In 1980 Picasso began designing jewelry for Tiffany & Company of New York, the legendary jeweler. Her early creations mixed color and varying gemstones in bold designs, demonstrating a modernity and panache that singled them out as something special. Her name (meaning "dove") and the color red were long used as essential ingredients of her work. Picasso's also began experimenting with fragrance, creating the very successful and distinctive Paloma, with its dynamic red and black packaging and strikingly shaped bottle. Described by its creator as “jewelry for the senses,” the floral, wood, and amber scent was formulated in 1984 along with a cosmetics and bath line including body lotion, powder, shower gel, and soap.

The year 2000 marked a time for commemoration and change for Picasso. She had stopped wearing her trademark red lipstick, and underwent an artistic transformation as well. Her home furnishings collections, consisting of wallpaper and fabrics, had always been awash in bold, vibrant colors. But the new patterns and colors available in 2000 were softened and subtle, especially in a shimmering silk collection awash in silvery-grays, blues and greens. Moreover, there was more emphasis on texture and less on pattern.

While Picasso's jewelry has been available in the U.S. since the 1980s, her home accessories collections (except for a stint in linens) were sold in Europe. In the new millennium, however, the designer considered broadening both her product line and market. Style for the home, she commented to HFN's Musselman, “has become the new fashion statement. People are spending [much] more time thinking about their surroundings.” Like a true connoisseur, though, she eschewed trends. “I don't like fashion that changes every six months. It's like the icing on the cake—but you still have to have a very good cake.” Picasso's designs, whether for the body or its environment, continue to evolve.

—Margo Seaman; updated by Kimbally A. Medeiros

Design by Robert Piguet, 1937. © Austrian Archives/CORBIS.

PIGUET, Robert

Swiss/French designer

Born: Yverdon, Switzerland, 1901; immigrated to France, 1918.

Education: Trained as a banker; studied fashion design under Redfern and Paul Poiret, 1918–28. Career: Founded own fashion house, 1933; sold designs by Dior, Balmain, Bohan, Givenchy, and Galanos; introduced perfume, Bandit, 1944, then Fracas, both of which remained successful for years; retired and closed his business, 1951.

Died: 22 February 1953, in Lausanne.

PUBLICATIONS

On PIGUET:

Books

McDowell, Colin, McDowell's Directory of Twentieth Century Fashion, Englewood Cliffs, NJ, 1985.

O'Hara, Georgina, The Encyclopaedia of Fashion, New York, 1986.

Stegemeyer, Anne, Who's Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.

* * *

Robert Piguet headed his own couture house for nearly two decades, and the years were the culmination if not the sum of his career in fashion. He learned his craft in two of the more important houses of the early 20th century, Poiret and Redfern. Both houses were fashionable and influential, but they espoused widely divergent philosophies of fashion and appealed to very different customers. In developing his own style, Piguet combined the imagination and awareness of Poiret at his peak with the quality and stability of Redfern. The resulting look was youthful but not girlish; the clothes echoed, flattered, and enhanced the body beneath them. There was an essential effortless wearability to garments from Piguet, which the vantage point of more than half a century has neither diminished nor obscured.

Like Poiret, Piguet understood and employed the links between high fashion and the arts. His collections often reflected his sensitivity to the cultural environment of the moment. An example is his response to the historical romanticism of the 1930s, an important movement fed by theatrical and motion picture costume dramas. These provided Piguet with inspiration for everything from suits to evening gowns. Particularly notable was the spring 1936 collection, which featured high, gathered-sleeve caps, bold up-flaring collars, or wide shoulder yokes based on 16th century modes used in the hit play Margot.

Just a short time later, during the early years of World War II, Piguet produced collections with a different, darker mood, influenced by political circumstances. In these, models were accessorized with such wartime essentials as gas masks, or given topical names referring to the realities and hardships of wartime life. Even his fabric choices reflected his surroundings. In 1945 Piguet joined many fellow Paris designers in the Théâtre de la Mode. With an eye to the scarcities and rationing of the immediate postwar years he used synthetics for several of his models.

No matter what Piguet's mood or inspiration, however, his creations always remained clothing, and never descended into costume—or they would now be considered camp, not classic. Some of Piguet's fragrance, creating the very successful and distinctive Paloma, with its dynamic red and black packaging and strikingly shaped bottle. Described by its creator as “jewelry for the senses,” the floral, wood, and amber scent was formulated in 1984 along with a cosmetics and bath line including body lotion, powder, shower gel, and soap.

The year 2000 marked a time for commemoration and change for Picasso. She had stopped wearing her trademark red lipstick, and underwent an artistic transformation as well. Her home furnishings collections, consisting of wallpaper and fabrics, had always been awash in bold, vibrant colors. But the new patterns and colors available in 2000 were softened and subtle, especially in a shimmering silk collection awash in silvery-grays, blues and greens. Moreover, there was more emphasis on texture and less on pattern.

While Picasso's jewelry has been available in the U.S. since the 1980s, her home accessories collections (except for a stint in linens) were sold in Europe. In the new millennium, however, the designer considered broadening both her product line and market. Style for the home, she commented to HFN's Musselman, “has become the new fashion statement. People are spending [much] more time thinking about their surroundings.” Like a true connoisseur, though, she eschewed trends. “I don't like fashion that changes every six months. It's like the icing on the cake—but you still have to have a very good cake.” Picasso's designs, whether for the body or its environment, continue to evolve.

—Margo Seaman; updated by Kimbally A. Medeiros

Design by Robert Piguet, 1937. © Austrian Archives/CORBIS.

PIGUET, Robert

Swiss/French designer

Born: Yverdon, Switzerland, 1901; immigrated to France, 1918.

Education: Trained as a banker; studied fashion design under Redfern and Paul Poiret, 1918–28. Career: Founded own fashion house, 1933; sold designs by Dior, Balmain, Bohan, Givenchy, and Galanos; introduced perfume, Bandit, 1944, then Fracas, both of which remained successful for years; retired and closed his business, 1951.

Died: 22 February 1953, in Lausanne.

PUBLICATIONS

On PIGUET:

Books

McDowell, Colin, McDowell's Directory of Twentieth Century Fashion, Englewood Cliffs, NJ, 1985.

O'Hara, Georgina, The Encyclopaedia of Fashion, New York, 1986.

Stegemeyer, Anne, Who's Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.

* * *

Robert Piguet headed his own couture house for nearly two decades, and the years were the culmination if not the sum of his career in fashion. He learned his craft in two of the more important houses of the early 20th century, Poiret and Redfern. Both houses were fashionable and influential, but they espoused widely divergent philosophies of fashion and appealed to very different customers. In developing his own style, Piguet combined the imagination and awareness of Poiret at his peak with the quality and stability of Redfern. The resulting look was youthful but not girlish; the clothes echoed, flattered, and enhanced the body beneath them. There was an essential effortless wearability to garments from Piguet, which the vantage point of more than half a century has neither diminished nor obscured.

Like Poiret, Piguet understood and employed the links between high fashion and the arts. His collections often reflected his sensitivity to the cultural environment of the moment. An example is his response to the historical romanticism of the 1930s, an important movement fed by theatrical and motion picture costume dramas. These provided Piguet with inspiration for everything from suits to evening gowns. Particularly notable was the spring 1936 collection, which featured high, gathered-sleeve caps, bold up-flaring collars, or wide shoulder yokes based on 16th century modes used in the hit play Margot.

Just a short time later, during the early years of World War II, Piguet produced collections with a different, darker mood, influenced by political circumstances. In these, models were accessorized with such wartime essentials as gas masks, or given topical names referring to the realities and hardships of wartime life. Even his fabric choices reflected his surroundings. In 1945 Piguet joined many fellow Paris designers in the Théâtre de la Mode. With an eye to the scarcities and rationing of the immediate postwar years he used synthetics for several of his models.

No matter what Piguet's mood or inspiration, however, his creations always remained clothing, and never descended into costume—or they would now be considered camp, not classic. Some of Piguet's most timeless designs include the post-New Look evening dresses which harkened back to the romantic silhouettes he used in the 1930s. These were in sync with his contemporaries, but, in a way, cleaner, with less ornamentation.

Since several different designers worked for Piguet, it is difficult to isolate elements of cut or construction as hallmarks of his house. There was, instead, an overarching impression of ease, comfort, and femininity. Piguet clothes, however fitted, never seemed to constrict or restrict the wearer. Allowance was made for movement: a narrow waist expanding into pleats or gathers above or below, a sheath skirt topped by a dolman-sleeved bodice. Tailored garments were rarely hard-edged; the severity of a pleated shirtwaist dress was mitigated by a short, cascading bolero top. Slim suit-skirts might be side draped sarong-style, or pegged with a gathered waistline; jackets could have rounded peak lapels, or tulip hem. Even a post-liberation suit, styled on the lines of an Allied forces military police uniform, had a shawl collar, long gloves crushed around the wrists, and white detailing to lift the khaki linen outfit out of the masculine realm.

It might be said that Piguet's most lasting contributions to postwar fashion were the designers he employed and encouraged. Dior, Givenchy, and Balmain each worked for or sold designs to Piguet in the 1930s and 1940s, and went on to open houses of their own. Whether Piguet hired them because an inherent romanticism in their work agreed with his fashion sense, or they learned from him traits which each would use to advantage in his own business is not a matter of record. Piguet's wisdom in choosing able designers, however, was more than matched by his skill in maintaining the identity of his house and collections, no matter who produced the actual sketches.

All Piguet's clothes provide distinction without constraint, and comfort without disorder. The fashions he fostered bespoke a mature editorial talent, ranging freely with his times and of his times. After retiring due to health problems in 1951, Piquet died two years later in Lausanne, Switzerland.

—Madelyn Shaw

PIPART, Gérard

French fashion designer

Born: Near Paris, 25 December 1933. Education: Studied at the École de la Chambre Syndicale de la Couture Parisienne. Career: Began selling sketches to Balmain and Jacques Fath; sketched for Marc Bohan and Givenchy; became chief designer for Nina Ricci, from 1963; freelanced for London's Germaine et Jane, Jean Baillie-Itemcey, and Chloé. Awards: De d'Or, or Golden Thimble, for best couture collection, 1987; National Knight Cross Badge, 1995.

PUBLICATIONS

On PIPART:

Books

Lambert, Eleanor, World of Fashion: People, Places, Resources, New York, 1976.

- McDowell, Colin, McDowell's Directory of Twentieth Century Fashion, New Jersey, 1985.
 O'Hara, Georgina, The Encyclopaedia of Fashion, New York, 1986.
 Skrebneski, Victor, The Art of Haute Couture, New York, 1995.
 Stegemeyer, Anne, Who's Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.

Articles

- "Ricci Cruise," in WWD, 6 July 1990.
 "Gianfranco's Couture Chic Revs Up Dior," in WWD, 29 January 1991.
 Deeny, Godfrey, "Ricci's Pipart: Staying Power," in WWD, 26 January 1995.
 Menkes, Suzy, "Divine Madness: Galliano True to Himself at Dior Debut," in the International Herald Tribune, 21 January 1997.
 "New York: A Delicate Balance," in WWD, 16 February 2001.
 "Alta Costura vs. Prêt-à-Porter," available online at Tendencia.com, www.tendencia.com 20 August 2001.
 "Gerard Pipart," available online at International Culture Festival, www.sh.com, 20 August 2001.

Gérard Pipart, designed for the house of Nina Ricci's 1995 collection. © AFP/CORBIS.

most timeless designs include the post-New Look evening dresses which harkened back to the romantic silhouettes he used in the 1930s. These were in sync with his contemporaries, but, in a way, cleaner, with less ornamentation.

Since several different designers worked for Piguet, it is difficult to isolate elements of cut or construction as hallmarks of his house. There was, instead, an overarching impression of ease, comfort, and femininity. Piguet clothes, however fitted, never seemed to constrict or restrict the wearer. Allowance was made for movement: a narrow waist expanding into pleats or gathers above or below, a sheath skirt topped by a dolman-sleeved bodice. Tailored garments were rarely hard-edged; the severity of a pleated shirtwaist dress was mitigated by a short, cascading bolero top. Slim suit-skirts might be side draped sarong-style, or pegged with a gathered waistline; jackets could have rounded peak lapels, or tulip hem. Even a post-liberation suit, styled on the lines of an Allied forces military police uniform, had a shawl collar, long gloves crushed around the wrists, and white detailing to lift the khaki linen outfit out of the masculine realm.

It might be said that Piguet's most lasting contributions to postwar fashion were the designers he employed and encouraged. Dior, Givenchy, and Balmain each worked for or sold designs to Piguet in the 1930s and 1940s, and went on to open houses of their own. Whether Piguet hired them because an inherent romanticism in their work agreed with his fashion sense, or they learned from him traits which each would use to advantage in his own business is not a matter of record. Piguet's wisdom in choosing able designers, however, was more than matched by his skill in maintaining the identity of his house and collections, no matter who produced the actual sketches.

All Piguet's clothes provide distinction without constraint, and comfort without disorder. The fashions he fostered bespoke a mature editorial talent, ranging freely with his times and of his times. After retiring due to health problems in 1951, Piquet died two years later in Lausanne, Switzerland.

—Madelyn Shaw

PIPART, Gérard

French fashion designer

Born: Near Paris, 25 December 1933. Education: Studied at the École de la Chambre Syndicale de la Couture Parisienne. Career: Began selling sketches to Balmain and Jacques Fath; sketched for Marc Bohan and Givenchy; became chief designer for Nina Ricci, from 1963; freelanced for London's Germaine et Jane, Jean Baillie-Itemcey, and Chloé. Awards: De d'Or, or Golden Thimble, for best couture collection, 1987; National Knight Cross Badge, 1995.

PUBLICATIONS

On PIPART:

Books

Lambert, Eleanor, World of Fashion: People, Places, Resources, New York, 1976.

- McDowell, Colin, McDowell's Directory of Twentieth Century Fashion, New Jersey, 1985.
 O'Hara, Georgina, The Encyclopaedia of Fashion, New York, 1986.
 Skrebneski, Victor, The Art of Haute Couture, New York, 1995.
 Stegemeyer, Anne, Who's Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.

Articles

- "Ricci Cruise," in WWD, 6 July 1990.
 "Gianfranco's Couture Chic Revs Up Dior," in WWD, 29 January 1991.
 Deeny, Godfrey, "Ricci's Pipart: Staying Power," in WWD, 26 January 1995.
 Menkes, Suzy, "Divine Madness: Galliano True to Himself at Dior Debut," in the International Herald Tribune, 21 January 1997.
 "New York: A Delicate Balance," in WWD, 16 February 2001.
 "Alta Costura vs. Prêt-à-Porter," available online at Tendencia.com, www.tendencia.com 20 August 2001.
 "Gerard Pipart," available online at International Culture Festival, www.sh.com, 20 August 2001.

Gérard Pipart, designed for the house of Nina Ricci's 1995 collection. © AFP/CORBIS.

Gérard Pipart, designed for the house of Nina Ricci's spring 1965 "Java" collection: linen with a shantung bodice. © Bettmann/CORBIS.

* * *

Before the age of 30, Gérard Pipart had become the most vital women's ready-to-wear designer in Paris. His clothes were already great sellers abroad. He made his mark with snappy, colorful sportswear, well-tailored, detailed, and with a deceptively casual simplicity that only good seams and a fine cut can guarantee. He became known for his inspired use of fabrics, as he skillfully manipulated every material he chose into amusing, wearable chic. His work as a freelancer at Chloé and other houses gained him widespread visibility, and he was hired by Nina Ricci in 1963 to replace designer Jules-François Crahay. His move to Nina Ricci's Haute Couture Studio was closely watched, and indeed, the young, fresh-faced designer brought new life to Ricci with his lively, youthful designs.

As a young designer, Pipart considered Balenciaga an important influence and greatly admired the designs of Norell. His background as an assistant at Balmain, Fath, and with Marc Bohan at Patou gave him a solid grounding in haute couture before he became a bright young star in ready-to-wear and then back again to couture. His couture collections have included elegant daytime wear, sumptuous coats, extravagant evening looks, furs, and bridal wear. Early collections focused on supple lines and a fit close to the body without being overly confining, and his clothes were praised as “never, never too haute.” Later collections investigated the long, languid lines of the bias-cut dress, played with loose, theatrical capes, feminized the culotte for daytime wear, and toyed with 1940s and 1950s retro looks.

His penchant for no-holds-barred glamor can be seen in evening dresses of frothy chiffon and bright, opulent taffeta, long-waisted and cinched, with high trumpet sleeves and luxuriant folds billowing to the floor, or exquisite embroideries requiring hundreds of hours of work. He dared to defy the “bride wore white” norm with his design for a Provençal-printed, multicolored mélange of a bridal dress, wrapped at the waist with a wide cummerbund, topped with a short jacket splashed with rhinestones. Fur trim, feathered hats, ruffles, lace, long gloves—Pipart has never shied away from a certain feminine, Parisian elegance in his designs and use of accessories.

His 1990s collections included bright, crisp cruise wear, including short skirts and swimsuits with matching floor-length skirts in shades of hot orange, fuchsia, and kelly green. Fabrics ranged from cotton pique and satin to embroidered linen and cotton jersey, affording comfortable and cheerful warm-weather looks. Other collections have highlighted pleats, with pastel skirts under pleated safari jackets for day and long iridescent taffeta dresses for evening. Pipart also received praise for his white linen suits and two-toned, draped crêpe dresses.

Not really an innovator, Pipart’s strength at Ricci has been his ability to take stock of fashion trends throughout each season and then to imbue them with freshness and youthfulness without sacrificing his unerring sense of French good taste. Pipart earned much respect in the early 1990s for his three decades as Nina Ricci’s couturier designer of classic, ultrafeminine costumes. Reminiscing of the mid-1960s, he recalled, “I was only thirty, young and full of new ideas, so it was all pretty different and I had to adjust.” He numbered among his fans the queens of Thailand and Norway, Grand Duchess Josephine-Charlotte of Luxembourg, Marcella Perez de Cuellar, and Mai Hallingby.

Looking back with pride in his staying power, Pipart admitted that he was initially hesitant to throw in with Ricci. Of the flux of the fashion world, he remarked, “I’m amazed I stayed so long. When I arrived everyone was predicting the death of couture, so I was keen to get in for what were meant to be the final few years.” Marking his 30th anniversary, he showed a collection of multicolored caftans and harem pants, ostrich plumes, and pleated column shapes with bustiers or lace bodies, his homage to impressionist painter Eugene Delacroix. He stated his objective: “My goal is to make a woman beautiful. In the evening, it’s a great pleasure when a woman makes a man happy, hopefully in my clothes.” By 1997 the irrepressibly romantic Pipart was off in poufs of pink taffeta. Of his elevation of women into birds of style, Suzy Menkes of the International Herald Tribune remarked, “His polished technique is at its best in floaty evening dresses as fine as a mille-feuille pastry and twice as sweet.”

—Kathleen Paton; updated by Mary Ellen Snodgrass

PLATT, Johnathan

See ALLY CAPELLINO

POLLEN, Arabella

British designer

Born: London, England, 21 June 1961. Education: Self-taught in design. Family: Married Giacomo Algranti, 1985 (separated, 1992); children: Jesse, Sam. Career: Worked as a personal assistant in advertising and on film scripts in France, 1979–81; established own business, Arabella Pollen, Inc., 1981; introduced Pollen B diffusion range, 1992; ceased trading, 1993; freelance hosiery designer, Courtaulds Textiles, for Aristoc, Rech, and Lyle & Scott, 1993. Address: 8 Canham Mews, Canham Road, London W3 7SR, England.

PUBLICATIONS

On POLLEN:

Articles

- Wansell, Geoffrey, “Buzz about Miss Pollen,” in the Sunday Telegraph Magazine (London), 5 June 1983.
- Modlinger, Jackie, “Bella la Bella,” in the Daily Express (London), 14 July 1985.
- Jobey, Liz, “Designing Women,” in Vogue (London), July 1987.
- Samuel, Kathryn, “Pollen: A Success Story Not to Be Sneeze At,” in the Daily Telegraph (London), 14 December 1987.
- “Soul Sister,” in the Sunday Times Magazine (London), 6 May 1990.
- Haggard, Claire, “Getting an Education in the Borders,” in the Independent (London), 26 May 1990.
- Smith, Liz, “In Her Own Image,” in the Times (London), 3 July 1990.
- Tredre, Roger, “A Designer Prepared to Meet Her Maker,” in the Independent, 11 August 1990.
- Collier, Andrew, “Pollen’s Body English: A British Designer Puts Her Own Twist on the Classics,” in WWD, September 1990.
- Smith, Liz, “Putting New Faith in Pollen,” in the Times [Saturday Review], 27 October 1990.
- Armstrong, Lisa, “Stuff the Purple Satin Tabards! It’s Pollen B, Honey!” in the Independent, 20 February 1992.
- Morris, Bernadine, “A Reality Check for British Designers,” in the Dallas Morning News, 25 March 1992.
- Flett, Scarth, “Arabella Pollen,” in the Observer Magazine (London), 23 February 1993.
- “Textiles Giant Axes Designer Fashion Firm,” in the Independent, 20 May 1993.
- Samuel, Kathryn, “From Cheers to Tears for Arabella Pollen Label,” in the Daily Telegraph, 20 May 1993.
- Fallon, James, “Arabella Pollen Closes Business,” in WWD, 20 May 1993.
- “New York: A Delicate Balance,” in WWD, 16 February 2001.
- “Arabella Pollen,” available online in the Vogue Archives, www.cntraveller.co.uk, 20 August 2001.

* * *

Arabella Pollen established a reputation as the bold colorist of British fashion. She became known for her snappy, classic, and wearable suits that were always trimmed with witty and unexpected touches—braid, velvet, or combinations of vivid orange, turquoise, and pink on a black jacket shape. Her special occasion wear was described by Harvey Nichols’ buying director Amanda Verdan as “brilliant, perfect and never fuddy duddy.” Traditional gold laces young star in ready-to-wear and then back again to couture. His couture collections have included elegant daytime wear, sumptuous coats, extravagant evening looks, furs, and bridal wear. Early collections focused on supple lines and a fit close to the body without being overly confining, and his clothes were praised as “never, never too haute.” Later collections investigated the long, languid lines of the bias-cut dress, played with loose, theatrical capes, feminized the culotte for daytime wear, and toyed with 1940s and 1950s retro looks.

His penchant for no-holds-barred glamor can be seen in evening dresses of frothy chiffon and bright, opulent taffeta, long-waisted and cinched, with high trumpet sleeves and luxuriant folds billowing to the floor, or exquisite embroideries requiring hundreds of hours of work. He dared to defy the “bride wore white” norm with his design for a Provençal-printed, multicolored mélange of a bridal dress, wrapped at the waist with a wide cummerbund, topped with a short jacket splashed with rhinestones. Fur trim, feathered hats, ruffles, lace, long gloves—Pipart has never shied away from a certain feminine, Parisian elegance in his designs and use of accessories.

His 1990s collections included bright, crisp cruise wear, including short skirts and swimsuits with matching floor-length skirts in shades of hot orange, fuchsia, and kelly green. Fabrics ranged from cotton pique and satin to embroidered linen and cotton jersey, affording comfortable and cheerful warm-weather looks. Other collections have highlighted pleats, with pastel skirts under pleated safari jackets for day and long iridescent taffeta dresses for evening. Pipart also received praise for his white linen suits and two-toned, draped crêpe dresses.

Not really an innovator, Pipart’s strength at Ricci has been his ability to take stock of fashion trends throughout each season and then to imbue them with freshness and youthfulness without sacrificing his unerring sense of French good taste. Pipart earned much respect in the early 1990s for his three decades as Nina Ricci’s couturier designer of classic, ultrafeminine costumes. Reminiscing of the mid-1960s, he recalled, “I was only thirty, young and full of new ideas, so it was all pretty different and I had to adjust.” He numbered among his fans the queens of Thailand and Norway, Grand Duchess Josephine-Charlotte of Luxembourg, Marcella Perez de Cuellar, and Mai Hallingby.

Looking back with pride in his staying power, Pipart admitted that he was initially hesitant to throw in with Ricci. Of the flux of the fashion world, he remarked, “I’m amazed I stayed so long. When I arrived everyone was predicting the death of couture, so I was keen to get in for what were meant to be the final few years.” Marking his 30th anniversary, he showed a collection of multicolored caftans and harem pants, ostrich plumes, and pleated column shapes with bustiers or lace bodies, his homage to impressionist painter Eugene Delacroix. He stated his objective: “My goal is to make a woman beautiful. In the evening, it’s a great pleasure when a woman makes a man happy, hopefully in my clothes.” By 1997 the irrepressibly romantic Pipart was off in poufs of pink taffeta. Of his elevation of women into birds of style, Suzy Menkes of the International Herald Tribune remarked, “His polished technique is at its best in floaty evening dresses as fine as a mille-feuille pastry and twice as sweet.”

—Kathleen Paton; updated by Mary Ellen Snodgrass

PLATT, Johnathan

See ALLY CAPELLINO

POLLEN, Arabella

British designer

Born: London, England, 21 June 1961. Education: Self-taught in design. Family: Married Giacomo Algranti, 1985 (separated, 1992); children: Jesse, Sam. Career: Worked as a personal assistant in advertising and on film scripts in France, 1979–81; established own business, Arabella Pollen, Inc., 1981; introduced Pollen B diffusion range, 1992; ceased trading, 1993; freelance hosiery designer, Courtaulds Textiles, for Aristoc, Rech, and Lyle & Scott, 1993. Address: 8 Canham Mews, Canham Road, London W3 7SR, England.

PUBLICATIONS

On POLLEN:

Articles

- Wansell, Geoffrey, “Buzz about Miss Pollen,” in the Sunday Telegraph Magazine (London), 5 June 1983.
- Modlinger, Jackie, “Bella la Bella,” in the Daily Express (London), 14 July 1985.
- Jobey, Liz, “Designing Women,” in Vogue (London), July 1987.
- Samuel, Kathryn, “Pollen: A Success Story Not to Be Sneeze At,” in the Daily Telegraph (London), 14 December 1987.
- “Soul Sister,” in the Sunday Times Magazine (London), 6 May 1990.
- Haggard, Claire, “Getting an Education in the Borders,” in the Independent (London), 26 May 1990.
- Smith, Liz, “In Her Own Image,” in the Times (London), 3 July 1990.
- Tredre, Roger, “A Designer Prepared to Meet Her Maker,” in the Independent, 11 August 1990.
- Collier, Andrew, “Pollen’s Body English: A British Designer Puts Her Own Twist on the Classics,” in WWD, September 1990.
- Smith, Liz, “Putting New Faith in Pollen,” in the Times [Saturday Review], 27 October 1990.
- Armstrong, Lisa, “Stuff the Purple Satin Tabards! It’s Pollen B, Honey!” in the Independent, 20 February 1992.
- Morris, Bernadine, “A Reality Check for British Designers,” in the Dallas Morning News, 25 March 1992.
- Flett, Scarth, “Arabella Pollen,” in the Observer Magazine (London), 23 February 1993.
- “Textiles Giant Axes Designer Fashion Firm,” in the Independent, 20 May 1993.
- Samuel, Kathryn, “From Cheers to Tears for Arabella Pollen Label,” in the Daily Telegraph, 20 May 1993.
- Fallon, James, “Arabella Pollen Closes Business,” in WWD, 20 May 1993.
- “New York: A Delicate Balance,” in WWD, 16 February 2001.
- “Arabella Pollen,” available online in the Vogue Archives, www.cntraveller.co.uk, 20 August 2001.

* * *

Arabella Pollen established a reputation as the bold colorist of British fashion. She became known for her snappy, classic, and wearable suits that were always trimmed with witty and unexpected touches—braid, velvet, or combinations of vivid orange, turquoise, and pink on a black jacket shape. Her special occasion wear was described by Harvey Nichols’ buying director Amanda Verdan as “brilliant, perfect and never fuddy duddy.” Traditional gold laces were made into slinky, long-sleeved tunics teamed with matching hot pants; short shifts of scarlet sequins were edged with pink velvet and wrapped in hooded velvet robes.

Pollen entered the world of fashion without formal training in design. She had hated drawing and sewing as a child but started making clothes for herself and friends at the age of 19. She found that she could survive on the money her clothes were making and began to expand. After designing and making a collection of clothes based on the hunting styles of the early 1900s, she showed the clothes to the wealthy publisher Naim Attallah, who was impressed by her enthusiasm and talent and agreed to provide financial backing.

Pollen's customers have tended to be like herself: young, energetic, with a relaxed style. She realized quickly to survive she had to find an identifiable look that was innovative but not too daring. She recognized there was a niche for chic elegant sportswear, telling the Sunday Telegraph Magazine in June 1983, "I try to do clothes that you can more or less slum around in, but that look elegant at the same time." The look instantly appealed to a particular group of upper-class women and their daughters christened by the press as "Sloane Rangers." Diana, the late Princess of Wales, was one of Pollen's first customers, wearing a number of her well-cut tweeds and dresses from her early collections. This proved a great publicity coup for the young designer and convinced Attallah he had made a wise investment.

Pollen was often her own best advertisement for the clothes, inspiring an affinity between designer and customer by incorporating many of her designs into her own personal wardrobe. This image was strengthened when she agreed to be photographed in the clothes she designed for the fashion manufacturers Windsmoor. The company recognized in Pollen a designer with a strong identity who could adapt her style to updating the Windsmoor image. Although Windsmoor suffered from its overly genteel reputation in the early 1980s, Pollen's youthful styles sharpened the company's identity and boosted sales.

In 1990 Courtaulds Textiles bought a minority stake in Pollen's business, a link that gave her the resources to make a huge international impact. Unfortunately, while sales grew rapidly in the UK, this was not the case in other parts of the world. After reviewing the situation, both parties felt it was inappropriate at this stage to provide further resources, and Arabella Pollen Ltd. announced that it had ceased trading in May 1993, though Pollen retained her link with Courtaulds as a design consultant.

As a woman designing for women, Pollen proved she had no preconceived ideas about what women wanted to wear. Wearing the clothes herself gave her insight into how women actually felt about them, their likes and dislikes—a major contribution to fashion that was accompanied by close attention to detail, quality, cut, and fit. An independent spokeswoman for women, Pollen had summarized her outlook years before in Vogue, stating: "I think modern women are tired of being dictated to by faddish whimsy. Fashion should be alive, expressing, not swamping, personality." From designing for the Princess of Wales and earning £1.2 million in 1990 at the top of her form, Pollen departed the first phase of her career to serve as design consultant for Courtaulds, including hosiery by Aristoc, Rech, and Lyle & Scott.

—Kevin Almond; updated by Mary Ellen Snodgrass

POLO

See LAUREN, Ralph

POMODORO, Carmelo

American designer

Born: New York, 20 March 1956. Education: Studied painting, then fashion design at Parsons School of Design, New York, graduated in 1978. Career: Assistant to designers Ralph Lauren, Stan Herman, and Bill Haire, mid-1970s to 1981; showed first collection, working from home, 1981; designer, Betty Hanson company, New York, 1982–86; established Carmelo Pomodoro Design Studio, Inc. for freelance work, 1985; formed Carmelo Pomodoro Sportswear, Ltd., 1986; introduced lower priced line, 1987, and line of bodywear, 1991; licenses included jewelry, from 1989, furs, from 1990, and Toyota sportswear line, from 1990; first of seven Carmelo Pomodoro boutiques, joint ventures with Takashima Company, opened in Tokyo, 1989; dressed television commentators for Winter Olympics, 1992. Died: 1 October 1992, in New York.

PUBLICATIONS

On POMODORO:

Books

Milbank, Caroline Rennolds, New York Fashion: The Evolution of American Style, New York 1989.
Ewing, Elizabeth, History of Twentieth Century Fashion, New York 1992.

Articles

Buck, Genevieve, "Two 'Overnight Successes' Spring Forth—with 26 Years Between Them," in Chicago Tribune, 22 July 1987.
Behbehani, Mandy, "Young, Hip Believers in Affordable Fashion," in the San Francisco Examiner, 26 June 1990.
Hayes, Tracy Achor, "Young Designers with Big Potential," in the Dallas Morning News, 3 October 1990.
Hix, Charles, "The 'Hot Tomato' of Cornwall Hollow: Fashion Designer Carmelo Pomodoro Carves High-Profile Niche with His Forward Fashions," in the Litchfield County Times (Connecticut), 22 February 1991.
_____, "Carmelo Pomodoro," in Collections Tokyo-New York, Spring/Summer 1991.
White, Constance C.R., "Sportswear Report SCOOP," in WWD, 25 September 1991.
Blissard, Mardi, "Autumn Fashions on the Runway at Bolo Bash IV—New York Designer Carmelo Pomodoro," in the Arkansas Times, 11 June 1992.
Lambert, Bruce, "Carmelo Pomodoro, 37, Designer Who Led New York Fashion Firm," [obituary] in the New York Times, 2 October 1992.
White, Constance C.R., "Carmelo Pomodoro Dead at 37: Energetic and Talented, He Helped Lead Young Designer Pack," in WWD, 2 October 1992.

* * *

The November 1992 cover of Harper's Bazaar was redesigned at the last moment to pay homage to one of the most promising fashion

were made into slinky, long-sleeved tunics teamed with matching hot pants; short shifts of scarlet sequins were edged with pink velvet and wrapped in hooded velvet robes.

Pollen entered the world of fashion without formal training in design. She had hated drawing and sewing as a child but started making clothes for herself and friends at the age of 19. She found that she could survive on the money her clothes were making and began to expand. After designing and making a collection of clothes based on the hunting styles of the early 1900s, she showed the clothes to the wealthy publisher Naim Attallah, who was impressed by her enthusiasm and talent and agreed to provide financial backing.

Pollen's customers have tended to be like herself: young, energetic, with a relaxed style. She realized quickly to survive she had to find an identifiable look that was innovative but not too daring. She recognized there was a niche for chic elegant sportswear, telling the Sunday Telegraph Magazine in June 1983, "I try to do clothes that you can more or less slum around in, but that look elegant at the same time." The look instantly appealed to a particular group of upper-class women and their daughters christened by the press as "Sloane Rangers." Diana, the late Princess of Wales, was one of Pollen's first customers, wearing a number of her well-cut tweeds and dresses from her early collections. This proved a great publicity coup for the young designer and convinced Attallah he had made a wise investment.

Pollen was often her own best advertisement for the clothes, inspiring an affinity between designer and customer by incorporating many of her designs into her own personal wardrobe. This image was strengthened when she agreed to be photographed in the clothes she designed for the fashion manufacturers Windsmoor. The company recognized in Pollen a designer with a strong identity who could adapt her style to updating the Windsmoor image. Although Windsmoor suffered from its overly genteel reputation in the early 1980s, Pollen's youthful styles sharpened the company's identity and boosted sales.

In 1990 Courtaulds Textiles bought a minority stake in Pollen's business, a link that gave her the resources to make a huge international impact. Unfortunately, while sales grew rapidly in the UK, this was not the case in other parts of the world. After reviewing the situation, both parties felt it was inappropriate at this stage to provide further resources, and Arabella Pollen Ltd. announced that it had ceased trading in May 1993, though Pollen retained her link with Courtaulds as a design consultant.

As a woman designing for women, Pollen proved she had no preconceived ideas about what women wanted to wear. Wearing the clothes herself gave her insight into how women actually felt about them, their likes and dislikes—a major contribution to fashion that was accompanied by close attention to detail, quality, cut, and fit. An independent spokeswoman for women, Pollen had summarized her outlook years before in Vogue, stating: "I think modern women are tired of being dictated to by faddish whimsy. Fashion should be alive, expressing, not swamping, personality." From designing for the Princess of Wales and earning £1.2 million in 1990 at the top of her form, Pollen departed the first phase of her career to serve as design consultant for Courtaulds, including hosiery by Aristoc, Rech, and Lyle & Scott.

—Kevin Almond; updated by Mary Ellen Snodgrass

POLO

See LAUREN, Ralph

POMODORO, Carmelo

American designer

Born: New York, 20 March 1956. Education: Studied painting, then fashion design at Parsons School of Design, New York, graduated in 1978. Career: Assistant to designers Ralph Lauren, Stan Herman, and Bill Haire, mid-1970s to 1981; showed first collection, working from home, 1981; designer, Betty Hanson company, New York, 1982–86; established Carmelo Pomodoro Design Studio, Inc. for freelance work, 1985; formed Carmelo Pomodoro Sportswear, Ltd., 1986; introduced lower priced line, 1987, and line of bodywear, 1991; licenses included jewelry, from 1989, furs, from 1990, and Toyota sportswear line, from 1990; first of seven Carmelo Pomodoro boutiques, joint ventures with Takashima Company, opened in Tokyo, 1989; dressed television commentators for Winter Olympics, 1992. Died: 1 October 1992, in New York.

PUBLICATIONS

On POMODORO:

Books

Milbank, Caroline Rennolds, New York Fashion: The Evolution of American Style, New York 1989.
Ewing, Elizabeth, History of Twentieth Century Fashion, New York 1992.

Articles

Buck, Genevieve, "Two 'Overnight Successes' Spring Forth—with 26 Years Between Them," in Chicago Tribune, 22 July 1987.
Behbehani, Mandy, "Young, Hip Believers in Affordable Fashion," in the San Francisco Examiner, 26 June 1990.
Hayes, Tracy Achor, "Young Designers with Big Potential," in the Dallas Morning News, 3 October 1990.
Hix, Charles, "The 'Hot Tomato' of Cornwall Hollow: Fashion Designer Carmelo Pomodoro Carves High-Profile Niche with His Forward Fashions," in the Litchfield County Times (Connecticut), 22 February 1991.
_____, "Carmelo Pomodoro," in Collections Tokyo-New York, Spring/Summer 1991.
White, Constance C.R., "Sportswear Report SCOOP," in WWD, 25 September 1991.
Blissard, Mardi, "Autumn Fashions on the Runway at Bolo Bash IV—New York Designer Carmelo Pomodoro," in the Arkansas Times, 11 June 1992.
Lambert, Bruce, "Carmelo Pomodoro, 37, Designer Who Led New York Fashion Firm," [obituary] in the New York Times, 2 October 1992.
White, Constance C.R., "Carmelo Pomodoro Dead at 37: Energetic and Talented, He Helped Lead Young Designer Pack," in WWD, 2 October 1992.

* * *

The November 1992 cover of Harper's Bazaar was redesigned at the last moment to pay homage to one of the most promising fashion

designers of his generation, Carmelo Pomodoro. The cover spoke gently of Pomodoro's œuvre—an elegant neo-1930s-type woman wearing an ivory colored chenille open-work gridded robe. The words describing this image were soft, sensual, and just a little bit Hollywood. From his first independent collection in 1987, it was clear Pomodoro had an unclassifiable sense of style that was at once romantic yet ruthlessly contemporary.

Pomodoro had thought of becoming an actor, an architect, and a painter, before discovering his natural affinity for the fashion arts through the guidance of Frank Rizzo, chairman of the fashion design department at Parsons School of Design, New York. After stints with Stan Herman, Ralph Lauren, Bill Haire, and Betty Hanson, Pomodoro established his own design studio in 1985 where he carried out freelance projects. With characteristic good energy and optimism he started Carmelo Pomodoro Sportswear Ltd., and produced a collection in 1986. His business partner John P. Axelrod supported Pomodoro's career, even after it received substantial Japanese backing.

His first signature collection was memorable and indicative of his greatest strengths as a designer. What could be called "the white resort collection" of 1987, featured drapy fabric, simple lines, and virtually no color. Akin to the paintings of Agnes Martin, the fabrics of Pomodoro's collection revealed subtle and delicate details at close range. The textures of his unusual fabric blends, or the quiet wit of an almost surreal self-scarf sweater, characterized his ability to balance artistic self-consciousness with a paradoxical sense of reverence and fun. This blend resulted in perhaps the best-ever designed trapeze tunic from the same collection, which seemingly floated over a tight tube skirt.

Throughout his all too brief career, Pomodoro continued to develop this series of women in white, and these were arguably his most successful artistic and commercial fashions. From the eggshell cotton crochet cover-up, both a tribute to the 1960s and an avant-garde prefiguration of the 1993 crochet craze, from his resort 1990 collection, to virginal white cotton organza overshirts and cotton silk lace tank dresses also appearing that year, Pomodoro brought forth inspirational designs that made women feel and project their most beautiful selves. Whether or not his attraction to monochromatic compositions came from his skills as a black-and-white photographer (he did much of the photography for his company's advertising campaigns himself), it is clear this propensity distinguished him among other artists of his generation such as Charlotte Neuville, Zang Toi, Jennifer George, and Rebecca Moses.

If white was his best noncolor, knitted fabric was his best medium for making art (dresses). A master technician, he understood not only pattern making and construction but also his materials. In knitting, with its ability to hold a shape, to drape, to cling, and to stretch, Pomodoro gave his designs a comfort quotient not possible from any other technique. What made his knits extraordinary was the mixture of mostly natural fibers, with a minuscule amount of the newest microfibers developed for him in Japan.

Softness permeated Pomodoro's work, even his much heralded leather designs. His use of leather, which he considered a very modern no-fuss fabric, was at times biker-chic but usually tempered when paired with flowing double-layered georgette short skirts or pastel leggings. The fall 1992 line featured a leather bathrobe coat mixed with fake fur, and jackets that gracefully followed the natural contour of the torso. Menswear collections developed as adjunct to the women's lines, but the intellectually savvy androgyny of his men's sleeveless undershirt with sequined evening skirt of 1992 reminds us that Carmelo Pomodoro was a gifted thinker with a lot to say about our sartorial lives.

Pomodoro's last collection was inspired by one of the world's most alluring women, Sophia Loren. A blend of camel hair and velvet pieces, the tailored glamor was eroticized by the leopard prints in the form of scarves, vests, and blouses. The look conjured up images of Rome, and the dolce vita of Federico Fellini. The formal elements, however—the colors, lines, and fabrics—were of-the-moment and Pomodoro world view.

Carmelo Pomodoro's love of the female was paramount. He demonstrated an uncanny knack for knowing how to interpret the ideal dress for his clients, women 25 to 45, part girl, part femme fatale, self-assured. The power of his clothing was its emotional connection to its designer. Early in his career he said, "If women wear my fashions and smile, I'll be happy." Mission accomplished summa cum laude.

—Marianne T. Carlano; updated by Nelly Rhodes

PORTER, Thea

British designer

Born: Dorothea Naomi Seale in Jerusalem, 24 December 1927; raised in Damascus, Syria. Education: Studied French and Old English at London University, 1949–50; studied art at Royal Holloway College, Egham, Surrey. Family: Married Robert Porter, 1953 (divorced, 1967); children: Venetia. Career: Lived in Beirut, 1953–early 1960s; established Greek Street, Soho, boutique selling textiles from the Near East and clothing of her own design, 1967–69; also maintained a shop in Paris, 1976–79; in-store Thea Porter boutique created at Henri Bendel, New York, 1969; freelance fashion, textile and interior designer, London, from 1969. Awards: English Fashion Designer of the Year award, 1972. Died: 24 July 2000 in London.

PUBLICATIONS

ON PORTER

ARTICLES

- "Thea Porter to Design Knitwear," in the Times (London), 1 April 1973.
- "Back to Bakst," in the Times, 18 December 1973.
- "Dressed to Vote," in the Times, 8 September 1974.
- "Porterama," in the Times, 21 September 1975.
- McColl, Patricia, "Couture Arabesque," in Aramco World (New York), March/April 1977.
- Shapiro, Harriet, "In Style: Porter," in People, 9 January 1978.
- Gibb, Frances, "Top Fashion Designers to Go Out of Business," in the Times, 5 February 1981.
- "Thea Porter is Back," in the Times, 18 July 1982.

designers of his generation, Carmelo Pomodoro. The cover spoke gently of Pomodoro's œuvre—an elegant neo-1930s-type woman wearing an ivory colored chenille open-work gridded robe. The words describing this image were soft, sensual, and just a little bit Hollywood. From his first independent collection in 1987, it was clear Pomodoro had an unclassifiable sense of style that was at once romantic yet ruthlessly contemporary.

Pomodoro had thought of becoming an actor, an architect, and a painter, before discovering his natural affinity for the fashion arts through the guidance of Frank Rizzo, chairman of the fashion design department at Parsons School of Design, New York. After stints with Stan Herman, Ralph Lauren, Bill Haire, and Betty Hanson, Pomodoro established his own design studio in 1985 where he carried out freelance projects. With characteristic good energy and optimism he started Carmelo Pomodoro Sportswear Ltd., and produced a collection in 1986. His business partner John P. Axelrod supported Pomodoro's career, even after it received substantial Japanese backing.

His first signature collection was memorable and indicative of his greatest strengths as a designer. What could be called "the white resort collection" of 1987, featured drapy fabric, simple lines, and virtually no color. Akin to the paintings of Agnes Martin, the fabrics of Pomodoro's collection revealed subtle and delicate details at close range. The textures of his unusual fabric blends, or the quiet wit of an almost surreal self-scarf sweater, characterized his ability to balance artistic self-consciousness with a paradoxical sense of reverence and fun. This blend resulted in perhaps the best-ever designed trapeze tunic from the same collection, which seemingly floated over a tight tube skirt.

Throughout his all too brief career, Pomodoro continued to develop this series of women in white, and these were arguably his most successful artistic and commercial fashions. From the eggshell cotton crochet cover-up, both a tribute to the 1960s and an avant-garde prefiguration of the 1993 crochet craze, from his resort 1990 collection, to virginal white cotton organza overshirts and cotton silk lace tank dresses also appearing that year, Pomodoro brought forth inspirational designs that made women feel and project their most beautiful selves. Whether or not his attraction to monochromatic compositions came from his skills as a black-and-white photographer (he did much of the photography for his company's advertising campaigns himself), it is clear this propensity distinguished him among other artists of his generation such as Charlotte Neuville, Zang Toi, Jennifer George, and Rebecca Moses.

If white was his best noncolor, knitted fabric was his best medium for making art (dresses). A master technician, he understood not only pattern making and construction but also his materials. In knitting, with its ability to hold a shape, to drape, to cling, and to stretch, Pomodoro gave his designs a comfort quotient not possible from any other technique. What made his knits extraordinary was the mixture of mostly natural fibers, with a minuscule amount of the newest microfibers developed for him in Japan.

Softness permeated Pomodoro's work, even his much heralded leather designs. His use of leather, which he considered a very modern no-fuss fabric, was at times biker-chic but usually tempered when paired with flowing double-layered georgette short skirts or pastel leggings. The fall 1992 line featured a leather bathrobe coat mixed with fake fur, and jackets that gracefully followed the natural contour of the torso. Menswear collections developed as adjunct to the women's lines, but the intellectually savvy androgyny of his men's sleeveless undershirt with sequined evening skirt of 1992 reminds us that Carmelo Pomodoro was a gifted thinker with a lot to say about our sartorial lives.

Pomodoro's last collection was inspired by one of the world's most alluring women, Sophia Loren. A blend of camel hair and velvet pieces, the tailored glamor was eroticized by the leopard prints in the form of scarves, vests, and blouses. The look conjured up images of Rome, and the dolce vita of Federico Fellini. The formal elements, however—the colors, lines, and fabrics—were of-the-moment and Pomodoro world view.

Carmelo Pomodoro's love of the female was paramount. He demonstrated an uncanny knack for knowing how to interpret the ideal dress for his clients, women 25 to 45, part girl, part femme fatale, self-assured. The power of his clothing was its emotional connection to its designer. Early in his career he said, "If women wear my fashions and smile, I'll be happy." Mission accomplished summa cum laude.

—Marianne T. Carlano; updated by Nelly Rhodes

PORTER, Thea

British designer

Born: Dorothea Naomi Seale in Jerusalem, 24 December 1927; raised in Damascus, Syria. Education: Studied French and Old English at London University, 1949–50; studied art at Royal Holloway College, Egham, Surrey. Family: Married Robert Porter, 1953 (divorced, 1967); children: Venetia. Career: Lived in Beirut, 1953–early 1960s; established Greek Street, Soho, boutique selling textiles from the Near East and clothing of her own design, 1967–69; also maintained a shop in Paris, 1976–79; in-store Thea Porter boutique created at Henri Bendel, New York, 1969; freelance fashion, textile and interior designer, London, from 1969. Awards: English Fashion Designer of the Year award, 1972. Died: 24 July 2000 in London.

PUBLICATIONS

ON PORTER

ARTICLES

- "Thea Porter to Design Knitwear," in the Times (London), 1 April 1973.
- "Back to Bakst," in the Times, 18 December 1973.
- "Dressed to Vote," in the Times, 8 September 1974.
- "Porterama," in the Times, 21 September 1975.
- McColl, Patricia, "Couture Arabesque," in Aramco World (New York), March/April 1977.
- Shapiro, Harriet, "In Style: Porter," in People, 9 January 1978.
- Gibb, Frances, "Top Fashion Designers to Go Out of Business," in the Times, 5 February 1981.
- "Thea Porter is Back," in the Times, 18 July 1982.

Trebay, Guy, "Thea Porter, 72; Dressed the Elite of the 1960s in Hippie Chic," in the New York Times, 27 July 2000.
 Obituary, "Thea Porter, Designer, 72," in WWD, 28 July 2000.
 "Deaths Last Week," [obituary], in Chicago Tribune, 30 July 2000.

* * *

Having lived in the Middle East as a child, Thea Porter based her fashion aesthetic upon the ethnic clothing she encountered there. During the late 1960s, fashion revolutions of many kinds were taking place, one of which was the new romanticism mirroring the romantic view of the East common to Victorian England. Hippie types went to Porter's store in Greek Street, London, to purchase Middle Eastern imports to decorate their homes, true to the spirit of 19th-century artists who created a complete atmosphere in their immediate environment that included loose aesthetic robes echoing distant lands and other time periods. Porter's shop offered pillows and cushions made from fancy Middle Eastern textiles as well as antique caftans. These dresses sold so well that Porter began to design them herself to meet the demand.

An ancient, loosely cut ankle-length garment, the caftan lent itself to opulent decoration and luxurious fabrics. Porter's evening gowns were made from silks, brocades, velvets, even crêpe de chine and filmy chiffon, embellished with metallic embroidery and spangles or braid. While not strictly native costume reproductions, the caftans captured the spirit of mysterious harem allure. Wealthy international clients like Elizabeth Taylor, Raquel Welch, Charlotte Rampling, Barbra Streisand, and Iranian royalty comprised Porter's clientèle, as much for the exoticism of the clothes, as no doubt for the comfort. Porter had long admired Arabic clothing, entranced by the rich embroideries and fabrics, in shapes producing a protected and secure feeling of being able to hide in one's clothes while feeling like a princess, in the richness of execution of her romantic fantasies.

Porter's nostalgic sensibilities also extended toward the Renaissance and the Edwardian periods. During the 1970s she offered high-waisted midi- or maxi-dresses with voluminous sleeves. These simple historic shapes also lent themselves to luxurious brocades, tapestries, velvets, and embroidery. Her Edwardian looks featured vintage trimmings, and sailor-collared or lacy dresses recalling the last days of the Imperial Russian Grand Duchesses. Porter claimed Chekhov as an influence as well as art déco. Gypsy dresses with their full-flounced skirts allowed for romantic play of colorful patterned fabrics. Again, the shapes were easy, flattering.

Much as Poiret brought Eastern exoticism to a turbulent era, so Porter reflected rapid fashion change toward individuality, coupled with comforting escapism. Even her knit collection, developed for the chilly English climate, included caftan-type dresses, skirt and cardigan sets, and culottes in bright, cheerful colors. By the 1980s Porter had dressed many well-known personalities in her couture and expensive ready-to-wear, including members of the Beatles and Rolling Stones, Donovan, Princess Margaret, and Jessye Norman. Her designs allowed the expression of artistic inclinations, while giving the wearer a shield from the too-scrutinizing eyes of the public.

In the 1990s the Porter look was found in secondhand stores and as with most fashions of earlier decades, enjoyed a bit of a renaissance. Porter's stores in New York and London, however, were long gone. Porter, who had been diagnosed with Alzheimer's, died in July 2000 in London.

—Therese Duzinkiewicz Baker; updated by Owen James

PRADA

Italian fashion house

Founded: by Mario Prada (born in Milan, Italy in 1913) and his brother as a luxury leather goods company; taken over by granddaughter Miuccia Bianchi Prada, 1978. Miuccia Prada began designing for company, early 1980s; married Patrizio Bertelli, 1989.

Company History: Ready-to-wear added, 1989; launched Miu Miu line, 1992; first London boutique, 1994; opened Miu Miu shop in SoHo, New York, and Prada shops in San Francisco, New York, and Paris, 1996; bought stake in Gucci, 1998; introduced innerwear, cosmetics, home furnishings, athleticwear, 1998–99; resold Gucci to LVMH, and acquired stakes Helmut Lang, Church, and Jil Sander, 1999; teamed with LVMH to buy Fendi, 1999; formed partnership with Azzedine Alaïa, 2000; bought stake in Carshoe, sold Fendi stake to LVMH, 2001; postponed IPO indefinitely. Awards: Miuccia Prada named Footwear News Footwear Designer of the Year, 1996; Special Achievement award, National Italian American Foundation, 2000; Patrizio Bertelli given the Pitti Immagine Uomo award, 2001.

Company Address: Via Andrea Maffei 2, 20135 Milan, Italy.

Company Website: www.prada.it.

PUBLICATIONS

On PRADA:

Articles

- Alford, Lucinda, "Modern de Luxe," in the Independent (London), 19 June 1994.
- "New York: Miu Miu," in WWD, 31 October 1994.
- Spindler, Amy M., "Cool Rises to Intimidating Heights," in the New York Times, 7 April 1995.
- Edelson, Sharon, "Prada to Open Miu Miu Unit in New York," in WWD, 29 September 1995.
- Forden, Sara Gay, "Prada Using Star Status to Expand its Role on Global Stage," in WWD, 15 February 1996.
- Baber, Bonnie, "Prada Power," in Footwear News, 23 December 1996.
- Forden, Sara Gay, "Prada on the Prowl: Seeking Growth via Acquisitions, Stores," in WWD, 10 December 1997.
- Conti, Samantha, "Prada Buys Five-Percent Gucci Stake," in WWD, 8 June 1998.
- Luscombe, Belinda, "Catfight on the Catwalk," in Time, 22 June 1998.
- Weisman, Katherine, "It's Getting Serious: LVMH Buys Prada's 9.5-Percent Stake in Gucci," in WWD, 13 January 1999.
- Conti, Samantha, and Lisa Lockwood, "Prada, Helmut Lang Plan Joint Venture to Build Lang Name," in WWD, 29 March 1999.
- Goldstein, Lauren, "Prada Goes Shopping," in Fortune, 27 September 1999.
- Menkes, Suzy, "Prada and LVMH Join Forces to Buy Italian Fashion House Fendi," in International Herald Tribune, 13 October 1999.
- Conti, Samantha, "The End of the Affair," in WWD, 25 January 2000.
- Socha, Miles, et al., "There's Something About Miuccia," in WWD, 10 July 2000.
- Zargani, Luisa, "Bertelli Takes Prada to the Public," in WWD, 10 November 2000.
- Conti, Samantha, "Prada Postpones IPO," in WWD, 20 September 2001.

Trebay, Guy, "Thea Porter, 72; Dressed the Elite of the 1960s in Hippie Chic," in the New York Times, 27 July 2000.
 Obituary, "Thea Porter, Designer, 72," in WWD, 28 July 2000.
 "Deaths Last Week," [obituary], in Chicago Tribune, 30 July 2000.

* * *

Having lived in the Middle East as a child, Thea Porter based her fashion aesthetic upon the ethnic clothing she encountered there. During the late 1960s, fashion revolutions of many kinds were taking place, one of which was the new romanticism mirroring the romantic view of the East common to Victorian England. Hippie types went to Porter's store in Greek Street, London, to purchase Middle Eastern imports to decorate their homes, true to the spirit of 19th-century artists who created a complete atmosphere in their immediate environment that included loose aesthetic robes echoing distant lands and other time periods. Porter's shop offered pillows and cushions made from fancy Middle Eastern textiles as well as antique caftans. These dresses sold so well that Porter began to design them herself to meet the demand.

An ancient, loosely cut ankle-length garment, the caftan lent itself to opulent decoration and luxurious fabrics. Porter's evening gowns were made from silks, brocades, velvets, even crêpe de chine and filmy chiffon, embellished with metallic embroidery and spangles or braid. While not strictly native costume reproductions, the caftans captured the spirit of mysterious harem allure. Wealthy international clients like Elizabeth Taylor, Raquel Welch, Charlotte Rampling, Barbra Streisand, and Iranian royalty comprised Porter's clientèle, as much for the exoticism of the clothes, as no doubt for the comfort. Porter had long admired Arabic clothing, entranced by the rich embroideries and fabrics, in shapes producing a protected and secure feeling of being able to hide in one's clothes while feeling like a princess, in the richness of execution of her romantic fantasies.

Porter's nostalgic sensibilities also extended toward the Renaissance and the Edwardian periods. During the 1970s she offered high-waisted midi- or maxi-dresses with voluminous sleeves. These simple historic shapes also lent themselves to luxurious brocades, tapestries, velvets, and embroidery. Her Edwardian looks featured vintage trimmings, and sailor-collared or lacy dresses recalling the last days of the Imperial Russian Grand Duchesses. Porter claimed Chekhov as an influence as well as art déco. Gypsy dresses with their full-flounced skirts allowed for romantic play of colorful patterned fabrics. Again, the shapes were easy, flattering.

Much as Poiret brought Eastern exoticism to a turbulent era, so Porter reflected rapid fashion change toward individuality, coupled with comforting escapism. Even her knit collection, developed for the chilly English climate, included caftan-type dresses, skirt and cardigan sets, and culottes in bright, cheerful colors. By the 1980s Porter had dressed many well-known personalities in her couture and expensive ready-to-wear, including members of the Beatles and Rolling Stones, Donovan, Princess Margaret, and Jessye Norman. Her designs allowed the expression of artistic inclinations, while giving the wearer a shield from the too-scrutinizing eyes of the public.

In the 1990s the Porter look was found in secondhand stores and as with most fashions of earlier decades, enjoyed a bit of a renaissance. Porter's stores in New York and London, however, were long gone. Porter, who had been diagnosed with Alzheimer's, died in July 2000 in London.

—Therese Duzinkiewicz Baker; updated by Owen James

PRADA

Italian fashion house

Founded: by Mario Prada (born in Milan, Italy in 1913) and his brother as a luxury leather goods company; taken over by granddaughter Miuccia Bianchi Prada, 1978. Miuccia Prada began designing for company, early 1980s; married Patrizio Bertelli, 1989.

Company History: Ready-to-wear added, 1989; launched Miu Miu line, 1992; first London boutique, 1994; opened Miu Miu shop in SoHo, New York, and Prada shops in San Francisco, New York, and Paris, 1996; bought stake in Gucci, 1998; introduced innerwear, cosmetics, home furnishings, athleticwear, 1998–99; resold Gucci to LVMH, and acquired stakes Helmut Lang, Church, and Jil Sander, 1999; teamed with LVMH to buy Fendi, 1999; formed partnership with Azzedine Alaïa, 2000; bought stake in Carshoe, sold Fendi stake to LVMH, 2001; postponed IPO indefinitely. Awards: Miuccia Prada named Footwear News Footwear Designer of the Year, 1996; Special Achievement award, National Italian American Foundation, 2000; Patrizio Bertelli given the Pitti Immagine Uomo award, 2001.

Company Address: Via Andrea Maffei 2, 20135 Milan, Italy.

Company Website: www.prada.it.

PUBLICATIONS

On PRADA:

Articles

- Alford, Lucinda, "Modern de Luxe," in the Independent (London), 19 June 1994.
- "New York: Miu Miu," in WWD, 31 October 1994.
- Spindler, Amy M., "Cool Rises to Intimidating Heights," in the New York Times, 7 April 1995.
- Edelson, Sharon, "Prada to Open Miu Miu Unit in New York," in WWD, 29 September 1995.
- Forden, Sara Gay, "Prada Using Star Status to Expand its Role on Global Stage," in WWD, 15 February 1996.
- Baber, Bonnie, "Prada Power," in Footwear News, 23 December 1996.
- Forden, Sara Gay, "Prada on the Prowl: Seeking Growth via Acquisitions, Stores," in WWD, 10 December 1997.
- Conti, Samantha, "Prada Buys Five-Percent Gucci Stake," in WWD, 8 June 1998.
- Luscombe, Belinda, "Catfight on the Catwalk," in Time, 22 June 1998.
- Weisman, Katherine, "It's Getting Serious: LVMH Buys Prada's 9.5-Percent Stake in Gucci," in WWD, 13 January 1999.
- Conti, Samantha, and Lisa Lockwood, "Prada, Helmut Lang Plan Joint Venture to Build Lang Name," in WWD, 29 March 1999.
- Goldstein, Lauren, "Prada Goes Shopping," in Fortune, 27 September 1999.
- Menkes, Suzy, "Prada and LVMH Join Forces to Buy Italian Fashion House Fendi," in International Herald Tribune, 13 October 1999.
- Conti, Samantha, "The End of the Affair," in WWD, 25 January 2000.
- Socha, Miles, et al., "There's Something About Miuccia," in WWD, 10 July 2000.
- Zargani, Luisa, "Bertelli Takes Prada to the Public," in WWD, 10 November 2000.
- Conti, Samantha, "Prada Postpones IPO," in WWD, 20 September 2001.

Prada, spring/summer 2002 ready-to-wear collection. © Reuters NewMedia Inc./CORBIS.

"Prada Sells Stake in Fendi for $265 million (to LVMH)," in New York Times, 26 November 2001.

* * *

Fratelli Prada was established as a purveyor of fine quality leather goods and imported items in Milan, Italy, in 1913, by Mario Prada and his brother. For most of this century, affluent clients were offered the requirements of fine living, in an atmosphere immersed in the refined opulence of Milan's Galleria Vittorio Emmanuele boutique. The oggetti di lusso or luxury items have included steamer trunks, Hartman luggage made in America, handbags from Austria, silver from London, crystal, tortoise, and shell accessories as well as now obsolete articles made from exquisite materials. Mario Prada traveled throughout Europe in order to familiarize himself with those materials and elements which would build his essential concepts of style and luxury.

Prada, spring/summer 2002 ready-to-wear collection © Reuters
NewMedia Inc./CORBIS.

Attracted to these same aspects but integrating her own design philosophy, his granddaughter, Miuccia Prada, proceeded to enrich and expand this inherited legacy in 1978. Initially she had dismissed any involvement with the family business as less important than the goals she had set for herself. She received a degree in political science, followed by a period of study in mime at the Piccolo Teatro di Milano in preparation for a career in acting. By her mid-20s she was a committed participant in the political activities of the 1970s in Milan. Though one who had always drawn inspiration from history, "she also refused to reject that part of herself." She was taught to value quality materials and craftsmanship, in a city noted for traditional tailor's ateliers and elegant fabric showrooms.

Miuccia's personal convictions and this serious aspect of her education probably attributed to her belief that women are successful designers because clothing today must express what many women deeply feel. This philosophy has resulted in clothing not preoccupied with sex appeal. What appears to be restrained design quite surprisingly feels exceptional on the body. There has continued to be a nonconforming aspect of beauty in all her collections. This was important to the continuance of Mario Prada's vision of fashion in a full and creative context, capable of making the artisan's qualities come alive in a contemporary spirit.

In the 1980s Miuccia Prada, with her distinctive regard for clothing, accessories, and footwear, began to develop and market an innovative line of fashion accessories eventually followed by a line of ready-to-wear clothes and footwear. In a magazine article, she was quoted as saying that her designs had freedom of movement, freedom from definition, and freedom from constriction. Bohemians, the avant-garde, the beatniks had been constant motifs in her designs. Her philosophy of dress also includes aspects developed and influenced by her own free-spirited personality. A fashion writer once remarked that "her clothes don't necessarily have misfit connotations, nor are particularly for young women, they're like uniforms for the slightly disenfranchised."

She was among the first to produce a practical, lightweight, nylon backpack and other hand-held bags of the same waterproof material. Disregarding season and occasion, the metal stamped Prada logo and brilliant palette combined tassels and leather trim. Black was, without a doubt, the stylish choice. Miuccia has stated she does not focus on inventing but rethinks the company's traditions in a different fashion, "I believe that every form is an archetype of the past."

In their Milanese headquarters, Miuccia Prada and her husband, business partner Patrizio Bertelli, oversee all aspects of the company. Collections are presented there as well as at cultural events. In their Tuscan factory, near Arezzo, prototypes are sampled and all stages of design and technology are controlled. The firm, I Pelletieri D'Italia SpA (IPI), produces and distributes the various lines. It was to this Bertelli-owned factory that Miuccia Prada was originally attracted when she researched improved manufacturing techniques. The firm continues to research all possible methods to make an industrial product look like the unique work of an artisan.

The company Fratelli Prada continues to manufacture leather goods; suede trimmed with passementerie and silk tassels, leather wallets embossed with constructivist motifs, jewelry rolls in suede-lined calf skin, boxy pigskin suitcases, and key rings with leather medallions. Beginning with autumn-winter 1989, ready-to-wear was presented in the calm and stately atmosphere of the Palazzo Manusardi headquarters. Admittedly inspirational to her first collections of black and white dresses and sportswear, were the predominantly stylish and lonely characters in films by Michelangelo Antonioni. "Prada is a reflection of Miuccia's taste, about being a connoisseur rather than a consumer," was an excerpt from a magazine interview. Her first footwear collections combined classicism with elements of the avant-garde in such styles as spectator oxfords and embroidered and bejeweled suede slippers.

Signora Prada begins developing her seasonal repertory with the concept that no single style is appropriate for one occasion. She offers her international clientèle an openminded regard for style. In 1994 there were 45 Prada retail stores worldwide and two Miu Miu (a newer apparel line bearing Miuccia's nickname) stores. In the Prada store in the Galleria, the original mahogany and brass fittings reflect luxury and tradition. On two floors, garments, accessories, footwear, and the addition of menswear, express refinement, grace and gentility as they fuse the past with the modern present.

In commenting on design, she confesses that combining opposites in unconventional ways such as refinement with primitive, and natural with machine-made helped produce the collections in her namesake store Miu Miu. In 1992, inspired by items in her own wardrobe closet, she created this bohemian, artsy-craftsy collection of patchwork and crocheted garments, saddle bags, and sheepskin jackets, clogs, and boots. She based the new and fresh line on rough finishes, natural colors, and materials reflecting the artisan's craft, stylish in the small boutiques of the 1960s. Her choices of fabrics usually associated with haute couture have been cut into streamlined sportswear such as silk faille trenchcoats, double faced cashmere suits, and nylon parkas trimmed in mink. "In the end," she says, "fabric is fabric. What is really new is the way you treat it and put the pieces together."

Prada, fall/winter 2001–02 collection. © AP/Wide World Photos.

In the later 1990s, the Prada empire grew in size and scope due in part to the growing popularity of the Miu Miu range. The first Miu Miu stores, in Paris and Milan, were joined by another in New York's SoHo in 1996, while new Prada stores opened in Beverly Hills, New York, San Francisco, and Paris. Additionally, Prada licensed a cosmetics line with Estée Lauder, began designing innerwear, and rolled out a home furnishings collection in 1999. Prada further expanded through acquisitions, buying stakes in Church & Co., a UK footwear manufacturer, as well as in designer brands Helmut Lang, Jil Sander, and bitter rival Gucci. Building a relationship with LVMH, Prada then sold its Gucci stake to the French luxury giant and formed an alliance to acquire Fendi in 1999. Further moves included a partnership with Azzedine Alaïa, buying Carshoe, selling its Fendi stake back to LVMH, and postponing an initial public offering originally planned for early 2001.

Prada, a fashion conglomerate in the 2000s, is still an exciting fashion label best known for its elegant accessories and breath-of-fresh-air Miu Miu apparel line.

—Gillion Skellenger; updated by Nelly Rhodes

PRÉMONVILLE, Myrène de

See de PRÉMONVILLE, Myrène

PRESTON, Nigel

See MAXFIELD PARRISH

PRICE, Anthony

British designer

Born: Bradford, England, 1945. Education: Studied at Bradford School of Art and the Royal College of Art, 1965–68. Career: Designer, Stirling Cooper, 1968–74; Che Guevera Plaza, 1974–79; formed own company incorporating Plaza, 1979; opened boutiques in London. Address: 15 Cranmer Road, London SW9 6JE, England.

PUBLICATIONS

On PRICE:

Articles

- Yates, Paula, "Glamour at A. Price," in Cosmopolitan (London), April 1981.
- Eggar, Robin, "Style at Any Price," in You magazine of the Mail on Sunday (London), 11 March 1984.
- Webb, Ian R., "Price," in Blitz (London), April 1987.
- Coleman, Alix, "The Frock Prince," in the Sunday Express Magazine (London), 10 April 1988.
- "The Price of Stardom," in Vogue (London), August 1988.
- Bell, Jaki, "Anthony Price," in DR: The Fashion Business (London), 10 February 1990.
- Mower, Sarah, "Leader of the Glam," in Vogue (London), March 1990.
- DiSilva, Beverly, "Adam on Eve," in Mirabella, November 1990.
- Blanchard, Tamsin, "Working Magic With Feathers and Visor," in the Independent, 1 March 1996.
- Sharkey, Alix, "Fashion Victim," in the Independent, 9 March 1996.
- Rayner, Abigail, "As Seen at...the New Look Party," in the Independent, 14 February 1997.
- "Top Designers Bemoan Lack of Materials," in Mirror Regional Newspapers, 1998.
- Williams, Cayte, "The Intelligent Consumer: The Fashion Month," in the Independent, 1 March 1998.

Prada, fall/winter 2001–02 collection. © AP/Wide World Photos.

natural with machine-made helped produce the collections in her namesake store Miu Miu. In 1992, inspired by items in her own wardrobe closet, she created this bohemian, artsy-craftsy collection of patchwork and crocheted garments, saddle bags, and sheepskin jackets, clogs, and boots. She based the new and fresh line on rough finishes, natural colors, and materials reflecting the artisan's craft, stylish in the small boutiques of the 1960s. Her choices of fabrics usually associated with haute couture have been cut into streamlined sportswear such as silk faille trenchcoats, double faced cashmere suits, and nylon parkas trimmed in mink. "In the end," she says, "fabric is fabric. What is really new is the way you treat it and put the pieces together."

In the later 1990s, the Prada empire grew in size and scope due in part to the growing popularity of the Miu Miu range. The first Miu Miu stores, in Paris and Milan, were joined by another in New York's SoHo in 1996, while new Prada stores opened in Beverly Hills, New York, San Francisco, and Paris. Additionally, Prada licensed a cosmetics line with Estée Lauder, began designing innerwear, and rolled out a home furnishings collection in 1999. Prada further expanded through acquisitions, buying stakes in Church & Co., a UK footwear manufacturer, as well as in designer brands Helmut Lang, Jil Sander, and bitter rival Gucci. Building a relationship with LVMH, Prada then sold its Gucci stake to the French luxury giant and formed an alliance to acquire Fendi in 1999. Further moves included a partnership with Azzedine Alaïa, buying Carshoe, selling its Fendi stake back to LVMH, and postponing an initial public offering originally planned for early 2001.

Prada, a fashion conglomerate in the 2000s, is still an exciting fashion label best known for its elegant accessories and breath-of-fresh-air Miu Miu apparel line.

—Gillion Skellenger; updated by Nelly Rhodes

PRÉMONVILLE, Myrène de

See de PRÉMONVILLE, Myrène

PRESTON, Nigel

See MAXFIELD PARRISH

PRICE, Anthony

British designer

Born: Bradford, England, 1945. Education: Studied at Bradford School of Art and the Royal College of Art, 1965–68. Career: Designer, Stirling Cooper, 1968–74; Che Guevera Plaza, 1974–79; formed own company incorporating Plaza, 1979; opened boutiques in London. Address: 15 Cranmer Road, London SW9 6JE, England.

PUBLICATIONS

On PRICE:

Articles

Yates, Paula, "Glamour at A. Price," in Cosmopolitan (London), April 1981.

Eggar, Robin, "Style at Any Price," in You magazine of the Mail on Sunday (London), 11 March 1984.

Webb, Ian R., "Price," in Blitz (London), April 1987.

Coleman, Alix, "The Frock Prince," in the Sunday Express Magazine (London), 10 April 1988.

"The Price of Stardom," in Vogue (London), August 1988.

Bell, Jaki, "Anthony Price," in DR: The Fashion Business (London), 10 February 1990.

Mower, Sarah, "Leader of the Glam," in Vogue (London), March 1990.

DiSilva, Beverly, "Adam on Eve," in Mirabella, November 1990.

Blanchard, Tamsin, "Working Magic With Feathers and Visor," in the Independent, 1 March 1996.

Sharkey, Alix, "Fashion Victim," in the Independent, 9 March 1996.

Rayner, Abigail, "As Seen at...the New Look Party," in the Independent, 14 February 1997.

"Top Designers Bemoan Lack of Materials," in Mirror Regional Newspapers, 1998.

Williams, Cayte, "The Intelligent Consumer: The Fashion Month," in the Independent, 1 March 1998.

- "A Model Wears a Dress by Anthony Price," in the Times of London, 21 May 1999.
- "Some Leading Designers and Influencers of Sixties Fashions," available online at www.sixtiescity.velnet.com, 2001.
- "Anthony Price," from the Biography Resource Center, Gale Group, 2001.

* * *

Anthony Price, who designs glamorous clothes for glamorous people, was born during the swan song of Hollywood's starstruck years. The last great screen goddesses loomed large in suburban theatres, with scarlet lips and arched eyebrows under pompadour hairstyles—their square shoulders emphasized wasp waists and shapely hips swathed in pleated lamé. By the time Price was attending the fashion course at London's Royal College of Art in the mid-1960s, these celluloid masterpieces of noir sex-kitsch were daytime television oddities. The shapely heroines gliding across the screen could not have been further removed from the London Twiggies in their flared Courrèges-style minidresses. It was the old-style glamor of these magical, sassy sirens—as embodied by Rita Hayworth—that inspired Price then and continues to do so today.

Soon the golden boy at Stirling Cooper, Price designed clothes to fit and flatter: his skin-tight snakeskin tailoring found its way onto the backs of the Mick Jagger and David Clark. A fortuitous association with Roxy Music and their elegant front man, Bryan Ferry, led Price to design stage sets and costumes, as well as album covers, considered classics of their time.

Producing successful commercial ranges for Che Guevara and Plaza, icon fashion labels of the day, Price laid claim to inventing the ubiquitous cap-sleeved t-shirt, flatteringly cut for muscle appeal, and suggestively revealing trousers. While designing largely for men, Price's clothes nevertheless had a contemporary unisex attraction. Price's personal style emerged in his King's Road, Chelsea, shop—a starlet's fitting room of celestial blue and gold, with scalloped 1930s-style vases spilling luxuriant flowers. No clothes rails here—garments were displayed on boards like sculptures in a gallery. In his South Molton Street shop, the Price style came to a baroque climax in a crescendo of dove gray velvet drapes, gilt-framed mirrors, crystal chandeliers, and golden scallop-shell fauteuils.

From hipster to couturier, Price's client list read like a who's who of pop and fashion stars: Duran Duran, Annie Lennox, Lucy Ferry, Joan Collins, and Jerry Hall. He also forayed into royal territory, designing for the Duchess of York's Canadian tour. Price's love of camp cabaret culminated in unforgettable party shows, each a stunning revue of set pieces staged in front of his own gold monogrammed velvet cinema curtains.

Price's gowns were also remarkable, not just for the way they looked, but for the way they were made. Attaining the Hollywood hourglass silhouette in these uncorseted days necessitated built-in structure, and his clothes became intricate masterpieces of boning and interfacing beneath the silks and taffetas. His wide-shouldered men's suits, with their narrow waists and snakelike hips, were equally flattering and apt to attract and allure.

Only a true craftspersons could produce such collectable apparel for his devoted clients. Price once told a student audience that his pattern-cutting skills stemmed from his days as a dry-stone waller in his native Yorkshire. Price most certainly is that rare animal, a designer of unparalleled flair who can also cut, drape, and sew. He cuts his own patterns, mathematically piecing together intricate toile on his secret system of client-shaped dummies. Practical in many ways, Price is as likely to be found rewiring his studio or laying down the law on the cultivation of the exotic Gunnera Manicata as cutting an evening gown.

His clients, transformed by sculptured curves into beings from a higher plane, may walk with the well-postured assurance that springs only from the knowledge that one is clothed by a master of his craft.

When he's not designing, Price spends his time as a socialite, hobnobbing with the likes of Hollywood's celebrities, Britain's high society, and the fashion industry's best. From 1996 to 1998, Price never missed a single London Fashion Week annual event. In 1996 Price was noticeable at Philip Treacy's hat show; in 1997, dressed in his a Diorish waistcoat and hat, Price attended the launch party for "Forties Fashion and the New Look." The show, commemorating the 50th anniversary of the New Look, was a star-studded event. "It was the most revolutionary fashion statement this century," Price commented. "People wanted to go out the next day and throw their clothes away. As an exercise in commercial design it was the best. It was like a number one hit album, it was beyond the Spice Girls."

By 1998 London Fashion Week was focused more on practicality than the usual outrageousness. Rather than only adhering to their creative desires, designers were concerned with cost and the need to sell their garments. Shows were better organized and designs more. Reflecting on the trend away from the outlandish to the more subdued, Price admitted to the Independent, "Putting on a catwalk show is like asking the world to a fantastic party and spending the next five years paying it off."

—Alan J. Flux; updated by Kimball Medeiros

PRINGLE OF SCOTLAND

Scottish design house

Established: by Robert Pringle in Cross Wynd, Hawick, Scotland in 1815 and known worldwide for quality sweaters. Company History: Acquired by Dawson International Plc., 1967; segued into luxury goods market and aggressively opened retail shops, 1993–94; scaled back and converted stores to franchises, 1995; incurred substantial losses and reduced workforce, 1997–98; sold to S.C. Fang & Sons Company, Ltd., Hong Kong textile group for $8.8 million, 2000; Kim Winser brought in as CEO and new diffusion line introduced, 2000; began opening retail outlets, 2001–02. Company Address: Glebe Mill, Noble Place, Hawick TD9 9QE, Scotland, UK. Company Website: www.pringle-of-scotland.co.uk.

PUBLICATIONS

On PRINGLE of SCOTLAND:

Books

Houck, Catherine, The Fashion Encyclopedia, New York, 1982.
O'Hara, Georgina, The Encyclopaedia of Fashion, New York, 1986.

Articles

Richards, Amanda, "The Knitwear Brand that stretched Too Far," in Marketing, 6 April 1995.

- "A Model Wears a Dress by Anthony Price," in the Times of London, 21 May 1999.
- "Some Leading Designers and Influencers of Sixties Fashions," available online at www.sixtiescity.velnet.com, 2001.
- "Anthony Price," from the Biography Resource Center, Gale Group, 2001.

* * *

Anthony Price, who designs glamorous clothes for glamorous people, was born during the swan song of Hollywood's starstruck years. The last great screen goddesses loomed large in suburban theatres, with scarlet lips and arched eyebrows under pompadour hairstyles—their square shoulders emphasized wasp waists and shapely hips swathed in pleated lamé. By the time Price was attending the fashion course at London's Royal College of Art in the mid-1960s, these celluloid masterpieces of noir sex-kitsch were daytime television oddities. The shapely heroines gliding across the screen could not have been further removed from the London Twiggies in their flared Courrèges-style minidresses. It was the old-style glamor of these magical, sassy sirens—as embodied by Rita Hayworth—that inspired Price then and continues to do so today.

Soon the golden boy at Stirling Cooper, Price designed clothes to fit and flatter: his skin-tight snakeskin tailoring found its way onto the backs of the Mick Jagger and David Clark. A fortuitous association with Roxy Music and their elegant front man, Bryan Ferry, led Price to design stage sets and costumes, as well as album covers, considered classics of their time.

Producing successful commercial ranges for Che Guevara and Plaza, icon fashion labels of the day, Price laid claim to inventing the ubiquitous cap-sleeved t-shirt, flatteringly cut for muscle appeal, and suggestively revealing trousers. While designing largely for men, Price's clothes nevertheless had a contemporary unisex attraction. Price's personal style emerged in his King's Road, Chelsea, shop—a starlet's fitting room of celestial blue and gold, with scalloped 1930s-style vases spilling luxuriant flowers. No clothes rails here—garments were displayed on boards like sculptures in a gallery. In his South Molton Street shop, the Price style came to a baroque climax in a crescendo of dove gray velvet drapes, gilt-framed mirrors, crystal chandeliers, and golden scallop-shell fauteuils.

From hipster to couturier, Price's client list read like a who's who of pop and fashion stars: Duran Duran, Annie Lennox, Lucy Ferry, Joan Collins, and Jerry Hall. He also forayed into royal territory, designing for the Duchess of York's Canadian tour. Price's love of camp cabaret culminated in unforgettable party shows, each a stunning revue of set pieces staged in front of his own gold monogrammed velvet cinema curtains.

Price's gowns were also remarkable, not just for the way they looked, but for the way they were made. Attaining the Hollywood hourglass silhouette in these uncorseted days necessitated built-in structure, and his clothes became intricate masterpieces of boning and interfacing beneath the silks and taffetas. His wide-shouldered men's suits, with their narrow waists and snakelike hips, were equally flattering and apt to attract and allure.

Only a true craftspersons could produce such collectable apparel for his devoted clients. Price once told a student audience that his pattern-cutting skills stemmed from his days as a dry-stone waller in his native Yorkshire. Price most certainly is that rare animal, a designer of unparalleled flair who can also cut, drape, and sew. He cuts his own patterns, mathematically piecing together intricate toile on his secret system of client-shaped dummies. Practical in many ways, Price is as likely to be found rewiring his studio or laying down the law on the cultivation of the exotic Gunnera Manicata as cutting an evening gown.

His clients, transformed by sculptured curves into beings from a higher plane, may walk with the well-postured assurance that springs only from the knowledge that one is clothed by a master of his craft.

When he's not designing, Price spends his time as a socialite, hobnobbing with the likes of Hollywood's celebrities, Britain's high society, and the fashion industry's best. From 1996 to 1998, Price never missed a single London Fashion Week annual event. In 1996 Price was noticeable at Philip Treacy's hat show; in 1997, dressed in his a Diorish waistcoat and hat, Price attended the launch party for "Forties Fashion and the New Look." The show, commemorating the 50th anniversary of the New Look, was a star-studded event. "It was the most revolutionary fashion statement this century," Price commented. "People wanted to go out the next day and throw their clothes away. As an exercise in commercial design it was the best. It was like a number one hit album, it was beyond the Spice Girls."

By 1998 London Fashion Week was focused more on practicality than the usual outrageousness. Rather than only adhering to their creative desires, designers were concerned with cost and the need to sell their garments. Shows were better organized and designs more. Reflecting on the trend away from the outlandish to the more subdued, Price admitted to the Independent, "Putting on a catwalk show is like asking the world to a fantastic party and spending the next five years paying it off."

—Alan J. Flux; updated by Kimball Medeiros

PRINGLE OF SCOTLAND

Scottish design house

Established: by Robert Pringle in Cross Wynd, Hawick, Scotland in 1815 and known worldwide for quality sweaters. Company History: Acquired by Dawson International Plc., 1967; segued into luxury goods market and aggressively opened retail shops, 1993–94; scaled back and converted stores to franchises, 1995; incurred substantial losses and reduced workforce, 1997–98; sold to S.C. Fang & Sons Company, Ltd., Hong Kong textile group for $8.8 million, 2000; Kim Winser brought in as CEO and new diffusion line introduced, 2000; began opening retail outlets, 2001–02. Company Address: Glebe Mill, Noble Place, Hawick TD9 9QE, Scotland, UK. Company Website: www.pringle-of-scotland.co.uk.

PUBLICATIONS

On PRINGLE of SCOTLAND:

Books

Houck, Catherine, The Fashion Encyclopedia, New York, 1982.
O'Hara, Georgina, The Encyclopaedia of Fashion, New York, 1986.

Articles

Richards, Amanda, "The Knitwear Brand that stretched Too Far," in Marketing, 6 April 1995.

- Fallon, James, "Pringle to Cut 290 Factory Workers," in DNR, 24 October 1997.
- Moffat, Alistair, "Sold Off to Hong Kong," in the New Statesman, 21 February 2000.
- "Pringle joins the fashion elite," available online at BBC News, www.news.bbc.co.uk, 21 February 2001.
- "The Lion Prepares to Roar," in the Drapers Record, 2 April 2001.
- Hall, Emma, "Fashion's Old Guard Aim to Generate Youth Appeal," in Campaign, 7 September 2001.

* * *

Founded in Cross Wynd, Hawick, Scotland in 1815 by Robert Pringle as a family business making hosiery, Pringle of Scotland became known throughout the world as an established brand and leader in fine cashmere and other high quality knitwear and sportswear, and a pioneer of modern knitwear technology and systems.

