize, 1981; Master International award, 1985; Premio Valencia Innovacion award, 1989. Address: c/o Komfort Spain, SL, P.O. Box 83; CP: 03600 Elda (Alicante), Spain.

PUBLICATIONS

On NAVARRO:

Books

Coad-Dent, Elizabeth, Spanish Design and Architecture, London, 1990.

McDowell, Colin, Shoes: Fashion and Fantasy, New York, 1989, 1994.

The Fashion Guide, Paris, 1990.

Articles

Barker, Barbara, "Two Spanish Designers Open Stores in Madrid Center," in Footwear News, 5 June 1989.

- _____, "Bad Timing Puts Spain Fairs in Fix," in Footwear News, 16 October 1989.
- _____, "Spain's FICC Shows Off With Complicated Shoes," in Footwear News, 2 April 1990.
- Ilari, Alessandra, "Vergelio Operates Ten Shoe Stores in Milan," in Footwear News, 11 June 1990.
- Barker, Barbara, "Elda Vendors Make Winter Statement," in Footwear News, 24 September 1990.
- "109 Anni Vissuti Intensamente," in Vogue Pelle (Milan), May-June 1991.
- "Pasos Decivos," in Vogue (Madrid), June 1991.
- Barker, Barbara, "Madrid International Fair Trots Out Cowboy Boots, Rugged Looks," in Footwear News, 6 April 1992.
- Weisman, Katherine, "Premiere Classe Brings Accessories Back to Earth," in Footwear News, 26 October 1992.
- "Identità di Gusto," Vogue Pelle, (Milan), July/August 1993
- Barker, Barbara, "Sara Navarro: Profile of a Professional," in Footwear News, 9 August 1993.
- Weisman, Katherine, "Premiere Classe Enjoys Traffic Bonus," in Footwear News, 18 October 1993.
- _____, "Shoes Play Leading Role at Premiere Classe Show," in Footwear News, 14 March 1994.
- "World Footwear Production," in Economic Review, November 1995.
- Barker, Barbara, "Spain Makers Pin Hopes on Far East," in Footwear News, 23 September 1996.
- "Spanish Fly," in Footwear News, 1 November 1999.
- "Fashion Fair," in Footwear News, 29 May 2000.
- Mullins, David Philip, "Showing Off: The Latest New York Shoe Expo...," in Footwear News, 29 May 2000.

*

I view creating with an outlook onto the future, spending a great deal of time researching cultural trends to gather information for the purpose of finding an underlying concept or thread tying together each collection. [I try to] reflect society's current cultural scene, so my designs may serve as a response to the questions, desires, or needs of those purchasing these items, but will also be a response, reaching them by getting over a message that is never void of content. I like to play with the imagination, to create a story told through my designs, to have them include playful aspects with a certain touch of irony (hence my collaboration in Almodovar's film, Mutant Effect). I place a great deal of importance on quality and comfort.

—Sara Navarro

* * *

Born in Elda, Alicante, Spain, in 1957, Sara Navarro is a third-generation shoemaker in her family. Dedication to hard work and craftsmanship were central to the family philosophy. Navarro's father, Juan Navarro Busquier, believed that in business, although the ultimate might be impossible, a "fervent desire for perfection" can lead to the greatest success. Juan's company, Kurhapiés, was founded on the meager savings of his father, a modest artisan shoemaker. Forty-five years later, the company, now known as Komfort Spain SL, is an empirical leader in volume Spanish footwear.

Sara joined the design department of her father's company in 1979. She was only 21 years old but had already majored in industrial psychology at the University of Valencia, Spain, and had studied classical ballet, fine arts, and several languages at prestigious schools all over the world. She studied design and shoe styling at the Ars Sutoria Institute in Milan and fashion design under Gianfranco Ferré at the Domus Academy. Navarro also obtained a B.A. in business management from L'Escuela de Organizacion Industrial in Madrid. Clearly, her decision to join the family business was not motivated by any lack of career choices. Her broad range of interests, from literature to piloting aircraft, typifies her dedication to study and work, in her own words: "There are few geniuses, only professionals. I've risked much with some pretty surprising collections."

Navarro has been conscious of her Mediterranean heritage throughout her career, incorporating the Spanish tradition of fine leatherwork and handcrafted finishes into her design work. Study of her work reveals an equally important commercial versatility. The Sara Navarro collections are nonrisk styling for the domestic market; Pretty Shoes are an everyday leisure line for "the woman who does not want to grow up." To find Navarro at her most creative and surprising, it is best to look at the Via Sara Navarro lines. Launched in 1988, the Via styles were designed and targeted at the export fashion market. Carried by Komfort Spain SL, this wider market brief has given Navarro the opportunity to explore and develop her own ideas about materials and techniques. The result is the emergence of a very personal design signature as the Via lines have become stronger over the years, encompassing evening, cocktail, and wedding footwear.

The trend of fashion in the 1990s to embrace recycled looks, distressed textures, and hand-rendered natural finishes is perfectly in harmony with Navarro's interest in her native Mediterranean heritage. She has explored derivatives of traditional constructions such as clogs, espadrille shoes, and boots. The silhouettes are strong, often irregular, echoing the clean classic lines of early Via collections; but the use of materials and chaotic color combinations is often surprising. In the mid-1990s, Navarro experimented more with the antique look, crafting granny boots, 1940s-styled walking shoes, and riding boots out of crinkled and oiled, redyed leather and damask fabrics mixed with aged leather. Her styles have attracted the interest of other designers, for example, John Galliano and Martine Sitbon, who find Navarro's styling in harmony with their own ideas.

It is a fortunate designer who can explore her interests and generate international acclaim for her work, and it is tempting to assume the fashion climate is simply in tune with this designer. Yet this would ignore the simpler truth that Navarro is a professional who can react to the fashion demands of both her domestic and export market. Jumping on the Swarovski crystals bandwagon, along with Ecoral, Stuart Weitzman, Sonia Rykiel, and Celine, Navarro nevertheless incorporates traditional Spanish craft skills such as hand-stitching into her work, making the Sara Navarro style instantly recognizable.

Navarro's work is so recognizable, in fact, that her designs were picked up by the Gusac Corp., based in Miami, Florida, for distribution in the U.S., alongside works by Uad Medani and Looky. In 2000 Navarro continued to be one of the top designers in the Spanish shoe industry, along with Panama Jack and Vincente Pastor's Bright Election, helping Spain hold its position among the top five shoe-producing countries in the world, especially in the textile shoe segment—espadrilles, leather shoes, and Western boots.

—Chris Hill; updated by Daryl F. Mallett

NEIMAN MARCUS

American retail store

Opened: in Dallas in 1907. Company History: Ready-to-wear retailer was established by Herbert Marcus, Carrie Marcus Neiman, and Abraham Lincoln (Al) Neiman. Through Herbert, his son Stanley, and grandson Richard, management remained in the Marcus family over 80 years. Over the years many events and activities were established and became part of the fabric of contemporary fashion. Originally known for excellent service and unique merchandise, the company struggled to redefine itself under new ownership. Company Address: 1618 Main Street, Dallas, TX 75201. Company Website: www.neimanmarcus.com.

PUBLICATIONS

On NEIMAN MARCUS:

Books

- Marcus, Stanley, Minding the Store, Boston, 1974; reissued, 2001.
- _____, Quest for the Best, New York, 1979, reissued 2001.
- _____, His & Hers: The Fantasy World of the Neiman Marcus Christmas Catalogue, New York, 1982.
- Farmer, David, Stanley Marcus: A Life with Books, Fort Worth, TX, 1993.
- Marcus, Stanley, The Viewpoints of Stanley Marcus: A Ten-Year Perspective, 1995.
- Wilson, Robert A. and Stanley Marcus, eds., American Greats, 2000.

Articles

- Marcus, Stanley, "My Biggest Mistake," in Inc., July 1999.
- "Not Nearly Shelved at 94 (Stanley Marcus)," in the New York Times, 22 August 1999.
- "Who's News: Neiman Marcus Group Inc.," in the Wall Street Journal, 26 June 2001.
- A&E Biography Series (Arts and Entertainment Channel television series), Neiman Marcus: Last of the Merchant Kings.
- Pacer, Eric, "Stanley Marcus, the Retailer, is Dead at 96," in the New York Times, 23 January 2002.

*

There is never a good sale for Neiman Marcus unless it's a good buy for the customer.

—Herbert Marcus

* * *

As one of only a handful of luxury retailers in the United States, Neiman Marcus is perhaps best known for their extravagant Christmas catalogue. Featuring annual his and her gifts of great imagination, several of these improbable items have actually sold. Since the first Christmas catalogue in 1939, Neiman Marcus has offered his and her Beechcraft planes (selling hers to a Texas rancher for his wife; he already had one), Chinese junks, eight of which were delivered to five different bodies of water, matching buffalo, and a female camel.

Herbert Marcus was a buyer of boys' clothing for Sanger Brothers in Dallas, while his sister, Carrie Marcus Neiman, was a blouse buyer and saleswoman for A. Harris and Company. Carrie's husband, Abraham Lincoln (Al) Neiman, persuaded the pair to accompany him to Atlanta to set up a special events business. After two years of success, the trio had a couple of offers to buy their business, one for $25,000 cash and another for a franchise in a new company. American retail would have been very different had they chosen the Coca Cola franchise.

They returned to Dallas and on 10 September 1907 opened the doors of Neiman Marcus. Though all were under 30, with not a high school diploma among them, they set out to offer ready-to-wear clothing of quality and value in an era when most clothing was still custom made. The apparel industry had not yet evolved into any sort of organized mass production, and issues of sizing, quality control, and style kept most fashionable women returning to their private dressmakers.

The young owners recognized that the world was changing and were determined to establish a unique business in the new era. They worked closely with manufacturers, demanding excellence, and offered to pay more for improved and finer garments. Customer satisfaction was paramount, and the sales staff was trained to accommodate clientèle and gently guide them toward good taste. Dallas was a thriving city of 84,000 people, many of whom possessed wealth from cotton. Oil money would come later, and Neiman Marcus was positioning itself to be the most fashionable store in the Southwest.

Herbert's son Stanley joined the store in 1926, after a Harvard education. His three younger brothers eventually followed him into the business. Two years later, Carrie and Al Neiman divorced, leaving the store owned by the Marcus family. Stanley Marcus instituted many events and practices that became standard for department stores, such as the first luncheon fashion show, personalized gift wrapping, bridal shows, and national advertising in Vogue and Harper's Bazaar. His immaculate taste and genius for merchandising are legendary, and stories about his sales ability abound. He has been asked to select gifts for royalty and heads of state as well as the difficult to please; he once sold an electric blanket for a pet lion and had a toupee made for a mounted lion's head whose mane had been ravaged by moths.

Stanley Marcus assumed the rank of CEO and president in 1950 and stayed with the store until 1979, retiring as chairman of the board (he died in January 2002 at the age of 96). His son Richard, who served as CEO and chairman until 1988, succeeded him.

Neiman Marcus opened a suburban store in 1948, beginning a slow expansion in the U.S. that would eventually spread across nearly half the nation. The first public sale of common stock occurred in 1959, the same year Neiman Marcus by Mail was launched. Carter Hawley Hale of Broadway Hale bought the stores in 1969. A difference in philosophy created poor sales and damaged Neiman Marcus' reputation as unique.

In 1987 Carter Hawley Hale traded controlling interest in the Neiman Marcus Group to General Cinema (renamed Harcourt General in 1993). The Group included the prestigious Bergdorf Goodman stores (two) in New York and the mass-market chain Contempo Casuals. The Group purchased Horchow Mail Order of Dallas, a high-end home items retailer in 1988. Contempo Casuals was sold to Wet Seal in 1995, and the Group bought Chef's Catalogue, a purveyor of fine cookware in 1998. The Group also opened three Galleries of Neiman Marcus, smaller stores specializing in gifts and fine jewelry.

In 1998 the Group acquired controlling interest in the company that makes Laura Mercier cosmetics. The next year, they purchased more than 50 percent of Kate Spade, manufacturer of luxury shoes and handbags. Harcourt General spun off most of its stake in the Neiman

Marcus Group to its own shareholders in 1999, with Richard Smith, his son Robert, and his son-in-law, Brian Knez, controlling about 23 percent of Neiman Marcus.

It remains to be seen whether the Neiman Marcus Group can continue to provide the superb special events, exotic one-of-a-kind items, and the personal attention that made the store one of the great retailers in America.

—Christina Lindholm

NEW REPUBLIC

American fashion firm

Founded: in 1981 by Thomas Oatman (born 1953). Company History: Established as a vintage clothing trading company and opened first store on Greene Street, SoHo, New York; store moved to Spring Street, New York, 1986; company produced two collections per year; clothing sold to better department stores and specialty stores throughout the U.S., Europe, and Japan; began offering custom services, 1995; signed licensing agreement with Ingram Company, Inc., 1996; collaborated with Pinky Wolman to create Soup + Fish formalwear collection, 1997; designed restaurant uniforms for Jean Georges, 1997. Company Address: 93 Spring Street, New York, NY 10012, U.S.A.

PUBLICATIONS

On NEW REPUBLIC:

Articles

- Shields, Jody, "Everything Old is New Again," in Vogue, April 1989.
 "New York Collections," in DNR, 10 February 1995.
 "New Republic's Bookish Look and Matsuda's Future Feature," in DNR, 6 March 1996.
 Socha, Miles, "Sportscast," in DNR, 13 March 1996.
 —, "New Republic," in DNR, 2 October 1996.
 Matsumoto, Janice, "Uniform Elegance," in Restaurants & Institutions, 15 December 1997.

* * *

Long before the current vogue for retro fashion, New Republic—founded by Thomas Oatman—has kept alive the flame of American menswear design that burned bright from the 1930s through the 1960s. New Republic, however, is not about promoting any particular era. Oatman added a few different styles to the line's roster every season, changing only the fabrics and colors, and updating the sizing. What the company does manage is to always be in style, because the premise of New Republic is simply about good style.

Thomas Oatman has said: "The difference is that I'm downdating, not updating. I'm not interested in classics with a twist. I want to remain true to the real classics, not the modern knockoffs." New Republic's interpretations are exacting, dealing with more than just the images from those eras that other designers rely on. The company is able to appeal simultaneously to both an avant-garde audience as well as to a more conservative customer. Thus a 1950s Ivy League sack suit exists alongside a pair of 1960s plain-front pegged trousers. Fashion icons are, after all, in the eye of the beholder. New Republic manifests a postmodern sensibility, mixing clothes from different eras in their presentations, which, ultimately, only make fashion sense in an era that coincides with the end of the century.

Oatman is the utmost connoisseur of fine vintage men's clothing. As such, he designs by accessing the index cards in his memory. Every item in the collection can be placed in an elaborate mental stage set that recalls its glory days. And so, a belted leather jacket—as worn by Marlon Brando in the movie On the Waterfront—is endearingly called The Strikebreaker. A 1950s-inspired cabana shirt recalls one's parents' honeymoon photos in Havana.

New Republic weaves romantic dreams that span the decades: a khaki bellows-pocket jacket in Palm Beach cloth conjures up the image of a gentleman on safari in the 1930s. A linen-blend three-button plaid jacket with solid sleeves recalls the look that American soldiers sported when they returned from World War II.

During their leisure time, men in this period wore a pajama-collar rayon gabardine shirt with flap pockets—which happens to be New Republic's trademark, and one of its first styles. Then later, when those soldiers went on vacation, they would wear clamdiggers and cabana shirts at the shore—just like the ones New Republic designed in Creamsicle colors. The late 1950s and early 1960s are also alive and well at New Republic in a natural-shoulder three-button madras sport coat with a hooked center vent and full lap seaming that could have come straight out of Brooks Brothers or J. Press.

America's icons have been inextricably tied with Hollywood, for Hollywood has given us with countless images from which to draw. New Republic, for its part, supplied menswear with a treasure trove of refined American looks. The enduring attraction of New Republic's style has been simple class; as the Daily News Record (10 February 1995) concurred, commenting on a new collection, "New Republic, designed by Thomas Oatman, sent out its signature classics," albeit this time "with a decidedly dandy flavor."

New Republic took commitment to its clientèle a step further in 1995 when it began offering custom services out of its SoHo store. The practice was successful enough that the firm expanded its services the following year, around the same time New Republic inked a 10-year joint venture with Ingram Company Inc., a subsidiary of Network Corporation. The agreement concerned opening three freestanding boutiques in Japan to start, then to continue opening stores throughout Asia.

Oatman also segued into different facets of fashion, teaming up with Pinky Wolman for a rather unusual formalwear collection called Soup + Fish, and then designing uniforms for Jean Georges, a 1950s-styled restaurant. Janice Matsumoto, writing for Restaurants & Institutions (15 December 1997), described the uniforms, five black suits, as "ranging from boxy Nehru jackets for back waiters to eye-catching double-breasted jackets for captains." New Republic's elegant, classically tailored menswear—whether for uniforms, entertaining, or formal occasions—will never go out of style.

—Vicki Vasilopoulos; updated by Sydonie Benét

NEXT PLC

British fashion company

Established: May 1981 by George Davies in conjunction with J. Hepworth & Son. Company History: First womenswear chain opened, 1982; first dual Next/Hepworth store in Reading, Berkshire,

Marcus Group to its own shareholders in 1999, with Richard Smith, his son Robert, and his son-in-law, Brian Knez, controlling about 23 percent of Neiman Marcus.

It remains to be seen whether the Neiman Marcus Group can continue to provide the superb special events, exotic one-of-a-kind items, and the personal attention that made the store one of the great retailers in America.

—Christina Lindholm

NEW REPUBLIC

American fashion firm

Founded: in 1981 by Thomas Oatman (born 1953). Company History: Established as a vintage clothing trading company and opened first store on Greene Street, SoHo, New York; store moved to Spring Street, New York, 1986; company produced two collections per year; clothing sold to better department stores and specialty stores throughout the U.S., Europe, and Japan; began offering custom services, 1995; signed licensing agreement with Ingram Company, Inc., 1996; collaborated with Pinky Wolman to create Soup + Fish formalwear collection, 1997; designed restaurant uniforms for Jean Georges, 1997. Company Address: 93 Spring Street, New York, NY 10012, U.S.A.

PUBLICATIONS

On NEW REPUBLIC:

Articles

- Shields, Jody, "Everything Old is New Again," in Vogue, April 1989.
 "New York Collections," in DNR, 10 February 1995.
 "New Republic's Bookish Look and Matsuda's Future Feature," in DNR, 6 March 1996.
 Socha, Miles, "Sportscast," in DNR, 13 March 1996.
 —, "New Republic," in DNR, 2 October 1996.
 Matsumoto, Janice, "Uniform Elegance," in Restaurants & Institutions, 15 December 1997.

* * *

Long before the current vogue for retro fashion, New Republic—founded by Thomas Oatman—has kept alive the flame of American menswear design that burned bright from the 1930s through the 1960s. New Republic, however, is not about promoting any particular era. Oatman added a few different styles to the line's roster every season, changing only the fabrics and colors, and updating the sizing. What the company does manage is to always be in style, because the premise of New Republic is simply about good style.

Thomas Oatman has said: "The difference is that I'm downdating, not updating. I'm not interested in classics with a twist. I want to remain true to the real classics, not the modern knockoffs." New Republic's interpretations are exacting, dealing with more than just the images from those eras that other designers rely on. The company is able to appeal simultaneously to both an avant-garde audience as well as to a more conservative customer. Thus a 1950s Ivy League sack suit exists alongside a pair of 1960s plain-front pegged trousers. Fashion icons are, after all, in the eye of the beholder. New Republic manifests a postmodern sensibility, mixing clothes from different eras in their presentations, which, ultimately, only make fashion sense in an era that coincides with the end of the century.

Oatman is the utmost connoisseur of fine vintage men's clothing. As such, he designs by accessing the index cards in his memory. Every item in the collection can be placed in an elaborate mental stage set that recalls its glory days. And so, a belted leather jacket—as worn by Marlon Brando in the movie On the Waterfront—is endearingly called The Strikebreaker. A 1950s-inspired cabana shirt recalls one's parents' honeymoon photos in Havana.

New Republic weaves romantic dreams that span the decades: a khaki bellows-pocket jacket in Palm Beach cloth conjures up the image of a gentleman on safari in the 1930s. A linen-blend three-button plaid jacket with solid sleeves recalls the look that American soldiers sported when they returned from World War II.

During their leisure time, men in this period wore a pajama-collar rayon gabardine shirt with flap pockets—which happens to be New Republic's trademark, and one of its first styles. Then later, when those soldiers went on vacation, they would wear clamdiggers and cabana shirts at the shore—just like the ones New Republic designed in Creamsicle colors. The late 1950s and early 1960s are also alive and well at New Republic in a natural-shoulder three-button madras sport coat with a hooked center vent and full lap seaming that could have come straight out of Brooks Brothers or J. Press.

America's icons have been inextricably tied with Hollywood, for Hollywood has given us with countless images from which to draw. New Republic, for its part, supplied menswear with a treasure trove of refined American looks. The enduring attraction of New Republic's style has been simple class; as the Daily News Record (10 February 1995) concurred, commenting on a new collection, "New Republic, designed by Thomas Oatman, sent out its signature classics," albeit this time "with a decidedly dandy flavor."

New Republic took commitment to its clientèle a step further in 1995 when it began offering custom services out of its SoHo store. The practice was successful enough that the firm expanded its services the following year, around the same time New Republic inked a 10-year joint venture with Ingram Company Inc., a subsidiary of Network Corporation. The agreement concerned opening three freestanding boutiques in Japan to start, then to continue opening stores throughout Asia.

Oatman also segued into different facets of fashion, teaming up with Pinky Wolman for a rather unusual formalwear collection called Soup + Fish, and then designing uniforms for Jean Georges, a 1950s-styled restaurant. Janice Matsumoto, writing for Restaurants & Institutions (15 December 1997), described the uniforms, five black suits, as "ranging from boxy Nehru jackets for back waiters to eye-catching double-breasted jackets for captains." New Republic's elegant, classically tailored menswear—whether for uniforms, entertaining, or formal occasions—will never go out of style.

—Vicki Vasilopoulos; updated by Sydonie Benét

NEXT PLC

British fashion company

Established: May 1981 by George Davies in conjunction with J. Hepworth & Son. Company History: First womenswear chain opened, 1982; first dual Next/Hepworth store in Reading, Berkshire,

Marcus Group to its own shareholders in 1999, with Richard Smith, his son Robert, and his son-in-law, Brian Knez, controlling about 23 percent of Neiman Marcus.

It remains to be seen whether the Neiman Marcus Group can continue to provide the superb special events, exotic one-of-a-kind items, and the personal attention that made the store one of the great retailers in America.

—Christina Lindholm

NEW REPUBLIC

American fashion firm

Founded: in 1981 by Thomas Oatman (born 1953). Company History: Established as a vintage clothing trading company and opened first store on Greene Street, SoHo, New York; store moved to Spring Street, New York, 1986; company produced two collections per year; clothing sold to better department stores and specialty stores throughout the U.S., Europe, and Japan; began offering custom services, 1995; signed licensing agreement with Ingram Company, Inc., 1996; collaborated with Pinky Wolman to create Soup + Fish formalwear collection, 1997; designed restaurant uniforms for Jean Georges, 1997. Company Address: 93 Spring Street, New York, NY 10012, U.S.A.

PUBLICATIONS

On NEW REPUBLIC:

Articles

- Shields, Jody, "Everything Old is New Again," in Vogue, April 1989.
 "New York Collections," in DNR, 10 February 1995.
 "New Republic's Bookish Look and Matsuda's Future Feature," in DNR, 6 March 1996.
 Socha, Miles, "Sportscast," in DNR, 13 March 1996.
 —, "New Republic," in DNR, 2 October 1996.
 Matsumoto, Janice, "Uniform Elegance," in Restaurants & Institutions, 15 December 1997.

* * *

Long before the current vogue for retro fashion, New Republic—founded by Thomas Oatman—has kept alive the flame of American menswear design that burned bright from the 1930s through the 1960s. New Republic, however, is not about promoting any particular era. Oatman added a few different styles to the line's roster every season, changing only the fabrics and colors, and updating the sizing. What the company does manage is to always be in style, because the premise of New Republic is simply about good style.

Thomas Oatman has said: "The difference is that I'm downdating, not updating. I'm not interested in classics with a twist. I want to remain true to the real classics, not the modern knockoffs." New Republic's interpretations are exacting, dealing with more than just the images from those eras that other designers rely on. The company is able to appeal simultaneously to both an avant-garde audience as well as to a more conservative customer. Thus a 1950s Ivy League sack suit exists alongside a pair of 1960s plain-front pegged trousers. Fashion icons are, after all, in the eye of the beholder. New Republic manifests a postmodern sensibility, mixing clothes from different eras in their presentations, which, ultimately, only make fashion sense in an era that coincides with the end of the century.

Oatman is the utmost connoisseur of fine vintage men's clothing. As such, he designs by accessing the index cards in his memory. Every item in the collection can be placed in an elaborate mental stage set that recalls its glory days. And so, a belted leather jacket—as worn by Marlon Brando in the movie On the Waterfront—is endearingly called The Strikebreaker. A 1950s-inspired cabana shirt recalls one's parents' honeymoon photos in Havana.

New Republic weaves romantic dreams that span the decades: a khaki bellows-pocket jacket in Palm Beach cloth conjures up the image of a gentleman on safari in the 1930s. A linen-blend three-button plaid jacket with solid sleeves recalls the look that American soldiers sported when they returned from World War II.

During their leisure time, men in this period wore a pajama-collar rayon gabardine shirt with flap pockets—which happens to be New Republic's trademark, and one of its first styles. Then later, when those soldiers went on vacation, they would wear clamdiggers and cabana shirts at the shore—just like the ones New Republic designed in Creamsicle colors. The late 1950s and early 1960s are also alive and well at New Republic in a natural-shoulder three-button madras sport coat with a hooked center vent and full lap seaming that could have come straight out of Brooks Brothers or J. Press.

America's icons have been inextricably tied with Hollywood, for Hollywood has given us with countless images from which to draw. New Republic, for its part, supplied menswear with a treasure trove of refined American looks. The enduring attraction of New Republic's style has been simple class; as the Daily News Record (10 February 1995) concurred, commenting on a new collection, "New Republic, designed by Thomas Oatman, sent out its signature classics," albeit this time "with a decidedly dandy flavor."

New Republic took commitment to its clientèle a step further in 1995 when it began offering custom services out of its SoHo store. The practice was successful enough that the firm expanded its services the following year, around the same time New Republic inked a 10-year joint venture with Ingram Company Inc., a subsidiary of Network Corporation. The agreement concerned opening three freestanding boutiques in Japan to start, then to continue opening stores throughout Asia.

Oatman also segued into different facets of fashion, teaming up with Pinky Wolman for a rather unusual formalwear collection called Soup + Fish, and then designing uniforms for Jean Georges, a 1950s-styled restaurant. Janice Matsumoto, writing for Restaurants & Institutions (15 December 1997), described the uniforms, five black suits, as "ranging from boxy Nehru jackets for back waiters to eye-catching double-breasted jackets for captains." New Republic's elegant, classically tailored menswear—whether for uniforms, entertaining, or formal occasions—will never go out of style.

—Vicki Vasilopoulos; updated by Sydonie Benét

NEXT PLC

British fashion company

Established: May 1981 by George Davies in conjunction with J. Hepworth & Son. Company History: First womenswear chain opened, 1982; first dual Next/Hepworth store in Reading, Berkshire, 1984; Next for Men launched, 1984; first Next mini department store, Edinburgh, 1984; home furnishings range, Next Interior store, Regent Street, London, 1985; name change to Next plc, 1986; launched Next Cosmetics, 1986; merged with Grattans mail order company, 1986; womenswear divided into Next Too and Next Collection, 1986; lingerie introduced, 1986; boys- and girlswear launched, 1987; Next Directory mail order and Next Originals, 1988; jewelry stores opened, 1988; Department X stores in London and Glasgow, 1988; David Jones appointed CEO, 1988; retail and mail order merged, 1993; first U.S. Next store, Boston, 1993; joint venture with Bath & Body Works, 1994–96; opened Paris store, 1995; signed licensing deal with Shekem for three stores in Israel, 1996; sold seven company stores, 1998; sold credit-card unit, 2001. Exhibitions: All Dressed Up: British Fashion in the 1980s, British Council Touring Exhibition, 1990. Company Address: Next plc, Desford Road, Enderby, Leicester LE9 5AT, England. Company Website: www.next.co.uk.

PUBLICATIONS

On NEXT PLC:

Books

- Davies, George, What Next?, London, 1989.
 Huygen, Frédérique, British Design: Image & Identity, London, 1989.
 Wilson, Elizabeth, and Lou Taylor, Through the Looking Glass: A History of Dress from 1860 to the Present Day, London, 1989.