Although its origins were in the production of hosiery and underwear, Pringle is more well known for its particular emphasis on leisurewear and sportswear. The emphasis on knitwear as outerwear is a comparatively recent one, dating from the earlier years of the 20th century when its use by sportsmen, particularly in golf, as nonconstricting yet striking-style garments made it fashionable. Up until 1934 Pringle was known primarily as a company producing fine quality undergarments and a limited selection of knitted outerwear. In June 1934 the appointment of Otto Weisz, an Austrian refugee, as the first full-time professional designer to work within the British knitwear industry, brought a revolutionary attitude to the importance of design and a flair for color to an insular industry. Weisz's designs included the concept of the twinset, which became a classic. It has been said that few industries did more than Scottish whiskey and the Hawick knitwear industry to earn dollars for Britain.

Many Scottish crafts families worked for generations in the Pringle mills and a substantial investment program resulted in these factories being equipped with the latest state of the art technology and machinery, employing thousands and ranking with the most up-to-date production units in Scotland. Some of the finest fibers in the world were used, including cashmere from the mountains of East Asia, lambswool and the best quality Geelong from Australia, and the native Scottish wools, such as those from the Shetland Isles.

The men's and womenswear collections took their inspiration from the wools themselves, current color trends, lifestyles, and surroundings. These collections included patterned, textured, plain, and highly-styled garments in the latest shades to meet the requirements of an ever-changing fashion scene, and complementary woven accessories for both men and women, mainly in natural fibers. Active and leisure sportswear were of particular importance to Pringle products; the Nick Faldo Collection of knitwear and coordinates sold very well in the UK, Europe, Japan, and the U.S., as well as the Ladies Golf and sports Classic collections.

Pringle of Scotland became part of Joseph Dawson (Holdings) Limited, later renamed Dawson International Plc. in 1967. The strong international style of the company's products allowed expansion and the Pringle name was soon established in over 45 countries throughout the world. An aggressive expansion in the early 1990s took the company into a myriad of luxury products and put Pringle shops in many European outlets, and into Japan and South America. In addition, Pringle held two Royal Warrants, as Manufacturers of Knitted Garments to both Her Majesty the Queen and Her Majesty the Queen Mother. Yet the turbulent mid- and late 1990s took their toll on the venerable kniwear producer.

The too-rapid expansion of 1993 and 1994 came back to haunt Pringle; it was forced to cut back and sell shops to franchisees in 1995. There was, however, a glimmer of hope during a brief turnaround in 1997 and 1998, only to have the company clobbered by surge in the pound's value. The weakened export market (which accounted for two-thirds of Pringle's business) forced the manufacturer to scale back operations, first through a shortened work week, then through increasing layoffs. The once mighty brand then suffered a devastating blow in 2000 when Dawson International, wanting to concentrate solely on cashmere operations, sold the ailing Pringle to the Hong Kong-based S.C. Fang & Sons Company, Ltd. Alistair Moffat, writing in the New Statesman (21 February 2000), didn't mince words, stating, "Half the workforce will go, with 140 losing their jobs and 60 being transferred to another company. That is a disgrace, and a very damaging act."

While its future seemed in doubt, Pringle rallied in the early 21st century under the leadership of new chief executive Kim Winser, formerly of Marks & Spencer. The firm was further invigorated by sales of a diffusion line launched in 2001. A company spokesperson told Emma Hall of Campaigns (7 September 2001), "The Diffusion collection has a more casual feel and will establish a new attitude for the brand, aimed at the cutting edge of the youth market." Hall commented that the knitwear producer had already made much progress, producing advertising with a "rough-and-ready appeal that would have been anathema to the Scottish knitwear house a couple of seasons ago." Though Pringle of Scotland suffered the loss of longtime workers, plant closings, and a change of ownership—the 187-year-old company more than endured, it triumphed with a new look and a broader appeal.

—Doreen Ehrlich; updated by Owen James

PUCCI, Emilio

Italian designer

Born: Marchese Emilio Pucci di Barsento in Naples, 20 November 1914. Education: Attended the University of Milan, 1933–35, University of Georgia, 1935–36, Reed College, Portland, Oregon, 1936–37; M.A., 1937; Ph.D., University of Florence, 1941. Family: Married Cristina Nannini di Casabianca, 1959; children: Alessandro, Laudomia. Military Service: Bomber pilot in the Italian Air Force, 1938–42. Career: Olympic skier, 1934; women's skiwear designer, White Stag, for Lord & Taylor department store, 1948; freelance fashion designer, from 1949; first Pucci shop established in Capri, 1949, Rome, Elba, Montecatini, from 1950; president, Emilio Pucci SrL, Florence, and Emilio Pucci, New York, from 1950; vice-president for design/merchandising, Formfit International, 1960s; business run by family after death, 1992; daughter Laudomia assumed design duties; men's ties, swimwear reintroduced, 1998; new womenswear designed by Stephan Janson, 1998; majority share acquired by LVMH,

- Fallon, James, "Pringle to Cut 290 Factory Workers," in DNR, 24 October 1997.
- Moffat, Alistair, "Sold Off to Hong Kong," in the New Statesman, 21 February 2000.
- "Pringle joins the fashion elite," available online at BBC News, www.news.bbc.co.uk, 21 February 2001.
- "The Lion Prepares to Roar," in the Drapers Record, 2 April 2001.
- Hall, Emma, "Fashion's Old Guard Aim to Generate Youth Appeal," in Campaign, 7 September 2001.

* * *

Founded in Cross Wynd, Hawick, Scotland in 1815 by Robert Pringle as a family business making hosiery, Pringle of Scotland became known throughout the world as an established brand and leader in fine cashmere and other high quality knitwear and sportswear, and a pioneer of modern knitwear technology and systems.

Although its origins were in the production of hosiery and underwear, Pringle is more well known for its particular emphasis on leisurewear and sportswear. The emphasis on knitwear as outerwear is a comparatively recent one, dating from the earlier years of the 20th century when its use by sportsmen, particularly in golf, as nonconstricting yet striking-style garments made it fashionable. Up until 1934 Pringle was known primarily as a company producing fine quality undergarments and a limited selection of knitted outerwear. In June 1934 the appointment of Otto Weisz, an Austrian refugee, as the first full-time professional designer to work within the British knitwear industry, brought a revolutionary attitude to the importance of design and a flair for color to an insular industry. Weisz's designs included the concept of the twinset, which became a classic. It has been said that few industries did more than Scottish whiskey and the Hawick knitwear industry to earn dollars for Britain.

Many Scottish crafts families worked for generations in the Pringle mills and a substantial investment program resulted in these factories being equipped with the latest state of the art technology and machinery, employing thousands and ranking with the most up-to-date production units in Scotland. Some of the finest fibers in the world were used, including cashmere from the mountains of East Asia, lambswool and the best quality Geelong from Australia, and the native Scottish wools, such as those from the Shetland Isles.

The men's and womenswear collections took their inspiration from the wools themselves, current color trends, lifestyles, and surroundings. These collections included patterned, textured, plain, and highly-styled garments in the latest shades to meet the requirements of an ever-changing fashion scene, and complementary woven accessories for both men and women, mainly in natural fibers. Active and leisure sportswear were of particular importance to Pringle products; the Nick Faldo Collection of knitwear and coordinates sold very well in the UK, Europe, Japan, and the U.S., as well as the Ladies Golf and sports Classic collections.

Pringle of Scotland became part of Joseph Dawson (Holdings) Limited, later renamed Dawson International Plc. in 1967. The strong international style of the company's products allowed expansion and the Pringle name was soon established in over 45 countries throughout the world. An aggressive expansion in the early 1990s took the company into a myriad of luxury products and put Pringle shops in many European outlets, and into Japan and South America. In addition, Pringle held two Royal Warrants, as Manufacturers of Knitted Garments to both Her Majesty the Queen and Her Majesty the Queen Mother. Yet the turbulent mid- and late 1990s took their toll on the venerable kniwear producer.

The too-rapid expansion of 1993 and 1994 came back to haunt Pringle; it was forced to cut back and sell shops to franchisees in 1995. There was, however, a glimmer of hope during a brief turnaround in 1997 and 1998, only to have the company clobbered by surge in the pound's value. The weakened export market (which accounted for two-thirds of Pringle's business) forced the manufacturer to scale back operations, first through a shortened work week, then through increasing layoffs. The once mighty brand then suffered a devastating blow in 2000 when Dawson International, wanting to concentrate solely on cashmere operations, sold the ailing Pringle to the Hong Kong-based S.C. Fang & Sons Company, Ltd. Alistair Moffat, writing in the New Statesman (21 February 2000), didn't mince words, stating, "Half the workforce will go, with 140 losing their jobs and 60 being transferred to another company. That is a disgrace, and a very damaging act."

While its future seemed in doubt, Pringle rallied in the early 21st century under the leadership of new chief executive Kim Winser, formerly of Marks & Spencer. The firm was further invigorated by sales of a diffusion line launched in 2001. A company spokesperson told Emma Hall of Campaigns (7 September 2001), "The Diffusion collection has a more casual feel and will establish a new attitude for the brand, aimed at the cutting edge of the youth market." Hall commented that the knitwear producer had already made much progress, producing advertising with a "rough-and-ready appeal that would have been anathema to the Scottish knitwear house a couple of seasons ago." Though Pringle of Scotland suffered the loss of longtime workers, plant closings, and a change of ownership—the 187-year-old company more than endured, it triumphed with a new look and a broader appeal.

—Doreen Ehrlich; updated by Owen James

PUCCI, Emilio

Italian designer

Born: Marchese Emilio Pucci di Barsento in Naples, 20 November 1914. Education: Attended the University of Milan, 1933–35, University of Georgia, 1935–36, Reed College, Portland, Oregon, 1936–37; M.A., 1937; Ph.D., University of Florence, 1941. Family: Married Cristina Nannini di Casabianca, 1959; children: Alessandro, Laudomia.

Military Service: Bomber pilot in the Italian Air Force, 1938–42. Career: Olympic skier, 1934; women's skiwear designer, White Stag, for Lord & Taylor department store, 1948; freelance fashion designer, from 1949; first Pucci shop established in Capri, 1949, Rome, Elba, Montecatini, from 1950; president, Emilio Pucci SrL, Florence, and Emilio Pucci, New York, from 1950; vice-president for design/merchandising, Formfit International, 1960s; business run by family after death, 1992; daughter Laudomia assumed design duties; men's ties, swimwear reintroduced, 1998; new womenswear designed by Stephan Janson, 1998; majority share acquired by LVMH, Emilio Pucci, 1976: printed silk dresses. © Bettmann/CORBIS.

2000; launched website, 2001. Awards: Neiman Marcus award, 1954, 1967; Sports Illustrated award, 1955, 1961; Burdines Fashion award, 1955; the Sunday Times award, London, 1963; Association of Industrial Design award, Milan, 1968; Drexel University award, Philadelphia, 1975; Italy-Austria award, 1977; Knighthood, Rome, 1982; Medaille de la Ville de Paris, 1985; Council of Fashion Designers of America award, 1990. Died: 29 November 1992, in Florence, Italy. Company Address: Palazzo Pucci, via dei Pucci 6, Florence, Italy. Company Website: www.emiliopucci.com.

PUBLICATIONS

On PUCCI:

Books

- Mulassano, Adriana, I mass-modà: fatti e personaggi dell'Italian Look, Florence, 1979.
Aragno, B.G., editor, 40 Years of Italian Fashion [exhibition catalogue], Rome, 1983.

Emilio Pucci, spring/summer 2002 ready-to-wear collection. © AFP/CORBIS.

Kennedy, Shirley, Pucci: A Renaissance in Fashion, New York, 1986, 1991.

Casadio, Mariuccia, Emilio Pucci, New York, 1998.

Articles

Schiff, F., "If You Knew Pucci," in Interview, September 1974.

"Founding Father of the Signature Print," in the Times (London), 1 September 1976.

Shields, Jody, "Pucci," in Vogue, May 1990.

Hochswender, Woody, "Pucci Redux," in the New York Times, 8 May 1990.

Porti, Anna Gloria, "Mai come adesso è Pucci," in Vogue (Milan), September 1990.

Young, Lucie, "The New Pucci Coup: Psychedelic Swirls Back," in Metropolitan Home (London), December/January 1990–91.

Morris, Bernadine, "Emilio Pucci, Designer of Bright Prints, Dies at 78," in the New York Times, 1 December 1992.

"Prince of Prints," [obituary] in People, 14 December 1992.

"Emilio Pucci," [obituary] in Current Biography, January 1993.

Goldstein, Lauren, "Pucci Adds New Punch to Spring Presentation," in DNR, 1 December 1997.

Forden, Sara Gay, "Tribute to Pucci Leads to Birth of a Collection," in WWD, 22 December 1997.

Braunstein, Peter, "Pucci Conquers Cyberspace," in WWD, 30 July 2000.

Menkes, Suzy, "Pucci Picks an Eclectic Designer," in the International Herald Tribune, 31 October 2000.

* * *

Rising out of the ashes of European fashion after World War II, Emilio Pucci brought a spectrum of carefree colors to the rationed continent. His sportswear beginnings lent a casual air to his work, a welcome relief from recent austerity and a new meaning to the term "resort wear." The swirling freestyle patterns and fluid fabrics he used became internationally recognized and desired, copied by many but rivaled by few.

American Tina Lesser may have been earlier with her hand-painted silks, but Pucci quickly made them his own, covering the fine lustrous fabric with optical fantasies of geometric shapes. His color range came straight from an Aegean horizon, turquoise and ultramarine set against sea green and lime, or hot fuchsia and sunflower yellow. Pucci swept away the repetitive sailor styles and tailored linens of cruisewear and brought in a new air of ease and luxury with his breezy separates. He capitalized on the lull in British and French couture after the war that benefitted many American and Italian designers, and dressed the fashionable mondaine in bold ready-to-wear.

The government-backed presentations of Italian designers of the late 1940s provided an aristocratic Florentine backdrop for Pucci's collections, which were soon internationally popular, and he became increasingly aware of the importance of the American market to his success. His characteristic style was best seen in slim-legged trousers in fruity shades, which provided a sexy foil to loose-hanging tunics and classic shirts left to hang outside the waistband.

His collections encompassed more than just stylish but jaunty daywear. In 1961 he showed simple evening dresses with deep V-shape panels set into their sophisticated bias-cut silhouette. Pucci saw his greatest success in the 1960s; his psychedelic-patterned printed silks were seen everywhere. They were, and continued to be worn by celebrities, from early clients Marilyn Monroe and Jackie Kennedy to Madonna, all seduced by the light touch of his designs.

As his reputation grew, Pucci's distinctive patterns were aspired to by many; a Pucci scarf or vivid silk handbag provided the cachet of luxury. His name was seen on everything from gloves to small ornaments, yet by the 1970s his work, like that of other big fashion houses, seemed less in tune with the times. During the 1980s, Pucci ranges seemed irrelevant to the weighty tailored severity that preoccupied the fashion world. It was not until the start of the 1990s that the pure whirling colors of the Pucci label (by then directed by his daughter, Laudomia) were again universally embraced. His signature shapes and vivid patterns had already inspired a generation of Italian designers, notably Gianni Versace and Franco Moschino, and in 1991 the reinvigorated Pucci look was everywhere. It had been translated into the modern essentials—clinging leggings, catsuits, and stretch polo necks which continued the sexy feel of his work and contrasted perfectly with his airy shirts. His clothes sold out across the world as a new, younger audience took up the label, perpetuating its popularity, albeit on a less high profile level after the initial Pucci mania earlier in the year.

The eclectic use of surface pattern and innovative color combinations distinguishing Pucci's work have been widely emulated throughout the fashion strata. His use of color added a feeling of movement to his clothes, while the quality fabrics enhanced the fluid line. The classic separates he designed continued to be successful, while the addition of newer styles ensured that the label would continue as a vibrant note to fashion in the later 1990s after Pucci's death in 1992.

A rebirth of Pucci's distinctive prints for men, including swimwear, sleepwear and ties, was scheduled to arrive in U.S. in 1998, but not before a new collection of womenswear debuted in Florence in January. At a time when original Pucci designs brought in premium prices at vintage shops, the reissue of menswear was inspired. The fall/winter womenswear line, however, grew out of different circumstances. "The whole idea started during the Biennial exhibition in Florence last fall," Laudomia Pucci, a company's director, told Women's Wear Daily in December 1997. The tribute, arranged by her mother Crista, had garnered so much attention the family decided to introduce a 50-piece collection, mostly for women, designed by Milan-based designer Stephan Janson. "We decided on Stephan Janson to do the collection because he's young, well-traveled, and well-cultured," Laudomia commented, and Janson "will be able to live well in the Pucci universe."

In the 21st century, change came to Pucci by way of new ownership. In February 2000 luxury conglomerate LVMH bought a controlling stake in the firm and initiated a haul of the Pucci image. Four new Pucci stores opened in Milan, Portofino, St. Moritz, and Palm Beach, followed by a segue into home furnishings. Next came the appointment of Puerto Rican designer Julio Espada as artistic director (Laudomia was named Image Director), and in 2001 came the launch of a snazzy Pucci website.

The online Pucci forum blended archival photos with newer images, with collections past and present. Laudomia believed the mix of "classic and contemporary" was worthy of special notice. "I don't think any fashion house with a history has tried to convey that dimension to an online audience," she remarked to Women's Wear Daily in July 2001. "They focus solely on now." The "now" of Pucci may be firmly rooted in the past, but is securely focused on the future.

—Rebecca Arnold; updated by Owen James

PULITZER, Lilly

American designer

Born: Lillian McKim in Roslyn, New York. Family: Married Herbert (Pete) Pulitzer (divorced, 1969); married Enrique Rousseau (died 1993); children: Peter, Minnie, Liza. Career: Formed business in Palm Beach, Florida, for sale of women's shifts, 1959; president, Lilly Pulitzer, Inc., 1961–84; children's dresses, called "Minnies," introduced, 1962; Pulitzer Jeans introduced, 1963; Men's Stuff line introduced, 1969; nearly three dozen stores nationwide, late 1970s; Chapter 11 filed and business closed, 1984; new line of Lillys designed by Marty Karabees, 1986; rights to line purchased by Sugartown Worldwide, Inc., 1992; relaunched and expanded Lilly lines, mid-1990s; sleepwear introduced, 1998; signed licensing deal with Dan River Home Fashions, 2000; profiled in the New Yorker, 2000.

PUBLICATIONS

On PULITZER:

Books

Fairchild, John, The Fashionable Savages, Garden City, New York, 1965.

Bender, Marylin, The Beautiful People, New York, 1967.

Lambert, Eleanor, The World of Fashion: People, Places, Resources, New York, London, 1976.

Articles

Moin, David, "Lilly Pulitzer's Prizes: A 'Shift' into the 1980s," in New York Apparel News, February 1984.

Reed, Susan, "Lilly Pulitzer's Preppy Prints to Get a Second Life," in People, 23 June 1986.

Staples, Kate, "Pulitzer's Prizes," in Mademoiselle, May 1993.

Koski, Lorna, "The Return of Lilly," in W, October 1993.

Monget, Karen, "Lilly Pulitzer's Latest—Sleepwear," in WWD, 27 April 1998.

Yazigi, Monique P., "The Pink-and-Green Police...," in the New York Times, 17 May 1998.

"Textile Briefs," in HFN (Weekly Newspaper for the Home Furnishing Network), 28 February 2000.

"Beachy Keen...Lilly Pulitzer Rousseau Enjoys a Second Blossoming...," in People, 4 September 2000.

MacFarquhar, Larissa, "Everything Lilly," in the New Yorker, 4 September 2000.

* * *

According to the legend, it all began with an orange juice stand begun by a bored (and rich) housewife in October 1959. The boss brought a dozen dresses made by her dressmaker from fabric bought at a nearby Woolworth's (in bright colorful prints that wouldn't show orange juice stains) and sold them off a pipe-rack. "I started it as a lark," Pulitzer remembered years later to Lorna Koski of W, "I just knew what I liked." Within five years, it seemed as if every woman in America had at least one sleeveless, back-zipped "Lilly" and more or less lived in the comfortable lifestyle of the the dress represented.

The Lilly designed by Pulitzer was a simple shift or chemise, an unarticulated little dress that caught the attention of women everywhere, including boarding-school chum Jacqueline Bouvier Kennedy. John Fairchild, writing in The Fashionable Savages (New York, 1965) explained, "Watch the chemise make a comeback with the masses... Just look at the Lilly, those chemises designed by Lilly Pulitzer, who has a gold mine in those little nothing, beautiful print chemises... All the top stores clamor for them—the same fashion they had on their markdown racks a few years back. The only difference is the Lilly is lined and [its] shape controlled."

There is, however, always a big difference between the uncomplicated Diane Von Furstenberg wrap dress, the Halston Ultrasuede shirtwaist or other icons of style, and all the competition. Pulitzer invented nothing; she wasn't really a designer—but she provided a uniform of sorts to women of the early and mid-1960s. The nondesign of the Lilly was its allure; a perky, bright, and unpretentious shift in polished cotton chintz met an American need for personal style amidst homogenous culture. Eleanor Lambert, writing in The World of Fashion, (New York, 1976) describes its evolution, "first a 'snob' uniform, then a general fashion craze."

The eclectic use of surface pattern and innovative color combinations distinguishing Pucci's work have been widely emulated throughout the fashion strata. His use of color added a feeling of movement to his clothes, while the quality fabrics enhanced the fluid line. The classic separates he designed continued to be successful, while the addition of newer styles ensured that the label would continue as a vibrant note to fashion in the later 1990s after Pucci's death in 1992.

A rebirth of Pucci's distinctive prints for men, including swimwear, sleepwear and ties, was scheduled to arrive in U.S. in 1998, but not before a new collection of womenswear debuted in Florence in January. At a time when original Pucci designs brought in premium prices at vintage shops, the reissue of menswear was inspired. The fall/winter womenswear line, however, grew out of different circumstances. "The whole idea started during the Biennial exhibition in Florence last fall," Laudomia Pucci, a company's director, told Women's Wear Daily in December 1997. The tribute, arranged by her mother Crista, had garnered so much attention the family decided to introduce a 50-piece collection, mostly for women, designed by Milan-based designer Stephan Janson. "We decided on Stephan Janson to do the collection because he's young, well-traveled, and well-cultured," Laudomia commented, and Janson "will be able to live well in the Pucci universe."

In the 21st century, change came to Pucci by way of new ownership. In February 2000 luxury conglomerate LVMH bought a controlling stake in the firm and initiated a haul of the Pucci image. Four new Pucci stores opened in Milan, Portofino, St. Moritz, and Palm Beach, followed by a segue into home furnishings. Next came the appointment of Puerto Rican designer Julio Espada as artistic director (Laudomia was named Image Director), and in 2001 came the launch of a snazzy Pucci website.

The online Pucci forum blended archival photos with newer images, with collections past and present. Laudomia believed the mix of "classic and contemporary" was worthy of special notice. "I don't think any fashion house with a history has tried to convey that dimension to an online audience," she remarked to Women's Wear Daily in July 2001. "They focus solely on now." The "now" of Pucci may be firmly rooted in the past, but is securely focused on the future.

—Rebecca Arnold; updated by Owen James

PULITZER, Lilly

American designer

Born: Lillian McKim in Roslyn, New York. Family: Married Herbert (Pete) Pulitzer (divorced, 1969); married Enrique Rousseau (died 1993); children: Peter, Minnie, Liza. Career: Formed business in Palm Beach, Florida, for sale of women's shifts, 1959; president, Lilly Pulitzer, Inc., 1961–84; children's dresses, called "Minnies," introduced, 1962; Pulitzer Jeans introduced, 1963; Men's Stuff line introduced, 1969; nearly three dozen stores nationwide, late 1970s; Chapter 11 filed and business closed, 1984; new line of Lillys designed by Marty Karabees, 1986; rights to line purchased by Sugartown Worldwide, Inc., 1992; relaunched and expanded Lilly lines, mid-1990s; sleepwear introduced, 1998; signed licensing deal with Dan River Home Fashions, 2000; profiled in the New Yorker, 2000.

PUBLICATIONS

On PULITZER:

Books

Fairchild, John, The Fashionable Savages, Garden City, New York, 1965.

Bender, Marylin, The Beautiful People, New York, 1967.

Lambert, Eleanor, The World of Fashion: People, Places, Resources, New York, London, 1976.

Articles

Moin, David, "Lilly Pulitzer's Prizes: A 'Shift' into the 1980s," in New York Apparel News, February 1984.

Reed, Susan, "Lilly Pulitzer's Preppy Prints to Get a Second Life," in People, 23 June 1986.

Staples, Kate, "Pulitzer's Prizes," in Mademoiselle, May 1993.

Koski, Lorna, "The Return of Lilly," in W, October 1993.

Monget, Karen, "Lilly Pulitzer's Latest—Sleepwear," in WWD, 27 April 1998.

Yazigi, Monique P., "The Pink-and-Green Police...," in the New York Times, 17 May 1998.

"Textile Briefs," in HFN (Weekly Newspaper for the Home Furnishing Network), 28 February 2000.

"Beachy Keen...Lilly Pulitzer Rousseau Enjoys a Second Blossoming...," in People, 4 September 2000.

MacFarquhar, Larissa, "Everything Lilly," in the New Yorker, 4 September 2000.

* * *

According to the legend, it all began with an orange juice stand begun by a bored (and rich) housewife in October 1959. The boss brought a dozen dresses made by her dressmaker from fabric bought at a nearby Woolworth's (in bright colorful prints that wouldn't show orange juice stains) and sold them off a pipe-rack. "I started it as a lark," Pulitzer remembered years later to Lorna Koski of W, "I just knew what I liked." Within five years, it seemed as if every woman in America had at least one sleeveless, back-zipped "Lilly" and more or less lived in the comfortable lifestyle of the the dress represented.

The Lilly designed by Pulitzer was a simple shift or chemise, an unarticulated little dress that caught the attention of women everywhere, including boarding-school chum Jacqueline Bouvier Kennedy. John Fairchild, writing in The Fashionable Savages (New York, 1965) explained, "Watch the chemise make a comeback with the masses... Just look at the Lilly, those chemises designed by Lilly Pulitzer, who has a gold mine in those little nothing, beautiful print chemises... All the top stores clamor for them—the same fashion they had on their markdown racks a few years back. The only difference is the Lilly is lined and [its] shape controlled."

There is, however, always a big difference between the uncomplicated Diane Von Furstenberg wrap dress, the Halston Ultrasuede shirtwaist or other icons of style, and all the competition. Pulitzer invented nothing; she wasn't really a designer—but she provided a uniform of sorts to women of the early and mid-1960s. The nondesign of the Lilly was its allure; a perky, bright, and unpretentious shift in polished cotton chintz met an American need for personal style amidst homogenous culture. Eleanor Lambert, writing in The World of Fashion, (New York, 1976) describes its evolution, "first a 'snob' uniform, then a general fashion craze."

Pulitzer had long been a powerful family name in America, and its associations with Palm Beach grandeur made vague allusions to wealth and aristocracy, but the dress was easily accessible. One of the elements of its popularity was it appealed not only across class lines, but across all ages of women, serving young women who might aspire to more than Laugh-In shifts, and style to women of a certain age who found the simplified form a kind of chaste elegance. Especially in an era influenced by the easy and unadorned grace of Jackie Kennedy, who became First Lady. As Marylin Bender reported in The Beautiful People (New York, 1976), “the fact that Jacqueline, Ethel, and Joan Kennedy were Lilly-fans didn’t hurt at all.”

Bender quoted Pulitzer as saying, “The great thing about the Lilly is that you wear practically nothing underneath.” In this inner simplicity as well as the outward simplicity in silhouette and bold tropical print, Pulitzer understood her time as much as she understood herself. Pulitzer was said to have worked with her dressmaker to come up with an alternative to trousers for the leisure life of Palm Beach, as she felt she didn’t look good in pants. The alternative arrived at was nothing more than the classic housedress, sanctioned a little by Balenciaga’s 1950s chemise, brightened by the tropical palette, and rarefied by the connection to grand lifestyle.

Only in America could the “Lilly” have happened as it did—a triumph of nondesign, an aristocratic aura bestowed on a distinctly unaristocratic idea, a dress that at a modest $30 to $75 retail exemplified its time. The mid-1960s youthquake, however, with its extreme minis followed by paper dresses and other experiments made the Lilly recede somewhat from fashion. In the 1970s Pulitzer opened retail shops across the U.S., numbering nearly three dozen by late in the decade. The Lilly, which had waxed and waned, was rediscovered in the 1980s and again became the chicest shift; yet by 1984 sales had fallen off so sharply Pulitzer was forced to close her boutiques and filed for Chapter 11 bankruptcy.

In fashion, where everything old is new again, the Lilly experienced another renaissance in 1986 when designer Marty Karabees introduced a line, then again in the early 1990s when the Lilly Pulitzer label was acquired by Sugartown Worldwide Inc., run by entrepreneur James B. Bradbeer, Jr. and his partners. Bradbeer reintroduced the Lilly chemise and a host of other designs including sportswear and swimwear for women and girls, and planned a foray into men’s products as well. Pulitzer sleepwear was launched in 1998 at luxury retailers like Saks Fifth Avenue and specialty chains, and the following year a new housewares collection was slated for release. The Pulitzer home collection became a reality in early 2000 through a licensing deal with Dan River Home Fashions. Luxury bed linens and a bath collection debuted in April, marking a new era for the Lilly-inspired prints designed more than three decades before.

—Richard Martin; updated by Owen James

PUMA

See LEE, Mickey

Q

QUANT, Mary

British designer

Born: Kent, 11 February 1934. Education: Studied art and design at Goldsmith's College of Art, London University, 1952–55. Family: Married Alexander Plunket Greene, 1957 (died, 1990); children: Orlando. Career: Fashion designer, from 1955; established Bazaar boutique and Alexander's restaurant, London, 1955; founder/director, Mary Quant Ginger Group wholesale design and manufacturing firm, 1963, and Mary Quant, Ltd., 1963; cosmetics line introduced, 1966; launched hot pants, 1969; member, Design Council, London, from 1971; Mary Quant Japan franchise shops established, 1983; has designed for J.C. Penney, Puritan Fashions, Alligator Rainwear, Kangol, Dupont Europe, Staffordshire Potteries, and many more; authored several books; opened Mary Quant Colour Shops, 1990s; stepped down from firm bearing her name, 2000. Exhibitions: Mary Quant's London, Museum of London, 1973. Awards: Woman of the Year award, London, 1963; the Sunday Times International Fashion award, London, 1963; Bath Museum of Costume Dress of the Year award, 1963; Maison Blanche Rex award, New Orleans, 1964; Piavola d'Oro award, 1966; Chartered Society of Designers medal, 1966; Officer, Order of the British Empire, 1966; Fellow, Chartered Society of Designers, 1967; Royal Designer for Industry, Royal Society of Arts, 1969; British Fashion Council Hall of Fame award, 1990; Senior Fellow, Royal College of Art, London, 1991. Address: 3 Ives St., London SW3 2NE, England. Website: www.maryquant.com.

PUBLICATIONS

By QUANT:

Books

- Quant by Quant*, Bath, 1966, 1974; New York, 1967.
Mary Quant's Daisy Chain of Things to Do, Glasgow, 1975.
Colour by Quant, with Felicity Greene, London, 1984; New York, 1985.
Quant on Makeup, with Vicci Bentley, London, 1986; New York, 1987.
The Ultimate Beauty Book, Ontario, 1996.
Classic Makeup & Beauty Book, with Maureen Barrymore and Dave King, London, 1998.

Articles

- "A Personal Design for Living," in the Listener (London), 19–26 December 1974.
"Things I Wish I'd Known at 19," in the Sunday Express Magazine (London), 21 June 1982.

On QUANT:

Books

- Halliday, Leonard, The Fashion Makers, London, 1966.
Bender, Marylin, The Beautiful People, New York, 1967.
Morris, Brian, and Ernestine Carter, An Introduction to Mary Quant's London, [exhibition catalogue], London 1973.
Bernard, Barbara, Fashion in the Sixties, London, 1978.
Carter, Ernestine, Magic Names of Fashion, Englewood Cliffs, NJ, 1980.

Mary Quant, 1965 collection: "Catamaran" (left), "Raleigh" (center), and "Centre-half" (right). © AP/Wide World Photos.

Mary Quant (right) with three of her designs, 1968. © AP/Wide World Photos.

MacCarthy, Fiona, and Patrick Nugent, Eye for Industry: Royal Designers for Industry 1936–1986 [exhibition catalogue], London, 1986.

Whiteley, Nigel, Pop Design: Modernism to Mod [exhibition catalogue], Design Council, London, 1987.

Lobenthal, Joel, Radical Rags: Fashions of the Sixties, New York, 1990.

Stegemeyer, Anne, Who's Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.

Cawthorne, Nigel, Key Moments in Fashion, London, 1998.

Strodder, Chris, Swingin' Chicks of the Sixties, New York, 2000.

Articles

"British Couple Kooky Styles," in Life (New York), 5 December 1960.

"Brash New Breed of British Designers," in Life, 8 October 1963.

Davis, John, "Mary, Mary, Quite Contrary, How Does Your Money Grow?" in the Observer (London), 19 August 1973.

De'Ath, Wilfred, "The Middle Age of Mary Quant," in the Illustrated London News, February 1974.

Kingsley, H., "How Does Her Empire Grow?," in the Sunday Telegraph Magazine (London), 29 March 1981.

Jackson, Jan, "Interview with Mary Quant," in the Leicester Mercury (England), 12 November 1984.

Lowe, Shirley, "Mary's Quantum Leap into the 1980s," in the Sunday Times Magazine (London), 10 August 1986.

Savage, Percy, "Mary Quant," in Art & Design (London), September 1986.

Orr, Deborah, "Minis to the Masses," in the New Statesman & Society (London), 19 October 1990.

Kay, Helen, "Uppers and Downers: British Entrepreneurs of the Past 25 Years," in Management Today (London), 9 October 1991.

Gandee, Charles, "Mod Mary," in Vogue, July 1995.

Terry, Elizabeth, "Beauty Black Book—Proud Mary," in In Style, 1 March 1996.

"All Revolutions Start Somewhere," in Management, September 1997.

Gillan, Audrey, "Mary Quant Quits Fashion Empire," in The Guardian, 2 December 2000.

Holmes, Lee, "A to Z of Fashion—Q is for Quant," in the Independent on Sunday, 7 October 2001.

* * *

The name Mary Quant is synonymous with 1960s fashion. Quant's designs initiated a look for the newly emerging teen-and-twenties market enabling young women to establish their own identity and put Britain on the international fashion map.

Quant did not study fashion; following parental advice she enrolled in an Art Teacher's Diploma course at Goldsmith's College, London University, but she was not committed to teaching. In the evenings she went to pattern cutting classes. Her fashion career began in 1955, in the workrooms of the London milliner, Erik, the same year she opened her boutique, Bazaar in King's Road, Chelsea, in partnership with her future husband, Alexander Plunket-Greene. The idea was to give the so-called Chelsea Set "a bouillabaisse of clothes and accessories." Quant was the buyer, but she soon found the kinds of clothes she wanted were not available. The solution was obvious, but not easy—21 years old, with little fashion experience, Quant started manufacturing from her home. Using revamped Butterick patterns and fabrics bought retail at Harrods, she created a look for the Chelsea girl. Her customers were hardly younger than herself and she knew what they wanted; her ideas took off in a big way, on both sides of the Atlantic.

Americans loved the London Look, so much so that in 1957 Quant signed a contract with J.C. Penney to create clothes and underwear for the wholesale market. American coordinates convinced her that separates were versatile and ideal for the young. To reach more of the British market in 1958 she launched the Ginger Group, a mass-produced version of the look, with U.S. manufacturer Steinberg's. In the same year she was nominated as Woman of the Year in Britain and the Sunday Times in London gave her its International Fashion award.

Quant created a total look based on simple shapes and bold fashion statements. She hijacked the beatnik style of the late 1950s: dark stockings, flat shoes, and polo necks became obligatory for the girl in the street. The pinafore dress, based on the traditional British school tunic, was transformed as one of the most useful garments of the early 1960s. Hemlines rose higher and higher; Quant's miniskirts reached thigh level, in 1965, and everyone followed. Courrèges confirmed that the time was right by launching his couture version in Paris but Quant needed no confirmation—1965 was the year of her whistlestop tour to the United States. With 30 outfits and her own models, she showed in 12 cities in 14 days. Sporting miniskirts and Vidal Sassoon's five-point geometric haircuts, the models ran and danced down the catwalk. It was the epitome of Swinging London and it took America by storm.

Quant's talents did not go unnoticed in higher places. In 1966 she was awarded the OBE for services to fashion and went to Buckingham Palace wearing a miniskirt. Her cosmetics line was also launched this year, and recognizable by the familiar daisy logo, Quant cosmetics were an international success. Later taken over by Max Factor, they were retailed in 90 countries. Additionally, she experimented with new materials including PVC and nylon, to create outerwear, shoes, tights, and swimwear.

In the early 1970s Quant moved out of mass market and began to work for a wider age group, chiefly for export to the U.S. and Europe. Her range of merchandise expanded to include household goods, toys, and furnishings. Mary Quant at Home, launched in the U.S. market in 1983, included franchised home furnishings and even wine. By the end of the 1980s her designs were again reaching the British mass market, through the pages of the Great Universal Stores/Kays mail order catalogues.

Mary Quant remained a genuine fashion innovator well into the 1990s and into the 2000s. She adjusted to change—the 1960s designer for the youth explosion became a creator for the 1980s and beyond lifestyle boom. Her market had grown up with her and she was able to anticipate its demands. Along the way she began publishing books, autobiographical to start, and later on beauty and cosmetics. It wasn't until she was in her 60s that Mary Quant stepped down as director of Mary Quant Ltd., in 2000. She did, however, remain a consultant for the myriad of products she pioneered over the last four decades.

—Hazel Clark; updated by Owen James

R

RABANNE, Paco

French designer

Born: Francisco Rabaneda Cuervo in San Sebastian, Spain, 18 February 1934; raised in France. Education: Studied architecture at l'École Nationale des Beaux-Arts, Paris, 1952–55. Career: Presented first haute couture collection, "Twelve Unwearable Dresses," Paris, 1966; home furnishing and tableware lines introduced, 1981; launched men's ready-to-wear line, 1983; men's skin care line launched, 1984; debuted women's ready-to-wear line, 1990; opened first shop,

Paco Rabanne, fall 1968 collection: "The Water" (left) and "The Fire," (right) minidresses made of gold and silver plates. © AP/Wide World Photos.

Paris, 1990; introduced leather goods, 1991; began condominium development in Miami beach, 1994; launched Champagne Lanson Noble Cuvee, 1998; parent company Puig closes Rabanne fashion, 1999; fragrances include Calandre, late 1960s, Paco Rabanne pour Homme, 1973, Metal, 1979, La Nuit, 1985, Sport, 1985, Tenere, 1988; Ultraviolet, 2000. Exhibitions: Body Covering, Museum of Contemporary Crafts, New York, 1968; Paco Rabanne, Musée de la mode, Marseille, 1995; Une vision plastique: rencontre de la plastique et de la Haute-Couture, Musée du Peigne et de la Plasturgie, Oyonnax, 1998. Folies de dentelles, Musée des Beaux-Arts et de la Dentelle, Alençon, 2000. Awards: Beauty Products Industry award, 1969; Fragrance Foundation Recognition award, 1974; L'Aiguille d'Or award, 1977; Dé d'Or award, 1990; Chevalier de la Légion d'Honneur, 1989; Officier de l'Ordre d'Isabelle la Catholique (Spain), 1989. Address: 6, boulevard de Parc, 92523 Neuilly, France. Website: www.paco.com.

PUBLICATIONS

By RABANNE:

Books

Trajectory, Paris, 1991.

Collections Paco Rabanne: 200 modèles de haute couture, 1966–1994, [catalogue], with Hervé Chayette and Laurence Calmels, Paris, 1994.

Paco Rabanne: Musée de la mode, 9 juin–17 septembre 1995, [exhibititon catalogue], Marseille, 1995.

La force des Celts: l'héritage druidique, with Philip Carr-Gomm, Paris, 1996.

Paco Rabanne: A Feeling for Research, with Lydia Kamitsis, Paris, 1996.

La leçon indienne: les secrets d'un homme-médecine, conversations avec Wallace Black Elk, with Wallace Black Elk, Paris, 1996.

The Dawn of the Golden Age: A Spiritual Design for Living, Barcelona & Shaftsbury, Dorset, 1997.

Paco Rabanne: Une vision plastique—rencontre de la plasturgie et de la Haute-Couture, [exhibition catalogue], Oyonnax, France, 1998.

Journey: From One Life to Another, Shaftsbury, Dorset, 1999.

1999: Fire from the Heavens, Paris, 1999.

Folies et dentelles, [exhibition catalogue], Alençon, France, 2000.

On RABANNE:

Books

Bender, Marylin, The Beautiful People, New York, 1967.

Clemmer, Jean, Canned Candies: The Exotic Women and Clothes of Paco Rabanne, Paris & London, 1969.

- Loebenthal, Joel, Radical Rags: Fashions of the Sixties, New York, 1990.
- Stegemeyer, Anne, Who's Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.
- Kamitsis, Lydia, Paco Rabanne, London, 1999.

Articles

- Sharp, Joy, "Fashion Foibles of 1967," in Costume, No. 2, 1968.
- Tretiak, Philippe, "Paco le visionnaire," in Elle (Paris), 24 October 1988.
- Dutt, Robin, "Metal Guru," in Clothes Show (London), December/January 1989–90.
- Bourdley, Laurence, "Paco Rabanne," in L'Officiel (Paris), February 1990.
- Silver, Vernon, "Label Living: You've Worn the Perfume, Now Live in the Condo," in the New York Times, 20 February 1994.
- Louie, Elaine, "Here's a Rainy Day Project (but Watch for Lightning)," in the New York Times, 30 May 1996.
- Whitney, Craig R., "An Old Prediction Speeds France's Annual Exodus," in the New York Times, 6 July 1999.
- Young, Clara, "Paco Rabanne," [profile] online at Fashion Live, www.fashionlive.com, 5 August 2000.

* * *

It comes as no surprise, on viewing the designs of Paco Rabanne, to hear that he prefers to be described as an engineer rather than a couturier. Son of the chief seamstress at Balenciaga (famed for his intricate techniques of construction), Rabanne, after studying architecture, made his name in the 1960s with a series of bizarre, futuristic garments made out of incongruous materials. When viewed on the catwalk they seemed space-age prototypes rather than high fashion garments.

Believing that the only new frontier left in fashion was the discovery and utilization of new materials rather than the old couture method of changing lines from season to season, Rabanne totally broke with tradition, experimenting with plastic and aluminium, to create some of the most eccentric yet influential garments of the 1960s. It was estimated that by 1966 Rabanne was using 30,000 metres of Rhodoid plastic per month in such designs as bib necklaces made of phosphorescent plastic discs strung together with fine wire and whole dresses of the same material linked by metal chains. When he had exhausted the possibilities of plastic, Rabanne created a contemporary version of chainmail using tiny triangles of aluminium and leather held together with flexible wire rings to construct a series of simple shift mini dresses.

The delight of his designs comes in the use of disparate materials not previously considered appropriate for use in clothing, or the displacing of traditional materials in order to produce strange juxtapositions of color and texture. He was, for instance, one of the first designers to combine knits, leather, and fur, using combinations like a cape made of matte silver leather triangles with black pony skin or a coat teaming curly white lamb and white leather.

It could be said that in the 1970s and 1980s the name Paco Rabanne became associated with male toiletries rather than for the intriguing experimentation he had been carrying out. Rabanne relies on the sales of his successful line of skinscents—including Calandre, Paco, and Metal—to finance his more technological projects. In 1971 he collaborated with Louis Giffard, an authority on flow-molding techniques, to produce a raincoat molded entirely in one piece of plastic.

Even the buttons were part of the same process, molded directly into the garment and fitting into pressed-out pieces on the other side of the coat.

In the 1990s, with a 1960s renaissance in full swing, the inventive caliber of Rabanne has been rediscovered. His latest collections are concentrating on stretch jersey, cotton, and viscose fabrics in metallic hues, still accessorized by enormous pieces of jewelry. The high modernism of his 1960s designs seems touchingly innocent when viewed through the jaded eyes of the 1990s. Science and technology in contemporary culture signify something far removed from the faith and hope in the future Rabanne was expressing with his self-consciously space age materials. His designs give less a sense of the future than imbue us with feelings of nostalgia for the optimism in new technology he embraced so fully in decades past.

By the end of the 20th century, Rabanne had broken ground on condominiums in Miami's South Beach, introduced a pricy champagne, a new fragrance (Ultraviolet), and published several new Age books, including a bestselling doomsday-ish tome based on his interpretations of several Nostradamus prophecies regarding 1999. On the fashion scene, however, Rabanne designed his last collection in July 1999, preparing to leave his various labels in the hands a cadre of assistants. Yet Rabanne's backer, Spain's Puig Fashion & Beauty, pulled its support, effectively shutting down the label. While Rabanne's clothing may have become less controversial over the years, his often audacious beliefs and outspokenness will probably continue to shock and amuse for years to come.

—Caroline Cox; updated by Owen James

RATIA, Armi and Viljo

See MARIMEKKO

RAYNE, Sir Edward

British footwear designer and manufacturer

Born: London, 19 August 1922. Education: Studied at Harrow School. Family: Married Phyllis Court, 1952; children: Edward, Nicholas. Career: Trainee in family shoemaking firm, H&M Rayne Ltd. (founded 1889), 1940–50; managing director, 1951–87; purchased half share in Delman, formed Rayne-Delman Shoes, Inc., 1961, president, 1961–72, and executive chairman, 1972–86; Paris shop opened, 1970; firm acquired by Debenhams, 1973 (itself acquired by the Burton Group, 1985); director, Debenhams, London, 1975–88; chairman, Harvey Nichols Stores, London, 1978–88; Burton Group sold off H&M Rayne to David Graham, 1987 (Rayne himself broke off ties with company); Graham sold firm to Richard Kottler, 1990; retired as chair of British Fashion Council, 1990; Rayne firm dissolved, 1994. Awards: Harper's Bazaar trophy, London, 1963; Fellow, Royal Society of Arts, London, 1971; Commander of the Victorian Order, 1977; Chevalier, l'Ordre National du Mérite, France, 1984; received Knighthood, 1988. Died: 7 February 1992, in London.

- Loebenthal, Joel, Radical Rags: Fashions of the Sixties, New York, 1990.
- Stegemeyer, Anne, Who's Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.
- Kamitsis, Lydia, Paco Rabanne, London, 1999.

Articles

- Sharp, Joy, "Fashion Foibles of 1967," in Costume, No. 2, 1968.
- Tretiak, Philippe, "Paco le visionnaire," in Elle (Paris), 24 October 1988.
- Dutt, Robin, "Metal Guru," in Clothes Show (London), December/January 1989–90.
- Bourdley, Laurence, "Paco Rabanne," in L'Officiel (Paris), February 1990.
- Silver, Vernon, "Label Living: You've Worn the Perfume, Now Live in the Condo," in the New York Times, 20 February 1994.
- Louie, Elaine, "Here's a Rainy Day Project (but Watch for Lightning)," in the New York Times, 30 May 1996.
- Whitney, Craig R., "An Old Prediction Speeds France's Annual Exodus," in the New York Times, 6 July 1999.
- Young, Clara, "Paco Rabanne," [profile] online at Fashion Live, www.fashionlive.com, 5 August 2000.

* * *

It comes as no surprise, on viewing the designs of Paco Rabanne, to hear that he prefers to be described as an engineer rather than a couturier. Son of the chief seamstress at Balenciaga (famed for his intricate techniques of construction), Rabanne, after studying architecture, made his name in the 1960s with a series of bizarre, futuristic garments made out of incongruous materials. When viewed on the catwalk they seemed space-age prototypes rather than high fashion garments.

Believing that the only new frontier left in fashion was the discovery and utilization of new materials rather than the old couture method of changing lines from season to season, Rabanne totally broke with tradition, experimenting with plastic and aluminium, to create some of the most eccentric yet influential garments of the 1960s. It was estimated that by 1966 Rabanne was using 30,000 metres of Rhodoid plastic per month in such designs as bib necklaces made of phosphorescent plastic discs strung together with fine wire and whole dresses of the same material linked by metal chains. When he had exhausted the possibilities of plastic, Rabanne created a contemporary version of chainmail using tiny triangles of aluminium and leather held together with flexible wire rings to construct a series of simple shift mini dresses.

The delight of his designs comes in the use of disparate materials not previously considered appropriate for use in clothing, or the displacing of traditional materials in order to produce strange juxtapositions of color and texture. He was, for instance, one of the first designers to combine knits, leather, and fur, using combinations like a cape made of matte silver leather triangles with black pony skin or a coat teaming curly white lamb and white leather.

It could be said that in the 1970s and 1980s the name Paco Rabanne became associated with male toiletries rather than for the intriguing experimentation he had been carrying out. Rabanne relies on the sales of his successful line of skinscents—including Calandre, Paco, and Metal—to finance his more technological projects. In 1971 he collaborated with Louis Giffard, an authority on flow-molding techniques, to produce a raincoat molded entirely in one piece of plastic.

Even the buttons were part of the same process, molded directly into the garment and fitting into pressed-out pieces on the other side of the coat.

In the 1990s, with a 1960s renaissance in full swing, the inventive caliber of Rabanne has been rediscovered. His latest collections are concentrating on stretch jersey, cotton, and viscose fabrics in metallic hues, still accessorized by enormous pieces of jewelry. The high modernism of his 1960s designs seems touchingly innocent when viewed through the jaded eyes of the 1990s. Science and technology in contemporary culture signify something far removed from the faith and hope in the future Rabanne was expressing with his self-consciously space age materials. His designs give less a sense of the future than imbue us with feelings of nostalgia for the optimism in new technology he embraced so fully in decades past.

By the end of the 20th century, Rabanne had broken ground on condominiums in Miami's South Beach, introduced a pricy champagne, a new fragrance (Ultraviolet), and published several new Age books, including a bestselling doomsday-ish tome based on his interpretations of several Nostradamus prophecies regarding 1999. On the fashion scene, however, Rabanne designed his last collection in July 1999, preparing to leave his various labels in the hands a cadre of assistants. Yet Rabanne's backer, Spain's Puig Fashion & Beauty, pulled its support, effectively shutting down the label. While Rabanne's clothing may have become less controversial over the years, his often audacious beliefs and outspokenness will probably continue to shock and amuse for years to come.

—Caroline Cox; updated by Owen James

RATIA, Armi and Viljo

See MARIMEKKO

RAYNE, Sir Edward

British footwear designer and manufacturer

Born: London, 19 August 1922. Education: Studied at Harrow School. Family: Married Phyllis Court, 1952; children: Edward, Nicholas. Career: Trainee in family shoemaking firm, H&M Rayne Ltd. (founded 1889), 1940–50; managing director, 1951–87; purchased half share in Delman, formed Rayne-Delman Shoes, Inc., 1961, president, 1961–72, and executive chairman, 1972–86; Paris shop opened, 1970; firm acquired by Debenhams, 1973 (itself acquired by the Burton Group, 1985); director, Debenhams, London, 1975–88; chairman, Harvey Nichols Stores, London, 1978–88; Burton Group sold off H&M Rayne to David Graham, 1987 (Rayne himself broke off ties with company); Graham sold firm to Richard Kottler, 1990; retired as chair of British Fashion Council, 1990; Rayne firm dissolved, 1994. Awards: Harper's Bazaar trophy, London, 1963; Fellow, Royal Society of Arts, London, 1971; Commander of the Victorian Order, 1977; Chevalier, l'Ordre National du Mérite, France, 1984; received Knighthood, 1988. Died: 7 February 1992, in London.

Sir Edward Rayne, spring/summer 1955 collection: workers inspect a pair of gold-studded luster calf shoes. © Hulton-Deutsch Collection/CORBIS.

PUBLICATIONS

On RAYNE:

Books

Lambert, Eleanor, The World of Fashion: People, Places, Resources, New York & London, 1976.

Swan, June, Shoes, London, 1982.

McDowell, Colin, Shoes: Fashion and Fantasy, London, 1989.

Articles

Tyrrel, Rebecca, "The Face of British Fashion," in the Sunday Times Magazine (London), 16 October 1989.

"Edward Rayne," [obituary] in The Guardian, 8 February 1992.

McDowell, Colin, profile in The Guardian, 10 February 1992.

"Edward Rayne," [obituary] in the Times (London), 10 February 1992.

"Edward Rayne," [obituary] in the Independent, 11 February 1992.

Fallon, James, "Britain's Rayne, 69, Dies in Fire at Home," in Footwear News (New York), 17 February 1992.

MacDonald, Laurie, "The Great Fashion Merchants," in Footwear News, 17 April 1995.

Baber, Bonnie, et al., "The Great Design Houses (Shoe Designers Gucci, Rayne, Delman, Bally and I. Miller)," in Footwear News, 17 April 1995.

LoRusso, Maryann, "1940-49—Stylish Sacrifices," in Footwear News, 26 April 1999.

_____, "Walk of Fame—Celebrities Have Been Among Shoe Designers' Best...," in Footwear News, 26 April 1999.

* * *

In 1918, when the second generation of Raynes took over the family firm, the idea of shoes as an article of fashion was a novel one. "The only people who bought stylish footwear were actresses and ladies of easy virtue," said Edward Rayne of the type of customer to patronize the first New Bond Street, London shop. This changed rapidly as the flapper age of the 1920s produced a breed of liberated and fashion-conscious women who demanded shoes like those worn by their idols of stage and screen. An H&M Rayne Ltd. advertisement of the time used popular actress Lily Langtry to promote the Langtry Shoe and the company won fashion credibility in a 1920s issue of Vogue when their button boots were described as the “smartest footwear in town.”

Long before stars of stage and screen were fashion leaders, trends were set by monarchs and aristocracy in the courts of Europe. When H&M Rayne received its first royal warrant from Queen Mary it was a sign the company had shed its risqué theatrical past and was respectable within the fashion world. Other royal warrants followed and a new generation of rich, famous, and aristocratic women patronized the company. These ladies were indeed well heeled, as H&M Rayne was the first British firm to introduce machinery from the U.S. to make the sole of the shoe more flexible.

With American-style multiple fittings and sizes, a Raynes shoe had the comfort and fit found previously only in bespoke shoes. H&M Raynes’ success as a British footwear fashion house to rival those of Charles Jourdan, Bally, and Miller came about in the 1950s. At age 28, Edward Rayne was still a young man when he took control of the family firm, and he led a hectic social life in Paris, enjoying night clubs and the company of fashion editors and glamorous diplomatic socialites. French and Italian design led the field in the 1950s and Rayne, from early on in his career, took an interest in promoting British design. In the 1950s when the buyers from important U.S. department stores came increasingly less often to London, Rayne courted them in the Paris couture houses and the fashionable night spots.

Edward Rayne became chairman of the Incorporated Society of London Fashion Designers (ISLFD) in 1960 and within two years Vogue was hailing his remarkable success in persuading American press and buyers to view British collections. Other members of the ISLFD included Hardy Amies, John Cavanagh, and Norman Hartnell, who all designed shoes for Rayne. During the 1950s H&M Rayne produced classic styling that perfectly matched the rigid dress codes of the day. Times were changing, however, and the 1960s saw a fashion revolution in clothes, music, and dance. Edward Rayne called dancing the “language of the legs” and knew full well that what a woman wore to dance, and how she danced, would influence her choice of footwear. In response to the changing trends he contracted new British designers to contribute to the Miss Rayne range.

Mary Quant designed her first leather stacked stiletto heels and Shirley Temple-style ankle-straps for Rayne in 1960. Later she was commissioned to design her own range, along with other young British designers such as Jean Muir and Gerald McCann, to produce collections in synch with the Swinging Sixties. Rayne made sure that alongside the sophisticated styling for one generation there was sufficient fashion and frivolity for the next.

The quality of the footwear designs was matched by their production. Rayne was a shoemaker himself, having served an 11-year apprenticeship. He was, said Jean Muir, the “best British shoemaker of his age. He worked to a quality that matched anything from abroad.” It is not surprising that in 1963 shoes by Roger Vivier were being made and sold exclusively by Rayne. In the 1970s shoes by Rayne were being used by leading French couturiers including Lanvin and Nina Ricci. The 1970s saw the fulfilment of one of Edward Rayne’s personal ambitions, his first shop in Paris. It was the first British shoe-shop to open in Paris since John Lobb, which specialized in bespoke footwear. By 1985 H&M Rayne had some 70 retail outlets throughout the world.

It was the Americans, Rayne claimed, who taught him to sell shoes, and he used his transatlantic talents to promote fashion design at the same time. Fashion writer Colin McDowell, writing in Shoes: Fashion and Fantasy (London, 1989) described Rayne as “a mover and a shaker to whom the British fashion industry owes a permanent debt.” Before the ISLFD was formed, the idea that one could sell a fashion industry to a world market was unheard of—but Edward Rayne changed this outdated mode of thinking. For over 40 years, first through the ISLFD and then the British Fashion Council, he was involved in any scheme that would improve the image of British fashion. He used his contacts with royalty and governments to stage fashion shows, banquets, and receptions to promote British collections. British Fashion Week became a glamorous affair which helped persuade overseas buyers and press to visit London. In launching the British Fashion Awards in 1989, he brought catwalk shows to the public and, through television coverage, brought fashion to the attention of millions.

Edward Rayne’s contribution to the development of the British Fashion Council was the culmination of a lifetime’s diplomatic pioneering—and partying—in aid of British design. He did more than any other businessman to persuade overseas buyers and press to take British fashion design seriously. By the time he retired from chairing the British Fashion Council in 1990, the Council had success and recognition worldwide as a promotional body, and Rayne had received a well deserved knighthood for his services to the industry.

—Chris Hill

RED OR DEAD

British footwear and clothing design firm

Founded: in London, 1982, by Wayne and Geraldine Hemingway (both born 1961); incorporated in 1983. Company History: Specialized in customized second-hand clothing and Doc Marten shoes and boots; produced Space Baby collection, 1989; approached by Marks & Spencer to consult on shoes, 1993; introduced Dead Basic collection, 1994; opened store in Tokyo, 1994; participated in Cool Britannia, 1998; debuted website. Company Address: 17–19 Popin Commercial Centre, South Way, Wembley, Middlesex HA9 OHB, England. Company Website: www.redordead.co.uk.

PUBLICATIONS

On RED OR DEAD:

Books

Kingswell, Tamsin, Red or Dead: The Good, the Bad, and the Ugly, London, 1998.

Articles

Collier, Andrew, “Red or Dead Becomes London Cult Happening,” in DNR, 7 November 1988.

patronize the first New Bond Street, London shop. This changed rapidly as the flapper age of the 1920s produced a breed of liberated and fashion-conscious women who demanded shoes like those worn by their idols of stage and screen. An H&M Rayne Ltd. advertisement of the time used popular actress Lily Langtry to promote the Langtry Shoe and the company won fashion credibility in a 1920s issue of Vogue when their button boots were described as the “smartest footwear in town.”

Long before stars of stage and screen were fashion leaders, trends were set by monarchs and aristocracy in the courts of Europe. When H&M Rayne received its first royal warrant from Queen Mary it was a sign the company had shed its risqué theatrical past and was respectable within the fashion world. Other royal warrants followed and a new generation of rich, famous, and aristocratic women patronized the company. These ladies were indeed well heeled, as H&M Rayne was the first British firm to introduce machinery from the U.S. to make the sole of the shoe more flexible.

With American-style multiple fittings and sizes, a Raynes shoe had the comfort and fit found previously only in bespoke shoes. H&M Raynes’ success as a British footwear fashion house to rival those of Charles Jourdan, Bally, and Miller came about in the 1950s. At age 28, Edward Rayne was still a young man when he took control of the family firm, and he led a hectic social life in Paris, enjoying night clubs and the company of fashion editors and glamorous diplomatic socialites. French and Italian design led the field in the 1950s and Rayne, from early on in his career, took an interest in promoting British design. In the 1950s when the buyers from important U.S. department stores came increasingly less often to London, Rayne courted them in the Paris couture houses and the fashionable night spots.

Edward Rayne became chairman of the Incorporated Society of London Fashion Designers (ISLFD) in 1960 and within two years Vogue was hailing his remarkable success in persuading American press and buyers to view British collections. Other members of the ISLFD included Hardy Amies, John Cavanagh, and Norman Hartnell, who all designed shoes for Rayne. During the 1950s H&M Rayne produced classic styling that perfectly matched the rigid dress codes of the day. Times were changing, however, and the 1960s saw a fashion revolution in clothes, music, and dance. Edward Rayne called dancing the “language of the legs” and knew full well that what a woman wore to dance, and how she danced, would influence her choice of footwear. In response to the changing trends he contracted new British designers to contribute to the Miss Rayne range.

Mary Quant designed her first leather stacked stiletto heels and Shirley Temple-style ankle-straps for Rayne in 1960. Later she was commissioned to design her own range, along with other young British designers such as Jean Muir and Gerald McCann, to produce collections in synch with the Swinging Sixties. Rayne made sure that alongside the sophisticated styling for one generation there was sufficient fashion and frivolity for the next.

The quality of the footwear designs was matched by their production. Rayne was a shoemaker himself, having served an 11-year apprenticeship. He was, said Jean Muir, the “best British shoemaker of his age. He worked to a quality that matched anything from abroad.” It is not surprising that in 1963 shoes by Roger Vivier were being made and sold exclusively by Rayne. In the 1970s shoes by Rayne were being used by leading French couturiers including Lanvin and Nina Ricci. The 1970s saw the fulfilment of one of Edward Rayne’s personal ambitions, his first shop in Paris. It was the first British shoe-shop to open in Paris since John Lobb, which specialized in bespoke footwear. By 1985 H&M Rayne had some 70 retail outlets throughout the world.

It was the Americans, Rayne claimed, who taught him to sell shoes, and he used his transatlantic talents to promote fashion design at the same time. Fashion writer Colin McDowell, writing in Shoes: Fashion and Fantasy (London, 1989) described Rayne as “a mover and a shaker to whom the British fashion industry owes a permanent debt.” Before the ISLFD was formed, the idea that one could sell a fashion industry to a world market was unheard of—but Edward Rayne changed this outdated mode of thinking. For over 40 years, first through the ISLFD and then the British Fashion Council, he was involved in any scheme that would improve the image of British fashion. He used his contacts with royalty and governments to stage fashion shows, banquets, and receptions to promote British collections. British Fashion Week became a glamorous affair which helped persuade overseas buyers and press to visit London. In launching the British Fashion Awards in 1989, he brought catwalk shows to the public and, through television coverage, brought fashion to the attention of millions.

Edward Rayne’s contribution to the development of the British Fashion Council was the culmination of a lifetime’s diplomatic pioneering—and partying—in aid of British design. He did more than any other businessman to persuade overseas buyers and press to take British fashion design seriously. By the time he retired from chairing the British Fashion Council in 1990, the Council had success and recognition worldwide as a promotional body, and Rayne had received a well deserved knighthood for his services to the industry.

—Chris Hill

RED OR DEAD

British footwear and clothing design firm

Founded: in London, 1982, by Wayne and Geraldine Hemingway (both born 1961); incorporated in 1983. Company History: Specialized in customized second-hand clothing and Doc Marten shoes and boots; produced Space Baby collection, 1989; approached by Marks & Spencer to consult on shoes, 1993; introduced Dead Basic collection, 1994; opened store in Tokyo, 1994; participated in Cool Britannia, 1998; debuted website. Company Address: 17–19 Popin Commercial Centre, South Way, Wembley, Middlesex HA9 OHB, England. Company Website: www.redordead.co.uk.

PUBLICATIONS

On RED OR DEAD:

Books

Kingswell, Tamsin, Red or Dead: The Good, the Bad, and the Ugly, London, 1998.

Articles

Collier, Andrew, “Red or Dead Becomes London Cult Happening,” in DNR, 7 November 1988.

Red or Dead, spring 1998 collection. © AP/Wide World Photos.

- _____, "Two UK Retailers Refuse to Sell Acid House Clothing," in Footwear News, 5 December 1988.
- _____, "Red or Dead: This British Chain is Red Hot," in DNR, 6 March 1989.
- Haggard, Claire, "Alive and Kicking," in Sportswear International (New York), July 1990.
- "Going to Greater Lengths—Those Unpredictable British Designers Take the Lead in Feminine, Wearable Fashions," in Chicago Tribune, 31 October 1990.
- Heath, Ashley, "Sole Survivors," in The Face (London), March 1992.
- Tredre, Roger, "What's Red, Dead, Alive and Kicking?" in the Independent (London), 15 March 1992.
- Warren, Rachael, "My First Break," in the Evening Standard (London), 25 March 1992.
- "Fashion, Fascism and Dead Old Doc," in Management Today (London), April 1992.
- Fallon, James, "Red or Dead Finds 'Easy Does It' Works," in Footwear News, 17 August 1992.
- "The Doctor is In," in DNR, 28 May 1993.
- Stretton, Lynda, "Red or Dead," [profile] at the Fashion Page website, available online at www.fashionz.co.uk, 1995.

- _____, "Interview with Wayne Hemingway," at the Fashion Page website, online at www.fashionz.co.uk, 1995.
- "Shopping Europe," in Footwear News, 30 September 1996.
- Freedman, Cheryl, "King of the Catwalk," in Estates Gazette (Manchester, England), 22 March 1997.
- Brooks, Libby, "Let's Help British Design Cut It (British Fashion Designer Wayne Hemingway)," in The Guardian, 4 February 1998.

*

Red or Dead is a London-based design company producing innovative clothing and footwear at affordable prices. Consisting of a dynamic group of young talent, the Red or Dead team has worked closely to create fashion with a refreshing sense of humour and individuality. In the space of 10 years, Red or Dead grew into an internationally known design label with shops in England, Copenhagen, Amsterdam, and Hong Kong. There is an extensive wholesale network selling to shops worldwide and a thriving mail order service with a biannual catalogue.

—Red or Dead

* * *

There are those who have described Wayne Hemingway as the shrewdest man in fashion. In the 1980s, while other British footwear companies were closing or retreating into safely classic styling, Hemingway, with his keen market trader's sense of street fashion, launched Red or Dead (the name came from Hemingway's father, Billy Two Rivers, a Mohawk Indian chief, and former heavyweight champion).

In the mid-1980s, formative years for Red or Dead, the well tailored young executive look dominated the London High Street stores. This was power dressing, clothes to make money, the yuppie uniform. In contrast to the serious adult dressing there was a "hard times" student style, sometimes dubbed "recession chic." The poverty stricken but style-conscious dressed in jumble sale bargains and 1940s or 1950s cheap secondhand clothes. Heavy fabrics combined with a long layered look evoked the workwear of a proletariat still engaged in a class war.

This was a street fashion which seemed to be suggesting some hidden socialist agenda within a mode of dress. Suddenly, politics and fashion could be mixed. The first designer t-shirt by Katherine Hammett proclaimed "58% Don't Want Pershing," and a fashion label was named Workers for Freedom. Yuppies really were conservative and socialists were chic.

The footwear of choice for the young, idealistic, and working class at heart was the classic steel-toe boot originally aimed at postmen and construction workers. The Doc Marten (DM) boot was designed for those who wanted to make an antifashion statement, and it quickly became popular with punk rock devotees. Hemingway introduced the basic DM through his Camden Market stalls and shop. They were immediately taken up by young men and women and customized by cutting in metal toe-caps, putting safety pins through them, sewing on beads and threading them with brightly colored laces. The basic black DM was sprayed in a multitude of colors and could be made as individual as the owner.

The DM boot was the only footwear available at the time with the heaviness of silhouette required to make a woman's foot look really heavy. This went against all the traditional ideas of dainty feminine footwear for ladies who wanted their feet to look smaller, not bigger. The idea of a heavy, functional shoe for women was not initially a fashion statement; it came out of the whole recession chic concept, but it soon became an obligatory accessory for those who would never have bought secondhand.

Red or Dead: autumn/winter 1998–99 collection: sheepskin coats.
© AP/Wide World Photos.

Red or Dead produced styles with jagged soles, platform soles, bigger and heavier than the basic DM. They made boots in perspex, bright orange patent, silver, and other colors. Hemingway had found a winning formula and could have continued selling chunky shoes from his now rapidly expanding retail empire. He was, however—his own words—easily bored. Moving into clothing was an obvious progression.

The Red or Dead clothing collections were as antifashion establishment as the footwear. Not for Hemingway the traditional middle-class, middle-aged values of made-to-last quality—the idea behind Red or Dead was, he states, “to wear the stuff for a few months, and then it either drops to bits or becomes unfashionable.” Hemingway recognized that fashion changed very quickly for young people and didn’t believe in taking it terribly seriously. His collections have become somewhat more tailored since the Space Baby or Kaleidoscope days and more professional than the notorious Animals collection, where the prints simply dropped off the garments. And since Hemingway long refused to court what he saw as the “la-di-da” fashion editors and stylists, his catwalk collections were not reviewed in the mainstream fashion bibles.

Yet what the fashion editors thought of Red or Dead was irrelevant; more than a third of the company’s international business came from clothing, and Hemingway’s reputation as a shrewd businessman earned him an invitation to sit on the British Fashion Council. For many this was the height of irony; but Hemingway and Red or Dead had—like it or not—joined the fashion parade. By the middle of the 1990s Red or Dead had stores around the world, from several in the UK to Tokyo, Tel Aviv, Copenhagen, and Ontario. Its uncanny ability to straddle fashion and antifashion continued to make it a sought-after commodity, in both apparel and shoes. Such was confirmed once again when Red or Dead made the “Hot List” put together by Footwear News (30 September 1996) naming shoe designers “who had buyers buzzing in Paris, Milan and Dusseldorf.”

Hemingway’s legacy to the fashion world will be twofold: first, in footwear, because Red or Dead changed the silhouette of women’s feet, along with our preconceptions of how they should look; and second, in apparel for transcending and creating trends simultaneously. Hemingway’s own mission statement said, “At Red or Dead our mission is to produce challenging clothing at an affordable price on a nonelitist level. We want fashion and high fashion for everybody.” Whether making a statement through chunky-soled shoes or in “nonelitist” clothes, Red or Dead is and will remain, according to the Fashion Page website, “one of London’s most innovative labels.”

—Chris Hill; updated by Nelly Rhodes

REESE, Tracy

American designer

Born: 12 February 1964, in Detroit, Michigan. Education: Cass Technical High School; Parsons School of Design, graduated 1984. Career: Design assistant, Martine Sitbon, New York, 1984–87; started own company, 1987–89; designer for Perry Ellis, 1990; freelance designer for Gordon Henderson, 1990; design director, Magaschoni, 1990–95; designed exclusive line for The Limited, New York, 1995; started own company, Tracy Reese Meridian, 1995.

PUBLICATIONS

On REESE:

Books

Stegemeyer, Anne, Who's Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.

Articles

Chua, Lawrence, “Tracy Reese,” in WWD, 8 September 1987.

Rosenblum, P., “Three Strike Out,” in WWD, 30 November 1988.

Lockwood, Lisa, “Duffy is Named President of Perry Ellis Women’s Unit,” in WWD, 26 January 1989.

Gregory, Deborah, “Tracy Reese,” in Essence, July 1993.

Holch, Allegra, “Tracy Reese,” in WWD, 6 January 1994.

Cain, Joy Luckett, Interview, Essence, May 1995.

Fashion brief, in Essence, September 2000.

* * *

Tracy Reese’s designs have been inspired by a wide variety of sources: a piece of music, a painting, a book, a vacation spot, or a heavy. This went against all the traditional ideas of dainty feminine footwear for ladies who wanted their feet to look smaller, not bigger. The idea of a heavy, functional shoe for women was not initially a fashion statement; it came out of the whole recession chic concept, but it soon became an obligatory accessory for those who would never have bought secondhand.

Red or Dead: autumn/winter 1998–99 collection: sheepskin coats.
© AP/Wide World Photos.

Red or Dead produced styles with jagged soles, platform soles, bigger and heavier than the basic DM. They made boots in perspex, bright orange patent, silver, and other colors. Hemingway had found a winning formula and could have continued selling chunky shoes from his now rapidly expanding retail empire. He was, however—his own words—easily bored. Moving into clothing was an obvious progression.

The Red or Dead clothing collections were as antifashion establishment as the footwear. Not for Hemingway the traditional middle-class, middle-aged values of made-to-last quality—the idea behind Red or Dead was, he states, “to wear the stuff for a few months, and then it either drops to bits or becomes unfashionable.” Hemingway recognized that fashion changed very quickly for young people and didn’t believe in taking it terribly seriously. His collections have become somewhat more tailored since the Space Baby or Kaleidoscope days and more professional than the notorious Animals collection, where the prints simply dropped off the garments. And since Hemingway long refused to court what he saw as the “la-di-da” fashion editors and stylists, his catwalk collections were not reviewed in the mainstream fashion bibles.

Yet what the fashion editors thought of Red or Dead was irrelevant; more than a third of the company’s international business came from clothing, and Hemingway’s reputation as a shrewd businessman earned him an invitation to sit on the British Fashion Council. For many this was the height of irony; but Hemingway and Red or Dead had—like it or not—joined the fashion parade. By the middle of the 1990s Red or Dead had stores around the world, from several in the UK to Tokyo, Tel Aviv, Copenhagen, and Ontario. Its uncanny ability to straddle fashion and antifashion continued to make it a sought-after commodity, in both apparel and shoes. Such was confirmed once again when Red or Dead made the “Hot List” put together by Footwear News (30 September 1996) naming shoe designers “who had buyers buzzing in Paris, Milan and Dusseldorf.”

Hemingway’s legacy to the fashion world will be twofold: first, in footwear, because Red or Dead changed the silhouette of women’s feet, along with our preconceptions of how they should look; and second, in apparel for transcending and creating trends simultaneously. Hemingway’s own mission statement said, “At Red or Dead our mission is to produce challenging clothing at an affordable price on a nonelitist level. We want fashion and high fashion for everybody.” Whether making a statement through chunky-soled shoes or in “nonelitist” clothes, Red or Dead is and will remain, according to the Fashion Page website, “one of London’s most innovative labels.”

—Chris Hill; updated by Nelly Rhodes

REESE, Tracy

American designer

Born: 12 February 1964, in Detroit, Michigan. Education: Cass Technical High School; Parsons School of Design, graduated 1984. Career: Design assistant, Martine Sitbon, New York, 1984–87; started own company, 1987–89; designer for Perry Ellis, 1990; freelance designer for Gordon Henderson, 1990; design director, Magaschoni, 1990–95; designed exclusive line for The Limited, New York, 1995; started own company, Tracy Reese Meridian, 1995.

PUBLICATIONS

On REESE:

Books

Stegemeyer, Anne, Who's Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.

Articles

Chua, Lawrence, “Tracy Reese,” in WWD, 8 September 1987.

Rosenblum, P., “Three Strike Out,” in WWD, 30 November 1988.

Lockwood, Lisa, “Duffy is Named President of Perry Ellis Women’s Unit,” in WWD, 26 January 1989.

Gregory, Deborah, “Tracy Reese,” in Essence, July 1993.

Holch, Allegra, “Tracy Reese,” in WWD, 6 January 1994.

Cain, Joy Luckett, Interview, Essence, May 1995.

Fashion brief, in Essence, September 2000.

* * *

Tracy Reese’s designs have been inspired by a wide variety of sources: a piece of music, a painting, a book, a vacation spot, or a particular city. Reese is known for combining unusual textures and colors, often with a touch of vintage. She claims that she designs for “a smart shopper,” but actually designs for shoppers who want no-nonsense sportswear. “My clothes are not basics, and they’re not really classics either, but they are, hopefully, essentials.” Reese has further stated that she would never design anything she would not wear herself.

Reese hails from Detroit, where as a youngster her mother enrolled her in art classes on the weekends so she wouldn’t be bored. Reese’s mother, a modern dance teacher, would challenge Tracy by staging sewing contests to see who could finish an outfit first—the loser had to pay for the fabric. Reese attended the well-known Cass Technical High School, where she took her first fashion design class. While she was in high school, she was encouraged to apply for a scholarship to a summer program at the Parsons School of Design. After receiving the scholarship and participating in the program at Parsons, she realized clothing design was the career choice for her, “That’s when I knew I wanted to be involved in every aspect of this business, not just stuck in some back room sketching and draping for days.” Reese later earned her B.A. from Parsons, graduating in 1984.

After Parsons, Reese was an apprentice to French designer Martine Sitbon for the Arlequin line of clothing. While working at Arlequin, Reese became more than an apprentice, as Sitbon allowed her to sketch designs. With encouragement from friends and family, and financial backing from Reese’s father, Claud, she started her own company in 1987. She designed and manufactured a full line of clothing shipped in the autumn of that year, but after the release of her fall 1988 line, the company folded. Her designs were well received and sold at boutiques and specialty stores, as well as upscale stores such as Barneys New York, Bergdorf Goodman, and Ann Taylor. Although Reese was successful as a designer, she did not have enough capital to keep up with the demand, and like many other designers in the late 1980s, her company failed.

Reese moved on to design for the Perry Ellis Portfolio line with Marc Jacobs. She also worked as a consultant with the sportswear designer Gordon Henderson, from whom she learned several key elements about how to succeed in the fashion design business. After about a year, Reese sought a job designing for Magaschoni, the company owned by Magdalena Lee. At first, Reese continued to work on the company’s existing line of clothing, which was “not my style,” but Magaschoni was a new company with an open mind and growth potential, and after two years, Reese was designing her own label. Lee, who had worked with several prominent designers, said of Reese: “What really impressed me so about Tracy is she knows how to make a better garment.” One of Reese’s friends, Ellen Greenberg (president of Magaschoni), who offered moral support in Reese’s early career, called her line “the jewel in the crown.”

Reese typically sketches her design ideas late at night while at home listening to music, and has admitted she cannot “put paper to pencil unless I’m listening to music.” She is very impressionable and gets her design ideas from a variety of sources, including fashion designs from previous eras, films, different cities. A recent trip to New Orleans was incorporated and reflected in a subsequent collection. Her eclectic taste in music and her passionate desire to experience new things and visit new places continues to pervade her designs.

After several successful years designing for Magaschoni, Reese left the company to work on her own. She designed an exclusive line of clothing for The Limited in 1995, which funded her first contemporary sportswear label, Tracy Reese Meridian. The Meridian line debuted in the spring of 1996 and the following year she established a second sportswear line, Plenty, inspired by a trip to India. Her collections have been shown at Saks, Nordstrom, Fred, Segal-Ron Herman, and Anthropologie.

—Christine Miner Minderovic

RENÉ LEZARD

German fashion company

Founded: René Lezard Mode GmbH founded in 1978, Schwarzach, Wurzburg, by Thomas Schaefer. Company History:

Specializes in womenswear, sportswear, and menswear; main lines are Classic, Excess, Sophisticated, plus Denim House; licensee products include shirts (Asoni), ties (Albisetti), belts (Condor), and leather accessories (Traveller); added footwear line, 2000; exports to Europe, U.S., and Asia; annual show at Herren-Mode-Woche (Cologne). Company Address: Industriestrasse 2, D-97359 Schwarzach, Germany. Company Website: www.rene-lezard.de.

PUBLICATIONS

On RENÉ LEZARD:

Articles

- Erlick, June C., “René Lezard Establishes U.S. Group,” in DNR, 13 August 1991.
- “Jennifer Nichols Joins René Lezard Fashion Group Inc. as Director of Sales and Marketing,” in DNR, 8 January 1992.
- Gellers, Stan, “Suit Makers Doubling Up for Fall,” in DNR, 15 April 1993.
- D’Aulnay, Sophie, “Suitably German,” in DNR, 8 July 1996.
- Conti, Samantha, “U.S. Still a Tasty Carrot for Hungry German Companies,” in DNR, 11 February 1998.
- Mui, Nelson, and James Fallon, “René Lezard to Make a Splash in 2000,” in DNR, 8 November 1999.
- “Multiple Choice: If a Little of What You Fancy Does You Good, Then the Fall New York Collections Should Benefit Many,” in WWD, 8 February 2000.
- Boye, Brian, and Brian Scott Lipton, “Spreading the Nudes,” in DNR, 16 June 2000.
- Gellers, Stan, “From Power Suits to Power Sportswear,” in DNR, 28 August 2000.
- Weldon, Kristi, “The Men’s Business Suit: Extinct, or Just Evolving?” in Apparel Industry Magazine, October 2000.
- McCants, Leonard, and Julee Greenberg, “Bold Blueprints to Boost Brands,” in WWD, 5 December 2000.
- Cunningham, Thomas, “Old World Elegance with New Twists Stars at Cologne,” in DNR, 7 February 2001.

*

Company philosophy—planned growth, team work and strong relationships with our clients are our top priorities. Product philosophy—offering a unique collection, using the highest quality fabrics available, the prerequisite for a smart mix of fashion.

—René Lezard

particular city. Reese is known for combining unusual textures and colors, often with a touch of vintage. She claims that she designs for “a smart shopper,” but actually designs for shoppers who want no-nonsense sportswear. “My clothes are not basics, and they’re not really classics either, but they are, hopefully, essentials.” Reese has further stated that she would never design anything she would not wear herself.

Reese hails from Detroit, where as a youngster her mother enrolled her in art classes on the weekends so she wouldn’t be bored. Reese’s mother, a modern dance teacher, would challenge Tracy by staging sewing contests to see who could finish an outfit first—the loser had to pay for the fabric. Reese attended the well-known Cass Technical High School, where she took her first fashion design class. While she was in high school, she was encouraged to apply for a scholarship to a summer program at the Parsons School of Design. After receiving the scholarship and participating in the program at Parsons, she realized clothing design was the career choice for her, “That’s when I knew I wanted to be involved in every aspect of this business, not just stuck in some back room sketching and draping for days.” Reese later earned her B.A. from Parsons, graduating in 1984.

After Parsons, Reese was an apprentice to French designer Martine Sitbon for the Arlequin line of clothing. While working at Arlequin, Reese became more than an apprentice, as Sitbon allowed her to sketch designs. With encouragement from friends and family, and financial backing from Reese’s father, Claud, she started her own company in 1987. She designed and manufactured a full line of clothing shipped in the autumn of that year, but after the release of her fall 1988 line, the company folded. Her designs were well received and sold at boutiques and specialty stores, as well as upscale stores such as Barneys New York, Bergdorf Goodman, and Ann Taylor. Although Reese was successful as a designer, she did not have enough capital to keep up with the demand, and like many other designers in the late 1980s, her company failed.

Reese moved on to design for the Perry Ellis Portfolio line with Marc Jacobs. She also worked as a consultant with the sportswear designer Gordon Henderson, from whom she learned several key elements about how to succeed in the fashion design business. After about a year, Reese sought a job designing for Magaschoni, the company owned by Magdalena Lee. At first, Reese continued to work on the company’s existing line of clothing, which was “not my style,” but Magaschoni was a new company with an open mind and growth potential, and after two years, Reese was designing her own label. Lee, who had worked with several prominent designers, said of Reese: “What really impressed me so about Tracy is she knows how to make a better garment.” One of Reese’s friends, Ellen Greenberg (president of Magaschoni), who offered moral support in Reese’s early career, called her line “the jewel in the crown.”

Reese typically sketches her design ideas late at night while at home listening to music, and has admitted she cannot “put paper to pencil unless I’m listening to music.” She is very impressionable and gets her design ideas from a variety of sources, including fashion designs from previous eras, films, different cities. A recent trip to New Orleans was incorporated and reflected in a subsequent collection. Her eclectic taste in music and her passionate desire to experience new things and visit new places continues to pervade her designs.

After several successful years designing for Magaschoni, Reese left the company to work on her own. She designed an exclusive line of clothing for The Limited in 1995, which funded her first contemporary sportswear label, Tracy Reese Meridian. The Meridian line debuted in the spring of 1996 and the following year she established a second sportswear line, Plenty, inspired by a trip to India. Her collections have been shown at Saks, Nordstrom, Fred, Segal-Ron Herman, and Anthropologie.

—Christine Miner Minderovic

RENÉ LEZARD

German fashion company

Founded: René Lezard Mode GmbH founded in 1978, Schwarzach, Wurzburg, by Thomas Schaefer. Company History: Specializes in womenswear, sportswear, and menswear; main lines are Classic, Excess, Sophisticated, plus Denim House; licensee products include shirts (Asoni), ties (Albisetti), belts (Condor), and leather accessories (Traveller); added footwear line, 2000; exports to Europe, U.S., and Asia; annual show at Herren-Mode-Woche (Cologne). Company Address: Industriestrasse 2, D-97359 Schwarzach, Germany. Company Website: www.rene-lezard.de.

PUBLICATIONS

On RENÉ LEZARD:

Articles

- Erlick, June C., “René Lezard Establishes U.S. Group,” in DNR, 13 August 1991.
- “Jennifer Nichols Joins René Lezard Fashion Group Inc. as Director of Sales and Marketing,” in DNR, 8 January 1992.
- Gellers, Stan, “Suit Makers Doubling Up for Fall,” in DNR, 15 April 1993.
- D’Aulnay, Sophie, “Suitably German,” in DNR, 8 July 1996.
- Conti, Samantha, “U.S. Still a Tasty Carrot for Hungry German Companies,” in DNR, 11 February 1998.
- Mui, Nelson, and James Fallon, “René Lezard to Make a Splash in 2000,” in DNR, 8 November 1999.
- “Multiple Choice: If a Little of What You Fancy Does You Good, Then the Fall New York Collections Should Benefit Many,” in WWD, 8 February 2000.
- Boye, Brian, and Brian Scott Lipton, “Spreading the Nudes,” in DNR, 16 June 2000.
- Gellers, Stan, “From Power Suits to Power Sportswear,” in DNR, 28 August 2000.
- Weldon, Kristi, “The Men’s Business Suit: Extinct, or Just Evolving?” in Apparel Industry Magazine, October 2000.
- McCants, Leonard, and Julee Greenberg, “Bold Blueprints to Boost Brands,” in WWD, 5 December 2000.
- Cunningham, Thomas, “Old World Elegance with New Twists Stars at Cologne,” in DNR, 7 February 2001.