Articles

- “The Rise and Fall of Next,” in the Daily Telegraph (London), 14 December 1990.
 Gilchrist, Susan, “Next Fights Recession with 88% Profits Rise,” in the Times (London), 30 March 1994.
 “Buying British Pays Off for Fashion Firm,” in the Daily Mirror (London), 30 March 1994.
 Bethell, James, “Next Goes Streets Ahead of Its Rivals,” in the Sunday Times (London), 3 April 1994.
 Reed, Paula, “Good Value Ousts Designer Gloss,” in the Sunday Times, 3 April 1994.
 “Next (Company Profile),” in Retail Business: Retail Trade Reviews, September 1995.
 Fallon, James, “Next Has a Knack for Hits,” in WWD, 28 September 1995.
 “Next to Shut Five U.S. Stores,” in WWD, 26 June 1998.
 “Performance of Next,” in Investors Chronicle, 23 October 1998.
 “Next Trading Update,” in UK Retail Report, May 2000.
 Fallon, James, et al., “British Retail Stocks Get Hammered,” in WWD, 12 January 2001.
 “Next Homes in on Bigger Stores,” in In-Store Marketing, October 2001.

* * *

The brainchild of retail entrepreneur George Davies, the initial success of the British chain of Next shops during the 1980s is credited with having prompted greater awareness of the importance of good design in both clothing and fashion retailing on the High Street by traveling around the country to check out the existing competition. It is interesting to note that the two concepts he most admired were the upmarket German brand, Mondi, and the Italian company, Benetton. Elsewhere he found a lack of inspiration with what he described as the “buy it all approach to stock...in the hope that something would sell.”

Davies’ vision of what the High Street required was firstly, a strong store identity and, secondly, a high level of quality control over the garments, from raw materials to finished product. Davies believed the tailored jacket was the garment that could establish Next, so long as it represented high quality and fantastic value for the price. The first seven Next shops opened in February 1982 and the sales were two-and-a-half times what the company had originally estimated. Davies’ philosophy of providing what he called “affordable collectables” found a ready market for his merchandise, which represented good design at reasonable prices.

Next offered the “power suit” at an accessible price when it was desired by female customers. Authors Elizabeth Wilson and Lou Taylor, writing in Through the Looking Glass: A History of Dress from 1860 to the Present Day (London, 1989), maintained that during the 1980s, Next brought together “...a fantasy of old-time shopping and ‘aspirational buying’—the desire of newly affluent members of the 25 to 35 age group to wear an approximation of designer clothes.”

Textile expert Brenda Azario believed Next’s success was because, “Quality is what a customer expects or desires at any price point; this expectation has to be met. Next came in very strongly in this aspect, giving the public a better product. It wasn’t a particularly expensive one but it was better—the designing was better and it was certainly better presented to the customer.” There followed Next for Men, Next shoes, Next Interior (home furnishings), Next Two, Next Collection, lingerie, Next Boys & Girls, and Next Directory.

Next Directory represented what was perhaps the most significant achievement as it was the first company to try to raise the rather downmarket image of the mail order business. The catalogue itself was a beautifully-produced book with a matte black cover, featuring well-recognized faces from the modeling world, captured by established photographers in great locations. The early numbers even included fabric swatches of certain garments, all of which contributed to the widespread media coverage attracted by the Directory’s launch, which revolutionized home shopping in January 1988.

The story of Next during the latter years of the 1980s to the early 1990s is renowned—a victim of over-zealous expansion paired with the recession that hit Britain during this period. Another factor contributing to the firm’s demise was the failure of Next Directory to achieve the success predicted by Davies who invested £24.1 million into its launch. The fall of Next was as dramatic as its meteoric rise—a profit warning came in December 1988 and within two weeks there followed the unceremonious sacking of George Davies.

A dramatic restructuring ensued under the guidance of the newly-appointed CEO, David Jones. A large number of stores were sold off and the company raised cash by selling off its Grattan mail-order business. These measures, however, were not enough to fuel the relatively rapid rise of Next to its astounding profits, which doubled from 1992 to 1993. Improved customer service, new clothes displays, and larger fitting rooms were not enough to entice the customer to buy; the clothes themselves effected the turnaround. Next succeeded in recapturing the British customer of the 1990s, and by 1994 there were over 300 Next-owned stores across Britain and nearly half a million Next Directory customers.

According to journalist Paula Reed of the Sunday Times (3 April 1994), at Next clients received “basic, honest merchandise without pretension to status or glamour. What makes Next sexy these days is not a glossy image but a quick response to catwalk trends and a canny anticipation of what is next in style.” A year later, Jones concurred in Women's Wear Daily (28 September 1995), “We have never been a fashion business. We sell good taste, good design and good quality.” Near the end of the decade, however, Next faltered once again, having gone too trendy and neglecting its classics base. Sales in its stores as well as its mail-order business suffered declined, and the firm sold seven (five in the U.S., one each in Paris and Brussels) underperforming company-owned stores in 1998.

The new century brought a rollercoaster ride for British retailers; first a brief resurgence early on, then another decline with disappointing holiday sales in 2000. In 2001 Next sold its consumer credit business, about the same time the company’s former CEO, George Davies, joined competitor Marks & Spencer to turnaround its womenswear division. Next garnered a turn of its own, however, with climbing sales for the Directory as well as its retail outlets. In the boardroom, Jones moved up to chairman, while Simon Wolfson assumed the duties of chief executive. By the end of 2001, Next was expansion-minded once more, closing smaller shops in favor of larger stores able to carry both clothing and its growing home furnishings collection.

—Catherine Woram; updated by Sydonie Benét

NIKOS

Greek designer working in France

Born: Nikos Apostolopoulos in Patras, Greece. Education: Studied at the Sorbonne, Paris, diploma in political science, doctorate in international law. Career: Designed first collection of intimate wear for men, 1985; line expanded to include intimate wear for women, swimwear, and men’s and women’s ready-to-wear, 1987; designed costumes for theatre and opera, including Monsigny’s Cadi Dupe, Paris Spring Festival, 1989, and Richard Strauss’ Salomé, Montpellier Festival, 1990; created Nikos Parfums and introduced first fragrance Sculpture Femme, 1994; created men’s fragrance Sculpture Homme, 1995. Address: 6 rue de Braque, Paris 75003, France.

PUBLICATIONS

On NIKOS:

Books

Pronger, Brian, The Arena of Masculinity, New York, 1990.

Articles

“Paris Now,” in DNR, 7 February 1990.

“Nikos Eyes U.S. Market,” in DNR, 26 June 1990.

Spindler, Amy M., “Tarlazzi, Nikos Cancel Paris Men’s Showings,” in DNR, 29 January 1991.

Deschamps, Mary, “Le retour de Nikos,” in Vogue Hommes International (Paris), Fall 1992.

“Lancaster to Try on New Scents,” in Advertising Age, 4 July 1994.

Fallon, James, “After Sculpture’s Success, Nikos to Mold Men’s Scent,” in WWD, 7 April 1995.

_____, “Latest Introductions in England Drive Department Store Sales,” in WWD, 12 April 1996.

* * *

Homoerotic masculinity is the motive of Nikos fashion. Invoking an idealism of gods and demigods, stretching and flexing on Olympus wearing versions of jock straps, ergonomic t-shirts and tank tops, and some street clothing, Nikos projects a similar image of apparel. Beginning with his first collection in 1985, Nikos employed cotton and Lycra for the stretchy, minimalist, erotic clothing of the gods and all who aspire to their condition of pumped-up muscles and physique divinity.

In 1988 Nikos worked with American photographer Victor Skrebneski in an ideal collaboration of like-minded fashion erotics. Denizens of South Beach and Venice, California, were logical candidates for this self-assured, body-flaunting clothing driven by heat, narcissism, and sexuality. Men who might dress for the evening in Gianni Versace might choose Nikos for activewear. While the line diversified to some street clothing for men and swimwear and exercise wear for women, Nikos still primarily addresses the homoerotic male.

Nikos’ clothing template is the jock strap. He customarily provides a band (including many in the late 1980s that, like the underwear of competitors, included the designer name) around the waist from which an extended cod-piece or pouch distends. The designer’s phallic primacy is complemented by bared sides and minimal coverage of buttocks, offering voyeurism (and implied accessibility) front and rear to the male. His tanks stress angularity almost as if to clothe men of granitic triangulation, rather than the ordinary soft body.

Further, two devices frequent in Nikos’ work exacerbate the homoerotic content. In effectively using stretch materials, Nikos often opens apertures in the briefs and tops, allowing a peek-a-boo spectatorship more often associated with female undergarments. Additionally, Nikos relishes piecing and visible seams, the stretchy activewear taking on something of the aspect of a virile Vionnet or an Azzedine Alaïa transferred to Muscle Beach. The effect, of course, is to promote even further the sense of the garment as strapping, swaddling, a slight covering for muscles and body movement. In instances when Nikos uses stripes, his only pattern, line enhances the verticality and size of the phallic pouch.

In the early 1990s collections emphasized more moderate clothing for the street, including the graphically strong spring/summer 1993 collection with outfits in black-and-white for exercise and shirts with bold designs inspired by Matisse cutouts. The spring/summer 1994 collection stressed sportswear for the street and offered a repertoire of loose, long knits and colorful shorts and white and black oversized trousers. Whenever Nikos had shown streetwear in the late 1980s and 1990s, the look was still of extremism, with see-through tank tops, faux leopard skins, and tailored clothing with zoot suit bravado. In the street clothes, Nikos did not abandoned fetishes, but moved toward mainstream menswear, ironically leaving many other designers from Dirk Bikkembergs to Gianni Versace to fill his gap on the wild side.

One can either dismiss Nikos for his marketing of the most blatant homoerotic clothing, of which probably a considerable portion is purchased but seldom worn, or worn only for the private circumstance. Or one can understand that Nikos stands, with many designers of men’s underwear and related athletic wear, as one who cultivates specific and definable traits of the homoerotic to develop garments possessing their own brand of beauty.

Nikos ventured into fragrances in 1994 with, oddly, a women’s scent rather than one for men. Sculpture Femme launched amidst much fanfare did well enough to encourage Nikos to develop a not a glossy image but a quick response to catwalk trends and a canny anticipation of what is next in style.” A year later, Jones concurred in Women's Wear Daily (28 September 1995), “We have never been a fashion business. We sell good taste, good design and good quality.” Near the end of the decade, however, Next faltered once again, having gone too trendy and neglecting its classics base. Sales in its stores as well as its mail-order business suffered declined, and the firm sold seven (five in the U.S., one each in Paris and Brussels) underperforming company-owned stores in 1998.

The new century brought a rollercoaster ride for British retailers; first a brief resurgence early on, then another decline with disappointing holiday sales in 2000. In 2001 Next sold its consumer credit business, about the same time the company’s former CEO, George Davies, joined competitor Marks & Spencer to turnaround its womenswear division. Next garnered a turn of its own, however, with climbing sales for the Directory as well as its retail outlets. In the boardroom, Jones moved up to chairman, while Simon Wolfson assumed the duties of chief executive. By the end of 2001, Next was expansion-minded once more, closing smaller shops in favor of larger stores able to carry both clothing and its growing home furnishings collection.

—Catherine Woram; updated by Sydonie Benét

NIKOS

Greek designer working in France

Born: Nikos Apostolopoulos in Patras, Greece. Education: Studied at the Sorbonne, Paris, diploma in political science, doctorate in international law. Career: Designed first collection of intimate wear for men, 1985; line expanded to include intimate wear for women, swimwear, and men’s and women’s ready-to-wear, 1987; designed costumes for theatre and opera, including Monsigny’s Cadi Dupe, Paris Spring Festival, 1989, and Richard Strauss’ Salomé, Montpellier Festival, 1990; created Nikos Parfums and introduced first fragrance Sculpture Femme, 1994; created men’s fragrance Sculpture Homme, 1995. Address: 6 rue de Braque, Paris 75003, France.

PUBLICATIONS

On NIKOS:

Books

Pronger, Brian, The Arena of Masculinity, New York, 1990.

Articles

“Paris Now,” in DNR, 7 February 1990.

“Nikos Eyes U.S. Market,” in DNR, 26 June 1990.

Spindler, Amy M., “Tarlazzi, Nikos Cancel Paris Men’s Showings,” in DNR, 29 January 1991.

Deschamps, Mary, “Le retour de Nikos,” in Vogue Hommes International (Paris), Fall 1992.

“Lancaster to Try on New Scents,” in Advertising Age, 4 July 1994.

Fallon, James, “After Sculpture’s Success, Nikos to Mold Men’s Scent,” in WWD, 7 April 1995.

_____, “Latest Introductions in England Drive Department Store Sales,” in WWD, 12 April 1996.

* * *

Homoerotic masculinity is the motive of Nikos fashion. Invoking an idealism of gods and demigods, stretching and flexing on Olympus wearing versions of jock straps, ergonomic t-shirts and tank tops, and some street clothing, Nikos projects a similar image of apparel. Beginning with his first collection in 1985, Nikos employed cotton and Lycra for the stretchy, minimalist, erotic clothing of the gods and all who aspire to their condition of pumped-up muscles and physique divinity.

In 1988 Nikos worked with American photographer Victor Skrebneski in an ideal collaboration of like-minded fashion erotics. Denizens of South Beach and Venice, California, were logical candidates for this self-assured, body-flaunting clothing driven by heat, narcissism, and sexuality. Men who might dress for the evening in Gianni Versace might choose Nikos for activewear. While the line diversified to some street clothing for men and swimwear and exercise wear for women, Nikos still primarily addresses the homoerotic male.

Nikos’ clothing template is the jock strap. He customarily provides a band (including many in the late 1980s that, like the underwear of competitors, included the designer name) around the waist from which an extended cod-piece or pouch distends. The designer’s phallic primacy is complemented by bared sides and minimal coverage of buttocks, offering voyeurism (and implied accessibility) front and rear to the male. His tanks stress angularity almost as if to clothe men of granitic triangulation, rather than the ordinary soft body.

Further, two devices frequent in Nikos’ work exacerbate the homoerotic content. In effectively using stretch materials, Nikos often opens apertures in the briefs and tops, allowing a peek-a-boo spectatorship more often associated with female undergarments. Additionally, Nikos relishes piecing and visible seams, the stretchy activewear taking on something of the aspect of a virile Vionnet or an Azzedine Alaïa transferred to Muscle Beach. The effect, of course, is to promote even further the sense of the garment as strapping, swaddling, a slight covering for muscles and body movement. In instances when Nikos uses stripes, his only pattern, line enhances the verticality and size of the phallic pouch.

In the early 1990s collections emphasized more moderate clothing for the street, including the graphically strong spring/summer 1993 collection with outfits in black-and-white for exercise and shirts with bold designs inspired by Matisse cutouts. The spring/summer 1994 collection stressed sportswear for the street and offered a repertoire of loose, long knits and colorful shorts and white and black oversized trousers. Whenever Nikos had shown streetwear in the late 1980s and 1990s, the look was still of extremism, with see-through tank tops, faux leopard skins, and tailored clothing with zoot suit bravado. In the street clothes, Nikos did not abandoned fetishes, but moved toward mainstream menswear, ironically leaving many other designers from Dirk Bikkembergs to Gianni Versace to fill his gap on the wild side.

One can either dismiss Nikos for his marketing of the most blatant homoerotic clothing, of which probably a considerable portion is purchased but seldom worn, or worn only for the private circumstance. Or one can understand that Nikos stands, with many designers of men’s underwear and related athletic wear, as one who cultivates specific and definable traits of the homoerotic to develop garments possessing their own brand of beauty.

Nikos ventured into fragrances in 1994 with, oddly, a women’s scent rather than one for men. Sculpture Femme launched amidst much fanfare did well enough to encourage Nikos to develop a complementary men's scent, preferably one as iconoclastic as its creator. Sculpture Homme, introduced in 1995, didn't disappoint with its sexy mythical connotations and spicy base, rolled out with widespread media advertising. Both Nikos incarnations sold very well at a time when upscale retailers were in a slump. The designer pondered additional fragrances as well as bath and body lines.

—Richard Martin; updated by Nelly Rhodes

NINA RICCI

French couture house

Founded: by Maria "Nina" Ricci (1883–1970) and son Robert Ricci (1905–88) in Paris, 1932. Company History: First ready-to-wear collection shown, 1964; men's collection introduced, 1986; first boutique opened, Paris, 1979; men's boutique, Ricci-Club, opened, Paris, 1986; cosmetics line, Le Teint Ricci, introduced, 1992; several new designers brought in, beginning 1993; Ricci products placed in luxury hotels as guest amenities; designer Nathalie Gervais hired, 1999; Gervais departs, 2001. Fragrances include Cœur de Joie, 1945,

Nina Ricci, fall/winter 2001–02 collection designed by Nathalie Gervais. © AP/Wide World Photos.

L'Air du Temps, 1948, Capricci, 1961, Farouche, 1974, Signoricci, 1975, Fleur de Fleurs, 1980, Nina, 1987, Ricci-Club, 1989. Awards: Mme. Ricci awarded Chevalier de la Légion d'Honneur; Fragrance Foundation Hall of Fame award, 1982; Fragrance Foundation Perennial Success award, 1988; Dé d'Or award, 1987; Bijorca d'Or award, 1987, 1988; Vénus de la Beauté, 1990; Trophée International Pardum/Couture, 1991; Prix d'Excellence "Créativité" 1992; Trophée de la Beauté de Dépêche Mode, 1992; Prix Européen de la P.L.V., 1992; l'Oscar du Mécénat d'Entreprises, 1993. Company Address: 39, avenue Montaigne, 75008 Paris, France.

PUBLICATIONS

On NINA RICCI:

Books

- Milbank, Caroline Rennolds, Couture: The Great Designers, New York, 1985.
- O'Hara, Georgina, The Encyclopaedia of Fashion, New York, 1986.
- Guillen, Pierre-Yves, and Jacqueline Claude, The Golden Thimble: French Haute Couture, Paris, 1990.
- Pochna, Marie-France, Nina Ricci, Paris, 1992.
- Skrebneski, Victor, The Art of Haute Couture, New York, 1995.
- Stegemeyer, Anne, Who's Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.

Articles

- Carter, Ernestine, "The New Boys at Nina Ricci," in the Sunday Times Magazine (London), 15 December 1963.
- Morris, Bernadine, "Robert Ricci, Couturier, 83, Dies...," in the New York Times, 10 August 1988.
- Davy, Philippe, "Le charme romantique des succès de Nina Ricci," in L'Officiel (Paris), February 1990.
- "Ricci Cruise," in WWD, 6 July 1990.
- Deeny, Godfrey, "Ricci's Pipart: Staying Power," in WWD, 26 January 1995.
- White, Constance, C.R., "Refreshing Nina Ricci," in the New York Times, 25 April 1995.
- "Nina Ricci Gets Luminous," in Cosmetics Products Report, September 1999.
- "Guest Amenities," in Hotel & Motel Management, 20 September 1999.
- Sulic, Diana, "Nina Ricci," [profile] online at Fashion Live, www.fashionlive.com, 5 August 2000.
- "New York: A Delicate Balance," in WWD, 16 February 2001.
- Deeny, Godfrey, "From Russia with Ricci as Designer Bows Out," available online at Fashion Windows, www.fashionwindows.com, 10 March 2001.
- Patterson, Suzy, "Luscious Furs and Fabrics at Nina Ricci," available online at www.theage.com.au, 12 March 2001.

*

To make women beautiful, to bring out the charm of each one's personality. But also to make life more beautiful...that has always been my ambition, and that is the underlying philosophy of Nina Ricci.

—Robert Ricci

complementary men's scent, preferably one as iconoclastic as its creator. Sculpture Homme, introduced in 1995, didn't disappoint with its sexy mythical connotations and spicy base, rolled out with widespread media advertising. Both Nikos incarnations sold very well at a time when upscale retailers were in a slump. The designer pondered additional fragrances as well as bath and body lines.

—Richard Martin; updated by Nelly Rhodes

NINA RICCI

French couture house

Founded: by Maria "Nina" Ricci (1883–1970) and son Robert Ricci (1905–88) in Paris, 1932. Company History: First ready-to-wear collection shown, 1964; men's collection introduced, 1986; first boutique opened, Paris, 1979; men's boutique, Ricci-Club, opened, Paris, 1986; cosmetics line, Le Teint Ricci, introduced, 1992; several new designers brought in, beginning 1993; Ricci products placed in luxury hotels as guest amenities; designer Nathalie Gervais hired, 1999; Gervais departs, 2001. Fragrances include Cœur de Joie, 1945,

Nina Ricci, fall/winter 2001–02 collection designed by Nathalie Gervais. © AP/Wide World Photos.

L'Air du Temps, 1948, Capricci, 1961, Farouche, 1974, Signoricci, 1975, Fleur de Fleurs, 1980, Nina, 1987, Ricci-Club, 1989. Awards: Mme. Ricci awarded Chevalier de la Légion d'Honneur; Fragrance Foundation Hall of Fame award, 1982; Fragrance Foundation Perennial Success award, 1988; Dé d'Or award, 1987; Bijorca d'Or award, 1987, 1988; Vénus de la Beauté, 1990; Trophée International Pardum/Couture, 1991; Prix d'Excellence "Créativité" 1992; Trophée de la Beauté de Dépêche Mode, 1992; Prix Européen de la P.L.V., 1992; l'Oscar du Mécénat d'Entreprises, 1993. Company Address: 39, avenue Montaigne, 75008 Paris, France.

PUBLICATIONS

On NINA RICCI:

Books

- Milbank, Caroline Rennolds, Couture: The Great Designers, New York, 1985.
- O'Hara, Georgina, The Encyclopaedia of Fashion, New York, 1986.
- Guillen, Pierre-Yves, and Jacqueline Claude, The Golden Thimble: French Haute Couture, Paris, 1990.
- Pochna, Marie-France, Nina Ricci, Paris, 1992.
- Skrebneski, Victor, The Art of Haute Couture, New York, 1995.
- Stegemeyer, Anne, Who's Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.

Articles

- Carter, Ernestine, "The New Boys at Nina Ricci," in the Sunday Times Magazine (London), 15 December 1963.
- Morris, Bernadine, "Robert Ricci, Couturier, 83, Dies...," in the New York Times, 10 August 1988.
- Davy, Philippe, "Le charme romantique des succès de Nina Ricci," in L'Officiel (Paris), February 1990.
- "Ricci Cruise," in WWD, 6 July 1990.
- Deeny, Godfrey, "Ricci's Pipart: Staying Power," in WWD, 26 January 1995.
- White, Constance, C.R., "Refreshing Nina Ricci," in the New York Times, 25 April 1995.
- "Nina Ricci Gets Luminous," in Cosmetics Products Report, September 1999.
- "Guest Amenities," in Hotel & Motel Management, 20 September 1999.
- Sulic, Diana, "Nina Ricci," [profile] online at Fashion Live, www.fashionlive.com, 5 August 2000.
- "New York: A Delicate Balance," in WWD, 16 February 2001.
- Deeny, Godfrey, "From Russia with Ricci as Designer Bows Out," available online at Fashion Windows, www.fashionwindows.com, 10 March 2001.
- Patterson, Suzy, "Luscious Furs and Fabrics at Nina Ricci," available online at www.theage.com.au, 12 March 2001.

*

To make women beautiful, to bring out the charm of each one's personality. But also to make life more beautiful...that has always been my ambition, and that is the underlying philosophy of Nina Ricci.

—Robert Ricci

Nina Ricci, fall/winter 1966 collection: "El Morocco," a North African-inspired cocktail djellaba. © AP/Wide World Photos.

* * *

Nina Ricci is established as one of the longest running Parisian couture houses. Unlike her peers, Elsa Schiaparelli and Chanel, Ricci's reputation does not rest on a revolutionary fashion statement. Instead, she was successful because she provided an understated, chic look for elegant and wealthy society women, always classic, yet intoxicatingly feminine.

When it came to designing clothes, Nina Ricci relied greatly on her feminine intuition. She worked directly on the model and designed by draping the actual fabric, which she felt gave her the answer to what the dress would become. Creating clothes was simply a matter of solving problems and in the 1930s she described several of them—she had to find an extra special, elegant detail that would render a dress a client's favorite and achieve a maximum ease and lightness that did not encumber the wearer when moving or dancing.

Much of the detailing in Nina Ricci clothing reflected the designer's ultrafeminine approach, the flattering effects of gathers, tucks, and drapery and an attention to décolleté and figure-hugging details like fitting dresses below the waist. She was clever and original in her use of fabric, cutting plaids and tartans on the bias for evening dresses and a black silk border print fabric so the print was avidly displayed over the bust, leaving the rest of the dress to become a straight column of fabric.

Ricci had been a successful designer for other houses before she decided to open her own with her son Robert in 1932. At the age of 49, this could have been a risky venture but the gamble paid off as the company rapidly grew in size and stature during its first decade. By 1939 they occupied eleven floors in three buildings, a stark contrast to their humble beginnings in one room at 20 boulevard des Capucines, Paris.

Nina retired from the business in the early 1950s, leaving the field open to her son Robert who pursued his own ambitious plans for the house. An excellent businessman, Robert Ricci established many divisions and licensees for the Ricci name. A fragrance, Cœur de Joie, was introduced in 1945, followed by the now classic L'Air du Temps. Later such fragrances as Fleur de Fleurs, and Nina were successively marketed. Sunglasses alone were reported to be grossing $6 million in the late 1970s and by 1979 the house had become firmly established in the former Kodak Mansion, opposite the House of Dior on avenue Montaigne, Paris.

Robert Ricci had also been successful in his choice of designers for the house. Belgian designer Jules-François Crahay was named head designer in 1954 and made his debut with a collection paying homage to Nina's trademark feminine look. Carrie Donovan from the New York Times described it as "a collection that was feminine in the extreme—beautiful of coloring and fabric, unbizarre and elegant." Crahay was succeeded in 1963 by Gérard Pipart, who remained as designer of both the couture and boutique collections for 30 years. After Pipart, there was a succession of designers, including Christian Astuguevielle and Myriam Schaeffer but the label had fallen out of favor with young Parisians.

Canadian Nathalie Gervais, formerly of Gucci and Valentino, was brought in in 1999 to reinvigorate the Nina Ricci name. Her luxe and trendy designs, along with a flashy new ad campaign, put the label back on solid ground. Gervais' early 2001 collection did not disappoint; her Indian and Russian-inspired collection featured slim pants, slinky tops and tunics, and leathers and furs.

In the 21st century Nina Ricci remains best known for its fragrances, especially the enduringly classic L'air du Temps, as well as a growing number of other fragrances and skincare products. Its haute couture, however, has struggled to maintain its identity. Nathalie Gervais seemed to have captured and updated the elegance long associated with the Nina Ricci name, then stunned the fashion world by announcing her departure from the venerable house in 2001. Nina Ricci was once again looking for a designer left by the void of longtime trendsetters Crahay and Pipart.

—Kevin Almond; updated by Owen James

NORDSTROM

American retail company

Founded: as a shoe retailer by Carl F. Wallin and John W. Nordstrom as Wallin & Nordstrom in Seattle, 1901. Company History: Second store established, 1923; Nordstrom retires, sells his share of the company to his sons, 1928; Wallin retires, sells interest to Nordstrom sons, 1929; Lloyd Nordstrom, another son, joins the company, 1933; expansion throughout Washington, and into Oregon and California; purchased Best Apparel, 1963; acquired Nicholas Ungar retailer and renamed new store Nordstrom Best, 1966; opened a Nordstrom Best in Tacoma, Washington, 1966; changed name to Nordstrom Inc., 1973; Nordstrom Rack stores opened in Seattle, 1975; company restructured, 1999. Company Address:

Nina Ricci, fall/winter 1966 collection: "El Morocco," a North African-inspired cocktail djellaba. © AP/Wide World Photos.

* * *

Nina Ricci is established as one of the longest running Parisian couture houses. Unlike her peers, Elsa Schiaparelli and Chanel, Ricci's reputation does not rest on a revolutionary fashion statement. Instead, she was successful because she provided an understated, chic look for elegant and wealthy society women, always classic, yet intoxicatingly feminine.

When it came to designing clothes, Nina Ricci relied greatly on her feminine intuition. She worked directly on the model and designed by draping the actual fabric, which she felt gave her the answer to what the dress would become. Creating clothes was simply a matter of solving problems and in the 1930s she described several of them—she had to find an extra special, elegant detail that would render a dress a client's favorite and achieve a maximum ease and lightness that did not encumber the wearer when moving or dancing.

Much of the detailing in Nina Ricci clothing reflected the designer's ultrafeminine approach, the flattering effects of gathers, tucks, and drapery and an attention to décolleté and figure-hugging details like fitting dresses below the waist. She was clever and original in her use of fabric, cutting plaids and tartans on the bias for evening dresses and a black silk border print fabric so the print was avidly displayed over the bust, leaving the rest of the dress to become a straight column of fabric.

Ricci had been a successful designer for other houses before she decided to open her own with her son Robert in 1932. At the age of 49, this could have been a risky venture but the gamble paid off as the company rapidly grew in size and stature during its first decade. By 1939 they occupied eleven floors in three buildings, a stark contrast to their humble beginnings in one room at 20 boulevard des Capucines, Paris.