*

Company philosophy—planned growth, team work and strong relationships with our clients are our top priorities. Product philosophy—offering a unique collection, using the highest quality fabrics available, the prerequisite for a smart mix of fashion.

—René Lezard

* * *

René Lezard is a medium-sized German fashion group making clothes for men and women. Neither high fashion nor cheap mass-market, René Lezard makes quality outfits and separates for High Street shops throughout Germany in what's known as the "gold" range—a bit less than designer but above bridge collections. René Lezard is a top German fashion brand and company, making quality, everyday clothes for practical lives. The clothes have a very practical, Northern European look and feel: thick, warm, heavy-duty office, leisure, and outdoor wear, distinctively German or middle European. The accent is on tailoring, not cut; fabrics are expensive but not flashy. The look is smart-somber, like a Northern European city in the rain or snow.

Fabrics used by the company include soft fleeces and refined leathers, warm corduroys and smooth velvets, thick tweeds, heavy lambswool and cashmere. Colors include all the darker shades of brown, gray, green, and blue, some dark mustard, some burgundy, and more recently denim and bright colors were added to the mix. The occasional item or outfit shines out in mother-of-pearl or cream. Though the styles are very classical, René Lezard seems more influenced by English fashion than French. The overall composition is pure German, with homegrown lines and styles. Shoulders are soft; upper parts are unrestricted and loose. There are many buttons and buttonholes, turnups, dark linings, high collars. The overall look is soft and loose, dry and warm. The smart chic of the clothes comes through the choice of refined color and fine fabric.

The company's range is comprehensive—for men, there are suits, jackets, vests, trousers, coats, sport jackets, shirts, neckties, belts, knitwear, t-shirts, polo neck sweaters, leathers, and most recently footwear. These are split into three lines: Classic, the basic elements of the collection; Excess, the young, approachable, commercial range; and Sophisticated, the fashionwear and experimental items. Similarly for women the range covers suits, trousers, skirts, blazers, coats, leatherwear, knitwear, blousons, and belts. Denim House is a mass-market brand, with jeans, shirts, jackets, and waistcoats clearly aimed at the High Street and a young adult market that buys one or more items to build or expand an existing wardrobe. In addition to the above, René Lezard uses licensee products within the collection: Asoni shirts, Albisetti ties, Condor belts, Traveller leather accessories.

René Lezard's strength is in finding its niche both in Europe and the U.S.—adults in the middle-age range who are willing to pay for stylish, practical, quality clothing that delivers as promised. The strategy paid off with strong growth in New York's SoHo district, which was treated to the company's first American store in September 1997, and corporate leaders are now looking toward Florida or the West Coast for future boutiques. The women's apparel is especially strong in the U.S. and sold in many Saks and Bergdorf Goodman locations. Men's apparel is primarily found in independent specialty stores, although the company is working to expand in the market.

René Lezard is actively seeking growth, particularly in the U.S., with increased spending for advertising, a "virtual showroom" website to interact with customers and professionals, sponsored trips for art students to Normandy, and by building ties with the art community, such as through sponsorship of the New York Academy of Arts benefit event "Take Home a Nude." The high quality and fit of René Lezard, coupled with its gold-level niche status, is sure to grow in popularity.

—Sally Anne Melia; updated by Carrie Snyder

RENTNER, Maurice

American designer and manufacturer

Born: Warsaw, Poland, 3 March 1889; immigrated to the U.S. in 1902. Family: Married Dorothy Fineberg; children: two daughters.

Career: Worked as an errand boy, traveling salesman and jobber, 1902–12; partner, M&H Rentner, 1912–23; owner, Maurice Rentner, Inc., 1923–58; company merged with sister's firm, Anna Miller & Company, then run and eventually renamed by Bill Blass, 1970.

Died: 7 July 1958, in New York.

PUBLICATIONS

On RENTNER:

Books

Ballard, Bettina, In My Fashion, New York, 1960.

Milbank, Caroline Rennolds, New York Fashion: The Evolution of American Style, New York, 1989.

Maurice Rentner, 1952 collection: silk satin evening gown with an abbreviated beaded bodice superimposed on top. © Bettmann/CORBIS.

* * *

René Lezard is a medium-sized German fashion group making clothes for men and women. Neither high fashion nor cheap mass-market, René Lezard makes quality outfits and separates for High Street shops throughout Germany in what's known as the "gold" range—a bit less than designer but above bridge collections. René Lezard is a top German fashion brand and company, making quality, everyday clothes for practical lives. The clothes have a very practical, Northern European look and feel: thick, warm, heavy-duty office, leisure, and outdoor wear, distinctively German or middle European. The accent is on tailoring, not cut; fabrics are expensive but not flashy. The look is smart-somber, like a Northern European city in the rain or snow.

Fabrics used by the company include soft fleeces and refined leathers, warm corduroys and smooth velvets, thick tweeds, heavy lambswool and cashmere. Colors include all the darker shades of brown, gray, green, and blue, some dark mustard, some burgundy, and more recently denim and bright colors were added to the mix. The occasional item or outfit shines out in mother-of-pearl or cream. Though the styles are very classical, René Lezard seems more influenced by English fashion than French. The overall composition is pure German, with homegrown lines and styles. Shoulders are soft; upper parts are unrestricted and loose. There are many buttons and buttonholes, turnups, dark linings, high collars. The overall look is soft and loose, dry and warm. The smart chic of the clothes comes through the choice of refined color and fine fabric.

The company's range is comprehensive—for men, there are suits, jackets, vests, trousers, coats, sport jackets, shirts, neckties, belts, knitwear, t-shirts, polo neck sweaters, leathers, and most recently footwear. These are split into three lines: Classic, the basic elements of the collection; Excess, the young, approachable, commercial range; and Sophisticated, the fashionwear and experimental items. Similarly for women the range covers suits, trousers, skirts, blazers, coats, leatherwear, knitwear, blousons, and belts. Denim House is a mass-market brand, with jeans, shirts, jackets, and waistcoats clearly aimed at the High Street and a young adult market that buys one or more items to build or expand an existing wardrobe. In addition to the above, René Lezard uses licensee products within the collection: Asoni shirts, Albisetti ties, Condor belts, Traveller leather accessories.

René Lezard's strength is in finding its niche both in Europe and the U.S.—adults in the middle-age range who are willing to pay for stylish, practical, quality clothing that delivers as promised. The strategy paid off with strong growth in New York's SoHo district, which was treated to the company's first American store in September 1997, and corporate leaders are now looking toward Florida or the West Coast for future boutiques. The women's apparel is especially strong in the U.S. and sold in many Saks and Bergdorf Goodman locations. Men's apparel is primarily found in independent specialty stores, although the company is working to expand in the market.

René Lezard is actively seeking growth, particularly in the U.S., with increased spending for advertising, a "virtual showroom" website to interact with customers and professionals, sponsored trips for art students to Normandy, and by building ties with the art community, such as through sponsorship of the New York Academy of Arts benefit event "Take Home a Nude." The high quality and fit of René Lezard, coupled with its gold-level niche status, is sure to grow in popularity.

—Sally Anne Melia; updated by Carrie Snyder

RENTNER, Maurice

American designer and manufacturer

Born: Warsaw, Poland, 3 March 1889; immigrated to the U.S. in 1902. Family: Married Dorothy Fineberg; children: two daughters.

Career: Worked as an errand boy, traveling salesman and jobber, 1902–12; partner, M&H Rentner, 1912–23; owner, Maurice Rentner, Inc., 1923–58; company merged with sister's firm, Anna Miller & Company, then run and eventually renamed by Bill Blass, 1970.

Died: 7 July 1958, in New York.

PUBLICATIONS

On RENTNER:

Books

Ballard, Bettina, In My Fashion, New York, 1960.

Milbank, Caroline Rennolds, New York Fashion: The Evolution of American Style, New York, 1989.

Maurice Rentner, 1952 collection: silk satin evening gown with an abbreviated beaded bodice superimposed on top. © Bettmann/CORBIS.

Articles

- Profile, in New York World Telegram, 11 May 1945.
 "Maurice Rentner," in National Cyclopaedia of American Biography, 1957.
 "Maurice Rentner is Dead at 69; Noted as Dress Manufacturer," [obituary] in the New York Times, 8 July 1958.

* * *

According to Bettina Ballard's In My Fashion (New York, 1960), Maurice Rentner styled himself the "King of Fashion." It is perhaps more accurate to call him a prince of American ready-to-wear. In his boyhood he worked briefly for his father's button-making company, then advanced from errand boy to salesman for a shirtwaist manufacturer by 1906. As ready-made clothing became more respectable, Rentner perceived its potential for growth, and began to develop the higher-priced end of the emerging industry.

Between 1912 and 1923 Rentner was associated with his brother in M&H Rentner, establishing his own company under his own name after the partnership was dissolved. From the very first, Rentner was careful to establish an air of exclusivity around his company. Advertisements were discreet but not inconspicuous, with text declaring Maurice Rentner gowns were only to be seen in the finest shops. He offered high quality merchandise at prices to match, setting standards of excellence for other ready-to-wear manufacturers.

Suits and daydresses made up most of the company's output, but eveningwear was also produced. Rentner said that he could not "sketch, sew, drape, pin or cut" and counted on design assistants to realize his ideas, which were rooted in the belief that "clothes should never decorate," as he told the New York World Telegram in May 1945, "but should always frame." As a result, silhouettes were generally uncomplicated, with spare detailing which was often innovative and sometimes unexpected. A narrow ruffle down the placket of a suit jacket resolved into a pocket flap at the hipline, or a smooth wool sheath dress was paired with a shirt-jacket having a hand-crocheted body. Fabrics were generally kept simple but sumptuous; wool or silk crêpes and jerseys, fine Rodier tweeds, silk prints. And, at least for a while, Rentner published and wrote the majority of the copy for his fashion periodical, Quality Street.

Rentner's prevailing theme was femininity, expressed in soft suits and graceful dresses. He further claimed to have pioneered the use of casual styling in formal clothing, introduced in the 1930s with a gold lamé shirtwaist-styled dinner gown. His efforts to meld style with comfort helped to establish an American fashion identity, in which casual need not mean unkempt, nor formal signify stuffy. At his level of workmanship, detail, and fabric quality, ready-made clothing was not for the working gal, but for the society or business woman who did not care to spend much of her free time in fittings. Garments by Maurice Rentner, Inc. were available as exclusives at stores like Bonwit Teller, I. Magnin, Rich's, Lord & Taylor, and Kaufmann's.

As one of the upmarket manufacturers who supported an in-house design staff, Rentner was very aware of the plague of design piracy. In 1933 he formed the Fashion Originator's Guild, which established a design registration bureau for its members. The Guild grew from 12 original members to 60 by the end of its first year. Cooperating retailers agreed to refrain from buying or selling copies of garments created by Guild members. It seems to have been a laudable experiment, but consensus on the terms of the agreements rapidly broke down, and by 1936 the Guild was being sued by several retailers for restraint of trade. It was disbanded in 1941.

Rentner tried always to foster the interests of the garment industry, as a member of the New York Dress Institute Couture Group and other garment center organizations, and by serving on the advisory board of the Fashion Institute of Technology in New York. His company was among those that profited, in terms of consumer recognition, by the isolation of American fashion during World War II. It may be that his success with high quality name ready-to-wear inspired the rush of European couturiers to lend their own names to the market in the late 1940s.

Although Rentner died in 1958, his business, in a way, lived on. Maurice Rentner, Inc. merged with Anna Miller & Company, owned by Rentner's sister, in 1958, with Miller's head designer, Bill Blass, maintaining the position in the joined company. Bill Blass for Maurice Rentner was successful through the 1960s, while Blass became vice-president and then owner of the firm. He organized the company under his own name in 1970. It is a tribute to Rentner's achievement in making his name synonymous with quality and style that, even through the turbulent 1960s, his name endured.

—Madelyn Shaw

RESTIVO, Mary Ann

American designer

Born: South Orange, New Jersey, 28 September 1940. Education: Studied retailing at College of St. Elizabeth, Morristown, New Jersey, 1958–60, and design at Fashion Institute of Technology, New York, 1960–61, with associate degree in Applied Arts. Family: Married Saul Rosen, 1978. Career: Trainee, Abby Michael junior sportswear house, New York, 1961; designer for New York firms Bernard Levine, Petti for Jack Winter, Something Special, Sports Sophisticates, and Mary Ann Restivo for Genre, 1962–74; head designer, women's blouse division, Dior New York, 1974–80; launched own firm, Mary Ann Restivo, Inc., 1980; sold company to Leslie Fay Corporation, 1988; designer, Mary Ann Restivo division, Leslie Fay Corporation, 1988–92; division closed, 1992; independent design consultant, for clients including Saks Fifth Avenue and Burberrys, from 1993; launched new scarf line, 1999; began designing home accessories, 1999–2000. Awards: Hecht Company Young Designers award, Washington, D.C., 1968; Mortimer C. Ritter award, Fashion Institute of Technology, 1973; awarded Honorary Doctor of Humanities, College of St. Elizabeth, 1986; Alumnus of the Year award, American Association of Community and Junior Colleges, 1992; Ellis Island Medal of Honor award, 1993.

PUBLICATIONS

On RESTIVO:

Books

- Milbank, Caroline Reynolds, New York Fashion: The Evolution of American Style, New York, 1989.
Fashion for America! Designs in the Fashion Institute of Technology, New York, Surrey, 1992.

Articles

- Profile, in New York World Telegram, 11 May 1945.
 "Maurice Rentner," in National Cyclopaedia of American Biography, 1957.
 "Maurice Rentner is Dead at 69; Noted as Dress Manufacturer," [obituary] in the New York Times, 8 July 1958.

* * *

According to Bettina Ballard's In My Fashion (New York, 1960), Maurice Rentner styled himself the "King of Fashion." It is perhaps more accurate to call him a prince of American ready-to-wear. In his boyhood he worked briefly for his father's button-making company, then advanced from errand boy to salesman for a shirtwaist manufacturer by 1906. As ready-made clothing became more respectable, Rentner perceived its potential for growth, and began to develop the higher-priced end of the emerging industry.

Between 1912 and 1923 Rentner was associated with his brother in M&H Rentner, establishing his own company under his own name after the partnership was dissolved. From the very first, Rentner was careful to establish an air of exclusivity around his company. Advertisements were discreet but not inconspicuous, with text declaring Maurice Rentner gowns were only to be seen in the finest shops. He offered high quality merchandise at prices to match, setting standards of excellence for other ready-to-wear manufacturers.

Suits and daydresses made up most of the company's output, but eveningwear was also produced. Rentner said that he could not "sketch, sew, drape, pin or cut" and counted on design assistants to realize his ideas, which were rooted in the belief that "clothes should never decorate," as he told the New York World Telegram in May 1945, "but should always frame." As a result, silhouettes were generally uncomplicated, with spare detailing which was often innovative and sometimes unexpected. A narrow ruffle down the placket of a suit jacket resolved into a pocket flap at the hipline, or a smooth wool sheath dress was paired with a shirt-jacket having a hand-crocheted body. Fabrics were generally kept simple but sumptuous; wool or silk crêpes and jerseys, fine Rodier tweeds, silk prints. And, at least for a while, Rentner published and wrote the majority of the copy for his fashion periodical, Quality Street.

Rentner's prevailing theme was femininity, expressed in soft suits and graceful dresses. He further claimed to have pioneered the use of casual styling in formal clothing, introduced in the 1930s with a gold lamé shirtwaist-styled dinner gown. His efforts to meld style with comfort helped to establish an American fashion identity, in which casual need not mean unkempt, nor formal signify stuffy. At his level of workmanship, detail, and fabric quality, ready-made clothing was not for the working gal, but for the society or business woman who did not care to spend much of her free time in fittings. Garments by Maurice Rentner, Inc. were available as exclusives at stores like Bonwit Teller, I. Magnin, Rich's, Lord & Taylor, and Kaufmann's.

As one of the upmarket manufacturers who supported an in-house design staff, Rentner was very aware of the plague of design piracy. In 1933 he formed the Fashion Originator's Guild, which established a design registration bureau for its members. The Guild grew from 12 original members to 60 by the end of its first year. Cooperating retailers agreed to refrain from buying or selling copies of garments created by Guild members. It seems to have been a laudable experiment, but consensus on the terms of the agreements rapidly broke down, and by 1936 the Guild was being sued by several retailers for restraint of trade. It was disbanded in 1941.

Rentner tried always to foster the interests of the garment industry, as a member of the New York Dress Institute Couture Group and other garment center organizations, and by serving on the advisory board of the Fashion Institute of Technology in New York. His company was among those that profited, in terms of consumer recognition, by the isolation of American fashion during World War II. It may be that his success with high quality name ready-to-wear inspired the rush of European couturiers to lend their own names to the market in the late 1940s.

Although Rentner died in 1958, his business, in a way, lived on. Maurice Rentner, Inc. merged with Anna Miller & Company, owned by Rentner's sister, in 1958, with Miller's head designer, Bill Blass, maintaining the position in the joined company. Bill Blass for Maurice Rentner was successful through the 1960s, while Blass became vice-president and then owner of the firm. He organized the company under his own name in 1970. It is a tribute to Rentner's achievement in making his name synonymous with quality and style that, even through the turbulent 1960s, his name endured.

—Madelyn Shaw

RESTIVO, Mary Ann

American designer

Born: South Orange, New Jersey, 28 September 1940. Education: Studied retailing at College of St. Elizabeth, Morristown, New Jersey, 1958–60, and design at Fashion Institute of Technology, New York, 1960–61, with associate degree in Applied Arts. Family: Married Saul Rosen, 1978. Career: Trainee, Abby Michael junior sportswear house, New York, 1961; designer for New York firms Bernard Levine, Petti for Jack Winter, Something Special, Sports Sophisticates, and Mary Ann Restivo for Genre, 1962–74; head designer, women's blouse division, Dior New York, 1974–80; launched own firm, Mary Ann Restivo, Inc., 1980; sold company to Leslie Fay Corporation, 1988; designer, Mary Ann Restivo division, Leslie Fay Corporation, 1988–92; division closed, 1992; independent design consultant, for clients including Saks Fifth Avenue and Burberrys, from 1993; launched new scarf line, 1999; began designing home accessories, 1999–2000. Awards: Hecht Company Young Designers award, Washington, D.C., 1968; Mortimer C. Ritter award, Fashion Institute of Technology, 1973; awarded Honorary Doctor of Humanities, College of St. Elizabeth, 1986; Alumnus of the Year award, American Association of Community and Junior Colleges, 1992; Ellis Island Medal of Honor award, 1993.

PUBLICATIONS

On RESTIVO:

Books

- Milbank, Caroline Reynolds, New York Fashion: The Evolution of American Style, New York, 1989.
Fashion for America! Designs in the Fashion Institute of Technology, New York, Surrey, 1992.

Articles

- Larkin, Kathy, "Meet Two Designers Who Are Changing Establishment Fashions," in the New York Daily News, 14 January 1973.
- Foley, Bridget, "Mary Ann Restivo Marches to Her Own Drummer," in New York Apparel News, April 1983.
- Morris, Bernadine, "Working Women: A Designer's Focus," in the New York Times, 30 June 1987.
- Daria, Irene, "Mary Ann Restivo: Targeting the Working Woman and Herself," in WWD, 26 October 1987.
- Vespa, Mary, "Designer Mary Ann Restivo Walks on Fashion's Mild Side...," in People, 23 November 1987.
- Michals, Debra, "Dresses from Sportswear Firms: Plusses and Problems," in WWD, 28 February 1989.
- Schiro, Anne-Marie, "From Restivo, a New Look of Softness," in the New York Times, 3 November 1989.
- Morris, Bernadine, "Building Wardrobes Around Jackets," in the New York Times, 8 May 1990.
- Buck, Geneviève, "Barneys, Buddy and Bo—New Style, Old Style and No Style," in Chicago Tribune, 15 July 1992.
- Johnson, Tish, "Restivo Returns," in WWD, 12 July 1999.
- "Robert Allen Event Combines Fashion, Charity," in HFN (Weekly Newspaper for the Home Furnishing Network), 6 December 1999.

* * *

"People need fashionably sensible clothes," Mary Ann Restivo commented to People magazine in the midst of the late 1980s excesses, to which People asserted that Restivo was "emerging...as the savior of the stylish but sane professional woman." Career and professional dressing have been the appropriate context for Restivo's work, not only in terms of her clientèle, but of the clothing's emphasis on good fit, excellent materials and manufacture, personal luxury without ostentation, and wearable good taste.

Bernadine Morris, a likely champion of Restivo's work in her commitment to American sportswear, wrote of Restivo that she "tries to walk the tightrope between clothes that are subdued and those that attract attention." The attention a Restivo garment attracts is primarily for its flattering image to the client. Restivo emphasizes fit, with some camouflage to the hips, appealing to women in sizes six, eight, and ten. As the designer argues in the tradition of sportswear, no woman should feel squeezed into the clothing, but should have mobility for her own sense of elegance and self-confidence, as well as the functions of dressing for careers in which one outfit may suffice from home to office to evening. In the 1980s, Restivo's work directly coincided with the perceived need of women of middle- and upper-management to wear sensible clothing to the office without merely adapting menswear. Other American designers came to the same conviction in the 1980s, but Restivo was one of the first to create stylish careerwear and to establish it as the cornerstone of her business.

Through the 1980s jackets were an important element of all Restivo collections, even for resort. Like most designers of the period, Restivo made her jackets softer and softer, choosing the textiles for unconstructed jackets still capable of the fresh self-confidence required by career women. Restivo told the New York Times (8 May 1990) at the apogee of the well-tailored business jacket: "The jacket is the key. When you start to develop your collection, you begin with the jacket then build everything else around it. You work out the skirts or the pants and the blouses and sweaters." Further, Restivo commented, "It is interesting to me that when store buyers come to buy the collection, they follow the same procedure. When customers go shopping for their fall clothes, they will probably do the same thing."

Restivo's acuity to the customer has always been an essential part of her business, begun in 1981. The loyalty of her clients is legendary—when the Restivo line was abruptly dropped by Leslie Fay in the early 1990s, clients pursued the designer herself to be sure they would not be cut off from their favorite clothing. Restivo's client empathy is undeniably important in the success of a woman designer creating for like-minded sensible women of business and style. Gloria Steinem once described Restivo's designs as "the kind of clothes that, after you've died, another woman would find in a thrift shop and like." Such enduring good taste and clothing recycling may thwart the image of fashion as a place of excess and fickle change. Yet Restivo's clothing fosters another more sensible, purposeful, and undeniably beautiful concept of fashion.

Restivo has long been a fan of exquisite textiles and a fixture at fabric fairs like Moda In and the European Textile Selection, scouring their wares for the best materials and often permitting the textiles to determine her designs. By the end of the 1990s Restivo had turned away from her consulting duties for Saks Fifth Avenue and Burberrys to again design under her own name. A new line of scarves and shawls, in bright colors and patterns, came in a variety of fabrics including cashmere, silk, tulle, and velvet. The new accessories were sold to high-end retailers and department stores, some of the very same stores Restivo targeted with her next launch of home accessories, including small lingerie dressers and decorative pillows. Commenting on her new direction, Restivo told Women's Wear Daily (12 July 1999), "I like the freedom that accessories offers in terms of the scale of design."

—Richard Martin; updated by Nelly Rhodes

RHODES, Zandra

British designer

Born: Zandra Lindsey Rhodes in Chatham, Kent, England, 19 September 1940. Education: Studied textile design, Medway College of Art, 1959–61, and Royal College of Art, 1961–64. Career: Established dressmaking firm with Sylvia Ayton, London, 1964, and textile design studio with Alexander McIntyre, 1965; partner/designer, Fulham Clothes Shop, 1967–68; freelance designer, 1968–75; director, Zandra Rhodes U.K. Ltd, and Zandra Rhodes Shops Ltd., from 1975; launched ready-to-wear collections, in Australia, 1979, and in Britain, 1984; also designed bed linens and household textiles; opened a studio in California for interior design and fine art, 1995; launched Zandra Rhodes fur collection for Pologeorgis, 1995; featured designer with Lady Thatcher for U.K. Utah British promotion in Salt Lake City, 1996; featured designer for Designing Women, Costa Mesa, with accompanying book signing, 1996; launched Zandra Rhodes II, hand-painted silk ready-to-wear collection made in Hong Kong, 1996; created bed linens for Grattons mail order catalogue in the U.K., 1996; launched Zandra by the Sea ready-to-wear collection, California, 1997; launched Zandra Rhodes eyewear collection with Lygo Merx, 1998; created exclusive collection for Liberty of London, 1998; active in the British Invasion at Saks Fifth Avenue, New York, 1998; conducted Riga-Latvia Show and headed Fashion Forum,

Articles

- Larkin, Kathy, "Meet Two Designers Who Are Changing Establishment Fashions," in the New York Daily News, 14 January 1973.
- Foley, Bridget, "Mary Ann Restivo Marches to Her Own Drummer," in New York Apparel News, April 1983.
- Morris, Bernadine, "Working Women: A Designer's Focus," in the New York Times, 30 June 1987.
- Daria, Irene, "Mary Ann Restivo: Targeting the Working Woman and Herself," in WWD, 26 October 1987.
- Vespa, Mary, "Designer Mary Ann Restivo Walks on Fashion's Mild Side...," in People, 23 November 1987.
- Michals, Debra, "Dresses from Sportswear Firms: Plusses and Problems," in WWD, 28 February 1989.
- Schiro, Anne-Marie, "From Restivo, a New Look of Softness," in the New York Times, 3 November 1989.
- Morris, Bernadine, "Building Wardrobes Around Jackets," in the New York Times, 8 May 1990.
- Buck, Geneviève, "Barneys, Buddy and Bo—New Style, Old Style and No Style," in Chicago Tribune, 15 July 1992.
- Johnson, Tish, "Restivo Returns," in WWD, 12 July 1999.
- "Robert Allen Event Combines Fashion, Charity," in HFN (Weekly Newspaper for the Home Furnishing Network), 6 December 1999.

* * *

"People need fashionably sensible clothes," Mary Ann Restivo commented to People magazine in the midst of the late 1980s excesses, to which People asserted that Restivo was "emerging...as the savior of the stylish but sane professional woman." Career and professional dressing have been the appropriate context for Restivo's work, not only in terms of her clientèle, but of the clothing's emphasis on good fit, excellent materials and manufacture, personal luxury without ostentation, and wearable good taste.

Bernadine Morris, a likely champion of Restivo's work in her commitment to American sportswear, wrote of Restivo that she "tries to walk the tightrope between clothes that are subdued and those that attract attention." The attention a Restivo garment attracts is primarily for its flattering image to the client. Restivo emphasizes fit, with some camouflage to the hips, appealing to women in sizes six, eight, and ten. As the designer argues in the tradition of sportswear, no woman should feel squeezed into the clothing, but should have mobility for her own sense of elegance and self-confidence, as well as the functions of dressing for careers in which one outfit may suffice from home to office to evening. In the 1980s, Restivo's work directly coincided with the perceived need of women of middle- and upper-management to wear sensible clothing to the office without merely adapting menswear. Other American designers came to the same conviction in the 1980s, but Restivo was one of the first to create stylish careerwear and to establish it as the cornerstone of her business.

Through the 1980s jackets were an important element of all Restivo collections, even for resort. Like most designers of the period, Restivo made her jackets softer and softer, choosing the textiles for unconstructed jackets still capable of the fresh self-confidence required by career women. Restivo told the New York Times (8 May 1990) at the apogee of the well-tailored business jacket: "The jacket is the key. When you start to develop your collection, you begin with the jacket then build everything else around it. You work out the skirts or the pants and the blouses and sweaters." Further, Restivo commented, "It is interesting to me that when store buyers come to buy the collection, they follow the same procedure. When customers go shopping for their fall clothes, they will probably do the same thing."

Restivo's acuity to the customer has always been an essential part of her business, begun in 1981. The loyalty of her clients is legendary—when the Restivo line was abruptly dropped by Leslie Fay in the early 1990s, clients pursued the designer herself to be sure they would not be cut off from their favorite clothing. Restivo's client empathy is undeniably important in the success of a woman designer creating for like-minded sensible women of business and style. Gloria Steinem once described Restivo's designs as "the kind of clothes that, after you've died, another woman would find in a thrift shop and like." Such enduring good taste and clothing recycling may thwart the image of fashion as a place of excess and fickle change. Yet Restivo's clothing fosters another more sensible, purposeful, and undeniably beautiful concept of fashion.

Restivo has long been a fan of exquisite textiles and a fixture at fabric fairs like Moda In and the European Textile Selection, scouring their wares for the best materials and often permitting the textiles to determine her designs. By the end of the 1990s Restivo had turned away from her consulting duties for Saks Fifth Avenue and Burberrys to again design under her own name. A new line of scarves and shawls, in bright colors and patterns, came in a variety of fabrics including cashmere, silk, tulle, and velvet. The new accessories were sold to high-end retailers and department stores, some of the very same stores Restivo targeted with her next launch of home accessories, including small lingerie dressers and decorative pillows. Commenting on her new direction, Restivo told Women's Wear Daily (12 July 1999), "I like the freedom that accessories offers in terms of the scale of design."

—Richard Martin; updated by Nelly Rhodes

RHODES, Zandra

British designer

Born: Zandra Lindsey Rhodes in Chatham, Kent, England, 19 September 1940. Education: Studied textile design, Medway College of Art, 1959–61, and Royal College of Art, 1961–64. Career: Established dressmaking firm with Sylvia Ayton, London, 1964, and textile design studio with Alexander McIntyre, 1965; partner/designer, Fulham Clothes Shop, 1967–68; freelance designer, 1968–75; director, Zandra Rhodes U.K. Ltd, and Zandra Rhodes Shops Ltd., from 1975; launched ready-to-wear collections, in Australia, 1979, and in Britain, 1984; also designed bed linens and household textiles; opened a studio in California for interior design and fine art, 1995; launched Zandra Rhodes fur collection for Pologeorgis, 1995; featured designer with Lady Thatcher for U.K. Utah British promotion in Salt Lake City, 1996; featured designer for Designing Women, Costa Mesa, with accompanying book signing, 1996; launched Zandra Rhodes II, hand-painted silk ready-to-wear collection made in Hong Kong, 1996; created bed linens for Grattons mail order catalogue in the U.K., 1996; launched Zandra by the Sea ready-to-wear collection, California, 1997; launched Zandra Rhodes eyewear collection with Lygo Merx, 1998; created exclusive collection for Liberty of London, 1998; active in the British Invasion at Saks Fifth Avenue, New York, 1998; conducted Riga-Latvia Show and headed Fashion Forum, Zandra Rhodes in 1989. © Eric Crichton/CORBIS.

1999; groundbreaking ceremony for the Fashion and Textile Museum, London, 1999; trunk show at Lilly Dodson, Dallas, 2000; opened Melbourne Fashion Week, 2000. Exhibitions: Zandra Rhodes: A Retrospective with Artworks, Art Museum of Santa Cruz, California, 1983; retrospective Works of Art, Seibu Seed Hall, Tokyo, Japan, 1987; exhibition of watercolors, Dyansen Gallery, New York, 1989; exhibition of scarves, dresses, and watercolors, Westbury Hotel in London, 1989; exhibition of watercolors, Dyansen Gallery, Los Angeles, 1989; exhibition of watercolors, printed textiles, and sketchbooks, Seibu Hall, Tokyo, 1991; Fabrics and Their Inspiration show and lectures, Goldstein Gallery, Dayton, Minneapolis, 1991; exhibition of watercolors, Dyansen Gallery, New Orleans, 1991; retrospective garment show, Mint Museum, North Carolina, 1992; Dressed to Kill, National Gallery of Australia, 1993; Street Chic, Victoria and Albert Museum, London, 1994; Couture of Chaos, Auckland Art Museum, New Zealand, 1997; Punk Kulture, South Melbourne, Australia, 1997; Cutting Edge Fifty Years of Fashion, Victoria and Albert Museum, London, 1997; The Surface and Beyond, Victoria and Albert Museum, 1997; Best Dressed, Victoria and Albert Museum, 1997; The Surface and Beyond, San Diego, 1998; Costume of the Ancient Egyptians, Manchester Museum, 1998; Exotisme, Musée de la Mode et du Textile, Paris, 1998; Grace Barrand Design Centre, Surrey, 1998. Awards: English Fashion Designer of the Year award, 1972; Royal Designer for Industry, 1974; Moore College of Art award, Philadelphia, 1978; DFA, International Fine Arts College of Miami, 1977; Royal Designer for Industry, Royal Society of Arts, 1977; Best Costume award for Romeo and Juliet on Ice, British Association of Film and Television Emmy award, 1979; "Britain's Designer", Clothing and Export Council and the National Economic Development Committee, 1983; Alpha award for Best Show of the Year, Saks Fifth Avenue, New Orleans, 1985; Woman of Distinction award, Northwood Institute, Dallas, 1986; Number One Textile Designer in the U.K. by the Observer magazine, 1990; Alpha award for Best Show of the Year, Saks Fifth Avenue, New Orleans, 1991; Hall of Fame award by the British Fashion Council, 1995; Golden Hanger award for lifetime achievement, Fashion Careers of California College, San Diego, 1997; Commander of the British Empire, 1997; Leading Woman Entrepreneur of the World by the Star Group U.S.A., 1998; Honor award from the National Terrazzo and Mosaic Association Honor for Del Mar Terrace, 1998. Address: Zandra Rhodes Head Office, 79–85 Bermondsey Street, London, SE1 3XF. Website: www.zandrarahodes.com.

PUBLICATIONS

By RHODES:

Books

The Art of Zandra Rhodes, with Anne Knight, London, 1984; New York, 1985, 1994.

Articles

"A Life in the Day of Zandra Rhodes," with Anne Whitehouse, in the Sunday Times Magazine (London), 24 January 1982.

"My Country, Right or Wrong," in the Sunday Telegraph Magazine (London), 10 May 1987.

On RHODES:

Books

Santa Cruz Art Museum, Zandra Rhodes: A Retrospective with Artworks, Santa Cruz, CA, 1983.

Milbank, Caroline Rennolds, Couture: The Great Fashion Designers, London, 1985.

McCarthy, Fiona, and Patrick Nuttgens, Eye for Industry: Royal Designers for Industry, 1936–1986, [exhibition catalogue], London, 1986.

Loebenthal, Joel, Radical Rags: Fashions of the Sixties, New York, 1990.

Mendes, Valerie, and Claire Wilcox, Modern Fashion in Detail, London, 1991.

Steele, Valerie, Women of Fashion, New York, 1991.

Stegemeyer, Anne, Who's Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.

Crane, Tara Christopher, Elements of an Era: A Postmodern Interpretation of the Art of Zandra Rhodes, Columbia, Missouri, 1998.

Articles

"Zandra's Fantasies," in Viva (New York), February 1974.

Perschitz, Lois, "On the Rhodes," in WWD, 26 April 1974.

Kavanagh, Julie, "All Rhodes Lead to Zandra," in WWD, 31 December 1975.

Walkley, Christina, "Zandra Rhodes," in Costume (London), 1976.

"British New Style," in Vogue (London), 15 March 1976.

Howell, Georgina, "The Zandra Rhodes Dossier," in Vogue (London), July 1978.

Bakewell, Joan, "Zandra Rhodes: A Profile," in the Illustrated London News, October 1978.

"Schooldays," in Vogue (London), October 1981.

"Zandra Rhodes at Home," in Connoisseur (London), December 1981.

Williams, Antonia, "Zandra, the Non-Stop Rhodes Show," in Vogue (London), August 1982.

Fallon, James, "At Long Last Friends: Dress Designer Zandra Rhodes and Her Sister Beverly," in the Sunday Times Magazine (London), 8 May 1983.

"Zandra Rhodes," in Art and Design (London), February 1985.

Burnie, Joan, "We'll Tak' the High Rhodes," in You magazine of the Mail on Sunday (London), 28 February 1988.

"The Fashion Fatigue of Zandra Rhodes," in Design Week (London), 11 March 1988.

Nieseward, Nonie, "Ware-ability," in Connoisseur, June 1988.

"Zandra Rhodes," in Pins and Needles (London), July 1988.

"The Correspondent Questionnaire: Zandra Rhodes," in the Correspondent Magazine (London), 21 October 1990.

Schaeffer, Claire B., "Zandra Rhodes Couture," in Threads (Newtown, CT), June/July 1990.

O'Kelly, Alan, "The London Home of Zandra Rhodes," in House Beautiful (London), November 1990.

Fallon, James, "Rhodes Shutters London Workroom," in WWD, 14 July 1992.

Loper, Mary Lou, "Overdue Celebration for Nobel Laureate," in the Los Angeles Times, 28 January 1993.

Gendel, Debra, "Cutting Runaway Runway-Model Fees," in the Los Angeles Times, 24 September 1993.

Robinson, Gaile, "Mannequins or Humans?" in the Los Angeles Times, 29 September 1994.

Goodwin, Betty, "Tiaras, Anyone," in Los Angeles Times, 3 November 1994.

Lederer, Edith M., "The Present and Future are Here and Now," in the Los Angeles Times, 16 March 1995.

Williamson, Rusty, "Flight of Fancy: The Colorful Whimsy of Designer Zandra Rhodes Floats into Dallas," in WWD, 9 March 2000.

Gale Group, "Zandra Rhodes," in Biography Resource Center (Farmington Hills, MI), 2001.

Herman-Cohen, Valli, "Wolfgang, Meet Zandra," in the Los Angeles Times, 12 January 2001.

* * *

Zandra Rhodes is an artist whose medium is printed textiles. Working in a calligraphic style uniquely her own, she designs airy prints from which she produces floating, romantic garments whose cut evolves from the logic and placement of the print itself. Rhodes has no imitators and her work is instantly recognizable.

In a field where novelty is prized, Rhodes' work over the years is remarkable for its consistency. Because the shapes of her garments are fanciful and fantastical, using volume to display the textile to its best advantage, her clothes do not date. Her references are timeless: T-shaped gowns of printed chiffon belted in satin; the full-pleated skirts and long gathered sleeves of Ukrainian festival dress; off-the-shoulder tabards finished with a fringe of dagging; children's smocking reinterpreted in silk jersey. Rhodes' clothes are extravagantly feminine, delicate, and mysterious—created, as one writer observed, for "contemporary Titanias."

Each collection of prints evolves as a thoughtful response to a personal vision. Drawing on traditional historic sources, on images from nature, from popular culture, and from her own past, Rhodes sketches an object over and over, entering into a dialogue with it as the sketches become increasingly abstract and a personal statement emerges. Only at that point are a series of these personal images combined until the right composition presents itself to be translated into the final screen print. The print determines how the garment will be cut. Rhodes was not trained as a draper or cutter, and she has not been bound by the concept of symmetry, conventional seam placement, or internal shaping. Many of her dresses are cut flat or with minimal shaping, sometimes incorporating floating panels that follow the undulations of the patterned textile. She favors large repeats on silk chiffon or silk net, and as the garment falls in on itself against the body, it creates mysterious shapes and soft, misty layers not easily known. Rhodes is without doubt one of the most gifted and original designers of the late 20th and early 21st century.

Rhodes began taking her artistry to much larger material. Pink and orange concrete walls, rotating exhibits, and lavish interiors are part of Rhodes' latest constructive endeavor for the fashion industry. She calls it the Fashion and Textile Museum, her lifelong dream. Located in Bermondsey on the South Bank of the River Thames near London Bridge, Rhodes is building the museum to exhibit local and international fashion and textile designers and to educate students of contemporary fashion and textile design. Rhodes planned to open the museum's doors in 2002.

In January 2001, Rhodes provided the San Diego Opera with her imaginative and brilliant style for the production of Mozart's The Magic Flute. She designed 127 costumes, which, according to Valli Herman-Cohen of the Los Angeles Times, included everything from a rhinoceros with mirrored mosaic paws to a fantastic Queen of the Night cloak. The extraordinary costumes were such a success for Rhodes that she also launched a Magic Flute-themed eveningwear collection.

Even with the success of her collections, Rhodes finds time to venture into other fashion and artistic territories such as furs, interior and exterior design, and even etched and cut-glass windows. Rhodes teamed up with artist David Humphries for her interior and exterior work; together they have fashioned a number of terrazzo designs such as the Global Plaza at Harbourside, Sydney, and the Del Mar House Terrazzo Project. Rhodes' unusual and exceptional designs are just as breathtaking today as they were when she began as a textile designer almost 40 years ago. Highly admired, Rhodes continues to be "the" designer for cutting-edge fashion in a variety of forms.

—Whitney Blausen; updated by Kimbally Medeiros

John Richmond, fall/winter 2001–02 collection. © AP/Wide World Photos.

RIBES, Jacqueline de

See de RIBES, Jacqueline

RICCI, Nina

See NINA RICCI

RICHMOND, John

British designer

Born: Manchester, England, 1960. Education: Graduated from Kingston Polytechnic, 1982. Family: Married Angie Hill; children: Harley, Phoenix. Career: Freelance designer in England for Lano Lano, Ursula Hudson, Fiorucci, Joseph Tricot, and Pin Up for Deni Cler, 1982–84; designer/partner with Maria Cornejo, Richmond-Cornejo, London, 1984–87; introduced John Richmod Man and John

Richmond Woman collections, 1987; introduced lower-priced Destroy collection, 1990; introduced Destroy Denim collection, 1991; opened first London boutique, 1992; launched own ready-to-wear and accessories line, 1995; signed on to design womenswear and accessories for Valextra, 2000–03. Address: 25 Battersea Bridge Road, London SW11 3BA England

PUBLICATIONS

On RICHMOND:

Books

- Thackara, John, ed., New British Design, London, 1986.
- McDermott, Catherine, Street Style: British Design in the 1980s, London, 1987.
- de La Haye, Amy, ed., The Cutting Edge: Fifty Years of British Fashion, 1947–1997, New York, 1997.
- Debrett's People of Today*, London, 2001.

Articles

- "All Right John?" in the Sunday Express Magazine (London), 3 August 1986.

silk chiffon or silk net, and as the garment falls in on itself against the body, it creates mysterious shapes and soft, misty layers not easily known. Rhodes is without doubt one of the most gifted and original designers of the late 20th and early 21st century.

Rhodes began taking her artistry to much larger material. Pink and orange concrete walls, rotating exhibits, and lavish interiors are part of Rhodes' latest constructive endeavor for the fashion industry. She calls it the Fashion and Textile Museum, her lifelong dream. Located in Bermondsey on the South Bank of the River Thames near London Bridge, Rhodes is building the museum to exhibit local and international fashion and textile designers and to educate students of contemporary fashion and textile design. Rhodes planned to open the museum's doors in 2002.

In January 2001, Rhodes provided the San Diego Opera with her imaginative and brilliant style for the production of Mozart's The Magic Flute. She designed 127 costumes, which, according to Valli Herman-Cohen of the Los Angeles Times, included everything from a rhinoceros with mirrored mosaic paws to a fantastic Queen of the Night cloak. The extraordinary costumes were such a success for Rhodes that she also launched a Magic Flute-themed eveningwear collection.

Even with the success of her collections, Rhodes finds time to venture into other fashion and artistic territories such as furs, interior and exterior design, and even etched and cut-glass windows. Rhodes teamed up with artist David Humphries for her interior and exterior work; together they have fashioned a number of terrazzo designs such as the Global Plaza at Harbourside, Sydney, and the Del Mar House Terrazzo Project. Rhodes' unusual and exceptional designs are just as breathtaking today as they were when she began as a textile designer almost 40 years ago. Highly admired, Rhodes continues to be "the" designer for cutting-edge fashion in a variety of forms.

—Whitney Blausen; updated by Kimbally Medeiros

John Richmond, fall/winter 2001–02 collection. © AP/Wide World Photos.

RIBES, Jacqueline de

See de RIBES, Jacqueline

RICCI, Nina

See NINA RICCI

RICHMOND, John

British designer

Born: Manchester, England, 1960. Education: Graduated from Kingston Polytechnic, 1982. Family: Married Angie Hill; children: Harley, Phoenix. Career: Freelance designer in England for Lano Lano, Ursula Hudson, Fiorucci, Joseph Tricot, and Pin Up for Deni Cler, 1982–84; designer/partner with Maria Cornejo, Richmond-Cornejo, London, 1984–87; introduced John Richmod Man and John

Richmond Woman collections, 1987; introduced lower-priced Destroy collection, 1990; introduced Destroy Denim collection, 1991; opened first London boutique, 1992; launched own ready-to-wear and accessories line, 1995; signed on to design womenswear and accessories for Valextra, 2000–03. Address: 25 Battersea Bridge Road, London SW11 3BA England

PUBLICATIONS

On RICHMOND:

Books

- Thackara, John, ed., New British Design, London, 1986.
- McDermott, Catherine, Street Style: British Design in the 1980s, London, 1987.
- de La Haye, Amy, ed., The Cutting Edge: Fifty Years of British Fashion, 1947–1997, New York, 1997.
- Debrett's People of Today*, London, 2001.

Articles

- "All Right John?" in the Sunday Express Magazine (London), 3 August 1986.

John Richmond, spring/summer 2001 ready-to-wear collection. © Reuters NewMedia Inc./CORBIS.

"Design Duo Separate," in Fashion Weekly (London), 12 November 1987.

"Richmond/Cornejo," in the Sunday Times Magazine (London), 22 November 1987.

Scott-Gray, Chris, "Designing Contradictions," in Fashion Weekly (London), 6 October 1988.

Collen, Matthew, "Maximum Impact," in i-D (London), December/January 1989–90.

Ferguson, Sarah, "Cyclist," in Elle (New York), April 1991.

"John Richmond," in Face (London), September 1991.

Fallon, James, "Richmond the Destroyer," in DNR, 6 July 1992.

Gordon, Mary Ellen, "Rock 'n' Roll Control," in WWD, 18 November 1992.

Clemente, Alba, "Limelighting John Richmond," in Interview, January 1993.

"Real Shopping: Style Police—Look, No Hands," in the Independent, 7 March 1999.

Bonas, Maurizio, "Milan Men's Wear Schedule," in DNR, 7–12 January 2000.

Zargani, Luisa, "Notebook from Milan: Valextra New Line," in Women's Wear Daily, 27 November 2000.

"John Richmond," available online at the Fashion Page, www.fashionz.co.uk; Fashion View, www.fashionview.com; Moda Online, www.modaonline.it; and at British Fur, www.british-fur.com; 5 October 2001.

* * *

The twin icons of popular rebellion—rock music and biker chic—are combined with good tailoring and attention to detail to make John Richmond's designs a success, commercially and critically. He is one of the most business-minded of his British counterparts, steadily building up his clothing range while others have fallen prey to financial and production problems. His designs have developed along the lines initiated during his partnership with Maria Cornejo, with certain motifs being carried through. These make his work instantly recognizable and, he says, justify the use of the "Destroy" slogan as a brand name for his cheaper lines, instead of promoting it as a diffusion range.

Richmond's womenswear shows the use of sharp tailoring with subversive twists that carry out the motto of "Destroy, Disorientate, Disorder,” so often emblazoned on his garments, as he tries to challenge accepted design conventions and expectations. Richmond’s clothes are always sexy and brazen, leading many stylists and pop stars to reach for his styles when wanting to create a memorable and striking image. Well-cut jackets, often in hot fruity colors, are combined with fetish motifs. Bondage chains, zips, and leather inserts hark back to punk, although the sophistication of the style and the quality of the fabric make the overall look far more contemporary. His tattoo-sleeve tops and biker jackets were seen everywhere, even inspiring a vogue for the real thing among some London clubbers.

These design details also highlighted another side of his more subversive work. The macho tattoos he juxtaposed with transparent georgette wrap tops in the late 1980s questioned sexual stereotypes, something he continued in his menswear, where bright shiny fabrics were used for long-jacketed suits, and net was set against hard leather. These were perhaps a reflection of the vulnerable, slightly camp edge possessed by many of the rock heroes who inspired Richmond; impossibly masculine images, at the same time tempered by a glam-rock glitziness or the feminine twist of a soft shiny fabric. Although the anarchy symbols he so often used challenge, they never led to his creating unwearable or unsellable clothes. A suit might have been made with bondage trousers as a witty edge to a traditional design, but the fine Prince of Wales check of the fabric still made it seem stylish and desirable.

Richmond’s Destroy and Destroy Denim labels had the same pop star/rock chic feel yet retained the quality of design of his main line, relying mainly on Lycra, denim, and splashes of leatherette to produce a sportswear influence and clubby feel. Jeans in denim and biker jackets formed the basis of this collection, although sharp suits also featured, with 1970s glam rock again an influence: feather boalike trim around coats and jackets and tight sequin tops for both men and women. Later collections showed a growing maturity in style and widening of influences, in couture-inspired jackets with gilt buttons and quilted linings and sleek slit skirts, still with the distinctive Richmond elements like shiny leggings and the contrast platform heels of the boots designed for Shelly’s, the popular London footwear chain.

For the 1996–97 winter season, Richmond’s second Milan showing stressed a distinctive sophistication merging sensuality with a cosmopolitan flair. He refined classic ensembles to suit a mature, worldly buyer who wanted to appear tasteful yet alluring. His dresses, which Forlì Red Falcon made and distributed, succeeded primarily because of Richmond’s fabric and detailing savvy. For the modish, self-confident woman, he underscored uncomplicated lines.

Richmond made his mark on the season with devoré velvets, metallic woolens, delavé taffetas, and optical prints. The collection of skirts and day costumes tended to be well-fitted and long; tapered pants complemented crêpe georgette blouses. For casual wear, he relaxed the silhouette with twin sets, trapeze skirts, low-slung pant lines, and tight, figure-revealing tops. His choice of animal prints and skins, bi-tone gabardine, satin, suedes, and vinyl, and velvet for dresses provided texture and variety to suit more occasions and settings. His palette centered on black, dark umber, and navy, often offset by diagonal slashes of pink and burgundy. For some ensembles in his winter 2001–02 collection, Richmond, like Dior, Gucci, Chanel, Prada, Armani, and numerous other of the fashion world’s top designers, chose fur, a material that Brenda Polan of the London Evening Standard connected with wealth, sex appeal, luxury, and glamor.

Additionally, in 2000, Richmond signed a three-year contract with Valextra, the Italian accessories firm, to design a new womenswear collection and coordinating accessories line featuring footwear and handbags. “I didn’t want to work with just my company, and I don’t really plan to do any other consulting,” Richmond told Women’s Wear Daily (27 November 2000), “I’m thinking of clothes that fit with the bags; I thought this was the easiest way to change people’s perception of Valextra, to show how accessories fit into modern life.”

—Rebecca Arnold; updated by Mary Ellen Snodgrass

ROBERTS, Patricia

British designer

Born: At Barnard Castle, County Durham, England, 2 January 1945.

Education: Studied at Queen Mary’s School, Lytham St. Anne’s, Lancashire, 1961–63; Fashion Diploma, Leicester College of Art, 1963–67. Family: Married John Christopher Heffernan, 1982; children: Amy. Career: Knitting editor, IPC Magazines, 1967–71; director/designer, Patricia Roberts Knitting, Ltd., from 1971, and, through Vogue, supplied knitwear for London shops; designer, Patricia Roberts Yarns and Woollybear Yarns, from 1976; director/designer, Patricia Roberts shops, from 1976; Patricia Roberts perfume, 1990.

Exhibitions: Knit One, Purl One, Victoria & Albert Museum, London, 1986. Collections: Victoria & Albert Museum, London; Whitworth Museum, Manchester. Awards: Duke of Edinburgh’s Designer’s prize, 1986; Design Council award, 1986. Address: 60 Kinnerton St., London SW1X 8ES, England.

PUBLICATIONS

By ROBERTS:

Books

Patricia Roberts Knitting Patterns, London, 1977.

Patricia Roberts Knitting Book, London, 1981.

Patricia Roberts Second Knitting Book, London, 1983.

Patricia Roberts Collection, London, 1985.

Patricia Roberts Style, London, 1988.

Patricia Roberts Variations, London, 1991, 1993; New York, 1992.

On ROBERTS:

Books

O’Hara, Georgina, Encyclopedia of Fashion from 1840 to 1980s, London, 1986.

Sutton, Ann, British Craft Textiles, London, 1991.

Articles

Raven, Susan, “Patterns for Patricia,” in the Sunday Times Magazine (London), 8 December 1984.

Brampton, Sally, “A Priceless Pearl among the Plain Set,” in the Times (London), 31 March 1986.

Disorder,” so often emblazoned on his garments, as he tries to challenge accepted design conventions and expectations. Richmond’s clothes are always sexy and brazen, leading many stylists and pop stars to reach for his styles when wanting to create a memorable and striking image. Well-cut jackets, often in hot fruity colors, are combined with fetish motifs. Bondage chains, zips, and leather inserts hark back to punk, although the sophistication of the style and the quality of the fabric make the overall look far more contemporary. His tattoo-sleeve tops and biker jackets were seen everywhere, even inspiring a vogue for the real thing among some London clubbers.

These design details also highlighted another side of his more subversive work. The macho tattoos he juxtaposed with transparent georgette wrap tops in the late 1980s questioned sexual stereotypes, something he continued in his menswear, where bright shiny fabrics were used for long-jacketed suits, and net was set against hard leather. These were perhaps a reflection of the vulnerable, slightly camp edge possessed by many of the rock heroes who inspired Richmond; impossibly masculine images, at the same time tempered by a glam-rock glitziness or the feminine twist of a soft shiny fabric. Although the anarchy symbols he so often used challenge, they never led to his creating unwearable or unsellable clothes. A suit might have been made with bondage trousers as a witty edge to a traditional design, but the fine Prince of Wales check of the fabric still made it seem stylish and desirable.

Richmond’s Destroy and Destroy Denim labels had the same pop star/rock chic feel yet retained the quality of design of his main line, relying mainly on Lycra, denim, and splashes of leatherette to produce a sportswear influence and clubby feel. Jeans in denim and biker jackets formed the basis of this collection, although sharp suits also featured, with 1970s glam rock again an influence: feather boalike trim around coats and jackets and tight sequin tops for both men and women. Later collections showed a growing maturity in style and widening of influences, in couture-inspired jackets with gilt buttons and quilted linings and sleek slit skirts, still with the distinctive Richmond elements like shiny leggings and the contrast platform heels of the boots designed for Shelly’s, the popular London footwear chain.

For the 1996–97 winter season, Richmond’s second Milan showing stressed a distinctive sophistication merging sensuality with a cosmopolitan flair. He refined classic ensembles to suit a mature, worldly buyer who wanted to appear tasteful yet alluring. His dresses, which Forlì Red Falcon made and distributed, succeeded primarily because of Richmond’s fabric and detailing savvy. For the modish, self-confident woman, he underscored uncomplicated lines.

Richmond made his mark on the season with devoré velvets, metallic woolens, delavé taffetas, and optical prints. The collection of skirts and day costumes tended to be well-fitted and long; tapered pants complemented crêpe georgette blouses. For casual wear, he relaxed the silhouette with twin sets, trapeze skirts, low-slung pant lines, and tight, figure-revealing tops. His choice of animal prints and skins, bi-tone gabardine, satin, suedes, and vinyl, and velvet for dresses provided texture and variety to suit more occasions and settings. His palette centered on black, dark umber, and navy, often offset by diagonal slashes of pink and burgundy. For some ensembles in his winter 2001–02 collection, Richmond, like Dior, Gucci, Chanel, Prada, Armani, and numerous other of the fashion world’s top designers, chose fur, a material that Brenda Polan of the London Evening Standard connected with wealth, sex appeal, luxury, and glamor.

Additionally, in 2000, Richmond signed a three-year contract with Valextra, the Italian accessories firm, to design a new womenswear collection and coordinating accessories line featuring footwear and handbags. “I didn’t want to work with just my company, and I don’t really plan to do any other consulting,” Richmond told Women’s Wear Daily (27 November 2000), “I’m thinking of clothes that fit with the bags; I thought this was the easiest way to change people’s perception of Valextra, to show how accessories fit into modern life.”

—Rebecca Arnold; updated by Mary Ellen Snodgrass

ROBERTS, Patricia

British designer

Born: At Barnard Castle, County Durham, England, 2 January 1945.

Education: Studied at Queen Mary’s School, Lytham St. Anne’s, Lancashire, 1961–63; Fashion Diploma, Leicester College of Art, 1963–67. Family: Married John Christopher Heffernan, 1982; children: Amy. Career: Knitting editor, IPC Magazines, 1967–71; director/designer, Patricia Roberts Knitting, Ltd., from 1971, and, through Vogue, supplied knitwear for London shops; designer, Patricia Roberts Yarns and Woollybear Yarns, from 1976; director/designer, Patricia Roberts shops, from 1976; Patricia Roberts perfume, 1990.

Exhibitions: Knit One, Purl One, Victoria & Albert Museum, London, 1986. Collections: Victoria & Albert Museum, London; Whitworth Museum, Manchester. Awards: Duke of Edinburgh’s Designer’s prize, 1986; Design Council award, 1986. Address: 60 Kinnerton St., London SW1X 8ES, England.

PUBLICATIONS

By ROBERTS:

Books

Patricia Roberts Knitting Patterns, London, 1977.

Patricia Roberts Knitting Book, London, 1981.

Patricia Roberts Second Knitting Book, London, 1983.

Patricia Roberts Collection, London, 1985.

Patricia Roberts Style, London, 1988.

Patricia Roberts Variations, London, 1991, 1993; New York, 1992.

On ROBERTS:

Books

O’Hara, Georgina, Encyclopedia of Fashion from 1840 to 1980s, London, 1986.

Sutton, Ann, British Craft Textiles, London, 1991.

Articles

Raven, Susan, “Patterns for Patricia,” in the Sunday Times Magazine (London), 8 December 1984.

Brampton, Sally, “A Priceless Pearl among the Plain Set,” in the Times (London), 31 March 1986.

McDowell, Colin, "Never Out of Fashion," in Crafts (London), May/June 1986.

*

My knitwear is identifiable by its sophisticated stitchcraft. I love to push the technical limits of hand knitting into new areas, but always within the context of casual, easy to wear fashion. I am inspired by the creative possibilities of hand knitting and enjoy inventing new stitches and amalgamating them with colours, textures and form.

For each collection I think of a theme and then imagine ways of interpreting it into colour, Aran or lace work, or a combination of these. There is often something completely new about the way they are worked. The inspiration comes from anywhere and anything—holidays, nature, the sea, art exhibitions, bric-a-brac, etc. I work in natural fibres, often luxury ones, like cashmere and angora. We have developed our own range of cottons, specially for hand knitting, in a myriad of colours.

I want people to feel comfortable and enjoy wearing my sweaters at almost any time and anywhere from the city office, to the country, the sea, or the fashionable ski resort.

—Patricia Roberts

* * *

The 20th century saw a revolution in hand knitwear and this fresh interpretation of knitting tradition was made by a small number of designers. Foremost in the field was Patricia Roberts who had trained in fashion at Leicester College of Art. On leaving college as an enthusiastic hand knitter in the early 1960s, she worked for a group of women's magazines making up patterns, and quickly learned the value of technical accuracy. Frustrated by the general outlook of hand knitting for economy's sake and magazines wanting Marks & Spencer copies, she realized knitwear must go in a different direction to justify knitting by hand at all.

At the age of 26 she launched herself as a freelance designer and put together a collection of entirely fresh-looking handknits which were sold to Browns of London and Bloomingdale's in the United States. She opened her first shop in London's Knightsbridge in 1976, selling both made up garments and knitting kits for the home knitter. Noting the lack of quality and limited color of available yarns, she sold her own range wholesale. Roberts soon had a thriving mail order business and had produced the first of her annual pattern books in a short time. More than a dozen were published in paperback and several in hardback as well. Roberts designed the books herself, stylish volumes of glamorous sophistication, many of which often sold out almost overnight.

Texture and colour have always been dominant features of her work—she was one of the first to make the British Spinning Industry confront the challenge for more creative yarns for the burgeoning talents among British knitwear designers. Roberts skilfully explored new techniques to achieve textural bobbles and bas relief, taking images from nature like bunches of grapes and cherries or, more mundanely, novelties like children's sweets or even a Scrabble board. Her grapes and cherries were huge bestsellers. Aran castles thin as trellises intersected areas full of different pattern, color, and stitchery. The yarns themselves further increased surface interest with fluffy mohair, smooth silks, and other luxury yarns like cashmere and angora.

Roberts has long used only natural fibers and designed her own range of cottons. Her plainer garments made use of thick linens, tweeds, and marls. These highly textured, one-color designs vied for attention with the more dramatic, multicolored, intricately-patterned garments in bright primaries or jewel tones. For the home knitter, these were not garments for the faint-hearted. Roberts continually designs on the needles, "I keep knitting it up," she has said, "and unravelling it because I keep changing my mind." It is then written down and sent to outworkers to be made up. Ready-made garments have definitely been at the top end of the market and customers have included stars of stage and screen.

Designer Jean Muir, who chaired the Knitting Committee of the Design Council, compared Roberts' work to that of a painter or sculptor, calling her "a craftsman who has made her work commercial.... [she is] a leader in the resurgence of artists and craftsmen who are bringing about the most exciting movement that has happened in this country for a century." Roberts regards herself as primarily a designer, very interested in the product design, and claims to be not at all "arty crafty." She has often been referred as the most commercial of Britain's hand knitters; with no loss of originality and quality, her ready-made collections, patterns, and yarns have been available to a wide international public.

In 1986 Roberts was awarded the Design Council award and subsequently the supreme accolade, the Duke of Edinburgh's Designer's prize of the year, never before awarded to a clothing designer. The Design Council described her achievement as "an outstanding example of British design success," and added, "despite a considerable growth of sales, the best design standards had been maintained throughout the growth of the company." Her work was included in exhibitions at the Victoria & Albert Museum twice in that same year, and her work was added to the museum's permanent collection.

In the mid-1990s Roberts showed two collections each year to buyers in Paris, Milan, and London. Retail shops bearing her name were opened in London and franchised shops in Hong Kong, Cyprus, and Melbourne. As much as three-quarters of her garment business was exported, primarily to Italy. Roberts was probably the first to see the commercial possibilities in what had started in the early 1960s as a fairly obscure craft revival. She remained seemingly untouched by her success, "I've always been a worker," she has said, "a plodder. I tend to think I'm not ambitious but I must be; other people seem to think I am." She progressed steadily from designing knitting patterns to masterminding an internationally acclaimed empire of haute couture knits and designs.

Roberts has raised handknitting to an artform and pioneered a way for others to follow. Although self-effacing by nature, she is matter of fact about her success: "I'm not surprised because nothing has happened overnight. It's all been just one stage after another."

—Elian McCready

ROBINSON, Bill

American designer

Born: circa 1948. Education: Graduated from Parsons School of Design, New York. Career: Chief designer of menswear collection,

McDowell, Colin, "Never Out of Fashion," in Crafts (London), May/June 1986.

*

My knitwear is identifiable by its sophisticated stitchcraft. I love to push the technical limits of hand knitting into new areas, but always within the context of casual, easy to wear fashion. I am inspired by the creative possibilities of hand knitting and enjoy inventing new stitches and amalgamating them with colours, textures and form.

For each collection I think of a theme and then imagine ways of interpreting it into colour, Aran or lace work, or a combination of these. There is often something completely new about the way they are worked. The inspiration comes from anywhere and anything—holidays, nature, the sea, art exhibitions, bric-a-brac, etc. I work in natural fibres, often luxury ones, like cashmere and angora. We have developed our own range of cottons, specially for hand knitting, in a myriad of colours.

I want people to feel comfortable and enjoy wearing my sweaters at almost any time and anywhere from the city office, to the country, the sea, or the fashionable ski resort.

—Patricia Roberts

* * *

The 20th century saw a revolution in hand knitwear and this fresh interpretation of knitting tradition was made by a small number of designers. Foremost in the field was Patricia Roberts who had trained in fashion at Leicester College of Art. On leaving college as an enthusiastic hand knitter in the early 1960s, she worked for a group of women's magazines making up patterns, and quickly learned the value of technical accuracy. Frustrated by the general outlook of hand knitting for economy's sake and magazines wanting Marks & Spencer copies, she realized knitwear must go in a different direction to justify knitting by hand at all.

At the age of 26 she launched herself as a freelance designer and put together a collection of entirely fresh-looking handknits which were sold to Browns of London and Bloomingdale's in the United States. She opened her first shop in London's Knightsbridge in 1976, selling both made up garments and knitting kits for the home knitter. Noting the lack of quality and limited color of available yarns, she sold her own range wholesale. Roberts soon had a thriving mail order business and had produced the first of her annual pattern books in a short time. More than a dozen were published in paperback and several in hardback as well. Roberts designed the books herself, stylish volumes of glamorous sophistication, many of which often sold out almost overnight.

Texture and colour have always been dominant features of her work—she was one of the first to make the British Spinning Industry confront the challenge for more creative yarns for the burgeoning talents among British knitwear designers. Roberts skilfully explored new techniques to achieve textural bobbles and bas relief, taking images from nature like bunches of grapes and cherries or, more mundanely, novelties like children's sweets or even a Scrabble board. Her grapes and cherries were huge bestsellers. Aran castles thin as trellises intersected areas full of different pattern, color, and stitchery. The yarns themselves further increased surface interest with fluffy mohair, smooth silks, and other luxury yarns like cashmere and angora.

Roberts has long used only natural fibers and designed her own range of cottons. Her plainer garments made use of thick linens, tweeds, and marls. These highly textured, one-color designs vied for attention with the more dramatic, multicolored, intricately-patterned garments in bright primaries or jewel tones. For the home knitter, these were not garments for the faint-hearted. Roberts continually designs on the needles, "I keep knitting it up," she has said, "and unravelling it because I keep changing my mind." It is then written down and sent to outworkers to be made up. Ready-made garments have definitely been at the top end of the market and customers have included stars of stage and screen.

Designer Jean Muir, who chaired the Knitting Committee of the Design Council, compared Roberts' work to that of a painter or sculptor, calling her "a craftsman who has made her work commercial.... [she is] a leader in the resurgence of artists and craftsmen who are bringing about the most exciting movement that has happened in this country for a century." Roberts regards herself as primarily a designer, very interested in the product design, and claims to be not at all "arty crafty." She has often been referred as the most commercial of Britain's hand knitters; with no loss of originality and quality, her ready-made collections, patterns, and yarns have been available to a wide international public.

In 1986 Roberts was awarded the Design Council award and subsequently the supreme accolade, the Duke of Edinburgh's Designer's prize of the year, never before awarded to a clothing designer. The Design Council described her achievement as "an outstanding example of British design success," and added, "despite a considerable growth of sales, the best design standards had been maintained throughout the growth of the company." Her work was included in exhibitions at the Victoria & Albert Museum twice in that same year, and her work was added to the museum's permanent collection.

In the mid-1990s Roberts showed two collections each year to buyers in Paris, Milan, and London. Retail shops bearing her name were opened in London and franchised shops in Hong Kong, Cyprus, and Melbourne. As much as three-quarters of her garment business was exported, primarily to Italy. Roberts was probably the first to see the commercial possibilities in what had started in the early 1960s as a fairly obscure craft revival. She remained seemingly untouched by her success, "I've always been a worker," she has said, "a plodder. I tend to think I'm not ambitious but I must be; other people seem to think I am." She progressed steadily from designing knitting patterns to masterminding an internationally acclaimed empire of haute couture knits and designs.

Roberts has raised handknitting to an artform and pioneered a way for others to follow. Although self-effacing by nature, she is matter of fact about her success: "I'm not surprised because nothing has happened overnight. It's all been just one stage after another."

—Elian McCready

ROBINSON, Bill

American designer

Born: circa 1948. Education: Graduated from Parsons School of Design, New York. Career: Chief designer of menswear collection,

Calvin Klein, 1977 to early 1980s; went to Yves Saint Laurent and updated men's collection; premiered own collection, fall, 1986; introduced complete suit, dress shirt, and neckwear collections, 1988; signed deal with Kindwear Company of Tokyo for the distribution of the Bill Robinson collection in Japan, 1987; label relaunched through three licensing agreements, 1996; new collections debuted, 1997. Awards: Student of the Year award, Parsons School of Design, 1969; Cutty Sark menswear award nomination, 1987; Most Promising U.S. Designer award, 1987. Died: 16 December 1993, in New York.

PUBLICATIONS

On ROBINSON:

Articles

Various reviews and coverage in the Philadelphia Inquirer, USA Today, Manhattan Inc., Daily News Record, Toronto Globe & Mail, June to November 1986.

Hochswender, Woody, "Making One's Mark (Designer Bill Robinson)," in the New York Times, 14 June 1988.

Cameron, Victoria Pearson, "Why So Blue? (Men's Fashions)," in Esquire, March 1991.

Laxton, William, "Mister America: A Salute to Designer Bill Robinson," in Esquire, May 1991.

Furman, Phyllis, "Resuiting American Men," in Crain's New York Business, 15 July 1991.

Pace, Eric, "Bill Robinson, 45, Pioneering Designer of Fashions for Men," [obituary] in the New York Times, 17 December 1993.

"Deaths Last Week," in Chicago Tribune, 19 December 1993.

Socha, Miles, "Robinson's Crusade: Bill Robinson Label Resurfaces as Contemporary Mainfloor Label," in DNR, 19 August 1996.

* * *

Bill Robinson was a rare breed of designer—articulate, modest, and enormously intuitive. He was one of the few American menswear designers to achieve a worldwide reputation in the 1980s. His clothes had their roots in classic American styles but also reflected a tradition of European design. They were an amalgam of fashion basics and sophisticated, elegant sportswear.

Robinson was inspired mainly by the period of the 1930s through the 1950s, considered the golden age of American sportswear. Yet he always strived to be "up-to-date, contemporary, modern," in his own words. The innate American character of his philosophy was expressed in a quote in the May 1991 issue of Esquire regarding his spring-summer 1991 collection, "My summer collection tells little stories, from Main to Florida."

Ironically enough, having once designed uniforms for Avis and TWA, Robinson set his sights on eradicating uniforms for men and opening up the horizons of menswear design. Wearing an unconstructed suit to work is fine, he seemed to say. And rather than donning a run-of-the-mill denim shirt and jacket, one could wear an indigo washed silk shirt and blazer—a casual yet eminently sophisticated ensemble that sacrificed nothing to comfort. Taking the classics as his starting point, he designed modern clothes for forward-thinking, creative men who were unafraid of their sensuality.

Robinson's formative years were spent working on the menswear collection for Calvin Klein. "Somehow, by fate, when I moved into menswear, I really took off," he said. Robinson made his reputation with sleek leather jackets and body-conscious knits, setting the standard against which other menswear designers were judged in these categories. He himself wore one of his signature looks, a black turtleneck, and managed to look chic yet down-to-earth, setting the tone for his collection.

He put his individual stamp on schoolboy ties, CPO shirts, regatta striped blazers, and mackinaw jackets. Robinson was a master of subtlety and a superb colorist, qualities brilliantly expressed in a seminal show staged at New York's Plaza Hotel for the fall 1989 season, when he launched his Japanese license with Kindwear. A velvet corduroy suit from the fall 1991 collection is among the best examples of his work, combining the utilitarian quality of a common fabric with the plush and rich color associated with luxury clothing. The collection was also the start of a new direction for the designer, who adopted a softened approach casting aside the excesses and "power looks" of the 1980s.

Having brought American design to a world-class level, Robinson also collaborated on advertising campaigns with such equally renowned figures as photographers Steven Meisel, Kurt Markus, and Guzman, raising the level of fashion photography in the United States. For his fall 1992 collection, Robinson included such classic as pea coats, slim, flat-front pants, a host of knits, short overcoats, and a generally slimmer silhouette. He combined the rugged with the urbane in a mackinaw jacket shown over a one-button business suit and a mock turtleneck. As he had commented, "The lines between work and play are blurring."

With his backer, Bidermann Industries Corp., Robinson was also forward thinking in his pricing structure, making the collection accessible to a wide range of customers and emphasizing the value-price relationship way before it was in vogue in the post-Ronald Reagan era. The fashion world, however, was robbed of this forward-minded designer in 1993, when Robinson died at the age of 45. Robinson's modesty was reflected in his designs, clothing separates easily incorporated into any man's wardrobe. They weren't blockbuster looks with a limited shelf life, but modern classics that would never go out of style. A testament to these qualities and Robinson's skills came in 1996, three years after the designer's untimely death, when his longtime companion and business partner, Leo Chiu, as well as other principals of Bill Robinson International, decided to save the floundering company through several new licensing agreements.

Three companies picked up the Robinson mantle: Male Concepts Inc. signed on to relaunch Robinson menswear in spring 1997, with suits, sports coats, full coats, and a range of trousers, from dress to casual; the Dino di Milano Corporation, headquartered in Miami, took the license for Robinson knit, woven, and dress shirts; and the New York-based Roffe Accessories company was slated to release Robinson neckties and socks. Chiu told Miles Socha of the Daily News Record, (19 August 1996), "This is something [Robinson] always wanted. We wanted to find suitable licensees we could trust, and [I] think we've found them." Though Robinson designs had been licensed in the past to backer Bidermann Industries and the Plaid Clothing Group, both companies had gone into bankruptcy proceedings.

—Vicki Vasilopoulos; updated by Nelly Rhodes

ROCCOBAROCCO

See BAROCCO, Rocco

ROCHAS, Marcel

French designer

Born: Paris, 1902. Career: Opened fashion house in rue Faubourg St-Honoré, Paris, 1924; moved to avenue Matignon, 1931; first perfume launched, 1936; fragrances lab scents discontinued, during World War II; Parfums Rochas S.A. established, 1945; Hélène Rochas took over after Marcel's death, 1955; factory moved to Poissy, 1969; acquired by Wella AG, 1987; couture relaunched with designer Peter O'Brien, 1990; debuting spring-summer collection after three-year absence, 2000; fragrances include Air Jeune, Avenue Matignon, and Audace, 1936 (latter was reintroduced 1972); Femme, 1945, Chiffon (later renamed Poupée), 1946; Madame Rochas, 1960, Monsieur Rochas, 1969; Mystère, 1978; Eau de Rochas, 1970; Eau de Rochas pour Homme, 1973; Macassar, 1980; Lumière, 1984; Globe, 1990; Tocade, 1994; Byzantine, 1995; Fleur de L'eau, 1996; Tocadilly, Marcel Rochas, 1950 collection. © Bettmann/CORBIS.

1997; Alchimie, 1998; Aquaman, 2001. Died: 1955, in Paris. Company Address: 33 rue François 1er Paris F-75008, France.

PUBLICATIONS

By ROCHAS:

Books

Twenty-Five Years of Paris Elegance 1925–50, n.d.

On ROCHAS:

Books

Picken, Mary Brooks, and Dora Loues Miller, Dressmakers of France: The Who, How, and Why of the French Couture, New York, 1956.

Garland, Madge, The Changing Face of Fashion, London, 1970.

Kennett, Frances, Collector's Book of Twentieth Century Fashion, London, 1983.

Mohrt, Françoise, Marcel Rochas: 30 ans d'élégance et de créations, 1925–1955, Paris, 1983.

Milbank, Caroline Rennolds, Couture: the Great Designers, New York, 1985.

Stegemeyer, Anne, Who's Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.

Robert, Guy, Les sens du parfum, Paris, 2000.

Articles

Noel, Lucie, "Marcel Rochas Stresses Youth in New Styles," in the New York Herald Tribune, 3 August 1948.

Alexander, Hilary, "The Face that Relaunched Rochas," in the Daily Telegraph (London), 16 November 1989.

Weisman, Katherine, "Rochas' Tocade to Bow in September," in WWD, 6 May 1994.

Weil, Jennifer, "Rochas' New Brew," in WWD, 19 June 1998.

"Lavender Goes Green for Rochas," in Cosmetics International, 10 March 1999.

Rein, Anne, "Rochas Sees the Light," in WWD, 28 April 2000.

Loyer, Michele, "The Sleeping Beauties of Couture are Waking," in the International Herald Tribune, 11 October 2000.

Jensen, Tanya, "Rochas: Classic & Refined," in WWD, 8 October 2001.

* * *

In the sometimes indeterminate world of fashion, Marcel Rochas was determined and decisive. He operated with a business acumen and cultural strategy (including the fashion designer as a conspicuous social mixer) that caused him in the postwar period to doubt the continued vitality and interest of couture—and to turn resolutely to his boutique operation and lucrative fragrance business. His motto was "Youth, Simplicity, and Personality," alternatively reported in the New York Herald Tribune (3 August 1948) as "elegance, simplicity, and youth," but it was in many ways the characteristic of personality that differentiated Rochas from other designers of his era. His initial fame came in the 1920s and rested on his tailleur, accompanied with full, supple skirts.

In 1942, five years before the Dior New Look, Rochas had offered a new corset to create the guépière, or wasp-waist, anticipating the return of the extreme femininity that enchanted him. Caroline Rennolds Milbank, writing in her book Couture: the Great Designers (New York, 1985), said Rochas and his skill were “characterized by a calculated originality.” Originality was very important for Rochas, if only as a sign of rights and attribute of value rather than of real creative initiative.

In the 1930s, he was already selling ready-to-wear and made-to-order clothes in his New York store. He claimed to have invented the word “slacks” in the early 1930s, along with originating the idea to include gray flannel slacks as part of a suit. In an era when women’s trousers were limited to extreme informality or recreation, Rochas trousers were highly advanced if not revolutionary. His clothing was not cautious, and for him “original” and “invention” were key words in the vocabulary of selling fashion.

The wide shoulders of the 1930s were created by several designers more or less simultaneously. He continuously played on the shoulders as a sign of the feminine—a fall-winter 1947 evening gown, for instance, invents broad shoulders through a capelet-like scarf attached to the bodice. Bolero jackets of the 1940s were lighter in construction than Balenciaga’s inspirations direct from Spain; Rochas was more interested in the effect of the enhanced shoulders to pad and to frame. Likewise, a 1949 robe du soir dipped to a bouquet of silk camellias at the bust, but capped the shoulders and framed the face with a flaring lightness. In other instances, grand white collars performed the same role and in providing a sweet, portrait-like framing for the face.

In January of 1948, Women’s Wear Daily reported of Rochas, “this house is very modern but with the modernity which carries with it a tradition linking it with the fashion picture of the day. There is always an air of excitement in his collections which are designed to enhance the charm of women.” If Rochas’ anatomical obsession was the shoulder, his second favorite was the arm. He often embellished the sleeves in suits and coats, and his coats from the 1940s, which tended to be voluminous and drapey, were characterized by large sleeves. Loose blouson effects were more than carried over into the excess of sleeves as well as an interest in full backs.

Picken and Miller, in their book, Dressmakers of France (New York, 1956), stated, “Conscious of the changes in fashion, Rochas was the first to give up his heavy burden of the haute couture collections and to restrict his activities to his boutique which specializes not only in accessories, but also in separates.” Anticipating Cardin and the marketing orientation of fashion and beauty, Rochas was a visionary. Though his firm had quit creating fragrances during World War II, a separate company, Parfums Rochas S.A. was set up in 1945 to handle the burgeoning interest in perfumes.

Upon his death in 1955, Marcel Rochas had not fully achieved the synthesis of design and marketing that would become the dynamic of late 20th-century fashion, but he had more than proven himself one of its pioneers. His business was taken over by family members who concentrated on developing fragrances. The Rochas name became synonymous with intriguing and evocative fragrances for women and men throughout the next several decades. The company was acquired by the Darmstadt, Germany-based Wella AG in 1987, and went back into couture with the hiring of designer Peter O’Brien 1990. Rochas couture remained overshadowed by its ever-increasing fragrance line until the market was flooded with signature scents. At the dawn of the 21st century, however, Rochas was once seeking recognition for its apparel as it prepared to show a spring/summer 2001 collection by O’Brien.

—Richard Martin; updated by Sydonie Benét

RODIER

French fashion house

Founded: by Eugene Rodier, 1848. Company History: Entered ready-to-wear knit wear, 1956; U.S. subsidiary, Rodier USA set up and stores opened, from 1983; acquired by Paris-based Group Vev; began selling to department stores, 1995; hired designer Christophe Lebourg, 1996; new flagship store in New York, 1996; signed licensing deals with Pierre Lannier (watches), Royer SA (shoes), Renown Group (in-store boutiques in Japan), 1997; set up wholesale operations in U.S., 1998; signed licensing agreement with Bella Donna Group, 2001. Company Address: 44, Avenue Georges Pompidou, 92300 Levallois-Perret, France. Company Website: www.rodier.tm.fr.

PUBLICATIONS

On RODIER:

Articles

“French Clothier Picks Chief for Its Assault on the U.S.,” in the New York Times, 28 March 1988.

Edelson, Sharon, “Rodier Spices Up Lines with New Looks, and Plans for More Stores,” in WWD, 22 November 1994.

_____, “Rodier to Open Up its Distribution,” in WWD, 8 December 1995.

_____, “Rodier: One More Time in U.S.,” in WWD, 14 November 1996.

“Rodier Licenses Shops in Japan, Line of Watches,” in WWD, 19 June 1997.

Socha, Miles, “Rodier’s Modified American Plan,” in WWD, 2 September 1998.

“Ready-to-Wear Rodier Grants License to Egyptian-Lebanese Bella Donna Group,” in the European Report, 10 January 2001.

* * *

Long known for fine knits and woolen clothes, the House of Rodier continues a tradition which began when Eugene Rodier was commended by the Comte de Montaliner, Minister of the Interior under Napoleon. Rodier’s distinction was won by reinterpreting the shawls of Kashmir for the contemporary woman of the 1800s at home and abroad, making his contribution to French commerce as well as to the nascent fashion industry.

Eugene Rodier formally established the house in 1848. Under his direction, and later under the direction of his son Paul and grandson Jacques, the firm continued to produce inventive and experimental textiles, informed by a study of past traditions. A collection introduced in the early 1920s was inspired by the decorative arts of French colonial territories shown at the 1922 Exposition Nationale Coloniale

In 1942, five years before the Dior New Look, Rochas had offered a new corset to create the guépière, or wasp-waist, anticipating the return of the extreme femininity that enchanted him. Caroline Rennolds Milbank, writing in her book Couture: the Great Designers (New York, 1985), said Rochas and his skill were “characterized by a calculated originality.” Originality was very important for Rochas, if only as a sign of rights and attribute of value rather than of real creative initiative.

In the 1930s, he was already selling ready-to-wear and made-to-order clothes in his New York store. He claimed to have invented the word “slacks” in the early 1930s, along with originating the idea to include gray flannel slacks as part of a suit. In an era when women’s trousers were limited to extreme informality or recreation, Rochas trousers were highly advanced if not revolutionary. His clothing was not cautious, and for him “original” and “invention” were key words in the vocabulary of selling fashion.

The wide shoulders of the 1930s were created by several designers more or less simultaneously. He continuously played on the shoulders as a sign of the feminine—a fall-winter 1947 evening gown, for instance, invents broad shoulders through a capelet-like scarf attached to the bodice. Bolero jackets of the 1940s were lighter in construction than Balenciaga’s inspirations direct from Spain; Rochas was more interested in the effect of the enhanced shoulders to pad and to frame. Likewise, a 1949 robe du soir dipped to a bouquet of silk camellias at the bust, but capped the shoulders and framed the face with a flaring lightness. In other instances, grand white collars performed the same role and in providing a sweet, portrait-like framing for the face.

In January of 1948, Women’s Wear Daily reported of Rochas, “this house is very modern but with the modernity which carries with it a tradition linking it with the fashion picture of the day. There is always an air of excitement in his collections which are designed to enhance the charm of women.” If Rochas’ anatomical obsession was the shoulder, his second favorite was the arm. He often embellished the sleeves in suits and coats, and his coats from the 1940s, which tended to be voluminous and drapey, were characterized by large sleeves. Loose blouson effects were more than carried over into the excess of sleeves as well as an interest in full backs.

Picken and Miller, in their book, Dressmakers of France (New York, 1956), stated, “Conscious of the changes in fashion, Rochas was the first to give up his heavy burden of the haute couture collections and to restrict his activities to his boutique which specializes not only in accessories, but also in separates.” Anticipating Cardin and the marketing orientation of fashion and beauty, Rochas was a visionary. Though his firm had quit creating fragrances during World War II, a separate company, Parfums Rochas S.A. was set up in 1945 to handle the burgeoning interest in perfumes.

Upon his death in 1955, Marcel Rochas had not fully achieved the synthesis of design and marketing that would become the dynamic of late 20th-century fashion, but he had more than proven himself one of its pioneers. His business was taken over by family members who concentrated on developing fragrances. The Rochas name became synonymous with intriguing and evocative fragrances for women and men throughout the next several decades. The company was acquired by the Darmstadt, Germany-based Wella AG in 1987, and went back into couture with the hiring of designer Peter O’Brien 1990. Rochas couture remained overshadowed by its ever-increasing fragrance line until the market was flooded with signature scents. At the dawn of the 21st century, however, Rochas was once seeking recognition for its apparel as it prepared to show a spring/summer 2001 collection by O’Brien.