Nina retired from the business in the early 1950s, leaving the field open to her son Robert who pursued his own ambitious plans for the house. An excellent businessman, Robert Ricci established many divisions and licensees for the Ricci name. A fragrance, Cœur de Joie, was introduced in 1945, followed by the now classic L'Air du Temps. Later such fragrances as Fleur de Fleurs, and Nina were successively marketed. Sunglasses alone were reported to be grossing $6 million in the late 1970s and by 1979 the house had become firmly established in the former Kodak Mansion, opposite the House of Dior on avenue Montaigne, Paris.

Robert Ricci had also been successful in his choice of designers for the house. Belgian designer Jules-François Crahay was named head designer in 1954 and made his debut with a collection paying homage to Nina's trademark feminine look. Carrie Donovan from the New York Times described it as "a collection that was feminine in the extreme—beautiful of coloring and fabric, unbizarre and elegant." Crahay was succeeded in 1963 by Gérard Pipart, who remained as designer of both the couture and boutique collections for 30 years. After Pipart, there was a succession of designers, including Christian Astuguevielle and Myriam Schaeffer but the label had fallen out of favor with young Parisians.

Canadian Nathalie Gervais, formerly of Gucci and Valentino, was brought in in 1999 to reinvigorate the Nina Ricci name. Her luxe and trendy designs, along with a flashy new ad campaign, put the label back on solid ground. Gervais' early 2001 collection did not disappoint; her Indian and Russian-inspired collection featured slim pants, slinky tops and tunics, and leathers and furs.

In the 21st century Nina Ricci remains best known for its fragrances, especially the enduringly classic L'air du Temps, as well as a growing number of other fragrances and skincare products. Its haute couture, however, has struggled to maintain its identity. Nathalie Gervais seemed to have captured and updated the elegance long associated with the Nina Ricci name, then stunned the fashion world by announcing her departure from the venerable house in 2001. Nina Ricci was once again looking for a designer left by the void of longtime trendsetters Crahay and Pipart.

—Kevin Almond; updated by Owen James

NORDSTROM

American retail company

Founded: as a shoe retailer by Carl F. Wallin and John W. Nordstrom as Wallin & Nordstrom in Seattle, 1901. Company History: Second store established, 1923; Nordstrom retires, sells his share of the company to his sons, 1928; Wallin retires, sells interest to Nordstrom sons, 1929; Lloyd Nordstrom, another son, joins the company, 1933; expansion throughout Washington, and into Oregon and California; purchased Best Apparel, 1963; acquired Nicholas Ungar retailer and renamed new store Nordstrom Best, 1966; opened a Nordstrom Best in Tacoma, Washington, 1966; changed name to Nordstrom Inc., 1973; Nordstrom Rack stores opened in Seattle, 1975; company restructured, 1999. Company Address:

1617 Sixth Avenue, Suite 700, Seattle, WA 98101, USA. Company Website: www.nordstrom.com.

PUBLICATIONS

On NORDSTROM:

Books

Spector, Robert, and Patrick D. McCarthy, The Nordstrom Way (2nd edition), New York, 2000.

Articles

Palmieri, Christopher, "Filling Big Shoes," in Forbes, 15 November 1999.

"Nordstrom Launches New Retail Cards," in PR Newswire (Seattle), 5 April 2000.

Bond, Jeff, "What's Inside Nordstrom's Reinvention?" in Washington CEO, July 2000.

"Nordstrom to Buy Faconnable, a Top Seller in Its Stores," in the New York Times, 7 September 2000.

* * *

Carl F. Wallin, a Seattle shoemaker, and John W. Nordstrom opened a shoe store, Wallin & Nordstrom, in Seattle in 1901. The partners built their business on the philosophy of offering customers the best in service, selection, quality, and value. Today, Nordstrom continues to grow and thrive on that very same philosophy through its family-controlled business. Nordstrom believes in service with a smile and wants to project an image of smalltown modesty—that's the corporate culture and it sells. An example of this phenomenon is Patrick McCarthy, who retired in 2000, and was the top salesperson for 15 consecutive years, selling over $1 million per year in the downtown Seattle store. Because of his accomplishment, McCarthy was the subject of an article called, "Personal Touch: Service Makes Salesman a Legend at Nordstrom."

Wallin and Nordstrom opened a second shoe store in Seattle's University District in 1923. The stores did well and in 1928 Nordstrom retired and sold his share of the company to his sons, Everett and Elmer. The following year Wallin retired, and sold his interests to Nordstrom sons. A third Nordstrom son, Lloyd, joined the company in 1933, and the company continued to expand throughout Washington and the surrounding states. Nordstrom soon had eight shoe stores in Washington and Oregon, and 13 leased shoe departments in Washington, Oregon, and California. The company's flagship store, in the downtown Seattle, was the largest shoe store in the country.

In the 1960s, Nordstrom began acquiring other companies, such as Best Apparel. Best Apparel was a Seattle-based clothing store with an outlet in Seattle and another at the Lloyd Center in Portland, Oregon. Nordstrom purchased Nicholas Ungar, a Portland fashion retailer, and merged the store with the existing shoe store in downtown Portland, and renamed the new store Nordstrom Best in 1966. Another Nordstrom Best was opened in Tacoma, Washington, and the company continued expanding and changed its name to simply Nordstrom, Inc. in 1973. Two years later, the first Nordstrom Rack stores opened in Seattle, and the company continued to grow as an all-purpose retailer through the rest of the 1970s and into the 1980s.

The course for Nordstrom has been to modernize, adding brands such as Caslon, DKNY, and EMME for women and Faconnable (which it later acquired), Kenneth Cole, and Tommy Bahama for men to its racks. After the company was restructured in 1999, Nordstrom decided to sharpen its image with consumers. In May 2000, Nordstrom declared "Reinvent Yourself" as its advertising campaign: when customers entered stores, they no longer saw piano players wearing tuxedos (a former trademark) and instead found modernized displays with hip, brighter, flashier colors, and the more casual apparel. Nordstrom also changed its advertising style, airing trendy commercials during hit shows like ER and Ally McBeal.

Following trends to make shopping easier for its customers, Nordstrom entered the Internet world in the spring of 1999 with its own website (www.nordstrom.com). The website was created to announce fashion shows, augment advertising, and often showcases select window and store displays. Further, it echoes trends of the season and is full of photos of Nordstrom's clothing, shoes, jewelry, gifts, and accessories available at stores. Customers can easily click to items to buy, add them to their shopping bag, visit customer service, request a catalogue, and use their credit card. Nordstrom's catalogue, like its website, is another exceptional convenience—available 24 hours a day, with toll-free phone operators and personal shoppers.

Nordstrom took customer convenience a step further when they hired Jennifer Morla in April 2000 to help redesign the company's proprietary credit card. Morla, a renowned designer based in San Francisco, helped Nordstrom depart from its conservative look to a more upbeat, fresh style for the company. For customers' credit ease, Nordstrom added the Nordstrom Retail, Nordstrom Legacy, Nordstrom Platinum, and Nordstrom Platinum Legacy proprietary cards.

One thing customers notice about Nordstrom, in its 72 full-line stores and 28 Nordstrom Rack stores, is the continued personal touch of the company's customer service. Nordstrom is still controlled and owned by a family, whose commitment and philosophy are the foundation of its success. Nordstrom may move forward with the trends of technology, but the needs of today's consumers will always come first.

—Kimball A. Medeiros

NORELL, Norman

American designer

Born: Norman David Levinson in Noblesville, Indiana, 20 April 1900. Education: Studied illustration at Parsons School of Design, New York, 1919; fashion design at Pratt Institute, Brooklyn, New York, 1920–22. Career: Costume designer, Paramount Pictures, Long Island, New York, 1922–23; theatrical costume designer, 1924–28; designer, Hattie Carnegie, New York, 1928–40; partner/designer, Traina-Norell company, New York, 1941–60; director, Norman Norell, New York, 1960–72. Exhibitions: Norman Norell retrospective, Metropolitan Museum of Art, New York, 1972. Awards: Neiman Marcus award, Dallas, Texas, 1942; Coty American Fashion Critics award, 1943, 1951, 1956, 1958, 1966; Parsons medal for distinguished achievement, 1956; Sunday Times International Fashion award, London, 1963; City of New York Bronze Medallion, 1972. Honorary Doctor of Fine Arts, Pratt Institute, 1962. Died: 25 October 1972, in New York.

1617 Sixth Avenue, Suite 700, Seattle, WA 98101, USA. Company Website: www.nordstrom.com.

PUBLICATIONS

On NORDSTROM:

Books

Spector, Robert, and Patrick D. McCarthy, The Nordstrom Way (2nd edition), New York, 2000.

Articles

Palmieri, Christopher, "Filling Big Shoes," in Forbes, 15 November 1999.

"Nordstrom Launches New Retail Cards," in PR Newswire (Seattle), 5 April 2000.

Bond, Jeff, "What's Inside Nordstrom's Reinvention?" in Washington CEO, July 2000.

"Nordstrom to Buy Faconnable, a Top Seller in Its Stores," in the New York Times, 7 September 2000.

* * *

Carl F. Wallin, a Seattle shoemaker, and John W. Nordstrom opened a shoe store, Wallin & Nordstrom, in Seattle in 1901. The partners built their business on the philosophy of offering customers the best in service, selection, quality, and value. Today, Nordstrom continues to grow and thrive on that very same philosophy through its family-controlled business. Nordstrom believes in service with a smile and wants to project an image of smalltown modesty—that's the corporate culture and it sells. An example of this phenomenon is Patrick McCarthy, who retired in 2000, and was the top salesperson for 15 consecutive years, selling over $1 million per year in the downtown Seattle store. Because of his accomplishment, McCarthy was the subject of an article called, "Personal Touch: Service Makes Salesman a Legend at Nordstrom."

Wallin and Nordstrom opened a second shoe store in Seattle's University District in 1923. The stores did well and in 1928 Nordstrom retired and sold his share of the company to his sons, Everett and Elmer. The following year Wallin retired, and sold his interests to Nordstrom sons. A third Nordstrom son, Lloyd, joined the company in 1933, and the company continued to expand throughout Washington and the surrounding states. Nordstrom soon had eight shoe stores in Washington and Oregon, and 13 leased shoe departments in Washington, Oregon, and California. The company's flagship store, in the downtown Seattle, was the largest shoe store in the country.

In the 1960s, Nordstrom began acquiring other companies, such as Best Apparel. Best Apparel was a Seattle-based clothing store with an outlet in Seattle and another at the Lloyd Center in Portland, Oregon. Nordstrom purchased Nicholas Ungar, a Portland fashion retailer, and merged the store with the existing shoe store in downtown Portland, and renamed the new store Nordstrom Best in 1966. Another Nordstrom Best was opened in Tacoma, Washington, and the company continued expanding and changed its name to simply Nordstrom, Inc. in 1973. Two years later, the first Nordstrom Rack stores opened in Seattle, and the company continued to grow as an all-purpose retailer through the rest of the 1970s and into the 1980s.

The course for Nordstrom has been to modernize, adding brands such as Caslon, DKNY, and EMME for women and Faconnable (which it later acquired), Kenneth Cole, and Tommy Bahama for men to its racks. After the company was restructured in 1999, Nordstrom decided to sharpen its image with consumers. In May 2000, Nordstrom declared "Reinvent Yourself" as its advertising campaign: when customers entered stores, they no longer saw piano players wearing tuxedos (a former trademark) and instead found modernized displays with hip, brighter, flashier colors, and the more casual apparel. Nordstrom also changed its advertising style, airing trendy commercials during hit shows like ER and Ally McBeal.

Following trends to make shopping easier for its customers, Nordstrom entered the Internet world in the spring of 1999 with its own website (www.nordstrom.com). The website was created to announce fashion shows, augment advertising, and often showcases select window and store displays. Further, it echoes trends of the season and is full of photos of Nordstrom's clothing, shoes, jewelry, gifts, and accessories available at stores. Customers can easily click to items to buy, add them to their shopping bag, visit customer service, request a catalogue, and use their credit card. Nordstrom's catalogue, like its website, is another exceptional convenience—available 24 hours a day, with toll-free phone operators and personal shoppers.

Nordstrom took customer convenience a step further when they hired Jennifer Morla in April 2000 to help redesign the company's proprietary credit card. Morla, a renowned designer based in San Francisco, helped Nordstrom depart from its conservative look to a more upbeat, fresh style for the company. For customers' credit ease, Nordstrom added the Nordstrom Retail, Nordstrom Legacy, Nordstrom Platinum, and Nordstrom Platinum Legacy proprietary cards.

One thing customers notice about Nordstrom, in its 72 full-line stores and 28 Nordstrom Rack stores, is the continued personal touch of the company's customer service. Nordstrom is still controlled and owned by a family, whose commitment and philosophy are the foundation of its success. Nordstrom may move forward with the trends of technology, but the needs of today's consumers will always come first.

—Kimball A. Medeiros

NORELL, Norman

American designer

Born: Norman David Levinson in Noblesville, Indiana, 20 April 1900. Education: Studied illustration at Parsons School of Design, New York, 1919; fashion design at Pratt Institute, Brooklyn, New York, 1920–22. Career: Costume designer, Paramount Pictures, Long Island, New York, 1922–23; theatrical costume designer, 1924–28; designer, Hattie Carnegie, New York, 1928–40; partner/designer, Traina-Norell company, New York, 1941–60; director, Norman Norell, New York, 1960–72. Exhibitions: Norman Norell retrospective, Metropolitan Museum of Art, New York, 1972. Awards: Neiman Marcus award, Dallas, Texas, 1942; Coty American Fashion Critics award, 1943, 1951, 1956, 1958, 1966; Parsons medal for distinguished achievement, 1956; Sunday Times International Fashion award, London, 1963; City of New York Bronze Medallion, 1972. Honorary Doctor of Fine Arts, Pratt Institute, 1962. Died: 25 October 1972, in New York.

Norman Norell, fall 1968 collection: sequined, fur-trimmed cossack shirt over a narrow skirt. © AP/Wide World Photos.

PUBLICATIONS

On NORELL:

Books

- Epstein, Beryl Williams, Fashion is Our Business, Philadelphia and New York, 1945, 1970.
 Ballard, Bettina, In My Fashion, New York, 1960.
 Roshco, Bernard, The Rag Race, New York, 1963.
 Fairchild, John, The Fashionable Savages, New York, 1965.

Sotheby's, Property of Norman Norell et al., Public Auction Catalogue, New York, 1973.

Morris, Bernadine, "Norman Norell," in Sarah Tomerlin Lee, editor, American Fashion: The Life and Lines of Adrian, Mainbocher, McCordell, Norell, and Trigère, New York, 1975.

Glynn, Prudence, In Fashion, New York, 1978.

Milbank, Caroline Rennolds, Couture: The Great Designers, New York, 1985.

New York and Hollywood Fashion: Costume Designs from the Brooklyn Museum Collection, New York, 1986.

Mulvagh, Jane, Vogue History of 20th Century Fashion, London, 1988.

Milbank, Caroline Rennolds, New York Fashion: The Evolution of American Style, New York, 1989.

Stegemeyer, Anne, Who's Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.

Articles

"Designer Honoured by Fashion Critics," in the New York Times, 23 January 1943.

Pope, Virginia, "Designer Stresses Simple Silhouette," in the New York Times, 24 January 1944.

"Laurels Anew for Norell," in Life (New York), 8 October 1956.

Cushman, Wilhelma, "American Designers," in Ladies' Home Journal (New York), March 1957.

Levin, Phyllis Lee, "Paris Sets Pace but Creative Talent, Critics Agree, Exists in US," in the New York Times, 19 June 1958.

"Four Inside Views of Fashion," in the New York Times Magazine, 19 June 1960.

Donovan, Carrie, "Stylist Gives Detailed Aid to Imitators," in the New York Times, 21 July 1960.

"Norell Styles Raise Ruckus All Their Own," in Life (New York), 26 September 1960.

Donovan, Carrie, "Norman Norell: Fashion Is His Life," in the New York Times, 28 June 1961.

"American Collections: Norell Shows Tailored and Femme-Fatale Designs," in the New York Times, 11 July 1962.

"Where the Shape Lies," in Newsweek (New York), 23 July 1962.

Frank, Stanley, "Style King of Ready-to-Wear," in Saturday Evening Post (New York), 20 October 1962.

"The Socko American Pair," in Life (New York), 1 March 1963.

"Backstage Notes at Norell," in Vogue (New York), March 1963.

"The Great Norell," in Vogue (New York), 1 October 1963.

Taylor, Angela, "Everything from Coats to Pants Cheered at Norman Norell Show," in the New York Times, 1 July 1964.

"Norman the Conqueror," in Time (New York), 10 July 1964.

"He's a Fashion Purist with the Golden Touch," in Business Week (New York), 12 September 1964.

"Norman Norell," in Current Biography, (New York), 1964.

Morris, Bernadine, "Parsons Honors Celebrated Dropout," in the New York Times, 30 April 1965.

Tucker, Priscilla, "Norman Norell," in the Metropolitan Museum of Art Bulletin (New York), November 1967.

Morris, Bernadine, "A Talk with Norman Norell," in the New York Times, 15 October 1972.

_____, "At Retrospective Hundreds Salute an Ailing Norell," in the New York Times, 17 October 1972.

_____, "Norman Norell Dies; Made Seventh Avenue the Rival of Paris," in the New York Times, 26 October 1972.

"Homage to Norell," in Newsweek (New York), 30 October 1972.

Norman Norell, fall 1968 collection. © AP/Wide World Photos.

Morris, Bernadine, "Recollections: Norell in Kansas City," in the New York Times, 23 September 1986.

Elliott, Mary C., "Norman Norell: Class All the Way," in Threads (Newtown, Connecticut), October/November 1989.

* * *

Simple, well-made clothes that would last and remain fashionable for many years became the hallmark of Norman Norell, the first American designer to win the respect of Parisian couturiers. He gained a reputation for flattering design while Traina, whose well-heeled clientèle appreciated the snob appeal of pared-down day clothes and dramatic eveningwear. From his early years with Hattie Carnegie, Norell learned all about meticulous cut, fit, and quality fabrics. Regular trips to Paris exposed him to the standards of couture that made French clothes the epitome of high fashion. Norell had the unique ability to translate the characteristics of couture into American ready-to-wear. He did inspect each model garment individually, carefully, in the tradition of a couturier, and was just as demanding in proper fabrication and finish. The prices of "Norells," especially after he went into business on his own, easily rivaled those of Paris creations, but they were worth it. The clothes lasted, and their classicism made them timeless.

Certain characteristics of Norell's designs were developed early on and remained constant throughout his career. Wool jersey shirtdress dresses with demure bowed collars were a radical departure from splashy floral daydresses of the 1940s. World War II restrictions on yardages and materials coincided with Norell's penchant for spare silhouettes, echoing his favorite period, the 1920s. Long before Paris was promoting the chemise in the 1950s, Norell was offering short, straight, low-waisted shapes during the war years. For evening, Norell looked to the flashy glamor of his days designing costumes for vaudeville.

Glittering paillettes, which were not rationed, would be splashed on evening skirts—paired with sweater tops for comfort in unheated rooms—or on coats. Later, the lavish use of all-out glamor sequins evolved into Norell's signature shimmering "mermaid" evening dresses, formfitting, round-necked and short-sleeved. The round neckline, plain instead of the then-popular draped, became one of the features of Norell's designs of which he was most proud. "I hope I have helped women dress more simply," was his goal. He used revealing bathing suit necklines for evening as well, with sable trim or jeweled buttons for contrast. Variations on these themes continued throughout the years, even after trousersuits became a regular part of Norell's repertoire.

Striking in their simplicity, Norell suits would skim the body, making the wearer the focus of attention rather than the clothes. Daytime drama came from bold, clear colors such as red, black, beige, bright orange, or pale blue, punctuated by large, plain contrasting buttons. Stripes, dots, and checks were the only patterns, although Norell was credited with introducing leopard prints in the 1940s, again, years before they became widespread in use. Norell's faithful clients hailed his clothes as some of the most comfortable they had ever worn.

Early exposure to men's clothing in Norell's father's haberdashery business no doubt led to the adaptation of the menswear practicality. An outstanding example was the sleeveless jacket over a bowed blouse and slim woolen skirt, developed after Norell became aware of the comfort of his own sleeveless vest worn for work. As in men's clothing, pockets and buttons were always functional. Norell created a sensation with the culotte-skirted wool flannel day suit with which he launched his own independent label in 1960. His sophisticated clientèle welcomed the ease of movement allowed by this daring design. As the 1960s progressed Norell presented another masculine-influenced garment, the jumpsuit, but in soft or luxurious fabrics for evening. Just as durability and excellent workmanship were integral to the best menswear, so they were to Norell's. Men's dress was traditionally slow to change; Norell stayed with his same basic designs, continually refining them over the years. He developed the idea that there should be only one center of interest in an outfit, and designed only what he liked.

What he liked was frequently copied, both domestically and overseas. The short, flippy, gored, ice skating skirt was copied by

Paris. Aware of piracy in the fashion business, Norell offered working sketches of the culotte suit free of charge to the trade to ensure that at least his design would be copied correctly. This integrity earned him a place as the foremost American designer of his time. Unlike most ready-to-wear that would be altered at the last moment for ease of manufacture, no changes were allowed after Norell had approved a garment. His impeccable taste was evident not only in the clothes, but in his simple life: meals at Schrafft's and Hamburger Heaven, quiet evenings at home, sketching in his modern duplex apartment, and unpublicized daily visits to assist fashion design students at Parsons School of Design.

As the designer whose reputation gained new respect for the Seventh Avenue garment industry, Norell was the first designer to receive the Coty Award, and the first to be elected to the Coty Award Hall of Fame. True to his innate integrity, he attempted to return his third Winnie award when he learned that judging was done without judges having actually seen designers' collections. Norell promoted American fashion as founder and president of the Council of Fashion Designers of America, but also by giving fledgling milliners their start in his black-tie, special event fashion shows. Halston and Adolfo designed hats for Norell, for, as in couture, Norell insisted upon unity of costume to include accessories.

As the "Dean of American Fashion," Norell was the first to have his name on a dress label, and the first to produce a successful American fragrance, Norell, with a designer name. Some of his clothes can be seen in the films, such as The Sainted Devil, That Touch of Mink and The Wheeler Dealers. Show business personalities and social leaders throughout the country treasured their "Norells" for years.

—Therese Duzinkiewicz Baker

NOTT, Richard

See WORKERS FOR FREEDOM

O

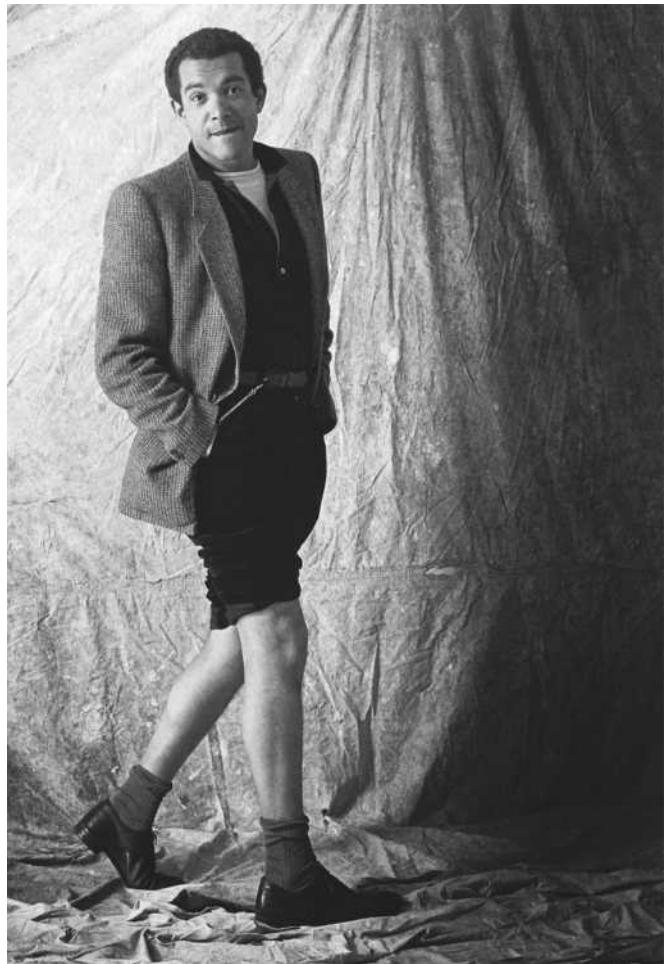

OATMAN, Thomas

See NEW REPUBLIC

OLDFIELD, Bruce

British designer

Born: London, 14 July 1950. Education: Ripon Grammar School, Yorkshire, 1961–67; studied at Sheffield City Polytechnic, Yorkshire; studied fashion design at Ravensbourne College of Art, Kent, 1968–71; St. Martin's School of Art, London, 1972–73. Career: Designed freelance from 1973–75, including capsule collections for Liberty and Browns, London, and collection for Henri Bendel store, New York, 1974; established own fashion house, Bruce Oldfield, Ltd., London, from 1975; visiting lecturer at the Fashion Institute of Technology, New York, 1977; couture division established, 1978; guest lecturer, Los Angeles County Museum of Art, 1983; opened flagship store in Beauchamp Place, Knightsbridge, London, 1984; reintroduced ready-to-wear line, 1984; lectured at Aspen Design Conference, Colorado, 1986; columnist, Welt am Sonntag (Hamburg), 1987–91; first diffusion collection, 1988; moved to only custom designing; created uniforms for Alexandra Corporate Clothing, 2000; designed home accessories for St. James Homes, 2001. Exhibitions: Metropolitan Museum of Art, New York; Victoria & Albert Museum; Bath Museum. Awards: Bath Museum of Costume Dress of the Year award, 1985; the Times Designer of the Year award, London, 1985; named Honorary Fellow, Sheffield City Polytechnic, 1987; Honorary Fellow, Royal College of Art, London, 1990; Honorary Fellow, Hatfield College, Durham University, 1990; OBE, 1990. Address: 27 Beauchamp Place, London SW3 1NJ, England.

Bruce Oldfield. © Geray Sweeney/CORBIS.

PUBLICATIONS

By OLDFIELD:

Books

Bruce Oldfield's Season, with Georgina Howell, London, 1987.

Articles

"Nothing to Do with Greed or Vanity," in the Independent (London), 9 September 1989.

On OLDFIELD:

Books

Coleridge, Nicholas, The Fashion Conspiracy, London, 1988. Stegemeyer, Anne, Who's Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.

Articles

Tuohy, William, "Chic Guru of European Society," in the Los Angeles Times, July 1983.

Scobie, W., "Star Dresser," in the Observer (London), 19 February 1984.

Moore, Jackie, "Men About Town: Bruce Oldfield," in Women's Journal (London), April 1985.

Kendall, Ena, "A Room of My Own," in the Observer Magazine, 8 June 1986.

- "Bruce Oldfield Makes Clothes for (Future) Queen," in People Weekly (New York), April 1987.
- Lasson, Sally Ann, "A Life in the Day of Bruce Oldfield," in the Sunday Times Magazine (London), 10 May 1987.
- Nadelson, Regina, "Bruce Oldfield—A Profile," in European Travel & Life, September 1987.
- Gross, Michael, "A London Designer Leaves Poverty Behind," in the New York Times, 9 October 1987.
- Stead, Kate, "Couturier to the Stars," in the Morning Herald (Sydney), January 1988.
- Dutt, Robin, "G'day Bruce," in Clothes Show (London), Spring 1988.
- Lambert, Elizabeth, "Modern Glamour for His London Flat," in Architectural Digest, September 1988.
- Samuel, Kathryn, "Rags to Rag-Trade Riches and Home Again," in the Daily Telegraph (London), 31 October 1988.
- Leston, Kimberley, "Oldfield's New Pastures," in the Daily Express DX Magazine (London), May 1989.
- Eyers, Anthony, "The Conversion of St. Bruce," in Isis (Oxford University), 1989.
- D'Silva, Beverly, "The Affordable Essence of Oldfield," in the Daily Telegraph (London), 18 January 1990.
- Tredre, Roger, "Bruce Stoops to Conquer," in the Independent (London), 18 January 1990.
- D'Silva, Beverly, "A Middle-Class Man of the Cloth," in the Sunday Times (London), 21 January 1990.
- _____, "The Bruce Oldfield Show," in the Telegraph Magazine, 3 March 1990.
- Deane, April, "Bruce Oldfield: An All Round Touch of Quality," in the Journal, 17 April 1991.
- Reed, Paula, "Bruce is Back," in the Sunday Times, 14 February 1993.
- Himes, Winsome, "Guru of High Style," in The Voice, 19 October 1993.
- Tyrrel, Rebecca, "Bruce Oldfield: Twenty Years of Fashion Success," in the Tatler, November 1993.
- Spackman, Anne, "Oldfield Shows How Far Estate Chic Has Come...," in the Financial Times, 27 January 2001.
- Curtis, Chris, "Wear and Stare," in Leisure & Hospitality Business, 22 February 2001.