—Richard Martin; updated by Sydonie Benét

RODIER

French fashion house

Founded: by Eugene Rodier, 1848. Company History: Entered ready-to-wear knit wear, 1956; U.S. subsidiary, Rodier USA set up and stores opened, from 1983; acquired by Paris-based Group Vev; began selling to department stores, 1995; hired designer Christophe Lebourg, 1996; new flagship store in New York, 1996; signed licensing deals with Pierre Lannier (watches), Royer SA (shoes), Renown Group (in-store boutiques in Japan), 1997; set up wholesale operations in U.S., 1998; signed licensing agreement with Bella Donna Group, 2001. Company Address: 44, Avenue Georges Pompidou, 92300 Levallois-Perret, France. Company Website: www.rodier.tm.fr.

PUBLICATIONS

On RODIER:

Articles

“French Clothier Picks Chief for Its Assault on the U.S.,” in the New York Times, 28 March 1988.

Edelson, Sharon, “Rodier Spices Up Lines with New Looks, and Plans for More Stores,” in WWD, 22 November 1994.

_____, “Rodier to Open Up its Distribution,” in WWD, 8 December 1995.

_____, “Rodier: One More Time in U.S.,” in WWD, 14 November 1996.

“Rodier Licenses Shops in Japan, Line of Watches,” in WWD, 19 June 1997.

Socha, Miles, “Rodier’s Modified American Plan,” in WWD, 2 September 1998.

“Ready-to-Wear Rodier Grants License to Egyptian-Lebanese Bella Donna Group,” in the European Report, 10 January 2001.

* * *

Long known for fine knits and woolen clothes, the House of Rodier continues a tradition which began when Eugene Rodier was commended by the Comte de Montaliner, Minister of the Interior under Napoleon. Rodier’s distinction was won by reinterpreting the shawls of Kashmir for the contemporary woman of the 1800s at home and abroad, making his contribution to French commerce as well as to the nascent fashion industry.

Eugene Rodier formally established the house in 1848. Under his direction, and later under the direction of his son Paul and grandson Jacques, the firm continued to produce inventive and experimental textiles, informed by a study of past traditions. A collection introduced in the early 1920s was inspired by the decorative arts of French colonial territories shown at the 1922 Exposition Nationale Coloniale

de Marseilles. Rodier adapted and edited motifs from French Indo-China (Vietnam, Cambodia, and Laos) and from French Equatorial Africa (Tunisia, Algeria, and Morocco). These were woven into a series of soft, winter-white cloths of wool and cashmere in such a way that when the dress was made up, the motifs formed a border or band of trimming.

In the early part of the 20th century the Rodier mills developed such new fabrics as senellic, an early experiment in spun rayon, and the copyrighted Kasha, which remained a staple in their line. Perhaps the best known fabric developed by Rodier is the knitted jersey which Coco Chanel rescued from its warehouse oblivion in 1916. The combined visions of Jacques Rodier and Coco Chanel transformed a humble fabric, intended primarily for men's underwear, into a textile inextricably linked with 20th-century style.

During the 1920s and 1930s, Rodier was also associated with such couturiers as Jean Patou, for whom the firm produced new textures and distinctive colors of unusual depth and subtlety. According to his biographer Meredith Etherington Smith, Patou's expansion in the mid-1920s was partially financed by the Rodier family. It was also during the mid-1920s that the house expanded its range to include fabrics for interiors designed by such luminaries as Pablo Picasso.

For Rodier, the first function of the mill was to act as a laboratory for the production of new yarns, new textures, and above all inventive designs reflecting the spirit of their age. Paul Rodier and his family were not only master weavers, but artists and editors. As such, they naturally studied the arts of the past and kept current with contemporary movements in painting, ballet, and anything else which might provide inspiration for their hand-operated looms. Rodier entered the ready-to-wear field in 1956 with a collection of fine knitwear.

Rodier rarely changed its design sensibilities, other than expanding into different areas, such as coats and accessories. Collections in the 1990s centered around color-related separates for women in distinctive patterns, rich colors, and with fine detailing, continuing Rodier's tradition of excellence. Buyers in the U.S. were given more opportunity to buy such clothes when Rodier began selling its products to high-end specialty stores and department stores in 1995, in addition to the dozen firm-owned boutiques nationwide and stores in over 20 countries worldwide. In revamping its image, Rodier hired Christophe Lebourg, who had worked with GFT Group, Joseph, and Claude Montana, as its new designer in 1996 and closed its store Fifth Avenue in New York to make way for a new flagship store at Rockefeller Center. Similarly styled stores were planned for Chicago, Beverly Hills, and San Francisco.

As the century came to a close, Rodier had restructured its operations with high hopes for the future. Part of its new focus was on bringing wholesale operations to the U.S. and boosting brand awareness through several licensing agreements. Pierre Lannier, in its first licensing deal, signed on to produce Rodier watches; Royer SA began manufacturing shoes; the Tokyo-based Renown Group was slated to open over 200 in-store Rodier boutiques in Japan from 1998 through 2002. In addition, Rodier and the Egyptian-Lebanese fashion firm Bella Donna Group inked a deal in 2001 for apparel and accessories.

—Whitney Blausen; updated by updated by Sydonie Benét

RODRÍGUEZ CARO, José Victor

See VICTORIO Y LUCCHINO

ROEHM, Carolyne

American designer

Born: Jane Carolyne Smith in Kirksville, Missouri, 7 May 1951.

Education: Graduated from Washington University, St. Louis, 1973.

Family: Married Axel Roehm, 1978 (divorced, 1981); married Henry Kravis, 1985 (divorced). Career: Designer, Mrs. sportswear by Kellwood Co. for Sears, Roebuck & Co., circa 1973; designer, Oscar de la Renta licensees, including Miss "O" line, New York, 1974–84; launched own deluxe ready-to-wear firm, New York, 1985, added couture line, 1988, footwear, 1989, closed house, 1991; launched mail order clothing, accessories, and gift collection, 1993, with related in-store boutiques at Saks Fifth Avenue, closed business again, 1994; president, Council of Fashion Designers of America, 1989. Awards: Pratt Institute award, 1991. Address: 550 7th Avenue, New York, NY 10018, USA.

PUBLICATIONS

By ROEHM:

Books

A Passion for Flowers, New York, 1997.

Summer Notebook: Garden Hearth Traditions Home, New York, 1999.

Carolyne Roehm's Fall Notebook, with Alan Richardson (Photographer), New York, 1999.

Carolyne Roehm's Winter Notebook: Garden Hearth Traditions Home, New York, 1999.

Spring Notebook: Garden Hearth Traditions Home, with Melissa Davis, New York, 2000.

Seasonal Notebooks: Summer, Fall, Winter, Spring, New York, 2000.

At Home With Carolyne Roehm, New York, 2001.

On ROEHM:

Books

Milbank, Caroline Rennolds, New York Fashion: The Evolution of American Style, New York, 1989.

Steele, Valerie, Women of Fashion: Twentieth Century Designers, New York, 1991.

Stegemeyer, Anne, Who's Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.

Articles

Kornbluth, Jesse, "The Working Rich: The Real Slaves of New York," in New York, January 1986.

Jobey, Liz, "Vogue's Spy: Carolyne Roehm," in Vogue (London), September 1987.

Gross, Michael, "Roehm's Forum," in New York, 7 November 1988.

Mehle, Aileen, and Karen Radkai, "Carolyne Roehm: An Opulent Aesthetic for the Designer's Manhattan Residence," in Architectural Digest, September 1989.

Menkes, Suzy, "Couture's Grand Ladies," in the Illustrated London News, Spring 1990.

"Those Gilded Moments..." in Esquire (Special Issue), June 1990.

Howell, Georgina, "Roehm's Empire," in Vogue (New York), August 1990.

de Marseilles. Rodier adapted and edited motifs from French Indo-China (Vietnam, Cambodia, and Laos) and from French Equatorial Africa (Tunisia, Algeria, and Morocco). These were woven into a series of soft, winter-white cloths of wool and cashmere in such a way that when the dress was made up, the motifs formed a border or band of trimming.

In the early part of the 20th century the Rodier mills developed such new fabrics as senellic, an early experiment in spun rayon, and the copyrighted Kasha, which remained a staple in their line. Perhaps the best known fabric developed by Rodier is the knitted jersey which Coco Chanel rescued from its warehouse oblivion in 1916. The combined visions of Jacques Rodier and Coco Chanel transformed a humble fabric, intended primarily for men's underwear, into a textile inextricably linked with 20th-century style.

During the 1920s and 1930s, Rodier was also associated with such couturiers as Jean Patou, for whom the firm produced new textures and distinctive colors of unusual depth and subtlety. According to his biographer Meredith Etherington Smith, Patou's expansion in the mid-1920s was partially financed by the Rodier family. It was also during the mid-1920s that the house expanded its range to include fabrics for interiors designed by such luminaries as Pablo Picasso.

For Rodier, the first function of the mill was to act as a laboratory for the production of new yarns, new textures, and above all inventive designs reflecting the spirit of their age. Paul Rodier and his family were not only master weavers, but artists and editors. As such, they naturally studied the arts of the past and kept current with contemporary movements in painting, ballet, and anything else which might provide inspiration for their hand-operated looms. Rodier entered the ready-to-wear field in 1956 with a collection of fine knitwear.

Rodier rarely changed its design sensibilities, other than expanding into different areas, such as coats and accessories. Collections in the 1990s centered around color-related separates for women in distinctive patterns, rich colors, and with fine detailing, continuing Rodier's tradition of excellence. Buyers in the U.S. were given more opportunity to buy such clothes when Rodier began selling its products to high-end specialty stores and department stores in 1995, in addition to the dozen firm-owned boutiques nationwide and stores in over 20 countries worldwide. In revamping its image, Rodier hired Christophe Lebourg, who had worked with GFT Group, Joseph, and Claude Montana, as its new designer in 1996 and closed its store Fifth Avenue in New York to make way for a new flagship store at Rockefeller Center. Similarly styled stores were planned for Chicago, Beverly Hills, and San Francisco.

As the century came to a close, Rodier had restructured its operations with high hopes for the future. Part of its new focus was on bringing wholesale operations to the U.S. and boosting brand awareness through several licensing agreements. Pierre Lannier, in its first licensing deal, signed on to produce Rodier watches; Royer SA began manufacturing shoes; the Tokyo-based Renown Group was slated to open over 200 in-store Rodier boutiques in Japan from 1998 through 2002. In addition, Rodier and the Egyptian-Lebanese fashion firm Bella Donna Group inked a deal in 2001 for apparel and accessories.

—Whitney Blausen; updated by updated by Sydonie Benét

RODRÍGUEZ CARO, José Victor

See VICTORIO Y LUCCHINO

ROEHM, Carolyne

American designer

Born: Jane Carolyne Smith in Kirksville, Missouri, 7 May 1951.

Education: Graduated from Washington University, St. Louis, 1973.

Family: Married Axel Roehm, 1978 (divorced, 1981); married Henry Kravis, 1985 (divorced). Career: Designer, Mrs. sportswear by Kellwood Co. for Sears, Roebuck & Co., circa 1973; designer, Oscar de la Renta licensees, including Miss "O" line, New York, 1974–84; launched own deluxe ready-to-wear firm, New York, 1985, added couture line, 1988, footwear, 1989, closed house, 1991; launched mail order clothing, accessories, and gift collection, 1993, with related in-store boutiques at Saks Fifth Avenue, closed business again, 1994; president, Council of Fashion Designers of America, 1989. Awards: Pratt Institute award, 1991. Address: 550 7th Avenue, New York, NY 10018, USA.

PUBLICATIONS

By ROEHM:

Books

A Passion for Flowers, New York, 1997.

Summer Notebook: Garden Hearth Traditions Home, New York, 1999.

Carolyne Roehm's Fall Notebook, with Alan Richardson (Photographer), New York, 1999.

Carolyne Roehm's Winter Notebook: Garden Hearth Traditions Home, New York, 1999.

Spring Notebook: Garden Hearth Traditions Home, with Melissa Davis, New York, 2000.

Seasonal Notebooks: Summer, Fall, Winter, Spring, New York, 2000.

At Home With Carolyne Roehm, New York, 2001.

On ROEHM:

Books

Milbank, Caroline Rennolds, New York Fashion: The Evolution of American Style, New York, 1989.

Steele, Valerie, Women of Fashion: Twentieth Century Designers, New York, 1991.

Stegemeyer, Anne, Who's Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.

Articles

Kornbluth, Jesse, "The Working Rich: The Real Slaves of New York," in New York, January 1986.

Jobey, Liz, "Vogue's Spy: Carolyne Roehm," in Vogue (London), September 1987.

Gross, Michael, "Roehm's Forum," in New York, 7 November 1988.

Mehle, Aileen, and Karen Radkai, "Carolyne Roehm: An Opulent Aesthetic for the Designer's Manhattan Residence," in Architectural Digest, September 1989.

Menkes, Suzy, "Couture's Grand Ladies," in the Illustrated London News, Spring 1990.

"Those Gilded Moments..." in Esquire (Special Issue), June 1990.

Howell, Georgina, "Roehm's Empire," in Vogue (New York), August 1990.

- "The Designers Talk Passion, Whimsy and Picassos," in ARTnews (New York), September 1990.
- "End of a Dream," in Time, 23 September 1991.
- "Carolyne Roehm," in Current Biography, February 1992.
- Ginsberg, Merle, "Henry and Carolyne Hit Hollywood," in WWD, 28 May 1992.
- Norwich, William, "Roehm's Return," in Vogue, March 1993.
- _____, "The Roehm Report," in Vogue, December 1993.
- Bowles, Hamish, "Paris and Roehm," in Vogue, June 1996.
- "In Full Flower," (interview) in Vogue, October 1997.
- Mehle, Aileen, "Carolyne Roehm in Manhattan: The Fashion Designer's Rooms on Sutton Place," in Architectural Digest, December 1997.

* * *

Carolyne Roehm is an American designer who created clothes for men to love and women to find flattering. She is a person with a passion for designing beautiful, feminine clothes in luxurious materials, who took great care with the details. She opened the doors of her own ready-to-wear and couture design firm in 1985, only to close them six years later.

Designing clothes was a lifelong passion for Jane Carolyne Smith Roehm. After studying fashion design at Washington University, she spent a year designing polyester sportswear for Kellwood Co., a supplier for Sears, before working for Oscar de la Renta, holding pins and serving as his fitting model. She learned the details of classic couture from him and later designed the Miss "O" line. After 10 years with de la Renta, she formed her own design firm known as Carolyne Roehm, Inc.

Roehm designed for women, like herself, who had money and an active life, involved with benefits and social events, but who might also work outside the home. She is known for well-detailed, finely constructed, feminine clothes created to make women feel elegant. Fabrics were rich: cashmere, satin, velvet, and suede. Details might include trapunto stitching, embroidery, or leather trim. Roehm's eveningwear was glamorous, fairytale-like, to be seen in at social occasions and photographed at charity events. The dresses could be cut full and made of rich fabrics, reminiscent of those worn in the aristocratic portraits of the artist Franz Winterhalter, or sleek, sensuous columns recalling John Singer Sargent's Madame X. Although best known for her glamorous eveningwear, half of her design work was in everyday wear. She created sporty separates, dresses, coats, hats, and shoes. In all circumstances, Roehm's design work was known for quality and fit. She was numbered among the working rich; her second husband, Henry Kravis, financed her design firm before they were married. After their marriage she certainly didn't have to work, but she was driven. She designed her collections and used her organizational skills to support charity events. As president of the Council of Fashion Designers of America, Roehm guided the organization as it became a major supporter of AIDS research. She also served as her own fitting model and appeared in her own advertising campaigns.

In 1991 after the death of stepson, Roehm closed her design business. Afterwards she maintained a small office and staff, creating a mail-order business, produced an exclusive catalogue for Saks Fifth Avenue, and designed clothes for private customers. In 1994, despite her success with Saks, Roehm again closed her business.

In the late 1990s Roehm turned from fashion to flowers and began publishing a number of books on flower arranging and garden design.

Her first, A Passion for Flowers, instructs the reader on arranging flowers in a way to accentuate their beauty. She organizes flowers by season, to make the reader aware that flowers can be enjoyed at any time of the year. Roehm has also written a series of "Notebooks," one for each season of the year. Each book comes with graph paper, pockets for notes or clippings, tips for flower arranging, recipes, and photographs. Roehm includes projects and decorating ideas for seasonal holidays in the books as well. It remains to be seen whether Roehm will return to glamorous, feminine clothing she so beautifully designed in the past.

—Nancy House; updated by Andrew Cunningham

RONCHI, Ermanno

See ERREUNO SCM SpA

ROTH, Christian Francis

American designer

Born: New York City, 12 February 1969. Education: Special student, Fashion Institute of Technology, New York, 1986–87; studied fashion design at Parsons School of Design, New York, 1987–88. Family: Married; children: two daughters. Career: Apprentice, later employee, of Koos Van den Akker; produced first small collection in Van den Akker studio, 1988; showed first full collection, 1990; closed couture business, 1995; initiated bridge designs with backing of Equal 4 Inc., 1995. Awards: Honoree, Cotton Inc. "Celebration of American Style" show; Council of Fashion Designers of America Perry Ellis award, 1990. Address: 18 East 17th Street, New York, NY 10003, USA.

PUBLICATIONS

On ROTH:

Books

Martin, Richard, and Harold Koda, Infra-Apparel, New York, 1993.
Stegemeyer, Anne, Who's Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.

Articles

Chua, Lawrence, "Christian Francis Roth," in WWD, 27 June 1989.
"A New York Upstart Puts a Smile on the Face of Fashion," in People Weekly, 30 October 1989.
Brubach, Holly, [fashion column] in the New Yorker, 29 January 1990.
Starzinger, Page Hill, "New Faces," in Vogue (New York), March 1990.
"Word is Out: SA [Seventh Avenue] Has a New Boy Wonder," in WWD, 10 April 1990.
Buck, Genevieve, "New Designer is Creating a Stir with His Quirky, Kid-Stuff Collection," in Chicago Tribune, 1 July 1990.
Boucher, Vincent, "The New Youthquake," in Vogue (New York), September 1990.

- "The Designers Talk Passion, Whimsy and Picassos," in ARTnews (New York), September 1990.
- "End of a Dream," in Time, 23 September 1991.
- "Carolyne Roehm," in Current Biography, February 1992.
- Ginsberg, Merle, "Henry and Carolyne Hit Hollywood," in WWD, 28 May 1992.
- Norwich, William, "Roehm's Return," in Vogue, March 1993.
- _____, "The Roehm Report," in Vogue, December 1993.
- Bowles, Hamish, "Paris and Roehm," in Vogue, June 1996.
- "In Full Flower," (interview) in Vogue, October 1997.
- Mehle, Aileen, "Carolyne Roehm in Manhattan: The Fashion Designer's Rooms on Sutton Place," in Architectural Digest, December 1997.

* * *

Carolyne Roehm is an American designer who created clothes for men to love and women to find flattering. She is a person with a passion for designing beautiful, feminine clothes in luxurious materials, who took great care with the details. She opened the doors of her own ready-to-wear and couture design firm in 1985, only to close them six years later.

Designing clothes was a lifelong passion for Jane Carolyne Smith Roehm. After studying fashion design at Washington University, she spent a year designing polyester sportswear for Kellwood Co., a supplier for Sears, before working for Oscar de la Renta, holding pins and serving as his fitting model. She learned the details of classic couture from him and later designed the Miss "O" line. After 10 years with de la Renta, she formed her own design firm known as Carolyne Roehm, Inc.

Roehm designed for women, like herself, who had money and an active life, involved with benefits and social events, but who might also work outside the home. She is known for well-detailed, finely constructed, feminine clothes created to make women feel elegant. Fabrics were rich: cashmere, satin, velvet, and suede. Details might include trapunto stitching, embroidery, or leather trim. Roehm's eveningwear was glamorous, fairytale-like, to be seen in at social occasions and photographed at charity events. The dresses could be cut full and made of rich fabrics, reminiscent of those worn in the aristocratic portraits of the artist Franz Winterhalter, or sleek, sensuous columns recalling John Singer Sargent's Madame X. Although best known for her glamorous eveningwear, half of her design work was in everyday wear. She created sporty separates, dresses, coats, hats, and shoes. In all circumstances, Roehm's design work was known for quality and fit. She was numbered among the working rich; her second husband, Henry Kravis, financed her design firm before they were married. After their marriage she certainly didn't have to work, but she was driven. She designed her collections and used her organizational skills to support charity events. As president of the Council of Fashion Designers of America, Roehm guided the organization as it became a major supporter of AIDS research. She also served as her own fitting model and appeared in her own advertising campaigns.

In 1991 after the death of stepson, Roehm closed her design business. Afterwards she maintained a small office and staff, creating a mail-order business, produced an exclusive catalogue for Saks Fifth Avenue, and designed clothes for private customers. In 1994, despite her success with Saks, Roehm again closed her business.

In the late 1990s Roehm turned from fashion to flowers and began publishing a number of books on flower arranging and garden design.

Her first, A Passion for Flowers, instructs the reader on arranging flowers in a way to accentuate their beauty. She organizes flowers by season, to make the reader aware that flowers can be enjoyed at any time of the year. Roehm has also written a series of "Notebooks," one for each season of the year. Each book comes with graph paper, pockets for notes or clippings, tips for flower arranging, recipes, and photographs. Roehm includes projects and decorating ideas for seasonal holidays in the books as well. It remains to be seen whether Roehm will return to glamorous, feminine clothing she so beautifully designed in the past.

—Nancy House; updated by Andrew Cunningham

RONCHI, Ermanno

See ERREUNO SCM SpA

ROTH, Christian Francis

American designer

Born: New York City, 12 February 1969. Education: Special student, Fashion Institute of Technology, New York, 1986–87; studied fashion design at Parsons School of Design, New York, 1987–88. Family: Married; children: two daughters. Career: Apprentice, later employee, of Koos Van den Akker; produced first small collection in Van den Akker studio, 1988; showed first full collection, 1990; closed couture business, 1995; initiated bridge designs with backing of Equal 4 Inc., 1995. Awards: Honoree, Cotton Inc. "Celebration of American Style" show; Council of Fashion Designers of America Perry Ellis award, 1990. Address: 18 East 17th Street, New York, NY 10003, USA.

PUBLICATIONS

On ROTH:

Books

Martin, Richard, and Harold Koda, Infra-Apparel, New York, 1993.
Stegemeyer, Anne, Who's Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.

Articles

Chua, Lawrence, "Christian Francis Roth," in WWD, 27 June 1989.
"A New York Upstart Puts a Smile on the Face of Fashion," in People Weekly, 30 October 1989.
Brubach, Holly, [fashion column] in the New Yorker, 29 January 1990.
Starzinger, Page Hill, "New Faces," in Vogue (New York), March 1990.
"Word is Out: SA [Seventh Avenue] Has a New Boy Wonder," in WWD, 10 April 1990.
Buck, Genevieve, "New Designer is Creating a Stir with His Quirky, Kid-Stuff Collection," in Chicago Tribune, 1 July 1990.
Boucher, Vincent, "The New Youthquake," in Vogue (New York), September 1990.

- Shaw, Daniel, "New Kid on the Block," in Avenue (New York), September 1990.
- Morris, Bernadine, "Two Young Designers Decorate Their Clothes with Wit," in the New York Times, 27 November 1990.
- "Card Company Says Designer Went Out of Line in Using Crayola Motif," in Chicago Tribune, 5 December 1990.
- "Great Expectations," in WWD, 12 June 1991.
- Coffin, David Page, "Stitching Fabric Puzzles," in Threads (Newtown, Connecticut), June/July 1992.
- "Arts and Crafts," in WWD, 1 September 1992.
- White, Ken, "New York Designer Making His Lighthearted Designs More Affordable," in the Las Vegas Review-Journal, 22 April 1997.

* * *

In 1990, a week after his first show and at the young age of 21, Christian Francis Roth was heralded by Women's Wear Daily as Seventh Avenue's latest boy wonder. Acclaim came stiflingly early for Roth; Vanity Fair had already photographed Roth with his ingenious dress-form dress (now in the collection of the Metropolitan Museum of Art) in August 1989 and in the New Yorker of January 1990, Holly Brubach proclaimed of Roth's designs, "These clothes would look first-rate in Paris or Milan or Timbuktu. It is already too late to call him promising. There is, in his clothes, nothing more to wait for." Such immoderate and unanimous praise could only be withering to many young artists, but Christian Francis Roth earned the adulation and has only gone on to warrant further accolades.

Yet after the last hurrah and congratulations, there is the designer who works as a consummate technician in a tightly circumscribed aesthetic. He reaches not for the gold ring of commercial success and recognition like other designers, but instead for a level of virtuosity and quiet quality in his work. Roth is an artist as evidenced by his vocabulary of forms conversant with such artistic elements as Surrealist trompe l'oeil, used in the dress-form dress (1989) and his wool jersey dress with illusionistic inset collar, cuffs, and belt (1991). Pop Art-derived concepts from consumer culture are represented in the spring 1990 Cartoon collection featuring daffy squiggles and suits with buttons looking as though they were spilled out of M & M candy bags.

Roth's breakfast suit (1990) breaks some eggs and prepares them sunny-side up, while his "Rothola" crayon outfits play with the children's toy for making art, and his scribbles and pencil-shaving skirt and jacket provide the means for artistic delineation. His 1990–91 wrought-iron (or, as he says, "Roth-iron") fence dress (also a jacket and jumpsuit) was partly indebted to the artist Jim Dine, while the dollar bill dress, which wraps the body in oversized bills, owes more than a buck to Andy Warhol. His spring/summer 1991 collection included a suite of brilliantly colored dresses inspired by Matisse's découpages.

While Roth's whimsical and artsy clothing was a hit with women, not everyone was amused with his creative borrowings. In late 1990 Hallmark Cards Inc., which owned Crayola, threatened to sue the designer for trademark infringement. Hallmark's unhappiness was two-fold: not only had Roth appropriated the trademarked Crayola crayon design, but the company had plans for its own clothing line through mail-order giant Speigel. Although the Speigel Crayola clothing was intended for young children, the companies felt Roth's designs were too close to their own intended collection. Roth disfused the imbroglio by agreeing to become a licensee and pay fees for the Caryola/Rothola motifs.

Admitting such debts did not diminish Roth's luster and originality, however, for each artistic enterprise is different, and Roth has scrupulously chosen to take from art only what he accommodates to the construction of clothing. His inlaid panels, sometimes compared to the finest marquetry, are a skilled fabrication in the pattern of the garment. While some fashion designers have sought to poach on art's prestige and to steal some aesthetic thunder, Roth has committed only the most discriminating larceny, flattering both art and fashion. His concern in integrating scribbles into the form of a garment is more integral to his medium than the cartoon appropriations of Pop Art. When he brings Matisse's cutouts to dressmaking, he does so not as surface decoration, but as pattern pieces to create the three-dimensional shape of the garment.

Roth's small collections were likewise developed with the concentration and formal intensity of musical form. His fall 1992 collection studied menswear. The lyrical spring 1992 collections included cocktail dresses that set up a 1950s bar and became the drinks themselves as well as a black cotton sateen dress with a diamond ring homage to Marilyn Monroe. In fall/winter 1991, his principal studies were Amish quilts which Roth translated from the spiral concentricity of flat quilt patterns into the piecing of dresses and circle skirts. Combining some techniques of color blocks with the rich harmonies of American quilts, the collection emphasized Roth's handmade warmth and beauty. Accompanying the quilt patterns, Roth provided a congenial coterie of hoboes in a trickle-up theory of fashion for clients not accustomed to a trackside way of life.

In the 1990s Roth changed his tune, closing his couture business in favor of lower-priced clothing. He told Ken White of the Las Vegas Review-Journal, "I just didn't think it was worth doing anymore." Roth further explained that the high-end couture collections were not a prime moneymaker. "Not that money has ever been my motivation to do what I do, but there comes a time [when] you make a career on what has been a successful craft for you. So, I more or less put the word out that I was interested in a different kind of situation." This new "situation" has been designing bridge clothes for young women and teens with a lower price tag, usually more than half the cost of his previous collections. The sweaters, skirts, pants, and shirts, still colorful and lighthearted, are sold in department stores.

Having matured and reached his 30s in the new century, Roth is still as quirky and fresh in his designs as when he vaulted to the top echelons of fashion barely into his 20s. Though he gave up the couture lifestyle and even settled into fatherhood, he still thinks fashion should be fun and functional. "You're in charge of your own destiny.... You have to make it work for yourself," he told White of the Las Vegas Review-Journal in 1997. "As long as you make great clothes, there's really nothing that can go wrong, particularly. It's always nice to have a good backer, a good situation, good promotion and merchandising. But that all comes from making nice clothes. I believe if you make beautiful things, people are going to want to get behind you."

Like Geoffrey Beene, whom he admires, Roth is an American designer of extravagant gift who has chosen the almost scholastic life of precious technician and exacting artist. Dubbed the "next Franco Moschino" or the "Schiaparelli of the '90s," Roth has worked with the unceasing patience and the quest of an artist to achieve in measure and modesty what others cannot attain in magnitude.

—Richard Martin; updated by Nelly Rhodes

ROUFF, Maggy

French designer

Born: Maggie Besançon de Wagner in Paris, 1896. Career: Designer for company owned by parents, Drécoll; own house opened, 1929, specializing in sportswear and lingerie; retired, 1948; daughter, Anne-Marie, took over; retired, 1960; house turned briefly to ready-to-wear; closed, 1960s. Awards: Chevalier de la Légion d'Honneur; Conseilleuse du Commerce Exterieur. Died: 7 August 1971, in Paris.

PUBLICATIONS

By ROUFF:

Books

Ce que j'ai vu en chiffonnant la clientèle, Paris, 1938.
La philosophie de l'elegance, Paris, 1942.
L'Amérique vue au microscope, Paris, circa 1948.

On ROUFF:

Books

Latour, Anny, Kings of Fashion, London, 1958.
 Milbank, Caroline Rennolds, Couture: The Great Designers, New York, 1980.
 Steele, Valerie, Women of Fashion, New York, 1991.

* * *

Harmony and simplicity were cornerstones of Maggy Rouff's belief in elegance as a way of life, and the way of fashion. A truly elegant woman was in harmony with her environment and herself, and to Rouff this meant being properly dressed for every occasion. Even in her early work at Drécoll in Paris, Rouff addressed a basic longing in the relationship between many women and their clothes. Patrons of her salon were secure in the knowledge that they would emerge with the right clothes, clothes that were fashionable, flattering, and appropriate. This did not mean she was conservative; rather, she believed novelty, and even surprise, were good for fashion. Novelty when allied with taste yielded chic, but novelty without taste was only eccentric.

As a result, a Rouff design considered "too much" was rare. She took care to establish a focal point in every costume. An evening gown in which the skirt was trimmed with a crossover hip wrap and little side puffs had simply-cut sleeves and bodice. Afternoon dresses with plain skirts might have an asymmetrical cowl neckline with a jeweled clip at one side, or a platter collar and shaped belt in a contrasting color. She enriched some surfaces with shirring, quilting, or trapunto, as in her 1936 "plus four" playsuit and 1938 button-quilted evening dress, but very lush fabrics and furs were handled in accordance with her less-is-more philosophy.

Common themes ran through Rouff's designs, always enhancing the underlying sense of femininity. She had a fondness for draped details, whether the sarong-like side drape of a skirt panel or soft cowl folds at the neckline. Rouff often highlighted the upper body, drawing attention toward the face with a few favorite devices such as wrapped and tied surplice fronts, unusual necklines, and dramatic sleeves. Accents were important: belts and sashes were wide, buttons were bold, silk flowers were substantial, yet somehow they were always in proportion. Contrasts of color, texture, or luster were also used as accents, and with the same sense of balance.

Historical allusions were frequent, but true to her beliefs she used historicism as a tool and not a crutch. The Directoire collection she showed in 1936 was striking for its theme, with variations on cutaway and frock coats turning up in corduroy with a bias-cut plaid skirt, in printed floral shantung with a black crêpe skirt, and in velvet with a wool skirt and an oversized watch chain pocket detail. Usually her references to the past were less direct, perhaps expressed in gigot sleeves, or apron and bustle effects.

In 1942 while Paris was occupied by German troops, Rouff wrote La Philosophie de L'Elegance. Her justification for what might have been considered in such circumstances a frivolous topic, was her belief that even in darkest times there must be faith in the future. An intelligent woman who had already lived through one world war, she could not help but understand that a different world than the one she had known would emerge from the second. Her book was, in a sense, an affirmation of the value and substance which the arts of elegance had given to her life and her success. Within the framework of her expertise—fashion—Rouff gave her readers a thread to tie the future to the past.

Rouff's daughter, Anne-Marie Besançon de Wagner, took over the designing upon her mother's retirement in 1948. The house maintained the attitudes toward dress it had always expressed, and the clothes were still elegant and feminine. For the first few years she was inclined to overdo, and some designs seem to have been fussy or hard-edged. As the 1950s progressed, however, she found her own sense of focus and greater sureness of line. Particularly beautiful were her full-skirted organdy evening and cocktail dresses from 1952 and a group of short, bouffant gowns with floor-length trains from 1959. Engaging day ensembles included, from 1953, a sleek tweed sheath with standaway cornucopia-shaped pockets at the bust and from 1952, a fur-trimmed swing coat worn over a pleated wool dress belted at the waist.

The house of Maggy Rouff did not survive the make-or-break period of the 1960s. Three designers worked for the house in the 1960s, during which time the business was transformed into a ready-to-wear house. The collections seem to have been aimed at a younger customer, but the original precepts of the house may have made it difficult to become established with a clientèle more interested in the pursuit of youth than the pursuit of elegance. The company was closed before Rouff's death in 1971.

—Madelyn Shaw

ROWLEY, Cynthia

American designer

Born: Barrington, Illinois, 29 July 1958. Education: Studied art at Arizona State University, graduated from the Art Institute of Chicago, 1981. Family: Married Tom Sullivan, 1988 (died, 1994). Career:

ROUFF, Maggy

French designer

Born: Maggie Besançon de Wagner in Paris, 1896. Career: Designer for company owned by parents, Drécoll; own house opened, 1929, specializing in sportswear and lingerie; retired, 1948; daughter, Anne-Marie, took over; retired, 1960; house turned briefly to ready-to-wear; closed, 1960s. Awards: Chevalier de la Légion d'Honneur; Conseilleuse du Commerce Exterieur. Died: 7 August 1971, in Paris.

PUBLICATIONS

By ROUFF:

Books

Ce que j'ai vu en chiffonnant la clientèle, Paris, 1938.
La philosophie de l'elegance, Paris, 1942.
L'Amérique vue au microscope, Paris, circa 1948.

On ROUFF:

Books

Latour, Anny, Kings of Fashion, London, 1958.
 Milbank, Caroline Rennolds, Couture: The Great Designers, New York, 1980.
 Steele, Valerie, Women of Fashion, New York, 1991.

* * *

Harmony and simplicity were cornerstones of Maggy Rouff's belief in elegance as a way of life, and the way of fashion. A truly elegant woman was in harmony with her environment and herself, and to Rouff this meant being properly dressed for every occasion. Even in her early work at Drécoll in Paris, Rouff addressed a basic longing in the relationship between many women and their clothes. Patrons of her salon were secure in the knowledge that they would emerge with the right clothes, clothes that were fashionable, flattering, and appropriate. This did not mean she was conservative; rather, she believed novelty, and even surprise, were good for fashion. Novelty when allied with taste yielded chic, but novelty without taste was only eccentric.

As a result, a Rouff design considered "too much" was rare. She took care to establish a focal point in every costume. An evening gown in which the skirt was trimmed with a crossover hip wrap and little side puffs had simply-cut sleeves and bodice. Afternoon dresses with plain skirts might have an asymmetrical cowl neckline with a jeweled clip at one side, or a platter collar and shaped belt in a contrasting color. She enriched some surfaces with shirring, quilting, or trapunto, as in her 1936 "plus four" playsuit and 1938 button-quilted evening dress, but very lush fabrics and furs were handled in accordance with her less-is-more philosophy.

Common themes ran through Rouff's designs, always enhancing the underlying sense of femininity. She had a fondness for draped details, whether the sarong-like side drape of a skirt panel or soft cowl folds at the neckline. Rouff often highlighted the upper body, drawing attention toward the face with a few favorite devices such as wrapped and tied surplice fronts, unusual necklines, and dramatic sleeves. Accents were important: belts and sashes were wide, buttons were bold, silk flowers were substantial, yet somehow they were always in proportion. Contrasts of color, texture, or luster were also used as accents, and with the same sense of balance.

Historical allusions were frequent, but true to her beliefs she used historicism as a tool and not a crutch. The Directoire collection she showed in 1936 was striking for its theme, with variations on cutaway and frock coats turning up in corduroy with a bias-cut plaid skirt, in printed floral shantung with a black crêpe skirt, and in velvet with a wool skirt and an oversized watch chain pocket detail. Usually her references to the past were less direct, perhaps expressed in gigot sleeves, or apron and bustle effects.

In 1942 while Paris was occupied by German troops, Rouff wrote La Philosophie de L'Elegance. Her justification for what might have been considered in such circumstances a frivolous topic, was her belief that even in darkest times there must be faith in the future. An intelligent woman who had already lived through one world war, she could not help but understand that a different world than the one she had known would emerge from the second. Her book was, in a sense, an affirmation of the value and substance which the arts of elegance had given to her life and her success. Within the framework of her expertise—fashion—Rouff gave her readers a thread to tie the future to the past.

Rouff's daughter, Anne-Marie Besançon de Wagner, took over the designing upon her mother's retirement in 1948. The house maintained the attitudes toward dress it had always expressed, and the clothes were still elegant and feminine. For the first few years she was inclined to overdo, and some designs seem to have been fussy or hard-edged. As the 1950s progressed, however, she found her own sense of focus and greater sureness of line. Particularly beautiful were her full-skirted organdy evening and cocktail dresses from 1952 and a group of short, bouffant gowns with floor-length trains from 1959. Engaging day ensembles included, from 1953, a sleek tweed sheath with standaway cornucopia-shaped pockets at the bust and from 1952, a fur-trimmed swing coat worn over a pleated wool dress belted at the waist.

The house of Maggy Rouff did not survive the make-or-break period of the 1960s. Three designers worked for the house in the 1960s, during which time the business was transformed into a ready-to-wear house. The collections seem to have been aimed at a younger customer, but the original precepts of the house may have made it difficult to become established with a clientèle more interested in the pursuit of youth than the pursuit of elegance. The company was closed before Rouff's death in 1971.

—Madelyn Shaw

ROWLEY, Cynthia

American designer

Born: Barrington, Illinois, 29 July 1958. Education: Studied art at Arizona State University, graduated from the Art Institute of Chicago, 1981. Family: Married Tom Sullivan, 1988 (died, 1994). Career:

Cynthia Rowley, spring 2001 collection: ensembled called "String Fever." © AP/Wide World Photos.

Senior at the Art Institute when she sold an 18-piece collection to Marshall Fields; moved to New York, 1983, incorporated business, 1988; designed costumes for dance troupes and films (including Three of Hearts and Dream Lover); produced shoes, ready-to-wear, sportswear, dresses; introduced line of girl's dresses, 1991; taught at Parsons School of Design, New York, 1992–93; critic, Fashion Institute of Technology, New York, 1992–94, and Marist College, New York, 1994; coauthored Swell: A Girl's Guide to the Good Life, 1995; opened Chicago store, 1995; opened Los Angeles store, 1996; signed licensing deal with Cheil Industries for Asia, 1996; introduced menswear, 1997; teamed up with Keds for shoe line, 1998; announced partnership with Pegasus Apparel Group, 2000. Exhibitions: Objects of Their Appreciation, Interart Center, New York, 1993; linen exhibition, Fashion Institute of Technology, New York, 1993; Dupont/Lycra exhibition, Fashion Institute of Technology, New York, 1994. Collections: Metropolitan Museum of Art Fashion Video Library, New York; Fashion Institute of Technology Permanent Collection, New York; Fashion Resource Center, Chicago Art Institute. Awards: New York Finalist, Entrepreneur of the Year, Forbes magazine, 1994; Council of Fashion Designers Perry Ellis award for New Fashion Talent, 1994. Address: 550 Seventh Avenue, 19th Floor, New York, NY, USA.

PUBLICATIONS

By ROWLEY:

Books

Swell: A Girl's Guide to the Good Life, with Ilene Rosenzweig, New York, 1999.

On ROWLEY:

Books

McBride, Mary, Wedding Dress, New York, 1993.

Bartlett, L., Feast for Life, Chicago, 1994.

Stegemeyer, Anne, Who's Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.

Articles

Finkelstein, Anita J., "Rowley Revs Up," in WWD, 6 January 1992.
"Cynthia Rowley Rises and Shines," in Mademoiselle, March 1992.
Goodman, Wendy, "Living with Style," in HG (New York), May 1992.

Levine, Lisbeth, "A Sense of Whimsy," in the Chicago Sun-Times, 3 May 1992.

Goodman, Wendy, "Fashion Designer Cynthia Rowley Serves Up 1940s Tablecloths...," in HG, May 1993.

Spindler, Amy M., "Fresh Talents Dish Up Tasty Design," in the New York Times, 5 November 1993.

Cawley, Janet, "Designer Makes Splash in New York," in the Chicago Tribune, January 1994.

Infantino, Vivian, "Rowley's Big Adventure," in Footwear News (New York), January 1994.

Trebay, Guy, "FTV," in Harper's Bazaar, August 1994.

Glusac, Elaine, "Rowley's Retail Homecoming," in WWD, 7 June 1995.

Ingrassia, Michele, "Dress for Success," in Newsweek, 13 November 1995.

Shae, Dan, "A Designer Original: Fashion Designer Cynthia Rowley," in Working Woman, March 1996.

Pogoda, Dianne M., "Rowley Expands in Asia," in WWD, 9 July 1996.

Anniss, Elisa, "Design Champion: Keds and Cynthia Rowley...," in Footwear News, 25 August 1997.

"Cynthia Rowley" in DNR, 3 August 1998.

Wilson, Eric, "Rowley's Aim for the Good Life" in WWD, 17 May 2001.

*

The underlying thing about my clothing is that I always think about a woman's shape. Sometimes it is a basic shape that everyone understands, but I try to make it a bit more fun. I definitely have a sense of whimsy with everything. I like clothes that are very feminine, but with an added twist. I also think a woman shouldn't have to spend a lot for great clothes; maybe it's my Midwestern practicality coming through, but I feel there's always a need for great dresses at good prices.

Cynthia Rowley, fall 2001 collection. © AP/Wide World Photos.

For me, inspiration is very personal. A lot of what I design is inspired by where I grew up. I often do a play on the classics: tiny crop twin sets, mixed-match plaids, and polo dresses. Like everyone growing up in the suburbs, television was my link to fashion coolness—it's where I got my first sense of glamor. My clothing reflects these classics but with wit and originality.

—Cynthia Rowley

* * *

Cynthia Rowley does not think clothes should be taken too seriously; nor does she believe style and individuality must necessarily go hand in hand with a high price tag. Rowley is known for a line of dresses that are charming, easily affordable, and utterly distinctive. This winning combination enabled her sales to double twice within three years during the mid-1990s while some of her better-known colleagues had to retrench.

Rowley's clothes reflect her well-developed sense of play. Drawing on shared and familiar elements of popular American culture, she elevates the mundane, rethinking and transforming the cliché to produce garments that arrest and amuse. Yet she is careful not to push a joke too far—her clothes, though with a sense of humor for daily use, are not novelty items to be quickly discarded. Instances of her quirky style include a long, snap-fronted sleeveless dress of quilted rayon and acetate satin worn over a matching ribbed cotton turtleneck for fall 1992, with a reference to the classic hunter's vest simultaneously reinforced and subverted by a six-pack of Budweiser slung low on the model's hip.

To commemorate the 100th anniversary of the bottle cap, Rowley scattered them across the front of a sleeveless cotton sweater, one half of a twin set with an eye-catching twist. Her spring 1993 collection included sundresses of classic red and white tablecloth checks, supported by straps made from plastic fruits and vegetables. "I definitely like to have a little sense of whimsy with everything," she said in a 1992 interview with the Chicago Sun-Times.

Rowley's more traditional dresses also incorporate styling elements not often seen at her end of the market. A halter dress becomes suitable for the office when cut from classic pinstripes and paired with a white shirt. She understands that the basics need not bore and that an imaginative dialogue between cut and fabric can produce distinctive clothing in any price range. She captured renewed attention in 1995, dubbed The Year of the Dress, for her feminine, fun to wear dresses. The Council of Fashion Designers awarded her the Perry Ellis award for New Fashion Talent in 1994, even though she had been in the business for 12 years.

Rowley's approachable collections move from down-to-earth casual to fanciful fun. In 2001, Rowley explored the popular interest in denim by presenting new shapes in puffed-sleeve dresses and also mixed jeans with dressier pieces. In her fall 2001 show, she produced a circus complete with mimes and jugglers and showed two-tone skirts and mismatched stockings. While always comfortable, Rowley's clothes can also be more sophisticated, like coordinated tailored jackets, skirts, and trousers or linen suits in 1998. Rowley designs dresses and sportswear and holds licensing arrangements for lingerie, coats, shoes, handbags, and other accessories. Her lines are sold in five company-owned stores in the U.S., department stores, and in-store boutiques in Japan.

For years, Rowley has been designing clothes for a woman with a carefree life loaded with style and bravado. In 1995 Rowley and friend Ilene Rosenzweig, a New York Times writer, packaged this ideal woman in their book Swell: A Girl's Guide to the Good Life. The popular book went through five printings and was translated into five languages. Rowley and Rosenzweig were preparing two sequels and making plans for a television spin-off. Rowley, of course, welcomes the opportunity to design the television wardrobes.

—Whitney Blausen; updated by Janette Goff Dixon

- Branzi, Andrea, The Hot House: Italian New Wave Design, London, 1984.
 Soli, Pia, Il Genio Antipatico, Milan, 1984.
 Manzini, Ezio, La Materia Dell'Invenzione, Milan, 1986.
 Martin, Richard, Fashion and Surrealism, New York, London, 1987.
 Soli, Pia, Pranzo alle 8, Milan, 1988.
 Yajima, Isao, Fashion Illustrators of Europe, Tokyo, 1989.
Contemporary Designers, Third Edition, Detroit, 1997.

Articles

- “Suggerioni Antoillogiche,” Il Giorno, 3 May 1998.
 Gandini, Manuela, “Ombre di Cinzia Ruggeri,” Il Sole 24 Ore, 31 May 1998.
 Muritti, Elisabetta, “Alice nel Paese della Post-Meraviglie,” Elle, June 1998.
 Davide, Paolini, “Ma il Grana e' in Galleria,” Il Sole 24 Ore, 21 June 1998.
 Piccoli, Cloe, “Specchi e Poltrone,” La Repubblica, 22 June 1998.
 Carloni, M. V., “Essere Dandy nel XXI Secolo,” Specchio della Stampa, 27 June 1998.
 “Cinzia Ruggeri,” available online at her company website, www.cinziaruggeri.com, October 2001.

* * *

Following her studies in the applied arts at the Accademia delle Arti Applicate in Milan, Cinzia Ruggeri obtained a position in the atelier of Carven in Paris. On her return to Italy, she served as director of design for the ready-to-wear firm of Unimac SpA, owned by her father, Guido Ruggeri, and based in Milan.

The Ruggeri firm was founded in 1963 and ceased operations in 1975. It had been controlled by the family and, under the label Guido Ruggeri, produced women's suits and coats. Unimac SpA was one of the foremost manufacturers in the booming Italian ready-to-wear industry of the 1960s. Signor Ruggeri and his daughter integrated the artisan's aesthetics and sartorial traditions with new techniques of production and distribution. During the 1960s, radical changes were occurring in the Italian garment industry. Good design, improved manufacturing methods, and competition diminished the pervasive antipathy to mass production. New ideas and reorganization were fused in collaborative efforts between manufacturer and small but specialized companies.

Around 1966, Unimac SpA began investigating alternatives such as synthetic fur detailing and novelty fasteners. It was possibly Cinzia Ruggeri's developing sense of design that was responsible for linking diverse fashion elements with the new manufacturing methods. During the 1970s, when Milanese designers were involved more than usual with “things English,” Ruggeri worked for the manufacturer Bumblebee, which produced a line of women's blouses labeled Bloom. On the Via Gandino in 1977, she proceeded to build her own line, labeled Bloom SpA, and presented her first collection to the press in 1978.

In 1979 the atelier was moved to the Via Crocefisso. From 1980 through 1984, Ruggeri presented her singular, thematic ready-to-wear collections with other Milanese designers at the Fiera di Milano. On one occasion, outside the seasonal venue, her 1985 collection was presented in a building formerly used for religious services. The lighting installation was designed by the English musician Brian Eno. In 1982, she added the label Cinzia Ruggeri to her existing Bloom SpA line, and in 1986 she introduced menswear.

RUGGERI, Cinzia

Italian designer

Born: Milan, Italy, 1 February 1945. Education: Studied design at Accademia delle Arti Applicate, Milan, 1963–65. Career: Freelance designer in Milan, from 1966. Exhibitions: Galleria del Prisma, Milan, 1963; Venice Biennale, 1981; Italian Re-Evolution, La Jolla Museum of Contemporary Art, La Jolla, California, 1982; Per Un Vestire Organico, Palazzo Fortuny, Venice, 1983; Italia: The Genius of Fashion, Fashion Institute of Technology, New York, 1985; Dopo Gondrand: Cinzia Ruggeri Denis Santachiara, Il Luogo di Corrado Levi, Milan, 1986; Extra Vacanze di Cinzia Ruggeri, Galleria Tucci Russo, Turin, 1986; Internationale Mobel Messe, Cologne, 1987; Fashion and Surrealism, Fashion Institute of Technology, New York, 1987 (toured); Pianeta Italia, Kaufhof Stores, Cologne, 1988; Salon del Mobile, Milan, 1988. Collections: Museo della Moda, Parma. Awards: Fil d'Or award, Confederation Internationale du Lin, 1981, 1982, 1983. Address: Corso Buenos Sires 2, Milan 20124, Italy. Website: www.cinziaruggeri.com.

PUBLICATIONS

By RUGGERI:

Articles

Casa Vogue (Milan), April 1980.

On RUGGERI:

Books

Amendola, Paola, Vestire Italiano, Rome, 1983.

Rowley's approachable collections move from down-to-earth casual to fanciful fun. In 2001, Rowley explored the popular interest in denim by presenting new shapes in puffed-sleeve dresses and also mixed jeans with dressier pieces. In her fall 2001 show, she produced a circus complete with mimes and jugglers and showed two-tone skirts and mismatched stockings. While always comfortable, Rowley's clothes can also be more sophisticated, like coordinated tailored jackets, skirts, and trousers or linen suits in 1998. Rowley designs dresses and sportswear and holds licensing arrangements for lingerie, coats, shoes, handbags, and other accessories. Her lines are sold in five company-owned stores in the U.S., department stores, and in-store boutiques in Japan.

For years, Rowley has been designing clothes for a woman with a carefree life loaded with style and bravado. In 1995 Rowley and friend Ilene Rosenzweig, a New York Times writer, packaged this ideal woman in their book Swell: A Girl's Guide to the Good Life. The popular book went through five printings and was translated into five languages. Rowley and Rosenzweig were preparing two sequels and making plans for a television spin-off. Rowley, of course, welcomes the opportunity to design the television wardrobes.

—Whitney Blausen; updated by Janette Goff Dixon

- Branzi, Andrea, The Hot House: Italian New Wave Design, London, 1984.
 Soli, Pia, Il Genio Antipatico, Milan, 1984.
 Manzini, Ezio, La Materia Dell'Invenzione, Milan, 1986.
 Martin, Richard, Fashion and Surrealism, New York, London, 1987.
 Soli, Pia, Pranzo alle 8, Milan, 1988.
 Yajima, Isao, Fashion Illustrators of Europe, Tokyo, 1989.
Contemporary Designers, Third Edition, Detroit, 1997.

Articles

- “Suggerioni Antoillogiche,” Il Giorno, 3 May 1998.
 Gandini, Manuela, “Ombre di Cinzia Ruggeri,” Il Sole 24 Ore, 31 May 1998.
 Muritti, Elisabetta, “Alice nel Paese della Post-Meraviglie,” Elle, June 1998.
 Davide, Paolini, “Ma il Grana e' in Galleria,” Il Sole 24 Ore, 21 June 1998.
 Piccoli, Cloe, “Specchi e Poltrone,” La Repubblica, 22 June 1998.
 Carloni, M. V., “Essere Dandy nel XXI Secolo,” Specchio della Stampa, 27 June 1998.
 “Cinzia Ruggeri,” available online at her company website, www.cinziaruggeri.com, October 2001.

* * *

Following her studies in the applied arts at the Accademia delle Arti Applicate in Milan, Cinzia Ruggeri obtained a position in the atelier of Carven in Paris. On her return to Italy, she served as director of design for the ready-to-wear firm of Unimac SpA, owned by her father, Guido Ruggeri, and based in Milan.

The Ruggeri firm was founded in 1963 and ceased operations in 1975. It had been controlled by the family and, under the label Guido Ruggeri, produced women's suits and coats. Unimac SpA was one of the foremost manufacturers in the booming Italian ready-to-wear industry of the 1960s. Signor Ruggeri and his daughter integrated the artisan's aesthetics and sartorial traditions with new techniques of production and distribution. During the 1960s, radical changes were occurring in the Italian garment industry. Good design, improved manufacturing methods, and competition diminished the pervasive antipathy to mass production. New ideas and reorganization were fused in collaborative efforts between manufacturer and small but specialized companies.

Around 1966, Unimac SpA began investigating alternatives such as synthetic fur detailing and novelty fasteners. It was possibly Cinzia Ruggeri's developing sense of design that was responsible for linking diverse fashion elements with the new manufacturing methods. During the 1970s, when Milanese designers were involved more than usual with “things English,” Ruggeri worked for the manufacturer Bumblebee, which produced a line of women's blouses labeled Bloom. On the Via Gandino in 1977, she proceeded to build her own line, labeled Bloom SpA, and presented her first collection to the press in 1978.

In 1979 the atelier was moved to the Via Crocefisso. From 1980 through 1984, Ruggeri presented her singular, thematic ready-to-wear collections with other Milanese designers at the Fiera di Milano. On one occasion, outside the seasonal venue, her 1985 collection was presented in a building formerly used for religious services. The lighting installation was designed by the English musician Brian Eno. In 1982, she added the label Cinzia Ruggeri to her existing Bloom SpA line, and in 1986 she introduced menswear.

RUGGERI, Cinzia

Italian designer

Born: Milan, Italy, 1 February 1945. Education: Studied design at Accademia delle Arti Applicate, Milan, 1963–65. Career: Freelance designer in Milan, from 1966. Exhibitions: Galleria del Prisma, Milan, 1963; Venice Biennale, 1981; Italian Re-Evolution, La Jolla Museum of Contemporary Art, La Jolla, California, 1982; Per Un Vestire Organico, Palazzo Fortuny, Venice, 1983; Italia: The Genius of Fashion, Fashion Institute of Technology, New York, 1985; Dopo Gondrand: Cinzia Ruggeri Denis Santachiara, Il Luogo di Corrado Levi, Milan, 1986; Extra Vacanze di Cinzia Ruggeri, Galleria Tucci Russo, Turin, 1986; Internationale Mobel Messe, Cologne, 1987; Fashion and Surrealism, Fashion Institute of Technology, New York, 1987 (toured); Pianeta Italia, Kaufhof Stores, Cologne, 1988; Salon del Mobile, Milan, 1988. Collections: Museo della Moda, Parma. Awards: Fil d'Or award, Confederation Internationale du Lin, 1981, 1982, 1983. Address: Corso Buenos Sires 2, Milan 20124, Italy. Website: www.cinziaruggeri.com.

PUBLICATIONS

By RUGGERI:

Articles

Casa Vogue (Milan), April 1980.

On RUGGERI:

Books

Amendola, Paola, Vestire Italiano, Rome, 1983.

Throughout the 1980s, Ruggeri continued to apply thematic appliqués to traditional styling, employing contemporary fabrics. A 1981 winter ensemble included a jacket of synthetic fur strips, ornamented with a fabric appliqué of three pigs covering the entire back of the garment. At an early stage in her career, Ruggeri established her sense of global responsibility by refusing to use animal fur, and both the wool trousers and the crêpe de chine blouse also featured the threesome appliqué. The pièce de résistance in this case was a perfectly constructed three-dimensional shoulder bag in the shape of a pig.

Ziggurat 1984–85 was a two-piece synthetic evening dress. The garment was appliquéd with scattered two-dimensional fabric bows, knotted as if clutching the three-dimensional feathers. The ruffle-edged jacket was traditional in design, and the floor-length skirt was three tiered, recalling the stepped towers of ancient civilizations. Subsequent garments have included these ziz-zag elements and structuring to form a volume independent of the wearer's body. She refers the stepped pattern to a personal symbol, which she has also repeated in other artistic expressions. Artform Magazine featured an illustration of a glass container that incorporated the pattern at right angles to each other.

The fantasy of nature itself was compelling to the Surrealists and to Ruggeri. Her 1983 Surrealist vision of marine life was titled "Dress with Octopus." The long-sleeved, boxy jacket was the surface for randomly placed cascading square fabric forms, and the straight shift worn underneath involved the same protrusions, including a neckline cut as an ocean's horizon. Her broken ground print dress, quite traditional in style and fit, was pierced with oversized blossoms and crawling with three-dimensional lizards. Most recently, in her Milanese studio, she proceeded to design prototypes for various projects that combined fashion with photography, anthropology, geology, and ecology by incorporating photographs of grass, cobblestones, and marble in her textile designs.

Ruggeri has developed "behavioral" garments, printed with material that changes color according to body heat, and designed a "rain coat" with images of lightning and wind. A fitted dress, printed with Scottie dogs and edged with a cantilevered structure from which the dogs appear to be running, is, of course, not surprisingly featured in a magazine accompanied by a set of three-dimensional Scottie dog suitcases. "Abito Tovaglia," tablecloth gown, illustrates a seated woman wearing a floor-length gown. She wears a collar as napkin, at first rolled up to the waist and attached at the sides of the garment. When unrolled, the panel reveals a cloth set with the utensils of an entire meal. For the Milanese firm Poltrona Frau, Ruggeri designed a chair ornamented with whiskered cats and illuminated eyes. A shower head is illustrated in the shape of a human hand with water spraying out from the ringer tips.

As an artist, Ruggeri has challenged herself in designing theatrical productions, ballets, and artistic events and has ventured into interior and furniture design. She has exhibited at the Triennale di Milano and the Biennale di Venezia, and performances involving her fantastical costumes have clearly reflected her poetic tendencies when given such titles as Performance Adanamica (Performance Without Movement), La Casa Onirica (The House Where I Dream), and Per Vestire Organico (To Dress Organically), all from 1983. La Neo Merce, Il Design dell'Intensione e dell'Estasi Artificiale were new products design and artificial ecstasy in 1985, and Vestiti al Video, videowear, in 1986. Also presented in 1994 were Verona Neo Eclettismo, Verona new eclecticism, and an exhibit at the Bacini Meridionale Museo Nuova Era.

Firmly entrenched in the world of interior design in the 1990s, Ruggeri created chairs, wardrobes, glassware, mirrors, and other avant-garde furniture and home accessories for such firms as Bic, Colombra, Driade, Ferrari Champagne, Glass Design, Mirror Schatzi, Poltrone Frau, Rapsel, and Wardrobe Rocco. Her work was exhibited at the Krizia Studio in Milan as well as venues in Frankfurt, Paris, London, Tokyo, and New York.

—Gillion Skellenger; updated by Mary Ellen Snodgrass

RYKIEL, Sonia

French designer

Born: Sonia Flis in Paris, 25 May 1930. Education: Attended high school in Neuilly-sur-Seine. Family: Married Sam Rykiel, 1953; children: Nathalie, Jean-Philippe. Career: Freelance designer for Laura boutique, Paris, 1962; first Paris boutique opened, 1968; household linens boutique opened, Paris, 1975; Sonia Rykiel Enfant

Sonia Rykiel, fall/winter 2001 ready-to-wear collection. © AP/Wide World Photos.

Throughout the 1980s, Ruggeri continued to apply thematic appliqués to traditional styling, employing contemporary fabrics. A 1981 winter ensemble included a jacket of synthetic fur strips, ornamented with a fabric appliqué of three pigs covering the entire back of the garment. At an early stage in her career, Ruggeri established her sense of global responsibility by refusing to use animal fur, and both the wool trousers and the crêpe de chine blouse also featured the threesome appliqué. The pièce de résistance in this case was a perfectly constructed three-dimensional shoulder bag in the shape of a pig.

Ziggurat 1984–85 was a two-piece synthetic evening dress. The garment was appliquéd with scattered two-dimensional fabric bows, knotted as if clutching the three-dimensional feathers. The ruffle-edged jacket was traditional in design, and the floor-length skirt was three tiered, recalling the stepped towers of ancient civilizations. Subsequent garments have included these ziz-zag elements and structuring to form a volume independent of the wearer's body. She refers the stepped pattern to a personal symbol, which she has also repeated in other artistic expressions. Artform Magazine featured an illustration of a glass container that incorporated the pattern at right angles to each other.

The fantasy of nature itself was compelling to the Surrealists and to Ruggeri. Her 1983 Surrealist vision of marine life was titled "Dress with Octopus." The long-sleeved, boxy jacket was the surface for randomly placed cascading square fabric forms, and the straight shift worn underneath involved the same protrusions, including a neckline cut as an ocean's horizon. Her broken ground print dress, quite traditional in style and fit, was pierced with oversized blossoms and crawling with three-dimensional lizards. Most recently, in her Milanese studio, she proceeded to design prototypes for various projects that combined fashion with photography, anthropology, geology, and ecology by incorporating photographs of grass, cobblestones, and marble in her textile designs.

Ruggeri has developed "behavioral" garments, printed with material that changes color according to body heat, and designed a "rain coat" with images of lightning and wind. A fitted dress, printed with Scottie dogs and edged with a cantilevered structure from which the dogs appear to be running, is, of course, not surprisingly featured in a magazine accompanied by a set of three-dimensional Scottie dog suitcases. "Abito Tovaglia," tablecloth gown, illustrates a seated woman wearing a floor-length gown. She wears a collar as napkin, at first rolled up to the waist and attached at the sides of the garment. When unrolled, the panel reveals a cloth set with the utensils of an entire meal. For the Milanese firm Poltrona Frau, Ruggeri designed a chair ornamented with whiskered cats and illuminated eyes. A shower head is illustrated in the shape of a human hand with water spraying out from the ringer tips.

As an artist, Ruggeri has challenged herself in designing theatrical productions, ballets, and artistic events and has ventured into interior and furniture design. She has exhibited at the Triennale di Milano and the Biennale di Venezia, and performances involving her fantastical costumes have clearly reflected her poetic tendencies when given such titles as Performance Adanamica (Performance Without Movement), La Casa Onirica (The House Where I Dream), and Per Vestire Organico (To Dress Organically), all from 1983. La Neo Merce, Il Design dell'Intensione e dell'Estasi Artificiale were new products design and artificial ecstasy in 1985, and Vestiti al Video, videowear, in 1986. Also presented in 1994 were Verona Neo Eclettismo, Verona new eclecticism, and an exhibit at the Bacini Meridionale Museo Nuova Era.

Firmly entrenched in the world of interior design in the 1990s, Ruggeri created chairs, wardrobes, glassware, mirrors, and other avant-garde furniture and home accessories for such firms as Bic, Colombra, Driade, Ferrari Champagne, Glass Design, Mirror Schatzi, Poltrone Frau, Rapsel, and Wardrobe Rocco. Her work was exhibited at the Krizia Studio in Milan as well as venues in Frankfurt, Paris, London, Tokyo, and New York.

—Gillion Skellenger; updated by Mary Ellen Snodgrass

RYKIEL, Sonia

French designer

Born: Sonia Flis in Paris, 25 May 1930. Education: Attended high school in Neuilly-sur-Seine. Family: Married Sam Rykiel, 1953; children: Nathalie, Jean-Philippe. Career: Freelance designer for Laura boutique, Paris, 1962; first Paris boutique opened, 1968; household linens boutique opened, Paris, 1975; Sonia Rykiel Enfant boutique opened, Paris, 1987; cosmetics line introduced in Japan, 1987; Rykiel Homme boutique opened, Paris, 1989; Inscription Rykiel collection, designed by Nathalie Rykiel, introduced, 1989; new flagship boutique opened, Paris, 1990; menswear collection, Rykiel Homme introduced, 1990; second Inscription Rykiel boutique, Paris, 1990; Rykiel Homme boutique opened, Paris, 1992; footwear collection launched, 1992; Sonia Rykiel fragrance introduced 1993; also columnist for Femme, from 1983; 30th anniversary celebration, Bibliothèque Nationale, 1998. Exhibitions: Sonia Rykiel, 20 Ans de Mode (retrospective), Galeries Lafayette, Paris, and Seibo Shibuya department store, Tokyo, 1987; retrospective, the Orangerie, Palais du Luxembourg, 1993. Awards: French Ministry of Culture Croix des Arts et des Lettres, 1983; named Chevalier de la Légion d'Honneur, 1985; Fashion Group, "Night of the Stars" award, 1986; Officier de l'Ordre de Arts et des Lettres, 1993. Address: 175 boulevard Saint Germain, 75006 Paris, France.

Sonia Rykiel, fall/winter 2001 ready-to-wear collection. © AP/Wide World Photos.

PUBLICATIONS

By RYKIEL:

Books

- Et je la voudrais nue*, Paris, 1979.
Rykiel, Paris, 1985.
Célébrations, Paris, 1988.
La collection, Paris, 1989; Tokyo, 1989.
Colette et la mode, Paris, 1991.
Collection Terminée, Collection Interminable, Paris, 1993.
Tatiana Acacia, Paris, 1993.
 (contributor) Spengler, Franck, ed., Plaisirs de femmes: nouvelles, Paris, 1998.
Paris: sur les pas de Sonia Rykiel, Paris, 1999.

On RYKIEL:

Books

- Fraser, Kennedy, The Fashionable Mind. Reflections on Fashion 1970–1981, New York, 1981.
 Chapsal, Madeleine, Hélène Cixous, and Sonia Rykiel, Rykiel, Paris, 1985.
 Milbank, Caroline Rennolds, Couture: The Great Designers, New York, 1985.
The Power of Paris: Frankly French, (video), New York, 1991.
 Marion, Sylvie, L'école de la vie, ou La France autodidacte, Paris, 1993.
 Chapsal, Madeleine, La jalouse, Paris, 1994.
 Benstock, Shari, and Suzanne Ferriss, On Fashion, New Brunswick, New Jersey, 1994.
 Stegemeyer, Anne, Who's Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.
 Lemoine, Bertrand, and Jean Gaumy, Regards: L'art des grands travaux, Paris, 1997.
 Mauries, Patrick, Sonia Rykiel, Paris, 1997; New York, 1998.

Articles

- "Sonia Rykiel, ambiguë, célèbre et solitaire," in Elle (Paris), 25 October 1976.
 Tournier, Françoise, "Sonia Rykiel sa vie, de fil," in Elle (Paris), 17 June 1985.

- Schoonejans, Sonia, "Autour de l'album Rykiel," in Vogue (Paris), August 1985.
 Menkes, Suzy, "Sonia Rykiel—Winning at Life," in the International Herald Tribune (Neuilly, France), 18 October 1988.
 Sacase, Christiane, "Sonia Rykiel, les 20 ans de la dame en noir," in Biba, November 1988.
 de Turckheim, Hélène, "Mes rendez-vous," in Madame Figaro (Paris), 11 February 1989.
 Chapsal, Madeleine, "Les vingt ans de Sonia Rykiel," in Elle (Paris), 20 February 1989.
 Tredre, Roger, "Touch of the Grande Dame," in The Independent on Sunday (London), 25 February 1990.
 "Sonia Rykiel," in Current Biography (New York), May 1990.
 Nolin, Dominique, "En visite chez Sonia Rykiel," in Marie-France (Paris), March 1991.
 Raulet, Sylvie, "Sonia Rykiel: une femme d'atmosphère," in Vogue (Japan), March 1991.
 Lender, Heidi, "Rapping with Rykiel," in WWD, 18 November 1991.
 Schwarm, Barbara, "Sonia Rykiel, la compil," in L'Officiel (Paris), June 1993.
 Lender, Heidi, and Godfrey Deeny, "Sex, Sweaters and Sonia Rykiel," in WWD, 7 July 1993.
 Menkes, Suzy, "Rykiel in Retrospect: The Unfinished Work of a Designer," in the International Herald Tribune, 13 July 1993.
 Webb, Ian, "Capital Elle," in The Times Magazine, 1994.
 Rafferty, Jean Bond, "The Leading Lady of the Left Bank," in Town & Country (New York), December 1994.
 Ozzard, Janet, "Rykiel Sips Tea, Seeks N.Y. Store," in WWD, 28 December 1994.
 Schiro, Anne-Marie, "Lacroix and Rykiel: Classics," in the New York Times, 18 March 1995.
 Menkes, Suzy, "Sonia Rykiel: Still Whipping Up the Cultural Broth," in the International Herald Tribune, 28 April 1998.

*

First I destroyed, undid what I had made. I wasn't satisfied with it, it wasn't me. It didn't relate to me. It was fashion, but it wasn't my fashion. I wanted to abolish the laws, the rules. I wanted to undo, overflow, exceed fashion. I wanted to unfold, unwind it. I wanted a lifestyle appropriate to the woman I was...this woman-symphony who was living the life of a woman mingled with the life of a worker.

I wanted airplane-style, travel-style, luggage-style. I saw myself as a woman on the go, surrounded by bags and children...so I imagined "kangaroo-clothes," stackable, collapsible, movable, with no right side, no wrong side, and no hem. Clothes to be worn in the daytime I could refine at night. I put "fashion" aside to create "non-fashion."

—Sonia Rykiel

* * *

French ready-to-wear designer Sonia Rykiel is a compelling presence whose intellect and individuality are apparent in her clothes. With her small bones and trademark mane of hair, she is probably her own best model, projecting assurance and energy. She began designing with no previous experience when, as the pregnant wife of the owner of Laura, a fashionable boutique, she was unable to find maternity clothes she liked. Continuing to design knitwear for Laura, she soon carved a niche for herself designing for well-to-do and sophisticated modern French women.

Sonia Rykiel, fall/winter 2001 ready-to-wear collection. © AP/Wide World Photos.

By 1964, Rykiel had been nicknamed "The Queen of Knitwear" in the U.S., where an ardent following developed for her knits, which were sold in trendsetting stores like Henri Bendel and Bloomingdale's in New York. For women who were rich and thin enough to wear them, these skinny sweaters, with their high armholes, imparted instant chic. Part of their appeal was in their distinctive colors and striped patterns. Black, navy, gray, and beige are still standards, but there was also a unique Rykiel palette of muted tones—stripes of grayed seafoam green and grayed teal. Although she herself does not wear red (she wears black, considering it a uniform), Rykiel still uses it consistently, with the shade changing from season to season.

Rykiel continues to design a complete range of clothes and accessories for women in the 1990s, drawn from her experiences and her fantasies, which she encourages women to appropriate and adapt whilst inventing and reinventing themselves. In addition to knits and jerseys, she uses crêpe for soft clothes, and woven tweeds and plaids for a more structured day look. Evening fantasies are best expressed in lightweight black luxury fabrics, often combined with sequins, metallic thread, embroidery, or elaborate combinations incorporating velvet.

Physical fitness is implicit in Sonia Rykiel's idea of modern femininity, so it is no surprise that the innermost layers of the knitted or jersey separates at the heart of her collections continue to be body conscious, if not figure hugging. They range in style from skimpy, narrow-shouldered pullovers with recognizable Rykiel detailing, to drop-shouldered tunics, to cardigans both short and boxy, and long and flowing. The detailing itself can be as soft as ruffles and bows, or as hard as nail heads. Although certain themes like cropped wide-leg trousers recur, the skirts and trousers that accompany the sweaters sometimes reflect the fashion of the moment, as in the short skirt worn with a classic Rykiel sweater which was featured by the New York Times Magazine in Patricia McColl's 1988 spring fashion preview, titled "The Byword is Short." The sweater is a fine example of another important facet of Rykiel's work: the dress, sweater, or accessory as bulletin board.

As befits the author of several books, Rykiel began to incorporate words into her designs. "I feel more like a novelist than a fashion designer," she commented to the International Herald Tribune's Suzy Menkes. "Someone who writes a new chapter each season, including everything I see around me." And what she has seen around her becomes emblazoned on slinky dresses and the fronts or backs of sweaters variously inscribed "Moi," "Fête," and "Plaisir," among others. Nor has English been slighted: "Artist," "Ready," "Black Tie," and "Black is Beautiful" have also been included. Not even eveningwear is sacrosanct: a 1983 ensemble with a sheer black lace bodice and black crêpe sleeves and skirt was encircled with a rhinestone studded belt reading, "Special Edition Evening Dreams." Nonetheless, the most frequent words to appear are "Sonia Rykiel," or simply "Rykiel."

Rykiel was an early exponent of deconstruction. Made of the finest quality wool yarns, sometimes mixed with angora, her knits are frequently designed with reverse seams. She also innovated the use of lockstitched hems. Since the early 1980s Rykiel has also produced at least two casual lines a year in cotton velours, a fluid, sensual fabric well suited to uncluttered silhouettes. Each season there is at least one dress, in addition to trousers, pullovers, cardigans, and jackets, many with reverse seams. They are offered in several solid colors, in stripes and, occasionally, in prints. Like other clothes of illusory simplicity, they have often been unsuccessfully copied.

Another Rykiel specialty is outerwear. Her coats, whether in fine woolens, or in highly coveted fake fur, tend to be voluminous. Along with these and her accessories line, other Rykiel enterprises include children's and menswear lines and perfumes. The entire Rykiel design output is available in the lifestyle boutique on Boulevard Saint Germain, which opened in 1990.

As the century came to a close, Rykiel looked forward and back. She celebrated the 30-year anniversary of her first Paris boutique with a gala at the Bibliothèque Nationale in 1998, remembering the Parisian student riots that forced her to close temporarily. Yet this particular French revolution ushered in both political upheaval and a shift in fashion—one Rykiel was only too happy to espouse. Her passion for artistic design is undiminished; yet it is now a family affair, involving daughter Nathalie, her husband, and Nathalie's three daughters who have modeled new Rykiel designs. And family is ever important to Rykiel, as she told Menkes in April 1998: "I wrote the story of women across the world. We all have the same needs and desires, the demands of work and family life. The Rykiel woman? She always has a bag on her shoulders so she can stride forward—with a child in each hand.”

In 2000 and 2001 Rykiel continued what she did best: fluid, fashionable clothing in a variety of fabrics and styles. She produced taut tops, skirts, and dresses in geometric patterns for a cruise line collection in early 2000, including her perennially popular matelot stripes. And black, of course, always black, her personal favorite. Though older and wiser, her tenets have remained the same: clothing should be sophisticated, and as she told Menkes, a “kind of bouillon de culture [a cultural broth]. To be modern is to be aware of what is going on.”

Sonia Rykiel, once called “Coco Rykiel,” is a worthy successor to the Chanel tradition: she is a strong, ultrafeminine, articulate intellectual with a flair for simplicity and self-promotion, who has shown herself capable of both refined innovation and commercial success.

—Arlene C. Cooper; updated by Nelly Rhodes

S

SACHS, Gloria

American designer

Born: Gloria Harris in Scarsdale, New York, circa 1927. Education: Graduated in fine arts, Skidmore College, New York, 1947; studied textile design, Cranbrook Academy of Art, Michigan, 1947; studied painting with Fernand Léger, Paris, 1949; studied architecture with Giò Ponti and Franco Albini, Italy. Family: Married Irwin Sachs, 1953; children: Nancy, Charles. Career: Worked as a model for Balenciaga and Balmain, Paris, 1949; textile designer, Hans Knoll, Herman Miller, 1948–49; apprentice, Domus magazine, Milan, 1949–50; executive trainee, assistant buyer, then fashion coordinator, Bloomingdale's, New York, 1951–56; preteen clothing designer, Gloria Sachs Red Barn company, 1958–60; fashion director for children's wear, Bloomingdale's, 1960–62; preteen clothing designer, Saks Fifth Avenue, New York, 1962–65; formed own sportswear company, Gloria Sachs Designs, Ltd., 1970; showed first evening collection, 1983; private label introduced, 1986; closed firm, 1991–92; also paints, sculpts, and weaves. Exhibitions: paintings and sculpture shown at Pratt Institute, Brooklyn, New York, 1949, Art Alliance of Philadelphia, 1950, Art Institute of Chicago, 1950, Museum of Modern Art, New York, 1951. Awards: Saks Fifth Avenue Creator award, 1969; Woolknit Design award, 1974, 1976.

PUBLICATIONS

On SACHS:

Books

Milbank, Caroline Rennolds, New York Fashion: The Evolution of American Style, New York, 1989.

Articles

Morris, Bernadine, "Low-Key Elegance by Gloria Sachs," in the New York Times, 22 September 1984.

Green, Wendy, "Gloria Sachs: Designing Her Own Business," in WWD, 14 July 1986.

Morris, Bernadine, "Sportswear Steps Up to Gold, Lace, and Velvet," in the New York Times, 15 April 1988.

Buck, Geneviève, "Barneys, Buddy and Bo—New Style, Old Style and No Style," in Chicago Tribune, 15 July 1992.

* * *

Gloria Sachs' intensive artistic education played a major part in her fashion work and its development. A fine arts graduate of the Skidmore College, she went on to study textiles at the Cranbrook Academy of Art in Michigan in 1947. Her first job was as a textile designer, noted for designing her own yarns in distinctive and individual color combinations. She used her earnings from this job to finance a cultural year in Europe. She was lucky enough to study painting at the atelier of Fernand Léger in Paris and architecture with both Giò Ponti and Franco Albini in Italy, which further developed her sense of color and proportion.

Returning to New York, Sachs worked in textiles at Bloomingdale's department store, eventually becoming their fashion coordinator. She later joined Saks Fifth Avenue as an in-house designer and her success there gave her the confidence to establish her own business on Seventh Avenue in 1970. Her first designs established her as a smart, casual separates designer. Mix-and-match pleated skirts, jackets, and coats, teamed with tailored shirts, were particularly distinctive. A glamorous, sporty evening look was another favorite with buyers. She later made glossy ensembles of color-blocked sweaters, teamed with uncoordinated skirts and trousers. Alongside other New York designers, including John Antony and Calvin Klein, she pioneered the New York look for casual sportswear shapes in supple and expensive fabrics.

Sachs is famous for her clever development of textile designs in her fashion. She worked very closely with the mills that produced her fabrics and even opened her own mill in Scotland to produce contrast trim and embroidered cashmere sweaters. She often used classic and antique patterns, developed with her own particular twist. Paisleys and plaids were reworked in unusual color combinations to be fresh and unexpected, always subtle and never brash. Experimentation with English gentlemen's neck-tie prints further allowed Sachs to originate and rescale exciting new patterns and shapes; in turn the fabrics served as inspiration for the creation of new clothing designs.

In her later work in the 1980s Sachs continued her development of signature, revamped textiles in beautiful fabrics. She also introduced looser, more unstructured clothing. Supple, fluid shapes that were simply cut and balanced were very flattering to wear and proved extremely popular. She sold her work through many top retailers, including Saks Fifth Avenue. Unfortunately, the early 1990s proved difficult for Sachs and a number of talented designers, including Mary Ann Restivo and Rebecca Moses, who were forced to close their businesses.

Gloria Sachs' major contribution to fashion was her easy, glamorous sportswear, dressed up for the evening or down for the day. These clothes were for professional, executive women who wanted to retain their femininity in the boardroom with taste and style. More relaxed than power dressing, it is dressing for success with dash and individuality.

—Kevin Almond; updated by Nelly Rhodes

SAINT LAURENT, Yves

French designer

Born: Yves Henri Donat Mathieu Saint Laurent in Oran, Algeria, 1 August 1936. Education: Studied at L'École de la Chambre Syndicale de la Couture, 1954. Career: Independent clothing stylist, Paris, 1953–54; designer/partner, 1954–57, chief designer, Dior, Paris, 1957–60; began designing for theater and film, 1959; founder/designer, Yves Saint Laurent, Paris, from 1962; Rive Gauche ready-to-wear line introduced, 1966; menswear line introduced, 1974; firm purchased by Elf-Sanofi SA, 1993; designer Elber Albaz hired, 1998–2000; acquired by Gucci Group NV, 1999; Tom Ford took over as creative director, 2000; renovated Madison Avenue store reopened, 2001; retired from designing, 2002; fragrances include Y 1964; Rive Gauche, 1971; Opium, 1978; Paris, 1983; Champagne, (renamed Yvresse, 1996) 1993; Opium relaunch, 1995; Opium for Men, 1996; Baby Doll, 1999; Nu, 2001. Exhibitions: Yves Saint Laurent, Metropolitan Museum of Art, 1983; Yves Saint Laurent et le Théâtre, Musée des Arts de la Mode, Paris, 1986; Yves Saint Laurent, 28 Ans de Création, Musée des Arts de la Mode, 1986; retrospective, Art Gallery of New South Wales, Sydney, Australia, 1987. Awards: International Wool Secretariat award, 1954; Neiman Marcus award, 1958; Harper's Bazaar award, 1966; Council of Fashion Designers of America award, 1981; CFDA Lifetime Achievement award, 1999; Fifi Fragrance award (for Baby Doll), 2000. Address: 5 avenue Marceau, 75116 Paris, France. Website: www.yslonline.com.

Yves Saint Laurent after showing his spring/summer 2000 high fashion collection. © Reuters NewMedia Inc./CORBIS.

PUBLICATIONS

By SAINT LAURENT:

Books

- Yves Saint Laurent*, New York & London, 1984.
- Yves Saint Laurent par Yves Saint Laurent*, Paris, 1986.
- Bergé, Pierre, and Yves Saint Laurent, Yves Saint Laurent, London & New York, 1996, 1997.
- Yves Saint Laurent: Forty Years of Creation*, New York, 1998.
- Love*, by Yves Saint Laurent, New York, 2000.

On SAINT LAURENT:

Books

- Lynam, Ruth, ed., Couture: An Illustrated History of the Great Paris Designers and Their Creations, New York, 1972.
- Madsen, Axel, Living for Design: The Yves Saint Laurent Story, New York, 1979.
- Milbank, Caroline Rennolds, Couture: The Great Designers, New York, 1985.
- Musée des Arts Décoratifs, Yves Saint Laurent et le Théâtre [exhibition catalogue], Paris, 1986.
- Art Gallery of New South Wales, Yves Saint Laurent, Retrospectives [exhibition catalogue], Sydney, New South Wales, 1987.
- Perschitz, Lois, ed., W, The Designing Life, New York, 1987.
- Yves Saint Laurent: Images of Design* [exhibition catalogue], New York, 1988.
- Howell, Georgina, Sultans of Style: 30 Years of Fashion and Passion 1960–1990, London, 1990.
- Benaïm, Laurence, Yves Saint Laurent, Paris, 1993, 1995.
- Martin, Richard, and Harold Koda, Orientalism: Visions of the East in Western Dress [exhibition catalogue], Metropolitan Museum of Art, 1994.
- Stegemeyer, Anne, Who's Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.
- Rawsthorn, Alice, Yves Saint Laurent, A Biography, London, 1996, 1997.
- Duras, Marguerite, Yves Saint Laurent and Fashion Photography, Munich, 1998.
- Tierney, Tom, Yves Saint Laurent Fashion Review, Mineola, New York, 1999.

Articles

- "YSL Models Rive Gauche for Men in His Marrakesh Home," in Vogue (London), 1 October 1969.
- "Yves Saint Laurent: His Very Special World," in McCall's (New York), January 1970.
- "Mary Russell Interviews Saint Laurent," in Vogue (New York), 1 November 1972.
- "Yves Saint Laurent Talks to Bianca Jagger," in Interview, January 1973.
- Julian, P., "Les années 20 revues dans les années 70 chez Yves Saint Laurent," in Connaissance des Arts (Paris), December 1973.
- Heilpern, John, and Yves Saint Laurent, "Yves Saint Laurent Lives," in The Observer Magazine (London), 5 June 1977.
- "Designers of Influence: Yves Saint Laurent, the Great Educator," in Vogue (London), June 1978.
- "Bravo: 20 Years of Saint Laurent," in Vogue (London), April 1982.

Yves Saint Laurent, 1999 special show of Moroccan high couture.
© AFP/CORBIS.

- “A Salute to Yves Saint Laurent,” in the New York Times Magazine, 4 December 1983.
- Brubach, Holly, “The Truth in Fiction,” in The Atlantic Monthly (Boston, Massachusetts), May 1984.
- Savage, Percy, “Yves Saint Laurent,” in Art and Design (London), August 1985.
- Berge, P., “Yves Saint Laurent der Modezeichner,” in Du (Zurich), No. 10, 1986.
- “Un équilibre définitif: Saint Laurent Rive Gauche,” in Vogue (Paris), February 1986.
- Griggs, Barbara, “All About Yves,” in The Observer (London), 25 May 1986.
- Mauries, Patrick, “Yves,” in Vogue (Paris), June 1986.
- “Le triomphe de Saint Laurent,” in L’Officiel (Paris), June 1986.
- Pringle, Colombe, “Saint Laurent: sanctifié il entre au musée,” in Elle (Paris), June 1986.
- Worthington, Christa, “Saint Laurent: Life as a Legend,” in Women’s Wear Daily (New York), 18 July 1986.
- “Yves Only,” in Vogue (London), September 1987.
- “Prince Charmant. Bernard Sanz: L’homme de Saint Laurent,” in Profession Textile (Paris), 27 May 1988.