*

My approach to fashion is, and always has been, through couture-orientated technique in cut and detail. I like the idea of producing a garment where the actual technique and the cut are the integral design elements. For me, this approach in designing clothes allows a greater scope for developing ideas from season to season. I am not enamoured of ad hoc superfluous detailing and would always prefer to use a good quality plain fabric over a print, because if I should need to have a surface detail, I would rather create it myself.

I love quality and finesse and continuity and am horrified by the concept of "in one season and out the next." It seems to devalue the whole creative process. This is not to say that fashion could or should stand still, we need new ideas and a rolling out of attitudes to the way that we see ourselves, but the speed of change and the polarization of successive trends show an insecurity that to me is quite undesirable. It would make me very happy if, in 2050, someone came across a Bruce Oldfield dress in a thrift shop and simply had to buy it.

—Bruce Oldfield

* * *

"It would have been better for me to have lived at an earlier period," Bruce Oldfield told journalist and writer Georgina Howell (who collaborated with Oldfield on Bruce Oldfield's Season, London, 1987), "because I care about the technique of making clothes." During the 1970s and 1980s there was an increasing disregard for quality and workmanship in dress manufacturing, and it was this very sloppiness, readily accepted by retailers and customers alike, that Oldfield reacted against. He was attracted to the traditional high standards and technical workmanship of couture and the private client.

In the 1970s and 1980s, crazy fashion was very popular but Oldfield declared he could never create such fantasy clothes. To him they were totally unconvincing. He recognized there was an established market for understated, flattering clothes and targeted an identifiable, timeless look towards this customer, someone he described as being expensive, sexy, body-conscious, a great looking woman in a flattering dress. Avoiding the need to make seasonal fashion statements he has remained a staunchly classic designer. "There have been times when I have been in fashion and times when I have been out of fashion, but I have always had six pages a year in Vogue, sometimes [more]," he once declared.

After leaving St. Martin's School of Art with a fashion degree in 1973, Oldfield worked as a freelance designer for several high-profile fashion companies, ranging from an exclusive collection for Henri Bendel in New York to selling shoe designs to Yves Saint Laurent in Paris. He established his own company in 1975 with a bank loan and a grant from Dr. Barnardo's, the children's home where Oldfield grew up. The business began as a ready-to-wear operation that produced two seasonal collections a year. Concentrating on occasion clothing, the range was available at prestigious stores such as Harvey Nichols in London, and Bergdorf Goodman, Saks Fifth Avenue, and Bloomingdale's in New York. He also worked on specialist commissions, such as designing the film wardrobe for Charlotte Rampling in Le Taxi Mauve and Joan Collins in The Bitch.

The success of the business led to an increasing emphasis on the private customer, resulting in the decision to provide an exclusively couture service by 1983, producing unique and glamorous evening and wedding dresses. In 1984 the first Bruce Oldfield shop opened at 27 Beauchamp Place, London, selling a total look, both to the ready-to-wear and the couture customer. Oldfield is perhaps best known for his couture and ready-to-wear evening dresses, often worn by high-profile clients such as the late Princess of Wales or actresses Joan Collins and Anjelica Huston.

Sumptuous fabrics like crushed velvets, taffeta, mink, printed sequins, crêpe, chiffon and lamé are used to design traditional sculpted shapes that are exquisitely manufactured. A ruched bodiced dress in velvet, with a huge fischou collar, is completed with a vast swathed taffeta bow on the hip. A velvet double-breasted coat dress is enhanced by an exaggerated mink collar. Particularly distinctive is Oldfield's use of color blocking; simple jersey dresses are slashed asymmetrically and blocked in various vivid color combinations. His tailoring is always curvaceous and womanly, with seams and darts significantly placed to flatter the feminine physique, in soft leathers and wool crêpes.

Oldfield's career has covered a wide span of activities and he has recently received awards acknowledging his contribution to fashion. In 1990 he was awarded the OBE and made an honorary fellow of both the Royal College of Art and Durham University. The same year he was also the subject of a television documentary on his life and career, A Journey into Fashion, which was subsequently sold to television companies around the world.

If success can be measured by public recognition, then Oldfield has achieved it. His name is synonymous with style; he is universally acknowledged as having a unique understanding of how to make a woman look and feel her best. Yet in the 21st century Oldfield took his particular fashion sense into alternate fields of design. Signing on with Alexandra Corporate Clothing, Oldfield designed staff uniforms for the Warren Village Cinemas, then Oldfield segued into interior design in a new St. James housing development in Kew, where he designed furniture and furnishings for two homes and two apartments of the 400-house Kew Riverside neighborhood.

Looking to move more firmly into interiors, the opportunity with St. James was a welcome respite from the demands of fashion designing. As Oldfield told Anne Spackman of the Financial Times (27 January 2001), "The idea that you spend three months making a collection of clothes which should be useless in six months' time makes a mockery of all the effort." For this reason Oldfield cut back to only custom orders, yet home furnishings, on the other hand, "are more of a worthwhile investment for me and for the customer.... The British have always been reluctant to spend money beautifying themselves, but when it comes to their homes, it's a different matter."

Brits with a taste for Bruce Oldfield style can seek him out for private orders, but his design skills now adorn the employees of Warner cinemas, the furnishings of select St. James homes, and if the designer gets his wish—perhaps restaurants and hotels as well.

—Kevin Almond; updated by Nelly Rhodes

OLDHAM, Todd

American designer

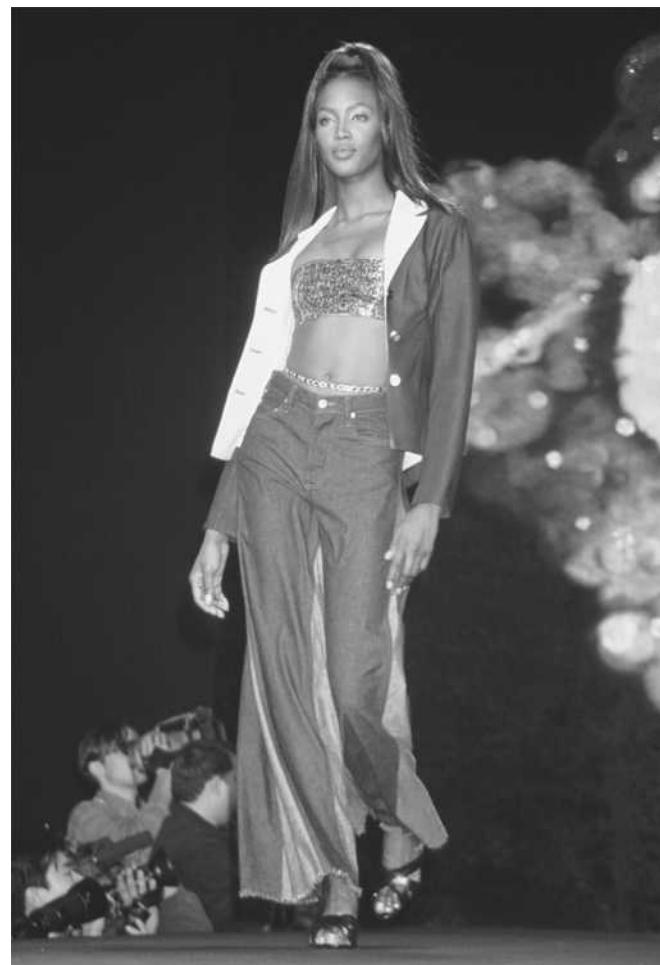

Born: Corpus Christi, Texas, 22 November 1961. Education: No formal training in design. Career: Worked in the alterations department, Polo/Ralph Lauren, Dallas, Texas, 1980; showed first collection, in Dallas, 1981; partner/designer, L-7 company, New York, incorporating Times 7 women's shirt collection, from 1988; reintroduced signature Todd Oldham collection with backing from Onward Kashiyama Company, 1989; introduced line of handbags, 1991; produced Todd Oldham patterns for Vogue Patterns, 1992; footwear line introduced, 1993; opened SoHo store with his father, Jack, 1994; signed on as creative consultant, Escada, 1995; began appearing on MTV's House of Style, 1995; directed first music video, 1997; designed complete renovations for The Hotel, Miami, 1999; published two books, 1997, 2000. Awards: Council of Fashion Designers of America Perry Ellis award, 1991; Dallas Fashion award, 1992; Fashion Excellence award, 1993. Address: 120 Wooster Street, New York, NY 10012, USA. Website: www.toddoldhamjeans.com.

PUBLICATIONS

By OLDHAM:

Books

Todd Oldham: Without Boundaries, New York, 1997.
Suits: The Clothes Make the Man, with Dave Hickey and Shaila Dewan, New York, 2000.

Todd Oldham, spring 1997 collection. © Mitchell Gerber/CORBIS.

On OLDHAM:

Books

Stegemeyer, Anne, Who's Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.

Articles

Robinson, Rob, "Todd Oldham," in Interview (New York), October 1982.

Morris, Bernadine, "Two Young Designers Decorate Their Clothes with Wit," in the New York Times, 27 November 1990.

Hochswender, Woody, "Flights of Fancy: Todd Oldham's Magic Carpet Ride," in the New York Times, 11 April 1991.

Darnton, Nina, "The New York Brat Pack," in Newsweek, 29 April 1991.

"Great Expectations," in WWD, 12 June 1991.

Schiros, Anne-Marie, "The 3-Year Leap of Todd Oldham," in the New York Times, 29 December 1991.

Lender, Heidi, "Hot Toddy," in WWD, 8 May 1992.

Servin, Jim, "Todd Oldham: This Year's It," in the New York Times, 10 May 1992.

"Hot Designer: Todd Oldham," in Rolling Stone, 14 May 1992.

career, A Journey into Fashion, which was subsequently sold to television companies around the world.

If success can be measured by public recognition, then Oldfield has achieved it. His name is synonymous with style; he is universally acknowledged as having a unique understanding of how to make a woman look and feel her best. Yet in the 21st century Oldfield took his particular fashion sense into alternate fields of design. Signing on with Alexandra Corporate Clothing, Oldfield designed staff uniforms for the Warren Village Cinemas, then Oldfield segued into interior design in a new St. James housing development in Kew, where he designed furniture and furnishings for two homes and two apartments of the 400-house Kew Riverside neighborhood.

Looking to move more firmly into interiors, the opportunity with St. James was a welcome respite from the demands of fashion designing. As Oldfield told Anne Spackman of the Financial Times (27 January 2001), "The idea that you spend three months making a collection of clothes which should be useless in six months' time makes a mockery of all the effort." For this reason Oldfield cut back to only custom orders, yet home furnishings, on the other hand, "are more of a worthwhile investment for me and for the customer.... The British have always been reluctant to spend money beautifying themselves, but when it comes to their homes, it's a different matter."

Brits with a taste for Bruce Oldfield style can seek him out for private orders, but his design skills now adorn the employees of Warner cinemas, the furnishings of select St. James homes, and if the designer gets his wish—perhaps restaurants and hotels as well.

—Kevin Almond; updated by Nelly Rhodes

OLDHAM, Todd

American designer

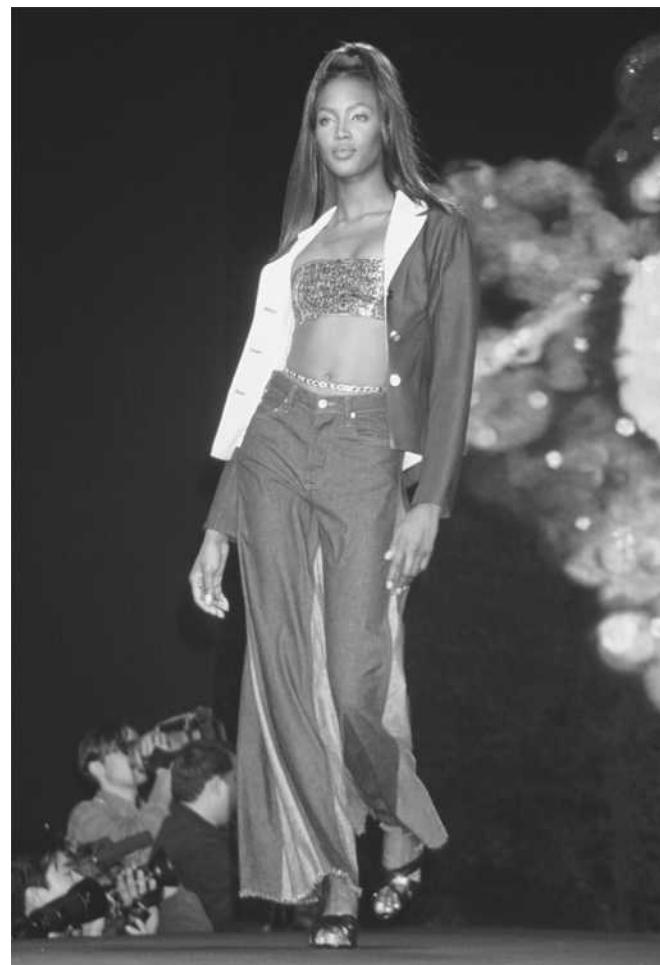

Born: Corpus Christi, Texas, 22 November 1961. Education: No formal training in design. Career: Worked in the alterations department, Polo/Ralph Lauren, Dallas, Texas, 1980; showed first collection, in Dallas, 1981; partner/designer, L-7 company, New York, incorporating Times 7 women's shirt collection, from 1988; reintroduced signature Todd Oldham collection with backing from Onward Kashiyama Company, 1989; introduced line of handbags, 1991; produced Todd Oldham patterns for Vogue Patterns, 1992; footwear line introduced, 1993; opened SoHo store with his father, Jack, 1994; signed on as creative consultant, Escada, 1995; began appearing on MTV's House of Style, 1995; directed first music video, 1997; designed complete renovations for The Hotel, Miami, 1999; published two books, 1997, 2000. Awards: Council of Fashion Designers of America Perry Ellis award, 1991; Dallas Fashion award, 1992; Fashion Excellence award, 1993. Address: 120 Wooster Street, New York, NY 10012, USA. Website: www.toddoldhamjeans.com.

PUBLICATIONS

By OLDHAM:

Books

Todd Oldham: Without Boundaries, New York, 1997.
Suits: The Clothes Make the Man, with Dave Hickey and Shaila Dewan, New York, 2000.

Todd Oldham, spring 1997 collection. © Mitchell Gerber/CORBIS.

On OLDHAM:

Books

Stegemeyer, Anne, Who's Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.

Articles

Robinson, Rob, "Todd Oldham," in Interview (New York), October 1982.

Morris, Bernadine, "Two Young Designers Decorate Their Clothes with Wit," in the New York Times, 27 November 1990.

Hochswender, Woody, "Flights of Fancy: Todd Oldham's Magic Carpet Ride," in the New York Times, 11 April 1991.

Darnton, Nina, "The New York Brat Pack," in Newsweek, 29 April 1991.

"Great Expectations," in WWD, 12 June 1991.

Schiros, Anne-Marie, "The 3-Year Leap of Todd Oldham," in the New York Times, 29 December 1991.

Lender, Heidi, "Hot Toddy," in WWD, 8 May 1992.

Servin, Jim, "Todd Oldham: This Year's It," in the New York Times, 10 May 1992.

"Hot Designer: Todd Oldham," in Rolling Stone, 14 May 1992.

Todd Oldham, spring 1995 collection. © Mitchell Gerber/CORBIS.

- James, Laurie, "Hot on the Trail," in Harper's Bazaar (New York), August 1992.
 Orlean, Susan, "Breaking Away," in Vogue (New York), September 1992.
 Mower, Sarah, "How Does Todd Do It?" in Harper's Bazaar, December 1994.
 Ferguson, Sarah, "Natural Force," in Elle (New York), March 1995.
 Spindler, Amy M., "Oldham and Tyler Look Super," in WWD, 6 April 1995.
 Ingrassia, Michelle, "All Todd, All the Time," in Newsweek, 12 June 1995.
 Colman, David, "Fashioning a Collection," in ARTnews, September 1997.
 Bussel, Abby, "Haute Hotel," in Interior Design, January 1999.
 Wasserman, Ted, "Designer Oldham Aims Snappy Duds at Polaroid," in Brandweek, 25 October 1999.

* * *

Todd Oldham's eclectic and electric fashion fuses a traditional avant-garde premise to an abiding love of the crafts. Acknowledging in Women's Wear Daily in 1992 that his "total hero" is Christian Lacroix, Oldham indicates his wild sense of rich pastiche and cultural

mix. At the time of his show for fall 1991, Woody Hochswender of the New York Times wrote, "The young Texas-born designer is on his own strange trip, and Tuesday afternoon he whisked editors and buyers on a whirlwind round-the-world tour—by plane, flying carpet and Greyhound."

Oldham's irrepressibly mischievous design takes fashion very seriously, bringing to dress a range of visual references. In 1990, in a collection called Garage Sale, he showed a black satin suit embroidered with items that might be found at a garage sale, including a lamp with its electrical cord, a clock, and crossed knife and fork. For fall 1992, he showed a coy "Old Masters—New Mistress" skirt with a beaded Mona Lisa on the front and a Picasso on the back. In between, he showed a black silk shantung trouser suit with sequined and embroidered travel patches, African-inspired embroidered tops, and Lamontage (synthetic-fiber felting) designs akin to Byzantine mosaics.

His vernacular references have strayed to the backyard for a 1991 hammock dress and to the kitchen for what he described to People magazine as "embroidered shirts that look like they've been iced by cake decorators" and his memorable "potholder suits" with pockets resembling the potholders of elementary crafts. In such gestures, Oldham gives literal meaning to "everything but the kitchen sink," but never with desperation, only with a charming surrealism. Another art-for-art's sake suit for 1990 used the motif of paint-by-numbers for its beaded pockets. Oldham's ever-present sense of ornament is not, however, for resplendence alone (although the decoration plays an undeniable role) but for its contribution to the narrative, the ironic information dispatched in each garment.

Oldham disavows kitsch, an almost inescapable epithet for his idiosyncratic talent, but his enthusiasm for naive crafts and his juxtapositions of good and highly uncertain taste encourage the description, however inadequate. Kitsch implies, however, no intervention or interpretation, only laconic appropriation. Oldham's aesthetic power is a willful perversity, a zest for twisting and changing the original source, whether kitsch or Mediterranean mosaic. His buttons are curious and quirky; his well-tailored suits are saved from conformity by their odd pockets; and his canny knowledge of fashion sources is saved from being scholastic by his whimsical juxtapositions.

For all of its personal taste, Oldham's fashion extends the tradition of Schiaparelli in its bold thematic development, delicate equilibrium between propriety and aesthetic anarchy, overt decoration, and annexation of related arts (including theater, film, and such street-inspired elements as using drag queen Billy Erb and the rock group B-52's Kate Pierson in his catwalk shows). Oldham's 1992 mirror dress pursued a Schiaparelli ideal, as does his preoccupation with the unexpected and seemingly autonomous pockets of suits.

Big-city, high-style savoir faire is key to Oldham's chic tongue in cheek, as it was for Schiaparelli. But Oldham's Texas roots and his family-based manufacturing give the work roots in the American Midwest as well as in the dry wit of capital cities. Born in Corpus Christi, Texas, in 1961, Oldham began his fashion business 20 years later, following a brief stint in alterations at the Polo/Ralph Lauren boutique in Dallas. He moved to New York in 1988 and started the women's shirt collections Times 7 at the time.

Spring 1992 headlines for Oldham as "Hot Toddy" in Women's Wear Daily (8 May 1992) and the "It" guy according to the New York Times (10 May 1992) might be the kiss of death for some designers, but Oldham possesses the characteristics of lasting, needed style, however outré or idiosyncratic it may seem. His persistent technical investigation—he was, for example, unique in experimenting with Lamontage as an apparel fabric—gives added meaning to his comment in the New York Times in 1991: "I haven't had any formal training, but that's worked to my advantage. People don't know what to expect." If cool whimsy is ever unexpected, so is the technology of the clothing endemic to Oldham's interest in the crafts. Likewise, his keen interest and perceptions in contemporary culture, beyond fashion, have provided him with a wealth of images for the work.

Oldham's aesthetic is bold and self-assured but far less transitory than it might initially seem. Oldham's creativity is in tune with fashion's constant striving to achieve ironic involvement in matters outside of dress and attempts, with irony, to understand the phenomena of clothing and contemporary life. A good example of his appeal was "Todd Time," irreverently goofy monthly segments filmed for MTV's House of Style, seen by nearly five million teens and young adults around the world. This exposure in turn led to Oldham directing a music video for jazzy hip-hop trio, US3.

In the late 1990s Oldham continued to branch out, this time in writing, with a book entitled Todd Oldham: Without Boundaries and into interior design by remodeling The Hotel, located on Miami's South Beach. The Hotel, formerly known as the Tiffany, is an old landmark given a glam new transformation thanks to Oldham. Glowing in chrome, blues, greens, and beiges, Oldham found the experience fun but not really challenging. He told Abby Bussel of Interior Design in January 1999, "I've been putting things on people for years, so putting things under people was no big deal." Everything used in renovation, including the furniture, tile, cabinetry, linens, and even bathrobes, were produced in Oldham's factory, which is overseen by his brother, Brad (Oldham also employs his father, mother, grandmother, and sister).

Of Oldham's literary career, Todd Oldham: Without Boundaries featured many of today's top fashion photographers capturing some of the world's most famous personalities—all wearing Oldham designs. His next book, Suits: The Clothes Make the Man, is an often hilarious account of two artists who spent a year touring the country wearing Oldham-designed suits. On the suits, they sold advertising space to fifty-six companies. The story is told through interviews, photos, and firsthand accounts.

Miles Socha, in an article in Women's Wear Daily, quoted Oldham from a speech he gave at Career Day at the Fashion Institute of Technology. Oldham talked of his decision to close the collection part of his business and focus on his line of Todd Oldham Jeans. "I elected to stop wholesaling my collection line because my heart wasn't in it anymore. I just didn't want to be part of $1200 blouses.... It was just not modern anymore." Oldham urged students to discover their own path. "The one thing we can really count on is change," he said. Oldham also told the students to "cultivate freethinking" and to be "singular in your vision," about what the market wants.

—Richard Martin; updated by Andrew Cunningham and Nelly Rhodes

ONG, Benny

Singaporean/British designer working in London

Born: Singapore, 1949 (one source says 1956); moved to London, 1968. Education: Graduated in fashion from St. Martin's School of Art, London. Career: Formed own company, Benny Ong Ltd., 1977; represented Britain in the Fashion Extravaganza in Milan, 1978; lectured in fashion at St. Martin's School of Art and Newcastle Polytechnic, England, 1979; introduced Private Label business designs for Austin Reed, London, 1983; launched Sunday and Ong by Benny Ong lines, 1988; produced private label designs for House of Fraser stores, 1988; created International Collection diffusion line, ONG, 1989; introduced third label, Bene, 1992; opened two Benny Ong boutiques in Singapore, 1992; guest lecturer to BA honors program fashion majors, Surrey Institute, 2001; also corporate uniform designer from 1986 with clients including BAA and British Telecom. Address: 3A Moreton Terrace, London SW1V 2NS, England.

PUBLICATIONS

On ONG:

Books

Mulvagh, Jane, Vogue History of Twentieth Century Fashion, London, 1988.

Articles

Hyde, Nina S., "No One Takes a Vacation Just to Shop," in the Washington Post, 17 April 1977.

Freedman, Lisa, and Barbara Griggs, "Secrets of Diana's Wardrobe," in the Sunday Express Magazine (London), 12 June 1983.

Theis, Tammy, "Wearing Linen to the Office? Here's a New Wrinkle for You," in the Dallas Morning News, 11 June 1986.

"Hot Fashion—Stolen Seat Belts—Causes Problems for Airline," in the AP Newswire, 29 June 2000.

"The Belgian Wave," in the AP Newswire, 22 January 2001.

"Benny Ong," available online at the Fashion Page, www.fashionz.co.uk, 20 August 2001.

"The Premier Collections," available online at the Fashion Page, www.fashionz.co.uk, 20 August 2001.

"Undergraduate Programmes," available online at the Surrey Institute, www.surrart.ac.uk, 20 August 2001.

* * *

Benny Ong is a designer of pretty, relaxed clothes that are charming and flattering to wear. Born in Singapore of Chinese descent, he moved to London in 1968 to study fashion design at St. Martin's School of Art. Today he retains his Singaporean connections with twice yearly visits that consolidate his successful design combination of Eastern philosophy with Western glamor.

He formed Benny Ong Ltd. in 1977 and presented a well-received debut collection quickly snapped up by two of London's top stores, Harrods and Selfridges. The collection set the tone for Ong's later work, with exquisite loose fitting, hand-sprayed silk chiffons, and jerseys. His successful debut year also saw Ong becoming a founding member of the prestigious London Designer Collections, which now represents the cream of British designers.

Expansion of the business has proved no problem, owing to the avid press interest and acclaim for the label since its inception. In addition to the designer range, the company began producing several diffusion lines for the middle price market. The first, in 1980, the International Collection, featured predominantly silk special occasion clothes; this was followed by Sunday, which presented less formal occasion clothes. The Ong by Benny Ong range was produced in 1988 and sells throughout Europe.

Lamontage as an apparel fabric—gives added meaning to his comment in the New York Times in 1991: "I haven't had any formal training, but that's worked to my advantage. People don't know what to expect." If cool whimsy is ever unexpected, so is the technology of the clothing endemic to Oldham's interest in the crafts. Likewise, his keen interest and perceptions in contemporary culture, beyond fashion, have provided him with a wealth of images for the work.

Oldham's aesthetic is bold and self-assured but far less transitory than it might initially seem. Oldham's creativity is in tune with fashion's constant striving to achieve ironic involvement in matters outside of dress and attempts, with irony, to understand the phenomena of clothing and contemporary life. A good example of his appeal was "Todd Time," irreverently goofy monthly segments filmed for MTV's House of Style, seen by nearly five million teens and young adults around the world. This exposure in turn led to Oldham directing a music video for jazzy hip-hop trio, US3.

In the late 1990s Oldham continued to branch out, this time in writing, with a book entitled Todd Oldham: Without Boundaries and into interior design by remodeling The Hotel, located on Miami's South Beach. The Hotel, formerly known as the Tiffany, is an old landmark given a glam new transformation thanks to Oldham. Glowing in chrome, blues, greens, and beiges, Oldham found the experience fun but not really challenging. He told Abby Bussel of Interior Design in January 1999, "I've been putting things on people for years, so putting things under people was no big deal." Everything used in renovation, including the furniture, tile, cabinetry, linens, and even bathrobes, were produced in Oldham's factory, which is overseen by his brother, Brad (Oldham also employs his father, mother, grandmother, and sister).

Of Oldham's literary career, Todd Oldham: Without Boundaries featured many of today's top fashion photographers capturing some of the world's most famous personalities—all wearing Oldham designs. His next book, Suits: The Clothes Make the Man, is an often hilarious account of two artists who spent a year touring the country wearing Oldham-designed suits. On the suits, they sold advertising space to fifty-six companies. The story is told through interviews, photos, and firsthand accounts.

Miles Socha, in an article in Women's Wear Daily, quoted Oldham from a speech he gave at Career Day at the Fashion Institute of Technology. Oldham talked of his decision to close the collection part of his business and focus on his line of Todd Oldham Jeans. "I elected to stop wholesaling my collection line because my heart wasn't in it anymore. I just didn't want to be part of $1200 blouses.... It was just not modern anymore." Oldham urged students to discover their own path. "The one thing we can really count on is change," he said. Oldham also told the students to "cultivate freethinking" and to be "singular in your vision," about what the market wants.

—Richard Martin; updated by Andrew Cunningham and Nelly Rhodes

ONG, Benny

Singaporean/British designer working in London

Born: Singapore, 1949 (one source says 1956); moved to London, 1968. Education: Graduated in fashion from St. Martin's School of Art, London. Career: Formed own company, Benny Ong Ltd., 1977; represented Britain in the Fashion Extravaganza in Milan, 1978; lectured in fashion at St. Martin's School of Art and Newcastle Polytechnic, England, 1979; introduced Private Label business designs for Austin Reed, London, 1983; launched Sunday and Ong by Benny Ong lines, 1988; produced private label designs for House of Fraser stores, 1988; created International Collection diffusion line, ONG, 1989; introduced third label, Bene, 1992; opened two Benny Ong boutiques in Singapore, 1992; guest lecturer to BA honors program fashion majors, Surrey Institute, 2001; also corporate uniform designer from 1986 with clients including BAA and British Telecom. Address: 3A Moreton Terrace, London SW1V 2NS, England.

PUBLICATIONS

On ONG:

Books

Mulvagh, Jane, Vogue History of Twentieth Century Fashion, London, 1988.

Articles

Hyde, Nina S., "No One Takes a Vacation Just to Shop," in the Washington Post, 17 April 1977.

Freedman, Lisa, and Barbara Griggs, "Secrets of Diana's Wardrobe," in the Sunday Express Magazine (London), 12 June 1983.

Theis, Tammy, "Wearing Linen to the Office? Here's a New Wrinkle for You," in the Dallas Morning News, 11 June 1986.

"Hot Fashion—Stolen Seat Belts—Causes Problems for Airline," in the AP Newswire, 29 June 2000.

"The Belgian Wave," in the AP Newswire, 22 January 2001.

"Benny Ong," available online at the Fashion Page, www.fashionz.co.uk, 20 August 2001.

"The Premier Collections," available online at the Fashion Page, www.fashionz.co.uk, 20 August 2001.

"Undergraduate Programmes," available online at the Surrey Institute, www.surrart.ac.uk, 20 August 2001.

* * *

Benny Ong is a designer of pretty, relaxed clothes that are charming and flattering to wear. Born in Singapore of Chinese descent, he moved to London in 1968 to study fashion design at St. Martin's School of Art. Today he retains his Singaporean connections with twice yearly visits that consolidate his successful design combination of Eastern philosophy with Western glamor.

He formed Benny Ong Ltd. in 1977 and presented a well-received debut collection quickly snapped up by two of London's top stores, Harrods and Selfridges. The collection set the tone for Ong's later work, with exquisite loose fitting, hand-sprayed silk chiffons, and jerseys. His successful debut year also saw Ong becoming a founding member of the prestigious London Designer Collections, which now represents the cream of British designers.

Expansion of the business has proved no problem, owing to the avid press interest and acclaim for the label since its inception. In addition to the designer range, the company began producing several diffusion lines for the middle price market. The first, in 1980, the International Collection, featured predominantly silk special occasion clothes; this was followed by Sunday, which presented less formal occasion clothes. The Ong by Benny Ong range was produced in 1988 and sells throughout Europe.

Fabrics for Ong are always classical, traditional, and stylish. As well as glamorous silk eveningwear fabrics, he has easy handkerchief linens, plain or in tiny checks; crisp white cottons and voiles for pretty, oversize shirts; or stonewashed crêpes for simple jackets. In 1983 the company began promotions for the European Silk Commission, with major fashion shows and wide coverage in international fashion magazines. Simple and graceful knitwear and cashmere ranges were added to the collection in 1985 and were immediately snapped up in huge quantities by the New York retailer Barneys.

Diana, the late Princess of Wales, was a frequent Ong customer. She commissioned dresses and suits for her first official visit to Australia in 1985. The exposure generated by having possibly the most prestigious customer in the UK led to an invitation to participate in a fashion show on the BBC television program Pebble Mill at One, that same year.

As well as producing ranges of clothes for the more glamorous end of the fashion market, Ong has worked on several corporate clothing commissions. In 1986 he was invited, along with five other eminent British designers, to tender for the British Airports Authority corporate clothing project. He won the contract, which led to further invitations to design for a new corporate clothing image for British Telecom and a prestigious clothing contract for the reopening of the internationally famous Raffles Hotel in Singapore.

Ong's other activities have included guest lecture programs in fashion design at St. Martin's College of Art and invitations to speak at various fashion forums for students and the trade, covering a range of topics from design to management. After the presentation of a first full fashion show to top buyers and press in 1979, his company further expanded into the private label business, designing a young and well-made range for Austin Reed in 1983 and branded merchandise for the designer section of the popular catalogue of Great Universal Stores, along with designers like Roland Klein, Jasper Conran, and Jean Muir. With colleagues Owen Gastor and Steve Stewart, in 2001, Ong guest lectured at the Surrey Institute to students in the BA honors program in fashion.

Ultimately, Benny Ong is best known for his eveningwear. He can handle beautiful fabrics in a sensitive and refined manner, producing conventional yet becoming garments for a wealthy clientèle.

—Kevin Almond; updated by Mary Ellen Snodgrass

OSTI, Massimo

See C.P. COMPANY

OZBEK, Rifat

British designer

Born: Istanbul, Turkey, 11 July 1953. Education: Studied architecture at Liverpool University, 1970–72; fashion design at St. Martin's School of Art, London, 1974–77. Military Service: National military service in Turkey, 1977. Career: Worked with Walter Albini for Trell, Milan, 1978–80; designer for Monsoon, London, 1980–84;

Rifat Ozbek, spring 2001 collection. © Fashion Syndicate Press.

established own firm, Ozbek, 1984; established second line, O, renamed Future Ozbek, 1987; production under licence by Aeffe SpA, Italy, from 1988; launched New Age collection, 1989; debuted Ozbek, signature fragrance, 1995; designed carpet for Christopher Farr, 1999. Exhibitions: Fellini: I Costumi e le Mode, Pecci Museum, Prato, Italy, and Stedelijk Museum, Amsterdam, both 1994; V&A: Street Style, From Sidewalk to Catwalk, 1940 to Tomorrow, 1994–95; Customised Levi's Denim Jacket for Benefit for Diffa/Dallas Collection, 1990, 1991, 1992. Awards: Woman Magazine Designer award, 1986; British Fashion Council Designer of the Year award, London, 1988, 1992; British Glamour award, 1989. Address: 18 Haunch of Venison Yard, London W1Y 1AF, England.

PUBLICATIONS

On OZBEK:

Books

Coleridge, Nicholas, The Fashion Conspiracy, London, 1988.
Stegemeyer, Anne, Who's Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.

Fabrics for Ong are always classical, traditional, and stylish. As well as glamorous silk eveningwear fabrics, he has easy handkerchief linens, plain or in tiny checks; crisp white cottons and voiles for pretty, oversize shirts; or stonewashed crêpes for simple jackets. In 1983 the company began promotions for the European Silk Commission, with major fashion shows and wide coverage in international fashion magazines. Simple and graceful knitwear and cashmere ranges were added to the collection in 1985 and were immediately snapped up in huge quantities by the New York retailer Barneys.

Diana, the late Princess of Wales, was a frequent Ong customer. She commissioned dresses and suits for her first official visit to Australia in 1985. The exposure generated by having possibly the most prestigious customer in the UK led to an invitation to participate in a fashion show on the BBC television program Pebble Mill at One, that same year.

As well as producing ranges of clothes for the more glamorous end of the fashion market, Ong has worked on several corporate clothing commissions. In 1986 he was invited, along with five other eminent British designers, to tender for the British Airports Authority corporate clothing project. He won the contract, which led to further invitations to design for a new corporate clothing image for British Telecom and a prestigious clothing contract for the reopening of the internationally famous Raffles Hotel in Singapore.

Ong's other activities have included guest lecture programs in fashion design at St. Martin's College of Art and invitations to speak at various fashion forums for students and the trade, covering a range of topics from design to management. After the presentation of a first full fashion show to top buyers and press in 1979, his company further expanded into the private label business, designing a young and well-made range for Austin Reed in 1983 and branded merchandise for the designer section of the popular catalogue of Great Universal Stores, along with designers like Roland Klein, Jasper Conran, and Jean Muir. With colleagues Owen Gastor and Steve Stewart, in 2001, Ong guest lectured at the Surrey Institute to students in the BA honors program in fashion.

Ultimately, Benny Ong is best known for his eveningwear. He can handle beautiful fabrics in a sensitive and refined manner, producing conventional yet becoming garments for a wealthy clientèle.

—Kevin Almond; updated by Mary Ellen Snodgrass

OSTI, Massimo

See C.P. COMPANY

OZBEK, Rifat

British designer

Born: Istanbul, Turkey, 11 July 1953. Education: Studied architecture at Liverpool University, 1970–72; fashion design at St. Martin's School of Art, London, 1974–77. Military Service: National military service in Turkey, 1977. Career: Worked with Walter Albini for Trell, Milan, 1978–80; designer for Monsoon, London, 1980–84;

Rifat Ozbek, spring 2001 collection. © Fashion Syndicate Press.

established own firm, Ozbek, 1984; established second line, O, renamed Future Ozbek, 1987; production under licence by Aeffe SpA, Italy, from 1988; launched New Age collection, 1989; debuted Ozbek, signature fragrance, 1995; designed carpet for Christopher Farr, 1999. Exhibitions: Fellini: I Costumi e le Mode, Pecci Museum, Prato, Italy, and Stedelijk Museum, Amsterdam, both 1994; V&A: Street Style, From Sidewalk to Catwalk, 1940 to Tomorrow, 1994–95; Customised Levi's Denim Jacket for Benefit for Diffa/Dallas Collection, 1990, 1991, 1992. Awards: Woman Magazine Designer award, 1986; British Fashion Council Designer of the Year award, London, 1988, 1992; British Glamour award, 1989. Address: 18 Haunch of Venison Yard, London W1Y 1AF, England.

PUBLICATIONS

On OZBEK:

Books

Coleridge, Nicholas, The Fashion Conspiracy, London, 1988.
Stegemeyer, Anne, Who's Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.

Rifat Ozbek, spring 2001 collection. © Fashion Syndicate Press.

Articles

- Brampton, Sally, "Wizard of Ozbek," in the Observer (London), 12 May 1985.
 Hoae, S., "Out of the Playpen," in the Observer, 23 March 1986.
 Thackara, J., "Hooked on Classics," in the Creative Review (London), June 1986.
 Etherington-Smith, Meredith, "Street Smart," in the Observer, 21 September 1986.
 "Designer of the Year," in DR: The Fashion Business (London), 15 October 1986.
 Jeal, Nicola, "The Wizard of Ozbek," in the Observer, 16 October 1986.
 "Designer of the Year: Rifat Ozbek," in Woman (London), 8 November 1986.
 Aitken, Lee, "Designer Rifat Ozbek, London's Young Turk, Dazzles the Rag Trade with a Theme for All Seasons," in People, 17 November 1986.
 Ducann, Charlotte, "The Designer Star: Rifat Ozbek," in Vogue (London), February 1987.
 "Rifat Ozbek," in the Sunday Times Magazine (London), 22 November 1987.
 "View: London's Young Turk," in Vogue, June 1988.

- Rumbold, Judy, "Ozbek Out on Top," in The Guardian, 11 October 1988.
 "Ozbek on Top," in DR: The Fashion Business, 15 October 1988.
 Jeal, Nicola, "The Wizard of Ozbek," in the Observer Magazine (London), 16 October 1988.
 "Rifat Ozbek," in Vogue (London), December 1988.
 Gross, Michael, "The Wizard of Ozbek," in New York, 23 January 1989.
 Campbell, Lisa, "Ozbek on the Fringe," in Vogue, January 1989.
 Jobey, Liza, "Rifat Madness," in Vanity Fair (London), February 1989.
 Brampton, Sally, "Aspects of Ozbek," in Elle (London), May 1989.
 Perry, Beverly, "The Rifat Ozbek Collection," in Marie Claire (London), July 1989.
 Bakjer, Caroline, "Beyond the Veil," in the Sunday Times Magazine (London), 26 November 1989.
 Reed, Paula, "Ozbek: The Movie," in Correspondent Magazine (London), 11 March 1990.
 "The Designers Talk Passion, Whimsy and Picassos," in ARTnews (New York), September 1990.
 Alderson, Maggie, "Rifat Ozbek's Hot Stuff," in Elle (New York), October 1990.
 Fallon, James, "Ozbek Will Show in Milan in October," WWD, 20 August 1991.
 Daspin, Eileen, "Rifat Ozbek, Milan's New Turk," in WWD, 16 October 1991.
 Orlean, Susan, "Breaking Away," in Vogue (New York), September 1992.
 Morris, Bernadine, "A Little Bit Exotic, But Soothingly So, the New York Times, 7 October 1992.
 Johnson, Marylin, "Copycat Chic: Military Look Takes Charge for Fall," in the Atlanta Journal & Constitution, 15 August 1993.
 McSweeney, Eve, "The Story of Ozbek," in Vogue UK, August 1993.
 Morris, Bernadine, "At Lacroix, Hollywood Meets Paris," in the New York Times, 7 March 1994.
 Reed, Paula, "The Sultan of Style," in the Sunday Times Magazine, 5 June 1994.
 "Paris...Milan: Prettiness Peeks Through in Lines for Spring '95," in the Atlanta Journal & Constitution, 16 October 1994.
 Middleton, William, and Godfrey Deeny, "Mugler Model Gambit Shreds Paris RTW Slate; Miffs Ozbek," WWD, 3 March 1995.
 "Schedule Changes Put End to Furor Over Thierry Mugler's Stealth Show," in WWD, 9 March 1995.
 "The Paris Collections—The Ideas of March: Rifat Ozbek," in WWD, 17 March 1995.
 Barone, Amy B., "Ozbek's Fragrance to Make London Debut," in WWD, 28 July 1995.
 Fallon, James, "Barney's Gets Ozbek Exclusive," in WWD, 17 November 1995.
 Spindler, Amy M., "Treating History with a Sense of Pride," in the New York Times, 17 March 1997.
 Everett, Rupert, "Rifat Ozbek," in Interview, July 1997.
 White, Constance C.R., "Finding the Sanctity in Magic," in the New York Times, 8 November 1997.
 "New York Globe Trotters," in WWD, 10 November 1997.
 "Dyed in the Wool," in Interior Design, July 1998.
 Theis, Tammy, "Sweater Weather," in the Dallas Morning News, 28 October 1998.
 "Shopping for Turkish Delights," in Travel Agent, 19 April 1999.
 "New York: A Delicate Balance," in WWD, 16 February 2001.

Klensch, Elsa, "The Turkish Touch: Ozbek's Sporty, Mystical Styles for Winter," available online at CNN.com, www.cnn.com, 20 August 2001.
"Rifat Ozbek," available online at Fashion Live, www.fashionlive.com, 20 August 2001.

*

My collections always have an element of ethnic and modern feeling.

—Rifat Ozbek

* * *

One of Britain's few truly international designers, Rifat Ozbek draws on London street style and his own Turkish origins to produce sophisticated clothes that successfully amalgamate diverse sources and keep him at the forefront of new developments in style. Ozbek restyles the classic shapes of Western couture, using multicultural decorative references like the traditional stitching of the djellaba and caftan to outline garments such as A-line linen dresses. He became renowned in the 1980s for a series of lavishly embroidered black cocktail suits that appeared with different themes each season, such as gold bows and tassels or Daliesque lips.

After leaving Turkey at the age of 17, Ozbek trained as an architect at Liverpool University, cutting his studies short after deciding he was more interested in decorating the surfaces of buildings than learning the methods of construction needed for his architectural projects to remain standing. This interest in the decoration of classic shapes, rather than breaking the barriers of garment construction, was expressed in his first clothing designs, which appeared in 1984.

Ozbek graduated from St. Martin's School of Art in 1977 and went on to work for three years at Monsoon, a company known for creating popular styles based on non-Western originals. Ozbek assimilated all these ideas and became known in the mid-1980s for his combinations of motifs and shapes from different cultures and juxtapositions of unusual fabrics, creating not just a straight pastiche of ethnicity but an arresting amalgamation of eclectic sources such as Africa, the Far East, ballet, and the Ottoman Empire.

At this time, his skillfully tailored clothes were fashioned out of luxurious fabrics like moiré silks and taffeta, with an amazing palette of colors of turquoise, purples, and fuchsia. His sophisticated and understated designs developed into an easily recognizable style, using heavy fabrics like gabardine or cashmere to structure the top half of an outfit combined with lighter materials below, like silks or jersey. This elegant look was supplanted by a more overtly sexy one in 1988, where the multicultural aesthetic was taken to new levels with the use of a diverse array of eclectic material. His confidence in dealing with a number of different non-Western sources was displayed in this significant collection, with garments showing their origins in Senegal, Tibet, and Afghanistan, an ethnic look made urbane for the fashion consumer. The collection included sarong skirts and gold chain belts, midriff tops, and boleros embroidered with crescent moons and stars, hipster trousers, and tasseled bras worn on the catwalk by models who resembled Turkish belly dancers.

In the 1990s Ozbek became more heavily influenced by the club scene, and his White Collection of 1990 caught the mood of the times. Acknowledging the New Age and Green consumerist tendencies of his audience, Ozbek created a range of easy-to-wear separates based on track suits and other sports clothing to be worn as club gear. This collection was in complete antithesis to the hard metropolitan chic of 1980s power dressing and paved the way for hooded sweatshirt tops and trainers appearing in the catwalk collections of other designers that year. The clothes were a stark bright white, displaying New Age slogans like "Nirvana." Unlike designers who have used white before, such as the "yé yé" designers of the 1960s who employed white to glorify science and technology, Ozbek used the color, without irony, to profess a faith in the concept of a New Age and a belief that a return to the spiritual would improve the quality of life and save the planet.

Antifashion soon became the fashionable look of the early 1990s. Casual, baggy clothes, making reference to sports and black youth subcultures, were worn with sequined money belts and baseball caps, and Ozbek was lauded as a designer in touch with the street. His popularity continued with the urban cowgirl look of fringed suede tops, hot pants, and North American Indian jewelry, his mock bone fronts on waistcoats and evening gowns, and the Confederate look incorporating tailed or cropped military jackets.

In 1995 Ozbek guarded his turf by inaugurating Ozbek, his signature women's fragrance manufactured in Milan by Proteo Parfumi. After three years of work developing the glamorous, heady blend of pittosporum with freesia, peach, and touches of jasmine and ylang ylang, he bottled it in an aluminum-topped flask reminiscent of a Turkish minaret and launched it in the U.S. exclusively at the Barneys chain in New York and Los Angeles. In England, he marketed Ozbek at Harrods, Liberty, and Selfridges. Of its appeal, he remarked, "I wanted something traditional yet modern... I wanted it to be quite floral, but not too strong. It's supposed to be very feminine and sensual." Paralleling his coup in the perfume market, Ozbek did not hesitate to clash publicly with Thierry Mugler for professional sabotage in block-booking such top models as Naomi Campbell and usurping Ozbek's space on the fashion calendar with an unscheduled showing.

Ozbek asserted his individualism in 1997, complaining that the era's design standards forced him to think of his hobby as a business. To old friend writer-interviewer Rupert Everett, who labeled Ozbek "an independent, an inventor, and an inveterate puncturer of pomposity," he said, "I still love designing, but it just moves too fast. Fashion has become sort of a relentless Ferris wheel, and you can't get off it—you know, it's one collection after the other."

Ozbek joined English stylist Christopher Farr's stable of carpet designers in 1998 and added vibrant prints reminiscent of Ottoman tile motifs to his clothing line. For city silhouettes, he stressed long romantic skirts mixed with energized, sporty jogging pants in Polartec fleece. He declared his exuberant, sensual chiffons, flocked velvet, devores, jerseys, and metallics a return to his Turkish roots.

—Caroline Cox; updated by Mary Ellen Snodgrass

P

PACKHAM, Jenny

British designer

Born: Southampton, England, 3 November 1965. Education: Studied at Southampton Art College, 1982–84; studied textile and fashion design at St. Martin's College of Art, London, 1984–88 (1st class honors). Career: Designer/director, Packham Anderson Ltd., from 1988. Exhibitions: London Designers Exhibition, 2001. Address: Zoomphase Ltd., The Imperial Works, 2nd Floor, Perren Street, London NW5 3ED England.

PUBLICATIONS

On PACKHAM:

Articles

Hepple, Keith, "Jenny Packham," in DR (London), September 1991. Yusuf, Nilgin, "Designer's Inspirations," in Joyce (Hong Kong), 1991 Holiday Issue.

Tait, James, "Don't Change a Thing, Carol," in the Sunday Mirror (London), 12 December 2000.

Dent, Grace, "Who the Nell Would Wear This?" in the Sunday Mirror (London), 8 July 2001.

* * *

British designer Jenny Packham's early training as a textile designer became an important influence on her later eveningwear. Her first collection of 12 short evening gowns was created entirely in black and white silk, with a bold print of musical instruments. The short evening dress continued to be the principal style in her collections, although full-length dresses were introduced in 1992. She also began designing wedding gowns in the 1990s.

Although the shapes of Packham's dresses remain essentially simple, their construction is complex and owes much to Christian Dior's designs of the 1950s, featuring intricate seaming, linings, and boning. Dress panels were lined with stiff organdy to create fullness, bodices had boned seams for a corseted effect, and full skirts were created with layer upon layer of stiff netting. A typical example of Packham's short evening dresses was a fitted torso, full skirt, and frou-frou neckline or short sleeves. Her theory that women want to look glamorous by night, with emphasis placed on the bustline and waist, has been a recurring feature of Packham's designs. She also placed an emphasis on comfort, which she believes is vital for eveningwear.

Although the styling of Packham's designs evolves gradually from one season to the next, the colors and textiles change dramatically. The designer acknowledges that eveningwear by tradition is less susceptible to major changes in fashion and thus unusual colors and fabric combinations play a central role in her designs. Packham often draws upon the works of famous artists, including Gaudi, Miro, and van Gogh, as inspiration for her use of color. Bold prints decorate the full skirts of her gowns, with designs based on such themes as harlequin checks, playing cards, and giant florals. Packham's use of rich fabrics and colors has been likened to that of Christian Lacroix, and costly fabrics such as embroidered brocades, silk taffetas, satins, and silk gazers have featured heavily in her collections.

Traditional styling married to contemporary prints and color combinations is the essence of Packham's design formula, and this theme is continued through to the Jenny Packham Sequel collection of less expensive dresses, which echo the shapes and colors of the main collection. Like the latter collection, Jenny Packham Sequel items are also produced in the United Kingdom by a small factory, supplemented by out-of-factory workers. The Sequel collection opened up a new market for her designs in the U.S., already one of her principal export markets, where her collection is sold through prestigious stores such as Neiman Marcus and Bergdorf Goodman. Packham's designs are favored by stars such as Sharon Stone, Shirley Bassey, and Nell McAndrew, the six-foot Amazon model who was the original face of Tomb Raider's Lara Croft. McAndrew showed up at the British premiere of Arnold Schwarzenegger's movie, The Sixth Day in a Packham creation.

Packham's success in the American market, where her collections are widely sold, proved her theory that there was a gap in the middle market for eveningwear which was sophisticated yet still youthful, and sexy in a humorous way. In the last six or so years, however, Packham has become best known for her wedding dress lines. Her Desire collection focuses on cut, shaping, attention to detail, and understated glamor. The white, shimmery dresses range from off-the-shoulder wrapped fronts to a meshed blouse look. Packham obviously designs these lovely dresses to make the bride feel special and comfortable, and they allow the bride to be enhanced rather than distracted while wearing her creations.

In October 2000, Packham was the guest designer for Evangeline Rose Exclusive Bridal Designs, and her creations have been carried by the best London couture houses (Harrods, Harvey Nichols, Selfridges, Debenhams), next to those of Mori Lee, Rena Koh, Katherine Jane, Sally Bee, and Lady Grace. She also created the Empire line of bridal dresses, including a stylish number called Kansas, a short-sleeved Empire-line dress with delicate beading around the neckline and a fine georgette overlay on the skirt. The Empire line also features organza and organza-and-rose skirts.

Highly active in England, France, Italy, and the U.S., Packham is represented by Flax PR, a public relations firm specializing in the design industry. Their client list includes not only Jenny Packham but also Agatha, Ballantyne, BHS, Fenn Wright Manson, Petit Bateau, Jane Packer, Katharine Hamnett, Land's End, Marilyn Moore, Toast, and Bridgewater.

—Catherine Woram; updated by Daryl F. Mallett

PARNIS, Mollie

American designer

Born: Sara Rosen Parnis, in Brooklyn, New York, 18 March 1902. Education: Briefly studied law, Hunter College, New York. Family: Married Leon Livingston (originally Levinson) in 1930. Career: After high school, worked in sales for a blouse manufacturer, then as stylist for David Westheim Company, New York, circa 1928–30; Parnis-Livingston ready-to-wear established, New York, 1933; launched own label, 1940s; boutique line added, 1970; Mollie Parnis Studio Collection ready-to-wear line added, 1979; firm closed, 1984; first loungewear collection, Mollie Parnis at Home, designed for Chevette, New York, 1985; Molly Parnis Livingston Foundation established, 1984. Died: 18 July 1992, in New York.

Mollie Parnis, 1955 collection. © Bettmann/CORBIS

PUBLICATIONS

On PARNIS:

Books

Levin, Phyllis Lee, The Wheels of Fashion, Garden City, New York, 1965.

Bender, Marylin, The Beautiful People, New York, 1967.

Morris, Bernadine, and Barbara Walz, The Fashion Makers, New York, 1978.

Diamonstein, Barbaralee, Fashion: The Inside Story, New York, 1985.

New York and Hollywood Fashion: Costume Designs from the Brooklyn Museum Collection, New York, 1986.

Milbank, Caroline Rennolds, New York Fashion: The Evolution of American Style, New York, 1989.

Fashion for America! Designs in the Fashion Institute of Technology, New York, Haslemere, Surrey, 1992.

Stegemeyer, Anne, Who's Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.

Articles

"It Can Happen to the President's Wife," in the New York Times, 1 April 1955.

"Blue-Green on the National Scene," in Life (New York), 25 April 1955.

"Molly Parnis," in Current Biography (New York), May 1956.

"Molly Parnis, Designer, Dies in Her Nineties," in the New York Times, 19 July 1992.

"A Woman of Many Modes: Mollie Parnis Dead at 93," in WWD, 20 July 1992.

"Died, Mollie Parnis," in Time (New York), 3 August 1992.

Friedman, Arthur, "Memories for Mollie Parnis," in WWD, 16 September 1992.

* * *

Mollie Parnis belongs to the first generation of American fashion designers to be known to the public by name rather than by affiliation to a department store. Her clothing became standard in the wardrobes of conservative businesswomen and socialites of the mid-20th century. Parnis herself was one of these women; she understood what women wanted to wear and what they required to appear appropriately dressed, yet feminine.

Parnis was a success in the fashion industry from the start. During her first job as a salesperson for a blouse manufacturer, she showed a keen interest in design details, as well as a good sense of what might sell. She was promoted to a design position with the firm in a short period of time. Her ability to determine what fashion would be successful served her throughout her career, spanning over 50 years in the industry. When she and her husband, Leon Livingston, started their own business just prior to World War II, the prospects for any new clothing wholesaler seemed dim. They knew, however, that one of the keys to success was specialization, so Parnis-Livingston limited its line to women's dresses and suits, which were immediately successful.

The look of Mollie Parnis clothes was conservative and classic. In the 1950s she was known for her shirtwaist dresses and suits in

Highly active in England, France, Italy, and the U.S., Packham is represented by Flax PR, a public relations firm specializing in the design industry. Their client list includes not only Jenny Packham but also Agatha, Ballantyne, BHS, Fenn Wright Manson, Petit Bateau, Jane Packer, Katharine Hamnett, Land's End, Marilyn Moore, Toast, and Bridgewater.

—Catherine Woram; updated by Daryl F. Mallett

PARNIS, Mollie

American designer

Born: Sara Rosen Parnis, in Brooklyn, New York, 18 March 1902. Education: Briefly studied law, Hunter College, New York. Family: Married Leon Livingston (originally Levinson) in 1930. Career: After high school, worked in sales for a blouse manufacturer, then as stylist for David Westheim Company, New York, circa 1928–30; Parnis-Livingston ready-to-wear established, New York, 1933; launched own label, 1940s; boutique line added, 1970; Mollie Parnis Studio Collection ready-to-wear line added, 1979; firm closed, 1984; first loungewear collection, Mollie Parnis at Home, designed for Chevette, New York, 1985; Molly Parnis Livingston Foundation established, 1984. Died: 18 July 1992, in New York.

Mollie Parnis, 1955 collection. © Bettmann/CORBIS

PUBLICATIONS

On PARNIS:

Books

Levin, Phyllis Lee, The Wheels of Fashion, Garden City, New York, 1965.

Bender, Marylin, The Beautiful People, New York, 1967.

Morris, Bernadine, and Barbara Walz, The Fashion Makers, New York, 1978.

Diamonstein, Barbaralee, Fashion: The Inside Story, New York, 1985.

New York and Hollywood Fashion: Costume Designs from the Brooklyn Museum Collection, New York, 1986.

Milbank, Caroline Rennolds, New York Fashion: The Evolution of American Style, New York, 1989.

Fashion for America! Designs in the Fashion Institute of Technology, New York, Haslemere, Surrey, 1992.

Stegemeyer, Anne, Who's Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.

Articles

"It Can Happen to the President's Wife," in the New York Times, 1 April 1955.

"Blue-Green on the National Scene," in Life (New York), 25 April 1955.

"Molly Parnis," in Current Biography (New York), May 1956.

"Molly Parnis, Designer, Dies in Her Nineties," in the New York Times, 19 July 1992.

"A Woman of Many Modes: Mollie Parnis Dead at 93," in WWD, 20 July 1992.

"Died, Mollie Parnis," in Time (New York), 3 August 1992.

Friedman, Arthur, "Memories for Mollie Parnis," in WWD, 16 September 1992.

* * *

Mollie Parnis belongs to the first generation of American fashion designers to be known to the public by name rather than by affiliation to a department store. Her clothing became standard in the wardrobes of conservative businesswomen and socialites of the mid-20th century. Parnis herself was one of these women; she understood what women wanted to wear and what they required to appear appropriately dressed, yet feminine.