- “Saint Laurent pour toujours,” in Profession Textile (Paris), 30 September 1988.
- Duras, Marguerite, “Saint Laurent par Duras,” in Elle (Paris), 31 October 1988.
- Hyde, Nina, and Albert Allart, “The Business of Chic,” in the National Geographic (Washington, D.C.), July 1989.
- Howell, Georgina, “The Secrets of Saint Laurent,” in The Sunday Times Magazine (London), 2 July 1989.
- _____, “Best Couturier: Yves Saint Laurent,” in The Sunday Times Magazine (London), 16 July 1989.
- Rafferty, Diane, Charles van Rensselaer and Thomas Cunneen, “The Many Faces of Yves: The Designer of the Half Century,” in Connoisseur, February 1990.
- Menkes, Suzy, “Yves of the Revolution,” in the Sunday Express Magazine (London), 22 April 1990.
- Germain, Stephanie, “All About Yves,” in Paris Passion (Paris), October 1990.
- Roberts, Michael, and André Leon Talley, “Unveiling Saint Laurent,” in Interview (New York), June 1991.
- Smith, Liz, “Thirty Years at Fashion’s Cutting Edge,” in The Times (London), 27 January 1992.
- “Yves Saint Laurent, King of Couture,” interview, in Elle (New York), February 1992.
- Brubach, Holly, “Fanfare in a Minor Key,” in The New Yorker, 24 February 1992.
- White, Lesley, “The Saint,” in Vogue (London), November 1994.
- Kramer, Jane, “The Impresario’s Last Act, in the New Yorker (New York), 21 November 1994.
- Schiros, Anne-Marie, “Yves Saint Laurent’s Shocking New Color: Black,” in the New York Times (New York), 22 March 1995.
- Menkes, Suzy, “YSL Plays Safe While Valentino Shines at Night,” in the International Herald Tribune (Paris), 22 March 1995.
- “Saint Laurent: A Fitting End,” in WWD, 22 March 1995.
- Menkes, Suzy, “A New Generation in Ready-to-Wear: Alber Elbaz Gets Aboard at YSL,” in the International Herald Tribune, 9 June 1998.
- “YSL Coming to Receive CFDA Award,” in WWD, 29 March 1999.
- Menkes, Suzy, “Gucci Buys House of YSL for $1-Billion,” in the International Herald Tribune, 16 November 1999.
- _____, “New Team, Same Theme at YSL,” in the International Herald Tribune, 20 January 2000.
- Socha, Miles, “Ford’s YSL: Full Steam Ahead,” in WWD, 12 January 2001.
- “At Yves Saint Laurent, Tom’s Triumph,” in WWD, 15 March 2001.
- Menkes, Suzy, “YSL and the Secrets of Classic Couture,” in the International Herald Tribune, 12 July 2001.
- Ozzard, Janet, “Tom’s Rive Gauche,” in WWD, 6 September 2001.
- Ozzard, Janet, et al, “Tom Ford Expands YSL Store,” in DNR, 10 September 2001.
- Diderich, Joelle, “Fashion Legend Yves Saint Laurent Retires,” from Reuters Newswire, 7 January 2002.
- Cowdy, Hannah, “YSL: Adieu to a Fashion Generation,” available online at ABCNews, www.ABCNews.com, 7 January 2002.

* * *

A great adaptor, Yves Saint Laurent responds in his designs to history, art, and literature. Vast ranges of themes are incorporated into his work, from the Ballet Russes to the writings of Marcel Proust, who inspired his taffeta gowns of 1971; the paintings of Picasso to the minimalist work of Mondrian and the de Stijl movement, shown in the primary colors of his geometrically blocked wool jersey dresses of 1965.

Yves Saint Laurent, autumn/winter 2001–02 haute couture collection. © Reuters NewMedia Inc./CORBIS.

Saint Laurent has a great love of the theatre. He has designed costumes for many stage productions during his long career and the theatre is an important source of ideas for his couture collections. Flamboyant ensembles, such as the Shakespeare wedding dress of brocade and damask of 1980 and his extravagant series of garments inspired by a romantic vision of Russian dress, reflect his passion for theatrical costume.

Less successful have been his attempts to engage with countercultural movements such as the 1960 collection based on the bohemian Left Bank look. The criticism leveled by the press on being confronted with the avant garde on the couture catwalk led to Saint Laurent's replacement as head designer for Dior, even though his 1958 trapeze line had been an enormous success and he had been feted as the savior of Parisian couture. At this time the House of Dior was responsible for nearly half of France's fashion exports, so there was a heavy burden of financial responsibility on Saint Laurent's shoulders.

The 1960 collection appropriated the Left Bank style with knitted turtlenecks and black leather jackets, crocodile jackets with mink

collars, and—a design which was to crop up again and again in his repertoire—the fur jacket with knitted sleeves. In 1968 Saint Laurent produced a tailored trouser collection reflecting his sympathy with the cause of the student marchers who had brought the streets of Paris to a standstill. The clothes were black and accessorized with headbands and fringes.

Where Saint Laurent sets the standards for world fashion is in his feminizing of the basic shapes of the male wardrobe. Like Chanel before him, he responded to the subtleties of masculine tailoring seeking to provide a similar sort of style for women. He produced a whole series of elegant day clothes, such as the shirt dress, which became a staple of the sophisticated woman's wardrobe of the 1970s. Saint Laurent is justly acclaimed for his sharply tailored suits with skirts or trousers, le smoking (a simple black suit with satin lapels based on the male tuxedo, which became an alternative to the frothily feminine evening gown), safari jackets, brass buttoned pea jackets, flying suits—in fact many of the chic classics of postwar women's style.

Saint Laurent's designs contain no rigid shaping or over-elaborate cutting but depend on a perfection of line and a masterful understanding of printed textiles and the use of luxurious materials. He worked with silk printers to produce glowing fabric designs incorporating a brilliant palette of clashing colors such as hot pink, violet, and sapphire blue. A sharp contrast is produced with his simple, practical daywear and romantic, exotic eveningwear, which is more obviously seductive with its extensive beadwork, embroidery, satin, and sheer fabrics such as silk chiffon.

Less interested in fashion than in style, Saint Laurent is and will always be a classicist, designing elegant, tasteful, and sophisticated apparel, perfectly handcrafted in the manner of the old couturiers. He did, however, use industrial methods to produce his Rive Gauche ready-to-wear line, created in 1966, and sold in his own franchised chain of boutiques. The popular line was later taken over by Alber Elbaz, who had worked for Guy Laroche, in 1998, and then by Tom Ford in 2000.

There was been a radical change in the small company founded by Yves Saint Laurent and business partner Pierre Bergé in 1961. It became a massive financial conglomerate, listed on the Paris Bourse, the result of profitable licensing deals. In the 1990s the firm changed ownership several times, ending up as part of the Gucci Group in 1999. Called "fashion's shiniest trophy," by the International Herald Tribune (16 November 1999), the YSL acquisition was another example of the fashion industry's tightening consolidation.

In the 21st century, YSL remained an acclaimed couture house, though its namesake and Rive Gauche designer Tom Ford rarely saw eye to eye. In January 2002, however, such creative differences were moot: Saint Laurent announced he was leaving the firm that bore his name and retiring. Roundly considered the last of the true haute couturiers, the industry lost one of its most elegant and inspired purveyors.

—Caroline Cox; updated by Nelly Rhodes

SAKS FIFTH AVENUE

American retail store

Opened: in 1924 as a joint venture between Horace Saks of Saks & Co. and Bernard Gimbel of Gimbel Bros. Company History: Targeting upscale customers, it was the first specialty store to expand across the minimalist work of Mondrian and the de Stijl movement, shown in the primary colors of his geometrically blocked wool jersey dresses of 1965.

Yves Saint Laurent, autumn/winter 2001–02 haute couture collection. © Reuters NewMedia Inc./CORBIS.

Saint Laurent has a great love of the theatre. He has designed costumes for many stage productions during his long career and the theatre is an important source of ideas for his couture collections. Flamboyant ensembles, such as the Shakespeare wedding dress of brocade and damask of 1980 and his extravagant series of garments inspired by a romantic vision of Russian dress, reflect his passion for theatrical costume.

Less successful have been his attempts to engage with countercultural movements such as the 1960 collection based on the bohemian Left Bank look. The criticism leveled by the press on being confronted with the avant garde on the couture catwalk led to Saint Laurent's replacement as head designer for Dior, even though his 1958 trapeze line had been an enormous success and he had been feted as the savior of Parisian couture. At this time the House of Dior was responsible for nearly half of France's fashion exports, so there was a heavy burden of financial responsibility on Saint Laurent's shoulders.

The 1960 collection appropriated the Left Bank style with knitted turtlenecks and black leather jackets, crocodile jackets with mink

collars, and—a design which was to crop up again and again in his repertoire—the fur jacket with knitted sleeves. In 1968 Saint Laurent produced a tailored trouser collection reflecting his sympathy with the cause of the student marchers who had brought the streets of Paris to a standstill. The clothes were black and accessorized with headbands and fringes.

Where Saint Laurent sets the standards for world fashion is in his feminizing of the basic shapes of the male wardrobe. Like Chanel before him, he responded to the subtleties of masculine tailoring seeking to provide a similar sort of style for women. He produced a whole series of elegant day clothes, such as the shirt dress, which became a staple of the sophisticated woman's wardrobe of the 1970s. Saint Laurent is justly acclaimed for his sharply tailored suits with skirts or trousers, le smoking (a simple black suit with satin lapels based on the male tuxedo, which became an alternative to the frothily feminine evening gown), safari jackets, brass buttoned pea jackets, flying suits—in fact many of the chic classics of postwar women's style.

Saint Laurent's designs contain no rigid shaping or over-elaborate cutting but depend on a perfection of line and a masterful understanding of printed textiles and the use of luxurious materials. He worked with silk printers to produce glowing fabric designs incorporating a brilliant palette of clashing colors such as hot pink, violet, and sapphire blue. A sharp contrast is produced with his simple, practical daywear and romantic, exotic eveningwear, which is more obviously seductive with its extensive beadwork, embroidery, satin, and sheer fabrics such as silk chiffon.

Less interested in fashion than in style, Saint Laurent is and will always be a classicist, designing elegant, tasteful, and sophisticated apparel, perfectly handcrafted in the manner of the old couturiers. He did, however, use industrial methods to produce his Rive Gauche ready-to-wear line, created in 1966, and sold in his own franchised chain of boutiques. The popular line was later taken over by Alber Elbaz, who had worked for Guy Laroche, in 1998, and then by Tom Ford in 2000.

There was been a radical change in the small company founded by Yves Saint Laurent and business partner Pierre Bergé in 1961. It became a massive financial conglomerate, listed on the Paris Bourse, the result of profitable licensing deals. In the 1990s the firm changed ownership several times, ending up as part of the Gucci Group in 1999. Called "fashion's shiniest trophy," by the International Herald Tribune (16 November 1999), the YSL acquisition was another example of the fashion industry's tightening consolidation.

In the 21st century, YSL remained an acclaimed couture house, though its namesake and Rive Gauche designer Tom Ford rarely saw eye to eye. In January 2002, however, such creative differences were moot: Saint Laurent announced he was leaving the firm that bore his name and retiring. Roundly considered the last of the true haute couturiers, the industry lost one of its most elegant and inspired purveyors.

—Caroline Cox; updated by Nelly Rhodes

SAKS FIFTH AVENUE

American retail store

Opened: in 1924 as a joint venture between Horace Saks of Saks & Co. and Bernard Gimbel of Gimbel Bros. Company History: Targeting upscale customers, it was the first specialty store to expand across the nation; financial stresses precipitated the sale of Saks Fifth Avenue to the U.S. subsidiary of British American Tobacco in 1973; company changed hands again in 1990; was acquired by Alabama-based Proffitt's, 1998. Awards: Fifth Avenue store earned a Gold Medal award from the Fifth Avenue Association and remains a New York landmark. Company Address: 12 East 49th Street, New York, NY 10017, USA. Company Website: www.saksfifthavenue.com.

Saks Fifth Avenue, New York City, 1996. © AP/Wide World Photos.

* * *

Saks Fifth Avenue evokes images of style and elegance. One of the most famous luxury retailers in the world, Saks Fifth Avenue has long been the destination for fashion-conscious men and women. The flagship store at 611 Fifth Avenue at 50th Street opened in 1924 and has served the stylish for over three-quarters of a century.

Andrew Saks was born in Baltimore, Maryland, and moved to Washington, D.C., to make his fortune. He established a clothing business there in 1867 that grew to include stores in other cities. He moved to New York and opened Saks & Company in 1902 at Sixth Avenue and 34th Street with the help of his brother Isadore and his sons Horace and William. When Andrew died in 1912, he was succeeded by the Princeton-educated Horace.

Saks & Company joined with Gimbel Bros. in 1922. Bernard Gimbel gained ownership of the store two years later, although it continued to operate under the Saks name until 1965. Looking for a higher class of clientèle, Horace pushed his new associate to open an upscale store on Fifth Avenue. Gimbel and Saks opened Saks Fifth Avenue in 1924. The beautiful building was awarded a Gold Medal

PUBLICATIONS

On SAKS FIFTH AVENUE:

Books

Marcus, Stanley, Quest for the Best, New York, 1979.
Leach, William, Land of Desire, New York, 1993.

Articles

Benbow-Pfälzgraf, Taryn, "Saks Fifth Avenue," in the International Directory of Company Histories, Detroit, MI, 1999.
"Saks Inc. in Store Deals," in WWD, 7 November 2001.

from the Fifth Avenue Association and is now on the designation list of the New York Landmarks Preservation Commission.

Horace Saks died suddenly of septic poisoning in 1926. Bernard Gimbel's cousin Adam had been Horace's assistant and was named president of Saks Fifth Avenue. Handsome, charming, and gregarious, Adam created small specialty shops within the store, which he had redecorated in the dramatic Art Moderne style. He filled Saks Fifth Avenue with exclusive merchandise from Europe and the U.S. and established small boutiques that made custom men's shirts and ladies' made-to-order dresses. He built the dominant fine shoe business and believed in a large stock, even in difficult economic times, so customers could have a large range of choices. He opened the company's first Resort store in Palm Beach, Florida, becoming the first specialty store to expand nationally. Both chains prospered, with Gimbel's and Saks & Company supplying all income levels, while Saks Fifth Avenue appealed to the well-heeled. By 1969, the year Adam retired, there were 28 Saks Fifth Avenue stores in 16 states. In addition to the geographic expansion, Saks Fifth Avenue branched into direct mail sales by introducing Folio in 1970.

In 1973 the U.S. subsidiary of British American Tobacco (B.A.T.) offered to purchase Gimbel Bros. As the company was experiencing financial woes, it was a welcome bid. They renovated the Fifth Avenue store in 1978, closed the Gimbel chain in 1986, and planned a $300 million expansion the following year. Rather than face an unwelcome takeover, Saks Fifth Avenue was sold in 1990 for $1.6 billion. Bahrain-based Investcorp was an international investment group that also owned Gucci Group and Tiffany & Co. Phillip B. Miller, formerly of Neiman Marcus (1977–83) was named CEO of Saks Fifth Avenue.

Financial circumstances caused the firm to open Clearinghouse (Off 5th since 1995), an outlet store for Saks Fifth Avenue merchandise in 1992. In an effort to enhance its West Coast presence, the chain acquired four I. Magnin stores in 1994, though the chain was phased out in 1995. Also in 1995, Saks Fifth Avenue opened the largest store in Beverly Hills, Saks West. The following year, 1996, the holding company, Saks Holdings, went public and Main Street, more compact stores, opened to address the demand of small but wealthy areas.

Saks Holdings was purchased by Proffitt's, based in Birmingham, Alabama, in 1998 for $2.1 billion. The company, which already owned department store chains Carson, Pirie, Scott and Parisian, changed its name to Saks Incorporated to capitalize on the higher prestige of its new acquisition. Christina Johnson became the company's first female chief executive when she assumed the office of president and CEO of Saks Fifth Avenue in 2000. Phillip Miller remained chairman.

Saks Holdings plans to spin off Saks Fifth Avenue and Saks Off 5th, while the catalogue and online Saks Direct were abandoned in early 2001 because of poor sales of luxury items. The $6-billion enterprise operated 62 Saks Fifth Avenue, 50 Saks Off 5th, Saks Direct, 40 Parisian, and 203 stores under the names of Proffitt's, McRaes, Younkers, Herbergers, Carson, Pirie, Scott, Bergner's and Boston Store.

—Christina Lindholm

SANCHEZ, Fernando

Spanish designer working in New York

Born: Spain, 1934. Education: Studied fashion, École de la Chambre Syndicale de la Couture Parisienne, 1951–53. Career: Assistant designer, Maggy Rouff, Paris, 1953–56; designer, Hirsh of Brussels, circa 1956–58; designer for Dior boutiques, and Dior lingerie and knitwear licensees, Paris, Germany, Denmark and the U.S., 1960s; designer, Revillon, New York and Paris, 1961–73 and 1984–85; established own lingerie firm, New York, 1973; introduced ready-to-wear line, 1980; also designer for Vanity Fair, from 1984; regular attendee of the Igédo Dessous and Beach Show, Dusseldorf. Awards: Winner, International Wool Secretariat Competition, 1954; Coty American Fashion Critics award, 1975, 1981; Coty Special award for Lingerie, 1974, 1977; Council of Fashion Designers of America award, 1981. Address: 5 West 19th Street, New York, NY 10011, U.S.A.

PUBLICATIONS

On SANCHEZ:

Books

Milbank, Caroline Rennolds, New York Fashion: The Evolution of American Style, New York, 1989.

Stegemeyer, Anne, Who's Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.

Articles

Krenke, Mary, "Frivolous Fernando," in WWD, 16 September 1965.

Gross, Michael, "Glamor Guys," in New York, 23 May 1988.

McDowell, Colin, "Origin of the Species," in The Guardian (London), 18 October 1988.

Urquhart, Rachel, "Minimalism with a Flourish: Spanish Austerity and Oriental Fantasy Merge in Fernando Sanchez's Style," in Vogue, January 1989.

Romano-Benner, Norma, "Shaping the '90s," in Americas, September/October 1990.

Morris, Bernadine, "A Touch of Lingerie in Outerwear," in the New York Times, 28 April 1991.

Koski, Lorna, "The Survivor: Designer Fernando Sanchez Has Seen, Done—or Outlived—It All," in W (New York), July 1994.

Drier, Melissa, "U.S. Makers Enjoy Warm Welcome at Igédo," in WWD, 19 September 1994.

Munk, Nina, "The Beauty and the Beast," in Forbes, 23 October 1995.

"Autumn in New York," in WWD, 2 April 1998.

"Presidential Picks," in WWD, 6 September 2000.

* * *

Born of a Spanish father and a Flemish mother, Sanchez began his career in high fashion ready-to-wear in Paris after studying at the École de la Chambre Syndicale de la Couture. He started out at the house of Dior, where he produced knitwear, lingerie, and accessories for the prestigious company's chain of boutiques. From there he moved to design assistant at Yves Saint Laurent before starting up his own company in 1974, after a period of working in both New York and Paris.

With a name already established for extravagant and exotic fur designs for Revillon, he rapidly built on his reputation through the creation of elegant, easy separates with an ambiguous functionality—they had no obvious place in the formal etiquette of dress. Such clothes as his soft, fluid camisoles with matching pyjama trousers and wrapped jackets or overshirts could be worn just as easily to bed as to

from the Fifth Avenue Association and is now on the designation list of the New York Landmarks Preservation Commission.

Horace Saks died suddenly of septic poisoning in 1926. Bernard Gimbel's cousin Adam had been Horace's assistant and was named president of Saks Fifth Avenue. Handsome, charming, and gregarious, Adam created small specialty shops within the store, which he had redecorated in the dramatic Art Moderne style. He filled Saks Fifth Avenue with exclusive merchandise from Europe and the U.S. and established small boutiques that made custom men's shirts and ladies' made-to-order dresses. He built the dominant fine shoe business and believed in a large stock, even in difficult economic times, so customers could have a large range of choices. He opened the company's first Resort store in Palm Beach, Florida, becoming the first specialty store to expand nationally. Both chains prospered, with Gimbel's and Saks & Company supplying all income levels, while Saks Fifth Avenue appealed to the well-heeled. By 1969, the year Adam retired, there were 28 Saks Fifth Avenue stores in 16 states. In addition to the geographic expansion, Saks Fifth Avenue branched into direct mail sales by introducing Folio in 1970.

In 1973 the U.S. subsidiary of British American Tobacco (B.A.T.) offered to purchase Gimbel Bros. As the company was experiencing financial woes, it was a welcome bid. They renovated the Fifth Avenue store in 1978, closed the Gimbel chain in 1986, and planned a $300 million expansion the following year. Rather than face an unwelcome takeover, Saks Fifth Avenue was sold in 1990 for $1.6 billion. Bahrain-based Investcorp was an international investment group that also owned Gucci Group and Tiffany & Co. Phillip B. Miller, formerly of Neiman Marcus (1977–83) was named CEO of Saks Fifth Avenue.

Financial circumstances caused the firm to open Clearinghouse (Off 5th since 1995), an outlet store for Saks Fifth Avenue merchandise in 1992. In an effort to enhance its West Coast presence, the chain acquired four I. Magnin stores in 1994, though the chain was phased out in 1995. Also in 1995, Saks Fifth Avenue opened the largest store in Beverly Hills, Saks West. The following year, 1996, the holding company, Saks Holdings, went public and Main Street, more compact stores, opened to address the demand of small but wealthy areas.

Saks Holdings was purchased by Proffitt's, based in Birmingham, Alabama, in 1998 for $2.1 billion. The company, which already owned department store chains Carson, Pirie, Scott and Parisian, changed its name to Saks Incorporated to capitalize on the higher prestige of its new acquisition. Christina Johnson became the company's first female chief executive when she assumed the office of president and CEO of Saks Fifth Avenue in 2000. Phillip Miller remained chairman.

Saks Holdings plans to spin off Saks Fifth Avenue and Saks Off 5th, while the catalogue and online Saks Direct were abandoned in early 2001 because of poor sales of luxury items. The $6-billion enterprise operated 62 Saks Fifth Avenue, 50 Saks Off 5th, Saks Direct, 40 Parisian, and 203 stores under the names of Proffitt's, McRaes, Younkers, Herbergers, Carson, Pirie, Scott, Bergner's and Boston Store.

—Christina Lindholm

SANCHEZ, Fernando

Spanish designer working in New York

Born: Spain, 1934. Education: Studied fashion, École de la Chambre Syndicale de la Couture Parisienne, 1951–53. Career: Assistant designer, Maggy Rouff, Paris, 1953–56; designer, Hirsh of Brussels, circa 1956–58; designer for Dior boutiques, and Dior lingerie and knitwear licensees, Paris, Germany, Denmark and the U.S., 1960s; designer, Revillon, New York and Paris, 1961–73 and 1984–85; established own lingerie firm, New York, 1973; introduced ready-to-wear line, 1980; also designer for Vanity Fair, from 1984; regular attendee of the Igédo Dessous and Beach Show, Dusseldorf. Awards: Winner, International Wool Secretariat Competition, 1954; Coty American Fashion Critics award, 1975, 1981; Coty Special award for Lingerie, 1974, 1977; Council of Fashion Designers of America award, 1981. Address: 5 West 19th Street, New York, NY 10011, U.S.A.

PUBLICATIONS

On SANCHEZ:

Books

Milbank, Caroline Rennolds, New York Fashion: The Evolution of American Style, New York, 1989.

Stegemeyer, Anne, Who's Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.

Articles

Krenke, Mary, "Frivolous Fernando," in WWD, 16 September 1965.

Gross, Michael, "Glamor Guys," in New York, 23 May 1988.

McDowell, Colin, "Origin of the Species," in The Guardian (London), 18 October 1988.

Urquhart, Rachel, "Minimalism with a Flourish: Spanish Austerity and Oriental Fantasy Merge in Fernando Sanchez's Style," in Vogue, January 1989.

Romano-Benner, Norma, "Shaping the '90s," in Americas, September/October 1990.

Morris, Bernadine, "A Touch of Lingerie in Outerwear," in the New York Times, 28 April 1991.

Koski, Lorna, "The Survivor: Designer Fernando Sanchez Has Seen, Done—or Outlived—It All," in W (New York), July 1994.

Drier, Melissa, "U.S. Makers Enjoy Warm Welcome at Igédo," in WWD, 19 September 1994.

Munk, Nina, "The Beauty and the Beast," in Forbes, 23 October 1995.

"Autumn in New York," in WWD, 2 April 1998.

"Presidential Picks," in WWD, 6 September 2000.

* * *

Born of a Spanish father and a Flemish mother, Sanchez began his career in high fashion ready-to-wear in Paris after studying at the École de la Chambre Syndicale de la Couture. He started out at the house of Dior, where he produced knitwear, lingerie, and accessories for the prestigious company's chain of boutiques. From there he moved to design assistant at Yves Saint Laurent before starting up his own company in 1974, after a period of working in both New York and Paris.

With a name already established for extravagant and exotic fur designs for Revillon, he rapidly built on his reputation through the creation of elegant, easy separates with an ambiguous functionality—they had no obvious place in the formal etiquette of dress. Such clothes as his soft, fluid camisoles with matching pyjama trousers and wrapped jackets or overshirts could be worn just as easily to bed as to dinner at an upmarket restaurant. He was quickly assimilated into the circle of New York fashion designers, which at the time included Halston, Calvin Klein, and Mary McFadden.

Sanchez's experimentation with separates dressing struck a chord among affluent American women in the 1970s and seemed to fit the notion of independent femininity that had filtered into fashion imagery and marketing. The ideal of self-reliant womanhood was superficially acknowledged in the whole concept of separates—the idea of putting together garments in one's own individual way, rather than being dictated into sporting a designer look from head to toe. Sanchez's separates were, however, like those of other American designers, always created with an organic whole in mind.

In the 1980s Sanchez was recognized for his use of lace appliquéd which appeared extensively on his nightwear, and the fan motif became his trademark as was the bold use of synthetics and vibrant color. His more contemporary forays into the ready-to-wear market followed the same lines as his original, understated, and elegant ensembles—with their basis in the language of lingerie, for which he received Coty Special awards in 1974 and 1977.

The entire concept of underwear as outerwear, what Sanchez himself referred to as "homewear," was especially suited to the designer. He continued to experiment for the remainder of the 1970s and well into the 1990s, although in a less obvious fashion than Jean-Paul Gaultier or Dolce & Gabbana. Designs in middle and late 1990s were sleek, flirty slip dresses for the same sort of fashionably wealthy woman who, like her counterpart in the 1970s, didn't want to stand out from the crowd. Yet some Sanchez designs, like brightly colored ostrich-feather jackets, were intended for the opposite effect. Such creations also caught the eye of animal rights activists, who continued to protest the use of any animal or bird parts. Sanchez, like many of his fellow designers, including Nicole Miller, Karl Lagerfeld, and Ralph Lauren, wasn't terribly concerned about being politically correct—as long as the designs were selling.

Sanchez exhibited at the 1994 Igeldo Dessous and Beach show in Dusseldorf, Germany, at a time when many American designers stayed home. After a seven-year absence of the German show, the Igeldo trade fair nevertheless provided participants, like Sanchez, with a chance to hook up with European distributors. Expansion continued to be an important factor for Sanchez, especially since many had jumped on the innerwear-as-outerwear bandwagon. Yet Sanchez's designs were still among the best in the business. Anne Stegemeyer, writing in Who's Who in Fashion, Third Edition, (New York, 1996), described his designs as "Seductive, luxurious, trendsetting, and expensive...[he] has been given credit for reviving interest in extravagant underthings," long before Victoria's Secret came onto the scene. Women's Wear Daily similarly enthused in April 1998, "Sanchez sent out the beautiful silk slips and quilted kimonos his customer can't lounge without, and the evening looks—full-skirted taffeta dresses, velvet opera coats, and stretchy bodysuits with embroidered organza and tulle skirts—that make her feel grand."

—Caroline Cox; updated by Owen James

SANDER, Jil

German designer

Born: Heidemarie Jiline Sander in Wesselburen, Germany, 27 November 1943. Education: Graduated from Krefeld School of Textiles, near Düsseldorf, 1963; foreign exchange student, University of Los Angeles, 1963–64. Career: Fashion journalist, McCall's, Los Angeles, and for Constanze and Petra magazines, Hamburg, 1964–68; freelance clothing designer, 1968–73; opened first Jil Sander boutique, Hamburg, 1968; founded Jil Sander Moden, Hamburg, 1969; showed first women's collection, 1973; founded Jil Sander GmbH, 1978; introduced fragrance and cosmetics line, 1979; launched Jil Sander furs, 1982; debut of leather and eyewear collections, 1984; Jil Sander GmbH converted to public corporation, Jil Sander AG, 1989; opened Paris boutique, 1993; showed first menswear collection, 1993; opened flagship store, Hamburg, 1997; Prada bought stake in firm, 1999; departed the company bearing her name, 2000; barred from designing a competing Sander line, until 2003; fragrances include Woman Pure, Woman II, Woman III, Man Pure, Man II, Man III, Man IV, and Feeling Man. Awards: Fil d'Or award, 1980, 1981, 1982, 1983, 1984, 1985; City of Munich Fashion award, 1983; Vif-Journal Silberne Eule, 1983; Fédération Française du Prêt à Porter Feminin award, 1985; Aguja de Oro award, Madrid, 1986; Forum Preis, 1989. Address: Osterfeldstrasse 32–34, 22529 Hamburg, Germany. Website: www.jilsander.com.

Jil Sander, fall/winter 2001–02 collection. © AP/Wide World Photos.

dinner at an upmarket restaurant. He was quickly assimilated into the circle of New York fashion designers, which at the time included Halston, Calvin Klein, and Mary McFadden.

Sanchez's experimentation with separates dressing struck a chord among affluent American women in the 1970s and seemed to fit the notion of independent femininity that had filtered into fashion imagery and marketing. The ideal of self-reliant womanhood was superficially acknowledged in the whole concept of separates—the idea of putting together garments in one's own individual way, rather than being dictated into sporting a designer look from head to toe. Sanchez's separates were, however, like those of other American designers, always created with an organic whole in mind.

In the 1980s Sanchez was recognized for his use of lace appliquéd which appeared extensively on his nightwear, and the fan motif became his trademark as was the bold use of synthetics and vibrant color. His more contemporary forays into the ready-to-wear market followed the same lines as his original, understated, and elegant ensembles—with their basis in the language of lingerie, for which he received Coty Special awards in 1974 and 1977.

The entire concept of underwear as outerwear, what Sanchez himself referred to as "homewear," was especially suited to the designer. He continued to experiment for the remainder of the 1970s and well into the 1990s, although in a less obvious fashion than Jean-Paul Gaultier or Dolce & Gabbana. Designs in middle and late 1990s were sleek, flirty slip dresses for the same sort of fashionably wealthy woman who, like her counterpart in the 1970s, didn't want to stand out from the crowd. Yet some Sanchez designs, like brightly colored ostrich-feather jackets, were intended for the opposite effect. Such creations also caught the eye of animal rights activists, who continued to protest the use of any animal or bird parts. Sanchez, like many of his fellow designers, including Nicole Miller, Karl Lagerfeld, and Ralph Lauren, wasn't terribly concerned about being politically correct—as long as the designs were selling.

Sanchez exhibited at the 1994 Igeldo Dessous and Beach show in Dusseldorf, Germany, at a time when many American designers stayed home. After a seven-year absence of the German show, the Igeldo trade fair nevertheless provided participants, like Sanchez, with a chance to hook up with European distributors. Expansion continued to be an important factor for Sanchez, especially since many had jumped on the innerwear-as-outerwear bandwagon. Yet Sanchez's designs were still among the best in the business. Anne Stegemeyer, writing in Who's Who in Fashion, Third Edition, (New York, 1996), described his designs as "Seductive, luxurious, trendsetting, and expensive...[he] has been given credit for reviving interest in extravagant underthings," long before Victoria's Secret came onto the scene. Women's Wear Daily similarly enthused in April 1998, "Sanchez sent out the beautiful silk slips and quilted kimonos his customer can't lounge without, and the evening looks—full-skirted taffeta dresses, velvet opera coats, and stretchy bodysuits with embroidered organza and tulle skirts—that make her feel grand."

—Caroline Cox; updated by Owen James

SANDER, Jil

German designer

Born: Heidemarie Jiline Sander in Wesselburen, Germany, 27 November 1943. Education: Graduated from Krefeld School of Textiles,

Jil Sander, fall/winter 2001–02 collection. © AP/Wide World Photos.

near Düsseldorf, 1963; foreign exchange student, University of Los Angeles, 1963–64. Career: Fashion journalist, McCall's, Los Angeles, and for Constanze and Petra magazines, Hamburg, 1964–68; freelance clothing designer, 1968–73; opened first Jil Sander boutique, Hamburg, 1968; founded Jil Sander Moden, Hamburg, 1969; showed first women's collection, 1973; founded Jil Sander GmbH, 1978; introduced fragrance and cosmetics line, 1979; launched Jil Sander furs, 1982; debut of leather and eyewear collections, 1984; Jil Sander GmbH converted to public corporation, Jil Sander AG, 1989; opened Paris boutique, 1993; showed first menswear collection, 1993; opened flagship store, Hamburg, 1997; Prada bought stake in firm, 1999; departed the company bearing her name, 2000; barred from designing a competing Sander line, until 2003; fragrances include Woman Pure, Woman II, Woman III, Man Pure, Man II, Man III, Man IV, and Feeling Man. Awards: Fil d'Or award, 1980, 1981, 1982, 1983, 1984, 1985; City of Munich Fashion award, 1983; Vif-Journal Silberne Eule, 1983; Fédération Française du Prêt à Porter Feminin award, 1985; Aguja de Oro award, Madrid, 1986; Forum Preis, 1989. Address: Osterfeldstrasse 32–34, 22529 Hamburg, Germany. Website: www.jilsander.com.

Jil Sander, fall/winter 2001–02 collection. © AP/Wide World Photos.

PUBLICATION

On SANDER:

Books

Stegemeyer, Anne, Who's Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.

Articles

Mayer, Margit J., "Soft und Sander," in Deutsch Vogue (Munich), January 1990.

Gomez, Edward, "Less is More Luxurious," in Time, 25 June 1990.

Drier, Melissa, "Jil Sander," in Mirabella (New York), June 1991.

Mayer, Margit J., "Jil Sander: Ganz Privat," in Marie Claire (Germany), August 1991.

_____, "A Walk with Jil Sander," in W (New York), 30 September–7 October 1991.

Livingston, David, "A Vision of Strength: Jil Sander," in the Toronto Globe & Mail, 2 January 1992.

Miller, Annetta, "The Selling of Jil Sander," in Newsweek, 16 November 1992.

- Schaenen, Eve, "Minimalist No More," in Harper's Bazaar, March 1993.
- Rubenstein, Hal, "The Glorious Haunting of Jil Sander," in Interview, September 1993.
- La Ferla, Ruth, "Pure Style: Jil Sander Talks About Clothes...," in Elle (New York), February 1994.
- Bellafante, Ginia, "Lessons in Lessness," in Time, 7 November 1994.
- Spindler, Amy M., "Luminous Design from Jil Sander," in the New York Times, 8 March 1995.
- "Jil Sander: Coming on Strong," in WWD, 8 March 1995.
- Ozzard, Janet, "Jil Power," in WWD, 17 May 1995.
- Drier, Melissa, "Jil Goes Home," in WWD, 29 September 1997.
- "Milan's Minimal Man," in DNR, 14 January 1998.
- Bowles, Hamish, "More for Less," in Vogue, September 1998.
- "Jil's Smart Set," in WWD, 9 October 1998.
- "Technologically Speaking," in WWD, 5 March 1999.
- Cohen, Edie, "Minimalism with Mouldings," in Interior Design, April 1999.
- "Faded Glory," in WWD, 1 October 1999.
- Mui, Nelson, and Luisa Zargani, "Retailers Still See Viability of Sander's Men's Line," in DNR, 26 January 2000.
- Horyn, Cathy, "Up and Out, Jil Sander Makes a Clean Sweep," in the New York Times, 25 February 2000.
- Givhan, Robin, "Jil Sander and Prada: A Clash of Colors," in the Washington Post, 3 March 2000.
- "No Mending Fences for Jil Sander," in DNR, 7 April 2000.
- "The Council of Fashion Designers of America Honors the Year's Most Influential Designers at the American Fashion Awards 2000 Gala," in PR Newswire, 16 June 2000.
- "Jil Sander Profits Up," in WWD, 6 September 2000.
- Conti, Samantha, "Prada's Wild Ride," in WWD, 18 December 2000.
- Ball, Deborah, "The Brand Rules Fashion's New World," in the Wall Street Journal, 12 March 2001.
- "The Sander Saga," in WWD, 9 July 2001.
- Davis, Boyd (ed.), "Jil Sander," available online at Fashion Windows, www.fashionwindows.com, 3 October 2001.
- Guerrero, Clare, "Jil Sander," online at First Cut, www.firstcut.com, 3 October 2001.
- "Project Profile: Jil Sander Headquarters," online at Rambusch, www.rambusch.com, 3 October 2001.

* * *

Jil Sander has often been described as the Queen of German fashion, but her style and ambitions have always been international. Her company headquarters were located in the north German city of Hamburg, but her clothes were manufactured in Milan, where she showed for almost a decade before changing her venue to Paris. A self-made success story, Sander designed for independent, intelligent women around the world. She also created fragrances for both men and women, and began producing a menswear line in 1993.

Sander has a strong, modern sensibility, and her style has been described as luxurious minimalism, on the edge of forward. There were no frills or fads in Sander's world; everything irrelevant is eliminated. Like Giorgio Armani, she is one of the fashion world's most austere purists, a creator of designs so clean they seem stripped down to the bone. Yet it is not entirely accurate to describe her clothes as classic, because this would imply they are static, and Sander has never repeated bestselling designs from the previous collections.

"I find 'timeless' classic terribly boring," Sander told German Vogue in January 1990. "A classic is an excuse, because one is too lazy to confront the spirit of the time." Her own style of classicism always had a modern edge, and the woman who wears Sander's clothes "knows perfectly well what is 'in' this season, and has consciously reduced [it] to suit herself." Sander loves fashion and change and believes other women feel the same way. "We don't buy a new coat because we are cold. We buy things that animate, that give us a good feeling."

Sander has been one of the most important women designers working in both the 20th and 21st centuries, believing there are definite differences between male and female design sensibilities. Male designers, Sander told Mirabella in June 1991, tend to "see things more decoratively—more from the outside. I want to know how I feel in my clothes." She tries on all the clothes in her women's collection herself, to ensure they look and feel exactly right. They consistently have the high quality of the best menswear; they are beautifully tailored, and made from menswear-derived fabrics, often her own luxury fiber blends such as wool-silk or linen-silk. Yet her palette tends toward pale neutrals, which read as both strong and feminine.

Sander's combination of masculine and feminine design elements results in clothes that feel comfortable and look powerful but are also sexy in a subtle way. Her version of understated chic is not cheap, however. "If you want quality, it costs," she bluntly told Mirabella's journalist. (Her women's suits range from $1,500 to $6,500.) Think more and buy less, she advised. "People have already consumed too much." But as journalist Melissa Drier observed, Sander's clothes give women the same confidence that a hand-tailored suit gives a man.

The words "strong" and "powerful" occur frequently in Sander's conversation, revealing something of her own personality, as well as her design aesthetic and her ideal customer. "A powerful woman, a woman who knows who she is—I would say that is more interesting than a doll with the most beautiful nose in the world," she told Marie Claire in August 1991. And as if to complement the strong modern woman, Sander has called her men's fragrance Feeling Man.

Sander has had no sympathy for the old-fashioned concept of woman as sex kitten or status symbol. "It is possible to have a very sexy feeling without looking like a sex kitten," she commented to W in fall 1991. A woman wearing an austere, brown wool trouser-suit can look and feel sexy, she believes. The typical alta-modà woman might not be happy in Sander's clothes, but many women today do want clothes that express a liberated sensibility and a modern sensuality.

Sander's intuition, too, has guided her into unusual modes, which Women's Wear Daily typified as the "bold and controversial punch" that is her trademark. In 1997, she opened a Hamburg flagship on Neuer Wall, which she dubbed the city's emerging "Madison Avenue." Interior Design applauded her collaboration with American architect Michael Gabellini and characterized the two visionaries as "masters of minimalism." Her ambition turned to locations in Osaka, Zurich, Basel, St. Moritz, London, New York, Miami, and Costa Mesa, California.

In 1999 Sander abandoned the airy femininity of 1998 with its drapey rayons, metallic threads, and mesh and invigorated her line with vinyl tunics. Later in the year, she paired top and skirt in contrasting patterns. To soften the look, she reversed fabrics to present the faded underside. She detailed with ruching and pintucking and experimented with felted or rubber-coated wools. For a new men's line, she replaced the power suit with pared-down tweeds, cashmere, and boiled wools. For herself, she commissioned Renzo Mongiardino to refurbish her 19th-century villa in Hamburg.

Just as Sander was revolutionizing unyielding, cookie-cutter men's businesswear, her unforeseen exit from Hamburg-based Prada in January 2000 bemused the fashion hierarchy with more questions than answers. The dust-up with moneyman Patrizio Bertelli occurred five months after Prada invested in her fashion house. At the time, Sander saw Prada as a partner and looked to Bertelli for strength as she aimed at introducing a line of fashion accessories.

Chief executive Bertelli obviously discounted the element that sold Jil Sanders clothes. His refusal to budget her choice of fine fabrics and trims for her $3,000 suits, $6,000 coats, and $1,000 sweaters irrevocably destroyed their synergy. Critics tended to take her side on the issue of marketing versus quality. In March, the Washington Post mourned, "Sander's cool dedication to business, smart women and fine tailoring will be sorely missed."

Of Sander's instinct for fashion, Nancy Pearlstein of Louis in Boston stated, "I think she's probably one of the most talented people in the business. She has an exquisite sense of fine fabric and that knowledge is irreplaceable." Appropriately, the Council of Fashion Designers of America nominated Sander for the 2000 International award. Fashion analyst Boyd Davis crowed her the Queen of German Fashion.

Ironically, Sander's exit her company occurred when the firm was showing strong sales and profits. Milan Vukmirovic, formerly with Gucci, eased into Sander's place but without replicating her knack for style and luxe. Exuding confidence in Sander's replacement, Bertelli stated to Women's Wear Daily, "A brand that's as strong as Jil Sander doesn't need to rely on the name of a designer." A legal settlement prohibited Sander from designing a competing line until January 2003. Speculation envisioned her making up with Bertelli and paired her with Hermès as a replacement for Martin Margiela, but both rumors proved untrue. As models hit the runway wearing spring 2002 designs, the fashion world missed Sander's élan.

—Valerie Steele; updated by Mary Ellen Snodgrass

SANT'ANGELO, Giorgio

American designer

Born: Count Giorgio Imperiale di Sant'Angelo in Florence, 5 May 1933; raised in Argentina; immigrated to the U.S., 1962. Education: Studied architecture in Florence, industrial design in Barcelona, and art at the Sorbonne. Career: Animator, Walt Disney Studios, Hollywood, 1962–63; textile and jewelry designer, 1963–67; designer, Sant'Angelo, New York, from 1966; launched Sant'Angelo Ready-to-Wear, 1966; di Sant'Angelo Inc. established, 1968; began licensing for sportswear, outerwear, suits, neckwear, fragrances, home furnishings; firm continued after his death, 1989. Exhibitions: Metropolitan Museum of Art, Costume Institute, 1999. Awards: Coty American Fashion Critics award, 1968, 1970; Inspiration Home Furnishings award, New York, 1978; Knitted Textile Association Designer award, New York, 1982; Council of Fashion Designers of America award, 1987; Fashion Designers of America award, 1988.

Died: 29 August 1989, in New York. Company Address: 611 Broadway, New York, NY 10012, U.S.A.

"I find 'timeless' classic terribly boring," Sander told German Vogue in January 1990. "A classic is an excuse, because one is too lazy to confront the spirit of the time." Her own style of classicism always had a modern edge, and the woman who wears Sander's clothes "knows perfectly well what is 'in' this season, and has consciously reduced [it] to suit herself." Sander loves fashion and change and believes other women feel the same way. "We don't buy a new coat because we are cold. We buy things that animate, that give us a good feeling."

Sander has been one of the most important women designers working in both the 20th and 21st centuries, believing there are definite differences between male and female design sensibilities. Male designers, Sander told Mirabella in June 1991, tend to "see things more decoratively—more from the outside. I want to know how I feel in my clothes." She tries on all the clothes in her women's collection herself, to ensure they look and feel exactly right. They consistently have the high quality of the best menswear; they are beautifully tailored, and made from menswear-derived fabrics, often her own luxury fiber blends such as wool-silk or linen-silk. Yet her palette tends toward pale neutrals, which read as both strong and feminine.

Sander's combination of masculine and feminine design elements results in clothes that feel comfortable and look powerful but are also sexy in a subtle way. Her version of understated chic is not cheap, however. "If you want quality, it costs," she bluntly told Mirabella's journalist. (Her women's suits range from $1,500 to $6,500.) Think more and buy less, she advised. "People have already consumed too much." But as journalist Melissa Drier observed, Sander's clothes give women the same confidence that a hand-tailored suit gives a man.

The words "strong" and "powerful" occur frequently in Sander's conversation, revealing something of her own personality, as well as her design aesthetic and her ideal customer. "A powerful woman, a woman who knows who she is—I would say that is more interesting than a doll with the most beautiful nose in the world," she told Marie Claire in August 1991. And as if to complement the strong modern woman, Sander has called her men's fragrance Feeling Man.

Sander has had no sympathy for the old-fashioned concept of woman as sex kitten or status symbol. "It is possible to have a very sexy feeling without looking like a sex kitten," she commented to W in fall 1991. A woman wearing an austere, brown wool trouser-suit can look and feel sexy, she believes. The typical alta-modà woman might not be happy in Sander's clothes, but many women today do want clothes that express a liberated sensibility and a modern sensuality.

Sander's intuition, too, has guided her into unusual modes, which Women's Wear Daily typified as the "bold and controversial punch" that is her trademark. In 1997, she opened a Hamburg flagship on Neuer Wall, which she dubbed the city's emerging "Madison Avenue." Interior Design applauded her collaboration with American architect Michael Gabellini and characterized the two visionaries as "masters of minimalism." Her ambition turned to locations in Osaka, Zurich, Basel, St. Moritz, London, New York, Miami, and Costa Mesa, California.

In 1999 Sander abandoned the airy femininity of 1998 with its drapey rayons, metallic threads, and mesh and invigorated her line with vinyl tunics. Later in the year, she paired top and skirt in contrasting patterns. To soften the look, she reversed fabrics to present the faded underside. She detailed with ruching and pintucking and experimented with felted or rubber-coated wools. For a new men's line, she replaced the power suit with pared-down tweeds, cashmere, and boiled wools. For herself, she commissioned Renzo Mongiardino to refurbish her 19th-century villa in Hamburg.

Just as Sander was revolutionizing unyielding, cookie-cutter men's businesswear, her unforeseen exit from Hamburg-based Prada in January 2000 bemused the fashion hierarchy with more questions than answers. The dust-up with moneyman Patrizio Bertelli occurred five months after Prada invested in her fashion house. At the time, Sander saw Prada as a partner and looked to Bertelli for strength as she aimed at introducing a line of fashion accessories.

Chief executive Bertelli obviously discounted the element that sold Jil Sanders clothes. His refusal to budget her choice of fine fabrics and trims for her $3,000 suits, $6,000 coats, and $1,000 sweaters irrevocably destroyed their synergy. Critics tended to take her side on the issue of marketing versus quality. In March, the Washington Post mourned, "Sander's cool dedication to business, smart women and fine tailoring will be sorely missed."

Of Sander's instinct for fashion, Nancy Pearlstein of Louis in Boston stated, "I think she's probably one of the most talented people in the business. She has an exquisite sense of fine fabric and that knowledge is irreplaceable." Appropriately, the Council of Fashion Designers of America nominated Sander for the 2000 International award. Fashion analyst Boyd Davis crowed her the Queen of German Fashion.

Ironically, Sander's exit her company occurred when the firm was showing strong sales and profits. Milan Vukmirovic, formerly with Gucci, eased into Sander's place but without replicating her knack for style and luxe. Exuding confidence in Sander's replacement, Bertelli stated to Women's Wear Daily, "A brand that's as strong as Jil Sander doesn't need to rely on the name of a designer." A legal settlement prohibited Sander from designing a competing line until January 2003. Speculation envisioned her making up with Bertelli and paired her with Hermès as a replacement for Martin Margiela, but both rumors proved untrue. As models hit the runway wearing spring 2002 designs, the fashion world missed Sander's élan.

—Valerie Steele; updated by Mary Ellen Snodgrass

SANT'ANGELO, Giorgio

American designer

Born: Count Giorgio Imperiale di Sant'Angelo in Florence, 5 May 1933; raised in Argentina; immigrated to the U.S., 1962. Education: Studied architecture in Florence, industrial design in Barcelona, and art at the Sorbonne. Career: Animator, Walt Disney Studios, Hollywood, 1962–63; textile and jewelry designer, 1963–67; designer, Sant'Angelo, New York, from 1966; launched Sant'Angelo Ready-to-Wear, 1966; di Sant'Angelo Inc. established, 1968; began licensing for sportswear, outerwear, suits, neckwear, fragrances, home furnishings; firm continued after his death, 1989. Exhibitions: Metropolitan Museum of Art, Costume Institute, 1999. Awards: Coty American Fashion Critics award, 1968, 1970; Inspiration Home Furnishings award, New York, 1978; Knitted Textile Association Designer award, New York, 1982; Council of Fashion Designers of America award, 1987; Fashion Designers of America award, 1988.

Died: 29 August 1989, in New York. Company Address: 611 Broadway, New York, NY 10012, U.S.A.

PUBLICATIONSOn SANT'ANGELO:*Books

- Morris, Bernadine, and Barbara Walz, The Fashion Makers, New York, 1978.
- Milbank, Caroline Rennolds, New York Fashion: The Evolution of American Style, New York, 1989.
- Stegemeyer, Anne, Who's Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.

Articles

- Mazzaraco, M., "Di Sant'Angelo's Head," in WWD, 16 October 1968.
- Nemy, Enid, "It Takes a Little Bit of Being Yourself," in the New York Times, 4 March 1969.
- "Restless Count from Italy Who Took Picasso's Advice," in Life, 7 March 1969.
- Klensch, Elsa, "Sant'Angelo Superstar," in WWD, 4 February 1972.
- Haber, Holly, "Sant'Angelo, a Master of Fantasy, Dies," in WWD, 31 August 1989.
- Polan, Brenda, "Sant'Angelo: Lycra Looks," [obituary] in The Guardian (London), 1 September 1989.
- Moore, Jackie, "Obituary: Giorgio Sant'Angelo," in the Independent (London), 4 September 1989.
- "Giorgio di Sant'Angelo: 1933–1989," [obituary] in Vogue, November 1989.
- Wilson, Eric, and Rusty Williamson, "The Ups and Downs of Building a Dress Line," in WWD, 7 March 2000.
- Gilbert, Daniela, "What Gives? The Continuing Popularity of Stretch Fabrics in the Fashion Industry," in WWD, 12 June 2001.

* * *

Giorgio di Sant'Angelo (the "di" was later dropped) was a child of the 1960s. Unlike many of the decade's talented new designers—including Pierre Cardin, André Courrèges, and Rudi Gernreich—who suffered symptoms of career burnout as the 1960s came to a close, Sant'Angelo soared on a creative high. His formative years, leading up to his move to New York, included an education in the arts in Florence and a studio apprenticeship with Picasso who urged Sant'Angelo to trust his own restless creativity and to keep trying new artistic ventures.

Sant'Angelo, who had an affinity for the new plastics developed with futuristic technology, designed Lucite jewelry and accessories in colorful geometric shapes. Diana Vreeland, editor of Vogue from 1963–71, found his designs to be in step with her own ideas and gave him carte blanche as a stylist. The results of their association during the late 1960s were stunning examples of the breadth of Sant'Angelo's originality. His concoctions of colored Veruschka were the peak of fashion fantasy. This option of make-believe went beyond mere merchandise shown in a magazine layout. His work was theatrical, exotic, and on some level could be considered performance art; this taste for escapism through dress coincided with the escalation of the Vietnam War beginning in 1968.

Inspired by hippie and street fashions, Sant'Angelo also translated ideas that would fit the marketplace. His love of ethnic clothing was evident, and his gypsy looks included elements of romanticism. Introducing a modern component, he incorporated Lycra body suits with these varied influences. He offered women a chance at self-expression through dress. In 1972 Sant'Angelo left behind his gypsy and Native American inspirations and concentrated on body-conscious designs combining knits and wovens. His 33-piece collection was shown at the Guggenheim Museum and further emphasized Sant'Angelo's commitment to fashion design as an artform. "To me, soul means freedom and inner confidence," Sant'Angelo commented on the collection. "I express it in happy, bright colors, and in simplicity of design." He presented matching knit shirts, tops, trousers, and bras that folded into an envelope for travel. These pieces were based around a body stocking and formed the 1970s American fashion silhouette.

An old advertisement read, "Giorgio Sant'Angelo Spoken Here," a true statement as how he saw his work as a new language in fashion. He admired the ideas of Rudi Gernreich, whose work also contributed key elements to modern design. He also respected the work of Halston, Elsa Peretti, Betsey Johnson, Stephen Burrows, Oscar de la Renta, Yves Saint Laurent, Pierre Cardin, and Valentino. Throughout the 1980s fashion shifts, Sant'Angelo worked on classical refinements of his own concepts. Poised for a timely reemergence as a name in fashion, Giorgio Sant'Angelo died in 1989. A truly original free spirit was lost forever, yet his name lived on with his company, and as inspiration for a new generation of designers making retro the hottest trend of the late 1990s and early 2000s. Among his admirers were David Meister, whose spring 2002 collection was reminiscent of Sant'Angelo styles from throughout the 1970s, as well as Marc Jacobs who winked at the hip decade's duds in his spring 2002 showing.

—Myra Walker

SARNE, Tanya

See GHOST

SARVEA, Jimmy

See TRANSPORT

SASSOON, David

See BELLVILLE SASSOON-LORCAN MULLANY

SAUL, Joan and Roger

See MULBERRY

SAVINI, Gaetano

See BRIONI

SCAASI, Arnold

American designer

Born: Arnold Isaacs in Montreal, Canada, 8 May 1931. Education: Studied fashion design at École Cotnoir Capponi, Montreal, 1953, and at the École de la Chambre Syndicale de la Haute Couture Parisienne, 1954–55; apprenticed one year with Paquin. Career: Moved to New York, worked with Charles James, 1951–53; freelance designer in New York working for Dressmaker Casuals and Lilly Daché, 1955–57; opened own business, 1957; president/designer, Arnold Scaasi Inc., from 1962; designer, Scaasi couture collections, from 1962; designer, ready-to-wear collections, 1962–63, 1969, and from 1984; introduced signature fragrance and dressed First Lady Barbara Bush for inauguration, 1989; inked licensing deal with Warnaco for leisurewear, 1995; began designing for First Lady Laura Bush, 2001; debuted new leisurewear collection for QVC, 2001. Exhibitions: Retrospective, New York State Theater, Lincoln Center, New York, 1975; Scaasi: The Joy of Dressing Up, New York, 1996, then Ohio State University, 1998. Awards: Coty American Fashion Critics award, 1958; Neiman Marcus award, 1959; Council of Fashion Designers of America (CFDA) award, 1987; Pratt Institute

Arnold Scaasi, spring 1968 collection: white feather ball gown.
© AP/Wide World Photos.

Design award, 1989; Girl Scout Council of Greater New York Salute, 1990; Dallas International Apparel Fashion Excellence award, 1992; CFDA Lifetime Achievement award, 1996. Address: 681 Fifth Avenue, New York, NY 10022–4209, U.S.A.

PUBLICATIONS

On SCAASI:

Books

- Morris, Bernadine, and Barbara Walz, The Fashion Makers, New York, 1978.
Diamonstein, Barbaralee, Fashion: The Inside Story, New York, 1985.
Milbank, Caroline Rennolds, New York Fashion: The Evolution of American Style, New York, 1989.
Daria, Irene, The Fashion Cycle, New York, 1990.
Morris, Bernadine, Scaasi: A Cut Above, New York, 1996.
Stegemeyer, Anne, Who's Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.

Articles

- Schwartzbaum, Lisa, "The Dramatist of Elegance," in Connoisseur (New York), July 1984.
Reed, Julia, "Little Big Man," in Vogue, April 1989.
Milbank, Caroline Rennolds, "Scaasi's New Stars," in Connoisseur, June 1989.
Sporkin, Elizabeth, "Scaasi," in People, 23 April 1990.
Shaeffer, Claire, "American Haute Couture," in Threads (Newtown, CT), December/January 1991–92.
Goodman, Wendy, "Palm Beach Story," in House & Garden, August 1992.
Pogoda, Dianne M., "Scaasi: $50,000 at Saks Bridal," in WWD, 5 March 1996.
"Blum & Fink Gets Scaasi Fur License," in WWD, 2 April 1996.
White, Constance C.R., "Scaasi Revisited," in the New York Times, 28 May 1996.
Sullivan, Robert, "Capitalist Tulle," in Vogue, October 1996.
Witchel, Alex, "A Polka-Dot Defender at Glamor's Gate," in the New York Times, 3 October 1996.
Brubach, Holly, "The Social Fabric," in the New York Times Magazine, 13 October 1996.
"Scaasi: A Cut Above," [review] in Publishers Weekly, 14 October 1996.
Vienne, Veronique, "The Scaasi's the Limit," in Town & Country, November 1996.
Luscombe, Belinda, "Seen & Heard," in Time, 10 February 1997.
DeCaro, Frank, "Fashion Chat," in TV Guide, 22 March 1997.
Taub, Bernadine, "Arnold Scaasi—A Conversation About the Evolution in Fashion," in WWD, 13 September 1999.
Sheehan, Susan, "The Scaasi Perspective," in Architectural Digest, November 2000.
"Dowdy No More?" in Time, 4 June 2001.
Monget, Karyn, "QVC Hits: Scaasi, Herman," in WWD, 11 June 2001.
"Mrs. Bush, Making it Scaasi in Europe," in the Washington Post, 29 June 2001.
Menkes, Suzy, "Scaasi: A Glitzy Tribute to 40 Years of Couture," available online at Style.com, www.iht.com, 3 October 2001.

"The Scaasi Exhibit," online at Ohio State: The College of Human Ecology, www.hec.ohio-state.edu, 3 October 2001.

*

Clothes should be worn to make one feel good, to flatter and as a statement of personality. The overall effect should always be a well-groomed look, not sloppy.... This is not a matter of self-indulgence; when you know you look your best, you face the day and the world with great self-assurance.

It's most important that one chooses clothes that work for their lifestyle, both financially and psychologically...I try to design clothes that will flatter the female form. I create clothes that are pretty, usually with an interesting mix of fabrics. I like luxurious fabrics, great quality for day, opulence for evening dresses. I am definitely not a minimalist designer! Clothes with some adornment are more interesting to look at and more fun to wear.

I believe clothes should touch and define the body at least in one spot. Most of my clothes have a defined waist and hipline, with some movement below the hip. Bustlines are always defined and I am known for low décolletage—either off-the-shoulder, strapless or simply scooped-out necklines. Sweetheart necklines are also flattering and I use them constantly. I prefer using color to black and white though sometimes black and/or white are most dramatic. Shades of red, pink, turquoise, violet and sapphire blue can be more flattering and exciting to look at.

At one point in my career I used an enormous amount of printed fabrics and found them wonderful to work with. However, in recent seasons my eye has changed and the prints seemed to have faded from fashion. Before long, the print craze will probably return as women—and designers—get bored with solid fabrics. In place of prints we are using more embroideries to give texture and life to the fabrics.

Lastly, clothes should be fun with a dash of fantasy. Scaasi creations are the champagne and caviar of the fashion world, as a very prominent Queen once said, "Let them eat cake!" I do hope I won't have my head chopped off for these thoughts!

—Arnold Scaasi

* * *

As a young apprentice to Charles James during the early 1950s, Arnold Scaasi was imprinted by James' concentration on "building" an evening dress as a sculpture. This early training led Scaasi to construct dresses in the round and to approach design as three-dimensional form. The influence of James has been a lifelong inspiration for Scaasi; another was the richness of the fabrics and furs used during the 1950s, when the prerequisite for women was to be perfectly dressed from head to toe.

Scaasi began to rethink his objectives after juggling a career during the late 1950s and early 1960s that included menswear, children's wear, and costume jewelry, in addition to ladies' ready-to-wear and custom designs. He decided to focus strategically on couture dressmaking at a time when Paris couture was beginning to suffer. It was 1964 when Scaasi debuted his collection of eveningwear. He was able to take the freedom of the youth-obsessed 1960s and channel the energy into designs that featured keen attention to details and the workmanship of couture dressing.

Scaasi emphasized sequins, fringe, and feathers as trims, substituting new fabrics to create an ostentatious signature style that included minidresses, trouser suits, and the use of transparency. Barbra Streisand wore a memorable Scaasi creation to the 1969 Academy Awards. His customers have often been the celebrated rich and famous—Elizabeth Taylor, Ivana Trump, Blaine Trump, Joan Rivers, Barbara Walters, and many other glamorous clients have favored Scaasi for years.

During the 1970s, styles changed to a more body-conscious, pared-down way of dressing. Scaasi, true to form, turned to dressing women who still loved to be noticed, such as artist Louise Nevelson. It made sense to Scaasi to continue creating what he was known for and what he loved to do. The basis of his work has been a combination of cut, color sensibility, and fabric selections recalling a past elegance yet which continue to speak to his clients' most current desires.

The 1980s, the Reagan era, ushered in a renaissance of upscale dressing perfect for the Scaasi touch. He dressed First Lady Barbara Bush for the inaugural ball and designed her wardrobe for the week of festivities. Never one to concern himself with everyday dressing, Scaasi dressed the urban woman who attends parties, galas, charity balls, and elaborate dinners. His customer is affluent and has a personality enabling her to wear a Scaasi creation. Often described as lavish, sumptuous, and magical, Scaasi's evening gowns are worn for making a sensational entrance.

Fashion editor Bernardine Morris' book, Scaasi: A Cut Above (1996) traced the designer from his beginnings to wardrobing such elite clientèle as singer Aretha Franklin, actresses Joan Crawford and Elizabeth Taylor, and socialites Brooke Astor and Charlotte Ford. Simultaneous with the publication of the book, the New York Historical Society presented Scaasi: The Joy of Dressing Up, a showcase of Scaasi's four decades accommodating the varied tastes of actresses, First Ladies, and many other memorable clients. Featured in the collection were two drop-waist off-the-shoulder gowns, a wedding dress, and an afternoon suit trimmed in fur with matching hat.

Drawing on his 75 scrapbooks for past successes, Scaasi expressed his delight in seeing people enjoy the experience of dressing well in couture ensembles, which tends to require numerous tedious fittings. The 1996 New York retrospective coincided with his Lifetime Achievement award from the Council of Fashion Designers of America, presented by Barbara Bush. Two years later, Ohio State's College of Human Ecology opened a three-month exhibit, a reprise of the New York tribute. Curator Gayle Streege accented the line's elegance and rich taffetas, lace, chiffons, velvets, satins, and jerseys.

In 1999 Scaasi helped satisfy the spunky American buyer hungering for a change. In explanation of his philosophy, he stressed to Women's Wear Daily writer Bernadine Taub that designers must listen to their clientèle. He summarized his own philosophy of assisting women to appear at their best: "A look doesn't happen out of the air—it comes from what someone wants or needs." One needy customer brought Scaasi immediate media acclaim. He reportedly rescued Laura Bush from the fashion scrap heap in 2001 after the inauguration of her husband, George W. Bush. To upgrade her down-home Texas wardrobe to a snappier, more photogenic look, he made suits and a coattail for a state tour of Europe. To enhance her appearance for the media, he created ensembles stressing vivid, cheerful shades of tomato red, green, lapis, and turquoise.

Midyear 2001 was a financial success for Scaasi's Leisure Collection for QVC, which sold 4,500 pieces netting $250 million. His line showcased rose prints, leopard stripes, and tropical flora in at-home caftans and patio dresses. According to the Washington Post, he informed critics that he aimed for a feminine, pretty look, warning, "If you don't want those kinds of clothes, don't come to me."

—Myra Walker; updated by Mary Ellen Snodgrass

SCHAEFER, Thomas,

See RENÉ LEZARD

SCHERRER, Jean-Louis

French designer

Born: Paris, circa 1936. Education: Studied ballet, Conservatoire de Danse Classique, Paris, and fashion, Chambre Syndicale de la Couture Parisienne. Career: Assistant at Christian Dior, 1955–57, and to Saint Laurent at Dior after Dior's death, 1957–59; left to design for Louis Féraud, 1959–61; founded Jean-Louis Scherrer label, 1962; ready-to-wear collection and Scherrer Boutique ready-to-wear lines introduced, 1971; signature fragrance, 1980; Scherrer 2 perfume, 1986; bath line, 1981; bought by Japanese firm, Sebu-Saison Group, 1990; diffusion line, Scherrer City, 1992; Scherrer replaced by Erik Mortensen and forced out of company, 1992; signed menswear license with Société Korn, 1994; Bernard Perris hired to head design department, 1994–97; Stéphane Rolland hired as designer, 1998; opened shop in Beijing, 2001; Parfums Jean-Louis Scherrer spun off, 2001. Awards: Dé d'Or award, Paris, 1980. Address: 51 avenue Montaigne, 75008 Paris, France.

PUBLICATIONS

On SCHERRER:

Books

Lambert, Eleanor, World of Fashion: People, Places, Resources, New York, 1976.

McDowell, Colin, Directory of 20th Century Fashion, London, 1984.

Articles

"In Paris, a Squabble over M. Scherrer's Good Name," in the Times (London), 24 June 1969.

"Scherrer: Third Time Round, But No Revolution," in the Times, 26 January 1971.

"...And Why Haute Couture is Still Fun," in the Sunday Times, 28 July 1974.

"Le point sur les collections: Jean-Louis Scherrer," in L'Officiel (Paris), March & September 1986.

"Beauty—Daughters with Dash: Laetitia Scherrer," in Vogue, September 1988.

Petkanes, Christopher, "Flair à la Scherrer," in Harper's Bazaar, December 1988.

"Scherrer Deal for Japanese," in the New York Times, 12 April 1990.

"Hearing in Scherrer v. Scherrer Delayed," in WWD, 23 March 1994.

"Jean-Louis Scherrer S.A.," in DNR, 18 May 1994.

Godfrey, Deeny, "House of Scherrer Names Perris Couture, Ready-to-Wear Designer," in WWD, 7 September 1994.

Weisman, Katherine, "Emmanuelle Khanh Said to Be in Talks to Buy Jean-Louis Scherrer," in WWD, 5 June 1997.

"Scherrer Skips Spring, Readies Fall Collections," in WWD, 13 January 1998.

"Fashion Extravaganza: A Fashion-Full December Beckons..." in the Bangkok Post, 4 December 2000.

"Tantalising Scherrer: The Latest Fashion Show at the Oriental Was a Shimmering Display of Elegance and Decadence..." in the Bangkok Post, 28 December 2000.

* * *

His early training as a dancer exposed Jean-Louis Scherrer to theatrical costumes and prepared him to design clothes that would suit the public roles of women connected with politics, theatre, and the arts, as well as the more private roles lived by the wives of wealthy Arabs, whose patronage once accounted for up to a third of the House of Scherrer's income.

From an early apprenticeship with Christian Dior in Paris, Scherrer learned the basics of cutting and draping, alongside a young Yves Saint Laurent. When Saint Laurent inherited the house of Dior, Scherrer successfully started his own haute couture establishment during a period when critics foretold the demise of traditional couture. He quickly became known for designs described as classic, restrained, sophisticated, and sexy but not vulgar. His customers read like a roster of the world's wealthiest women: Mme. Anne-Aymone Giscard d'Estaing, wife of the then-President of France, as well as his daughter, Valerie-Anne Montassier; Baroness Thyssen; Olympia and Nadine de Rothschild; Queen Noor, the wife of the then-King of Jordan; Patricia Kennedy Lawford; Isabelle d'Ornano; Ann Getty; Nan Kempner; Françoise Sagan; Michèle Morgan; Raquel Welch; and Sophia Loren.

In the mid-1970s dozens of American stores, including Bergdorf Goodman in New York, carried Scherrer. Chiffon evening dresses, often accented with sequined embroideries, were a staple, as was deluxe ready-to-wear. These were simpler clothes, more moderately priced than the thousands of dollars of the couture, but still expensive-looking. One such boutique outfit, modeled by Scherrer's daughter Laetitia, featured a leopard print shaped blazer jacket with matching leopard cloche hat, worn with a slim black leather skirt.

Scherrer was not a maker of trends, but of refined deluxe versions of trends. When everyone was showing tiered flounced skirts during the 1980s, Scherrer made a restrained version that just grazed the knee and was topped by a long-sleeved shirt-collared bodice, in luxurious silk. A prime example of Scherrer's hallmark "exotically pampered appearance" was a lavishly embroidered coat in mink-bordered beige informed critics that he aimed for a feminine, pretty look, warning, "If you don't want those kinds of clothes, don't come to me."

—Myra Walker; updated by Mary Ellen Snodgrass

SCHAEFER, Thomas,

See RENÉ LEZARD

SCHERRER, Jean-Louis

French designer

Born: Paris, circa 1936. Education: Studied ballet, Conservatoire de Danse Classique, Paris, and fashion, Chambre Syndicale de la Couture Parisienne. Career: Assistant at Christian Dior, 1955–57, and to Saint Laurent at Dior after Dior's death, 1957–59; left to design for Louis Féraud, 1959–61; founded Jean-Louis Scherrer label, 1962; ready-to-wear collection and Scherrer Boutique ready-to-wear lines introduced, 1971; signature fragrance, 1980; Scherrer 2 perfume, 1986; bath line, 1981; bought by Japanese firm, Sebu-Saison Group, 1990; diffusion line, Scherrer City, 1992; Scherrer replaced by Erik Mortensen and forced out of company, 1992; signed menswear license with Société Korn, 1994; Bernard Perris hired to head design department, 1994–97; Stéphane Rolland hired as designer, 1998; opened shop in Beijing, 2001; Parfums Jean-Louis Scherrer spun off, 2001. Awards: Dé d'Or award, Paris, 1980. Address: 51 avenue Montaigne, 75008 Paris, France.

PUBLICATIONS

On SCHERRER:

Books

Lambert, Eleanor, World of Fashion: People, Places, Resources, New York, 1976.

McDowell, Colin, Directory of 20th Century Fashion, London, 1984.

Articles

"In Paris, a Squabble over M. Scherrer's Good Name," in the Times (London), 24 June 1969.

"Scherrer: Third Time Round, But No Revolution," in the Times, 26 January 1971.

"...And Why Haute Couture is Still Fun," in the Sunday Times, 28 July 1974.

"Le point sur les collections: Jean-Louis Scherrer," in L'Officiel (Paris), March & September 1986.

"Beauty—Daughters with Dash: Laetitia Scherrer," in Vogue, September 1988.

Petkanes, Christopher, "Flair à la Scherrer," in Harper's Bazaar, December 1988.

"Scherrer Deal for Japanese," in the New York Times, 12 April 1990.

"Hearing in Scherrer v. Scherrer Delayed," in WWD, 23 March 1994.

"Jean-Louis Scherrer S.A.," in DNR, 18 May 1994.

Godfrey, Deeny, "House of Scherrer Names Perris Couture, Ready-to-Wear Designer," in WWD, 7 September 1994.

Weisman, Katherine, "Emmanuelle Khanh Said to Be in Talks to Buy Jean-Louis Scherrer," in WWD, 5 June 1997.

"Scherrer Skips Spring, Readies Fall Collections," in WWD, 13 January 1998.

"Fashion Extravaganza: A Fashion-Full December Beckons..." in the Bangkok Post, 4 December 2000.

"Tantalising Scherrer: The Latest Fashion Show at the Oriental Was a Shimmering Display of Elegance and Decadence..." in the Bangkok Post, 28 December 2000.

* * *

His early training as a dancer exposed Jean-Louis Scherrer to theatrical costumes and prepared him to design clothes that would suit the public roles of women connected with politics, theatre, and the arts, as well as the more private roles lived by the wives of wealthy Arabs, whose patronage once accounted for up to a third of the House of Scherrer's income.

From an early apprenticeship with Christian Dior in Paris, Scherrer learned the basics of cutting and draping, alongside a young Yves Saint Laurent. When Saint Laurent inherited the house of Dior, Scherrer successfully started his own haute couture establishment during a period when critics foretold the demise of traditional couture. He quickly became known for designs described as classic, restrained, sophisticated, and sexy but not vulgar. His customers read like a roster of the world's wealthiest women: Mme. Anne-Aymone Giscard d'Estaing, wife of the then-President of France, as well as his daughter, Valerie-Anne Montassier; Baroness Thyssen; Olympia and Nadine de Rothschild; Queen Noor, the wife of the then-King of Jordan; Patricia Kennedy Lawford; Isabelle d'Ornano; Ann Getty; Nan Kempner; Françoise Sagan; Michèle Morgan; Raquel Welch; and Sophia Loren.

In the mid-1970s dozens of American stores, including Bergdorf Goodman in New York, carried Scherrer. Chiffon evening dresses, often accented with sequined embroideries, were a staple, as was deluxe ready-to-wear. These were simpler clothes, more moderately priced than the thousands of dollars of the couture, but still expensive-looking. One such boutique outfit, modeled by Scherrer's daughter Laetitia, featured a leopard print shaped blazer jacket with matching leopard cloche hat, worn with a slim black leather skirt.

Scherrer was not a maker of trends, but of refined deluxe versions of trends. When everyone was showing tiered flounced skirts during the 1980s, Scherrer made a restrained version that just grazed the knee and was topped by a long-sleeved shirt-collared bodice, in luxurious silk. A prime example of Scherrer's hallmark "exotically pampered appearance" was a lavishly embroidered coat in mink-bordered beige cashmere, hooded, reminiscent of Anna Karenina and following in the footsteps of Saint Laurent's revolutionary Russian-inspired looks of the late 1970s. Scherrer, in fact, often borrowed exotic details from the East. Chinoiserie and Mongolian-inspired coats and jackets frequently appeared in his collections. At the apex of 1980s opulence in couture, Scherrer indulged in pearl-decorated rajah jackets, tunics, and trousers. In a spirit of Arabian Nights fantasy much like Paul Poiret's, jeweled and feathered turbans completed the ensembles.

Even Scherrer's day clothes featured opulent touches: velvet appliqués on wool, or gold piping on trenchcoats. Chiffon and silk were used for dresses and skirts; leathers and furs decorated coats. While hemlines rose during the remainder of the decade, Scherrer continued to show calf-length skirts. For him, surface texture and sumptuous workmanship were more important than innovative lines. The longer covered-up fashions satisfied his customers' modesty requirements, dictated by Islamic law, while also proclaiming their wealth and status.

Into the 1990s Scherrer continued to employ luxury materials and to explore a variety of trends—long, short, bright colors (a departure from conservative beiges, grays, and white), patchwork prints, plaids, jumpsuits, feminine versions of men's suits and hunting attire. The Scherrer boutique continued to offer sleek toned-down versions of the high fashion items in over 100 markets in 25 countries. In Europe and Japan scores of Jean-Louis Scherrer accessories could be obtained, and a bestselling signature perfume launched in 1979 was followed by a spicy floral haute couture perfume, Scherrer 2, in 1986.

Financial difficulties resulted in the late 1992 firing of Scherrer from the firm he founded, and he fought back in the following year in court, winning a cash settlement but not the use of his name. The company, Jean-Louis Scherrer S.A., however, continued by hiring Erik Mortensen as couture designer, then announced a licensing agreement for a new menswear collection with Société Korn in 1994. Mortensen was replaced by Bernard Perris, and soon rumors of a possible sale of the embattled house circulated in the industry. Denied by both Seibu-Saison (which owned 95-percent of the company) and Hermès (which owned the remaining 5-percent), the rumors persisted, and in 1997 Groupe Emmanuelle Khanh bought the ailing fashion house.

Soon after the acquisition, Perris departed as artistic director and Stephane Rolland was appointed new designer in 1998. By the 21st century, the house of Jean-Louis Scherrer had bounced back with a flashy showing in Bangkok and the opening of a new location in Beijing. The Bangkok show, commemorating the golden wedding anniversary of the King and Queen of Thailand, showcased Rolland's bright, nature-inspired prints as well as the sophisticated, feminine dresses and separates for which the company was renowned.

—Therese Duzinkiewicz Baker; updated by Nelly Rhodes

SCHIAPARELLI, Elsa

French designer

Born: Rome, 10 September 1890. Family: Married Comte William de Wendt de Kerlor, 1914 (separated); children: Yvonne ("Gogo").

Career: Lived in New York working as scriptwriter and translator, 1919–22 and 1941–44; immigrated to Paris, 1923; showed first collection, 1925; house of Schiaparelli operated, 1928–54; London branch opened, 1933, girls' debutante department added, 1935; Schiaparelli Paris boutique opened, 1935; lecturer on fashion, 1940, and volunteer in U.S. for French war effort, 1941–43; fragrances include Salut, Soucis, and Schiap, 1934; Shocking, 1937; Sleeping, 1938; Snuff for men, 1939; Le Roi Soleil, 1946; Zut, 1948; Succès Fou, 1953; Si, 1957; and S, 1961. Exhibitions: Hommage à Elsa Schiaparelli, Pavillon des Arts, Paris, 1984; Fashion and Surrealism, Fashion Institute of Technology, New York, and Victoria and Albert Museum, London, 1987–88; Elsa Schiaparelli, Brooklyn Museum, 1995–96. Awards: Neiman Marcus award, 1940. Died: 13 November 1973, in Paris.

PUBLICATIONS

By SCHIAPARELLI:

Books

Shocking Life, London, 1954.

On SCHIAPARELLI:

Books

Flanner, Janet, An American in Paris, New York, 1940.

Bertin, Celia, Paris à la Mode: A Voyage of Discovery, London, 1956.

Latour, Anny, Kings of Fashion, London, 1958.

Hommage à Elsa Schiaparelli [exhibition catalogue], Paris, 1984.

Elsa Schiaparelli, 1937: lamé dihabille. © Bettmann/CORBIS.

cashmere, hooded, reminiscent of Anna Karenina and following in the footsteps of Saint Laurent's revolutionary Russian-inspired looks of the late 1970s. Scherrer, in fact, often borrowed exotic details from the East. Chinoiserie and Mongolian-inspired coats and jackets frequently appeared in his collections. At the apex of 1980s opulence in couture, Scherrer indulged in pearl-decorated rajah jackets, tunics, and trousers. In a spirit of Arabian Nights fantasy much like Paul Poiret's, jeweled and feathered turbans completed the ensembles.

Even Scherrer's day clothes featured opulent touches: velvet appliqués on wool, or gold piping on trenchcoats. Chiffon and silk were used for dresses and skirts; leathers and furs decorated coats. While hemlines rose during the remainder of the decade, Scherrer continued to show calf-length skirts. For him, surface texture and sumptuous workmanship were more important than innovative lines. The longer covered-up fashions satisfied his customers' modesty requirements, dictated by Islamic law, while also proclaiming their wealth and status.

Into the 1990s Scherrer continued to employ luxury materials and to explore a variety of trends—long, short, bright colors (a departure from conservative beiges, grays, and white), patchwork prints, plaids, jumpsuits, feminine versions of men's suits and hunting attire. The Scherrer boutique continued to offer sleek toned-down versions of the high fashion items in over 100 markets in 25 countries. In Europe and Japan scores of Jean-Louis Scherrer accessories could be obtained, and a bestselling signature perfume launched in 1979 was followed by a spicy floral haute couture perfume, Scherrer 2, in 1986.

Financial difficulties resulted in the late 1992 firing of Scherrer from the firm he founded, and he fought back in the following year in court, winning a cash settlement but not the use of his name. The company, Jean-Louis Scherrer S.A., however, continued by hiring Erik Mortensen as couture designer, then announced a licensing agreement for a new menswear collection with Société Korn in 1994. Mortensen was replaced by Bernard Perris, and soon rumors of a possible sale of the embattled house circulated in the industry. Denied by both Seibu-Saison (which owned 95-percent of the company) and Hermès (which owned the remaining 5-percent), the rumors persisted, and in 1997 Groupe Emmanuelle Khanh bought the ailing fashion house.

Soon after the acquisition, Perris departed as artistic director and Stephane Rolland was appointed new designer in 1998. By the 21st century, the house of Jean-Louis Scherrer had bounced back with a flashy showing in Bangkok and the opening of a new location in Beijing. The Bangkok show, commemorating the golden wedding anniversary of the King and Queen of Thailand, showcased Rolland's bright, nature-inspired prints as well as the sophisticated, feminine dresses and separates for which the company was renowned.

—Therese Duzinkiewicz Baker; updated by Nelly Rhodes

SCHIAPARELLI, Elsa

French designer

Born: Rome, 10 September 1890. Family: Married Comte William de Wendt de Kerlor, 1914 (separated); children: Yvonne ("Gogo").

Career: Lived in New York working as scriptwriter and translator, 1919–22 and 1941–44; immigrated to Paris, 1923; showed first collection, 1925; house of Schiaparelli operated, 1928–54; London branch opened, 1933, girls' debutante department added, 1935; Schiaparelli Paris boutique opened, 1935; lecturer on fashion, 1940, and volunteer in U.S. for French war effort, 1941–43; fragrances include Salut, Soucis, and Schiap, 1934; Shocking, 1937; Sleeping, 1938; Snuff for men, 1939; Le Roi Soleil, 1946; Zut, 1948; Succès Fou, 1953; Si, 1957; and S, 1961. Exhibitions: Hommage à Elsa Schiaparelli, Pavillon des Arts, Paris, 1984; Fashion and Surrealism, Fashion Institute of Technology, New York, and Victoria and Albert Museum, London, 1987–88; Elsa Schiaparelli, Brooklyn Museum, 1995–96. Awards: Neiman Marcus award, 1940. Died: 13 November 1973, in Paris.

PUBLICATIONS

By SCHIAPARELLI:

Books

Shocking Life, London, 1954.

On SCHIAPARELLI:

Books

Flanner, Janet, An American in Paris, New York, 1940.

Bertin, Celia, Paris à la Mode: A Voyage of Discovery, London, 1956.

Latour, Anny, Kings of Fashion, London, 1958.

Hommage à Elsa Schiaparelli [exhibition catalogue], Paris, 1984.

Elsa Schiaparelli, 1937: lamé dihabille. © Bettmann/CORBIS.

Elsa Schiaparelli, 1949 collection. © Genevieve Naylor/CORBIS.

Milbank, Caroline Rennolds, Couture: The Great Designers, New York, 1985.

White, Palmer, Elsa Schiaparelli, New York, 1986.

Martin, Richard, Fashion and Surrealism, New York, 1987.

Leese, Elizabeth, Costume Design in the Movies, New York, 1991.

Steele, Valerie, Women of Fashion: Twentieth Century Designers, New York, 1991.

White, Palmer, Elsa Schiaparelli: Empress of Fashion, New York, 1995.

Stegemeyer, Anne, Who's Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.

Baudot, François, Schiaparelli, New York, 1997.

Cawthorne, Nigel, Key Moments in Fashion, London, 1998.

Articles

Wilson, Bettina, "Back to Paris with Elsa Schiaparelli," in Vogue (London), October 1945.

"Schiaparelli the Shocker," in Newsweek, 26 September 1949.

- Sheppard, Eugenia, "Schiaparelli's Dim View of Today," in The Guardian, 11 August 1971.
- "Elsa Schiaparelli," [obituary] in the New York Times, 15 November 1973.
- "Berry—We Called Her Schiap," in American Fabrics and Fashions (New York), No. 100, Spring 1974.
- "Schiaparelli sa vie en rose—shocking," in Elle (Paris), 6 August 1984.
- Moutet, Anne Elizabeth, "A Shocking Affair," in Elle (London), October 1986.
- Lawford, Valerie, "Encounters with Chanel, Mainbocher, Schiaparelli, Valentino, and Charles," in Architectural Digest, September 1988.
- White, Edmund, "The Jewelry Designer's Crush on Schiaparelli...," in Architectural Digest, September 1989.
- McCoey, Meriel, "Strung Along," in the Sunday Times Magazine (London), 21 April 1991.
- Menkes, Suzy, "Elsa Schiaparelli: Shocking Life on the rue de Berri in Paris," in Architectural Digest, October 1994.
- Smith, Roberta, "In Schiaparelli's Hands, Women as Works of Art," in the New York Times, 18 December 1995.
- Cuccio, Angela, "Elsa Schiaparelli: The Roman Who Was the Sensation of Paris Through the 1930s, Looks Forward," in WWD, 13 September 1999.

* * *

Elsa Schiaparelli considered designing an art rather than a profession, making the unconventional acceptable. Born into a high ranking Italian family, her creativity was influenced by accepting the visually rich and rebelling against her extremely regulatory and proper upbringing. Much of her extravagance was inspired by the proper yet dramatic vestments of the priests and nuns remembered from her youth in Rome, combined with the city's architecture, magnificent medieval manuscripts, and ancient Greco-Roman mythology from the library where her father worked. The opulent and fanciful bead-work and embroidery Schiaparelli later produced in Paris was reminiscent of stained glass windows and had its roots in her youth in Italy. Other influences in her work were the futurists, cubists, New York dadaism, Parisian surrealists, and art déco.

Schiaparelli began designing gowns for herself and friends in 1915, with help and influence from Paul Poiret. She was an inventor of clothes; her clothes were immediately considered avant-garde, individualistic, eccentric, yet easy to wear. Sportswear, coordinated beachwear, and matching bags and shoes characterized her early work. Unusual fabrics such as upholstery material and terrycloth for beachwear and zippers on ski ensembles were characteristic.

Schiaparelli was a contemporary of Chanel. They worked during the same period and both started out designing sweaters—yet these are the only similarities they shared. Schiaparelli's initial success came with her tromp l'oeil sweater featuring a knitted-in bow at the neckline. So influential were these sweaters that additional designs followed, which included belts, handkerchiefs, and men's ties, all utilizing the unique methods of Armenian knitters. The immediate success of her sweaters allowed Schiaparelli to open her own shop on the rue de la Paix, the most fashionable street in Paris in 1927. An amazing success, it was estimated that by 1930 her company's income was approximately 120 million francs per year and her workrooms employed more than 2,000 people. She introduced good working-class clothes into polite society and understood how snob appeal worked through pricing.

After the Great Depression, fashion was in desperate need of excitement. Schiaparelli was to answer this call—she shocked as well as entertained the public, believing good taste was less important than creativeness, outrageousness, and fun. It was her belief that women should dare to be different, and through wearing attention-seeking clothes, a woman became chic. Utilizing wit and shock tactics to arm modern women, Schiaparelli believed they would gain equality and independence.

The extraordinary and unusual were expected of Schiaparelli; she didn't disappoint. She was the first couturier to use brightly colored zippers, using them initially on sportswear, beginning in 1930, and reintroducing them in 1935 on evening dresses. She collaborated with fabric houses to develop unusual novelty prints and unique materials. When Rhodophane, a cellophane material, was invented, she made glass-like tunics. Schiaparelli was known for such fabrics as "anthracite," a coal-like rayon; "treebark," a matte crêpe crinkled in deep folds to look like bark; and fabrics printed with newsprint.

Her commissions of contemporary artists were legendary—they included Christian Bérard, Jean Cocteau, and Salvador Dalí. Their collaborations led to such eccentric designs as the lamb-cutlet hat, the brain hat, the shoe hat, and the suit with pockets that simulated a chest of drawers. She also incorporated oversized buttons in the shape of peanuts, bumblebees, and rams' heads. Her basic silhouettes were often simple and easy-to-wear, but through witty embellishments on a variety of themes such as the military, the zodiac, and the circus, they became unique. Through the study of Tunisian methods of sewing, draping, and veil twisting, Schiaparelli brought Arab breeches, embroidered shirts, and wrapped turbans to Paris fashion, as well as huge pompom-rimmed hats, barbaric belts, jewelry, and the "wedgie"—a two-inch-soled shoe that would be a trend throughout the 20th century and into the next.

There was also a more cautious side to Schiaparelli, which appealed to the somewhat more conservative woman. For this woman, her severe suits and plain black dresses were appealing. To her tailored ensembles she added trousers and unconsciously influenced the mix-and-match sportswear concept which wasn't fully recognized for the next 40 to 50 years. She showed her trouser suits for every occasion—travel, citywear, evening, and sports. After the acceptance of these slimmer, more slender divided skirts as they were called, she took the next step and shortened them, thus creating the culotte.

Black and the combination of black with white were favorites of Schiaparelli. In 1936 she launched shocking pink, a brilliant pink somewhere between fuchsia and red, and it became the hallmark of her couture house. Schiaparelli's influence can still be seen today in the masculine chic looks, the surrealistic accessories, and ornate buttons. She broke down the walls dividing art and fashion and anticipated the 21st century's eclectic approach to designing. Elsa Schiaparelli remains an everlasting influence on contemporary fashion.

—Roberta H. Gruber; updated by Nelly Rhodes

SCHÖN, Mila

Yugoslavian designer working in Italy

Born: Maria Carmen Nutrizio Schön in Trau, Dalmatia, Yugoslavia, 1919; raised in Trieste and Milan, Italy. Career: Opened atelier, Milan, 1958; first showed own custom designs, 1965; first boutique

- Sheppard, Eugenia, "Schiaparelli's Dim View of Today," in The Guardian, 11 August 1971.
- "Elsa Schiaparelli," [obituary] in the New York Times, 15 November 1973.
- "Berry—We Called Her Schiap," in American Fabrics and Fashions (New York), No. 100, Spring 1974.
- "Schiaparelli sa vie en rose—shocking," in Elle (Paris), 6 August 1984.
- Moutet, Anne Elizabeth, "A Shocking Affair," in Elle (London), October 1986.
- Lawford, Valerie, "Encounters with Chanel, Mainbocher, Schiaparelli, Valentino, and Charles," in Architectural Digest, September 1988.
- White, Edmund, "The Jewelry Designer's Crush on Schiaparelli...," in Architectural Digest, September 1989.
- McCoey, Meriel, "Strung Along," in the Sunday Times Magazine (London), 21 April 1991.
- Menkes, Suzy, "Elsa Schiaparelli: Shocking Life on the rue de Berri in Paris," in Architectural Digest, October 1994.
- Smith, Roberta, "In Schiaparelli's Hands, Women as Works of Art," in the New York Times, 18 December 1995.
- Cuccio, Angela, "Elsa Schiaparelli: The Roman Who Was the Sensation of Paris Through the 1930s, Looks Forward," in WWD, 13 September 1999.

* * *

Elsa Schiaparelli considered designing an art rather than a profession, making the unconventional acceptable. Born into a high ranking Italian family, her creativity was influenced by accepting the visually rich and rebelling against her extremely regulatory and proper upbringing. Much of her extravagance was inspired by the proper yet dramatic vestments of the priests and nuns remembered from her youth in Rome, combined with the city's architecture, magnificent medieval manuscripts, and ancient Greco-Roman mythology from the library where her father worked. The opulent and fanciful bead-work and embroidery Schiaparelli later produced in Paris was reminiscent of stained glass windows and had its roots in her youth in Italy. Other influences in her work were the futurists, cubists, New York dadaism, Parisian surrealists, and art déco.

Schiaparelli began designing gowns for herself and friends in 1915, with help and influence from Paul Poiret. She was an inventor of clothes; her clothes were immediately considered avant-garde, individualistic, eccentric, yet easy to wear. Sportswear, coordinated beachwear, and matching bags and shoes characterized her early work. Unusual fabrics such as upholstery material and terrycloth for beachwear and zippers on ski ensembles were characteristic.

Schiaparelli was a contemporary of Chanel. They worked during the same period and both started out designing sweaters—yet these are the only similarities they shared. Schiaparelli's initial success came with her tromp l'oeil sweater featuring a knitted-in bow at the neckline. So influential were these sweaters that additional designs followed, which included belts, handkerchiefs, and men's ties, all utilizing the unique methods of Armenian knitters. The immediate success of her sweaters allowed Schiaparelli to open her own shop on the rue de la Paix, the most fashionable street in Paris in 1927. An amazing success, it was estimated that by 1930 her company's income was approximately 120 million francs per year and her workrooms employed more than 2,000 people. She introduced good working-class clothes into polite society and understood how snob appeal worked through pricing.

After the Great Depression, fashion was in desperate need of excitement. Schiaparelli was to answer this call—she shocked as well as entertained the public, believing good taste was less important than creativeness, outrageousness, and fun. It was her belief that women should dare to be different, and through wearing attention-seeking clothes, a woman became chic. Utilizing wit and shock tactics to arm modern women, Schiaparelli believed they would gain equality and independence.

The extraordinary and unusual were expected of Schiaparelli; she didn't disappoint. She was the first couturier to use brightly colored zippers, using them initially on sportswear, beginning in 1930, and reintroducing them in 1935 on evening dresses. She collaborated with fabric houses to develop unusual novelty prints and unique materials. When Rhodophane, a cellophane material, was invented, she made glass-like tunics. Schiaparelli was known for such fabrics as "anthracite," a coal-like rayon; "treebark," a matte crêpe crinkled in deep folds to look like bark; and fabrics printed with newsprint.

Her commissions of contemporary artists were legendary—they included Christian Bérard, Jean Cocteau, and Salvador Dalí. Their collaborations led to such eccentric designs as the lamb-cutlet hat, the brain hat, the shoe hat, and the suit with pockets that simulated a chest of drawers. She also incorporated oversized buttons in the shape of peanuts, bumblebees, and rams' heads. Her basic silhouettes were often simple and easy-to-wear, but through witty embellishments on a variety of themes such as the military, the zodiac, and the circus, they became unique. Through the study of Tunisian methods of sewing, draping, and veil twisting, Schiaparelli brought Arab breeches, embroidered shirts, and wrapped turbans to Paris fashion, as well as huge pompom-rimmed hats, barbaric belts, jewelry, and the "wedgie"—a two-inch-soled shoe that would be a trend throughout the 20th century and into the next.

There was also a more cautious side to Schiaparelli, which appealed to the somewhat more conservative woman. For this woman, her severe suits and plain black dresses were appealing. To her tailored ensembles she added trousers and unconsciously influenced the mix-and-match sportswear concept which wasn't fully recognized for the next 40 to 50 years. She showed her trouser suits for every occasion—travel, citywear, evening, and sports. After the acceptance of these slimmer, more slender divided skirts as they were called, she took the next step and shortened them, thus creating the culotte.

Black and the combination of black with white were favorites of Schiaparelli. In 1936 she launched shocking pink, a brilliant pink somewhere between fuchsia and red, and it became the hallmark of her couture house. Schiaparelli's influence can still be seen today in the masculine chic looks, the surrealistic accessories, and ornate buttons. She broke down the walls dividing art and fashion and anticipated the 21st century's eclectic approach to designing. Elsa Schiaparelli remains an everlasting influence on contemporary fashion.

—Roberta H. Gruber; updated by Nelly Rhodes

SCHÖN, Mila

Yugoslavian designer working in Italy

Born: Maria Carmen Nutrizio Schön in Trau, Dalmatia, Yugoslavia, 1919; raised in Trieste and Milan, Italy. Career: Opened atelier, Milan, 1958; first showed own custom designs, 1965; first boutique

Mila Schön, spring/summer 1967: silk damask suit (left) and striped linen suit (right). © AP/Wide World Photos.

for womenswear opened via Montenapoleone, Milan, 1966; launched Linea Uomo line of menswear, alongside opening of new boutique, Mila Schön Uomo, at via Montenapoleone, 1972; Mila Schön 2, second company, set up in 1973 to produce and distribute Alta Moda Pronta, Miss Schön, and Mila Schön Uomo lines; launched perfume, Mila Schön, 1978; established Mila Schön Japan; took over running of company in Como, Italy, for the manufacture and distribution of textiles for all Mila Schön lines, 1983; Aqua Schön swimwear collection introduced, 1984; opened first U.S. shop, Beverly Hills, 1986; Schön retired; company bought by Japanese firm Itochu Fashion Systems and distributor Coronet; Andrea Pinto appointed director and new design team hired, 1994; Schön returned to help design, 1996; opened second shop in Russia, 1998; acquired by Mariella Burani Fashion Group SpA, 1999; Pinto departed, 2000; launched menswear line, 2001; also produces shoes, stockings, furnishings, eyewear. Address: Via Montenapoleone, Milan.

PUBLICATIONS

On SCHÖN:

Books

- Lambert, Eleanor, World of Fashion: People, Places, Resources, New York, 1976.
 Alfonsi, Maria Vittoria, Leaders in Fashion: i grandi personaggi della moda, Bologna, 1983.
 Soli, Pia, Il genio antipatico (exhibition catalogue), Venice, 1984.

- Stegemeyer, Anne, Who's Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.
 Vergani, Orio, Birignao: piccolo lessico del palcoscenico, Udine, 1997.

Articles

- Pertile, Marina, "Roma: la primavera di Mila Schön," in Vogue (Milan), March 1985.
 "Rigorosamente femminile: grande moda a Roma: Mila Schön," in Vogue (Milan), September 1986.
 "Mila Schön, lo chic," in Donna (Milan), July/August 1987.
 Forden, Sara Gay, "Pinto Brings in Mila Schön in Attempt to Save House," in WWD, 29 June 1995.
 "Mila Schön," in WWD, 24 February 1998.
 Wilson, Eric, "Andrea Pinto Gives Up Directorship," in WWD, 21 June 2000.
 Singer, Natasha, "Luxury Boutiques Start Pouring into Russia," in WWD, 28 November 2000.
 "Far and Away—Fun and Games at Moschino to Dainty, Ruffled Romance at Mila Schön," in WWD, 3 October 2001.

* * *

Mila Schön's interest in high fashion began when she became a personal client of Balenciaga. Her family were wealthy Yugoslav aristocrats who had fled to Italy to escape the communist regime. Living the life of a wealthy Italian demanded an elegant wardrobe and Schön's natural grace and good taste made her an excellent couture client. She must have studied the business thoroughly during her fittings because, when the family fortunes were lost, she turned to the fashion industry in order to make a living.

Business began in 1959 when Schön was 35, with a small atelier in Milan, where Parisian models were basically adapted and copied, combining Balenciaga's austerity of cut with Dior's versatility, plus a hint of Schiaparelli's wit. By the mid-1960s Schön was showing more original work at trade fairs in Florence and Rome, establishing a reputation as a perfectionist who worked within the constraints of a classic design structure. Her tailoring was particularly distinctive, executed with faultless attention to detail and cut in her favourite double-faced wools. The resultant clothes were highly sophisticated and sold at the top end of ready-to-wear or in the Mila Schön boutiques in Rome, Florence, and Milan. Small wonder clients included wealthy socialites like Jacqueline Kennedy Onassis, her sister Lee Radziwill Ross, and Babe Paley.

Schön described her company slogan as "Not how much, but how." This was reflective of her attitude towards high quality and taste. The company decided to translate the DOC (controlled origin denomination), a quality mark used in the wine business, for use on their clothes, denoting the company's attitude towards perfection. Schön was also very selective when it came to choosing clients in order to retain quality. She traded on what she described as a "medium circulation basis," so that when any side of her business was seen to make a marked profit, therefore operating beyond its limits, she started a new company to accommodate it.

There have been several diffusion lines and licensees since the company's inception. In line with the Schön business philosophy, these products have been marketed and sold through separately formed companies. Mila Schön Due is a less expensive ready-to-wear line; Mila Schön Uomo is the men's range. There is also a swimwear range, Aqua Schön, and a sunglasses range, Schön Ottica. Ties, scarves, fabrics, handbags, belts, and the perfume Mila Schön, were also produced.

Mila Schön, autumn/winter 2001–02 ready-to-wear collection.
© AFP/CORBIS.

By the mid-1990s Mila Schön, the designer, had retired, and her firm had been acquired by the Japanese trading company, Itocha, and the Coronet distribution firm. In 1994 the new owners hired Andrea Pinto, son of Pinto clan owning Krizia, to return the house to a higher profile, since it had lost much of its cache and was no longer profitable. Anna Domenici, also of Krizia, was brought over to help as a design consultant, and Pinto approached Schön herself to come back in 1996. The move was inspired, and so were the resulting collections. When the firm was acquired by Mariella Burani Fashion Group SpA in 1999, the Schön name was once again at the forefront of fashion, with new boutiques opening worldwide, including two in Russia, another in Prague, and plans for a third Russian store.

In 2001 Mila Schön was alive and well. In its coverage of the Milan fashion shows, Women's Wear Daily (3 October 2001) enthused over the firm's ability to add a hint of femininity to its traditionally tough-as-nails chic, "The hard edges of sculptured shapes were softened with cutout lace motifs and discreet ruffling. From day into evening, the delicate detailing appeared on almost everything, and, when it wasn't on the clothes, it found its way onto the accessories, from belts to boots."

Some 45 years after its founding, Mila Schön remains one of the most respected and established names in Italian fashion, representing design standards that are classic, flattering, and sometimes highly imaginative. Though Schön herself is no longer a fixture, her design sensibility ranked her among the finest Italian design houses in clientèle and prestige.

—Kevin Almond; updated by Nelly Rhodes

SCHNURER, Carolyn

American designer

Born: Carolyn Goldsand in New York City, 5 January 1908. Education: Studied at the New York Training School for Teachers; received B.S. from New York University, 1941; studied fashion at the Traphagen School of Design, New York, 1939–40. Family: Married Harold Teller (Burt) Schnurer, 1930 (divorced, late 1950s); children: Anthony. Career: Taught music and art before turning to sportswear design, 1940; clothes originally manufactured by Burt Schnurer Cabana Co., sold only at Best and Co., New York; company renamed for Carolyn Schnurer, 1946; left fashion design, became textile consultant to J.P. Stevens Company, circa 1956. Awards: New Orleans Fashion Group award, 1950.

PUBLICATIONS

On SCHNURER:

Books

Milbank, Caroline Rennolds, New York Fashion: The Evolution of American Style, New York, 1989.
Steele, Valerie, Women of Fashion: Twentieth-Century Designers, New York, 1991.

Articles

"Southern Resort Fashions," in Life (New York), 14 January 1946.
"Women Designers Set New Fashions," in Life, 14 January 1946.
Carlyle, Cora, "Carolyn Schnurer's Flight to Japan," in American Fabrics, No. 20, Winter 1951–52.
_____, "Carolyn Schnurer's African Trip," in American Fabrics, No. 24, Winter 1952–53.
"From Natives to Natives," in Time, 11 January 1954.
"Carolyn Schnurer," in Current Biography, March 1955.

* * *

Carolyn Schnurer was a rather late bloomer in the field of fashion design. After teaching for a time in the state school system, she attended the Traphagen School of Design in New York and began working for her husband's bathing suit company, Burt Schnurer, Inc., in 1940. Her timing was perfect. As one of a handful of American designers whose creativity filled the vacuum left by the war-enforced

Mila Schön, autumn/winter 2001–02 ready-to-wear collection.
© AFP/CORBIS.

scarves, fabrics, handbags, belts, and the perfume Mila Schön, were also produced.

By the mid-1990s Mila Schön, the designer, had retired, and her firm had been acquired by the Japanese trading company, Itocha, and the Coronet distribution firm. In 1994 the new owners hired Andrea Pinto, son of Pinto clan owning Krizia, to return the house to a higher profile, since it had lost much of its cache and was no longer profitable. Anna Domenici, also of Krizia, was brought over to help as a design consultant, and Pinto approached Schön herself to come back in 1996. The move was inspired, and so were the resulting collections. When the firm was acquired by Mariella Burani Fashion Group SpA in 1999, the Schön name was once again at the forefront of fashion, with new boutiques opening worldwide, including two in Russia, another in Prague, and plans for a third Russian store.

In 2001 Mila Schön was alive and well. In its coverage of the Milan fashion shows, Women's Wear Daily (3 October 2001) enthused over the firm's ability to add a hint of femininity to its traditionally tough-as-nails chic, "The hard edges of sculptured shapes were softened with cutout lace motifs and discreet ruffling. From day into evening, the delicate detailing appeared on almost everything, and, when it wasn't on the clothes, it found its way onto the accessories, from belts to boots."

Some 45 years after its founding, Mila Schön remains one of the most respected and established names in Italian fashion, representing design standards that are classic, flattering, and sometimes highly imaginative. Though Schön herself is no longer a fixture, her design sensibility ranked her among the finest Italian design houses in clientèle and prestige.

—Kevin Almond; updated by Nelly Rhodes

SCHNURER, Carolyn

American designer

Born: Carolyn Goldsand in New York City, 5 January 1908. Education: Studied at the New York Training School for Teachers; received B.S. from New York University, 1941; studied fashion at the Traphagen School of Design, New York, 1939–40. Family: Married Harold Teller (Burt) Schnurer, 1930 (divorced, late 1950s); children: Anthony. Career: Taught music and art before turning to sportswear design, 1940; clothes originally manufactured by Burt Schnurer Cabana Co., sold only at Best and Co., New York; company renamed for Carolyn Schnurer, 1946; left fashion design, became textile consultant to J.P. Stevens Company, circa 1956. Awards: New Orleans Fashion Group award, 1950.

PUBLICATIONS

On SCHNURER:

Books

Milbank, Caroline Rennolds, New York Fashion: The Evolution of American Style, New York, 1989.
Steele, Valerie, Women of Fashion: Twentieth-Century Designers, New York, 1991.

Articles

"Southern Resort Fashions," in Life (New York), 14 January 1946.
"Women Designers Set New Fashions," in Life, 14 January 1946.
Carlyle, Cora, "Carolyn Schnurer's Flight to Japan," in American Fabrics, No. 20, Winter 1951–52.
_____, "Carolyn Schnurer's African Trip," in American Fabrics, No. 24, Winter 1952–53.
"From Natives to Natives," in Time, 11 January 1954.
"Carolyn Schnurer," in Current Biography, March 1955.

* * *

Carolyn Schnurer was a rather late bloomer in the field of fashion design. After teaching for a time in the state school system, she attended the Traphagen School of Design in New York and began working for her husband's bathing suit company, Burt Schnurer, Inc., in 1940. Her timing was perfect. As one of a handful of American designers whose creativity filled the vacuum left by the war-enforced absence of European fashion, Schnurer capitalized on her Traphagen training in methods of adaptive design. She became so well known for her casual clothes that in 1946 the company name was changed to Carolyn Schnurer, Inc.

Schnurer was a product of a persistent theme in American design between the World Wars: the need for freedom from the dictates of Europe. To this end, fabric and garment designers were encouraged to do original research in museum collections. Schnurer embraced the practice, picking a country on which to base a collection and then examining relevant objects at the Brooklyn Museum or Metropolitan Museum of Art in New York.

She enjoyed an advantage over her predecessors in that as air travel became more common, the countries she studied became readily accessible. In 1944 she made her first trip, to the Andes Mountains, returning with the theme for her Serrano collection, and her first enormous success, the Cholo coat. So strongly did she become associated with the idea of foreign inspiration that it overshadowed the real diversity in her work.

One of Schnurer's biggest boosters was American Fabrics magazine, founded in 1946. Its editors denounced what they perceived as a fundamental lack—and fear—of originality within most of the North American textile industry. Praise and publicity were lavished upon the few innovators. Each issue included a survey of some textile or decorative arts tradition, to educate and inspire subscribers. Schnurer's methods were in accord with the American Fabrics editorial policy, and her trips abroad, together with the designs they inspired, received substantial coverage.

Schnurer's career travel included visits to Brittany and Normandy, Ireland, Portugal, Greece, India, Japan, South Africa, Turkey, and Norway. Many of these were sponsored by stores such as Peck & Peck or Franklin Simon, with some secondary support coming from textile companies who then produced Schnurer's designs. She differed from some of her contemporaries in how she made use of the references she chose for garments. Schnurer preferred to graft an element or two of an ethnic style onto an otherwise Western silhouette. The Japanese-inspired collection, for instance, featured kimono sleeves, padded hems or wide, obi-like sashes on conventional full-skirted dresses, pagoda-shaped shoulder and hem details on a bathing suit, beach coat, and shorts, and necklines which left the nape bare in virtually every outfit. The African collection of a year later showed cropped jackets with Hausa style embroidery and dress-bodices styled along the lines of tops worn by native women.

The African-inspired work, however, depended much more on the fabrics she derived from native sources than on the shapes of native costume. Earlier, Schnurer had originated a wrinkle-resistant cotton tweed as a result of the trip to Ireland. Dan River, Fuller, Bates, Arthur Beir, and Hollander were among the companies she worked with to develop textiles based on the motifs which filled her travel notebooks. A love of texture was apparent in all her fabric choices. Print designs came from Japanese ink paintings, African wood carvings, and Islamic architecture. A knotted-fiber rain cloak from Japan and an African mud cloth were translated into all-over embroidery patterns. Supple fibers such as linen, cotton, cashmere, and alpaca, as well as fabrics with character, including glazed chintz, sueded jersey, or velvet, distinguished her work. Schnurer's most creative fabric designs and developments adapted the look of the original into a form better suited to the American environment and lifestyle.

It is not surprising that when Schnurer left fashion design after her divorce in the late 1950s, she spent some time as a consultant with the J.P. Stevens textile company. Although she had a relatively short career in fashion, Schnurer left a considerable legacy. With others of her generation who gained prominence in the 1940s, she gave credibility to American design, even at the level of "popular" pricing. Her casual wear enhanced the leisure time of the average woman, while the fabrics and styles she introduced opened the minds of both consumers and those in the industry to the variety awaiting them outside the borders of the nation.

—Madelyn Shaw

SENNEVILLE, Elisabeth de

See de SENNEVILLE, Elisabeth

SHAMASK, Ronaldus

Dutch designer working in New York

Born: Amsterdam, Netherlands, 24 November 1945; raised in Australia. Education: Trained as an architect, self-taught in fashion design. Career: Window display designer, Melbourne, Australia, 1963–66; fashion illustrator for the Times and Observer, London, 1967–68; theatrical designer, Company of Man performance group, Buffalo, New York, 1968–71; freelance interior and clothing designer, New York, 1971–77; designer, Moss Shamask fashion company, New York, 1978–90; opened Moss on Madison Avenue boutique, New York, 1979, closed, 1986; introduced first menswear collection, 1985; showed new collection under his own name, and formed new company, SUSA (Shamask USA), 1990; signed on with Revlon for cosmetics line, 1993; created costumes for dancer Lucinda Childs, 1994; began designing womenswear again, for Barneys New York, 1995; showed collection in Greenwich Village loft, 1998; has also designed furniture. Exhibitions: Intimate Architecture: Contemporary Clothing Design, Massachusetts Institute of Technology, Cambridge, 1982; Infra-Apparel, Metropolitan Museum of Art, New York, 1993. Awards: American Fashion Critics Coty award, 1981; Council of Fashion Designers of America award, 1987; Confédération Internationale du Lin Fil d'Or award, 1987, 1989; Woolmark Award, 1989. Address: c/o Revlon, 625 Madison Avenue, New York, NY 10022, U.S.A.

PUBLICATIONS

By SHAMASK:

Articles

"Commentary," in Details (New York), April 1989.

On SHAMASK:

Books

Massachusetts Institute of Technology, Intimate Architecture: Contemporary Clothing Design [exhibition catalogue], Cambridge, 1982.

absence of European fashion, Schnurer capitalized on her Traphagen training in methods of adaptive design. She became so well known for her casual clothes that in 1946 the company name was changed to Carolyn Schnurer, Inc.

Schnurer was a product of a persistent theme in American design between the World Wars: the need for freedom from the dictates of Europe. To this end, fabric and garment designers were encouraged to do original research in museum collections. Schnurer embraced the practice, picking a country on which to base a collection and then examining relevant objects at the Brooklyn Museum or Metropolitan Museum of Art in New York.

She enjoyed an advantage over her predecessors in that as air travel became more common, the countries she studied became readily accessible. In 1944 she made her first trip, to the Andes Mountains, returning with the theme for her Serrano collection, and her first enormous success, the Cholo coat. So strongly did she become associated with the idea of foreign inspiration that it overshadowed the real diversity in her work.

One of Schnurer's biggest boosters was American Fabrics magazine, founded in 1946. Its editors denounced what they perceived as a fundamental lack—and fear—of originality within most of the North American textile industry. Praise and publicity were lavished upon the few innovators. Each issue included a survey of some textile or decorative arts tradition, to educate and inspire subscribers. Schnurer's methods were in accord with the American Fabrics editorial policy, and her trips abroad, together with the designs they inspired, received substantial coverage.

Schnurer's career travel included visits to Brittany and Normandy, Ireland, Portugal, Greece, India, Japan, South Africa, Turkey, and Norway. Many of these were sponsored by stores such as Peck & Peck or Franklin Simon, with some secondary support coming from textile companies who then produced Schnurer's designs. She differed from some of her contemporaries in how she made use of the references she chose for garments. Schnurer preferred to graft an element or two of an ethnic style onto an otherwise Western silhouette. The Japanese-inspired collection, for instance, featured kimono sleeves, padded hems or wide, obi-like sashes on conventional full skirted dresses, pagoda-shaped shoulder and hem details on a bathing suit, beach coat, and shorts, and necklines which left the nape bare in virtually every outfit. The African collection of a year later showed cropped jackets with Hausa style embroidery and dress-bodices styled along the lines of tops worn by native women.

The African-inspired work, however, depended much more on the fabrics she derived from native sources than on the shapes of native costume. Earlier, Schnurer had originated a wrinkle-resistant cotton tweed as a result of the trip to Ireland. Dan River, Fuller, Bates, Arthur Beir, and Hollander were among the companies she worked with to develop textiles based on the motifs which filled her travel notebooks. A love of texture was apparent in all her fabric choices. Print designs came from Japanese ink paintings, African wood carvings, and Islamic architecture. A knotted-fiber rain cloak from Japan and an African mud cloth were translated into all-over embroidery patterns. Supple fibers such as linen, cotton, cashmere, and alpaca, as well as fabrics with character, including glazed chintz, sueded jersey, or velvet, distinguished her work. Schnurer's most creative fabric designs and developments adapted the look of the original into a form better suited to the American environment and lifestyle.

It is not surprising that when Schnurer left fashion design after her divorce in the late 1950s, she spent some time as a consultant with the J.P. Stevens textile company. Although she had a relatively short career in fashion, Schnurer left a considerable legacy. With others of her generation who gained prominence in the 1940s, she gave credibility to American design, even at the level of "popular" pricing. Her casual wear enhanced the leisure time of the average woman, while the fabrics and styles she introduced opened the minds of both consumers and those in the industry to the variety awaiting them outside the borders of the nation.

—Madelyn Shaw

SENNEVILLE, Elisabeth de

See de SENNEVILLE, Elisabeth

SHAMASK, Ronaldus

Dutch designer working in New York

Born: Amsterdam, Netherlands, 24 November 1945; raised in Australia. Education: Trained as an architect, self-taught in fashion design. Career: Window display designer, Melbourne, Australia, 1963–66; fashion illustrator for the Times and Observer, London, 1967–68; theatrical designer, Company of Man performance group, Buffalo, New York, 1968–71; freelance interior and clothing designer, New York, 1971–77; designer, Moss Shamask fashion company, New York, 1978–90; opened Moss on Madison Avenue boutique, New York, 1979, closed, 1986; introduced first menswear collection, 1985; showed new collection under his own name, and formed new company, SUSA (Shamask USA), 1990; signed on with Revlon for cosmetics line, 1993; created costumes for dancer Lucinda Childs, 1994; began designing womenswear again, for Barneys New York, 1995; showed collection in Greenwich Village loft, 1998; has also designed furniture. Exhibitions: Intimate Architecture: Contemporary Clothing Design, Massachusetts Institute of Technology, Cambridge, 1982; Infra-Apparel, Metropolitan Museum of Art, New York, 1993. Awards: American Fashion Critics Coty award, 1981; Council of Fashion Designers of America award, 1987; Confédération Internationale du Lin Fil d'Or award, 1987, 1989; Woolmark Award, 1989. Address: c/o Revlon, 625 Madison Avenue, New York, NY 10022, U.S.A.

PUBLICATIONS

By SHAMASK:

Articles

"Commentary," in Details (New York), April 1989.

On SHAMASK:

Books

Massachusetts Institute of Technology, Intimate Architecture: Contemporary Clothing Design [exhibition catalogue], Cambridge, 1982.

- Diamonstein, Barbaralee, Fashion: The Inside Story, New York, 1985.
- Milbank, Caroline Rennolds, New York Fashion: The Evolution of American Style, New York, 1989.
- Stegemeyer, Anne, Who's Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.

Articles

- "Shamask: High Technique," in WWD, 3 November 1980.
- Duka, John, "New Architects of Fashion," in the New York Times Magazine, 16 August 1981.
- Shapiro, Harriet, "Ronaldus Shamask's Wearable Architecture," in People, 24 August 1981.
- Carlsen, Peter, "Ronaldus Shamask," in Contemporary Designers, Detroit, 1984.
- Sturdza, Marina, "Ronaldus Shamask," in Fashion 85 (New York), 1984.
- Sinclaire, Paul, and Lesley Jane Nonkin, "Designer, Client: The Modern Equation," in Vogue, November 1987.
- Boehlert, Bart, "Who's That Shamasked Man?" in New York, 8 February 1988.
- Parola, Robert, "The Anatomy of Design," in DNR, 17 October 1988.
- Schiro, Anne-Marie, "Three U.S. Designers, Less or More in the Mainstream," in the New York Times, 4 November 1988.
- Chua, Lawrence, "Ronaldus Shamask Enjoying a Sense of Pleasure," in WWD, March 1989.
- "Designing Men," in GQ, July 1989.
- Boucher, Vincent, "The Two Mr. Shamasks," in Seven Days (New York), 7 March 1990.
- "The Word to Men: Hang Looser," in People, Spring 1990.
- Fenichell, Stephen, "The Look of the Nineties: Four Designers Lead the Way," in Connoisseur (New York), March 1991.
- Sloan, Pat, "Ron Shamask: Streetwise Designer Has His Finger on Pulse of American Culture for Revlon," in Advertising Age, 8 February 1993.
- Pogoda, Dianne M., "Shamask Gets Back into Fashion," in WWD, 26 September 1995.
- Spindler, Amy M., "What a Difference A Zip Makes," in the New York Times, 3 October 1995.
- , "The Cut of One Seam Coiling," in the New York Times, 12 August 1997.
- White, Constance C.R., "New Wave of Designers Opening Stores in SoHo," in the New York Times, 2 September 1997.
- Schiro, Anne-Marie, "For Dancing the Night Away," in the New York Times, 10 November 1998.

* * *

Peter Carlsen, writing in Contemporary Designers (1984), perceived Ronaldus Shamask's designs in a most interesting and prophetic way. Carlsen claimed, "Shamask dresses an élite—the largely self-appointed élite comprising the devotees of high style. Certainly, his work is part of a way of life that is bound up with living in Manhattan; his clothes are meant to be worn in lofts, to downtown openings, are meant to signal to other members of what might be called the esthetic establishment their wearers' good standing in its ranks.... What Charles James was to 1940s New York, Shamask was to the late 1970s and early 1980s." Shamask creates intellectual, aesthetic clothing and perhaps inevitably, he has dressed intellectuals and aesthetically-minded individuals.

Recognized initially in a August 1981 feature article by John Duka in the New York Times Magazine, and subsequently in an exhibition, Intimate Architecture: Contemporary Clothing Design, at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology in 1982, Shamask was the wunderkind of the architectural rubric. But people do not wear buildings; nor is Shamask's design genuinely analogous to architecture. Rather, he is an immensely idiosyncratic and adventuresome designer with a sensibility for minimalism, a cant to the East, and a depth of conviction about fashion that often makes his work seem more utopian than commercially viable.

Shamask seeks a purity in fashion that others would not even warrant: his pursuit can seem too severe to some and austere perfect to others. Anne-Marie Schiro wrote in the New York Times (4 November 1988), "At a time when many American designers are sticking to the classics, Mr. Shamask went a different route, showing styles that most women do not already have in their closets. Of course, they are not clothes for most women but for those with a flair for fashion and a desire to look different." His design has always been deliberate, but its visual rewards can be equally deliberate as well.

His fall 1981 two-piece coat with a visible spiraling seam may be more sophisticated in construction than most wearers or viewers would wish to know, though others such as Balenciaga and Geoffrey Beene have similarly designed to the utmost chastity of form. A 1979 linen ensemble literally unbuttons pockets down their sides to become part of the fold of the garment. His Japanese-inspired hakima trousers were featured in the Japonisme exhibition of the Kyoto Costume Institute at the Kyoto National Museum in 1994; his sensibility has often been shaped by Japanese aesthetics. Shamask participates in a rarefied international culture that recognizes fashion as an art and seeks its participation with dance, theater, architecture, and all visual arts. He creates fashion worthy of such a status.

In the 1990s, Shamask devoted himself to menswear, where his talent for building clothes was shown to advantage. Ruth Gilbert, writing for New York Magazine in February 1992, claimed Shamask's tailored clothing "perfect fits." Years earlier, Shamask had told Esquire (September 1987), "Men are less interested in applied decoration than in the logical engineering of clothes." Even in menswear, Shamask had ardent admirers and a circle of devoted wearers without having vast commercial impact. His may not be an easily likable aesthetic, but it has definitely been a high art of dress informed by intelligence.

Making a comeback to women's fashions, Shamask didn't focus on the design, fabric, or fit—but on the zipper. Unzipped, the articles of clothing take on a rectangular form, shapeless, and don't even appear as if they can be worn. Once the zipper is fastened, however, this seemingly useless piece of fabric becomes a three-dimensional shape. In some instances, the zipper has been used as spaghetti straps; at other times, it forms a slit from the neck to shoulders, or just slightly above the neck.

Some say Shamask reinvented the use of the zipper. Others claim it was not a reinvention at all; merely an expansion of his ever-popular spiral jacket. Created in 1981, the jacket was based on one piece of fabric and emphasized the seam. Nearly two decades later, Shamask is still known for the jacket that gained him recognition. Like all of Shamask's creations, it was based on intellect rather than trend. Though trendy is not a word most would ascribe to Shamask, he was continually at the forefront of style.

In the early 1990s Shamask began designing fragrance packaging for Revlon, as well creating his own line of cosmetics. Then, after a five-year absence, Shamask was once again designing womenswear in 1995. Through a deal with Barneys New York, Shamask's new 25-piece collection was sold in exclusive in-store boutiques. In late 1998 Shamask took over the Greenwich Village studio of the abstract artist Jennifer Bartlett to display his new collection. Along the runway, paintings of Bartlett were shown to illustrate Shamask's appreciation for her, especially her color palette. The spring collection featured pleated pieces in trapezoidal shapes and dresses with spiral seams—another extension of the most notable spiral jacket.

Shamask continued to focus on architectural design late in his career, using mathematics and geometry to create each single piece of fabric. "The only decorative element in my clothes is the cut, the only detail is the seams," Shamask told the New York Times in 1997. Since Shamask's reinventing of the zipper, he has had a vast and varied design career—from working with Revlon to studying furniture design, while continuing to design extraordinary clothes for men and women.

—Richard Martin; updated by Diana Idzelis

SHILLING, David

English milliner and designer

Born: London, England, 27 June 1956. Education: St. Paul's School, Hammersmith, London. Career: Underwriter, Lloyd's of London, 1973–75; established millinery business, 1974; established own shop for couture hats, 1976; introduced women's ready-to-wear collection, 1984; other lines include menswear collection, 1986–89, and hand-painted ties, 1988–90; fashion correspondent, Radio London, 1982–86; Senior Consultant on Design and Product Adaptation, United Nations, from 1990; created symbol for Britain's Festival of Arts and Culture, 1995; designed the logo for the Consortium for Street Children; organized a millinery course in one of Her Majesty's prisons. Exhibitions: David Shilling—The Hats, toured the United Kingdom, 1981–84; Edinburgh College of Art, 1982; David Shilling: A Decade of Design, Chester Museum, England, 1991; exhibition of paintings, Richard Demarco Gallery, Edinburgh, 1991; Unique Insight Into David Shilling, Hatworks Museum, Stockport, 2001; Mrs. Shilling Outfits, National Horseracing Museum, Suffolk, 2001. Collections: Metropolitan Museum, New York; Los Angeles County Museum; Philadelphia Museum of Art; Victoria and Albert Museum, London; and Musée de l'Art Décoratif, Paris. Awards: President for Life of Valdivia, Ecuador. Address: 5 Homer Street, London W1H 1HN, England. Website: www.davidshilling.com.

PUBLICATIONS

By SHILLING:

Books

Thinking Rich, London, 1986.

On SHILLING:

Books

Hickey, Ted, and Elizabeth McCrum, David Shilling: The Hats [exhibition catalogue], Belfast, 1981.

Polan, Brenda, ed., The Fashion Year, London, 1983.

Ginsburg, Madeleine, The Hat, Hauppauge, New York, 1990.

McDowell, Colin, Hats: Status, Style, Glamour, London, 1992.

Articles

Neustatter, Angela, "Cheeky Chapeaux," in The Guardian (London), 15 March 1978.

Glynn, Prudence, "A Sense of Occasion," in the Times (London), 16 March 1978.

"The Shilling Hat Man," in the Observer, 30 April 1978.

Cleave, Maureen, "Over 21," in Woman's Day, June 1979.

"Simply Shilling, My Dear," in Woman's Day, 23 July 1979.

Clemeneigh, Mirella, "Capelli in Mostra," in Casa Vogue, December 1980.

McKay, Peter, "Man with a Head for Hats," in Woman's Journal (London), December 1980.

Heron, Marianne, "Shilling, the Man Who Makes Headlines," in Irish Independent, Summer 1981.

Blume, Mary, "David Shilling, Wild Hatter of Ascot," in the International Herald Tribune, 5 June 1982.

Webster, Valerie, "A Shilling's Worth of Extravagance," in the Scotsman, 15 February 1984.

Mercer, Tim, "A Room of My Own: David Shilling," in the Observer, 18 March 1984.

Benchy, Maeve, "Not Like the Ones He Used to Make for His Mother," in the Irish Times, 15 May 1984.

"Hats Off to Shilling," in World of Interiors (London), August 1984.

Hillier, Bevis, "David Shilling Hat Trick," in the Los Angeles Times, 13 October 1985.

"Haute Hats," in Cosmopolitan, November 1986.

"Who Needs Money to Be a Millionaire," in the Sunday Express, 2 November 1986.

"A Head for Hats," in Woman's Journal, February 1987.

Weber, Bruce, "The Milliner's Tale," in the New York Times Magazine, 24 April 1988.

"David Shilling, Hatmaker to the Rich and Famous," in Hello (London), 22 April 1989.

"A Hat Man's Day at the Races," in the Herald-Sun, 9 September 1990.

Smith, Liz, "David Shilling," in the Times, 6 February 1991.

Kuandika, Giyil, "David Shilling," in Business Times (Dar-Es-Salaam), May 1991.

Owens, Susan, "The Item to Top it All Off," in the Sydney Morning Herald, 25 August 1992.

Gibbs, Warren, "The Mad Hatter," in New Idea, 24 October 1992.

Cawthorne, Zelda, "Hats That are Ahead of the Rest," in the South China Morning Post, 28 November 1992.

Bunoan, Vladimir S., "Hats Off to David," in Philippine Business World, 2 February 1993.

Gusman, Susan A., "Hats Off," in the Philippine Daily Enquirer, 14 February 1993.

is still known for the jacket that gained him recognition. Like all of Shamask's creations, it was based on intellect rather than trend. Though trendy is not a word most would ascribe to Shamask, he was continually at the forefront of style.

In the early 1990s Shamask began designing fragrance packaging for Revlon, as well creating his own line of cosmetics. Then, after a five-year absence, Shamask was once again designing womenswear in 1995. Through a deal with Barneys New York, Shamask's new 25-piece collection was sold in exclusive in-store boutiques. In late 1998 Shamask took over the Greenwich Village studio of the abstract artist Jennifer Bartlett to display his new collection. Along the runway, paintings of Bartlett were shown to illustrate Shamask's appreciation for her, especially her color palette. The spring collection featured pleated pieces in trapezoidal shapes and dresses with spiral seams—another extension of the most notable spiral jacket.

Shamask continued to focus on architectural design late in his career, using mathematics and geometry to create each single piece of fabric. "The only decorative element in my clothes is the cut, the only detail is the seams," Shamask told the New York Times in 1997. Since Shamask's reinventing of the zipper, he has had a vast and varied design career—from working with Revlon to studying furniture design, while continuing to design extraordinary clothes for men and women.

—Richard Martin; updated by Diana Idzelis

SHILLING, David

English milliner and designer

Born: London, England, 27 June 1956. Education: St. Paul's School, Hammersmith, London. Career: Underwriter, Lloyd's of London, 1973–75; established millinery business, 1974; established own shop for couture hats, 1976; introduced women's ready-to-wear collection, 1984; other lines include menswear collection, 1986–89, and hand-painted ties, 1988–90; fashion correspondent, Radio London, 1982–86; Senior Consultant on Design and Product Adaptation, United Nations, from 1990; created symbol for Britain's Festival of Arts and Culture, 1995; designed the logo for the Consortium for Street Children; organized a millinery course in one of Her Majesty's prisons. Exhibitions: David Shilling—The Hats, toured the United Kingdom, 1981–84; Edinburgh College of Art, 1982; David Shilling: A Decade of Design, Chester Museum, England, 1991; exhibition of paintings, Richard Demarco Gallery, Edinburgh, 1991; Unique Insight Into David Shilling, Hatworks Museum, Stockport, 2001; Mrs. Shilling Outfits, National Horseracing Museum, Suffolk, 2001. Collections: Metropolitan Museum, New York; Los Angeles County Museum; Philadelphia Museum of Art; Victoria and Albert Museum, London; and Musée de l'Art Décoratif, Paris. Awards: President for Life of Valdivia, Ecuador. Address: 5 Homer Street, London W1H 1HN, England. Website: www.davidshilling.com.

PUBLICATIONS

By SHILLING:

Books

Thinking Rich, London, 1986.

On SHILLING:

Books

Hickey, Ted, and Elizabeth McCrum, David Shilling: The Hats [exhibition catalogue], Belfast, 1981.

Polan, Brenda, ed., The Fashion Year, London, 1983.

Ginsburg, Madeleine, The Hat, Hauppauge, New York, 1990.

McDowell, Colin, Hats: Status, Style, Glamour, London, 1992.

Articles

Neustatter, Angela, "Cheeky Chapeaux," in The Guardian (London), 15 March 1978.

Glynn, Prudence, "A Sense of Occasion," in the Times (London), 16 March 1978.

"The Shilling Hat Man," in the Observer, 30 April 1978.

Cleave, Maureen, "Over 21," in Woman's Day, June 1979.

"Simply Shilling, My Dear," in Woman's Day, 23 July 1979.

Clemeneigh, Mirella, "Capelli in Mostra," in Casa Vogue, December 1980.

McKay, Peter, "Man with a Head for Hats," in Woman's Journal (London), December 1980.

Heron, Marianne, "Shilling, the Man Who Makes Headlines," in Irish Independent, Summer 1981.

Blume, Mary, "David Shilling, Wild Hatter of Ascot," in the International Herald Tribune, 5 June 1982.

Webster, Valerie, "A Shilling's Worth of Extravagance," in the Scotsman, 15 February 1984.

Mercer, Tim, "A Room of My Own: David Shilling," in the Observer, 18 March 1984.

Benchy, Maeve, "Not Like the Ones He Used to Make for His Mother," in the Irish Times, 15 May 1984.

"Hats Off to Shilling," in World of Interiors (London), August 1984.

Hillier, Bevis, "David Shilling Hat Trick," in the Los Angeles Times, 13 October 1985.

"Haute Hats," in Cosmopolitan, November 1986.

"Who Needs Money to Be a Millionaire," in the Sunday Express, 2 November 1986.

"A Head for Hats," in Woman's Journal, February 1987.

Weber, Bruce, "The Milliner's Tale," in the New York Times Magazine, 24 April 1988.

"David Shilling, Hatmaker to the Rich and Famous," in Hello (London), 22 April 1989.

"A Hat Man's Day at the Races," in the Herald-Sun, 9 September 1990.

Smith, Liz, "David Shilling," in the Times, 6 February 1991.

Kuandika, Giyil, "David Shilling," in Business Times (Dar-Es-Salaam), May 1991.

Owens, Susan, "The Item to Top it All Off," in the Sydney Morning Herald, 25 August 1992.

Gibbs, Warren, "The Mad Hatter," in New Idea, 24 October 1992.

Cawthorne, Zelda, "Hats That are Ahead of the Rest," in the South China Morning Post, 28 November 1992.

Bunoan, Vladimir S., "Hats Off to David," in Philippine Business World, 2 February 1993.

Gusman, Susan A., "Hats Off," in the Philippine Daily Enquirer, 14 February 1993.

*

I have chosen to communicate not in words but in shapes and tones. In the catalogue to the 1981 Ulster Museum exhibition of my hats, I was quoted as saying that the work should speak for itself, that words about it are superfluous. I still believe this is true. If I thought I could express in words any meaningful essays or insights into my work, I might be able to save myself all the hard work that goes into creating whatever it may be that I am creating in all its glorious color and form.

The passion has always been there; as a child I knew what I wanted to be. I redesigned my room constantly but I didn't earn a penny from my designing until I sold soft toys to my local toy shop at 13. From then on I was hooked on fashion. I am very motivated by the challenges of my work, whether in art or design, and I always want to do better than before. I challenge myself; I love what I'm doing, and I guess if I find that much pleasure in it, so will my clients.

I knew my work would change over the years. What I had not expected was that enormous changes would occur at the heart of fashion itself. When I first started, you thought of fashion as clothes. Now, in every consumer purchase there is an element of fashion.

Success has not been an end in itself but the key to other things. Although I received no formal art education, it has enabled me to work in all sorts of areas, from interior design to working with the United Nations in developing countries.

I particularly enjoy innovation, but novelty alone is never enough. One of the keys of successful designing is getting your timing right. When I started designing hats commercially, I never dreamed they would have the global and continuing influence they have, but I knew I was on the right track. I knew women should enjoy again the pure indulgence of wearing hats. What I didn't foresee were the generations of young people who would imitate my success. Luckily, I still love making hats.

The deeper messages of my work I express in my paintings, examining conflicts and relationships. The message when I design is simply that to be alive is a gift, so every day should be a celebration.

—David Shilling

* * *

David Shilling's interest in millinery was first inspired by a visit to his mother's hatmaker at the age of 12. He resolved to design a hat for his mother to wear to that year's Royal Ascot. Mrs. Gertrude Shilling, who was already noted for her eccentric and flamboyant taste in occasion dressing, caused such a sensation that her appearance made front-page news. The press adored her, and for 30 years her appearance at Ascot was a national institution until her death in 1999. "Once my mother had got into the papers, she was determined to be in each subsequent year," Shilling later recalled. To gratify his mother's determination, Shilling was faced with the task of creating gimmick after gimmick, a process that led him to establish his own millinery business in 1974.

In contrast to his extravagant creations, Shilling has a vulnerable and sensitive approach to his work. This attitude led him to anonymously send his first collection of millinery to the London department stores Liberty and Fortnum & Mason. He opened his first shop in Marylebone High Street, London, where everything was designed and made on the premises. Noted for always looking in on his shop to see the results of his efforts and to advise anyone unaccustomed to wearing hats, he has an eye for detail and design flair that ensures that many of his devoted clients return each season.

No two Shilling hats are ever made exactly the same. Bloomingdale's, Bergdorf Goodman, and Neiman Marcus have all bought collections from Shilling in the past. The volume of work requested by his private clients, however, led Shilling to stop the wholesaling of his hats. Shilling's hats are more than fashion accessories; they are works of art and as such they have been exhibited in art galleries and museums around the world. According to Elizabeth McCrum from the Ulster Museum, "His hats have achieved the status of objects d'art... They also function most effectively, being both flattering and comfortable for the wearer."

Actress Susan George declared, "I only wear hats if it is a hat occasion; otherwise I tend to feel rather self-conscious." She was so overwhelmed by her choice of a Shilling wide-brimmed, veiled hat for Ascot that her self-consciousness quickly gave way to enthusiasm. As Shilling himself acknowledged, "I love women to look beautiful and could never let a woman walk out of my shop wearing a hat that I didn't think suited her." In contrast, another customer, journalist and painter Molly Parkin, admits to being a hat fetishist. "I wear hats all the time, even in bed," she said. "In fact, I can't do anything without a hat on." Shilling saw this as an ideal creative opportunity to encourage Parkin's idea that her hair is an accessory to his hats.

Shilling's basic design philosophy is simple. He believes if you pay attention to every detail of the hat from the initial design to the finishing touches, the hat will flatter the customer. His hats are created from a variety of fabrics and trimmings, including black lacquered feathers, felting, antique velvets, silk veiling, tulle, and artificial flowers. In many ways, he established a niche in the British millinery market for fantasy, with fashion hats that were witty yet stylish.

Shilling's hats reflect both a sculptural and architectural quality. In the early 1990s when he started working with all-white canvases, his paintings were also more like sculptures. Shilling soon moved away from works with fabric and trim to create his sculptural designs. He now works with large, freestanding, mirror-polished stainless steel and a blowtorch. He completed his first commissioned sculpture in 1999, Between the Two Blues, in Nassau, Bahamas. Shilling's most recent commissioned sculptures are both in France.

Although Shilling never had any formal education in art, he has lectured all over the world on art and design at public gatherings, art colleges, and universities. He has also worked with several government agencies, such as the United Nations, to promote the importance of excellence in design worldwide. His touch of design can be seen in the British Festival of Art and Culture 1995 symbol and in the logo for the Consortium for Street Children in London. He also served on the development committee for the Royal Academy.

"I'm the best hatmaker there is," Shilling once declared, but added modestly, "I don't know whether it is a good thing or not."

—Kevin Almond; updated by Kim Brown

SIMON, Fabrice

See FABRICE

SIMONETTA

Italian designer

Born: Duchess Simonetta Colonna di Cesarò, Rome, Italy, 10 April 1922. Family: Married Count Galaezzo Visconti di Modrone, 1944 (divorced, 1959); married Alberto Fabiani (divorced); children: Verde, Bardo. Career: Opened design studio, Rome, 1946–62, 1965; partner/designer, Simonetta et Fabiani, Paris, 1962–65; introduced fragrance Incanto, 1955; traveled in India, 1960s–70s, establishing a colony for the care of lepers and a craft training program, 1973–76. Exhibitions: Rome, 1946; Homage and International Celebration of Italian Designers, Center for Italian Fashion, Florence, 2001. Address: 8 Via Cadore, 41012 Caroi, Italy.

PUBLICATIONS

On SIMONETTA:

Books

- Lambert, Eleanor, World of Fashion: People, Places, Resources, New York, London, 1976.
 Steele, Valerie, Women of Fashion: Twentieth Century Designers, New York, 1991.
 Vergani, Guido, The Sala Bianca: The Birth of Italian Fashion, Milan, 1992.
 Stegemeyer, Anne, Who's Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.
 Mormorio, Diego, Dressed: The Style of the Italians, Turin, 2000.

Articles

- Sheppard, Eugenia, "Simonette," in the New York Herald Tribune, 14 November 1951.
 "Simonetta," in Current Biography, December 1955.
 "Bonjour Paris, Addio Rome," in WWD, 3 April 1962.
 Forti, Anna Gloria, "La Lady dell'alta Moda: Simonetta," in Vogue (Milan), December 1991 supplement.
 Brady, James, "In Italian Fashion Murder Case, Even the Psychic Gets Jail Time," in Advertising Age, 30 November 1998.
 Goldstein, Lauren, "Valentino's Day," in Time Europe, 31 July 2000.

* * *

Eugenia Sheppard, writing in the New York Herald Tribune, in November 1951 called Simonetta the "youngest, liveliest member of the up and coming Italian Couture," commending the breadth of her collection from a two-part playsuit with cummerbund and bloomer shorts to a silk shantung dress-suit with tiered collar to her short and long eveningwear. By 1951, with ardent advocacy from American Vogue and Bergdorf Goodman, Simonetta was one of the best-known names in America for the new Italian postwar fashion.

Simonetta had presented her first collection in Rome in 1946, two years after her marriage to Count Galaezzo Visconti and a year before the birth of their daughter, Verde. An aristocrat, Simonetta had been interned by the Mussolini government for antifascist activities. The further pluckiness of starting up her couture business so immediately after the war was a sign of Simonetta's dauntless determination. A press release for her 1946 collection read in part: "To understand how difficult it was to open a maison de couture and have a show with 14 models just after the liberation of Rome by the Allies, one must remember the general situation at that time. Materials and trimmings were very scarce. The most surprising and common materials had to be used to make the extraordinary collection—dish cloths, gardeners' aprons, butlers' uniforms, strings and ribbons, and everything that could be found on the market." It was a humble beginning for an aristocrat dreaming of a high style.

But Simonetta was not alone. Other aristocratic Italian couturiers joined her, including her future second husband, Alberto Fabiani, as well as Roberto Capucci, Marquis Emilio Pucci, Princess Marcella Borghese, Federico Forquet, Ognibene and Zendman. They turned the attention of the international fashion world away from Paris, where they had been rebuffed, to Rome, with their elegant yet comfortable ensembles, created from new and innovative textiles and set in striking color combinations. The glamor of a politically correct aristocrat improvising an Italian postwar renaissance was of hypnotic charm to the American market. Moreover, Simonetta's youthful style held a special appeal, especially in the buoyant silk cocktail dresses, elegant debutante dresses, and ball gowns she created in the 1950s, with their emphasis on the bust.

Equally popular were the daywear and sportswear lines, as well as Simonetta's coats, with the coats in particular providing a favored inspiration for Seventh Avenue copying. She could rival Balenciaga in creating coats and suits made in robust materials, cut with precision and minimal detailing to draw attention to one salient feature. Like Balenciaga, she favored capelike sleeve treatments that gave the coats a dramatic sense of volume, especially in photographs. Further, she shared with Balenciaga a preference for the seven-eighths sleeve in coats, allowing for the display of gloves and jewelry. For the American market, these popular attributes constituted an idea of ease and mobility, but they also lent themselves to facile imitation and copying.

Famed Italian filmmaker Federico Fellini helped the fledgling Italian designers by making their clothing visible in his La Dolce Vita (1960), and other films, like Joseph Mankiewicz's Barefoot Contessa (1954), also featured Italian style. Suddenly, Simonetta, Fabiani, Pucci, Armani, Jole Veneziani, Marucelli, and Emilio Schubert were enjoying international attention, though France still snubbed these Italians. In fact, in 1962, when Simonetta and Fabiani moved to Paris and established Simonetta et Fabiani, the enterprise was less successful. But for a time, Rome was a locus of fashion.

Simonetta's distinguished international clientèle included the likes of Audrey Hepburn, Clare Booth Luce, Eleanor Lambert, Lauren Bacall, and Jacqueline Kennedy Onassis. As Aurora Fiorentini Capitani and Stefania Ricci observed in the Sala Bianca (Milan, 1992), "The collections by Simonetta were invariably met with success, in terms of the public and in terms of sales, because they translated the image of a naturally chic woman, with essential lines, elevated by one simple feature, a knot or a raised neck, and corresponded in every way to the personality of the Roman designer."

Modern Italian designers have paid homage to Simonetta and her husband, describing the two of them, along with the Fontana sisters, Design by Simonetta, 1952. © Genevieve Naylor/CORBIS.

Veneziani, Marucelli, and Pucci as being among the pioneers who gave international wings to the then fledgling Italian fashion industry, paving the way for the likes of Valentino, Gucci, and Armani. Archives of her work, and that of Fabiani, are held at the New York Public Library's Manuscripts and Archives Division.

Simonetta was often photographed in her clothing and served in some ways as her own best model. She lived the life Americans dreamed of as portrayed in such movies as William Wyler's Roman Holiday (1953). If Simonetta was the ideal model for her clothing in the 1940s and 1950s, exemplifying practicality and young elegance, and a famous designer of clothing in the 1950s and 1960s, she later epitomized another cultural transformation as she forsook fashion to devote herself to philanthropy and spirituality, working with lepers in India in the 1970s and 1980s. Eventually, she moved to the Himalayas, where she studied Eastern spirituality and mysticism. In the 1990s, she returned to Rome, interested in reviewing and collecting her fashion work for a museum, and her works influenced those of future designers like Anna Municchi.

Simonetta's life seems to have been, more than most, culturally keyed. If it was in any way a destiny granted with privilege, it was also a destiny seized. Her fashion recognized the possibility of renewed elegance in postwar Italian and American life as well as the practicality of designing for distinctly modern women.

—Richard Martin; updated by Daryl F. Mallett

SIMPSON, Adele

American fashion designer

Born: Adele Smithline, in New York City, 28 December 1904. Education: Studied dressmaking at Pratt Institute of Design, Brooklyn, New York, 1921–22. Family: Married textile manufacturer Wesley William Simpson, 1930 (deceased); children: Jeffrey, Joan. Career: Assistant designer, 1922, then head dress designer, 1923–26, Ben Gershel's ready-to-wear fashion house, New York; chief designer, William Bass, New York, 1927–28; designer of Adele Simpson fashions, at Mary Lee Fashions, New York, 1929–49; president and director of Adele Simpson Inc. (bought out Mary Lee Fashions), New

Adele Simpson, spring 1965 collection. © AP/Wide World Photos.

York, beginning in 1949. Member of the New York Couture Group; treasurer and board member, Fashion Group, New York; co-founder and board member, Fashion Designers of America. Collections: Brooklyn Museum, New York; Metropolitan Museum of Art, New York; Dallas Public Library, Texas. Awards: Neiman-Marcus award, 1946; Coty American Fashion Critics Winnie award, New York, 1947. Died: 23 August 1995, in Greenwich, Connecticut.

PUBLICATIONS

On SIMPSON:

Books

- Celebrity Register*, New York, 1963.
 Moritz, Charles, ed., Current Biography Yearbook 1970, New York, 1970.
 Watkins, Josephine Ellis, Fairchild's Who's Who in Fashion, New York, 1975.
 Babbitt, Marcy, Living Christian Science: Fourteen Lives, Englewood Cliffs, New Jersey, 1975.
 Walz, Barbra, and Morris, Bernadine, The Fashion Makers, New York, 1978.
 Houck, Catherine, The Fashion Encyclopedia, New York, 1982.
 O'Hara, Georgina, The Encyclopaedia of Fashion, New York, 1986.
 Stegemeyer, Anne, Who's Who in Fashion, Second Edition, New York, 1988.
 Calasibetta, Charlotte Mankey, Fairchild's Dictionary of Fashion, Second Edition, New York, 1988.
 Milbank, Caroline Rennolds, New York Fashion: The Evolution of American Style, New York, 1989.
 Stegemeyer, Anne, Who's Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.

Articles

- "First Lady Selects Spring Wardrobe," in the New York Times, 25 March 1966.
 "Mrs. Johnson to Wear Slim Tunic for Easter," in the New York Times, 9 April 1966.
 Morris, Bernadine, "Mrs. Nixon's One Midiskirt," in the New York Times, 14 March 1970.
 _____, "Cheerful Designs for Winter Sun," in the New York Times, 27 August 1975.
 _____, "Joyful Fashions with a Folkloric Flavor," in the New York Times, 6 November 1976.
 _____, "Designers Softly Changing the Way Women Will Dress," in the New York Times, 23 April 1977.
 _____, "Fashion: Serious About Summer," in the New York Times, 18 January 1978.
 _____, "For Resort Wear: Trousers Are Shorter and Waistlines Easier," in the New York Times, 19 August 1978.
 Bancou, Marielle, "Adele Simpson," in American Fabrics and Fashions (New York), Fall 1978.
 Anster, Linda, "Simsoniana on Display," in the New York Times, 15 November 1978.
 Morris, Bernadine, "Long Reach of the Reagan Style," in the New York Times, 24 February 1981.
 _____, "Four Designers Present Easy-to-Wear Clothes," in the New York Times, 29 October 1982.

Simonetta's life seems to have been, more than most, culturally keyed. If it was in any way a destiny granted with privilege, it was also a destiny seized. Her fashion recognized the possibility of renewed elegance in postwar Italian and American life as well as the practicality of designing for distinctly modern women.

—Richard Martin; updated by Daryl F. Mallett

SIMPSON, Adele

American fashion designer

Born: Adele Smithline, in New York City, 28 December 1904. Education: Studied dressmaking at Pratt Institute of Design, Brooklyn, New York, 1921–22. Family: Married textile manufacturer Wesley William Simpson, 1930 (deceased); children: Jeffrey, Joan. Career: Assistant designer, 1922, then head dress designer, 1923–26, Ben Gershel's ready-to-wear fashion house, New York; chief designer, William Bass, New York, 1927–28; designer of Adele Simpson fashions, at Mary Lee Fashions, New York, 1929–49; president and director of Adele Simpson Inc. (bought out Mary Lee Fashions), New

Adele Simpson, spring 1965 collection. © AP/Wide World Photos.

York, beginning in 1949. Member of the New York Couture Group; treasurer and board member, Fashion Group, New York; co-founder and board member, Fashion Designers of America. Collections: Brooklyn Museum, New York; Metropolitan Museum of Art, New York; Dallas Public Library, Texas. Awards: Neiman-Marcus award, 1946; Coty American Fashion Critics Winnie award, New York, 1947. Died: 23 August 1995, in Greenwich, Connecticut.

PUBLICATIONS

On SIMPSON:

Books

- Celebrity Register*, New York, 1963.
 Moritz, Charles, ed., Current Biography Yearbook 1970, New York, 1970.
 Watkins, Josephine Ellis, Fairchild's Who's Who in Fashion, New York, 1975.
 Babbitt, Marcy, Living Christian Science: Fourteen Lives, Englewood Cliffs, New Jersey, 1975.
 Walz, Barbra, and Morris, Bernadine, The Fashion Makers, New York, 1978.
 Houck, Catherine, The Fashion Encyclopedia, New York, 1982.
 O'Hara, Georgina, The Encyclopaedia of Fashion, New York, 1986.
 Stegemeyer, Anne, Who's Who in Fashion, Second Edition, New York, 1988.
 Calasibetta, Charlotte Mankey, Fairchild's Dictionary of Fashion, Second Edition, New York, 1988.
 Milbank, Caroline Rennolds, New York Fashion: The Evolution of American Style, New York, 1989.
 Stegemeyer, Anne, Who's Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.

Articles

- "First Lady Selects Spring Wardrobe," in the New York Times, 25 March 1966.
 "Mrs. Johnson to Wear Slim Tunic for Easter," in the New York Times, 9 April 1966.
 Morris, Bernadine, "Mrs. Nixon's One Midiskirt," in the New York Times, 14 March 1970.
 _____, "Cheerful Designs for Winter Sun," in the New York Times, 27 August 1975.
 _____, "Joyful Fashions with a Folkloric Flavor," in the New York Times, 6 November 1976.
 _____, "Designers Softly Changing the Way Women Will Dress," in the New York Times, 23 April 1977.
 _____, "Fashion: Serious About Summer," in the New York Times, 18 January 1978.
 _____, "For Resort Wear: Trousers Are Shorter and Waistlines Easier," in the New York Times, 19 August 1978.
 Bancou, Marielle, "Adele Simpson," in American Fabrics and Fashions (New York), Fall 1978.
 Anster, Linda, "Simsoniana on Display," in the New York Times, 15 November 1978.
 Morris, Bernadine, "Long Reach of the Reagan Style," in the New York Times, 24 February 1981.
 _____, "Four Designers Present Easy-to-Wear Clothes," in the New York Times, 29 October 1982.

- _____, "Seventh Avenue Winners: Coat Dresses, Suits," in the New York Times, 1 March 1983.
- _____, "Short Gowns Shine for Night," in the New York Times, 17 May 1983.
- Obituary, Time, 4 September 1995.
- Profile and obituary, Current Biography, October 1995.

* * *

The longevity of Adele Simpson's fashion business might be attributed to her acute awareness of the needs of her clientele: busy women who were frequently in the public eye, traveled quite a bit, and who required practical, well-made clothes to please not only their husbands and their observers, but themselves. Avant-garde or bizarre fashions would not do for these women. Simpson consistently offered conservative, yet pretty and feminine versions of current trends. The garments were made of ordinary fabrics such as cotton—Simpson was the first American designer to treat cotton seriously as a fashion fabric—or sumptuous fabrics inspired by the textiles she saw and collected on her frequent world travels. Her inspiration might have come from close to home as well, as in her adaptation of a New York City public school child's drawing of a cityscape at dusk, which Simpson interpreted in a silk dress and jacket ensemble that was later displayed at the Fashion Institute of Technology.

Adele Simpson, fall 1964 collection: satin princess dress. © AP/Wide World Photos.

From the beginning of her career, Simpson dedicated herself to what she described as "realistic" fashion. During a time when women's dresses were developing a radically simpler silhouette, Simpson went even further and devised clothing that could be stepped into rather than pulled over the head. She concentrated on creating dresses and coats, blouses and suits, or dress and jacket combinations, all of which could coordinate and allow the wearer to be well dressed from daytime into the evening with a minimum of effort. An ingenious design consisted of a woolen cape and skirt teamed with a luxurious brocade blouse, and a separate underskirt made of the brocaded blouse material. When the cape and overskirt were removed for evening, the resulting costume would be an elegant two-piece dinner dress. Political wives with busy itineraries and traveling schedules (including four First Ladies), and international performers such as Dame Margot Fonteyn, appreciated the practicality of Simpson's clothes, as well as their quality and artistic merits. As if to compensate for the basic conservatism of the styles, Simpson often rendered them in unusual, often sensuous fabrics.

Credited with "taking cotton out of the kitchen" during the 1940s, Simpson proved the fiber's suitability for street dresses and full-skirted evening gowns. Although known for her pretty prints in delicate colors, Simpson often used black for spring or summer, and made unusual pairings of fabrics, such as velvet over gingham. Silhouettes would generally be modified versions of prevailing shapes. There would usually be a defined waist and gentle overall curvaceousness that proved flattering to her somewhat more mature customers. Even the Simpson version of the chemise in the 1950s came with an adjustable tie belt.

Simpson often looked to the East for exotic touches to her designs. In the early 1960s, one collection featured day and evening clothes for summer that were made of linen and silk embroidered with Turkish patterns or printed in Byzantine mosaic motifs. Simpson also employed authentic Indian cotton sari fabrics, some embroidered in gold, for a dress collection that was exhibited at the New York World's Fair. Japanese silk prints also proved to be elegant and feminine sources of inspiration.

Drawing from the collection of foreign costumes she amassed during world travels, Simpson might conceive a fabric design from a single decoration, color scheme, or detail to create fashion that she would then display next to the original native piece. A printed evening gown might be inspired by a delicately embroidered Chinese jacket, or a vested outfit by a South American gaucho costume. Clothes such as these would appeal to clients who traveled, or merely wished to enliven their wardrobes with a touch of the exotic.

Adele Simpson, Inc. had long been one of the most successful manufacturers of women's better ready-to-wear. Prices of the designs ranged from about $100 in the 1940s, through $200 for a dress or suit in the 1960s, and from $400 to $1,000 in the 1980s, although a simple "ladylike dinner dress" could be had for $325. In 1990 Gump's catalogue (San Francisco, California) offered two versions of Simpson's "little black dresses" for around $400 each. First Ladies Mrs. Eisenhower, Mrs. Johnson, Mrs. Nixon, and Mrs. Carter included Simpson designs in their public and private wardrobes. When Mrs. Johnson selected a Simpson sand-beige coat and black silk dress ensemble to wear on Easter Sunday, the item made the news. Mrs. Nixon wore Simpson designs to Russia, China, and Africa, and one of the second Inaugural balls.

While for years the designer favored only pure silk, wool, and cotton in their many variations, she later did admit the merits of synthetic fibers. Simpson always made a point of asking women about their needs and desires in clothing; she credited her belief in Christian Science for setting the standard for beauty and excellence in her work.

After Adele Simpson donated her vast collection of artifacts, costumes, and fashion magazines to the Fashion Institute of Technology in 1978, she continued to oversee the designing, but Donald Hobson became the official designer for the company. His work maintained the Simpson aesthetic, but it evolved into even softer, more fluid and youthful lines.

In August 1995, Adele Simpson died at her home in Greenwich, Connecticut.

—Therese Duzinkiewicz Baker

SITBON, Martine

French designer

Born: circa 1952 in Casablanca; raised in Casablanca and Paris. Education: Graduated in fashion design from the Studio Bercot, Paris, 1974. Career: Fashion consultant, then freelance designer, 1974–84; signature ready-to-wear collection debuted in Paris, 1984; also ready-to-wear designer, Chloé in Paris, 1987–91; opened Paris store, 1995; licensing deal with Gibo and launched Martine Sitbon Tricot, 1998; introduced menswear collection, 1999; debuted punk collection, March 2000; named creative director for women, Byblos, 2001. Address: 6 rue de Braque, 75003 Paris, France.

PUBLICATIONS

On SITBON:

Books

Steele, Valerie, Women of Fashion: Twentieth Century Designers, New York, 1991.

Articles

Webb, Ian R., "Martine Sitbon," in Blitz (London), April 1986.

"Chloé Unveils New Design Team with Martine Sitbon," in WWD, 14 May 1987.

Maiberger, Elise, "Sitbon Pretty," in The Face (London), June 1988.

Voight, Rebecca, "Martine Sitbon: France's Best Kept Fashion Secret," in i-D (London), March 1989.

Gross, Michael, "Paris Originals: Chloé in the Afternoon," in New York, 15 May 1989.

Quick, Harriet, and Louise Chunn, "Beauty and the Beastly" in The Guardian, 10 March 1994.

Forden, Sara Gay, "Italy Smokes Paris," in WWD, 24 April 1996.

Drake, Alicia, "Fashion Lights Up the Town," in WWD, 10 March 1997.

"Sitbon Signs License Pact with Gibo," in WWD, 15 June 1998.

Martine Sitbon, spring 2001 collection. © AP/Wide World Photos/Fashion Wire Daily.

Dodd, Annmarie, and Nelson Mui, "Martine Sitbon Hones in on Homme...," in DNR, 12 April 1999.

Murphy, Robert, "French Designers are Determining Own Approach to Sportswear from Slimane to Sitbon...," in DNR, 19 January 2000.

"Byblos Appoints Martine Sitbon as Women's Creative Director," in WWD, 19 March 2001.

* * *

Although her early collections bore fairytale titles like Cinderella, it is rock music, especially of the 1970s, that has often been Sitbon's strongest inspiration. Her sculptural suiting, often based on masculine lines, underpins each season's looks but leathers, studs, and swirling sequins were present, emphasizing both her affinity with the music scene and her skilled use of luxury fabrics.

Sitbon's manipulation of delicate textiles, mixing soft pastel and metallic shades as artistically as fruitier colors, is seen in both her own name line and the work she produced to breathe life back into the Chloé label from the mid-1980s to the early 1990s. Her use of fine organzas, left to flow and ruffle in petal-like folds at the cuff and selected a Simpson sand-beige coat and black silk dress ensemble to wear on Easter Sunday, the item made the news. Mrs. Nixon wore Simpson designs to Russia, China, and Africa, and one of the second Inaugural balls.

While for years the designer favored only pure silk, wool, and cotton in their many variations, she later did admit the merits of synthetic fibers. Simpson always made a point of asking women about their needs and desires in clothing; she credited her belief in Christian Science for setting the standard for beauty and excellence in her work.

After Adele Simpson donated her vast collection of artifacts, costumes, and fashion magazines to the Fashion Institute of Technology in 1978, she continued to oversee the designing, but Donald Hobson became the official designer for the company. His work maintained the Simpson aesthetic, but it evolved into even softer, more fluid and youthful lines.

In August 1995, Adele Simpson died at her home in Greenwich, Connecticut.

—Therese Duzinkiewicz Baker

SITBON, Martine

French designer

Born: circa 1952 in Casablanca; raised in Casablanca and Paris. Education: Graduated in fashion design from the Studio Bercot, Paris, 1974. Career: Fashion consultant, then freelance designer, 1974–84; signature ready-to-wear collection debuted in Paris, 1984; also ready-to-wear designer, Chloé in Paris, 1987–91; opened Paris store, 1995; licensing deal with Gibo and launched Martine Sitbon Tricot, 1998; introduced menswear collection, 1999; debuted punk collection, March 2000; named creative director for women, Byblos, 2001. Address: 6 rue de Braque, 75003 Paris, France.

PUBLICATIONS

On SITBON:

Books

Steele, Valerie, Women of Fashion: Twentieth Century Designers, New York, 1991.

Articles

Webb, Ian R., "Martine Sitbon," in Blitz (London), April 1986.

"Chloé Unveils New Design Team with Martine Sitbon," in WWD, 14 May 1987.

Maiberger, Elise, "Sitbon Pretty," in The Face (London), June 1988.

Voight, Rebecca, "Martine Sitbon: France's Best Kept Fashion Secret," in i-D (London), March 1989.

Gross, Michael, "Paris Originals: Chloé in the Afternoon," in New York, 15 May 1989.

Quick, Harriet, and Louise Chunn, "Beauty and the Beastly" in The Guardian, 10 March 1994.

Forden, Sara Gay, "Italy Smokes Paris," in WWD, 24 April 1996.

Drake, Alicia, "Fashion Lights Up the Town," in WWD, 10 March 1997.

"Sitbon Signs License Pact with Gibo," in WWD, 15 June 1998.

Martine Sitbon, spring 2001 collection. © AP/Wide World Photos/Fashion Wire Daily.

Dodd, Annmarie, and Nelson Mui, "Martine Sitbon Hones in on Homme...," in DNR, 12 April 1999.

Murphy, Robert, "French Designers are Determining Own Approach to Sportswear from Slimane to Sitbon...," in DNR, 19 January 2000.

"Byblos Appoints Martine Sitbon as Women's Creative Director," in WWD, 19 March 2001.

* * *

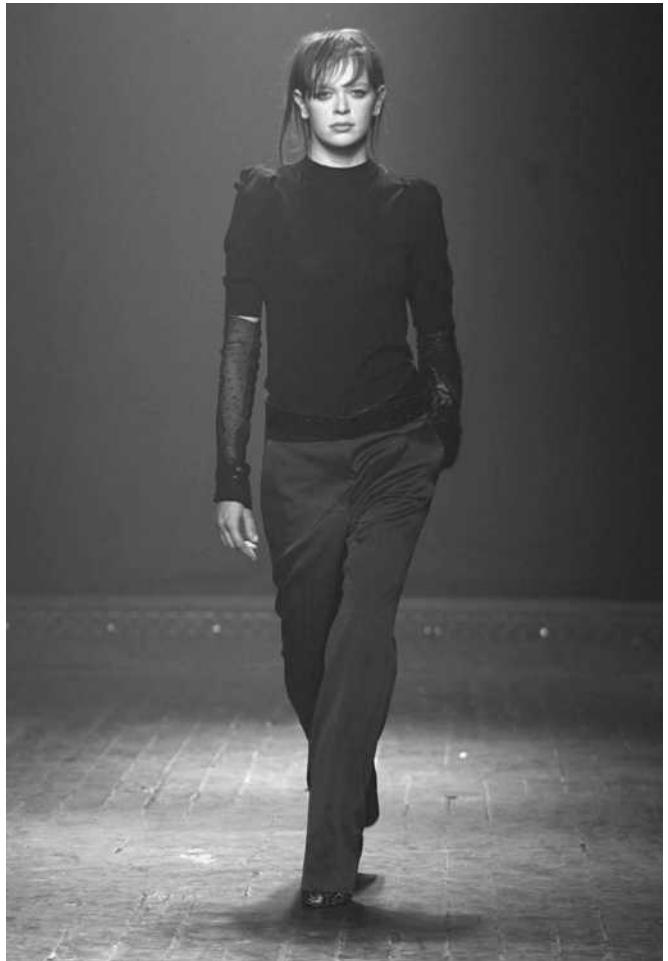

Although her early collections bore fairytale titles like Cinderella, it is rock music, especially of the 1970s, that has often been Sitbon's strongest inspiration. Her sculptural suiting, often based on masculine lines, underpins each season's looks but leathers, studs, and swirling sequins were present, emphasizing both her affinity with the music scene and her skilled use of luxury fabrics.

Sitbon's manipulation of delicate textiles, mixing soft pastel and metallic shades as artistically as fruitier colors, is seen in both her own name line and the work she produced to breathe life back into the Chloé label from the mid-1980s to the early 1990s. Her use of fine organzas, left to flow and ruffle in petal-like folds at the cuff and collars of blouses, was a recurring element in her work. Such ruffling reached its apex in the cascading frills that flowed down the back of blouses dotted with overblown silk flowers in her spring/summer 1992 collection. The delicate femininity was tempered by the cool shine of slim satin trousers, abbreviated skirts, and elongated jackets.

The freedom to use these sensuous fabrics comes from her strong Italian financial backing, enabling her to experiment with expensive 1970s decorative favorites like sequins and embroidery. In 1989 she punctuated cropped leather waistcoats with gold studs, manipulating Hell's Angel motifs to achieve more luxurious results. The idea was developed further in olive suede waistcoats with looped chains that hung down to the bright gold velvet skirts with which they were teamed, demonstrating the subtle use of color and shade pervading her work.

In the middle 1990s, Sitbon's rock preoccupations came into their own, in tune with retrospective trends that gave an edge to her signature use of flares and bell bottoms. She has shown them in everything from intricate pink and charcoal cut velvet to dazzling gold sequins. In her spring/summer 1993 collection, her look became more attenuated. Slate grey hipster flares were worn with thigh-skimming jackets, severely cut away and held together by black thongs bound across the body, a look which was very influential. This collection contrasted bondage motifs with fluid chocolate-brown satin and organza skirts, and raised her already impressive profile in Europe, linking as it does with the main elements of current deconstructed styles putting proportions off balance and dress-down luxury textiles with rougher detailing and accessories.

Martine Sitbon, fall 2001 collection. © AP/Wide World Photos/
Fashion Wire Daily.

Sitbon's work has always been carefully accessorized, with perspex-heeled platform sandals with black straps criss-crossing up the leg or with stringy leather or satin chokers. Her attention to detail inspires the trimmings she uses; a futuristic bent is also a recurring undercurrent with stretch fit leggings, tops and jackets in soft leather, stitched in circles and stripes, which emphasize the wearer's physique and give a starkly postmodern feel. A sculptural form continues in her suits, tailored to accentuate the shape of the body, like the soft Prince of Wales trouser suits in 1987 that exploited the cut of men's suits and, more severely, in fitted black jackets and miniskirts defined by white borders and flap pocket edges in 1990. Along with the simple raw silk trousers and supple blouses, they provided a classic foil to her more dandyish designs for Chloé and the more fantastic elements of her main line.

This ability to design strong daywear items as well as more luxurious garments has provided Sitbon with a wide customer base in Europe. She has skillfully manipulated fabrics and the mixing of very contemporary themes, masculine and feminine, or what Women's Wear Daily (10 March 1994) termed "roughness...combined with richness." Sitbon's duality has made her an important force in fashion, with a successful record of collections, including a new menswear line in 1999. Fashioned after Brit rockers, the suits and separates had hints of femininity, just as her womenswear usually had underlying masculinity.

Sitbon next dove into men's sportswear, telling the Daily News Record (19 January 2000), "I've been highly influenced by sportswear in the measure that comfortable clothes are part and parcel with today's zeitgeist. But at the same time, Paris is not about pure sportswear, it's about elegance. I like to mix diverse elements to give my man the freedom to dress in a personal way." Another mix came in early 2000 when Sitbon surprised everyone at the Paris showings with a fall punk collection.

A new collaboration arrived in the 21st century when Sitbon signed with Byblos to become its womenswear director in 2001. The appointment came at a time when Sitbon's own collections were increasingly well received. Her spring 2002 womenswear showing in Paris was another stunner with delicate shirts and camisoles, cinched dresses, and wide trousers for day, and eveningwear in darker shades of gold, coral, and black with elaborate beading and embroidery. Karin Nelson, writing for the Fashion Windows website, reported, "It was a collection so simply poetic, so acutely appropriate that the crowd did something they rarely ever do—stood up and applauded the designer."

—Rebecca Arnold; updated by Sydonie Benét

SITBON, Sophie

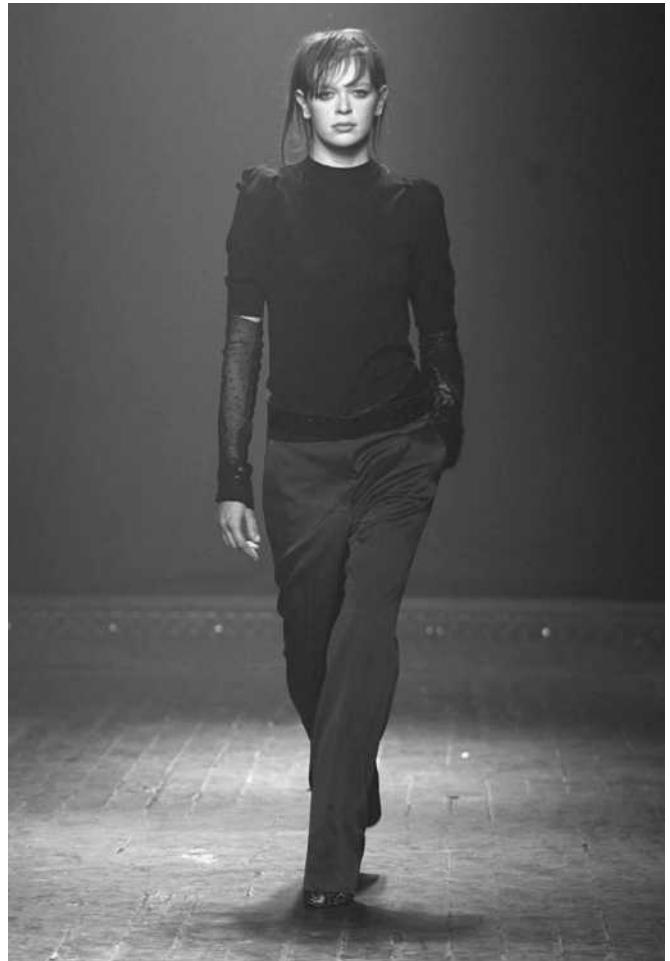

French designer

Born: Paris, France, 29 June 1961. Education: Attended the Lycée Victor Hugo, Paris; followed a one-year course in screenwriting, collars of blouses, was a recurring element in her work. Such ruffling reached its apex in the cascading frills that flowed down the back of blouses dotted with overblown silk flowers in her spring/summer 1992 collection. The delicate femininity was tempered by the cool shine of slim satin trousers, abbreviated skirts, and elongated jackets.