Parnis was a success in the fashion industry from the start. During her first job as a salesperson for a blouse manufacturer, she showed a keen interest in design details, as well as a good sense of what might sell. She was promoted to a design position with the firm in a short period of time. Her ability to determine what fashion would be successful served her throughout her career, spanning over 50 years in the industry. When she and her husband, Leon Livingston, started their own business just prior to World War II, the prospects for any new clothing wholesaler seemed dim. They knew, however, that one of the keys to success was specialization, so Parnis-Livingston limited its line to women's dresses and suits, which were immediately successful.

The look of Mollie Parnis clothes was conservative and classic. In the 1950s she was known for her shirtwaist dresses and suits in luxurious-looking fabrics that spanned seasons and made the transition from office to dinner. She also employed whimsical, all-American combinations such as menswear wool with silk fringe in some of her evening dresses. Though not always a design innovator, she was a consistent provider of well-made, highly wearable clothes. She interpreted the contemporary silhouette with her conservative good taste and her sensibility to the busy American woman's desires and needs.

United States First Ladies, from Mamie Eisenhower to Rosalyn Carter, were Parnis customers. One dress in particular received national attention in April 1955 when Mrs. Eisenhower arrived at a Washington reception wearing a Mollie Parnis shirtwaist of blue and green printed taffeta, only to be greeted by another woman in the same dress. Parnis expressed her embarrassment over the situation, but explained to the New York Times in April 1995: "I do not sell directly to any wearer, nor do I usually make one of a kind; that is what makes this country a great democracy. But I do feel that the First Lady should have something special." There had been minor variations made to Mrs. Eisenhower's dress alone, but approximately 90 dresses of the similar style were shipped to U.S. stores.

Though other designers were hired by the firm eventually, Parnis remained the originator of themes and ideas, and the final editor of her design staff's creations. Eleanor Lambert described her as having "an architect's eye for proportion" and the ability to endow mass-produced clothing with a custom-made look. Like many designers who were successful in the long run, she avoided trendy looks in the service of her customers who came to expect fashionable clothing that would last for more than one season. Mollie Parnis used her own life as inspiration and guide for her work. She stated her design philosophy in Barbaralee Diamonstein's Fashion: The Inside Story (1985): "Being a designer is being a personality. It's creating a look you like, that your friends like, that belongs to the life that you know."

Parnis' life exemplified the successful and civic-minded businesswoman in New York. In addition to her career as an award-winning fashion designer, she founded several philanthropic organizations. Through her design work and her membership in such organizations as the Council of Fashion Designers of America, she played a role in the promotion and success of the American fashion industry.

—Melinda L. Watt

PARRISH, Maxfield

See MAXFIELD PARRISH

PATOU, Jean

See JEAN PATOU

PAULIN, Guy

French designer

Born: Lorraine, France in 1946. Career: Freelance designer for Prisunic, Jimper, Dorothée Bis, Paraphernalia, Mic Mac, Byblos, and others, prior to establishing own house, 1970s–84, and 1986–89; designer, Chloé, 1984–86; designer, Tiktiner, 1990. Died: June 1990, in Paris.

PUBLICATIONS

On PAULIN:

Articles

"Designer Guy Paulin Dies in Paris at Age 44," in WWD, 15 June 1990.

"Guy Paulin, Fashion Designer," [obituary], in Chicago Tribune, 17 June 1990.

* * *

Guy Paulin began his career as a freelance designer of women's ready-to-wear in Paris. Though he had no formal training he was hired as a design assistant to Jacqueline Jacobson at Dorothée Bis, where he first worked with knits. He then signed a contract with Paraphernalia, a chain of franchised stores in New York, where he rubbed shoulders with other young designers of the time, including Mary Quant, Betsey Johnson, Emmanuelle Khanh, and Lison Bonfils.

A shy, quick-witted conversationalist and lover of 1950s American Abstract Expressionist paintings, Paulin believed fashion to be part of life, an essential component of the French l'art de vivre. He claimed to be most inspired by Katherine Hepburn—a mature, free-spirited soul who eschewed fashion trends and projected her own sense of personal style, and his clothing designs were often acclaimed for their gentle and unpretentious lines, reminiscent of classic American sportswear.

On returning to Paris after his New York sojourn, Paulin received an enthusiastic press response for the simple, feminine clothes he designed for various clients. He worked for the next two decades in France and Italy, designing for Bercher, Biga, P. Blume, Byblos, Sport Max for Max Mara, Mic-Mac, PEP, and Rodier. Before establishing his own business, he was known to juggle as many as thirteen different ready-to-wear collections, designed anonymously, in a single season. His designs were marked by simplicity of line, softness of color, and ease of movement—from loose sportswear separates to classic suits and cocktail dresses.

In 1984 Paulin succeeded Karl Lagerfeld as director of design at Chloé, claiming this appointment was "a dream." At Chloé he adapted his unerring fashion sense into a look he called "as French as French cuisine—an image of a young couture, of ready-to-wear with the finesse of couture but with a very young spirit behind it." But his casual, relaxed, and individualistic styles were not completely welcomed by Chloé's tradition-minded customers, and he resigned after overseeing only a few collections.

The disappointment he experienced at Chloé did not deter Paulin—between 1985 and 1990 he created S.A. Guy Paulin design studio, the principal clients being Byblos and Mic-Mac; took back the direction of his own house and signed two licensing contracts with the groups Kanematsu Gosho and Yoshida, establishing himself in Japan; and signed on as part-time artistic director of Tiktiner, a French ready-to-wear manufacturer. During this period he designed a range of classic luxurious-looking fabrics that spanned seasons and made the transition from office to dinner. She also employed whimsical, all-American combinations such as menswear wool with silk fringe in some of her evening dresses. Though not always a design innovator, she was a consistent provider of well-made, highly wearable clothes. She interpreted the contemporary silhouette with her conservative good taste and her sensibility to the busy American woman's desires and needs.

United States First Ladies, from Mamie Eisenhower to Rosalyn Carter, were Parnis customers. One dress in particular received national attention in April 1955 when Mrs. Eisenhower arrived at a Washington reception wearing a Mollie Parnis shirtwaist of blue and green printed taffeta, only to be greeted by another woman in the same dress. Parnis expressed her embarrassment over the situation, but explained to the New York Times in April 1995: "I do not sell directly to any wearer, nor do I usually make one of a kind; that is what makes this country a great democracy. But I do feel that the First Lady should have something special." There had been minor variations made to Mrs. Eisenhower's dress alone, but approximately 90 dresses of the similar style were shipped to U.S. stores.

Though other designers were hired by the firm eventually, Parnis remained the originator of themes and ideas, and the final editor of her design staff's creations. Eleanor Lambert described her as having "an architect's eye for proportion" and the ability to endow mass-produced clothing with a custom-made look. Like many designers who were successful in the long run, she avoided trendy looks in the service of her customers who came to expect fashionable clothing that would last for more than one season. Mollie Parnis used her own life as inspiration and guide for her work. She stated her design philosophy in Barbaralee Diamonstein's Fashion: The Inside Story (1985): "Being a designer is being a personality. It's creating a look you like, that your friends like, that belongs to the life that you know."

Parnis' life exemplified the successful and civic-minded businesswoman in New York. In addition to her career as an award-winning fashion designer, she founded several philanthropic organizations. Through her design work and her membership in such organizations as the Council of Fashion Designers of America, she played a role in the promotion and success of the American fashion industry.

—Melinda L. Watt

PARRISH, Maxfield

See MAXFIELD PARRISH

PATOU, Jean

See JEAN PATOU

PAULIN, Guy

French designer

Born: Lorraine, France in 1946. Career: Freelance designer for Prisunic, Jimper, Dorothée Bis, Paraphernalia, Mic Mac, Byblos, and others, prior to establishing own house, 1970s–84, and 1986–89; designer, Chloé, 1984–86; designer, Tiktiner, 1990. Died: June 1990, in Paris.

PUBLICATIONS

On PAULIN:

Articles

"Designer Guy Paulin Dies in Paris at Age 44," in WWD, 15 June 1990.

"Guy Paulin, Fashion Designer," [obituary], in Chicago Tribune, 17 June 1990.

* * *

Guy Paulin began his career as a freelance designer of women's ready-to-wear in Paris. Though he had no formal training he was hired as a design assistant to Jacqueline Jacobson at Dorothée Bis, where he first worked with knits. He then signed a contract with Paraphernalia, a chain of franchised stores in New York, where he rubbed shoulders with other young designers of the time, including Mary Quant, Betsey Johnson, Emmanuelle Khanh, and Lison Bonfils.

A shy, quick-witted conversationalist and lover of 1950s American Abstract Expressionist paintings, Paulin believed fashion to be part of life, an essential component of the French l'art de vivre. He claimed to be most inspired by Katherine Hepburn—a mature, free-spirited soul who eschewed fashion trends and projected her own sense of personal style, and his clothing designs were often acclaimed for their gentle and unpretentious lines, reminiscent of classic American sportswear.

On returning to Paris after his New York sojourn, Paulin received an enthusiastic press response for the simple, feminine clothes he designed for various clients. He worked for the next two decades in France and Italy, designing for Bercher, Biga, P. Blume, Byblos, Sport Max for Max Mara, Mic-Mac, PEP, and Rodier. Before establishing his own business, he was known to juggle as many as thirteen different ready-to-wear collections, designed anonymously, in a single season. His designs were marked by simplicity of line, softness of color, and ease of movement—from loose sportswear separates to classic suits and cocktail dresses.

In 1984 Paulin succeeded Karl Lagerfeld as director of design at Chloé, claiming this appointment was "a dream." At Chloé he adapted his unerring fashion sense into a look he called "as French as French cuisine—an image of a young couture, of ready-to-wear with the finesse of couture but with a very young spirit behind it." But his casual, relaxed, and individualistic styles were not completely welcomed by Chloé's tradition-minded customers, and he resigned after overseeing only a few collections.

The disappointment he experienced at Chloé did not deter Paulin—between 1985 and 1990 he created S.A. Guy Paulin design studio, the principal clients being Byblos and Mic-Mac; took back the direction of his own house and signed two licensing contracts with the groups Kanematsu Gosho and Yoshida, establishing himself in Japan; and signed on as part-time artistic director of Tiktiner, a French ready-to-wear manufacturer. During this period he designed a range of classic garments, including clingy knit dresses, feminine pinstriped suits, pretty floral 18th-century-inspired dresses, and simple one- and two-piece swimsuits. His clothes never strove for shock value, but remained reserved and feminine, with only the occasional theatrical accessory for emphasis, such as a “waistcoat” of multicolored cords draped across the breasts, or an oversized fringed straw hat.

Though not strictly an avant garde designer, Paulin considered himself one of a creative generation of creators including Thierry Mugler, Claude Montana, and the younger Jean-Paul Gaultier. Towards the end of his career he was investigating retro looks, such as 1940s-inspired tweed suits and neo-Baroque velvet gowns strewn with embroidery. His death in 1990 at the young age of 44 prompted waves of regret among his peers at the loss of such a talented, industrious, and benevolent designer and colleague.

—Kathleen Paton

PEDLAR, Sylvia

American designer

Born: Sylvia Schlang in New York, 1901. Education: Studied art and fashion illustration, Cooper Union school, and at the Art Students League, New York. Family: Married William A. Pedlar. Career: Founder/designer, Iris Lingerie, 1929–70 (business closed in 1970). Awards: Coty American Fashion Critics award, 1951, 1964; Neiman Marcus award, 1960. Died: 26 February 1972, in New York.

PUBLICATIONS

On PEDLAR:

Books

Lambert, Eleanor, World of Fashion: People, Places, Resources, New York, London, 1976.

The Undercover Story [exhibition catalogue], Fashion Institute of Technology, New York, 1982.

Stegemeyer, Anne, Who's Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.

Articles

Bender, Marylin, “Lingerie Can Be Sensibly Elegant,” in the New York Times, 17 December 1963.

* * *

For 41 years American women relied on Sylvia Pedlar for sleep and loungewear to suit their every mood. Fine fabrics, careful workmanship, and imaginative styling distinguished the Pedlar gown. Some of her designs were based on traditional favorites; others were strikingly original, sometimes pleasingly provocative, but always in good taste.

Pedlar designed to suit many scenarios. She understood a woman might prefer to dress in a certain way for the street, yet play a wider variety of roles in the privacy of her own home. She saw no reason why a wardrobe for sleeping should not be as versatile as one for day.

Pedlar was the cofounder and designer of Iris Lingerie, from its inception in 1929 until she closed the business in 1970. In all that time, according to Marylin Bender, writing in the New York Times in December 1963, the company employed no salesmen and bought no paid advertising. The product spoke for itself. Pedlar was said to have created the baby-doll look, a phrase she disliked and did not use herself, as a response to the wartime fabric shortages of 1942. She interpreted the classic flannel Mother Hubbard nightgown in sheer cotton batiste, giving it a more sophisticated, bateau neckline and open, flowing sleeves. Deep borders of Cluny lace finished the neck, sleeves, and hem.

For women who preferred to sleep in the nude, Pedlar offered the “bedside toga,” a column of crêpe slit entirely up one side which fastened with a single tie at the shoulder and one at the waist. Originally designed as a novelty item for friends, the bedside toga was photographed for the cover of Life magazine in 1962 and became a bestseller. Although she was trained as an illustrator, Pedlar preferred draping directly to sketching her ideas. Many of her designs relied on simple, bias cut shapes with a minimum of seaming, cut from solid shades of crêpe or chiffon. A trio of Iris gowns from the mid-1960s pictured in The Undercover Story, the catalogue for an exhibition held in 1982–83 at the Fashion Institute of Technology, New York, and the Kyoto Costume Institute in Japan illustrate Pedlar’s gift as a cutter. An asymmetrical layered gown in turquoise georgette both conceals and reveals; an off-white one shouldered gown in crêpe charmeuse evokes the prewar years with its diaper hem and bias cut. A pair of coral lounging pajamas have trousers cut wide like a dhoti. Each is as wearable today as when they were first produced.

A winner of two Coty awards, Pedlar was cited by the American Fashion Critics committee for “her talent in combining luxury, beauty, and femininity with modern fabric developments and contemporary silhouettes.”

—Whitney Blausen

PEPE

British jeans/casualwear manufacturer

Founded: Pepe brand jeans began on London’s Portobello Road market. Company History: Lines have included Basic, BSCO, Hardcore, Buffalo, and Tommy Hilfiger labels; Pepe Group Plc. bought by SEL International Investments Corp. (in turn owned by Apparel International Holdings Ltd., the parent company of Tommy Hilfiger), 1993; entered U.S. market with Pepe Jeans USA, 1993; acquired license for new Tommy Hilfiger line of jeans, 1995; separate units for women’s and men’s Hilfiger jeans formed, 1996; signed deal to distribute Tommy Hilfiger lines in Europe, 1997; signed licensing agreement with Keystone Industries, 1997; Pepe Jeans USA unit sold to Tommy Hilfiger Corp., 1998; opened first U.S. Pepe garments, including clingy knit dresses, feminine pinstriped suits, pretty floral 18th-century-inspired dresses, and simple one- and two-piece swimsuits. His clothes never strove for shock value, but remained reserved and feminine, with only the occasional theatrical accessory for emphasis, such as a “waistcoat” of multicolored cords draped across the breasts, or an oversized fringed straw hat.

Though not strictly an avant garde designer, Paulin considered himself one of a creative generation of creators including Thierry Mugler, Claude Montana, and the younger Jean-Paul Gaultier. Towards the end of his career he was investigating retro looks, such as 1940s-inspired tweed suits and neo-Baroque velvet gowns strewn with embroidery. His death in 1990 at the young age of 44 prompted waves of regret among his peers at the loss of such a talented, industrious, and benevolent designer and colleague.

—Kathleen Paton

PEDLAR, Sylvia

American designer

Born: Sylvia Schlang in New York, 1901. Education: Studied art and fashion illustration, Cooper Union school, and at the Art Students League, New York. Family: Married William A. Pedlar. Career: Founder/designer, Iris Lingerie, 1929–70 (business closed in 1970). Awards: Coty American Fashion Critics award, 1951, 1964; Neiman Marcus award, 1960. Died: 26 February 1972, in New York.

PUBLICATIONS

On PEDLAR:

Books

Lambert, Eleanor, World of Fashion: People, Places, Resources, New York, London, 1976.

The Undercover Story [exhibition catalogue], Fashion Institute of Technology, New York, 1982.

Stegemeyer, Anne, Who's Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.

Articles

Bender, Marylin, “Lingerie Can Be Sensibly Elegant,” in the New York Times, 17 December 1963.

* * *

For 41 years American women relied on Sylvia Pedlar for sleep and loungewear to suit their every mood. Fine fabrics, careful workmanship, and imaginative styling distinguished the Pedlar gown. Some of her designs were based on traditional favorites; others were strikingly original, sometimes pleasingly provocative, but always in good taste.

Pedlar designed to suit many scenarios. She understood a woman might prefer to dress in a certain way for the street, yet play a wider variety of roles in the privacy of her own home. She saw no reason why a wardrobe for sleeping should not be as versatile as one for day.

Pedlar was the cofounder and designer of Iris Lingerie, from its inception in 1929 until she closed the business in 1970. In all that time, according to Marylin Bender, writing in the New York Times in December 1963, the company employed no salesmen and bought no paid advertising. The product spoke for itself. Pedlar was said to have created the baby-doll look, a phrase she disliked and did not use herself, as a response to the wartime fabric shortages of 1942. She interpreted the classic flannel Mother Hubbard nightgown in sheer cotton batiste, giving it a more sophisticated, bateau neckline and open, flowing sleeves. Deep borders of Cluny lace finished the neck, sleeves, and hem.

For women who preferred to sleep in the nude, Pedlar offered the “bedside toga,” a column of crêpe slit entirely up one side which fastened with a single tie at the shoulder and one at the waist. Originally designed as a novelty item for friends, the bedside toga was photographed for the cover of Life magazine in 1962 and became a bestseller. Although she was trained as an illustrator, Pedlar preferred draping directly to sketching her ideas. Many of her designs relied on simple, bias cut shapes with a minimum of seaming, cut from solid shades of crêpe or chiffon. A trio of Iris gowns from the mid-1960s pictured in The Undercover Story, the catalogue for an exhibition held in 1982–83 at the Fashion Institute of Technology, New York, and the Kyoto Costume Institute in Japan illustrate Pedlar’s gift as a cutter. An asymmetrical layered gown in turquoise georgette both conceals and reveals; an off-white one shouldered gown in crêpe charmeuse evokes the prewar years with its diaper hem and bias cut. A pair of coral lounging pajamas have trousers cut wide like a dhoti. Each is as wearable today as when they were first produced.

A winner of two Coty awards, Pedlar was cited by the American Fashion Critics committee for “her talent in combining luxury, beauty, and femininity with modern fabric developments and contemporary silhouettes.”

—Whitney Blausen

PEPE

British jeans/casualwear manufacturer

Founded: Pepe brand jeans began on London’s Portobello Road market. Company History: Lines have included Basic, BSCO, Hardcore, Buffalo, and Tommy Hilfiger labels; Pepe Group Plc. bought by SEL International Investments Corp. (in turn owned by Apparel International Holdings Ltd., the parent company of Tommy Hilfiger), 1993; entered U.S. market with Pepe Jeans USA, 1993; acquired license for new Tommy Hilfiger line of jeans, 1995; separate units for women’s and men’s Hilfiger jeans formed, 1996; signed deal to distribute Tommy Hilfiger lines in Europe, 1997; signed licensing agreement with Keystone Industries, 1997; Pepe Jeans USA unit sold to Tommy Hilfiger Corp., 1998; opened first U.S. Pepe garments, including clingy knit dresses, feminine pinstriped suits, pretty floral 18th-century-inspired dresses, and simple one- and two-piece swimsuits. His clothes never strove for shock value, but remained reserved and feminine, with only the occasional theatrical accessory for emphasis, such as a “waistcoat” of multicolored cords draped across the breasts, or an oversized fringed straw hat.

Though not strictly an avant garde designer, Paulin considered himself one of a creative generation of creators including Thierry Mugler, Claude Montana, and the younger Jean-Paul Gaultier. Towards the end of his career he was investigating retro looks, such as 1940s-inspired tweed suits and neo-Baroque velvet gowns strewn with embroidery. His death in 1990 at the young age of 44 prompted waves of regret among his peers at the loss of such a talented, industrious, and benevolent designer and colleague.

—Kathleen Paton

PEDLAR, Sylvia

American designer

Born: Sylvia Schlang in New York, 1901. Education: Studied art and fashion illustration, Cooper Union school, and at the Art Students League, New York. Family: Married William A. Pedlar. Career: Founder/designer, Iris Lingerie, 1929–70 (business closed in 1970). Awards: Coty American Fashion Critics award, 1951, 1964; Neiman Marcus award, 1960. Died: 26 February 1972, in New York.

PUBLICATIONS

On PEDLAR:

Books

Lambert, Eleanor, World of Fashion: People, Places, Resources, New York, London, 1976.

The Undercover Story [exhibition catalogue], Fashion Institute of Technology, New York, 1982.

Stegemeyer, Anne, Who's Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.

Articles

Bender, Marylin, “Lingerie Can Be Sensibly Elegant,” in the New York Times, 17 December 1963.

* * *

For 41 years American women relied on Sylvia Pedlar for sleep and loungewear to suit their every mood. Fine fabrics, careful workmanship, and imaginative styling distinguished the Pedlar gown. Some of her designs were based on traditional favorites; others were strikingly original, sometimes pleasingly provocative, but always in good taste.

Pedlar designed to suit many scenarios. She understood a woman might prefer to dress in a certain way for the street, yet play a wider variety of roles in the privacy of her own home. She saw no reason why a wardrobe for sleeping should not be as versatile as one for day.

Pedlar was the cofounder and designer of Iris Lingerie, from its inception in 1929 until she closed the business in 1970. In all that time, according to Marylin Bender, writing in the New York Times in December 1963, the company employed no salesmen and bought no paid advertising. The product spoke for itself. Pedlar was said to have created the baby-doll look, a phrase she disliked and did not use herself, as a response to the wartime fabric shortages of 1942. She interpreted the classic flannel Mother Hubbard nightgown in sheer cotton batiste, giving it a more sophisticated, bateau neckline and open, flowing sleeves. Deep borders of Cluny lace finished the neck, sleeves, and hem.

For women who preferred to sleep in the nude, Pedlar offered the “bedside toga,” a column of crêpe slit entirely up one side which fastened with a single tie at the shoulder and one at the waist. Originally designed as a novelty item for friends, the bedside toga was photographed for the cover of Life magazine in 1962 and became a bestseller. Although she was trained as an illustrator, Pedlar preferred draping directly to sketching her ideas. Many of her designs relied on simple, bias cut shapes with a minimum of seaming, cut from solid shades of crêpe or chiffon. A trio of Iris gowns from the mid-1960s pictured in The Undercover Story, the catalogue for an exhibition held in 1982–83 at the Fashion Institute of Technology, New York, and the Kyoto Costume Institute in Japan illustrate Pedlar’s gift as a cutter. An asymmetrical layered gown in turquoise georgette both conceals and reveals; an off-white one shouldered gown in crêpe charmeuse evokes the prewar years with its diaper hem and bias cut. A pair of coral lounging pajamas have trousers cut wide like a dhoti. Each is as wearable today as when they were first produced.

A winner of two Coty awards, Pedlar was cited by the American Fashion Critics committee for “her talent in combining luxury, beauty, and femininity with modern fabric developments and contemporary silhouettes.”

—Whitney Blausen

PEPE

British jeans/casualwear manufacturer

Founded: Pepe brand jeans began on London’s Portobello Road market. Company History: Lines have included Basic, BSCO, Hardcore, Buffalo, and Tommy Hilfiger labels; Pepe Group Plc. bought by SEL International Investments Corp. (in turn owned by Apparel International Holdings Ltd., the parent company of Tommy Hilfiger), 1993; entered U.S. market with Pepe Jeans USA, 1993; acquired license for new Tommy Hilfiger line of jeans, 1995; separate units for women’s and men’s Hilfiger jeans formed, 1996; signed deal to distribute Tommy Hilfiger lines in Europe, 1997; signed licensing agreement with Keystone Industries, 1997; Pepe Jeans USA unit sold to Tommy Hilfiger Corp., 1998; opened first U.S. Pepe stores, 2001. Company Address: Pepe House, 11 Lower Square, Old Isleworth-on-Thames, Middlesex TW7 6HN, UK. Company Websites: www.pepejeans.com.

PUBLICATIONS

On PEPE:

Articles

- Lippert, Barbara, "Clean Jeans, Dirty War," in the Chicago Tribune, 16 December 1988.
- Wall Street Journal*, (New York), 10 April 1989.
- Bidlake, Suzanne, "Pepe Strides Upmarket with Branding U-Turn," in Marketing, 11 April 1991.
- Fallon, James, "Maurice Marciano Seeks Interest in Pepe Group," in DNR, 6 January 1993.
- _____, "Restructuring Done, Pepe Group is Set to Go," in WWD, 3 February 1993.
- Gordon, Maryellen, "New Owners, New Power for Pepe," in WWD, 10 February 1993.
- Ozzard, Janet, "Margolis Cuts a New Pattern at Pepe," in WWD, 19 January 1994.
- Walsh, Peter, "Margolis Joins Hilfiger as Vice-Chairman, President; Succeeded at Pepe by Lewis," in DNR, 10 March 1994.
- Lockwood, Lisa, "More Suitors Seen Pitching for CK Jeans," in WWD, 14 April 1994.
- Moore, M. H., "Pepe Jeans May Be Loose, Seeking Fit," in Adweek, 22 August 1994.
- Ozzard, Janet, "Pepe's New Fashion Flavor," in WWD, 1 February 1996.
- "Pepe Forms Two Units for Hilfiger Lines," in WWD, 5 December 1996.
- Socha, Miles, "Tommy Taking Department Store Jeans Biz by Storm," in DNR, 8 September 1997.
- "Hilfiger Holders Okay Pepe Jeans USA Deal," in DNR, 6 May 1998.
- Caplan, David Grant, "Pepe Jeans to Launch Stores," in WWD, 19 April 2001.

* * *

In the notoriously competitive denim sales market, Pepe has been able to maintain its profile as much through witty and eclectic marketing as through design details. The company and its various casualwear lines have carved a niche by concentrating on prompting a contemporary, directional image which has enabled them to establish an identity distinct from the nostalgia-led promotional strategy of many jeans companies.

A potent mix of references has marked out Pepe and its sister ranges as fashionable and different. The attention to detailing, with double stitched seams and copper rivets, so important to serious denim wearers, has underpinned their success and enabled Pepe to prosper. The range of different denims it produces has also been significant; the firm has maintained a reputation for quality, both in its staple Basic line, which established Pepe's classic straight-cut shapes for jeans and jackets, and its production of a changing array of washes and dyes to pick up on current fashion trends for its other lines.

Having started life in London's Portobello Road market, Pepe has always had an affinity with street fashion and urban life, and it is this ability to chime in with the Zeitgeist that brought them to the fore in the 1980s. After the dip in denim's popularity at the start of the decade, the slick advertising of the market leader, Levi Strauss, dominated by retro 1950s cool, sent jeans sales rocketing, partly triggered by the obsession with so-called design classics and media hype. If Pepe was lacking the long history of the main American labels, it certainly made up for it with its originality of approach.

Pepe recognized its own strengths as a British-based name and employed strong, innovative advertising to promote its ranges. The company understood that it was just as important to generate an aura of streetwise cool about its product, as to keep up with trends in fabric washes and design details. From 1986 Pepe sidestepped the traditional American imagery associated with jeans and produced a series of ads which ultimately led to an almost complete brand awareness by the end of the decade. Pepe's advertising achieved cult status; two of its most successful campaigns produced a soundtrack of contemporary music fitted together with well-known club images for the usually-resistant younger market. The "Wears Pepe" series cut images of avant-garde nightclub figure Leigh Bowery with shots of natural-looking models in Pepe denims and increased Pepe's status as a company which could both encapsulate and define the times.

Along with the memorable "Raindance" advertising, which also brought together maverick elements, looking more like a clip from a film than a piece of marketing, and "Laughter," which simply showed a group of people smiling and talking in a park in Pepe clothes, the company created a precedent. Pepe had recognized a crucial element of the 1990s youth market, seeing that the video generation was not taken in by straightforward name-plugging, but wanted to feel in on the joke, as though they were part of the street culture which Pepe represented.

Pepe has defined its role within the denim market and built on its strengths by clever advertising and an empathy with street fashion. If never quite in the same league as the biggest names in denim, it chose to strike out in a different direction, leaning on the contemporary rather than exploiting its own history to promote its ideals, such as the now legendary SoulHole parties. This approach has since been mimicked by other British casualwear names, but never with Pepe's originality and quality of research, in marketing or design.