The freedom to use these sensuous fabrics comes from her strong Italian financial backing, enabling her to experiment with expensive 1970s decorative favorites like sequins and embroidery. In 1989 she punctuated cropped leather waistcoats with gold studs, manipulating Hell's Angel motifs to achieve more luxurious results. The idea was developed further in olive suede waistcoats with looped chains that hung down to the bright gold velvet skirts with which they were teamed, demonstrating the subtle use of color and shade pervading her work.

In the middle 1990s, Sitbon's rock preoccupations came into their own, in tune with retrospective trends that gave an edge to her signature use of flares and bell bottoms. She has shown them in everything from intricate pink and charcoal cut velvet to dazzling gold sequins. In her spring/summer 1993 collection, her look became more attenuated. Slate grey hipster flares were worn with thigh-skimming jackets, severely cut away and held together by black thongs bound across the body, a look which was very influential. This collection contrasted bondage motifs with fluid chocolate-brown satin and organza skirts, and raised her already impressive profile in Europe, linking as it does with the main elements of current deconstructed styles putting proportions off balance and dress-down luxury textiles with rougher detailing and accessories.

Martine Sitbon, fall 2001 collection. © AP/Wide World Photos/
Fashion Wire Daily.

Sitbon's work has always been carefully accessorized, with perspex-heeled platform sandals with black straps criss-crossing up the leg or with stringy leather or satin chokers. Her attention to detail inspires the trimmings she uses; a futuristic bent is also a recurring undercurrent with stretch fit leggings, tops and jackets in soft leather, stitched in circles and stripes, which emphasize the wearer's physique and give a starkly postmodern feel. A sculptural form continues in her suits, tailored to accentuate the shape of the body, like the soft Prince of Wales trouser suits in 1987 that exploited the cut of men's suits and, more severely, in fitted black jackets and miniskirts defined by white borders and flap pocket edges in 1990. Along with the simple raw silk trousers and supple blouses, they provided a classic foil to her more dandyish designs for Chloé and the more fantastic elements of her main line.

This ability to design strong daywear items as well as more luxurious garments has provided Sitbon with a wide customer base in Europe. She has skillfully manipulated fabrics and the mixing of very contemporary themes, masculine and feminine, or what Women's Wear Daily (10 March 1994) termed "roughness...combined with richness." Sitbon's duality has made her an important force in fashion, with a successful record of collections, including a new menswear line in 1999. Fashioned after Brit rockers, the suits and separates had hints of femininity, just as her womenswear usually had underlying masculinity.

Sitbon next dove into men's sportswear, telling the Daily News Record (19 January 2000), "I've been highly influenced by sportswear in the measure that comfortable clothes are part and parcel with today's zeitgeist. But at the same time, Paris is not about pure sportswear, it's about elegance. I like to mix diverse elements to give my man the freedom to dress in a personal way." Another mix came in early 2000 when Sitbon surprised everyone at the Paris showings with a fall punk collection.

A new collaboration arrived in the 21st century when Sitbon signed with Byblos to become its womenswear director in 2001. The appointment came at a time when Sitbon's own collections were increasingly well received. Her spring 2002 womenswear showing in Paris was another stunner with delicate shirts and camisoles, cinched dresses, and wide trousers for day, and eveningwear in darker shades of gold, coral, and black with elaborate beading and embroidery. Karin Nelson, writing for the Fashion Windows website, reported, "It was a collection so simply poetic, so acutely appropriate that the crowd did something they rarely ever do—stood up and applauded the designer."

—Rebecca Arnold; updated by Sydonie Benét

SITBON, Sophie

French designer

Born: Paris, France, 29 June 1961. Education: Attended the Lycée Victor Hugo, Paris; followed a one-year course in screenwriting,

Paris, 1980; studied fashion design, 1981–83, Paris. Career: Launched own fashion line, Sophie Sitbon, 1985; lauded for unusual designs, early 1990s; designed Academy Awards dress for Juliette Binoche, 1997. Exhibitions: Modes Gitane, Carousel des Sources, 1994. Address: 10 Rue Charlot Paris, 75003 France.

PUBLICATIONS

On SITBON:

Books

Modes Gitane, Paris, 1994.

Articles

- Véran, Sylvie, "...Et les bonheurs de Sophie," in Gap (Paris), February 1986.
 "Sophie Sitbon," in Elle (Paris), May 1987.
 "Stylistes: Sophie Sitbon," in 20ans (France), September 1989.
 "Designers' Inspirations: Sophie Sitbon," in Joyce (Hong Kong), Summer 1991.
 Schiro, Anne-Marie, "In Paris, Escapism is in Fashion for the 1990s," in the New York Times, 15 October 1992.
 Avins, Mimi, "Fashion: Lessons That Oscar Taught Us," in the Los Angeles Times, 24 March 1997.
 Johnson, Marylin, "Pre-Oscar Preening: What'll They Wear?" in the Atlanta Journal-Constitution, 24 March 1997.
 Avins, Mimi, "Calendar Goes to the Oscars," in the Los Angeles Times, 25 March 1997.
 Johnson, Marylin, and Miriam Longino, "Oscar Night: The 1997 Academy Awards," in the Atlanta Journal-Constitution, 25 March 1997.
 Levine, Lisbeth, "Fashion Parade Actresses Stop Traffic in Starry Battle of the Cleavage," in the Chicago Tribune, 25 March 1997.
 Colman, David, "Abandon Ship: Fashion Follies of the Year," in the New York Times, 4 January 1998.
 Thomas, Barbara, "Magazine Review: Guides to Help You Dress with Success," in the Los Angeles Times, 18 December 1998.
 Swanson, James L., "Three Hot Colors: Gray, Black and a Touch of Pink...," in the Chicago Tribune, 11 April 1999.
 "Sophie Sitbon," available online at Get Chic, www.getchic.com, 5 October 2001.
 "Sophie Sitbon," online at First View, www.firstview.com, 5 October 2001.
 "Sweet Scent of Success," online at Contessa Helena, www.contessahelena.com, 7 October 2001.

* * *

Fashion, to Sophie Sitbon, is functional. Clothes are not a means of artistic expression but a liaison between proportion and harmony and their sole reason for being is to be worn. Clothes are an individual means of expression for the person who wears them; they send out messages that can describe the complex range of subtleties and distinctions making up the human persona, a signal to other people about the essence of another person.

Sitbon describes her signature look as being seductive. In contrast to sexiness, seduction is subtle and has the power to attract in many directions. She particularly admires the seductive power of writer Tennessee Williams and the complex, often subversive repression of his heroines. Her designs reflect this, being always provocative yet never blatant. Movies and television are another strong influence; Sitbon regards her generation as being more audiovisual than literary. The visual impact of glamorous movie stars and their wardrobes often tell a more potent story than the written word. She sees clothes as a visual medium for reinterpreting the excitement and vibrancy of movies in real life.

Sitbon loves the drama of black and red, colors she adopted as her own: "I love black. I loved it before it became fashionable and I will always love it. Black is perennial," she said in an interview with Joyce magazine in Paris. Her clothes are simple yet dramatic, classic yet eccentric—a stark, black shift dress, suspended by spaghetti straps, is punctured by tiny holes that follow the dart positions of a dress block and is teamed with matching opera gloves. Another shift dress has a scalloped neckline and is splashed with an asymmetrical contrast color shape reminiscent of a Matisse cutout. Always energetic in her approach, Sitbon creates designs that are whimsical yet vital and impudent without being aggressive.

A graduate of the Esmode School of Fashion in Paris, in her final year she was awarded a Gold Medal by a jury of designers including Jean-Paul Gaultier and Thierry Mugler at the International Style Competition in Osaka, Japan. She produced her own collection in 1985, financed by a Japanese group and manufactured from a showroom in the Marais district of Paris, aiming to provide a simple, high-quality couture look for modern women at affordable prices. Seven years later, she declared herself happy with her design success, although her admiration for movie heroines has left her with one unfulfilled ambition—to direct her own movie.

In the 21st century, Sitbon continues to create clothes for an independent, self-confident woman who is what she is, rather than what she wears. Her clothes are a proposition rather than an imposed ideal. Her customer interprets Sitbon clothes to create her own independent look. "I prefer people to see someone in my designs and say 'doesn't she look wonderful,' not 'she's wearing Sophie Sitbon,'" the designer declared. Though she may not be as well known as some of her contemporaries, Sitbon remains a sought-after designer for such high profile events as the Academy Awards, for which she has produced several show stoppers.

—Kevin Almond; updated by Mary Ellen Snodgrass

SLIMANE, Hedi

French menswear designer

Born: Paris, France, 1969. Education: No formal training in fashion; studied art history at the École du Louvre. Career: Hired as assistant at José Lévy, 1990; became assistant at Yves Saint Laurent, 1997, quickly becoming designer of Rive Gauche Homme and then YSL menswear; took over as designer of Dior Homme, 2000. Address: Dior Homme, 30 Avenue Montaigne, 75008 Paris, France.

Paris, 1980; studied fashion design, 1981–83, Paris. Career: Launched own fashion line, Sophie Sitbon, 1985; lauded for unusual designs, early 1990s; designed Academy Awards dress for Juliette Binoche, 1997. Exhibitions: Modes Gitane, Carousel des Sources, 1994. Address: 10 Rue Charlot Paris, 75003 France.

PUBLICATIONS

On SITBON:

Books

Modes Gitane, Paris, 1994.

Articles

- Véran, Sylvie, "...Et les bonheurs de Sophie," in Gap (Paris), February 1986.
 "Sophie Sitbon," in Elle (Paris), May 1987.
 "Stylistes: Sophie Sitbon," in 20ans (France), September 1989.
 "Designers' Inspirations: Sophie Sitbon," in Joyce (Hong Kong), Summer 1991.
 Schiro, Anne-Marie, "In Paris, Escapism is in Fashion for the 1990s," in the New York Times, 15 October 1992.
 Avins, Mimi, "Fashion: Lessons That Oscar Taught Us," in the Los Angeles Times, 24 March 1997.
 Johnson, Marylin, "Pre-Oscar Preening: What'll They Wear?" in the Atlanta Journal-Constitution, 24 March 1997.
 Avins, Mimi, "Calendar Goes to the Oscars," in the Los Angeles Times, 25 March 1997.
 Johnson, Marylin, and Miriam Longino, "Oscar Night: The 1997 Academy Awards," in the Atlanta Journal-Constitution, 25 March 1997.
 Levine, Lisbeth, "Fashion Parade Actresses Stop Traffic in Starry Battle of the Cleavage," in the Chicago Tribune, 25 March 1997.
 Colman, David, "Abandon Ship: Fashion Follies of the Year," in the New York Times, 4 January 1998.
 Thomas, Barbara, "Magazine Review: Guides to Help You Dress with Success," in the Los Angeles Times, 18 December 1998.
 Swanson, James L., "Three Hot Colors: Gray, Black and a Touch of Pink...," in the Chicago Tribune, 11 April 1999.
 "Sophie Sitbon," available online at Get Chic, www.getchic.com, 5 October 2001.
 "Sophie Sitbon," online at First View, www.firstview.com, 5 October 2001.
 "Sweet Scent of Success," online at Contessa Helena, www.contessa-helena.com, 7 October 2001.

* * *

Fashion, to Sophie Sitbon, is functional. Clothes are not a means of artistic expression but a liaison between proportion and harmony and their sole reason for being is to be worn. Clothes are an individual means of expression for the person who wears them; they send out messages that can describe the complex range of subtleties and distinctions making up the human persona, a signal to other people about the essence of another person.

Sitbon describes her signature look as being seductive. In contrast to sexiness, seduction is subtle and has the power to attract in many directions. She particularly admires the seductive power of writer Tennessee Williams and the complex, often subversive repression of his heroines. Her designs reflect this, being always provocative yet never blatant. Movies and television are another strong influence; Sitbon regards her generation as being more audiovisual than literary. The visual impact of glamorous movie stars and their wardrobes often tell a more potent story than the written word. She sees clothes as a visual medium for reinterpreting the excitement and vibrancy of movies in real life.

Sitbon loves the drama of black and red, colors she adopted as her own: "I love black. I loved it before it became fashionable and I will always love it. Black is perennial," she said in an interview with Joyce magazine in Paris. Her clothes are simple yet dramatic, classic yet eccentric—a stark, black shift dress, suspended by spaghetti straps, is punctured by tiny holes that follow the dart positions of a dress block and is teamed with matching opera gloves. Another shift dress has a scalloped neckline and is splashed with an asymmetrical contrast color shape reminiscent of a Matisse cutout. Always energetic in her approach, Sitbon creates designs that are whimsical yet vital and impudent without being aggressive.

A graduate of the Esmode School of Fashion in Paris, in her final year she was awarded a Gold Medal by a jury of designers including Jean-Paul Gaultier and Thierry Mugler at the International Style Competition in Osaka, Japan. She produced her own collection in 1985, financed by a Japanese group and manufactured from a showroom in the Marais district of Paris, aiming to provide a simple, high-quality couture look for modern women at affordable prices. Seven years later, she declared herself happy with her design success, although her admiration for movie heroines has left her with one unfulfilled ambition—to direct her own movie.

In the 21st century, Sitbon continues to create clothes for an independent, self-confident woman who is what she is, rather than what she wears. Her clothes are a proposition rather than an imposed ideal. Her customer interprets Sitbon clothes to create her own independent look. "I prefer people to see someone in my designs and say 'doesn't she look wonderful,' not 'she's wearing Sophie Sitbon,'" the designer declared. Though she may not be as well known as some of her contemporaries, Sitbon remains a sought-after designer for such high profile events as the Academy Awards, for which she has produced several show stoppers.

—Kevin Almond; updated by Mary Ellen Snodgrass

SLIMANE, Hedi

French menswear designer

Born: Paris, France, 1969. Education: No formal training in fashion; studied art history at the École du Louvre. Career: Hired as assistant at José Lévy, 1990; became assistant at Yves Saint Laurent, 1997, quickly becoming designer of Rive Gauche Homme and then YSL menswear; took over as designer of Dior Homme, 2000. Address: Dior Homme, 30 Avenue Montaigne, 75008 Paris, France.

Hedi Slimane, designed for the house of Christian Dior's spring/summer 2002 ready-to-wear collection © Reuters NewMedia Inc./CORBIS.

PUBLICATIONS

On SLIMANE:

Articles

- Plewka, Karl, "A Hedi New Experience," in Interview, March 1999.
- Horyn, Cathy, "An Electric Moment for a Men's Designer," in the New York Times, 1 February 2000.
- Raper, Sarah, and Robert Murphy, "Is Hedi Slimane Leaving Yves Saint Laurent?" in DNR, 18 February 2000.
- Socha, Miles, "Slimane Talks About Dior, YSL," in WWD, 5 July 2000.
- Horyn, Cathy, "A Short, Creative Trip," in the New York Times, 18 July 2000.
- Bowles, Hamish, "Hedi Times," in Vogue, May 2001.
- Sischy, Ingrid, "The French Connection," in Vanity Fair, June 2001.
- Menkes, Suzy, "Dior's Fashion Warriors Amid the Luxury," in the International Herald Tribune, 3 July 2001.

Horyn, Cathy, "Erotic Undercurrents," in the New York Times, 11 July 2001.

* * *

Hedi Slimane, designer at Dior Homme since late 2000, has achieved nearly universal positive reviews for his collections, both at Dior and before that at Yves St. Laurent. This young man has made his way in just a few years from a virtual unknown to the highest profile menswear designer in France.

The fashion press and his fellow designers alike find Slimane's upscale designs stand out from the competition. Colleagues such as Karl Lagerfeld and Slimane's former boss, Yves St. Laurent (with whose brand he now competes), attend his shows; in fact, St. Laurent caused a stir when he made a rare appearance at one of Slimane's first shows for Dior, whose parent company, LVMH, is a bitter rival of YSL's parent, the Gucci Group.

Slimane's silhouettes are based on classic menswear but with a modern twist. He is known for preferring black (sometimes with hints of bright color); for narrow lines, low-cut and sheer shirts and thin-waisted suits; and for a certain femininity that appeals to men and women alike. After women such as actress Cate Blanchett and entertainer Madonna requested versions of his men's suits, Slimane began selling certain items for women as well, not modified at all from the men's designs except being available in smaller sizes.

Slimane has a reputation for high-quality tailoring, attention to detail, and minimalist designs, his pieces have frequently been termed "architectural" and "slightly subversive." He also is interested in the idea of matching, whether a tuxedo and a swimsuit or a pair of sunglasses and a ring. Although his designs appeal to youthful men—and his very young runway models emphasize this slant—Slimane has commented that his clothes are much more about attitude the wearer's age.

Slimane's work for Dior has been a continuation of his progression at YSL, where he first designed the Rive Gauche Homme ready-to-wear brand, later taking over the reins at YSL menswear. He became known for pieces that have been called slim and sexy, elegant and erotic, subtle and simple. He has a modern take on fashion yet a respect for and inspiration from the work of leading menswear designers throughout history. After leaving YSL, Slimane had many options, from designing his own label for YSL's owner, Gucci Group, to designing Prada's Jil Sander women's collection. He opted for LVMH's Dior because he liked the idea of creating a men's business practically from the ground floor; Dior Homme had focused only on suits for some time, with distribution limited to Europe and Asia.

Slimane's move to Dior in 2000 at age 32—caused in part by his dissatisfaction in reporting to another designer after Tom Ford was hired to oversee all of Gucci's brands—was acclaimed, but some observers wondered about the ramifications to the Dior brand, especially given the fact that John Galliano, Slimane's polar opposite, was designing the women's collection. Critics wondered how Dior could put forth a cohesive brand image when its women's and men's lines were so divergent, even taking into account that the two were never merchandised or advertised together.

Yet Slimane felt comfortable, at this point in his young career, with the idea of creating new designs within the established Dior framework. He told Women's Wear Daily (5 July 2000) that he liked facing the challenge of creating something new within the vocabulary of a firm with a long history. So far, given the way the fashion world has continued to embrace the shy designer and his work, the fit seems perfect.

—Karen Raugust

SMITH, Graham

British milliner

Born: Bexley, Kent, 19 January 1938. Education: Studied at Bromley College of Art, 1956–57, and the Royal College of Art, London, 1958–59. Career: Worked for Lanvin, Paris, 1958–59; milliner, Michael of Carlos Place, London, 1960–67; own firm established, 1967–81, and from 1991; consultant design director, Kangol Limited, 1981–91; created hat collection for BHS stores, 1990s. Address: 22 Crawford Street, London W1H 1PJ, England.

PUBLICATIONS

On SMITH:

Books

McDowell, Colin, Hats: Status, Style, Glamour, London, 1992.

Articles

- “Haute Hats,” in Cosmopolitan (London), November 1986.
- Rowe, Gillian, “Heads He Wins,” in You magazine of the Mail on Sunday (London), 6 November 1988.
- Fallon, James, “Storehouse to Sell BHS Clothing Again,” in WWD, 28 March 2000.

* * *

Graham Smith is a milliner’s milliner; one examines his hats and finds outstanding craftsmanship. These featherweight pieces appear untouched by human hand; no irregularities mar the sheen of the fine straw crowns, and snow-white felts remain pristine after the rigorous hand-blocking which sets them irrevocably into shape. Invisibly-stitched brims and seemingly effortless draping belie hours of painstaking handwork for which there is no substitute if one requires the genuine article.

Nor does Smith’s work exhibit technical mastery alone—to walk into his showroom is to be amazed and amused by the combination of color, texture, and shape, and by the witty inventiveness of the trims. Smith’s shows during the decade of his design directorship of Kangol were stunning parades of the milliner’s art and a gift to fashion editors, whether the chosen theme followed a traditional floral path, swooped up into outer space or dived to the bed of a tropical ocean. The staid Kangol beret suddenly emerged as a hot fashion item, whether studded, colored or trimmed whimsically with buttons.

Smith left London’s Royal College of Art early to work in Paris with Lanvin. After returning to work with Michael, the English couture house, he ran his own business off Bond Street, which soon attracted a distinguished clientèle. Royalty and media stars have worn his hats; every leading London store carries them. He has worked with many leading designers, amongst them Zandra Rhodes and Jean Muir, and has often designed for the screen—notably for Help, The Ruling Class, Goodbye Mr. Chips, and the Bondish face, Casino Royale.

Smith hats have also literally traveled the world, adorning the heads of British Airways flight attendants. Additionally, his work is represented in the permanent collection at the Victoria & Albert Museum, and has been photographed for Pirelli calendars by Norman Parkinson. To use an inelegant term for an elegant man, Smith might be termed a workaholic; given the time, one could well imagine he would prefer to do all his own work. Of this he would certainly be more than capable, and he is an exacting master—which does not deter his loyal staff, some of whom have worked with him for decades. His wit and entertaining teaching style have endeared him to many fashion students during his time as millinery tutor on the degree course at Kingston Polytechnic.

Graham Smith has thrived on design talent and technical excellence, running a successful business through years when hats were far from obligatory as high fashion accessories. As hats wax and wane in importance, Smith’s faithful clients continue to wear his creations in the knowledge that they are simply of the highest possible quality; and to reach these heights there are no short cuts.

—Alan J. Flux

SMITH, Paul

British designer

Born: 1946. Family: Married Pauline Denyer, 2000. Education: Attended Beeston Fields Grammar School, Nottingham, England. Career: Opened first menswear shop, Nottingham, 1970; opened in London, 1979; opened New York store, 1987; opened flagship Tokyo shop, 1991; introduced womenswear collection, 1993; opened first women’s boutique, Paris, 1994; opened first children’s shop, London, 1994; first Jeans shop, London, 1994; introduced watch collection, 1994; offered custom tailoring, 1998; new London flagship, 1998; 13 worldwide stores, sold in more than 40 countries, by 2001. Exhibitions: Observation, Victoria & Albert Museum, London, June–November 1995; Paul Smith True Brit exhibition, Design Museum, London, October 1995–April 1996. Awards: British Design for Industry award, 1991; named Honorary Fellow, Chartered Society of Designers, 1991; named Commander of the British Empire, for services to fashion industry, January 1994; Queens award for Industry, for export achievement, April 1995; invited to join the Labour government’s Department of Culture, Media and Sport Creative Industries Taskforce, 1997; knighted for services to the British fashion industry, November 2000. Address: Riverside Building, Riverside Way, Nottingham NG2 1DP, England. Website: www.paulsmith.co.uk.

PUBLICATIONS

On SMITH:

Books

Jones, Dylan, Paul Smith True Brit, Italy, 1995.

Articles

- York, Peter, “The Meaning of Clothes,” in Blueprint (London), October 1983.

the challenge of creating something new within the vocabulary of a firm with a long history. So far, given the way the fashion world has continued to embrace the shy designer and his work, the fit seems perfect.

—Karen Raugust

SMITH, Graham

British milliner

Born: Bexley, Kent, 19 January 1938. Education: Studied at Bromley College of Art, 1956–57, and the Royal College of Art, London, 1958–59. Career: Worked for Lanvin, Paris, 1958–59; milliner, Michael of Carlos Place, London, 1960–67; own firm established, 1967–81, and from 1991; consultant design director, Kangol Limited, 1981–91; created hat collection for BHS stores, 1990s. Address: 22 Crawford Street, London W1H 1PJ, England.

PUBLICATIONS

On SMITH:

Books

McDowell, Colin, Hats: Status, Style, Glamour, London, 1992.

Articles

- “Haute Hats,” in Cosmopolitan (London), November 1986.
- Rowe, Gillian, “Heads He Wins,” in You magazine of the Mail on Sunday (London), 6 November 1988.
- Fallon, James, “Storehouse to Sell BHS Clothing Again,” in WWD, 28 March 2000.

* * *

Graham Smith is a milliner’s milliner; one examines his hats and finds outstanding craftsmanship. These featherweight pieces appear untouched by human hand; no irregularities mar the sheen of the fine straw crowns, and snow-white felts remain pristine after the rigorous hand-blocking which sets them irrevocably into shape. Invisibly-stitched brims and seemingly effortless draping belie hours of painstaking handwork for which there is no substitute if one requires the genuine article.

Nor does Smith’s work exhibit technical mastery alone—to walk into his showroom is to be amazed and amused by the combination of color, texture, and shape, and by the witty inventiveness of the trims. Smith’s shows during the decade of his design directorship of Kangol were stunning parades of the milliner’s art and a gift to fashion editors, whether the chosen theme followed a traditional floral path, swooped up into outer space or dived to the bed of a tropical ocean. The staid Kangol beret suddenly emerged as a hot fashion item, whether studded, colored or trimmed whimsically with buttons.

Smith left London’s Royal College of Art early to work in Paris with Lanvin. After returning to work with Michael, the English couture house, he ran his own business off Bond Street, which soon attracted a distinguished clientèle. Royalty and media stars have worn his hats; every leading London store carries them. He has worked with many leading designers, amongst them Zandra Rhodes and Jean Muir, and has often designed for the screen—notably for Help, The Ruling Class, Goodbye Mr. Chips, and the Bondish face, Casino Royale.

Smith hats have also literally traveled the world, adorning the heads of British Airways flight attendants. Additionally, his work is represented in the permanent collection at the Victoria & Albert Museum, and has been photographed for Pirelli calendars by Norman Parkinson. To use an inelegant term for an elegant man, Smith might be termed a workaholic; given the time, one could well imagine he would prefer to do all his own work. Of this he would certainly be more than capable, and he is an exacting master—which does not deter his loyal staff, some of whom have worked with him for decades. His wit and entertaining teaching style have endeared him to many fashion students during his time as millinery tutor on the degree course at Kingston Polytechnic.

Graham Smith has thrived on design talent and technical excellence, running a successful business through years when hats were far from obligatory as high fashion accessories. As hats wax and wane in importance, Smith’s faithful clients continue to wear his creations in the knowledge that they are simply of the highest possible quality; and to reach these heights there are no short cuts.

—Alan J. Flux

SMITH, Paul

British designer

Born: 1946. Family: Married Pauline Denyer, 2000. Education: Attended Beeston Fields Grammar School, Nottingham, England. Career: Opened first menswear shop, Nottingham, 1970; opened in London, 1979; opened New York store, 1987; opened flagship Tokyo shop, 1991; introduced womenswear collection, 1993; opened first women’s boutique, Paris, 1994; opened first children’s shop, London, 1994; first Jeans shop, London, 1994; introduced watch collection, 1994; offered custom tailoring, 1998; new London flagship, 1998; 13 worldwide stores, sold in more than 40 countries, by 2001. Exhibitions: Observation, Victoria & Albert Museum, London, June–November 1995; Paul Smith True Brit exhibition, Design Museum, London, October 1995–April 1996. Awards: British Design for Industry award, 1991; named Honorary Fellow, Chartered Society of Designers, 1991; named Commander of the British Empire, for services to fashion industry, January 1994; Queens award for Industry, for export achievement, April 1995; invited to join the Labour government’s Department of Culture, Media and Sport Creative Industries Taskforce, 1997; knighted for services to the British fashion industry, November 2000. Address: Riverside Building, Riverside Way, Nottingham NG2 1DP, England. Website: www.paulsmith.co.uk.

PUBLICATIONS

On SMITH:

Books

Jones, Dylan, Paul Smith True Brit, Italy, 1995.

Articles

- York, Peter, “The Meaning of Clothes,” in Blueprint (London), October 1983.

the challenge of creating something new within the vocabulary of a firm with a long history. So far, given the way the fashion world has continued to embrace the shy designer and his work, the fit seems perfect.

—Karen Raugust

SMITH, Graham

British milliner

Born: Bexley, Kent, 19 January 1938. Education: Studied at Bromley College of Art, 1956–57, and the Royal College of Art, London, 1958–59. Career: Worked for Lanvin, Paris, 1958–59; milliner, Michael of Carlos Place, London, 1960–67; own firm established, 1967–81, and from 1991; consultant design director, Kangol Limited, 1981–91; created hat collection for BHS stores, 1990s. Address: 22 Crawford Street, London W1H 1PJ, England.

PUBLICATIONS

On SMITH:

Books

McDowell, Colin, Hats: Status, Style, Glamour, London, 1992.

Articles

- “Haute Hats,” in Cosmopolitan (London), November 1986.
- Rowe, Gillian, “Heads He Wins,” in You magazine of the Mail on Sunday (London), 6 November 1988.
- Fallon, James, “Storehouse to Sell BHS Clothing Again,” in WWD, 28 March 2000.

* * *

Graham Smith is a milliner’s milliner; one examines his hats and finds outstanding craftsmanship. These featherweight pieces appear untouched by human hand; no irregularities mar the sheen of the fine straw crowns, and snow-white felts remain pristine after the rigorous hand-blocking which sets them irrevocably into shape. Invisibly-stitched brims and seemingly effortless draping belie hours of painstaking handwork for which there is no substitute if one requires the genuine article.

Nor does Smith’s work exhibit technical mastery alone—to walk into his showroom is to be amazed and amused by the combination of color, texture, and shape, and by the witty inventiveness of the trims. Smith’s shows during the decade of his design directorship of Kangol were stunning parades of the milliner’s art and a gift to fashion editors, whether the chosen theme followed a traditional floral path, swooped up into outer space or dived to the bed of a tropical ocean. The staid Kangol beret suddenly emerged as a hot fashion item, whether studded, colored or trimmed whimsically with buttons.

Smith left London’s Royal College of Art early to work in Paris with Lanvin. After returning to work with Michael, the English couture house, he ran his own business off Bond Street, which soon attracted a distinguished clientèle. Royalty and media stars have worn his hats; every leading London store carries them. He has worked with many leading designers, amongst them Zandra Rhodes and Jean Muir, and has often designed for the screen—notably for Help, The Ruling Class, Goodbye Mr. Chips, and the Bondish face, Casino Royale.

Smith hats have also literally traveled the world, adorning the heads of British Airways flight attendants. Additionally, his work is represented in the permanent collection at the Victoria & Albert Museum, and has been photographed for Pirelli calendars by Norman Parkinson. To use an inelegant term for an elegant man, Smith might be termed a workaholic; given the time, one could well imagine he would prefer to do all his own work. Of this he would certainly be more than capable, and he is an exacting master—which does not deter his loyal staff, some of whom have worked with him for decades. His wit and entertaining teaching style have endeared him to many fashion students during his time as millinery tutor on the degree course at Kingston Polytechnic.

Graham Smith has thrived on design talent and technical excellence, running a successful business through years when hats were far from obligatory as high fashion accessories. As hats wax and wane in importance, Smith’s faithful clients continue to wear his creations in the knowledge that they are simply of the highest possible quality; and to reach these heights there are no short cuts.

—Alan J. Flux

SMITH, Paul

British designer

Born: 1946. Family: Married Pauline Denyer, 2000. Education: Attended Beeston Fields Grammar School, Nottingham, England. Career: Opened first menswear shop, Nottingham, 1970; opened in London, 1979; opened New York store, 1987; opened flagship Tokyo shop, 1991; introduced womenswear collection, 1993; opened first women’s boutique, Paris, 1994; opened first children’s shop, London, 1994; first Jeans shop, London, 1994; introduced watch collection, 1994; offered custom tailoring, 1998; new London flagship, 1998; 13 worldwide stores, sold in more than 40 countries, by 2001. Exhibitions: Observation, Victoria & Albert Museum, London, June–November 1995; Paul Smith True Brit exhibition, Design Museum, London, October 1995–April 1996. Awards: British Design for Industry award, 1991; named Honorary Fellow, Chartered Society of Designers, 1991; named Commander of the British Empire, for services to fashion industry, January 1994; Queens award for Industry, for export achievement, April 1995; invited to join the Labour government’s Department of Culture, Media and Sport Creative Industries Taskforce, 1997; knighted for services to the British fashion industry, November 2000. Address: Riverside Building, Riverside Way, Nottingham NG2 1DP, England. Website: www.paulsmith.co.uk.

PUBLICATIONS

On SMITH:

Books

Jones, Dylan, Paul Smith True Brit, Italy, 1995.

Articles

- York, Peter, “The Meaning of Clothes,” in Blueprint (London), October 1983.

Paul Smith, fall/winter 2001 collection. © AP/Wide World Photos.

"Harris Tweed, Campaign Sign; Paul Smith," in Fashion Weekly (London), 13 June 1985.
"Cue: Paul Smith," in Vogue (London), 15 September 1985.
"Face to Face," in Creative Review (London), June 1986.
Boehlert, Bart, "Mr. Smith Comes to New York," in New York, 20 April 1987.
Rumbold, Judy, "The Man of Paul Smith's Dreams," in The Guardian (London), 9 November 1987.
Mower, Sarah, "The Gospel According to Paul," in the Observer Magazine (London), 29 November 1987.
Schneider-Levy, Barbara, "Paul Smith, Anti-Fashionist," in Footwear News (London), 14 December 1987.
"After Nottingham, the World for Smith," in Blueprint (London), December 1987.
"Wearing Mr. Smith," in the Economist (London), 9 January 1988.
Jeal, Nicola, "Smith Said 'Cotton,'" in the Observer (London), 21 February 1988.
Hamilton, William L., "The Schoolboy's Revenge," in Metropolitan Home, August 1988.
Dutt, Robin, "Paul Smith," in Clothes Show (London), July/August 1989.

Paul Smith, fall/winter 2001 collection. © AP/Wide World Photos.

Emmrich, Stuart, "The Hip Little Shop Around the Corner," in Manhattan, Inc., February 1990.
Harris, Martyn, "The Designer Guru Who Suits Himself," in the Sunday Telegraph (London), 11 March 1990.
Gandee, Charles, "Mr. Smith Goes to Italy," in House & Garden (London), April 1990.
Fairchild, Gillian, "A Day in the Life of Paul Smith," in the New York Times Magazine, 9 June 1990.
Jordan, Mary Beth, "I Am a Camera: Designer Paul Smith Shoots his New York," in Metropolitan Home, August 1990.
Omelianuk, Scott, "Mr. Smith Goes Global," in GQ, August 1993.
Morais, Richard C., "We're Finally Ready...," in Forbes, 24 April 1995.
Clarke, Michael, "Suitable Opportunity," in the Times Educational Supplement, 6 October 1995.
Spindler, Amy M., "Slim, Sophisticated Men's Wear in Paris," in the New York Times, 9 July 1996.
_____, "In Paris, Men's Wear Sizzles," in the New York Times, 28 January 1997.
_____, "The Gutsy, the Greedy, the Humble," in the New York Times, 8 April 1997.

- , “Strength in Diversity at Men’s Shows,” in the New York Times, 9 July 1997.
- Fallon, James, “London’s Hip Notting Hill Neighborhood is Now Home to Paul Smith,” in DNR, 15 June 1998.
- Mower, Sarah, “Smith’s Open House,” in Harper’s Bazaar, August 1998.
- Goldstein, Lauren, “Paul Smith Brings Designer Credentials to Custom Tailoring,” in Fortune, 26 October 1998.
- Friedman, Vanessa, “Paul Smith Steps Out,” in Travel & Leisure, September 1999.
- “Queen Knights Paul Smith,” in WWD, 19 June 2000.
- Hiscock, Jennifer, “Different Cloth,” in Marketing, 1 February 2001.
- Freed Carlson, Janet, “The Day-Tripper,” in Town & Country, May 2001.
- “Sir Paul Smith,” in Financial Times, 9 October 2001.

* * *

The much-used phrase “classics with a twist” was the original design philosophy behind Paul Smith’s menswear collections, where the element of classicism did not frighten traditionally conservative British male dressers. With no formal training in fashion design, Smith’s fashion career began with his shop in Nottingham in 1970. The shop sold mostly other designers such as Kenzo and Margaret Howell, but it also stocked some early Paul Smith shirts, trousers, and jackets that he made in nearby workrooms. With the encouragement of Pauline Denyer, an RCA graduate in fashion, then his girlfriend, and evening classes at the local polytechnic, Smith was able to create more of what he wanted for his shops. His first collection was introduced in Paris in 1976; unable to find the type of clothes he wanted, he introduced his own designs for shirts and jackets, which he had made up in local workrooms.

The evolution of the Paul Smith label away from classicism, which began in the early 1980s, was prompted by the proliferation of copyists springing up on the heels of his initial success. The Paul Smith style was imitated both in England and abroad by companies such as Next, Façonnable, and Henry Cotton’s. Smith admits his decision to become a more fashion-oriented label resulted in confusion about the company’s image. Although the classic phase of the label gave way to a higher fashion emphasis, the designer says he is often likened to America’s Ralph Lauren because of his earlier image. Later designs are best characterized by wit and humor, with offbeat fabrics and colors creating a hint of excitement in the essentially practical styles. Smith’s attention to detail is easily seen in the functional buttons in his men’s suits and the inside pockets, hand-stitching, and vivid lining found in the women’s suits.

Smith continues to be the chairman of his company as well as the designer of the clothes. “At the moment, while I still have my health and my sanity, there is somebody called Paul Smith behind the label. And I am really behind the label. I am involved in every shop decision, every design decision, the way the advertising looks, the way the window dressing looks, the way the clothes look,” Smith stated during an interview with Jennifer Hiscock of Marketing (1 February 2001). Fiercely committed to his customers, Smith continues to work in his Nottingham Hill Gate Shop on Saturday afternoons when he is in London. It is his attempt to stay in contact with his customers and understand what they want. “I think a lot of designers or company bosses lose touch with the reality of their customers, or where they earn their wages. They surround themselves with subservients, have ivory-tower offices and chauffeur-driven cars, and eventually they just lose touch, especially in a fickle industry like fashion.”

Smith attributes his personal success to the fact that his early designs were representative of the company’s classical phase. His jackets were traditionally styled, but he lowered the armholes to make them easier to wear and subtly changed the shape of the trousers. Using wools, tweeds, and fine cottons, Smith’s designs retained just the right element of English tailoring traditions with a hint of eccentricity that appealed not only to conservative city types but also to the newly-emerged yuppie of the 1980s, for whom a Paul Smith suit became an important status symbol. By gradually introducing changes to the male wardrobe, Smith says he found his customers slowly became less nervous about adding a patterned tie or a colored sweater. Richly patterned or embroidered waistcoats, colored braces, and decorative socks are also examples of Smith’s subtle changes to basic menswear items.

Smith’s own shops are an integral part of his design strategy and form the backdrop for his fashion designs. His was one of the first fashion shops to sell items other than clothes; they included watches and pens, modern sculpture, candlesticks, mirrors, and glassware. The selling of a lifestyle was also greatly imitated during the 1980s, when ordinary everyday objects achieved cult status in the right environment. Smith was responsible for the revival of the Filofax and men’s boxer shorts during this period.

A strong British pride has fueled Smith’s work to establish design as a vital component in British industry. Recognition for his work in this area has won him numerous awards, placed him on the government’s official list of ambassadors, and brought suitors like luxury conglomerates LVMH and Gucci Group to his door. He has refused all offers of consolidation, content to maintain his firm and its independence.

Paul Smith, paragon of style, was rewarded for his unique brand of service to his country and the British fashion industry when he received the coveted title of “Sir,” and earned a knighthood from HRH Queen Elizabeth II in November 2000.

—Catherine Woram; updated by Kim Brown

SMITH, Willi

American designer

Born: Willi Donnell Smith in Philadelphia, 29 February 1948. Education: Studied fashion illustration, Philadelphia Museum College of Art, 1962–65; studied fashion design, Parsons School of Design, New York, 1965–67. Career: Worked as fashion illustrator with Arnold Scaasi and Bobbi Brooks, New York, 1965–69; freelance designer, working in New York, for Digits Inc., sportswear company, Talbott, Bobbie Brooks, 1967–76; with Laurie Mallet established company, WilliWear, Ltd., 1976; added WilliWear men’s collection, 1978; began lecturing in art history at the Fashion Institute, London; first store opened posthumously, Paris, 1987; WilliWear reintroduced with Michael Shulman as designer, 1996. Exhibitions: Featured in Harlem Museum, New York, 1987; among permanent collections of Black Fashion Museum, Washington, D.C., 1998. Awards: International Mannequins Designer of the Year award, New York, 1978; Coty American Fashion Critics award, 1983; 23 February named “Willi Smith Day” in New York City, 1988. Died: 17 April 1987, in New York.

- , “Strength in Diversity at Men’s Shows,” in the New York Times, 9 July 1997.
- Fallon, James, “London’s Hip Notting Hill Neighborhood is Now Home to Paul Smith,” in DNR, 15 June 1998.
- Mower, Sarah, “Smith’s Open House,” in Harper’s Bazaar, August 1998.
- Goldstein, Lauren, “Paul Smith Brings Designer Credentials to Custom Tailoring,” in Fortune, 26 October 1998.
- Friedman, Vanessa, “Paul Smith Steps Out,” in Travel & Leisure, September 1999.
- “Queen Knights Paul Smith,” in WWD, 19 June 2000.
- Hiscock, Jennifer, “Different Cloth,” in Marketing, 1 February 2001.
- Freed Carlson, Janet, “The Day-Tripper,” in Town & Country, May 2001.
- “Sir Paul Smith,” in Financial Times, 9 October 2001.

* * *

The much-used phrase “classics with a twist” was the original design philosophy behind Paul Smith’s menswear collections, where the element of classicism did not frighten traditionally conservative British male dressers. With no formal training in fashion design, Smith’s fashion career began with his shop in Nottingham in 1970. The shop sold mostly other designers such as Kenzo and Margaret Howell, but it also stocked some early Paul Smith shirts, trousers, and jackets that he made in nearby workrooms. With the encouragement of Pauline Denyer, an RCA graduate in fashion, then his girlfriend, and evening classes at the local polytechnic, Smith was able to create more of what he wanted for his shops. His first collection was introduced in Paris in 1976; unable to find the type of clothes he wanted, he introduced his own designs for shirts and jackets, which he had made up in local workrooms.

The evolution of the Paul Smith label away from classicism, which began in the early 1980s, was prompted by the proliferation of copyists springing up on the heels of his initial success. The Paul Smith style was imitated both in England and abroad by companies such as Next, Façonnable, and Henry Cotton’s. Smith admits his decision to become a more fashion-oriented label resulted in confusion about the company’s image. Although the classic phase of the label gave way to a higher fashion emphasis, the designer says he is often likened to America’s Ralph Lauren because of his earlier image. Later designs are best characterized by wit and humor, with offbeat fabrics and colors creating a hint of excitement in the essentially practical styles. Smith’s attention to detail is easily seen in the functional buttons in his men’s suits and the inside pockets, hand-stitching, and vivid lining found in the women’s suits.

Smith continues to be the chairman of his company as well as the designer of the clothes. “At the moment, while I still have my health and my sanity, there is somebody called Paul Smith behind the label. And I am really behind the label. I am involved in every shop decision, every design decision, the way the advertising looks, the way the window dressing looks, the way the clothes look,” Smith stated during an interview with Jennifer Hiscock of Marketing (1 February 2001). Fiercely committed to his customers, Smith continues to work in his Nottingham Hill Gate Shop on Saturday afternoons when he is in London. It is his attempt to stay in contact with his customers and understand what they want. “I think a lot of designers or company bosses lose touch with the reality of their customers, or where they earn their wages. They surround themselves with subservients, have ivory-tower offices and chauffeur-driven cars, and eventually they just lose touch, especially in a fickle industry like fashion.”

Smith attributes his personal success to the fact that his early designs were representative of the company’s classical phase. His jackets were traditionally styled, but he lowered the armholes to make them easier to wear and subtly changed the shape of the trousers. Using wools, tweeds, and fine cottons, Smith’s designs retained just the right element of English tailoring traditions with a hint of eccentricity that appealed not only to conservative city types but also to the newly-emerged yuppie of the 1980s, for whom a Paul Smith suit became an important status symbol. By gradually introducing changes to the male wardrobe, Smith says he found his customers slowly became less nervous about adding a patterned tie or a colored sweater. Richly patterned or embroidered waistcoats, colored braces, and decorative socks are also examples of Smith’s subtle changes to basic menswear items.

Smith’s own shops are an integral part of his design strategy and form the backdrop for his fashion designs. His was one of the first fashion shops to sell items other than clothes; they included watches and pens, modern sculpture, candlesticks, mirrors, and glassware. The selling of a lifestyle was also greatly imitated during the 1980s, when ordinary everyday objects achieved cult status in the right environment. Smith was responsible for the revival of the Filofax and men’s boxer shorts during this period.

A strong British pride has fueled Smith’s work to establish design as a vital component in British industry. Recognition for his work in this area has won him numerous awards, placed him on the government’s official list of ambassadors, and brought suitors like luxury conglomerates LVMH and Gucci Group to his door. He has refused all offers of consolidation, content to maintain his firm and its independence.

Paul Smith, paragon of style, was rewarded for his unique brand of service to his country and the British fashion industry when he received the coveted title of “Sir,” and earned a knighthood from HRH Queen Elizabeth II in November 2000.

—Catherine Woram; updated by Kim Brown

SMITH, Willi

American designer

Born: Willi Donnell Smith in Philadelphia, 29 February 1948. Education: Studied fashion illustration, Philadelphia Museum College of Art, 1962–65; studied fashion design, Parsons School of Design, New York, 1965–67. Career: Worked as fashion illustrator with Arnold Scaasi and Bobbi Brooks, New York, 1965–69; freelance designer, working in New York, for Digits Inc., sportswear company, Talbott, Bobbie Brooks, 1967–76; with Laurie Mallet established company, WilliWear, Ltd., 1976; added WilliWear men’s collection, 1978; began lecturing in art history at the Fashion Institute, London; first store opened posthumously, Paris, 1987; WilliWear reintroduced with Michael Shulman as designer, 1996. Exhibitions: Featured in Harlem Museum, New York, 1987; among permanent collections of Black Fashion Museum, Washington, D.C., 1998. Awards: International Mannequins Designer of the Year award, New York, 1978; Coty American Fashion Critics award, 1983; 23 February named “Willi Smith Day” in New York City, 1988. Died: 17 April 1987, in New York.

Willi Smith in 1987 © Bettmann/CORBIS.

PUBLICATIONS

On SMITH:

Books

- Lambert, Eleanor, World of Fashion, New York, 1976.
 Alexander, Lois K., Blacks in the History of Fashion, New York, 1982.
 Milbank, Caroline Rennolds, New York Fashion: The Evolution of American Style, New York, 1989.
 Stegemeyer, Anne, Who's Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.

Articles

- Rogers, Susan, "Willi Smith, a Man with Missions," in Amsterdam News, 16 June 1979.
 "Willi Smith: noir et blanc et en coton," in Elle (Paris), September 1984.
 "Da New York: Off Off Fashion," in L'Uomo Vogue (Milan), March 1985.

"Designer Willi Smith Suits Groom, Ushers at Kennedy Nuptials," in Jet, 4 August 1986.

"Talents: WilliWear," in Depêche Mode (Paris), January 1987.
 Filmer, Denny, "Just William," in Fashion Weekly (London), 12 February 1987.

Horwell, Veronica, "The Wonder of Willi," in the Observer (London), 8 March 1987.

James, George, "Willi Smith, Clothes Designer, Creator of Vivid Sportswear," in the New York Times, 19 April 1987.
 Rittersporn, Liz, "Designer Willi Smith Dead," in the New York Daily News, 19 April 1987.

"Willi Smith," [obituary] in the Daily Telegraph (London), 22 April 1987.
 O'Dwyer, Thom, "Willi Smith is Dead," in Fashion Weekly (London), 23 April 1987.

Als, Hilton, "Willi Smith, 1948–87," in the Village Voice, 28 April 1987.
 Buck, Genevieve, "Though The 'Real' is Gone, Williwear Plans to Forge Ahead," in Chicago Tribune, 29 April 1987.

Parikh, Anoop, "The Man Who Had Attitude," [obituary] in The Guardian (London), 30 April 1987.
 Lebow, Joan, "WilliWear Without Willi: His Partner, Petite, French and Tough, Looks Ahead," in Crain's New York Business, 4 May 1987.

Smith, Marguerite T., "Sustaining Williwear's Spirit," in the New York Times, 17 May 1987.

"For Willi, 1948–87," [obituary] in Essence (New York), July 1987.
 Campbell, Roy H., "Black Creations Long Overlooked, Fashions by Black Designers Find a Home in a Harlem Museum," in Chicago Tribune, 16 September 1987.

"Designer Collection: Garments by Willi Smith," in Elle (London), October 1987.

"Willi Smith Day Held to Aid Needy N.Y. Groups," in Jet, 20 March 1989.

Davis, Stephan H., "The Return of Willi: Company Revives the Stylish, Comfortable Designs of Willi Smith," in Chicago Tribune, 13 June 1996.

White, Constance C.R., "A Paris Store for de la Renta; Willi Smith Meets T.J. Maxx...," in the New York Times, 27 August 1996.

Burch, Audra, "D.C.'s Black Fashion Museum Traces Untold Story," in Chicago Tribune, 20 December 1998.

Johnson, Eunice W., "Black Designers—Shaping the Future," in Ebony, February 2000.

* * *

Without respect for race, Willi Smith was one of the most talented designers of his era. With respect to race, he was indisputably, as the New York Daily News fashion writer Liz Rittersporn declared upon his death in 1987, that he was "the most successful black designer in fashion history." Smith chafed at the attention given to the anomaly of his being a black designer, yet he acknowledged some advantages in the sensibility of being an African-American: "Being black has a lot to do with my being a good designer. My eye will go quicker to what a pimp is wearing than to someone in a gray suit and tie. Most of these designers who have to run to Paris for color and fabric combinations should go to church on Sunday in Harlem. It's all right there." It was all right there for Smith as a quintessentially American designer, of the people and for the people, with a vivid sense of style democracy and eclectic mix.

Perhaps in part due to his Indian cottons and colors, or to his inexhaustible appeal to youth, or maybe just due to his own wit and sense of loose fit, Smith excelled in clothing for summer. His winter collections, too, were especially notable for oversized coats based on classic shapes. His WilliWear News for fall 1986 proclaimed with irony his intention to get “serious” with the fall collection. In a sense, Smith never was serious, preferring instead a lively incongruity he had learned from observation and refined from affordable clothing made in India.

WilliWear, the company he founded with Laurie Mallet in 1976, went from $30,000 in sales in its first year to $25 million in 1986. His soft, baggy looks did not require sophisticated tailoring and benefitted from the Indian textiles that he chose for their supple hand, easy care and comfortable aging, and indescribably indefinite colors. Smith’s slouchy softness was a “real people” look, marketed at modest costs with great impact in the 1980s as the informality of designer jeans and other casual wear was replaced by the kind of alternative Smith’s designs offered—a drapey silhouette for comfortable clothing with style.

While primarily a designer of women’s clothing, WilliWear was also influential in men’s clothing. In July 1983 he created the clothes for Edwin Schlossberg’s marriage to Caroline Kennedy, including blue-violet linen blazers to be worn with white slacks and white buck shoes for the groom’s party; the groom wore a navy linen double-breasted suit with a silver linen tie, outfits that were both traditional and slightly spoofy and outrageous enough to notice and enjoy.

Smith’s tenure in the fashion world, however, was terribly short-lived. He died, young and at his prime, in 1987. George James quoted Smith in an obituary written in the New York Times (19 April 1987): “I don’t design clothes for the Queen, but for the people who wave at her as she goes by.” In Smith’s designs there was no equivocation—sportswear was for fun and comfort. He knew this, having first worked for Arnold Scaasi in a rarefied world of fancy dress. Later, he worked for Bobbie Brooks and Digits, among others, but it was on his own, first in a business with his sister Toukie, and later in WilliWear, that Smith found his own voice designing what he affably called “street couture” without apology.

Smith created uniforms for the workers on Christo’s Pont Neuf, Paris wrapping in 1985. His work even anticipates much that became casual style in America in the late 1980s and 1990s through the Gap and A/X—loose, slouchy oversizing and mixable possibilities. Hilton Als eulogized Smith in the Village Voice (28 April 1987), “As both designer and person, Willi embodied all that was the brightest, best, and most youthful in spirit in his field.... That a WilliWear garment was simple to care for italicized the designer’s democratic urge: to clothe people as simply, beautifully, and inexpensively as possible.”

In his short life, terminated by an AIDS-related death at 39, Smith made little issue or complaint of the social disadvantages and difficulty of being an African-American committed to making a mass-market clothing business—he simply proceeded to make an exemplary life of innovative design that both earned him the Coty award in 1983 and countless fans of his sportswear style who may never have known—or cared—whether he was black, white, or any other color. These fans found his designs available for a short time after his death, and then in 1996 WilliWear was relaunched. Available exclusively at T.J. Maxx stores, the new lines were produced by designer Michael Shulman.

—Richard Martin; updated by Owen James

SNOEREN, Rolf

See VIKTOR & ROLF

SPOOK, Per

Norwegian fashion designer

Born: Oslo, Norway, 1939. Education: Studied at School of Fine Arts, Oslo, and École de la Chambre Syndicale, Paris. Career: Arrived in Paris, 1957, and joined house of Dior soon afterwards; worked as freelancer with Yves Saint Laurent and Louis Féraud; opened own house, 1977; acquired by Haifinance Corp., 1991; lost funding, 1994; produces haute couture and ready-to-wear. Awards: Golden Needle (Chambre Syndicale, Paris), 1978; Golden Thimble, 1979. Address: 6 rue François 1er, 615008 Paris, France.

PUBLICATIONS

On SPOOK:

Books

McDowell, Colin, McDowell’s Directory of Twentieth Century Fashion, Englewood Cliffs, New Jersey, 1985.

O’Hara, Georgina, The Encyclopaedia of Fashion, New York, 1986.

Guillen, Pierre-Yves, and Jacqueline Claude, The Golden Thimble: French Haute Couture, Paris, 1990.

Stegemeyer, Anne, Who’s Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.

Articles

Greene, Elaine, and Bent Reg, “Coming Home to Norway,” in House Beautiful, May 1988.

“Paris: C’est Tout!” in WWD, 22 July 1993.

Ramey, Joanna, “Backer Pulls the Plug on Per Spook Couture,” in WWD, 27 June 1994.

“Haute Couture-Behind the Scenes,” available online at www.diplomatique.fr, 5 October 2001.

“Os Negócios da Moda,” online at www.centroatl.pt, 6 October 2001.

“Per Spook,” online at www.affaa.asso.fr, 6 October 2001.

* * *

Per Spook came to Paris in the late 1950s after graduating from the Oslo School of Fine Arts. For him, Paris had been a lifelong ambition, the place to go for anyone wanting to work in the fashion industry. After studying at L’École de la Chambre Syndicale de la Couture in Paris, he embarked on a long career as an apprentice and freelance designer. Experience with revered houses like Yves Saint Laurent, Christian Dior, and Louis Féraud gave him a taste for haute couture and the specialized fashion that created a sensation when he opened his own house at the age of 38 in 1977.

Spook clothes were instantly applauded for their new, soft shapes and color. He established a hallmark for well-cut clothes that were elegantly understated but upheld the characteristics of quality, individuality, and wearability. Distinctive innovations have been his

Perhaps in part due to his Indian cottons and colors, or to his inexhaustible appeal to youth, or maybe just due to his own wit and sense of loose fit, Smith excelled in clothing for summer. His winter collections, too, were especially notable for oversized coats based on classic shapes. His WilliWear News for fall 1986 proclaimed with irony his intention to get “serious” with the fall collection. In a sense, Smith never was serious, preferring instead a lively incongruity he had learned from observation and refined from affordable clothing made in India.

WilliWear, the company he founded with Laurie Mallet in 1976, went from $30,000 in sales in its first year to $25 million in 1986. His soft, baggy looks did not require sophisticated tailoring and benefitted from the Indian textiles that he chose for their supple hand, easy care and comfortable aging, and indescribably indefinite colors. Smith’s slouchy softness was a “real people” look, marketed at modest costs with great impact in the 1980s as the informality of designer jeans and other casual wear was replaced by the kind of alternative Smith’s designs offered—a drapey silhouette for comfortable clothing with style.

While primarily a designer of women’s clothing, WilliWear was also influential in men’s clothing. In July 1983 he created the clothes for Edwin Schlossberg’s marriage to Caroline Kennedy, including blue-violet linen blazers to be worn with white slacks and white buck shoes for the groom’s party; the groom wore a navy linen double-breasted suit with a silver linen tie, outfits that were both traditional and slightly spoofy and outrageous enough to notice and enjoy.

Smith’s tenure in the fashion world, however, was terribly short-lived. He died, young and at his prime, in 1987. George James quoted Smith in an obituary written in the New York Times (19 April 1987): “I don’t design clothes for the Queen, but for the people who wave at her as she goes by.” In Smith’s designs there was no equivocation—sportswear was for fun and comfort. He knew this, having first worked for Arnold Scaasi in a rarefied world of fancy dress. Later, he worked for Bobbie Brooks and Digits, among others, but it was on his own, first in a business with his sister Toukie, and later in WilliWear, that Smith found his own voice designing what he affably called “street couture” without apology.

Smith created uniforms for the workers on Christo’s Pont Neuf, Paris wrapping in 1985. His work even anticipates much that became casual style in America in the late 1980s and 1990s through the Gap and A/X—loose, slouchy oversizing and mixable possibilities. Hilton Als eulogized Smith in the Village Voice (28 April 1987), “As both designer and person, Willi embodied all that was the brightest, best, and most youthful in spirit in his field.... That a WilliWear garment was simple to care for italicized the designer’s democratic urge: to clothe people as simply, beautifully, and inexpensively as possible.”

In his short life, terminated by an AIDS-related death at 39, Smith made little issue or complaint of the social disadvantages and difficulty of being an African-American committed to making a mass-market clothing business—he simply proceeded to make an exemplary life of innovative design that both earned him the Coty award in 1983 and countless fans of his sportswear style who may never have known—or cared—whether he was black, white, or any other color. These fans found his designs available for a short time after his death, and then in 1996 WilliWear was relaunched. Available exclusively at T.J. Maxx stores, the new lines were produced by designer Michael Shulman.

—Richard Martin; updated by Owen James

SNOEREN, Rolf

See VIKTOR & ROLF

SPOOK, Per

Norwegian fashion designer

Born: Oslo, Norway, 1939. Education: Studied at School of Fine Arts, Oslo, and École de la Chambre Syndicale, Paris. Career: Arrived in Paris, 1957, and joined house of Dior soon afterwards; worked as freelancer with Yves Saint Laurent and Louis Féraud; opened own house, 1977; acquired by Haifinance Corp., 1991; lost funding, 1994; produces haute couture and ready-to-wear. Awards: Golden Needle (Chambre Syndicale, Paris), 1978; Golden Thimble, 1979. Address: 6 rue François 1er, 615008 Paris, France.

PUBLICATIONS

On SPOOK:

Books

McDowell, Colin, McDowell’s Directory of Twentieth Century Fashion, Englewood Cliffs, New Jersey, 1985.

O’Hara, Georgina, The Encyclopaedia of Fashion, New York, 1986.

Guillen, Pierre-Yves, and Jacqueline Claude, The Golden Thimble: French Haute Couture, Paris, 1990.

Stegemeyer, Anne, Who’s Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.

Articles

Greene, Elaine, and Bent Reg, “Coming Home to Norway,” in House Beautiful, May 1988.

“Paris: C’est Tout!” in WWD, 22 July 1993.

Ramey, Joanna, “Backer Pulls the Plug on Per Spook Couture,” in WWD, 27 June 1994.

“Haute Couture-Behind the Scenes,” available online at www.diplomatique.fr, 5 October 2001.

“Os Negócios da Moda,” online at www.centroatl.pt, 6 October 2001.

“Per Spook,” online at www.affaa.asso.fr, 6 October 2001.

* * *

Per Spook came to Paris in the late 1950s after graduating from the Oslo School of Fine Arts. For him, Paris had been a lifelong ambition, the place to go for anyone wanting to work in the fashion industry. After studying at L’École de la Chambre Syndicale de la Couture in Paris, he embarked on a long career as an apprentice and freelance designer. Experience with revered houses like Yves Saint Laurent, Christian Dior, and Louis Féraud gave him a taste for haute couture and the specialized fashion that created a sensation when he opened his own house at the age of 38 in 1977.

Spook clothes were instantly applauded for their new, soft shapes and color. He established a hallmark for well-cut clothes that were elegantly understated but upheld the characteristics of quality, individuality, and wearability. Distinctive innovations have been his versatile long dresses with a device allowing them to be taken up for daywear, then let down again for an evening look; his Ile de Wight dress, a square-cut white linen dress embroidered with abstract black squares; and his Crumple clothes, made from a fabric that allows the clothes to fold into a small bundle and pack away without creasing. He also likes to design versatile mix-and-match outfits that can unite to create ensembles ranging from glamorous cocktailwear to daywear.

When it comes to ready-to-wear, the ideal Spook customer has been a woman who is both realistic and practical. She is active, up to date and, with her international lifestyle and career, needs clothes that are graceful and polished but also witty and lively. With his couture clothes, Spook likes to combine his own creativity with the individual personality of a client. He recognizes that each client has a different set of needs and fantasies about how she wants to look. Even if designer and client have opposing ideas, it is always possible to create a united design.

Spook collections have often been fanciful and evoked romantic images of society lifestyles in the 1920s and 1930s. The clothes have had a strong resort feel, suggesting leisured times at Deauville or on the Lido at Venice. Figure prints on expensive crêpes and asymmetric details on crossover crêpe minidresses have been popular, as have saucy nautical stripes, abstract polka dots, and geometrics, like black-and-white checkerboard jackets or long sequin shift dresses in geometric-patterned fabrics. They evoked references to fashion icons of the past, an updated Duchess of Windsor, Marlene Dietrich, or the 1950s model Dovima.

Spook's other artistic interests are noteworthy and undoubtedly inspirational when it comes to fashion design, and his design interests have not been exclusively fashion oriented. He is an accomplished painter, sculptor, and photographer. Interiors, textiles, and product design capture his imagination and have been barometers of inspiration and observation helping form and develop his creative fashion ideas. In his career, Spook has been recognized with several fashion awards, including the Chambre Syndicale's Golden Needle and Golden Thimble awards. Ultimately, it is in couture that Spook has excelled. To a designer, haute couture is often the inventive lifeblood of the industry, where creativity is unhampered by the limitations of expense or market (unfortunately, financing has been a battle for Spook, who lost his backing in 1994).

Financed or not, Spook's approach has always been down to earth. He enjoys creating couture that combines practicality and realism with creativity and aesthetic vision—and his vision is genuinely appreciated.

—Kevin Almond; updated by Mary Ellen Snodgrass

SPROUSE, Stephen

American designer

Born: Ohio, 1953. Education: Attended Rhode Island School of Design for three months. Career: Worked briefly for Halston and Bill Blass; showed first collection, 1983; out of business, 1985–87; showed three lines, S, Post Punk Dress for Success, and Stephen Sprouse in own shop, 1987; opened satellite shop, Beverly Hills, 1988; out of business, 1988–92; designer, introducing Cyber Punk line, Bloomingdale's, 1992; signed licensing deal with Staff International, 1997; began working with Marc Jacobs and Louis Vuitton, 2000; designed gown for artist E.V. Day, 2000.

PUBLICATIONS

On SPROUSE:

Books

Milbank, Caroline Rennolds, New York Fashion: The Evolution of American Style, New York, 1989.

Stegemeyer, Anne, Who's Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.

Articles

"Hot Commodities: Rich Returns," in Harper's Bazaar, July 1987.

Goodman, Wendy, "Stephen Sprouse Tries a Comeback with a Bold New Store," in New York, 21 September 1987.

"Art & Commerce: Stephen Sprouse," in Interview (New York), September 1987.

"All Sproused Up: The Return of Stephen Sprouse," in i-D (London), November 1987.

Martin, Richard, "Vicious Icon: Hero and History in the Art of Stephen Sprouse," in Arts Magazine, December 1987.

Fressola, Peter, "Glitz Sprout," in DNR, 19 April 1988.

Cihlar, Kimberly, "The Many Sides of Stephen Sprouse," in DNR, 12 August 1988.

Young, Lucie, "Corporate Greed: A Fashionable Vice," in Design (London), August 1988.

Lender, Heidi, "The Return of Stephen: The Seventies Are Back and So Is Stephen Sprouse," in WWD, 30 October 1992.

Norwich, William, "Back to the Future," in Vogue, December 1992.

Yarritu, David, and Mariuccia Casadio, "Quick! There's a Sprouse in the House," in Interview, December 1992.

Spindler, Amy M., "Rock-and-Roll's Designer-Curator," in the New York Times, 9 May 1995.

White, Constance C.R., "Licensing Deal for Sprouse," in the New York Times, 24 June 1997.

_____, "Sprouse's American Hurrah," in the New York Times, 4 November 1997.

"Fashion: A Bite of the Apple," in the Independent, 17 January 1998.

"Joie de Mode," in WWD, 6 April 1998.

White, Constance C.R., "Breakaway Looks: Vintage to Cyberchic," in the New York Times, 7 April 1998.

"From Superfine to Chunky, Knits Take Center Stage on Milan Runways," in DNR, 15 January 1999.

Schiro, Ann-Marie, "Muses from Futuristic to Folk," in the New York Times, 19 February 1999.

"Xybernaut: Wearable PC Debuts at Fashion Week," in the PR Newswire, 25 March 1999.

"Sprouse on Stint at Louis Vuitton with Marc Jacobs," in WWD, 28 July 2000.

Cash, Stephanie, "E.V. Day at Henry Urbach Architecture," in Art in America, October 2000.

"Sprouse in the House," in WWD, 11 October 2000.

"Public Lives: It's Graffiti, by Design, and Flying Cars to Come," in the New York Times, 22 August 2001.

"Mercedes-Benz Revs Up Fashion Week," in the PR Newswire, 7 September 2001.

versatile long dresses with a device allowing them to be taken up for daywear, then let down again for an evening look; his Ile de Wight dress, a square-cut white linen dress embroidered with abstract black squares; and his Crumple clothes, made from a fabric that allows the clothes to fold into a small bundle and pack away without creasing. He also likes to design versatile mix-and-match outfits that can unite to create ensembles ranging from glamorous cocktailwear to daywear.

When it comes to ready-to-wear, the ideal Spook customer has been a woman who is both realistic and practical. She is active, up to date and, with her international lifestyle and career, needs clothes that are graceful and polished but also witty and lively. With his couture clothes, Spook likes to combine his own creativity with the individual personality of a client. He recognizes that each client has a different set of needs and fantasies about how she wants to look. Even if designer and client have opposing ideas, it is always possible to create a united design.

Spook collections have often been fanciful and evoked romantic images of society lifestyles in the 1920s and 1930s. The clothes have had a strong resort feel, suggesting leisured times at Deauville or on the Lido at Venice. Figure prints on expensive crêpes and asymmetric details on crossover crêpe minidresses have been popular, as have saucy nautical stripes, abstract polka dots, and geometrics, like black-and-white checkerboard jackets or long sequin shift dresses in geometric-patterned fabrics. They evoked references to fashion icons of the past, an updated Duchess of Windsor, Marlene Dietrich, or the 1950s model Dovima.

Spook's other artistic interests are noteworthy and undoubtedly inspirational when it comes to fashion design, and his design interests have not been exclusively fashion oriented. He is an accomplished painter, sculptor, and photographer. Interiors, textiles, and product design capture his imagination and have been barometers of inspiration and observation helping form and develop his creative fashion ideas. In his career, Spook has been recognized with several fashion awards, including the Chambre Syndicale's Golden Needle and Golden Thimble awards. Ultimately, it is in couture that Spook has excelled. To a designer, haute couture is often the inventive lifeblood of the industry, where creativity is unhampered by the limitations of expense or market (unfortunately, financing has been a battle for Spook, who lost his backing in 1994).

Financed or not, Spook's approach has always been down to earth. He enjoys creating couture that combines practicality and realism with creativity and aesthetic vision—and his vision is genuinely appreciated.

—Kevin Almond; updated by Mary Ellen Snodgrass

SPROUSE, Stephen

American designer

Born: Ohio, 1953. Education: Attended Rhode Island School of Design for three months. Career: Worked briefly for Halston and Bill Blass; showed first collection, 1983; out of business, 1985–87; showed three lines, S, Post Punk Dress for Success, and Stephen Sprouse in own shop, 1987; opened satellite shop, Beverly Hills, 1988; out of business, 1988–92; designer, introducing Cyber Punk line, Bloomingdale's, 1992; signed licensing deal with Staff International, 1997; began working with Marc Jacobs and Louis Vuitton, 2000; designed gown for artist E.V. Day, 2000.

PUBLICATIONS

On SPROUSE:

Books

Milbank, Caroline Rennolds, New York Fashion: The Evolution of American Style, New York, 1989.

Stegemeyer, Anne, Who's Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.

Articles

"Hot Commodities: Rich Returns," in Harper's Bazaar, July 1987.

Goodman, Wendy, "Stephen Sprouse Tries a Comeback with a Bold New Store," in New York, 21 September 1987.

"Art & Commerce: Stephen Sprouse," in Interview (New York), September 1987.

"All Sproused Up: The Return of Stephen Sprouse," in i-D (London), November 1987.

Martin, Richard, "Vicious Icon: Hero and History in the Art of Stephen Sprouse," in Arts Magazine, December 1987.

Fressola, Peter, "Glitz Sprout," in DNR, 19 April 1988.

Cihlar, Kimberly, "The Many Sides of Stephen Sprouse," in DNR, 12 August 1988.

Young, Lucie, "Corporate Greed: A Fashionable Vice," in Design (London), August 1988.

Lender, Heidi, "The Return of Stephen: The Seventies Are Back and So Is Stephen Sprouse," in WWD, 30 October 1992.

Norwich, William, "Back to the Future," in Vogue, December 1992.

Yarritu, David, and Mariuccia Casadio, "Quick! There's a Sprouse in the House," in Interview, December 1992.

Spindler, Amy M., "Rock-and-Roll's Designer-Curator," in the New York Times, 9 May 1995.

White, Constance C.R., "Licensing Deal for Sprouse," in the New York Times, 24 June 1997.

_____, "Sprouse's American Hurrah," in the New York Times, 4 November 1997.

"Fashion: A Bite of the Apple," in the Independent, 17 January 1998.

"Joie de Mode," in WWD, 6 April 1998.

White, Constance C.R., "Breakaway Looks: Vintage to Cyberchic," in the New York Times, 7 April 1998.

"From Superfine to Chunky, Knits Take Center Stage on Milan Runways," in DNR, 15 January 1999.

Schiro, Ann-Marie, "Muses from Futuristic to Folk," in the New York Times, 19 February 1999.

"Xybernaut: Wearable PC Debuts at Fashion Week," in the PR Newswire, 25 March 1999.

"Sprouse on Stint at Louis Vuitton with Marc Jacobs," in WWD, 28 July 2000.

Cash, Stephanie, "E.V. Day at Henry Urbach Architecture," in Art in America, October 2000.

"Sprouse in the House," in WWD, 11 October 2000.

"Public Lives: It's Graffiti, by Design, and Flying Cars to Come," in the New York Times, 22 August 2001.

"Mercedes-Benz Revs Up Fashion Week," in the PR Newswire, 7 September 2001.

Hastreiter, Kim, "Stephen Sprouse," available online at www.papermag.com, 7 October 2001.

* * *

A much lauded figure on the New York fashion scene in the early 1980s, Stephen Sprouse is one of the most notorious success-failure stories in the American fashion business. One of a number of designers with their roots in the rural backwaters of Indiana, Sprouse shares his origins with Norman Norell, Bill Blass, and Halston, for whom he worked briefly in the early 1970s. Reputedly already displaying a precocious talent by the age of 12 when he designed leopard-print jumpsuits, Sprouse went on to study for a mere three months at the Rhode Island School of Design before hitting the New York scene as a rock photographer.

In the late 1970s Sprouse made his name by designing stage clothes for Debbie Harry of the pop group Blondie, having met her in the kitchen of the flats they were sharing in New York's Bowery. His designs included ripped t-shirts, minis, and leotards, paving the way for the first of his collections in 1983. Sprouse's clothes displayed a nostalgia for the New York underground of the 1960s, particularly Andy Warhol and the Factory aesthetic, and he seemingly designed with Edie Sedgwick or Ultra Violet in mind. Revisionist rather than retro, the garments were a witty caricature of the wildest excesses of 1960s fashion, harking back to the days of Betsey Johnson at Paraphernalia—yet tempered by Sprouse's New Wave sensibilities.

Sprouse used synthetic fabrics, neon hues, and striking graphic prints to give his basic shapes visual appeal, contrasting Day-Glo colors with black jersey separates such as t-shirts and minis. Press attention focused primarily on his use of sequins shown on jackets, thigh high boots, and his signature single shoulder strap dresses worn with matching bra tops. The influence of André Courrèges and Rudi Gernreich has been obvious in his use of cutout panels revealing parts of the female torso such as the waist or midriff or in his redefinition of that staple of the 1960s male wardrobe, the Nehru jacket, colored hot punk pink by Sprouse in 1985.

Acknowledging the clichés of youthful rebellion, Sprouse toyed with items of subcultural style, which through overuse in popular imagery became mainstream. A prime example of this approach is the motorcycle jacket Sprouse experimented with endlessly, covering it with sequins, 1960s iconography, or pseudoslang. His use of logos, which seemed to be making reference to some magical teenage argot, bemused audiences in 1988 when the meaningless phrase "Glab Flack" was emblazoned over clothes shown on the catwalk.

Arguably his best work, as worn and publicized extensively by Debbie Harry, was the collection in 1983 on which Sprouse collaborated with celebrated New York graffiti artist Keith Haring to produce Day-Glo prints of hand-painted scribbles, imagery lifted straight from the subway walls. Matching outfits of miniskirts and tights or shirts and flares for men made the wearer look as if he or she had been caught full force in the fire of a spray can.

Sprouse's designs were strictly club clothes, street fashion at couture prices as a result of the expensive fabrics, applied decoration, and hand-finishing applied to every garment. Following a 1997 comeback based on Andy Warhol spinoffs, Sprouse's 1998 fashion line thrust fatigue-green hooded capes with orange lining above wide-leg pants and long maxiskirts. He bolstered his showing with matte sequined evening dresses and slim-line tuxedos anchored with Velcro.

With free-flowing chutzpah, Sprouse produced a techno-chic line for fall 1999. During Fashion Week, Sprouse caught the eye of the global fashion in-crowd and rockers such as Axl Rose and Steven Tyler, energized by the designer's high-fashion shoes, 3-D microminis, and unisex pants. Taking his cue from the Mars Pathfinder Rover, Sprouse toned up the runway spectacle with silvered colors, plastic sheen, and imagery from the Warhol catalogue, to which he has exclusive rights. Sprouse outdid himself with a unique application of head gear, paneling, and body computers. According to PR Newswire, he exulted, "I had no idea that the computer industry has advanced to the point that people can be wearing computers. This technology is so cool." In his estimation, the melding of cyber hardware with garments set the tone for the new millennium.

In fall 2000, Sprouse supplied a silver spangled dress to artist E.V. Day for "Transporter," one of her Exploded Couture exhibits. Spotlighted against a marine backdrop at the heart of her show, the gown floated between disks like a celestial mirage. Day slit the fabric to enhance a semblance of earthly beauty absorbed into the cosmos. Valued for his spunky countercultural panache, Sprouse made a palette of world-class luxury items. For 2000, he moved easily from clothes to accessories. Partnering with creative director Marc Jacobs during regular commutes between New York and Paris, Sprouse returned to the Day-Glo graffiti of his 1983 debut to enhance fabrics, prints, handbags, and luggage for Louis Vuitton.

Sprouse freed himself of the retro tag, telling Women's Wear Daily his use of a sprinkling of squiggles and a reinterpretation of LV lettering was not looking back—"I'm more into the present, but I guess the 1980s are the present now. This stuff looks more now to me." Even more demanding than his Paris job was a sizeable painting commission for NASA. At the New York showing of spring 2002 collections, he spackled show tents with his trademark eye-popping fluorescent color.

—Caroline Cox; updated by Mary Ellen Snodgrass

STAVROPOULOS, George Peter

Greek designer

Born: Tripolis, Greece, 20 January 1920. Family: Married Nancy Angelakos, 1960; children: Peter. Career: Couturier, Athens, 1949–61; New York couture and ready-to-wear business opened, 1961–90. Died: 10 December 1990, in New York.

PUBLICATIONS

On STAVROPOULOS:

Books

Milbank, Caroline Rennolds, New York Fashion: The Evolution of American Style, New York, 1989.

Articles

"George Peter Stavropoulos," Current Biography, March 1985.

Milbank, Caroline Rennolds, and Peter Vitale, "George Stavropoulos: A Master of Classical Line in Manhattan," in Architectural Digest, September 1989.

"George Stavropoulos Dies; Known for Classic Designs," in WWD, 12 December 1990.

Hastreiter, Kim, "Stephen Sprouse," available online at www.papermag.com, 7 October 2001.

* * *

A much lauded figure on the New York fashion scene in the early 1980s, Stephen Sprouse is one of the most notorious success-failure stories in the American fashion business. One of a number of designers with their roots in the rural backwaters of Indiana, Sprouse shares his origins with Norman Norell, Bill Blass, and Halston, for whom he worked briefly in the early 1970s. Reputedly already displaying a precocious talent by the age of 12 when he designed leopard-print jumpsuits, Sprouse went on to study for a mere three months at the Rhode Island School of Design before hitting the New York scene as a rock photographer.

In the late 1970s Sprouse made his name by designing stage clothes for Debbie Harry of the pop group Blondie, having met her in the kitchen of the flats they were sharing in New York's Bowery. His designs included ripped t-shirts, minis, and leotards, paving the way for the first of his collections in 1983. Sprouse's clothes displayed a nostalgia for the New York underground of the 1960s, particularly Andy Warhol and the Factory aesthetic, and he seemingly designed with Edie Sedgwick or Ultra Violet in mind. Revisionist rather than retro, the garments were a witty caricature of the wildest excesses of 1960s fashion, harking back to the days of Betsey Johnson at Paraphernalia—yet tempered by Sprouse's New Wave sensibilities.

Sprouse used synthetic fabrics, neon hues, and striking graphic prints to give his basic shapes visual appeal, contrasting Day-Glo colors with black jersey separates such as t-shirts and minis. Press attention focused primarily on his use of sequins shown on jackets, thigh high boots, and his signature single shoulder strap dresses worn with matching bra tops. The influence of André Courrèges and Rudi Gernreich has been obvious in his use of cutout panels revealing parts of the female torso such as the waist or midriff or in his redefinition of that staple of the 1960s male wardrobe, the Nehru jacket, colored hot punk pink by Sprouse in 1985.

Acknowledging the clichés of youthful rebellion, Sprouse toyed with items of subcultural style, which through overuse in popular imagery became mainstream. A prime example of this approach is the motorcycle jacket Sprouse experimented with endlessly, covering it with sequins, 1960s iconography, or pseudoslang. His use of logos, which seemed to be making reference to some magical teenage argot, bemused audiences in 1988 when the meaningless phrase "Glab Flack" was emblazoned over clothes shown on the catwalk.

Arguably his best work, as worn and publicized extensively by Debbie Harry, was the collection in 1983 on which Sprouse collaborated with celebrated New York graffiti artist Keith Haring to produce Day-Glo prints of hand-painted scribbles, imagery lifted straight from the subway walls. Matching outfits of miniskirts and tights or shirts and flares for men made the wearer look as if he or she had been caught full force in the fire of a spray can.

Sprouse's designs were strictly club clothes, street fashion at couture prices as a result of the expensive fabrics, applied decoration, and hand-finishing applied to every garment. Following a 1997 comeback based on Andy Warhol spinoffs, Sprouse's 1998 fashion line thrust fatigue-green hooded capes with orange lining above wide-leg pants and long maxiskirts. He bolstered his showing with matte sequined evening dresses and slim-line tuxedos anchored with Velcro.

With free-flowing chutzpah, Sprouse produced a techno-chic line for fall 1999. During Fashion Week, Sprouse caught the eye of the global fashion in-crowd and rockers such as Axl Rose and Steven Tyler, energized by the designer's high-fashion shoes, 3-D microminis, and unisex pants. Taking his cue from the Mars Pathfinder Rover, Sprouse toned up the runway spectacle with silvered colors, plastic sheen, and imagery from the Warhol catalogue, to which he has exclusive rights. Sprouse outdid himself with a unique application of head gear, paneling, and body computers. According to PR Newswire, he exulted, "I had no idea that the computer industry has advanced to the point that people can be wearing computers. This technology is so cool." In his estimation, the melding of cyber hardware with garments set the tone for the new millennium.

In fall 2000, Sprouse supplied a silver spangled dress to artist E.V. Day for "Transporter," one of her Exploded Couture exhibits. Spotlighted against a marine backdrop at the heart of her show, the gown floated between disks like a celestial mirage. Day slit the fabric to enhance a semblance of earthly beauty absorbed into the cosmos. Valued for his spunky countercultural panache, Sprouse made a palette of world-class luxury items. For 2000, he moved easily from clothes to accessories. Partnering with creative director Marc Jacobs during regular commutes between New York and Paris, Sprouse returned to the Day-Glo graffiti of his 1983 debut to enhance fabrics, prints, handbags, and luggage for Louis Vuitton.

Sprouse freed himself of the retro tag, telling Women's Wear Daily his use of a sprinkling of squiggles and a reinterpretation of LV lettering was not looking back—"I'm more into the present, but I guess the 1980s are the present now. This stuff looks more now to me." Even more demanding than his Paris job was a sizeable painting commission for NASA. At the New York showing of spring 2002 collections, he spackled show tents with his trademark eye-popping fluorescent color.

—Caroline Cox; updated by Mary Ellen Snodgrass

STAVROPOULOS, George Peter

Greek designer

Born: Tripolis, Greece, 20 January 1920. Family: Married Nancy Angelakos, 1960; children: Peter. Career: Couturier, Athens, 1949–61; New York couture and ready-to-wear business opened, 1961–90. Died: 10 December 1990, in New York.

PUBLICATIONS

On STAVROPOULOS:

Books

Milbank, Caroline Rennolds, New York Fashion: The Evolution of American Style, New York, 1989.

Articles

"George Peter Stavropoulos," Current Biography, March 1985.

Milbank, Caroline Rennolds, and Peter Vitale, "George Stavropoulos: A Master of Classical Line in Manhattan," in Architectural Digest, September 1989.

"George Stavropoulos Dies; Known for Classic Designs," in WWD, 12 December 1990.

"George Peter Stavropoulos," [obituary] in Current Biography, February 1991.

* * *

Throughout his career, George Peter Stavropoulos maintained a relatively low but highly respected profile in the fashion world. He was one of a small number of designers in America who exclusively produced ready-to-wear clothes of the quality and caliber of Parisian haute couture. Stavropoulos presented two ready-to-wear collections, produced in his own atelier each year for 30 years and never ventured into lower priced lines, licensed products, or perfumes, as did many of his contemporaries. Nor did he venture into the further reaches of avant-garde design. While many of his designs were innovative and strikingly beautiful, they were never shocking or arresting and his innovations were subtle to the degree that they were apparent only to the wearer or noticed either upon close inspection, or when the wearer moved about.

Stavropoulos established his business in New York in 1961, having left his native Greece, and chiffon evening dresses of every variety were central to his collections. Signature chiffon looks included single shoulder asymmetrically draped toga styles, inspired by models from classical antiquity, many layered body-skimming styles, and dresses with pleats originating at the neckline or shoulders that could be tied at the waist or left flowing freely away from the body. Recurring details included intricate pleats and tucks, wrap and capelet effects, free floating panels that could be thrown across the shoulders as a scarf or wrapped around the waist as a belt, and other multipurpose convertible details.

Evident in his chiffons and central to Stavropoulos' design philosophy were the ideas of comfort, softness, and ease of movement. In 1961 he remarked, "I don't want clothes to be tight, it's not high fashion. A woman must be able to move around in a dress." In the early to middle 1960s, contrary to the prevailing tendency toward stiffness and a boxy silhouette, Stavropoulos designed unconstrained kimono-sleeved jackets and daytime wool suits cut on the bias that subtly draped over the body. Throughout his career, rather than designing evening coats to go over his gowns he preferred the soft and simple cape to finish off his evening looks, often accessorized with a single long strand of black or white pearls.