From the early 1990s, Pepe became inextricably linked with Tommy Hilfiger, when it was bought by SEL International Investments Corp., which in turn was owned by Apparel International Holdings Ltd., the corporate parent of Hilfiger. Then Pepe Jeans USA secured the license for the new Tommy Jeans line, which debuted amidst much fanfare. The momentum of Hilfiger did much for Pepe, long considered a European jeans brand, to break into the American market and challenge such titan Levi Strauss. By 1997 the Tommy Jeans collections were the top-selling brand in over 1,200 U.S. departments stores, many of which had in-store Hilfiger boutiques, and Pepe London had signed exclusives agreements with Tommy Hilfiger to market products throughout Europe, as well as another licensing deal with the Montreal-based Keystone Industries to produce and distribute Pepe's own jeans in Canada.

The following year, 1998, Pepe Jeans USA was bought by Tommy Hilfiger Corp., just as the division planned an expansion of its women's denim collection and added styles to Tommy Jeans for men and boys. In 2001 Pepe Group Plc., sans its American subsidiary Pepe Jeans USA, announced plans for stores to open in Los Angeles, Miami, and New York carrying Pepe denim, outerwear, and accessories for both sexes. Though the company was already established in London, elsewhere in Europe and in Latin America, these were the company's first U.S. stores. Pepe clothes were successfully sold in American specialty and department stores, but as Pepe executive Jonathan Cea told David Grant Caplan of Women's Wear Daily (19 April 2001), opening the firm's own shops was "the best form of advertising. It solidifies you as a brand."

—Rebecca Arnold; updated by Nelly Rhodes

PERETTI, Elsa

Italian designer working in New York

Born: Florence, Italy, 1 May 1940. Career: Language (French) teacher in Gstaad, Switzerland, 1961; ski instructor; studied interior design in Rome; modeled in London, Paris, New York, mid-1960s; began designing jewelry for Halston and Georgio di Sant'Angelo, New York, 1969; designer, Tiffany & Co., New York, from 1974; packaging designer, Halston fragrances (including Elsa Peretti) and cosmetics. Exhibitions: Fifteen of My Fifty with Tiffany, Fashion Institute of Technology, New York, 1990; retrospective, Tiffany's stores worldwide, 2001. Awards: American Fashion Critics Coty award, 1971; President's Fellow award, Rhode Island School of

Design, 1981; Fashion Group "Night of the Stars" award, 1986; Cultured Pearl Industry award, 1987; Council of Fashion Designers of America's Accessories Designer of the Year, 1996. Address: Tiffany & Co., 600 Madison Avenue, New York, NY 10022.

PUBLICATIONS

By PERETTI:

Books

Elsa Peretti, Tenth Anniversary, New York, 1984.

Elsa Peretti: Fifteen of My Fifty with Tiffany [exhibition catalogue], New York, 1990.

On PERETTI:

Books

Morris, Bernadine, and Barbara Walz, The Fashion Makers, New York, 1978.

Stegemeyer, Anne, Who's Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.

Loring, John, Tiffany's 20th Century: A Portrait of American Style, New York, 1997.

Articles

Kent, Rosemary, "Elsa Peretti...Real Things with a Thought," in WWD, 29 December 1971.

Talley, André Leon, "Elsa Peretti: Style is to Be Simple," in WWD, 11 June 1976.

"Jewelry's New Dazzle," in Newsweek, 4 April 1977.

"The Peretti Obsession," in the New York Times Magazine, 26 February 1978.

Blair, Gwenda, "Elsa Peretti at 40," in Attenzione, August 1980.

McAlpin, Heller, "Designing Women," in Savvy (New York), October 1981.

Caminiti, Susan, "Selling: Jewelers Woo the Working Woman," in Fortune, 8 June 1987.

Rice, Faye, with Laurie Kretchmar, "Competition: Tiffany's Tries the Cartier Formula," in Fortune, 20 November 1989.

"A Look at Peretti's Work and Life," in WWD, 27 April 1990.

Shain, Michael, and Pat Weschler, "Inside New York," in Newsday, 13 October 1993.

Rosenberg, Joyce M., "Karats, Trademarks are Gold Symbols to Assure You Get What You Pay For," in the Minneapolis Star Tribune, 18 December 1996.

Kovel, Ralph, and Terry Kovel, "Rare Kites Can Bring Sky-High Prices," in the St. Louis Post-Dispatch, 4 January 1997.

Levins, Harry, "People," in the St. Louis Post-Dispatch, 27 February 1997.

Okun, Stacey, "Tiffany's 20th Century: A Portrait of American Style," in Town & Country, 1 September 1997.

Pittel, Christine, "Tiffany's 20th Century: A Portrait of American Style," in House Beautiful, 1 November 1997.

McRee, Lisa, "Treats from Tiffany's," from ABC's Good Morning America, 19 November 1997.

Berry, Warren, and Kathy Larkin, "A Bright Time for Gift Ideas," in Newsday, 22 November 1998.

Elsa Peretti in 1969. © Colita/CORBIS.

American specialty and department stores, but as Pepe executive Jonathan Cea told David Grant Caplan of Women's Wear Daily (19 April 2001), opening the firm's own shops was "the best form of advertising. It solidifies you as a brand."

—Rebecca Arnold; updated by Nelly Rhodes

PERETTI, Elsa

Italian designer working in New York

Born: Florence, Italy, 1 May 1940. Career: Language (French) teacher in Gstaad, Switzerland, 1961; ski instructor; studied interior design in Rome; modeled in London, Paris, New York, mid-1960s; began designing jewelry for Halston and Georgio di Sant'Angelo, New York, 1969; designer, Tiffany & Co., New York, from 1974; packaging designer, Halston fragrances (including Elsa Peretti) and cosmetics. Exhibitions: Fifteen of My Fifty with Tiffany, Fashion Institute of Technology, New York, 1990; retrospective, Tiffany's stores worldwide, 2001. Awards: American Fashion Critics Coty award, 1971; President's Fellow award, Rhode Island School of

Design, 1981; Fashion Group "Night of the Stars" award, 1986; Cultured Pearl Industry award, 1987; Council of Fashion Designers of America's Accessories Designer of the Year, 1996. Address: Tiffany & Co., 600 Madison Avenue, New York, NY 10022.

PUBLICATIONS

By PERETTI:

Books

Elsa Peretti, Tenth Anniversary, New York, 1984.

Elsa Peretti: Fifteen of My Fifty with Tiffany [exhibition catalogue], New York, 1990.

On PERETTI:

Books

Morris, Bernadine, and Barbara Walz, The Fashion Makers, New York, 1978.

Stegemeyer, Anne, Who's Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.

Loring, John, Tiffany's 20th Century: A Portrait of American Style, New York, 1997.

Articles

Kent, Rosemary, "Elsa Peretti...Real Things with a Thought," in WWD, 29 December 1971.

Talley, André Leon, "Elsa Peretti: Style is to Be Simple," in WWD, 11 June 1976.

"Jewelry's New Dazzle," in Newsweek, 4 April 1977.

"The Peretti Obsession," in the New York Times Magazine, 26 February 1978.

Blair, Gwenda, "Elsa Peretti at 40," in Attenzione, August 1980.

McAlpin, Heller, "Designing Women," in Savvy (New York), October 1981.

Caminiti, Susan, "Selling: Jewelers Woo the Working Woman," in Fortune, 8 June 1987.

Rice, Faye, with Laurie Kretchmar, "Competition: Tiffany's Tries the Cartier Formula," in Fortune, 20 November 1989.

"A Look at Peretti's Work and Life," in WWD, 27 April 1990.

Shain, Michael, and Pat Weschler, "Inside New York," in Newsday, 13 October 1993.

Rosenberg, Joyce M., "Karats, Trademarks are Gold Symbols to Assure You Get What You Pay For," in the Minneapolis Star Tribune, 18 December 1996.

Kovel, Ralph, and Terry Kovel, "Rare Kites Can Bring Sky-High Prices," in the St. Louis Post-Dispatch, 4 January 1997.

Levins, Harry, "People," in the St. Louis Post-Dispatch, 27 February 1997.

Okun, Stacey, "Tiffany's 20th Century: A Portrait of American Style," in Town & Country, 1 September 1997.

Pittel, Christine, "Tiffany's 20th Century: A Portrait of American Style," in House Beautiful, 1 November 1997.

McRee, Lisa, "Treats from Tiffany's," from ABC's Good Morning America, 19 November 1997.

Berry, Warren, and Kathy Larkin, "A Bright Time for Gift Ideas," in Newsday, 22 November 1998.

Elsa Peretti in 1969. © Colita/CORBIS.

- Robson, Julia, "Style: Chokers Let Off the Leash," in the Daily Telegraph, 11 January 1999.
- Papakonstantinou, Irene, "Give Them a Gift with All Your Heart," in the Toronto Sun, 9 February 1999.
- Woods, Judith, "Features: Cherie's Cry from the Heart is Highlighted in Silver," in the Daily Telegraph, 5 May 1999.
- Johnson, Marilyn, "In Style Trends, Shows, Shopping, Tips: Peretti, A Jewel in Tiffany's Crown," in the Atlanta Journal and Constitution, 30 May 1999.
- Stanley, Kathleen, "It's Not the Thought That Counts, It's the Box," in the Washington Post, 16 December 1999.
- "Chanel's Burning Issue Brings Tears to My Eyes," in the Toronto Star, 23 November 2000.
- Eldredge, Richard L., "Gifting Braxton," in the Atlanta Constitution, 1 May 2001.

* * *

"Style," Elsa Peretti says, "is to be simple"—an ironic statement from a designer described as "the most complicated person I know. She's volatile, explosive, obstinate, and as difficult as any artist trying to achieve perfection"—according to Tiffany's vice president and long-time Peretti colleague, Frank Arcaro (from the Toronto Star, 2000). He adds: "But she is also charming and kind and very, very shy."

Peretti can deliver a brusque maxim in her husky voice with a Chanel imperiousness and a Montesquieu-like incisiveness. Her knowledge of style is perhaps so vivid because it comes intuitively from a career in modeling, friendships with fashion designers, interest in sculptural adornment, and a fascination with the crafts that go into jewelry. Her quest is for expressive, perfect form, even if it happens to look imperfect at first. Touch—the hand of making and of holding—is foremost. She has brilliantly expanded the materials and repertory of jewelry, ensuring that it is a modern tradition but also guaranteeing it preserves special crafts of the past. Her art evades any particular place in the world, drawing upon Japanese traditions, surrealism, and modernist design; it is an art so vagrant its only home is in the heart.

Peretti explores nature with a biologist's acumen and an artist's discrimination. The simplicity of her forms resides in the fact that she selects the quintessential form from among those found in nature, never settling on the median or most familiar, but striving for the essence. Her hearts, for instance, are never of a trite Valentine's Day familiarity; rather, they cleave to the hand with shaped, hand-held warmth. That the heart necklace, described by Tiffany's Melvyn Kirtley as "a wonderful free-form heart," hangs "on a woven mesh chain" in asymmetry as the chain passes through the middle, gives it the quirk of love and the aberration of art that Peretti admires. John Loring of Tiffany's and editor of Tiffany's 20th Century: A Portrait of American Style, on ABC's Good Morning America television show described Peretti's floating heart as "probably [her] best-known piece of jewelry." Additionally, her 18-carat gold mesh bracelet flows like water and "wears like silk," according to her fans.

Reminding us that Chanel never forgot she was a peasant, Peretti too never forgets the simple things of life. Her suite of beans is ineffably ordinary, yet they are extraordinary in their craft, in their scaling to hand, and in their finest materials. Her bottles are common; Peretti transfigures the crude practicality into an elegant simplicity.

"The design," said Peretti, "is full of common sense. Of course I'm slow. I have to crystallize a form, find the essence."

In June 1974, Peretti joined Tiffany & Company. That year, her first collection, featuring "sinuous," "sensual," and "sculptural" shapes and forms, debuted, causing a sensation in the accessories world. Sixteen years later, in the 1990 catalogue of Elsa Peretti: Fifteen of My Fifty with Tiffany, Richard Martin wrote: "A transcendental aspect haunts Peretti's work; she hints at our affinity to nature even as she plucks the perfect form from the cartload of nature's abundance and art's options. Peretti returns us in her absolute objects to a Garden of Paradise. There, all form has its lingering memory and every shape is the definitive best."

Peretti's sensibility is deeply touched by her professional and personal friendships with Halston and Georgio di Sant'Angelo, no less so after the death of both designers. As a model, Peretti had known both. In 1999 she explained how it all started to the Atlanta Journal and Constitution, "In 1969, I found a tiny flower vase in a junk shop and was inspired to design a bottle on a chain for designer Giorgio di Sant'Angelo," from whom Peretti drew a spirit of incorporating regional materials in an aggregate at once a composite of many sources and a refinement of them in modern terms. She went on to design belts for Halston—whose minimalism is a touchstone for Peretti, not only in the opportunity for her demonstrative forms to stand out in the ensemble of such simple luxury in dress but also in the obdurate minimalism of her own design—before joining Tiffany's.

Generous in acknowledging such designers and in expressing her pleasure in cooperating with craftspeople in the fulfillment of her work, Peretti cannot disguise her own remarkable ability, which she sometimes passes off as craft, to distill form and ideas. The sabotage of her belts is that their sources are in the stable, not in haberdashery: Peretti's attention in 1969 to a leather horse girth inspired a belt without mechanisms, working by the unadorned looping to fulfill the function of the belt. Her tableware is fit for a peasant table, before chopsticks or other utensils: she has created the perfect setting for Picasso's Blind Man's Meal to transform it to Tiffany grace without ever compromising its rudimentary, manual presence, which is ironic, since her colleague at Tiffany's is none other than Paloma Picasso, daughter of the famous painter. Other Tiffany's colleagues have included Angela Cummings and Jean Schlumberger.

Characteristically, when Peretti confronted diamonds, she flouted convention and offered the affordable—and revolutionary—"Diamonds by the Yard," giving even the desired stone a degree of access and of animation. Of that insouciant success, a landmark of 1970s design, Peretti says modestly, "My objective is to design according to one's financial possibilities." Few would earlier have imagined a leading jewelry designer to come up with such a frank and sensitive view of the product or the consumer. In fact, it is one of Peretti's triumphs to restore to jewelry a vitality it had lost in the 1960s and early 1970s.

"My love for bones has nothing macabre about it," Peretti says. Indeed, Peretti's sensibility is one of unmitigated joy. Her fruits are prime produce; her sea life is a miracle of abundance; her scorpions and snakes are never scary but seem instead to be mementos of exhilaration; her handbags long to be clutched; her angels and crosses evoke respect for religion making it "touchable" by the masses; even her teardrops adapted for earrings, pendants, and even pen clips are never melancholic. They are tears of joy created by a designer who zealously celebrates life, and enjoys it, as evidenced by her “Alphabet,” a series of sterling silver pendants in loopy representations of the alphabet.

Her fragrances are no different. For Tiffany, Peretti released a fragrance named after herself, described as “a spicy woodsy fragrance composed of narcissus, wood, magnolia, the Japanese flower, daphne, nutmeg, and pepper.” She also designed a beautiful cobalt blue glass heart-shaped paperweight reminiscent of her jewelry hearts; a crystal apple candy dish, which floats like an iridescent bubble on the table; lacquered pens that evoke images of chopsticks and yet can be worn like jewelry; “Thumbprint” pottery bowls and glasses with a very oriental flavor; sterling silver punch ladles; candlesticks and candle snuffers; wine coasters; and many other items.

In 1996 the Council of Fashion Designers of America named her the Accessories Designer of the Year. The same year, one of Peretti’s belts showed up in the Jackie Kennedy Onassis estate sale, going, with another belt, for $7,475. Other famous women drawn to Peretti’s work include Mona Williams, Diana Vreeland, Gwyneth Paltrow, and Demi Moore. Peretti’s career and designs have inspired a whole new generation of accessory designers, including Jennifer Miller, who designs “replica” jewelry in the style of Peretti and others.

—Richard Martin; updated by Daryl F. Mallett

PERRIS, Bernard

French designer

Born: Millau, France, 5 October 1936. Education: Studied fashion design at Cours Bazot School. Career: Assistant to Marc Bohan, assistant designer, Guy Laroche, 1960–61; designer, Jacques Heim, 1961–63; designer, Dior, 1963; designer, Paul Bon, 1964–69; opened ready-to-wear firm, Bernard Perris Nouvelle Couture, 1969; opened New York shop, 1986; opened two Paris shops, 1988; introduced bridge line, 1989; business closed briefly, reopened, 1992; hired by Jean-Louis Scherrer as head designer, 1994 (later replaced by Stephane Rolland). Exhibitions: Musée des Arts Décoratifs, Paris, 1988; Musée de la Mode, Marseille, 1994. Awards: Best Fashion Designer, Houston, Texas, 1988; Best Fashion Designer, Tokyo, 1988; Silver Slipper award, Houston, 1995. Address: 5 rue de Magdebourg, 75116 Paris, France.

PUBLICATIONS

On PERRIS:

Articles

“International Ethnic is the Big News from Paris,” in WWD, 19 March 1990.

“Bernard Perris Liquidates Two Main Holding Companies,” in WWD, 12 July 1991.

“Perris to Reopen with New Partners,” in WWD, 13 October 1992.

Godfrey, Deeny, “House of Scherrer Names Perris Couture, Ready-to-Wear Designer,” in WWD, 7 September 1994.

Bernard Perris, fall 1995 collection. © AFP/CORBIS.

Griffin, Linda Gillian, “Not the Retiring Type, Perris Goes Back to the Drawing Board,” in the Houston Chronicle, 25 May 1995.

Additional articles in Vogue, L’Officiel, Elle, Figaro, Madame, Town & Country, Harper’s Bazaar, as well as Joyce and Mode x Mode (both Japan).

*

What has been mainly distinctive of my work...is an atmosphere of high standard elegance with a glance to independence of mind and fun toward “les idées reçues.” I have been many times called the most “couturier” of the “createurs,” probably because my line was more a nouvelle couture than a deluxe RTW. As everyone, I have a double personality and am reflecting the influence of the “austerité” and “grandeur” of a Balenciaga, as well as the “glamour,” “sexy touch,” and “joie de vivre” of a Jacques Fath.

—Bernard Perris

* * *

It has been said that the women’s ready-to-wear designs by Parisian Bernard Perris embody the philosophy “more is more.” From the zealously celebrates life, and enjoys it, as evidenced by her “Alphabet,” a series of sterling silver pendants in loopy representations of the alphabet.

Her fragrances are no different. For Tiffany, Peretti released a fragrance named after herself, described as “a spicy woodsy fragrance composed of narcissus, wood, magnolia, the Japanese flower, daphne, nutmeg, and pepper.” She also designed a beautiful cobalt blue glass heart-shaped paperweight reminiscent of her jewelry hearts; a crystal apple candy dish, which floats like an iridescent bubble on the table; lacquered pens that evoke images of chopsticks and yet can be worn like jewelry; “Thumbprint” pottery bowls and glasses with a very oriental flavor; sterling silver punch ladles; candlesticks and candle snuffers; wine coasters; and many other items.

In 1996 the Council of Fashion Designers of America named her the Accessories Designer of the Year. The same year, one of Peretti’s belts showed up in the Jackie Kennedy Onassis estate sale, going, with another belt, for $7,475. Other famous women drawn to Peretti’s work include Mona Williams, Diana Vreeland, Gwyneth Paltrow, and Demi Moore. Peretti’s career and designs have inspired a whole new generation of accessory designers, including Jennifer Miller, who designs “replica” jewelry in the style of Peretti and others.

—Richard Martin; updated by Daryl F. Mallett

PERRIS, Bernard

French designer

Born: Millau, France, 5 October 1936. Education: Studied fashion design at Cours Bazot School. Career: Assistant to Marc Bohan, assistant designer, Guy Laroche, 1960–61; designer, Jacques Heim, 1961–63; designer, Dior, 1963; designer, Paul Bon, 1964–69; opened ready-to-wear firm, Bernard Perris Nouvelle Couture, 1969; opened New York shop, 1986; opened two Paris shops, 1988; introduced bridge line, 1989; business closed briefly, reopened, 1992; hired by Jean-Louis Scherrer as head designer, 1994 (later replaced by Stephane Rolland). Exhibitions: Musée des Arts Décoratifs, Paris, 1988; Musée de la Mode, Marseille, 1994. Awards: Best Fashion Designer, Houston, Texas, 1988; Best Fashion Designer, Tokyo, 1988; Silver Slipper award, Houston, 1995. Address: 5 rue de Magdebourg, 75116 Paris, France.

PUBLICATIONS

On PERRIS:

Articles

“International Ethnic is the Big News from Paris,” in WWD, 19 March 1990.

“Bernard Perris Liquidates Two Main Holding Companies,” in WWD, 12 July 1991.

“Perris to Reopen with New Partners,” in WWD, 13 October 1992.

Godfrey, Deeny, “House of Scherrer Names Perris Couture, Ready-to-Wear Designer,” in WWD, 7 September 1994.

Bernard Perris, fall 1995 collection. © AFP/CORBIS.

Griffin, Linda Gillian, “Not the Retiring Type, Perris Goes Back to the Drawing Board,” in the Houston Chronicle, 25 May 1995.

Additional articles in Vogue, L'Officiel, Elle, Figaro, Madame, Town & Country, Harper's Bazaar, as well as Joyce and Mode x Mode (both Japan).

*

What has been mainly distinctive of my work...is an atmosphere of high standard elegance with a glance to independence of mind and fun toward “les idées reçues.” I have been many times called the most “couturier” of the “createurs,” probably because my line was more a nouvelle couture than a deluxe RTW. As everyone, I have a double personality and am reflecting the influence of the “austerité” and “grandeur” of a Balenciaga, as well as the “glamour,” “sexy touch,” and “joie de vivre” of a Jacques Fath.

—Bernard Perris

* * *

It has been said that the women’s ready-to-wear designs by Parisian Bernard Perris embody the philosophy “more is more.” From the moment he opened his own Paris showroom in 1969, Perris favored dramatic, almost theatrical fare, incorporating luxurious fabrics, intricate construction, and extravagant trim into his creations. He was even accused of cramming enough ideas for a dozen dresses into one garment, loading his designs with high voltage, eye-popping details.

As a young boy in the south of France, Perris was strongly influenced by the women's fashions he saw in his mother's ready-to-wear clothing boutique. At age 16, he ventured to Paris, where he eventually was hired as a couture assistant for Guy Laroche. He then went on to design debutante and wedding dresses under the Jacques Heim and Paul Bon labels, where he learned ready-to-wear techniques. After a short stay at Dior, Perris opened his own house and showed his first collection of Nouvelle Couture, a collection based on techniques that allowed him the creative freedom of haute couture but whose prices were accessible to more women.

The designer's fortunes rose and fell precipitously, causing him to suffer bouts of nervous exhaustion and from about 1971–77 he remained out of the fashion spotlight. But as the interest in ethnic revivals and the "hippy look" waned and a renewed taste for glamorous dressing arose toward the end of the 1970s, Perris again emerged, promoting his special brand of opulent ready-to-wear deluxe. His fur-trimmed and embroidered velvets, gathered capes and evening gowns, tiered and ruffled cocktail dresses, and appliquéd resort wear garnered a newly appreciative audience, and he opened his own Paris boutique in 1985.

Perris became particularly popular in America, appealing as he did to the big-spending, flashy customer who wanted to be seen in his bold yet high-quality clothing, and he established a Madison Avenue shop in New York. He did not shrink from personally promoting his clothes in the U.S., presenting trunk shows for wealthy buyers from Beverly Hills to Las Vegas and often appearing at in-store events and charity dinners.

Chosen in 1985 by the "Best" committee as one of the 10 most elegant men in the world, Perris created clothing for a high-profile, international clientèle, including several film stars. He designed all the women's costumes for the 1986 film Max, My Love, in which actress Charlotte Rampling wore 10 different Bernard Perris ensembles. Clothing from the 1980s stressed strong lines, saturated color, and a kind of dazzling, urban chic—these were powerful clothes made for grand entrances, completely in step with the period's emphasis on wealth and conspicuous consumption.

Later styles found the designer embracing less show-stopping ideas without sacrificing his essential devotion to luxury or glamor, as in his wool daytime suits trimmed with sheared beaver, drapey silk georgette lounging ensembles, cashmere separates, and extravagant accessories. He remained true to his reputation for fabulous eveningwear, however, as seen in his sumptuous 1988 all black-white-and-red collection featuring swaths of fur, rustling silks, and liberal lace trim.

His acceptance into the Chambre Syndicale du Prêt-à-Porter des Couturiers and des Crêteurs de Mode finally validated Bernard Perris' long and fruitful, if uneven, career. In early 1994, he closed his business to regroup after a business partner's retirement, but his absence from the fashion world did not last long. In August of 1994, Perris was appointed as the couture and haute couture designer for the Paris house of Jean-Louis Scherrer. While in the position, Perris received critical praise and expanded his reputation for designing elegant and sumptuous clothing. The Scherrer house was bought by François Barthes in 1997 and Stephane Rolland took over designing in 1998.

—Kathleen Paton; updated by Megan Stacy

PER SPOOK

See SPOOK, Per

PETER HOGGARD

British design firm

Founded: by Michelle Hoggard (born in West Yorkshire, England, 1962) and Peter Leathers (born in Tyneside, England, 1962) in Tyneside, 1983. Company History: Sells clothes to local retail outlets; opened own outlet in Hyper Hyper store, London, 1985; first catwalk collection presented at British Fashion Week, London, 1986; opened shop in Rupert Court, London, 1987; established small factory in Yorkshire, England, to manufacture own label, 1987; established retail chain selling own label and other small designer labels, with shops in Leeds and Manchester, England, 1992; label falls from fashion, late 1990s; "Air" home furnishings shops opened by Michelle Hoggard, 2000s. Awards: Yorkshire Television Young Business Entrepreneur of the Year, 1985; Fil d'Or Linen award, Paris, 1991.

PUBLICATIONS

On PETER HOGGARD:

Articles

"Fresh Blow to City as Store Quits Its Home," available online at Bradford & District, www.thisisbradford.co.uk, 1 October 2000.
Poole, Suzy, "Good Taste in the Air," available online at Bradford & District, www.thisisbradford.co.uk, 1 October 2000.

* * *

When Oscar Wilde wrote, "One should either wear a work of art or be a work of art," little did he imagine it would one day appear embroidered on the sleeve of a Peter Hoggard jacket. Ideas such as this, not to mention coats made from a Bayeux tapestry print or Peter Rabbit appliqués on skirts, have been a staple of Peter Hoggard collections since their inception in the early 1980s. This was the age of do-it-yourself fashion, street credibility being the latest in media hypes, with style bibles such as i-D and The Face eagerly documenting the wild and outrageous sartorial antics of British youth.

Amid this heady atmosphere and fueled by their joint passion for clothes and dressing up, Peter Leathers and Michelle Hoggard formed their fashion company, Peter Hoggard. Hoggard explained, "We were both very visual people—I think that's why we were attracted to each moment he opened his own Paris showroom in 1969, Perris favored dramatic, almost theatrical fare, incorporating luxurious fabrics, intricate construction, and extravagant trim into his creations. He was even accused of cramming enough ideas for a dozen dresses into one garment, loading his designs with high voltage, eye-popping details.

As a young boy in the south of France, Perris was strongly influenced by the women's fashions he saw in his mother's ready-to-wear clothing boutique. At age 16, he ventured to Paris, where he eventually was hired as a couture assistant for Guy Laroche. He then went on to design debutante and wedding dresses under the Jacques Heim and Paul Bon labels, where he learned ready-to-wear techniques. After a short stay at Dior, Perris opened his own house and showed his first collection of Nouvelle Couture, a collection based on techniques that allowed him the creative freedom of haute couture but whose prices were accessible to more women.

The designer's fortunes rose and fell precipitously, causing him to suffer bouts of nervous exhaustion and from about 1971–77 he remained out of the fashion spotlight. But as the interest in ethnic revivals and the "hippy look" waned and a renewed taste for glamorous dressing arose toward the end of the 1970s, Perris again emerged, promoting his special brand of opulent ready-to-wear deluxe. His fur-trimmed and embroidered velvets, gathered capes and evening gowns, tiered and ruffled cocktail dresses, and appliquéd resort wear garnered a newly appreciative audience, and he opened his own Paris boutique in 1985.

Perris became particularly popular in America, appealing as he did to the big-spending, flashy customer who wanted to be seen in his bold yet high-quality clothing, and he established a Madison Avenue shop in New York. He did not shrink from personally promoting his clothes in the U.S., presenting trunk shows for wealthy buyers from Beverly Hills to Las Vegas and often appearing at in-store events and charity dinners.

Chosen in 1985 by the "Best" committee as one of the 10 most elegant men in the world, Perris created clothing for a high-profile, international clientèle, including several film stars. He designed all the women's costumes for the 1986 film Max, My Love, in which actress Charlotte Rampling wore 10 different Bernard Perris ensembles. Clothing from the 1980s stressed strong lines, saturated color, and a kind of dazzling, urban chic—these were powerful clothes made for grand entrances, completely in step with the period's emphasis on wealth and conspicuous consumption.

Later styles found the designer embracing less show-stopping ideas without sacrificing his essential devotion to luxury or glamor, as in his wool daytime suits trimmed with sheared beaver, drapey silk georgette lounging ensembles, cashmere separates, and extravagant accessories. He remained true to his reputation for fabulous eveningwear, however, as seen in his sumptuous 1988 all black-white-and-red collection featuring swaths of fur, rustling silks, and liberal lace trim.

His acceptance into the Chambre Syndicale du Prêt-à-Porter des Couturiers and des Crêteurs de Mode finally validated Bernard Perris' long and fruitful, if uneven, career. In early 1994, he closed his business to regroup after a business partner's retirement, but his absence from the fashion world did not last long. In August of 1994, Perris was appointed as the couture and haute couture designer for the Paris house of Jean-Louis Scherrer. While in the position, Perris received critical praise and expanded his reputation for designing elegant and sumptuous clothing. The Scherrer house was bought by François Barthes in 1997 and Stephane Rolland took over designing in 1998.

—Kathleen Paton; updated by Megan Stacy

PER SPOOK

See SPOOK, Per

PETER HOGGARD

British design firm

Founded: by Michelle Hoggard (born in West Yorkshire, England, 1962) and Peter Leathers (born in Tyneside, England, 1962) in Tyneside, 1983. Company History: Sells clothes to local retail outlets; opened own outlet in Hyper Hyper store, London, 1985; first catwalk collection presented at British Fashion Week, London, 1986; opened shop in Rupert Court, London, 1987; established small factory in Yorkshire, England, to manufacture own label, 1987; established retail chain selling own label and other small designer labels, with shops in Leeds and Manchester, England, 1992; label falls from fashion, late 1990s; "Air" home furnishings shops opened by Michelle Hoggard, 2000s. Awards: Yorkshire Television Young Business Entrepreneur of the Year, 1985; Fil d'Or Linen award, Paris, 1991.

PUBLICATIONS

On PETER HOGGARD:

Articles

"Fresh Blow to City as Store Quits Its Home," available online at Bradford & District, www.thisisbradford.co.uk, 1 October 2000.
Poole, Suzy, "Good Taste in the Air," available online at Bradford & District, www.thisisbradford.co.uk, 1 October 2000.

* * *

When Oscar Wilde wrote, "One should either wear a work of art or be a work of art," little did he imagine it would one day appear embroidered on the sleeve of a Peter Hoggard jacket. Ideas such as this, not to mention coats made from a Bayeux tapestry print or Peter Rabbit appliqués on skirts, have been a staple of Peter Hoggard collections since their inception in the early 1980s. This was the age of do-it-yourself fashion, street credibility being the latest in media hypes, with style bibles such as i-D and The Face eagerly documenting the wild and outrageous sartorial antics of British youth.

Amid this heady atmosphere and fueled by their joint passion for clothes and dressing up, Peter Leathers and Michelle Hoggard formed their fashion company, Peter Hoggard. Hoggard explained, "We were both very visual people—I think that's why we were attracted to each other—I made my own clothes while Peter customized his.” Their first collection was inspired by Leathers’ innovative idea of making couture one-offs from hotel laundry, which were then sold to friends. Big, baggy shirts, each one sprayed with an individual pattern, were customized with de rigueur designer rips and tears. The skirts were spotted by television presenter Leslie Ash when the duo appeared suitably attired on the set of the pop music show The Tube. She promptly placed an order, as did guest artist Gary Glitter.

Encouraged, the duo decided to take the bull by the horns and approach the fashion world in a serious and businesslike way. Becoming their own agents, they sold clothes to various retailers through a trunk show. This success led in turn to the opening of their own retail outlets and a stall in Hyper Hyper, the thriving and bustling center for London’s young and avant-garde designers in Kensington High Street.

Concentrating on womenswear with strong yet eclectic themes that were both interesting and inspirational to research, Peter Hoggard collections have evolved to embody a sophisticated designer interpretation of street fashion, in tune with the 1990s customer who demanded quality and superb cut. Working in fabrics that often opposed and contradicted—linen and raffia, venetian wool and plastic, waxed cotton piping and rayon—themes have included prints based on dollar and pound signs and ship rigging, which incorporated jackets and sheath dresses with waxed-cotton piped sleeves or inserts. Bomber jackets in plastic with Dada-inspired imagery were appliquéd and reembroidered to create a cornucopia of reference, and crushed velvet minidresses and jackets were trimmed in new age crystal.

Peter Hoggard has been part of a similar breed of talented British designers and design duos emerging in the early 1980s—Bodymap, Richmond/Cornejo, and Mark and Syrie—being contemporaries. Compared to the vast success of international designers such as Gianni Versace or Calvin Klein, Peter Hoggard and company run the risk of being shackled by what Michelle Hoggard calls “the great British disease,” being the traditional difficulties smaller designers have with production. When public relations officer Richard Titchner described Peter Hoggard as being “the best kept secret in fashion,” his ironic statement served only as a reminder that many talented individuals had to go abroad to be taken seriously as creative designers. Peter Hoggard viewed itself as an endangered species, determined to retain its design integrity and a very English look to its product—and unfortunately, its status was right on the mark. By the end of the 20th century, the Peter Hoggard label was virtually extinct.

The new millennium found Michelle Hoggard, a permanent resident in the West Yorkshire area, still dedicated to a sense of place and distinctive English style. In an interview for the “This is Bradford” website, she discussed her reason for opening two city center housewares stores to offer hard-to-find items. With 14 years in fashion retail and manufacturing behind her, she established the “Air” shops at the Wool Exchange in Bradford to reflect her taste in interior design. “When I bought my new house,” she explained, “I was very conscious of wanting to put my own stamp on things, but there wasn’t an awful lot around. I started going to trade shows but then I put the focus on smaller items to suit the market.”

Hoggard’s eye for business saw opportunity in high-end gifts and home decoration. Her shops on Hustlergate and Market streets stocked aromatherapy products, oil burners, picture frames, storage units, table decoration, and clocks. Her criteria for new additions to the household and giftware lines focused on unique global sources such as salt crystal lamps and candleholders from Germany and on items that were both natural and attractive. Her pledge to remain viable in Bradford’s business district accompanied the opening of the second Air shop, a boon to a city center hard hit by business reorganizations and closures.

—Kevin Almond; updated by Mary Ellen Snodgrass

PEZZUTTO, Graziella Ronchi

See ERREUNO SCM SpA

PFISTER, Andrea

Italian footwear designer working in Paris

Born: Pesaro, Italy, 30 August 1942. Education: Studied art and languages at University of Florence 1960–62, shoe design at Ars Sutoria, Milan, 1962. Career: Designed collections for Lanvin, Patou, in Paris, 1963; showed first collection under own label, 1965; opened first shop, Paris, 1967, and began production of own line, 1968; collaborated with Anne Klein, 1973–94; started shoe factory and introduced accessory line (belts, bags, scarves, jewelry), 1974; introduced ready-to-wear line, 1976; introduced lower-priced shoe range, 1990; invented colors and new finishings or prints for the Italian tannery Stefania, from 1990; artistic director of Bruno Magli Shoes since 1993. Exhibitions: Mostra d’epoca della calzatura, Vigevano, Italy; Andrea Pfister: Trente ans de création, (traveling exhibition), Musée International de la Chaussure, Romans, France, 1993–94; UBS-Brugg, Switzerland, 1994; Palazzo degli Affari, Milan, 1994–95; Fashion Institute of Technology, New York, and Bata Shoe Museum, Toronto, 1996; Fashion Institute of Design and Merchandising, Los Angeles, 1998; Fashion Institute of Design and Merchandising, San Francisco, 1999. Collections: Metropolitan Museum, New York. Awards: Fashion Footwear Association of New York, Gold Medal, 1988; Designer of the Year, 1990 (for Anne Klein); first prize, shoe designer international competition, Amsterdam. Address: Viale dei Mille, 47, Vigevano 27029 (PV), Italy.

PUBLICATIONS

On PFISTER:

Books

- Liu, Aimee, and Rottman, Meg, Shoe Time, New York, 1986.
- Trasko, Mary, Heavenly Soles, London, 1989.
- McDowell, Colin, Shoes: Fashion and Fantasy, New York & London, 1989.
- Hirmer, S., Schuhe, Munich, 1992.
- Andrea Pfister: Trente ans de création* [exhibition catalogue], Romans, France, 1993.
- Mazza, Samuele, Andrea Pfister, Milan, 1998.

Articles

- “Dateline Milan,” in Footwear News (New York), 25 March 1985.
- “Andrea Pfister,” in Footwear News, 11 February 1991.
- McKay, Deirdre, “Pflights of Pfancy: A Tribute to Andrea Pfister’s Creative Passion,” in Footwear News, 29 January 1996.

other—I made my own clothes while Peter customized his.” Their first collection was inspired by Leathers’ innovative idea of making couture one-offs from hotel laundry, which were then sold to friends. Big, baggy shirts, each one sprayed with an individual pattern, were customized with de rigueur designer rips and tears. The skirts were spotted by television presenter Leslie Ash when the duo appeared suitably attired on the set of the pop music show The Tube. She promptly placed an order, as did guest artist Gary Glitter.

Encouraged, the duo decided to take the bull by the horns and approach the fashion world in a serious and businesslike way. Becoming their own agents, they sold clothes to various retailers through a trunk show. This success led in turn to the opening of their own retail outlets and a stall in Hyper Hyper, the thriving and bustling center for London’s young and avant-garde designers in Kensington High Street.

Concentrating on womenswear with strong yet eclectic themes that were both interesting and inspirational to research, Peter Hoggard collections have evolved to embody a sophisticated designer interpretation of street fashion, in tune with the 1990s customer who demanded quality and superb cut. Working in fabrics that often opposed and contradicted—linen and raffia, venetian wool and plastic, waxed cotton piping and rayon—themes have included prints based on dollar and pound signs and ship rigging, which incorporated jackets and sheath dresses with waxed-cotton piped sleeves or inserts. Bomber jackets in plastic with Dada-inspired imagery were appliquéd and reembroidered to create a cornucopia of reference, and crushed velvet minidresses and jackets were trimmed in new age crystal.

Peter Hoggard has been part of a similar breed of talented British designers and design duos emerging in the early 1980s—Bodymap, Richmond/Cornejo, and Mark and Syrie—being contemporaries. Compared to the vast success of international designers such as Gianni Versace or Calvin Klein, Peter Hoggard and company run the risk of being shackled by what Michelle Hoggard calls “the great British disease,” being the traditional difficulties smaller designers have with production. When public relations officer Richard Titchner described Peter Hoggard as being “the best kept secret in fashion,” his ironic statement served only as a reminder that many talented individuals had to go abroad to be taken seriously as creative designers. Peter Hoggard viewed itself as an endangered species, determined to retain its design integrity and a very English look to its product—and unfortunately, its status was right on the mark. By the end of the 20th century, the Peter Hoggard label was virtually extinct.

The new millennium found Michelle Hoggard, a permanent resident in the West Yorkshire area, still dedicated to a sense of place and distinctive English style. In an interview for the “This is Bradford” website, she discussed her reason for opening two city center housewares stores to offer hard-to-find items. With 14 years in fashion retail and manufacturing behind her, she established the “Air” shops at the Wool Exchange in Bradford to reflect her taste in interior design. “When I bought my new house,” she explained, “I was very conscious of wanting to put my own stamp on things, but there wasn’t an awful lot around. I started going to trade shows but then I put the focus on smaller items to suit the market.”

Hoggard’s eye for business saw opportunity in high-end gifts and home decoration. Her shops on Hustlergate and Market streets stocked aromatherapy products, oil burners, picture frames, storage units, table decoration, and clocks. Her criteria for new additions to the household and giftware lines focused on unique global sources such as salt crystal lamps and candleholders from Germany and on items that were both natural and attractive. Her pledge to remain viable in Bradford’s business district accompanied the opening of the second Air shop, a boon to a city center hard hit by business reorganizations and closures.

—Kevin Almond; updated by Mary Ellen Snodgrass

PEZZUTTO, Graziella Ronchi

See ERREUNO SCM SpA

PFISTER, Andrea

Italian footwear designer working in Paris

Born: Pesaro, Italy, 30 August 1942. Education: Studied art and languages at University of Florence 1960–62, shoe design at Ars Sutoria, Milan, 1962. Career: Designed collections for Lanvin, Patou, in Paris, 1963; showed first collection under own label, 1965; opened first shop, Paris, 1967, and began production of own line, 1968; collaborated with Anne Klein, 1973–94; started shoe factory and introduced accessory line (belts, bags, scarves, jewelry), 1974; introduced ready-to-wear line, 1976; introduced lower-priced shoe range, 1990; invented colors and new finishings or prints for the Italian tannery Stefania, from 1990; artistic director of Bruno Magli Shoes since 1993. Exhibitions: Mostra d’epoca della calzatura, Vigevano, Italy; Andrea Pfister: Trente ans de création, (traveling exhibition), Musée International de la Chaussure, Romans, France, 1993–94; UBS-Brugg, Switzerland, 1994; Palazzo degli Affari, Milan, 1994–95; Fashion Institute of Technology, New York, and Bata Shoe Museum, Toronto, 1996; Fashion Institute of Design and Merchandising, Los Angeles, 1998; Fashion Institute of Design and Merchandising, San Francisco, 1999. Collections: Metropolitan Museum, New York. Awards: Fashion Footwear Association of New York, Gold Medal, 1988; Designer of the Year, 1990 (for Anne Klein); first prize, shoe designer international competition, Amsterdam. Address: Viale dei Mille, 47, Vigevano 27029 (PV), Italy.

PUBLICATIONS

On PFISTER:

Books

- Liu, Aimee, and Rottman, Meg, Shoe Time, New York, 1986.
- Trasko, Mary, Heavenly Soles, London, 1989.
- McDowell, Colin, Shoes: Fashion and Fantasy, New York & London, 1989.
- Hirmer, S., Schuhe, Munich, 1992.
- Andrea Pfister: Trente ans de création* [exhibition catalogue], Romans, France, 1993.
- Mazza, Samuele, Andrea Pfister, Milan, 1998.

Articles

- “Dateline Milan,” in Footwear News (New York), 25 March 1985.
- “Andrea Pfister,” in Footwear News, 11 February 1991.
- McKay, Deirdre, “Pflights of Pfancy: A Tribute to Andrea Pfister’s Creative Passion,” in Footwear News, 29 January 1996.

McKinney, Melonee, "Shoe Designer Andrea Pfister Does Accessories," in DNR, 23 April 1999.
 Spindler, Amy, "The Two Gentlemen of Priano," in the New York Times, 23 January 2000.
 "Pfister Acquired by Italian Fin. Part Group," in Footwear News, 5 March 2001.
 Articles in Donna, Grazia, Panorama, (Italy), October 1993; further articles in Ars Sutoria, December 1993; Mode Pella January 1994; and Bazaar Italy, February 1994.

*

My shoes are feminine, sexy, full of humor and perfectly made. But a shoe cannot only be pretty—it has also to fit, not hurt. Colors, materials and clear lines are very important to me. I love flat heels and very high heels.

—Andrea Pfister

* * *

"If a beautiful woman's feet hurt, she becomes ugly." This is a typically robust statement from a designer whose opulent creations have been variously described as frivolous, witty, and even in dubious taste. Yet the success of his creations depends on the combination of proportion and line with comfort: "I always think shoes should be very feminine and sexy. Compromises are often necessary. It's easy to make wonderful looking shoes, but they also have to fit and be comfortable."

Andrea Pfister's shoes are essentially Italian in their craftsmanship and attention to detail. But there is an element of lightness and irreverence about his creations not usually associated with the traditional shoemaker. He improvises on themes—starry skies, the sea, music, circuses, and Las Vegas—designing shoes such as Martini Dry, with cocktail glass heels supporting slices of lemon. He uses applique motifs, so that when a sandal is called Jazz, it really does have a snakeskin saxophone on the upper.

Another reason for the originality of his work may be that unlike most footwear designers, Pfister is a colorist. Twice a year, he retreats for two months to prepare new collections. The starting point is always color, then he works on shape, proportion, and styling. He is involved with several tanneries, creating seasonal color charts and matching colors in diverse materials such as reptile and suede as a basis for his collections. Pfister's commitment to color also explains his copious use of ornamentation. Jewels, sequins, and glitter catch the light bouncing color off upper and heel as the shoes trip lightly along. The fullest ranges of materials are used to create the desired effects. He will use sumptuous handcrafted embroidery and silks and yet is equally at home with plastics and paste stones.

Despite the occasional jokiness of his themes, the shoes are true couture creations. Pfister has always been a couturier; he began his career at the top with Lanvin and Jean Patou at the age of 21. More recently, he created shoes for Italian dress designer Mariuccia Mandeli, whose Krizia collections are also often quirky, and for the Bruno Magli label. Pfister's business has evolved as well; in 2001 his company was acquired by Fin. Part Group, allowing the designer to retain creative control while reaching new markets.

Like all original designers, his ideas were plundered by others. Snakeskin, a favorite material, was used in multicolored patches over white kidskin on a court shoe called Mosaique. This style, from the early 1980s, is instantly recognizable because it has been copied so often. His most famous style must be the Birdcage shoe of 1979. This was a closed-back, opened-toed flat pump, with the main body constructed in an open latticework of thin leather straps. It spawned millions of copies. Its final form, far removed from the finely crafted snakeskin original, is as a molded plastic beach shoe. Pfister's style in his later collections became less ornate and subtler. Even as his personal style continues to evolve, museums across the globe have hosted retrospectives of his work, honoring his enduring influence and originality.

Pfister diversified into handmade handbags, scarves, leatherwear, gloves, neckwear, and even picture frames, but remains committed to producing beautiful shoes. His attitude toward fashion is relaxed. Pfister styles complement current trends but can also stand alone. He looks for this independence in his customers, including stars from Elizabeth Taylor to Madonna. For him the client is "the woman who mixes different pieces—an Armani top, for instance, with a Donna Karan skirt, and a jacket by Ferré. My shoes work best on the woman who's sure enough of herself to create her own combination."

Andrea Pfister creates truly original footwear; though it may not be fashionable in a trendsetting sense. It may not always appeal to the mainstream idea of good taste, but the styles are extraordinary, often eccentric, and frequently enchanting, making him one of the most innovative designers of footwear.

—Chris Hill; updated by Megan Stacy

PICASSO, Paloma

French designer

Born: Paris, France, 19 April 1949, daughter of Pablo Picasso and Françoise Gilot. Education: Attended University of Paris, Sorbonne, and University of Nanterre; studied jewelry design and fabrication.

Family: Married Rafael Lopez-Cambil (aka Lopez-Sanchez), 1978.

Career: Fashion jewelry designer for Yves Saint Laurent, 1969; designed jewelry for Zolotas, 1971; designed costumes and sets for Lopez-Cambil's Parisian productions L'Interprétation, 1975 and Success, 1978; teamed with Lopez-Cambil to create Paloma Picasso brand, including jewelry for Tiffany & Company, from 1980; introduced fragrance and cosmetics line, 1984; designed men's and women's accessories for Lopez-Cambil, Ltd., 1987; began designing fabrics and wall coverings for Motif, 1993; celebrated 20 years with Tiffany, 2000; designed hosiery for Grupo Synkro; eyewear for Carrera; bone china, crystal, silverware, and tiles for Villeroy & Boch; household linens for KBC; Paloma Picasso boutiques throughout Europe, and in Japan and Hong Kong; fragrances include: Paloma, 1984; Minataure, 1992; Temptations, 1996. Award: MODA award for design excellence, 1988. Address: Lopez-Cambil Ltd., 37 West 57th Street, New York, NY 10019 USA.

PUBLICATIONS

By PICASSO:

Books

Paloma Picasso: Galleria d'Arte Cavour, with Roberto Sanesi, Milan, 1972.

McKinney, Melonee, "Shoe Designer Andrea Pfister Does Accessories," in DNR, 23 April 1999.
 Spindler, Amy, "The Two Gentlemen of Priano," in the New York Times, 23 January 2000.
 "Pfister Acquired by Italian Fin. Part Group," in Footwear News, 5 March 2001.
 Articles in Donna, Grazia, Panorama, (Italy), October 1993; further articles in Ars Sutoria, December 1993; Mode Pella January 1994; and Bazaar Italy, February 1994.

*

My shoes are feminine, sexy, full of humor and perfectly made. But a shoe cannot only be pretty—it has also to fit, not hurt. Colors, materials and clear lines are very important to me. I love flat heels and very high heels.

—Andrea Pfister

* * *

"If a beautiful woman's feet hurt, she becomes ugly." This is a typically robust statement from a designer whose opulent creations have been variously described as frivolous, witty, and even in dubious taste. Yet the success of his creations depends on the combination of proportion and line with comfort: "I always think shoes should be very feminine and sexy. Compromises are often necessary. It's easy to make wonderful looking shoes, but they also have to fit and be comfortable."

Andrea Pfister's shoes are essentially Italian in their craftsmanship and attention to detail. But there is an element of lightness and irreverence about his creations not usually associated with the traditional shoemaker. He improvises on themes—starry skies, the sea, music, circuses, and Las Vegas—designing shoes such as Martini Dry, with cocktail glass heels supporting slices of lemon. He uses applique motifs, so that when a sandal is called Jazz, it really does have a snakeskin saxophone on the upper.

Another reason for the originality of his work may be that unlike most footwear designers, Pfister is a colorist. Twice a year, he retreats for two months to prepare new collections. The starting point is always color, then he works on shape, proportion, and styling. He is involved with several tanneries, creating seasonal color charts and matching colors in diverse materials such as reptile and suede as a basis for his collections. Pfister's commitment to color also explains his copious use of ornamentation. Jewels, sequins, and glitter catch the light bouncing color off upper and heel as the shoes trip lightly along. The fullest ranges of materials are used to create the desired effects. He will use sumptuous handcrafted embroidery and silks and yet is equally at home with plastics and paste stones.

Despite the occasional jokiness of his themes, the shoes are true couture creations. Pfister has always been a couturier; he began his career at the top with Lanvin and Jean Patou at the age of 21. More recently, he created shoes for Italian dress designer Mariuccia Mandeli, whose Krizia collections are also often quirky, and for the Bruno Magli label. Pfister's business has evolved as well; in 2001 his company was acquired by Fin. Part Group, allowing the designer to retain creative control while reaching new markets.

Like all original designers, his ideas were plundered by others. Snakeskin, a favorite material, was used in multicolored patches over white kidskin on a court shoe called Mosaique. This style, from the early 1980s, is instantly recognizable because it has been copied so often. His most famous style must be the Birdcage shoe of 1979. This was a closed-back, opened-toed flat pump, with the main body constructed in an open latticework of thin leather straps. It spawned millions of copies. Its final form, far removed from the finely crafted snakeskin original, is as a molded plastic beach shoe. Pfister's style in his later collections became less ornate and subtler. Even as his personal style continues to evolve, museums across the globe have hosted retrospectives of his work, honoring his enduring influence and originality.

Pfister diversified into handmade handbags, scarves, leatherwear, gloves, neckwear, and even picture frames, but remains committed to producing beautiful shoes. His attitude toward fashion is relaxed. Pfister styles complement current trends but can also stand alone. He looks for this independence in his customers, including stars from Elizabeth Taylor to Madonna. For him the client is "the woman who mixes different pieces—an Armani top, for instance, with a Donna Karan skirt, and a jacket by Ferré. My shoes work best on the woman who's sure enough of herself to create her own combination."

Andrea Pfister creates truly original footwear; though it may not be fashionable in a trendsetting sense. It may not always appeal to the mainstream idea of good taste, but the styles are extraordinary, often eccentric, and frequently enchanting, making him one of the most innovative designers of footwear.

—Chris Hill; updated by Megan Stacy

PICASSO, Paloma

French designer

Born: Paris, France, 19 April 1949, daughter of Pablo Picasso and Françoise Gilot. Education: Attended University of Paris, Sorbonne, and University of Nanterre; studied jewelry design and fabrication.

Family: Married Rafael Lopez-Cambil (aka Lopez-Sanchez), 1978.

Career: Fashion jewelry designer for Yves Saint Laurent, 1969; designed jewelry for Zolotas, 1971; designed costumes and sets for Lopez-Cambil's Parisian productions L'Interprétation, 1975 and Success, 1978; teamed with Lopez-Cambil to create Paloma Picasso brand, including jewelry for Tiffany & Company, from 1980; introduced fragrance and cosmetics line, 1984; designed men's and women's accessories for Lopez-Cambil, Ltd., 1987; began designing fabrics and wall coverings for Motif, 1993; celebrated 20 years with Tiffany, 2000; designed hosiery for Grupo Synkro; eyewear for Carrera; bone china, crystal, silverware, and tiles for Villeroy & Boch; household linens for KBC; Paloma Picasso boutiques throughout Europe, and in Japan and Hong Kong; fragrances include: Paloma, 1984; Minataure, 1992; Temptations, 1996. Award: MODA award for design excellence, 1988. Address: Lopez-Cambil Ltd., 37 West 57th Street, New York, NY 10019 USA.

PUBLICATIONS

By PICASSO:

Books

Paloma Picasso: Galleria d'Arte Cavour, with Roberto Sanesi, Milan, 1972.

Paloma Picasso in 1985. © Bettmann/CORBIS.

Designwelt Paloma Picasso (The Design World of Paloma Picasso), with Wilhelm Siemen, Hocchein, Germany, 1997.

On PICASSO:

Books

- Mulvagh, Jane, Costume Jewelry in Vogue, London, 1988.
 Stegemeyer, Anne, Who's Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.
 Loring, John, Tiffany's 20th Century: A Portrait of American Style, New York, 1997.

Articles

- Irvine, Susan, "Paloma's Pink Period," in the Sunday Express magazine (London), 7 August 1988.
 Fusco, Ann Castronovo, "Paloma's Classic Touch," in House Beautiful (London), February 1989.
 Samuel, Kathryn, "The Look That Says Picasso," in the Daily Telegraph (London), 7 September 1989.
 Beckett-Young, Kathleen, "Design for Living," in Working Woman (New York), October 1990.

- Gandee, Charles, "Paloma Picasso Has Mass Appeal," in House & Garden, November 1990.
 Stern, Ellen, "The Prolific Paloma," in House Beautiful (London), March 1992.
 Landis, Dylan, "Paloma Picasso's Signature Style," in Metropolitan Home (New York), September/October 1993.
 Gendel, Debra, "With a Red Kiss, Picasso Tours," in the Los Angeles Times, 13 August 1993.
 Jolis, Alan, "Matisse, Picasso, Disney, and Paloma: Paloma Picasso Talks About Life With—and Without—Her Father," in ARTnews, November 1996.
 Nightengale, Cyndi Y., "Wall Falls," in the Los Angeles Times, 2 May 1998.
 "Paloma Picasso," in the Los Angeles Times, November 1998.
 Ceballos, Chris, "Focus: Orange County Community News," in the Los Angeles Times, 26 August 1999.
 Musselman, Faye, "The Softer Side of Paloma Picasso," in HFN (Home Furnishings Network), 20 March 2000.
 Hessen, Wendy, "Tiffany Celebrates 20 Paloma Years," in WWD, 2 October 2000.
 "Charles Tiffany's 'Fancy Goods' Shop and How It Grew," from the Biography Resource Center, the Gale Group, 2001.
 "Paloma Picasso," from the Biography Resource Center, the Gale Group, 2001.

* * *

With such a name, one could hardly fail to be noticed. And since her marriage, her name has an even more exotic ring—Paloma Picasso Lopez-Sanchez. The daughter of Pablo Picasso, however, is undoubtedly a personality and exciting talent in her own right. Visually arresting with striking features, she always wore bright red lipstick to emphasize her white skin and thick, black hair; when she reached her fifties, however, she no longer cared for such scrutiny and wore less noticeable cosmetics. "For 20 years, I put it on every day," Picasso told Faye Musselman of the Home Furnishings Network's weekly newspaper, HFN, in March 2000. "When I was younger, I wanted to make an impression, to look older. But now that I've turned 50, I obviously don't want to look older anymore."

Picasso has, however, continued to be a newsworthy and photogenic participant in the world's fashion circuit—and not because she is the daughter of Pablo Picasso. Picasso fille has earned her reputation through a myriad of creations, from fragrances, bath and body products, and cosmetics to sought-after jewelry and home furnishings.

Picasso was born and educated in Paris. Formally trained as a jewelry designer, her interest was possibly kindled by childhood memories of the glass beads seen on the island of Murano in Venice and an early fascination with sparkling colors. Initially, she was involved in costume design for the theater, where her originality and exotic pieces attracted much attention. An invitation from Yves Saint Laurent to create a collection of jewelry for his couture house ensured that her work was widely seen, and in 1972 her gold designs for the Greek company Zolotas achieved further recognition and acclaim.