By the mid-1970s, when the trends had caught up with Stavropoulos and fluid simplicity was the rage, the designer presented the ultimate innovation in soft and simple luxury—a gently flaring tank dress in five layers of bias-cut white chiffon with a single seam at the center back. Unlike his contemporary Halston, however, who presented similar looks around the same time, cerebral, minimal modernism was not the conceptual basis for his design. Instead Stavropoulos was most interested in exploring the ideas of softness and ease of movement (despite the apparent simplicity of Halston's designs and his pretensions to minimalism, many of his garments were a challenge to wear). Although Stavropoulos was most praised for his creations in chiffon, he was adept at working with other fabrics and had a particular liking for taffeta and satin, pleated, tucked, and manipulated on the bias with the same attention to fine detail he gave chiffon.

Stavropoulos' style remained unchanged in his three decades in business in New York. Demand for his signature body-skimming layered chiffon evening look was so consistent that he found it a challenge to "make the clothes look different," yet still reflect his point of view that "classical design is forever." His clients appreciated the classic and long-lasting investment quality of his garments and many still wear his clothes today.

—Alan E. Rosenberg

STECKLING-COEN, Adrienne

See ADRI

STEFANEL SPA

Italian sportswear manufacturer and retailer

Formed: in Treviso, 1959, by Carlo Stefanel (1925–87); son Giuseppe joined firm, 1970s. Company History: Signed licensing agreements with Romeo Gigli, the Girbauds, Peter Handley and others; company went public; announced joint venture with Calvin Klein, 1995; formed K Service SpA and SKY Company SpA with Klein, 1996; opened first CK store, Milan, 1997; signed with Joyce Ma to license apparel in Hong Kong, 1997; expansion planned for the U.S., 2001–02. Company Address: 85 via Postumia, 31047 Ponte di Piave, Treviso, Italy.

PUBLICATIONS

On STEFANEL:

Articles

- "Knitting Patterns," in the Economist, 3 October 1987.
- Bannon, Lisa, "Stefanel's Fantasy Trip," in WWD, 13 March 1992.
- Ozzard, Janet, "Stefanel Deal Will Put CK Stores in Europe," in WWD, 20 December 1995.
- "Restructuring Puts Stefanel in Red," in WWD, 18 March 1996.
- "Stefanel Loses $12.6M in Half," in WWD, 3 October 1996.
- Forden, Sara Gay, "Restructuring and Cutting Costs Return Stefanel to Profitability," in WWD, 18 March 1998.

* * *

Stefanel is one of Italy's largest fashion companies, manufacturing young, sporty, wearable separates and knitwear for the young menswear and womenswear market. Sold in shops worldwide, Stefanel clothing is synonymous with good design in quality fabrics, as well its licensing agreements and a joint venture with Calvin Klein.

The company began in 1959 as a manufacturer of knitwear in Treviso, Italy. The brainchild of Carlo Stefanel, it quickly established a reputation for lively color and quality. Carlo's son Giuseppe Stefanel entered the business in the mid-1970s, with exciting plans for expansion into the broader fashion market of casual clothing, sportswear, jeans, and ready-to-wear. Through franchising, Stefanel developed a competitive distribution system that resulted in a steady growth in international markets, particularly in the Far East and Europe. Stefanel's development strategy has supported distribution growth by introducing carefully targeted production policies within

"George Peter Stavropoulos," [obituary] in Current Biography, February 1991.

* * *

Throughout his career, George Peter Stavropoulos maintained a relatively low but highly respected profile in the fashion world. He was one of a small number of designers in America who exclusively produced ready-to-wear clothes of the quality and caliber of Parisian haute couture. Stavropoulos presented two ready-to-wear collections, produced in his own atelier each year for 30 years and never ventured into lower priced lines, licensed products, or perfumes, as did many of his contemporaries. Nor did he venture into the further reaches of avant-garde design. While many of his designs were innovative and strikingly beautiful, they were never shocking or arresting and his innovations were subtle to the degree that they were apparent only to the wearer or noticed either upon close inspection, or when the wearer moved about.

Stavropoulos established his business in New York in 1961, having left his native Greece, and chiffon evening dresses of every variety were central to his collections. Signature chiffon looks included single shoulder asymmetrically draped toga styles, inspired by models from classical antiquity, many layered body-skimming styles, and dresses with pleats originating at the neckline or shoulders that could be tied at the waist or left flowing freely away from the body. Recurring details included intricate pleats and tucks, wrap and capelet effects, free floating panels that could be thrown across the shoulders as a scarf or wrapped around the waist as a belt, and other multipurpose convertible details.

Evident in his chiffons and central to Stavropoulos' design philosophy were the ideas of comfort, softness, and ease of movement. In 1961 he remarked, "I don't want clothes to be tight, it's not high fashion. A woman must be able to move around in a dress." In the early to middle 1960s, contrary to the prevailing tendency toward stiffness and a boxy silhouette, Stavropoulos designed unconstrained kimono-sleeved jackets and daytime wool suits cut on the bias that subtly draped over the body. Throughout his career, rather than designing evening coats to go over his gowns he preferred the soft and simple cape to finish off his evening looks, often accessorized with a single long strand of black or white pearls.

By the mid-1970s, when the trends had caught up with Stavropoulos and fluid simplicity was the rage, the designer presented the ultimate innovation in soft and simple luxury—a gently flaring tank dress in five layers of bias-cut white chiffon with a single seam at the center back. Unlike his contemporary Halston, however, who presented similar looks around the same time, cerebral, minimal modernism was not the conceptual basis for his design. Instead Stavropoulos was most interested in exploring the ideas of softness and ease of movement (despite the apparent simplicity of Halston's designs and his pretensions to minimalism, many of his garments were a challenge to wear). Although Stavropoulos was most praised for his creations in chiffon, he was adept at working with other fabrics and had a particular liking for taffeta and satin, pleated, tucked, and manipulated on the bias with the same attention to fine detail he gave chiffon.

Stavropoulos' style remained unchanged in his three decades in business in New York. Demand for his signature body-skimming layered chiffon evening look was so consistent that he found it a challenge to "make the clothes look different," yet still reflect his point of view that "classical design is forever." His clients appreciated the classic and long-lasting investment quality of his garments and many still wear his clothes today.

—Alan E. Rosenberg

STECKLING-COEN, Adrienne

See ADRI

STEFANEL SPA

Italian sportswear manufacturer and retailer

Formed: in Treviso, 1959, by Carlo Stefanel (1925–87); son Giuseppe joined firm, 1970s. Company History: Signed licensing agreements with Romeo Gigli, the Girbauds, Peter Handley and others; company went public; announced joint venture with Calvin Klein, 1995; formed K Service SpA and SKY Company SpA with Klein, 1996; opened first CK store, Milan, 1997; signed with Joyce Ma to license apparel in Hong Kong, 1997; expansion planned for the U.S., 2001–02. Company Address: 85 via Postumia, 31047 Ponte di Piave, Treviso, Italy.

PUBLICATIONS

On STEFANEL:

Articles

- "Knitting Patterns," in the Economist, 3 October 1987.
- Bannon, Lisa, "Stefanel's Fantasy Trip," in WWD, 13 March 1992.
- Ozzard, Janet, "Stefanel Deal Will Put CK Stores in Europe," in WWD, 20 December 1995.
- "Restructuring Puts Stefanel in Red," in WWD, 18 March 1996.
- "Stefanel Loses $12.6M in Half," in WWD, 3 October 1996.
- Forden, Sara Gay, "Restructuring and Cutting Costs Return Stefanel to Profitability," in WWD, 18 March 1998.

* * *

Stefanel is one of Italy's largest fashion companies, manufacturing young, sporty, wearable separates and knitwear for the young menswear and womenswear market. Sold in shops worldwide, Stefanel clothing is synonymous with good design in quality fabrics, as well its licensing agreements and a joint venture with Calvin Klein.

The company began in 1959 as a manufacturer of knitwear in Treviso, Italy. The brainchild of Carlo Stefanel, it quickly established a reputation for lively color and quality. Carlo's son Giuseppe Stefanel entered the business in the mid-1970s, with exciting plans for expansion into the broader fashion market of casual clothing, sportswear, jeans, and ready-to-wear. Through franchising, Stefanel developed a competitive distribution system that resulted in a steady growth in international markets, particularly in the Far East and Europe. Stefanel's development strategy has supported distribution growth by introducing carefully targeted production policies within the textile and clothing sector, constantly widening the breadth of product ranges.

Knitwear still plays a dominant role in Stefanel collections. For both menswear and womenswear the look is unisex, homespun, and traditional. Fair Isles, jacquards, stripes and checks are incorporated into cozy, easy shapes and restyled into modern, young looks. For evening there are slinky gold, ribbed knits and crochet designs teamed with black drainpipes and silky white blouses for a dressed-up look. Pioneer-style denims, chambray, tartans, and tiny paisley prints are the major woven fabrics used in oversize shirts, casual shirtwaist dresses, simple jackets, and wrap over minis with fringed hems. Cuban style jackets in heavy wool coating, teamed with fisherman jerseys, can give a nautical feel to the range.

Stefanel boutiques mix high-tech with traditional in their interiors. Simple wood floors and furniture are mixed with chrome and glass to create a spacious, modernistic shopping environment. The clothing is merchandised in a logical, easy way with garments arranged in color coordinated sections making it simple for the customer to put together an outfit. Such retail outlets were sprinkled throughout the UK, including its first shops in Ireland in the 1993. Stefanel also opened stores in major cities in China, the first consumer goods manufacturer to do so.

In the 1990s the firm experienced growth and a much higher profile. In 1995 Stefanel and Calvin Klein agreed to a joint venture to manufacture and distribute the popular CK bridge lines. The agreement further called for opening CK stores across Europe and in the Middle East, for Stefanel to acquire a production facility exclusively for CK apparel, and the formation of two new companies—K Service SpA (wholly-owned by Stefanel for manufacturing) and SKY Company SpA (73-percent owned by Stefanel, the remainder to Klein, for distribution). The glow from the Klein deal dimmed quickly, however, when Stefanel experienced its first ever losses in 1995 and 1996, due mostly to restructuring its worldwide operations. Then the following year top officials of the firm were under investigation by Italian authorities for fiscal fraud and falsifying documents, though charges had yet to filed.

Stefanel and Klein opened their first CK store in Milan in early 1997, and the former finally reaped the benefits of its reorganization and debt reduction of the last two years. For 1997 Stefanel was back in the black and the Klein venture was beginning to pay off. Stefanel then turned its attention to expansion outside Europe, namely in the U.S. where operated just a few stores. Giuseppe Stefanel has carried on the tradition his father began almost 50 years ago, and their firm is one of the few remaining independent fashion empires in Italy and beyond.

—Kevin Almond; updated by Owen James

STEFFE, Cynthia

American fashion designer

Born: Sioux City, Iowa, 30 June 1957. Education: Parsons School of Design, 1978–81. Family: Married Richard W. “Rick” Roberts, 1984. Career: Designer for Donna Karan and Louis Dell’Olio at Anne Klein & Company, 1981; designed women’s tailored separates for Spitalnick & Company, 1983–88; consultant for Crystal Brands, 1988–89; chaired Cynthia Steffe Inc., 1989–2000; joint designing of Cynthia Steffe, fall 2001 collection. © Fashion Syndicate Press.

cosmetics line, 1995; produced luxury coats for the Tepper Collection, 1995; created secondary line, 1997; sold firm to Leslie Fay, 2000. Awards: Student Designer of the Year, 1981; Donna Karan Gold Thimble, 1981; one of People magazine’s “50 Most Beautiful People in the World,” 1991. Address: 550 Seventh Avenue, Floor 21, New York, NY 10018–3203 U.S.A.

PUBLICATIONS

On STEFFE:

Books

Hodgman, Ann, A Day in the Life of a Fashion Designer, Mahwah, New Jersey, 1988.

Stegemeyer, Anne, Who’s Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.

The Complete Marquis Who’s Who, 2001.

Articles

“Steffe Leaves Spitalnick,” in WWD, 18 January 1988.

“Steffe Joins Crystal Brands,” in WWD, 16 March 1988.

the textile and clothing sector, constantly widening the breadth of product ranges.

Knitwear still plays a dominant role in Stefanel collections. For both menswear and womenswear the look is unisex, homespun, and traditional. Fair Isles, jacquards, stripes and checks are incorporated into cozy, easy shapes and restyled into modern, young looks. For evening there are slinky gold, ribbed knits and crochet designs teamed with black drainpipes and silky white blouses for a dressed-up look. Pioneer-style denims, chambray, tartans, and tiny paisley prints are the major woven fabrics used in oversize shirts, casual shirtwaist dresses, simple jackets, and wrap over minis with fringed hems. Cuban style jackets in heavy wool coating, teamed with fisherman jerseys, can give a nautical feel to the range.

Stefanel boutiques mix high-tech with traditional in their interiors. Simple wood floors and furniture are mixed with chrome and glass to create a spacious, modernistic shopping environment. The clothing is merchandised in a logical, easy way with garments arranged in color coordinated sections making it simple for the customer to put together an outfit. Such retail outlets were sprinkled throughout the UK, including its first shops in Ireland in the 1993. Stefanel also opened stores in major cities in China, the first consumer goods manufacturer to do so.

In the 1990s the firm experienced growth and a much higher profile. In 1995 Stefanel and Calvin Klein agreed to a joint venture to manufacture and distribute the popular CK bridge lines. The agreement further called for opening CK stores across Europe and in the Middle East, for Stefanel to acquire a production facility exclusively for CK apparel, and the formation of two new companies—K Service SpA (wholly-owned by Stefanel for manufacturing) and SKY Company SpA (73-percent owned by Stefanel, the remainder to Klein, for distribution). The glow from the Klein deal dimmed quickly, however, when Stefanel experienced its first ever losses in 1995 and 1996, due mostly to restructuring its worldwide operations. Then the following year top officials of the firm were under investigation by Italian authorities for fiscal fraud and falsifying documents, though charges had yet to filed.

Stefanel and Klein opened their first CK store in Milan in early 1997, and the former finally reaped the benefits of its reorganization and debt reduction of the last two years. For 1997 Stefanel was back in the black and the Klein venture was beginning to pay off. Stefanel then turned its attention to expansion outside Europe, namely in the U.S. where operated just a few stores. Giuseppe Stefanel has carried on the tradition his father began almost 50 years ago, and their firm is one of the few remaining independent fashion empires in Italy and beyond.

—Kevin Almond; updated by Owen James

STEFFE, Cynthia

American fashion designer

Born: Sioux City, Iowa, 30 June 1957. Education: Parsons School of Design, 1978–81. Family: Married Richard W. “Rick” Roberts, 1984. Career: Designer for Donna Karan and Louis Dell’Olio at Anne Klein & Company, 1981; designed women’s tailored separates for Spitalnick & Company, 1983–88; consultant for Crystal Brands, 1988–89; chaired Cynthia Steffe Inc., 1989–2000; joint designing of Cynthia Steffe, fall 2001 collection. © Fashion Syndicate Press.

cosmetics line, 1995; produced luxury coats for the Tepper Collection, 1995; created secondary line, 1997; sold firm to Leslie Fay, 2000. Awards: Student Designer of the Year, 1981; Donna Karan Gold Thimble, 1981; one of People magazine’s “50 Most Beautiful People in the World,” 1991. Address: 550 Seventh Avenue, Floor 21, New York, NY 10018–3203 U.S.A.

PUBLICATIONS

On STEFFE:

Books

Hodgman, Ann, A Day in the Life of a Fashion Designer, Mahwah, New Jersey, 1988.

Stegemeyer, Anne, Who’s Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.

The Complete Marquis Who’s Who, 2001.

Articles

“Steffe Leaves Spitalnick,” in WWD, 18 January 1988.

“Steffe Joins Crystal Brands,” in WWD, 16 March 1988.

- Rosenblum, Anne, "Steffe Line Poised for Fall Debut," in WWD, 10 November 1988.
- _____, "Cynthia Steffe: A Class Act," in WWD, 1 February 1989.
- "Cynthia Steffe Premieres," in WWD, 29 March 1989.
- Schiro, Anne-Marie, "Cynthia Steffe," in the New York Times, 28 August 1989.
- Delaney, Joan, "Designing Woman," in Executive Female, September-October 1990.
- "The 50 Most Beautiful People in the World," in People, July 1991.
- Friedman, Arthur, "Tepper Gets Coat License for Steffe," in WWD, 11 April 1995.
- "Steffe Makes Up," in WWD, 25 October 1995.
- White, Constance C.R., "Sleek Powerbroker Suits and Cool Characters," in the New York Times, 1 November 1995.
- Ozzard, Janet, "Cynthia's Steady Course," in WWD, 20 December 1995.
- "Savvy Take on Rocky Retail Era..." in Crain's New York Business, 4 March 1996.
- Ozzard, Janet, "Cynthia Steffe Stretches Out," in WWD, 12 February 1997.
- Bounds, Wendy, "Behind the Scenes at a Designer's First Show," in the Wall Street Journal, 25 April 1997.
- Avery, Nicole Volta, "Cynthia Steffe Showcases Spirited Designs for Hudsons," in the Detroit News, 23 March 1998.
- "Leslie Fay to Buy Cynthia Steffe Inc.," in WWD, 20 April 2000.
- Homan, Becky, "Snake Charmers," in the St. Louis Post-Dispatch, 20 May 2000.
- Mayer, Robin Long, "Tradition Honored," in Country Living, May 2001.
- "In Cynthia's Closet," in Ladies Home Journal, August 2001.
- "Cynthia Steffe," available online at Fashion Dex, www.fashiondex.com, 2001.
- Davis, Boyd, "New Generation: Cynthia Steffe," online at Fashion Windows, www.fashionwindows.com, 10 November 2001.
- Davis, Mari, "Cynthia Steffe: A View from Backstage," online at Fashion Windows, www.fashionwindows.com, 10 November 2001.

* * *

Cynthia Steffe, developer of Cynthia Steffe Collection, Cynthia's Closet, and Frances & Rita, used market savvy to ease her way into a highly competitive field. Born in Sioux City, Iowa, in 1958, she grew up in Boyden. In her teens, she emulated her mother's flair for clothes by sketching and sewing her own outfits. After Steffe chose fashion for her career, she entered New York City's Parsons School of Design at age 19. Before graduating in 1981, she snagged both the Student Designer of the Year and the Donna Karan Gold Thimble awards.

Immediately signed with Donna Karan, Steffe worked for Karan and Louis Dell'Olio at Anne Klein & Company. She began designing women's tailored separates for Spitalnick & Company in 1983 and left in 1988 to consult for Crystal Brands, maker of clothing for women, men, and youth under the Izod, Lacoste, and Ship 'n' Shore labels and Monet costume jewelry. A gift for design earned her a place among People Weekly's "50 Most Beautiful People in the World." Women's Wear Daily classed her as one of the "New Majors," a slate of tyros including Jennifer George, Rebecca Moses, Charlotte Neuville, and Carmelo Pomodoro, the five new names fashion pundits predicted would take the place of older, fading fashion houses.

Cynthia Steffe, fall 2001 collection. © Fashion Syndicate Press.

Steffe realized the only way to impact the market with original, unedited designs was to market them herself. In partnership with Ira J. Hechler & Associates, in March 1989 she launched Cynthia Steffe Inc., a 2,500-square-foot showroom at 575 Seventh Avenue to wholesale her creations in the $100 to $400 range. She involved herself at all levels, from design and administration to production and sales. Assisting her was company president Richard W. "Rick" Roberts, formerly president of Alexander Julian Womenswear for two years and director of the Calvin Klein Studio Division for two years. She had met Roberts in her sophomore year at Parsons and married him in 1984.

Chairing her own company, Steffe aimed for the best in fabric, detail, and construction to give buyers more value for their fashion investment. In anticipation of demand for luxury items and novelty fur pieces, she showed a first 50-item collection featuring blanket coats, tunics, kimono jackets, cigarette pants, bolero jackets, and faux furs in fundamental gray, navy, and black. To punch up her line, she stressed interesting buttons, trims, and shawls. Anne Rosenblum of Women's Wear Daily quoted Steffe's aim: "I am designing for a woman with a high taste level, who wants quality at a price she can afford."

Steffe's interest in a less monied class of shopper caught the fashion world's attention. Joan Delaney, writing for Executive Female, summarized Steffe's appeal: "By skirting fashion shows, this material girl delivers designer duds for fewer dollars." Steffe pushed herself to top previous years' successes with something wearable and eye-catching, including affordable crêpes, mohair boucles, wool jacquards, and suedes. Her niche was the bridge between the mass merchandising of Evan Picone and Jones of New York and exclusive originals by Calvin Klein. In 1990 Spiegel featured her contemporary designs in its 125th anniversary catalogue.

A year later, when Steffe was named one of the world's most attractive people, she told People, "I want a youthful personality to my clothes." CBS fashion analyst Pat George confirmed Steffe's choice of direction and ventured a prediction: "Her clothes are right on and her colors are original. She will be another Liz Claiborne or Adrienne Vittadini." In 1995 Steffe began cautiously branching out in a joint effort with Prescriptives on the introduction of Understatements '96, a cosmetics line, and made her first venture into licensing with Jeff Tepper's collection, for which she produced luxury coats in fur-trimmed alpaca velvet, angora flannel, shearling, leather, and shimmer sateen for sale at Saks Fifth Avenue and Neiman Marcus. Accounting for around two-thirds of her wholesale business in 1995 was the office-minded Frances & Rita line. Steffe told Women's Wear Daily, "We went after the market of women who wanted something to wear to work but wanted a little more style."

At her headquarters, Steffe acknowledged the uphill struggle in a cooling department store market that saw the demise of Ames, B. Altman, and Bloomingdale's and the sale of Saks. Fewer department stores meant stiffer competition for those that survived the shakeout; in retrospect, she commented that the 1980s offered a more forgiving fiscal climate: "Today, you can't afford to make a mistake. You really have to know your customer." As company pilot in chancy waters, she hired Susan Portnoy from Nicole Miller as public relations manager and initiated an aggressive advertising and promotion campaign.

After steadily advancing in sales to about $22 million in wholesale goods annually, in 1997 Steffe's company added a secondary line with the security of the Frances & Rita line, the office-friendly sportswear label, anchoring the firm. To Janet Ozzard of Women's Wear Daily, president Rick Roberts exulted, "The company is seven-and-a-half years old, and it's been consistently profitable for the last five."

Boldly thrusting into new territory, Steffe's designs reached out to women who buy individual wardrobe items rather than whole costumes. She offered narrow coats, slim shirtdresses and skirts, boot-leg pants, and double-breasted jackets over man-tailored trousers. To put more texture into the line, she featured fake fur, leather, stretch cotton and napa satin, wool pinstripe, burnout velvet, Lycra spandex twill, wool pebble crêpe, Lurex, and rayon or chenille yarns. She held down prices by buying from the second tier of expensive mill collections. In late April 2000, Steffe sold her firm to Leslie Fay Company, Inc.

At the beginning of a new millennium, Steffe was still pursuing texture by adding reptile prints and mottled touches to her designs as well as softly draped materials to her home. Targeting twentysomethings, she captured the Jackie look of the 1960s with matching rainwear as well as retro riding gear, asymmetrical hemlines, belts, leggings, and the indispensable purse to hold makeup and cell phone. In May 2001 Country Living featured the mountain getaway of Steffe and her husband. Departing their New York City apartment, they retreated to Calicoon, New York, in the Catskill

Mountains, where she coated walls and ceiling in creamy and ivory fabric lengths to reflect natural light.

In August 2001 Ladies Home Journal summarized the designer's unique sense of workable style. The choice of a monochromatic base enabled her to simplify shopping, accessorizing, and moving from 14-hour days to evening. Steffe confided, "Open my closet and it's a sea of black. I work with color all the time, so I wear black because it's the perfect backdrop to drape my fabrics against when I'm designing."

—Mary Ellen Snodgrass

STEHLE, Gerd

See STRENESSE GROUP

STEWART, Stevie

See BODYMAP

STOCK, Robert

American designer

Born: The Bronx, New York, 1946. Education: Self-taught in design. Family: Married Nancy McTague, 1982; children: two. Career: Apprentice designer, Paul Ressler Pants, New York, circa 1966; owner/designer, Country Britches, New York, 1967–73; design assistant, Chaps by Ralph Lauren, 1973–76; designer, Country Roads by Robert Stock, from 1976; formed Robert Stock Designs, 1978; co-owner/designer, Robert Stock Designs Ltd., 1990–99; women's line introduced, 1992; children's line introduced, 1993; licenses include men's shirts and ties, from 1991, jeans, and leather goods, from 1992; licensed overcoats, hosiery, and footwear, 1994; loungewear separates licensed, 1995; cotton jackets, 1996; Robert Stock School Gear, 1999; closed Robert Stock Ltd. and signed licensing pact with Capital Mercury Apparel, 1999. Awards: American Fashion Critics Coty award, 1978.

PUBLICATIONS

On STOCK:

Articles

"Robert Stock: Quiet on the Fashion Front," in GQ (New York), April 1981.

"Robert Stock," in DNR, 12 March 1987.

"Robert Stock Forms Firm," in DNR, 19 June 1990.

"Robert Stock Ltd.," in DNR, 4 August 1993.

"Mister Coats Gets Robert Stock License," in DNR, 27 January 1994. Schneider-Levy, "Stock Adds Shoes to Fashion Lineup," in Footwear News, 5 December 1994.

"Robert Stock Expands Pacts with Foster," in DNR, 6 October 1995. Socha, Miles, "Robert Stock Limited," in DNR, 29 May 1996.

Steffe's interest in a less monied class of shopper caught the fashion world's attention. Joan Delaney, writing for Executive Female, summarized Steffe's appeal: "By skirting fashion shows, this material girl delivers designer duds for fewer dollars." Steffe pushed herself to top previous years' successes with something wearable and eye-catching, including affordable crêpes, mohair boucles, wool jacquards, and suedes. Her niche was the bridge between the mass merchandising of Evan Picone and Jones of New York and exclusive originals by Calvin Klein. In 1990 Spiegel featured her contemporary designs in its 125th anniversary catalogue.

A year later, when Steffe was named one of the world's most attractive people, she told People, "I want a youthful personality to my clothes." CBS fashion analyst Pat George confirmed Steffe's choice of direction and ventured a prediction: "Her clothes are right on and her colors are original. She will be another Liz Claiborne or Adrienne Vittadini." In 1995 Steffe began cautiously branching out in a joint effort with Prescriptives on the introduction of Understatements '96, a cosmetics line, and made her first venture into licensing with Jeff Tepper's collection, for which she produced luxury coats in fur-trimmed alpaca velvet, angora flannel, shearling, leather, and shimmer sateen for sale at Saks Fifth Avenue and Neiman Marcus. Accounting for around two-thirds of her wholesale business in 1995 was the office-minded Frances & Rita line. Steffe told Women's Wear Daily, "We went after the market of women who wanted something to wear to work but wanted a little more style."

At her headquarters, Steffe acknowledged the uphill struggle in a cooling department store market that saw the demise of Ames, B. Altman, and Bloomingdale's and the sale of Saks. Fewer department stores meant stiffer competition for those that survived the shakeout; in retrospect, she commented that the 1980s offered a more forgiving fiscal climate: "Today, you can't afford to make a mistake. You really have to know your customer." As company pilot in chancy waters, she hired Susan Portnoy from Nicole Miller as public relations manager and initiated an aggressive advertising and promotion campaign.

After steadily advancing in sales to about $22 million in wholesale goods annually, in 1997 Steffe's company added a secondary line with the security of the Frances & Rita line, the office-friendly sportswear label, anchoring the firm. To Janet Ozzard of Women's Wear Daily, president Rick Roberts exulted, "The company is seven-and-a-half years old, and it's been consistently profitable for the last five."

Boldly thrusting into new territory, Steffe's designs reached out to women who buy individual wardrobe items rather than whole costumes. She offered narrow coats, slim shirtdresses and skirts, boot-leg pants, and double-breasted jackets over man-tailored trousers. To put more texture into the line, she featured fake fur, leather, stretch cotton and napa satin, wool pinstripe, burnout velvet, Lycra spandex twill, wool pebble crêpe, Lurex, and rayon or chenille yarns. She held down prices by buying from the second tier of expensive mill collections. In late April 2000, Steffe sold her firm to Leslie Fay Company, Inc.

At the beginning of a new millennium, Steffe was still pursuing texture by adding reptile prints and mottled touches to her designs as well as softly draped materials to her home. Targeting twentysomethings, she captured the Jackie look of the 1960s with matching rainwear as well as retro riding gear, asymmetrical hemlines, belts, leggings, and the indispensable purse to hold makeup and cell phone. In May 2001 Country Living featured the mountain getaway of Steffe and her husband. Departing their New York City apartment, they retreated to Calicoon, New York, in the Catskill

Mountains, where she coated walls and ceiling in creamy and ivory fabric lengths to reflect natural light.

In August 2001 Ladies Home Journal summarized the designer's unique sense of workable style. The choice of a monochromatic base enabled her to simplify shopping, accessorizing, and moving from 14-hour days to evening. Steffe confided, "Open my closet and it's a sea of black. I work with color all the time, so I wear black because it's the perfect backdrop to drape my fabrics against when I'm designing."

—Mary Ellen Snodgrass

STEHLE, Gerd

See STRENESSE GROUP

STEWART, Stevie

See BODYMAP

STOCK, Robert

American designer

Born: The Bronx, New York, 1946. Education: Self-taught in design. Family: Married Nancy McTague, 1982; children: two. Career: Apprentice designer, Paul Ressler Pants, New York, circa 1966; owner/designer, Country Britches, New York, 1967–73; design assistant, Chaps by Ralph Lauren, 1973–76; designer, Country Roads by Robert Stock, from 1976; formed Robert Stock Designs, 1978; co-owner/designer, Robert Stock Designs Ltd., 1990–99; women's line introduced, 1992; children's line introduced, 1993; licenses include men's shirts and ties, from 1991, jeans, and leather goods, from 1992; licensed overcoats, hosiery, and footwear, 1994; loungewear separates licensed, 1995; cotton jackets, 1996; Robert Stock School Gear, 1999; closed Robert Stock Ltd. and signed licensing pact with Capital Mercury Apparel, 1999. Awards: American Fashion Critics Coty award, 1978.

PUBLICATIONS

On STOCK:

Articles

- "Robert Stock: Quiet on the Fashion Front," in GQ (New York), April 1981.
- "Robert Stock," in DNR, 12 March 1987.
- "Robert Stock Forms Firm," in DNR, 19 June 1990.
- "Robert Stock Ltd.," in DNR, 4 August 1993.
- "Mister Coats Gets Robert Stock License," in DNR, 27 January 1994.
- Schneider-Levy, "Stock Adds Shoes to Fashion Lineup," in Footwear News, 5 December 1994.
- "Robert Stock Expands Pacts with Foster," in DNR, 6 October 1995.
- Socha, Miles, "Robert Stock Limited," in DNR, 29 May 1996.

- "U-Got-It Gets Robert Stock License for 1997," in DNR, 14 October 1996.
- Romero, Elena, "...Robert Stock Creates Stylish Uniforms for Back-to-School," in DNR, 19 April 1999.
- Dodd, Annmarie, "Robert Stock to Dissolve Manufacturing Company," in DNR, 11 October 1999.
- Curan, Catherine, "Designer Patches up Menswear Label with License Deal; Robert Stock Allies with Large Company," in Crain's New York Business, 29 November 1999.

* * *

As a fashion designer, Robert Stock achieved a remarkably successful about-turn. His first foray into the fashion industry, after an apprenticeship with a trouser company, was to form Country Britches, a company that produced traditional sportswear—including classic slacks and polo shirts—fitting into almost any traditional department store. Stock later sold the company and went to work with Ralph Lauren, the master of timeless dressing. He aided in the design and development of Chaps, Lauren's lower-priced men's sportswear division which later became a division of Warnaco.

Country Roads by Robert Stock, a division of Creighton Industries, was the company for which Stock designed after leaving Ralph Lauren. Appropriately, this line followed the same traditional vein—sportswear to appeal to the conventional middle American male. In 1990 Stock and a partner formed Robert Stock Designs to manufacture men's knitwear. Soon after, sandwashed silk pieces were added and the company grew swiftly from a firm worth $10 million into one valued at $100 million.

Although it would be inaccurate to credit Stock as designer of a line consisting chiefly of plain and print sandwashed silk shirts, he should be credited for recognizing that silk, considered a luxury fabric, could be sourced and manufactured in the Far East at a cheaper price than previously thought. By adding this luxury line, Stock offered consumers value at an affordable price, referred to in the market as "perceived value." Stock expanded his offering of silk luxury to both the womenswear and boyswear markets and reintroduced the leisure suit to the menswear market. His version, however, was almost active wear; a sweat- or warm-up suit offered not in the usual nylon or Goretex, but in sandwashed silk. Such an ensemble, designed for leisure or sport and manufactured in a luxurious fabric seemed incongruous, yet clients snapped them up.

The success brought by sandwashed silk apparel enabled Stock to enter into a slew of licensing agreements in other areas, including tailored clothing, furnishings, neckwear, jeans, knitwear, hosiery, footwear, loungewear, and the outerwear market, including both casual and dress outerwear. Stock took another tack in 1999, when he began designing school uniforms. Commenting on the new label, Robert Stock School Gear, to Daily News Record (19 April 1999) the designer said, "The collection is value driven yet it also offers tremendous quality as well as a degree of style." The range included both short- and long-sleeved button-down shirts, polo shirts, sweaters, and pants made from twill, flannel, and gabardine pants and were sold to high-end department stores.

By the end of the 20th century, Stock had decided to close his manufacturing firm, Robert Stock Ltd., in favor of his burgeoning licensing business. A subsequent licensing pact with Capital Mercury Apparel had Stock designing men's sportswear, shirts, and swim gear for a fall 2000 launch. Stock told Annmarie Dodd of DNR (11 October 1999), "In today's marketplace teaming up with a manufacturer like Capital Mercury can only help to elevate the brand and allow me to concentrate on design."

As an erstwhile traditional designer, Robert Stock has pushed the limits of traditional men's sportswear by changing the face of the fabrics used. Once considered the "King of Silk," an evolving market forced him to segue into less appreciated forms of fashion. Though he has referred to himself as the "Ford or Chevrolet of designers," this is an understatement of his worth—unless, of course, he meant Corvettes or Lincoln Navigators.

—Lisa Marsh; updated by Owen James

STOREY, Helen

British designer

Born: 16 August 1959 in Rome, Italy. Education: Graduated with degree in fashion design, Kingston Polytechnic, 1981. Family: Married Ron Brinkers; children: one son. Career: Apprenticed to Valentino and Lancetti, Milan, 1981–83; launched own label, Amalgamated Talent, 1984; partner/designer, Boyd & Storey, London, 1987–89; first catwalk show, London, 1990; designer, Jigsaw stores, 1990; introduced menswear collection, 1991; designer, Knickerbox, and Empire stores, 1991; introduced 2nd Life line of recycled clothes, 1992; opened store in King's Road, London, 1992; Edith Sitwell-inspired collection, London, 1995; began selling stakes in her stores and went into bankruptcy, 1995; authored book on fashion business, 1997; launched housewares and party favors collection, 1999. Awards: With Karen Boyd, British Apparel Export award, 1989; Most Innovative Designer of the Year award, 1990; Young Designer of the Year award, 1990; with sister Kate Storey, Wellcome Trust Sci-Art Initiative, cash award, 1997. Address: Coates & Storey Ltd., 57 Kings Road, London SW3 4ND, England.

PUBLICATIONS

By STOREY:

Books

Fighting Fashion, London, 1997.

Articles

"Party Like It's 1999," in Los Angeles Magazine, December 1999.
"It's Not the Art but the Taking Part," in the Times Educational Supplement (London), 5 May 2000.

"My Best Teacher: Helen Storey," with Hilary Wilcein, in the Times Educational Supplement (London), 20 July 2001.

On STOREY:

Articles

Wheeler, Karen, "Five Survivors," in DR: The Fashion Business (London), 26 August 1989.
Wolford, Lisa, and Mark Borthwick, "West End's Storey," in Interview, December 1989.

- "U-Got-It Gets Robert Stock License for 1997," in DNR, 14 October 1996.
- Romero, Elena, "...Robert Stock Creates Stylish Uniforms for Back-to-School," in DNR, 19 April 1999.
- Dodd, Annmarie, "Robert Stock to Dissolve Manufacturing Company," in DNR, 11 October 1999.
- Curan, Catherine, "Designer Patches up Menswear Label with License Deal; Robert Stock Allies with Large Company," in Crain's New York Business, 29 November 1999.

* * *

As a fashion designer, Robert Stock achieved a remarkably successful about-turn. His first foray into the fashion industry, after an apprenticeship with a trouser company, was to form Country Britches, a company that produced traditional sportswear—including classic slacks and polo shirts—fitting into almost any traditional department store. Stock later sold the company and went to work with Ralph Lauren, the master of timeless dressing. He aided in the design and development of Chaps, Lauren's lower-priced men's sportswear division which later became a division of Warnaco.

Country Roads by Robert Stock, a division of Creighton Industries, was the company for which Stock designed after leaving Ralph Lauren. Appropriately, this line followed the same traditional vein—sportswear to appeal to the conventional middle American male. In 1990 Stock and a partner formed Robert Stock Designs to manufacture men's knitwear. Soon after, sandwashed silk pieces were added and the company grew swiftly from a firm worth $10 million into one valued at $100 million.

Although it would be inaccurate to credit Stock as designer of a line consisting chiefly of plain and print sandwashed silk shirts, he should be credited for recognizing that silk, considered a luxury fabric, could be sourced and manufactured in the Far East at a cheaper price than previously thought. By adding this luxury line, Stock offered consumers value at an affordable price, referred to in the market as "perceived value." Stock expanded his offering of silk luxury to both the womenswear and boyswear markets and reintroduced the leisure suit to the menswear market. His version, however, was almost active wear; a sweat- or warm-up suit offered not in the usual nylon or Goretex, but in sandwashed silk. Such an ensemble, designed for leisure or sport and manufactured in a luxurious fabric seemed incongruous, yet clients snapped them up.

The success brought by sandwashed silk apparel enabled Stock to enter into a slew of licensing agreements in other areas, including tailored clothing, furnishings, neckwear, jeans, knitwear, hosiery, footwear, loungewear, and the outerwear market, including both casual and dress outerwear. Stock took another tack in 1999, when he began designing school uniforms. Commenting on the new label, Robert Stock School Gear, to Daily News Record (19 April 1999) the designer said, "The collection is value driven yet it also offers tremendous quality as well as a degree of style." The range included both short- and long-sleeved button-down shirts, polo shirts, sweaters, and pants made from twill, flannel, and gabardine pants and were sold to high-end department stores.

By the end of the 20th century, Stock had decided to close his manufacturing firm, Robert Stock Ltd., in favor of his burgeoning licensing business. A subsequent licensing pact with Capital Mercury Apparel had Stock designing men's sportswear, shirts, and swim gear for a fall 2000 launch. Stock told Annmarie Dodd of DNR (11 October 1999), "In today's marketplace teaming up with a manufacturer like Capital Mercury can only help to elevate the brand and allow me to concentrate on design."

As an erstwhile traditional designer, Robert Stock has pushed the limits of traditional men's sportswear by changing the face of the fabrics used. Once considered the "King of Silk," an evolving market forced him to segue into less appreciated forms of fashion. Though he has referred to himself as the "Ford or Chevrolet of designers," this is an understatement of his worth—unless, of course, he meant Corvettes or Lincoln Navigators.

—Lisa Marsh; updated by Owen James

STOREY, Helen

British designer

Born: 16 August 1959 in Rome, Italy. Education: Graduated with degree in fashion design, Kingston Polytechnic, 1981. Family: Married Ron Brinkers; children: one son. Career: Apprenticed to Valentino and Lancetti, Milan, 1981–83; launched own label, Amalgamated Talent, 1984; partner/designer, Boyd & Storey, London, 1987–89; first catwalk show, London, 1990; designer, Jigsaw stores, 1990; introduced menswear collection, 1991; designer, Knickerbox, and Empire stores, 1991; introduced 2nd Life line of recycled clothes, 1992; opened store in King's Road, London, 1992; Edith Sitwell-inspired collection, London, 1995; began selling stakes in her stores and went into bankruptcy, 1995; authored book on fashion business, 1997; launched housewares and party favors collection, 1999. Awards: With Karen Boyd, British Apparel Export award, 1989; Most Innovative Designer of the Year award, 1990; Young Designer of the Year award, 1990; with sister Kate Storey, Wellcome Trust Sci-Art Initiative, cash award, 1997. Address: Coates & Storey Ltd., 57 Kings Road, London SW3 4ND, England.

PUBLICATIONS

By STOREY:

Books

Fighting Fashion, London, 1997.

Articles

"Party Like It's 1999," in Los Angeles Magazine, December 1999.
"It's Not the Art but the Taking Part," in the Times Educational Supplement (London), 5 May 2000.

"My Best Teacher: Helen Storey," with Hilary Wilcein, in the Times Educational Supplement (London), 20 July 2001.

On STOREY:

Articles

Wheeler, Karen, "Five Survivors," in DR: The Fashion Business (London), 26 August 1989.
Wolford, Lisa, and Mark Borthwick, "West End's Storey," in Interview, December 1989.

- Hume, Marion, "Shock Tactics," in the Sunday Times (London), 17 December 1989.
- Armstrong, Lisa, "Success Storey," in Vogue (London), May 1990.
- Curtis, Anne-Marie, "Love Storey," in Sky (London), June 1990.
- Bull, Sandra, "Multi Storey," in Fashion Weekly (London), 13 September 1990.
- Rowe, Gillian, "Storey Lines," in Shop in Town, 14 March 1991.
- "Great Expectations," in WWD, 13 June 1991.
- Chunn, Louise, "Bettering by Design," in The Guardian (London), 20 May 1992.
- Mulvagh, Jane, "From the Rag Trade to Riches," in the European (London), 3–6 December 1992.
- Dutt, Lalla, "True Storey," in City Limits (London), 21–28 January 1993.
- Underhill, William, "The Roaring 1990s: America's Resurgent Economy," in Newsweek, 22 February 1993.
- Schiros, Anne-Marie, "Small Houses: Holding in the 1980s, or Back to the 1970s," in the New York Times, 23 February 1993.
- Armstrong, Lisa. "One Girl's Storey," in Vogue (London), November 1994.
- Spindler, Amy M., "From Young Designers, Familiar Echoes," in the New York Times, 14 March 1995.
- Brampton, Sally, "From Catwalk to Dole Queue (Interview of British Fashion Designer Helen Storey)," in The Guardian, 14 June 1995.
- "Fighting Fashion," [book review] in the Economist, 15 March 1997.
- Riddell, Mary, "Interview: Helen Storey," in the New Statesman (London), 12 September 1997.

* * *

Helen Storey is one of Britain's most innovative and controversial designers. She has been described as "the next great British hope," and rationalized her success in characteristic style: "One of the reasons that I am here and a lot of my contemporaries aren't is because I sit on the knife edge between good and bad taste, fashion and theatre, business and imagination."

Trained at Kingston Polytechnic in Surrey, Storey was encouraged by one of her tutors, Richard Nott (of Workers for Freedom) to apply to Valentino, as her work seemed out of step with the fashion course at Kingston. Storey says of her work as a student at the time, "I was designing wildly theatrical outfits—I doubt if they could even be made up, let alone washed. I tried to think Marks & Spencer but it always came out wrong." She stayed with Valentino's design studio for two years and was much struck by the contrast between the experience in Rome and her student training: "Valentino designed 65 collections a year and was treated like a lord. I felt sick that this kind of sky's-the-limit attitude could never happen at home."

When she returned to London, at the high point of international interest in young British designers in 1984, Storey became one of a group to join forces under the umbrella title of Amalgamated Talent, where she showed six highly successful collections. In 1987 Storey opened Boyd & Storey in West Soho, London, together with fellow designers Karen Boyd and Caroline Coates. Two years later, Helen Storey and Karen Boyd (who were to go their separate ways within the year) won the British Apparel Export award in recognition of their outstanding export achievements. By May 1990 the Helen Storey for Jigsaw collection was available in Jigsaw stores throughout Great Britain, and in October of the same year Storey won the Most Innovative Designer of the Year award with her first solo catwalk show during London Fashion Week.

In 1991 Storey designed her first full menswear collection, which was launched at SEHM, Paris. The same year she was commissioned by the underwear chain Knickerbox to design a range and by Empire stores to endorse and design for their mail order catalogues. In the following year, Showroom Seven was appointed as Storey's American agent, and the fall-winter 1992 collection "Dreams and Reality" was shown in New York, London, Paris, and Düsseldorf.

Storey has been preoccupied with recycling: "Fashion is a wasteful image—full stop! So there's a limit to how much you can fly the eco-flag. As a fashion company my problem is how do I keep selling and respond to environmentalism. We must tackle the problem slowly." In June 1992, Storey introduced a range of recycled clothes under the name 2nd Life, and in the same year she began another significant foray into eco-fashion when she became the first British designer to launch and use the most recent Courtauld's fiber Tencel, the so-called cashmere of denim, for her October 1992 collection. Tencel is the first new synthetic textile fiber in 30 years, and Storey described it as having extraordinary possibilities. "It can be as floppy as silk but has all the robust characteristics of denim." In 1993 Storey continued her innovative fiber association and marketing with the use of Tencel, Tactel (ICI), and Acetate Novaceta Ltd.

Storey believes "the fashion industry is really a very funny place for me to be," and attempts to explain her work in the following terms: "Basically, people want to see a bit of the impossible in the clothes because it confirms their own sense of reality. I am an instinctual designer; I see that I am attached to the energy of creation, but it also makes me want to give up sometimes because of the amount of unnecessary items we churn out for the sake of another season."

The innovative and controversial Storey did a show in London in 1995. Inspired by English eccentric Edith Sitwell, the bohemian poet and intellectual of the 1920s, Storey's collection included androgynous pinstripe suits entailing fake fur boas, as well as 1920s gowns also showing long trains of fake fur. A year or so later, the award-winning British designer spoke up about the strains of running a fashion business while supporting her husband during his fight against cancer. Selling parts of her shops here and there, Storey believes it is a lack of professionalism that forces designers to be on the move. Brand-building is probably the weakest element in the fashion industry, according to Storey, especially in Britain, where the designer got her start.

But Storey is known well beyond that of the design world. Along with her sister Kate, they won an award from the Wellcome Trust's Sci-Art Initiative, an organization that supports cross-fertilization between art and science. Storey's focus in this cause was to ensure that her designs were an accurate representation of the scientific process. From studying the first 1,000 hours of human life to studying the division of cells under a microscope, Storey underwent a whole new aspect of education most designers never experience in their lifetime. The idea of the cross-fertilization between art and science is that those who are passionate about fashion will also pick up lessons in human biology. Storey describes it as "New Fashion."

Although Storey said she did not miss straying away from the fashion world to accommodate for and learn more about science, she did return to what she knew best in 1999. It was not clothing but instead party essentials she introduced, including Arts & Letters designed to enhance invitations, the Empty Vase for any array of flowers, and Illume for candles. Due to the fact that it was presented before the millennium, the products were highly successful.

—Doreen Ehrlich; updated by Diana Idzelis

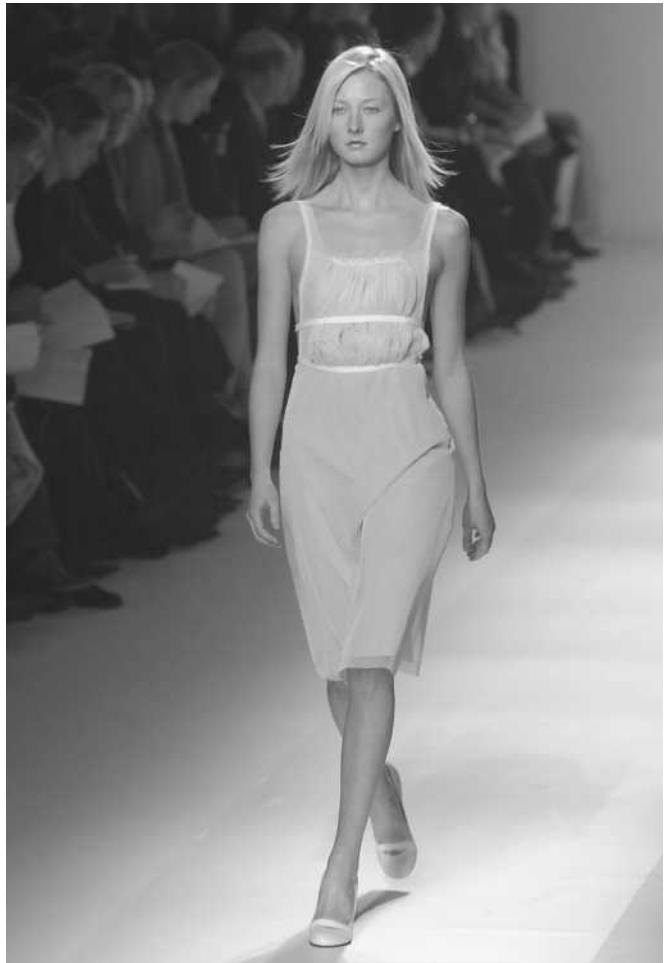

STRAUSS, Levi

See LEVI-STRAUSS & CO.

STRENESSE GROUP

German fashion house

Founded: from family clothing company by Gerd Strehle in Nordlingen, 1968. Company History: Joined by wife Gabriele Strehle as designer, from 1973; launched Strehle Collection, 1976; Strenesse Blue, sportswear line debuted, 1993; opened flagship store, Dusseldorf, 1995; launched ready-to-wear in the U.S. at Bergdorf Goodman, 1995; introduced footwear, 1996; took footwear line to U.S., 1997; launched first fragrance Strenesse Gabriele Strehle, 2001; opened New York showroom, 2001; introduced first menswear line, 2002; opened Tokyo flagship, 2002. Awards: European Fashion Diamond for Marketing Excellence (to Gerd Strehle), 1999. Company Address: Eichendorffplatz 3, 8860 Nordlingen, Germany. Company Website: www.strenesse.com.

Strenesse Group, fall/winter 2001–02 collection. © AP/Wide World Photos.

PUBLICATIONS

On STRENESSE:

Articles

- Drier, Melissa, "Strenesse: Making Marks with Minimalism," in WWD, 2 February 1993.
 "Skirmishing in Asia," in WWD, 29 November 1994.
 "Shopping Europe," in Footwear News, 30 September 1996.
 LoRusso, Maryann, "Feisty Fern...Fern Dembiccer Sets Out...to Make German Brand Strenesse an American Staple," in Footwear News, 26 May 1997.
 Socha, Miles, "Strenesse Takes Aim at U.S.," in WWD, 19 November 1997.
 "Milan Going for Glamour," in WWD, 5 March 1998.
 Conti, Samantha, et al., "Connolly, Strenesse Eyed for HDP's Expansion List," in WWD, 30 November 1998.
 "Sense and Sensibility," in WWD, 4 March 1999.
 Socha, Miles, "The New Gold Rush," in WWD, 21 April 1999.
 Ilari, Alessandra, "The Main Event...Accessories are Stealing the Spotlight from the Clothes," in WWD, 1 May 2000.
 "New Strenesse USA CEO," in WWD, 21 July 2000.
 "Study in Contrasts: Designer Gabriele Strehle," in WWD, 4 October 2000.
 Drier, Melissa, "A Classic Turn for German RTW," in WWD, 13 February 2001.
 Wilson, Eric, "Strenesse Subsidiary Maps U.S. Growth Plan," in WWD, 28 February 2001.
 Drier, Melissa, "Strenesse to Launch First Fragrance," in WWD, 1 June 2001.
 Wilson, Eric, "Strenesse, Strehle Open in U.S.," in WWD, 3 August 2001.

* * *

The Strenesse group designs clothes aim to show the personality of a woman in a way that suits her own style. It is for this reason that the company promotes its label as a style label rather than a designer label, so often only a platform for the creative personality of the designer. A group collection like Strenesse is concerned with providing the modern woman with a versatile, stylish wardrobe created by a united team of fashion experts.

The company was originally established in 1948 and produced a wearable but unadventurous line of coats and suits. Gerd Strehle took over the company from his parents in 1968 and, with the help of freelance designers and stylists, established it as a popular fashion label. In 1973 a design graduate from the fashion school in Munich became responsible for the collection. Gabriele Strehle eventually married into the company and became its creative director.

Gabriele Strehle established a stylish collection—a mixture of luxury materials, quality workmanship, and a purist, minimalistic look intended to emphasize the aura and personality of its wearer. Strenesse collections became timeless and classic, with a design principle that each new piece could be combined and worn with the previous season's look, to create a harmonious continuity of style. It also emphasizes Gabriele's ecological and cultural sense in for a definitive style that will not date. The clothes themselves are simple and luxurious, sensuous knits, hacking jackets, tailored skirt and trouser suits, and roomy, comfortable coats. Fabrics include tweeds, leathers, chiffons, pinstripe flannels, and cashmeres.

Strenesse Group, fall/winter 2001–02 collection. © AP/Wide World Photos.

Photographers such as Jacques Olivar and Ellen Von Unwerth have been responsible for creating many of the visuals that represent the Strenesse look in both publicity and advertising. Classic tailored, mannish looks and elongated, sexy basque dresses are generally photographed in sharp black and white. Classic movie star references abound: Sophia Loren on a Vespa in Rome, Marlene Dietrich languidly smoking in a darkened railway station, or Ingrid Bergman in a beret from Arch of Triumph. These looks suggest to the customer the many different roles she can adopt with her versatile Strenesse wardrobe.

The ideal Strenesse woman is both erotic and confident in her pared-down chic. She does not use fashion as a means to flaunt her success, wealth or status. Like Gabriele Strehle, she believes in the phrase "Less is more." In a world often taut with recession and environmental constraints, this philosophy has a creative longevity. Fashion gimmicks and short-lived trends are rejected in favor of a forward-looking fashion style that adapts to, but does not radically alter, the personality of its wearer.

Teamwork is very important at Strenesse. Strehle sees her role as catalyst for her design team's many ideas. The company views group work as being the chief motivation for creativity and, ultimately, productivity. Teamwork is a unity of interpersonal relations and common interests with one aim in mind, that being the extended development of new ideas for the evolution of the Strenesse look. Strenesse began in the 1990s to introduce accessory products—belts, shoes, and handbags—to encourage customers to adopt the Strenesse lifestyle. In autumn 1993 the company introduced Strenesse Blue, a more casual holiday and leisurewear collection. By 1995 the firm had approximately 900 worldwide clients, among them new customers in the U.S. after the exporting its ready-to-wear line to Bergdorf Goodman in New York. Acceptance from Americans only further confirmed Strenesse's established popularity and influence on international style.

In the late 1990s while other German design firms had less than stalwart sales, Strenesse continued to sell well both in Germany and abroad. Capitalizing on its name and brand awareness, Strenesse introduced a new footwear line in Germany, Europe, and Asia, then launched the collection in the U.S. in 1997, with the help of consultant Fern Dembicser, president of the Fern Monica marketing company. The Strenesse collection was made up of more than three dozen comfortable yet stylish shoes, footwear Dembicser told Footwear News (September 1997) would "work with a whole wardrobe of stylish looks, from suits to pants to long and short skirts."

"We say Strenesse is an intelligent collection," Gabriele Strehle told Miles Socha of Women's Wear Daily back in 1997. "Our philosophy is that we are a modern luxury brand. Modern means with a much more realistic approach to the market." Apparently, its ever-increasing clientèle agreed; for luxury retailers in the U.S., Strenesse represented what Saks Fifth Avenue called "the gold range" between the highest priced designer collections and bridge lines. At both Saks and Bergdorf Goodman, Strenesse had been achieving record sales since debuting in the U.S., and the Strehles continued to roll out new products from accessories and a new jeans line, to a fragrance launch and Gabriele's first menswear collection. To help with the growing demand, the firm created a new division, Strenesse USA, and hired Deb Maxwell (formerly of Gruppo GFT) as chief executive officer.

In 1998 Women's Wear Daily had praised the enduring elegance of Strenesse, stating, "Classics have always been the backbone of Strenesse, and it's been a formula that has worked for this German powerhouse." The message was the same in February 2001, when Elke Giese, director of the German Fashion Institute, said of Strenesse's newest collection to WWD's Melissa Drier, "It has a stunning clarity." Drier concurred, stating, "The collection harked back to Strenesse's roots with the kind of streamlined tailoring and rich fabrics with which the label originally made its mark." Such high praise wasn't lost on Europe's luxury conglomerates, as both Gruppo GFT and LVMH had expressed an interest in acquiring the German firm. The Strehles, however, had yet to find the right combination of funds and creative control, and loathed to have Strenesse lose its most valuable asset—excellence in both design and quality.

—Kevin Almond; updated by Nelly Rhodes

STUART, Jill

American fashion designer

Born: Daughter of Lynn Stuart, New York City designer-merchandiser. Education: Dalton School; the Rhode Island School of Design.

Strenesse Group, fall/winter 2001–02 collection. © AP/Wide World Photos.

Photographers such as Jacques Olivar and Ellen Von Unwerth have been responsible for creating many of the visuals that represent the Strenesse look in both publicity and advertising. Classic tailored, mannish looks and elongated, sexy basque dresses are generally photographed in sharp black and white. Classic movie star references abound: Sophia Loren on a Vespa in Rome, Marlene Dietrich languidly smoking in a darkened railway station, or Ingrid Bergman in a beret from Arch of Triumph. These looks suggest to the customer the many different roles she can adopt with her versatile Strenesse wardrobe.

The ideal Strenesse woman is both erotic and confident in her pared-down chic. She does not use fashion as a means to flaunt her success, wealth or status. Like Gabriele Strehle, she believes in the phrase "Less is more." In a world often taut with recession and environmental constraints, this philosophy has a creative longevity. Fashion gimmicks and short-lived trends are rejected in favor of a forward-looking fashion style that adapts to, but does not radically alter, the personality of its wearer.

Teamwork is very important at Strenesse. Strehle sees her role as catalyst for her design team's many ideas. The company views group work as being the chief motivation for creativity and, ultimately, productivity. Teamwork is a unity of interpersonal relations and common interests with one aim in mind, that being the extended development of new ideas for the evolution of the Strenesse look. Strenesse began in the 1990s to introduce accessory products—belts, shoes, and handbags—to encourage customers to adopt the Strenesse lifestyle. In autumn 1993 the company introduced Strenesse Blue, a more casual holiday and leisurewear collection. By 1995 the firm had approximately 900 worldwide clients, among them new customers in the U.S. after the exporting its ready-to-wear line to Bergdorf Goodman in New York. Acceptance from Americans only further confirmed Strenesse's established popularity and influence on international style.

In the late 1990s while other German design firms had less than stalwart sales, Strenesse continued to sell well both in Germany and abroad. Capitalizing on its name and brand awareness, Strenesse introduced a new footwear line in Germany, Europe, and Asia, then launched the collection in the U.S. in 1997, with the help of consultant Fern Dembicser, president of the Fern Monica marketing company. The Strenesse collection was made up of more than three dozen comfortable yet stylish shoes, footwear Dembicser told Footwear News (September 1997) would "work with a whole wardrobe of stylish looks, from suits to pants to long and short skirts."

"We say Strenesse is an intelligent collection," Gabriele Strehle told Miles Socha of Women's Wear Daily back in 1997. "Our philosophy is that we are a modern luxury brand. Modern means with a much more realistic approach to the market." Apparently, its ever-increasing clientèle agreed; for luxury retailers in the U.S., Strenesse represented what Saks Fifth Avenue called "the gold range" between the highest priced designer collections and bridge lines. At both Saks and Bergdorf Goodman, Strenesse had been achieving record sales since debuting in the U.S., and the Strehles continued to roll out new products from accessories and a new jeans line, to a fragrance launch and Gabriele's first menswear collection. To help with the growing demand, the firm created a new division, Strenesse USA, and hired Deb Maxwell (formerly of Gruppo GFT) as chief executive officer.

In 1998 Women's Wear Daily had praised the enduring elegance of Strenesse, stating, "Classics have always been the backbone of Strenesse, and it's been a formula that has worked for this German powerhouse." The message was the same in February 2001, when Elke Giese, director of the German Fashion Institute, said of Strenesse's newest collection to WWD's Melissa Drier, "It has a stunning clarity." Drier concurred, stating, "The collection harked back to Strenesse's roots with the kind of streamlined tailoring and rich fabrics with which the label originally made its mark." Such high praise wasn't lost on Europe's luxury conglomerates, as both Gruppo GFT and LVMH had expressed an interest in acquiring the German firm. The Strehles, however, had yet to find the right combination of funds and creative control, and loathed to have Strenesse lose its most valuable asset—excellence in both design and quality.

—Kevin Almond; updated by Nelly Rhodes

STUART, Jill

American fashion designer

Born: Daughter of Lynn Stuart, New York City designer-merchandiser. Education: Dalton School; the Rhode Island School of Design.

Jill Stuart, fall 2001 collection. © AP/Wide World Photos.

Family: Married Ron Curtis, 1986. Career: Opened a belt and handbag boutique on New York's Upper East Side, 1988; worked out of a design studio/showroom on East 68th Street, 1990; introduced Skin clothes, 1993; designs featured in the movie Clueless, 1995; thrived in the Japanese market with stores in Tokyo and Osaka, mid-1990s; showed the Jill Stuart International Collection at her shop at 100 Greene Street in SoHo, 1998; opened third Japan store in Kobe, 1998; signed several licensing deals and launched jeans collection, 2000; new lingerie line, 2001. Exhibitions: Debuted at the Plaza Hotel, New York, 1990. Address: 550 Seventh Avenue, Fifth Floor, New York, NY 10018 U.S.A.

PUBLICATIONS

On STUART:

Articles

- Brill, Eileen B., "Designers Support U.S. Production," in WWD, 25 October 1985.
 Botton, Sari, "Jill Stuart Opens Shop," in WWD, 12 October 1988.
 Newman, Jill, "Stuart Takes New Direction," in WWD, 4 May 1990.
 ———, "Showroom Seven to Represent Leather Line by Jill Stuart," in WWD, 10 May 1991.

Gaut, Halle, "Jill Stuart to Unveil Lower-Priced Jill Line," in WWD, 31 July 1992.

"Jill Stuart Opens Skin clothes Lines," in WWD, 24 November 1993.
 Schiro, Anne-Marie, "Leather, Shapely and Pretty," in the New York Times, 28 February 1995.

White, Constance C.R., "Two Soothing Visions of Clothes for the 1990s," in the New York Times, 1 April 1996.

"Jill Stuart Goes In-Store," in WWD, 12 June 1996.

Socha, Miles, "Whipping Up an American Frenzy: Jill Stuart Opens Store in Japan," in WWD, 23 March 1998.

"Joie de Mode," in WWD, 6 April 1998.

"New York Rolls On," in WWD, 17 September 1998.

Schiro, Anne-Marie, "Cutting Loose with Colors and Grace," in the New York Times, 17 September 1998.

"Girl Talk...Anna Sui, Victor Alfaro and Jill Stuart are Taking a Sweeter Approach," in WWD, 17 September 1999.

Wilson, Eric, "Jill Stuart's Licensing Streak," in WWD, 28 September 2000.

"Jill Stuart Launches Jeans Line," in WWD, 30 November 2000.

Monget, Karyn, "Jill Stuart Gets Intimate," in WWD, 30 April 2001.

"In Brief," in WWD, 24 May 2001.

"Party On," in WWD, 18 July 2001.

Czarra, Kerstin, "White Out? The Much-Maligned White Pump is Waging a Fashion Comeback (Jill Stuart Brings Back Trend)," in Footwear News, 30 July 2001.

Davis, Boyd, "Jill Stuart Spring 2002," available online at Fashion Windows, www.fashionwindows.com, 11 November 2001.

"Jill Stuart," available online at Fashion Windows, www.fashionwindows.com, 11 November 2001.

"Jill Stuart Runway Fashion Photos," available online at Fashion Showroom, www.fashionshowroom.com, 11 November 2001.

Johnson, Phillip D., "(Le) Smokin'!" online at Lucire, www.lucire.com, 11 November 2001.

Kim, Eri, "Jill Stuart's Sensual Vision," online at Fashion Windows, www.fashionwindows.com, 11 November 2001.

Knight, Molly, "Jill Stuart's Black Out," online at Fashion Windows, www.fashionwindows.com, 11 November 2001.

* * *

Since her introduction of trendy handbags, belts, and leather kilts, the star attraction among her girlish sportswear and dresses in 1993, Jill Stuart has maintained a steady business in the U.S. and a robust demand for her goods in Europe and Asia. She received her first nudge into fashion design in childhood from observing her parents, makers of tailored clothing for Mister Pants in Manhattan's Garment District. Her mother, Lynn Stuart, earned recognition by creating costumes for Lucille Ball and Sheila MacRea. To fashion writer Eric Wilson, Stuart explained, "I was born into this business. It's in my blood and my genes. I live for it and I'm very passionate about it. As a child, I remember hearing about the business at the dinner table every night, from the designers of the fabric to the collection to the ad campaign and the contractors." By age 15, she was selling her first line of bags and belts to Bloomingdale's.

Educated at the Dalton School and the Rhode Island School of Design, in 1986 Stuart asserted her creative bent by marrying a fellow artist, Ron Curtis, producer of an off-Broadway play. In 1988 she opened her first boutique, a 400-square-foot shop on New York's Upper East Side, at 22 East 65th Street, between Madison and Fifth Avenues. From one-on-one interaction with customers, she got to know shoppers and their needs. Interviewer Eileen Brill reported the designer's motivation to succeed: "I've always believed in my designs. I'm pretty aggressive and pretty persuasive and I won't stop once I've started on something."

Jill Stuart, fall 2001 collection. © AP/Wide World Photos.

Stuart's modest beginnings prefaced a rapid rise in name and style recognition. By 1990 her low-priced line of belts, evening bags, stoles, and fur accessories quickly found choice spots at Neiman Marcus and in Bergdorf Goodman stores and catalogues. Working out of a design studio/showroom on East 68th Street, she gave a formal exhibition at New York City's Plaza Hotel and distributed her fashions through Showroom Seven on 37th Street. She demonstrated pride in American goods by lauding U.S. crafting, which she correctly envisioned would impact the rest of the world's shoppers.

Stuart made a splash in the fashion world in fall 1993 with Skin clothes, a flirty line of leather slip-dresses, jeans, shirts, jackets, and kilts with matching shirts distributed by Annett B, Barneys, New Signatures, and Macy's East. Women's Wear Daily quoted the excitement of Benny Lin, Macy's East fashion director: "It's great fashion at great value. We've always done well with Jill's accessories, so it's a great tie-in.... We've wanted her to do sportswear for some time."

As Stuart's company CEO, husband Curtis estimated sales of her label had reached $100 million in 1993, one quarter of which was derived from Europe. The showcasing of Jill Stuart outfits on star Alicia Silverstone in the Paramount movie Clueless (1995) enhanced the first nationwide spurt of interest in Stuart designs. By 1996 Stuart had introduced in-store goods at Bloomingdale's on the East and West Coasts.

When the American clothing market fizzled in mid-1990s, Stuart had begun looking to Pacific Rim outlets for her sensual, bouncy fashions. To Eric Wilson with Women's Wear Daily, Curtis remarked confidently, "We've always thought of Jill Stuart as a global brand." For department store shoppers, she introduced more goods priced under $100. Curtis reported there were 70 Jill Stuart in-store shops in Japan and announced plans for several dozen more over the next few years. Already successful at flagship locations in Osaka and Tokyo, her outlets carried a variety of goods, from footwear to handbags.

In fall 1998 Women's Wear Daily characterized the Jill Stuart look as cute and sugary "girly-wear." Departing Cinderella fantasies, Stuart developed a frontier look with burlap and showed open-backed smock dresses, cropped pants, and full skirts teamed with peasant blouses and chiffon aprons. She acquired a 5,000-square-foot store in SoHo at 100 Greene Street, where she could display the entire Jill Stuart International Collection, produced by Sanei International of Hong Kong. For the gala premiere, she crafted a luxurious, mohair- and cashmere-rich collection intended to boost U.S. sales. Her models strutted in wide pants, pleated skirts, thick knits, chinchilla coats, and off-the-shoulder dresses embroidered with blossoms. For evening, she coordinated cashmere skirts with embroidered velvet bodices.

This same era saw a boom in Stuart labels in Japan, where young buyers snapped up items displaying the designer's signature cuteness. She told Women's Wear Daily, "Their enthusiasm is amazing. It's really a high to be there; they love to shop, the Japanese, and when they catch on..." A reader poll conducted by Ryuko-Tushin, a Japanese fashion magazine, placed her in the top spot shared with Vivienne Woodward for favorite international designer. A third Stuart flagship opened in Kobe in 1998.

The year 2000 was Stuart's venture into licensing deals in Japan, where Itochu Fashion System Company Limited managed distribution. Fans exalted her to cult status, stalked her in public, and begged autographs. Carrying her label were lingerie, eyewear, denim, and shoes. Stuart maneuvered forays into a spring eyewear collection with Eyewear Designs, two shoe lines debuting with Schwartz Benjamin, and another footwear collection with Japan's Moda Clea. Scoring with Bergdorf Goodman, Stanley Korshak, Neiman Marcus, and Fred Segal were Stuart's fur-trimmed pumps and gold mesh footwear. Kuipo of Japan introduced Jill Stuart handbags and shoes at 40 locations. The year 2000 also saw plans for further expansion into watches, fragrances, skincare products, and home furnishings.

To advertise her fashion goods, Stuart hired Ellen von Unwerth as photographer and Doug Lloyd of Lloyd Company as art director. CEO Curtis explained the need for collaboration as an outgrowth of the broadening of mid-level marketing. In Japan, eight-foot-high billboards splashed the Jill Stuart label and generated a sell-out business. To fashion analyst Miles Socha, Stuart chuckled, "They know how to do it in Japan." Keeping the Stuart name before the public were dolls sporting scaled-down outfits made by Itochu and Sanei. For full-sized wearers of the Stuart label, the designer relied on top-of-the-line fabrics and a wide variety of styles to catch shoppers' attention.

At the same time, Stuart pursued serious negotiations with Sara Lee Corporation to buy the Jill Stuart company. Curtis, who admittedly was not a business mogul, justified his wife's interest in a corporate connection as a relief from business concerns so she could concentrate on creativity. Of their team approach, he summarized to Eric Wilson, "Jill works on the collection, I work on the creative campaign. The demands on our time are backbreaking and overwhelming." Contributing to those demands were new lingerie designs distributed in fall 2001 by Host for Her.

In May, headlines blared Stuart's appearance in court to settle a lawsuit by Vicki Ross for nonpayment of $2.9 million in the licensing of Stuart designs in Japan. Ross sought finder's fee, royalties, and compensation. Undeterred by the action, two months later Stuart reprised her sugary basics at a designers party, where she served raspberry lemonade at her roof deck. Parading among guests, models displayed Stuart's signature peasant blouses, lacy-sleeved jersey frocks, and puff-sleeved tops with trousers.

For fall 2001, Stuart dressed models in Edwardian finery—ivory-and-white lace and cotton dresses with matching jackets, vests, slips, and leggings and rounded out the look with calf-high lace-up sandals. She balanced ultra romanticized femininity with hot pants and vest, lilac or green cargo pants, voluminous cotton shorts, patchwork skirts, voile suit, ethnic belts, and roomy peasant blouses. To Women's Wear Daily, she pegged her familiar style as pretty, feminine, and never retro: "The collection is playful and dainty. It has a certain sweetness with little touches of young and feminine detail."

Some fashion mavens were confused by Stuart's mixed signals in 2001. Rather than her usual tunnel vision on confection-rich clothes, she intermingled a variety of looks with a heavy touch of black. Phillip D. Johnson, writing for Lucire, found her "terribly erratic." He brightened that her fall-winter 2001 collection was more cohesive and classy—sleeveless knee-length coat and a cropped one-button jacket with nods to the pared waistlines of Prada and Yves Saint Laurent.

—Mary Ellen Snodgrass

SUI, Anna

American designer

Born: Dearborn Heights, Michigan, circa 1955. Education: Studied at Parsons School of Design, New York, circa 1973–75. Career: Stylist for photographer Steven Meisel and junior sportswear firms in New York, 1970s to 1981; sportswear designer, Simultanee, New York, 1981; also designed own line, from 1980; formed own company, New York, 1983; first runway show, 1991; added menswear line, opened in-store boutique Macy's, 1992; first freestanding store, SoHo, New York, 1992; opened shop in Hollywood, 1993–95; launched bridge line, SUI by Anna Sui, 1995; opened two boutiques in Japan, 1997; formed Anna Sui Shoes and added cosmetic line,

Anna Sui, fall 2001 collection: chiffon caftan over glittery corduroy pants. © AP/Wide World Photos.

1997; introduced first fragrance, Magic Window, and opened Los Angeles store, 1999; introduced jeans collection and second fragrance, Sui Dreams, 2000. Exhibitions: Part of the Fashion in Motion series, Victoria & Albert Museum, London, 2000. Awards: Perry Ellis award, 1993. Address: 275 West 39th Street, New York, NY 10018, U.S.A. Websites: www.annasui.com, www.annasuibeauty.com.

PUBLICATIONS

On SUI:

Books

Steele, Valerie, Women of Fashion—Twentieth Century Designers, New York, 1991.

Stegemeyer, Anne, Who's Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.

Watson, Linda, Vogue Twentieth-Century Fashion: 100 Years of Style by Decade and Designer, London, 1999.

Articles

Casadio, Mariuccia, "Anna Sui: Spectacular Ingredients," in Interview, July 1991.

know how to do it in Japan." Keeping the Stuart name before the public were dolls sporting scaled-down outfits made by Itochu and Sanei. For full-sized wearers of the Stuart label, the designer relied on top-of-the-line fabrics and a wide variety of styles to catch shoppers' attention.

At the same time, Stuart pursued serious negotiations with Sara Lee Corporation to buy the Jill Stuart company. Curtis, who admittedly was not a business mogul, justified his wife's interest in a corporate connection as a relief from business concerns so she could concentrate on creativity. Of their team approach, he summarized to Eric Wilson, "Jill works on the collection, I work on the creative campaign. The demands on our time are backbreaking and overwhelming." Contributing to those demands were new lingerie designs distributed in fall 2001 by Host for Her.

In May, headlines blared Stuart's appearance in court to settle a lawsuit by Vicki Ross for nonpayment of $2.9 million in the licensing of Stuart designs in Japan. Ross sought finder's fee, royalties, and compensation. Undeterred by the action, two months later Stuart reprised her sugary basics at a designers party, where she served raspberry lemonade at her roof deck. Parading among guests, models displayed Stuart's signature peasant blouses, lacy-sleeved jersey frocks, and puff-sleeved tops with trousers.

For fall 2001, Stuart dressed models in Edwardian finery—ivory-and-white lace and cotton dresses with matching jackets, vests, slips, and leggings and rounded out the look with calf-high lace-up sandals. She balanced ultra romanticized femininity with hot pants and vest, lilac or green cargo pants, voluminous cotton shorts, patchwork skirts, voile suit, ethnic belts, and roomy peasant blouses. To Women's Wear Daily, she pegged her familiar style as pretty, feminine, and never retro: "The collection is playful and dainty. It has a certain sweetness with little touches of young and feminine detail."

Some fashion mavens were confused by Stuart's mixed signals in 2001. Rather than her usual tunnel vision on confection-rich clothes, she intermingled a variety of looks with a heavy touch of black. Phillip D. Johnson, writing for Lucire, found her "terribly erratic." He brightened that her fall-winter 2001 collection was more cohesive and classy—sleeveless knee-length coat and a cropped one-button jacket with nods to the pared waistlines of Prada and Yves Saint Laurent.

—Mary Ellen Snodgrass

SUI, Anna

American designer

Born: Dearborn Heights, Michigan, circa 1955. Education: Studied at Parsons School of Design, New York, circa 1973–75. Career: Stylist for photographer Steven Meisel and junior sportswear firms in New York, 1970s to 1981; sportswear designer, Simultanee, New York, 1981; also designed own line, from 1980; formed own company, New York, 1983; first runway show, 1991; added menswear line, opened in-store boutique Macy's, 1992; first freestanding store, SoHo, New York, 1992; opened shop in Hollywood, 1993–95; launched bridge line, SUI by Anna Sui, 1995; opened two boutiques in Japan, 1997; formed Anna Sui Shoes and added cosmetic line,

Anna Sui, fall 2001 collection: chiffon caftan over glittery corduroy pants. © AP/Wide World Photos.

1997; introduced first fragrance, Magic Window, and opened Los Angeles store, 1999; introduced jeans collection and second fragrance, Sui Dreams, 2000. Exhibitions: Part of the Fashion in Motion series, Victoria & Albert Museum, London, 2000. Awards: Perry Ellis award, 1993. Address: 275 West 39th Street, New York, NY 10018, U.S.A. Websites: www.annasui.com, www.annasuibeauty.com.

PUBLICATIONS

On SUI:

Books

Steele, Valerie, Women of Fashion—Twentieth Century Designers, New York, 1991.

Stegemeyer, Anne, Who's Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.

Watson, Linda, Vogue Twentieth-Century Fashion: 100 Years of Style by Decade and Designer, London, 1999.

Articles

Casadio, Mariuccia, "Anna Sui: Spectacular Ingredients," in Interview, July 1991.

Anna Sui, fall 2001 collection: wool knit dress. © AP/Wide World Photos.

- Goodman, Wendy, "Anna Sui Suits Herself," in House & Garden, March 1992.
- Allis, Tim, "The Sui Smell of Success," in People, 13 July 1992.
- James, Laurie, "Sui Success," in Harper's Bazaar, September 1992.
- Shiro, Anne-Marie, "On Opposite Sides of the Cutting Edge," in the New York Times, 6 November 1992.
- "Designer Dish," in WWD, 29 March 1993.
- "Anna Sui," in Current Biography, July 1993.
- Shiro, Anne-Marie, "Anna Sui Pounds Out the Beat," in the New York Times, 5 November 1993.
- Foley, Bridget, "Anna's Time," in W (New York), September 1994.
- Spindler, Amy M., "Saluting—or Doing In—The Suburban Muse," in the New York Times, 4 November 1994.
- DeCaro, Frank, "Hairy Situations and Hula Balloos: Anna Sui," in New York Newsday, 4 November 1994.
- Spindler, Amy M., "Cool Rises to Intimidating Heights," in the New York Times, 7 April 1995.
- "New York: Anna Sui," in WWD, 7 April 1995.
- Sitbon, Martine, "Oui, Sui!" in Interview, May 1999.
- Spindler, Amy M., "Behind the Seams," in the New York Times Magazine, 14 November 1999.

LoRusso, Maryann, "The Sui and Lowdown," in Footwear News, 26 June 2000.

* * *

When Anna Sui started her own apparel company in 1980, her mission was to sell clothes to every rock 'n' roll store in the country. "It was right after the punk rock thing and I was so into that," said the designer, who has earned a reputation for bringing a designer's sensibility to wild-child, rocker clothes with a vintage spin.

One of three children of Chinese immigrants, Sui knew she wanted to be a clothing designer since she was a little girl growing up in Detroit in the late 1950s and 1960s. She came to New York to attend Parsons School of Design after graduating from high school in the early 1970s—an era whose music-inspired fashion scene, mix-it-up attitude, and free-spirited energy influenced Sui to a great degree. At Parsons, Sui met photographer Steven Meisel—her counterpart in styling ventures then and now.

Upon graduation from Parsons, Sui's first job was with the now defunct junior sportswear firm Bobbie Brooks, where she worked as a design assistant for about a year. After working for other firms over several years, Sui landed at Glenora, a firm the designer described as "very hip at the time." There she was able to experiment with her interest in clothing having a historical bent, made modern by mixing fresh colors and new shapes with vintage elements.

In 1980, prompted by friends and the praise she received as a stylist for Meisel's shoots for the Italian fashion magazine Lei, she started her own company. Greatly influenced by New York's punk scene of the 1970s, Sui's main focus was on selling her funky styles to music stores, though she continued as a stylist for Meisel. This changed around 1987, when the designer decided to "get serious about being a designer," as she recalled. She moved her line into the Annette B showroom, owned by Annette Breindel, a no-nonsense woman known for nurturing young designers. "Annette helped me enormously," said Sui. "She helped me build my dress business first because that's what she saw as a worthwhile area."

Building up her dress category is what allowed Sui to move her business out of her apartment and into a loft workspace in the garment district of New York. In 1991 Sui staged her first major fashion showing during New York Fashion Week. Her friends—supermodels Naomi Campbell, Linda Evangelista, and Christy Turlington—walked Sui's runway for free, in exchange for clothes. Influenced by the shows of Thierry Mugler and Jean-Paul Gaultier, the designer created a showing that was as much about music and theater as about clothing. She soon reigned as the queen of fashion show extravaganzas.

Sui's designs mixed styles and time periods. She explained her creative focus in an interview with Maryann LoRusso in Footwear News in June 2000: "My designs are a combination of nostalgia and trendiness and rock 'n' roll and flea markets. And fantasy and dress-up. I'm a product of American pop culture, and my designs really show that." She is a fanatical researcher with an insatiable desire to learn. She draws inspiration from art exhibits, films, flea markets, museums, music, and street fashion. She does not simply pluck ideas from the past or another culture, but instead pulls together themes from many sources and seeks to relate them to what people are currently experiencing. She understands that her customers want to express themselves through their clothing and not feel as if they were wearing a costume.

Sui's business continues to expand; she has over 200 boutiques worldwide, in such locations as New York, Los Angeles, Tokyo, and

Osaka, and her collections are sold in many major department and specialty stores. She formed Anna Sui Shoes in 1997, and her cosmetic and fragrance line is now a global brand. Even as her business branches out, Sui's commitment to fashion that is fun to wear hasn't diminished. Her 2001 collection included 59 feminine t-shirts decorated with printed designs, fabric flowers, lace, and sequins, and were as fashionable as they were affordable. Never interested in haute couture, Sui's work reflects her ongoing concern to "continue to make these clothes accessible to the people I want wearing them."

—Mary Ellen Gordon; updated by Janette Goff Dixon

SUNG, Alfred

Canadian designer

Born: 26 April 1948, in Shanghai, China; immigrated to Paris, 1966; immigrated to Canada, 1972. Education: Studied fashion design at Chambre Syndicale de la Couture Parisienne, Paris; studied one year at Parsons School of Design, New York, 1967–68. Career: Worked in New York City Garment District, late 1960s-early 1970s; moved to Toronto, 1972; worked on Spadina Avenue for Lindzon Ltd.; opened own boutique, Moon; partnered with Joseph and Saul Mimran to form Monaco, 1979; first women's fragrance, 1986; licensed with Etac Sales Ltd. to make and market the Alfred Sung line and Sung sportswear, 1991; Etac went bankrupt, 1994; Sung and the Mimran Group formed Alfred Sung Collections Ltd. and bought back licensing agreements from Etac, 1994–95; signed new bridge licensing agreement, 1994; Alfred Sung Collections Ltd. filed for bankruptcy, 1997; fragrances include: Sung, 1986; Forever, 1995; Pure, 1997; Shi, 2000. Awards: Named one of the Top Ten New Designers by Saks Fifth Avenue, 1981; HBA International Package Design award, for Shi fragrance, 2000.

PUBLICATIONS

On SUNG:

Articles

- MacKay, G., "Alfred Sung: The New King of Fashion," in Macleans, 22 August 1983.
- Bennett, J., "Designs for an Empire," in Macleans, 15 December 1986.
- Hastings, N.J., "Sung Style: Like His Fashions," in Chatelaine, January 1989.
- Wickens, B., "Sung Also Rises," in Macleans, 12 September 1994.
- Socha, Miles, "Sung Returns to Apparel with Bridge License Deal," in WWD, 3 August 1994.
- Larsen, Soren, "Sung's Forever Slated for Fall," in WWD, 31 March 1995.
- "Sung Staying Pure with Latest Fragrance," in WWD, 27 June 1997.
- "Scents and Senses," in WWD, 18 July 1997.
- Born, Pete, "Alfred Sung's Shi—Balance of Nature," in WWD, 28 July 2000.
- "The HBA Show in New York Claims Another Record," in Cosmetics International, 10 July 2001.

* * *

Alfred Sung is a Canadian designer with an international following. Based in Toronto, Sung created designs primarily for women, though he has on occasion produced for men. The most recognized of Sung's creations, however, are his fragrances, as well as bridal collections and accessories.

The hallmark of this Shanghai-born designer was simple, chic design created to be worn by women who needed stylish yet wearable clothes for busy lifestyles. Sung's designs evinced a classic feeling for line and detail, and his clothes were made from high-quality fabrics he himself had been known to design. He created separates, dresses, evening clothes, and jeans. His simple shapes were easy to wear and chosen by people in the public eye because they are neither trendy nor outrageous, and because they were somewhat conservative. His designs always complemented rather than overwhelmed their wearer; he worked towards an understated chic for real life, not for the runway.

Sung has long been a perfectionist who lived and breathed the world of fashion design and often eschewed other concerns of life. He has, however, faced more than his share of challenges as his career developed. A native of Shanghai, Sung was originally named Sung Wang Moon, which meant "a door in the cloud." When his family moved to the British colony of Hong Kong, his father changed his son's name to Alfred. From an early age he painted, drew, and wanted to continue study in this field. His father sent him to Paris, though not to study painting but fashion design at the Chambre Syndicale de la Couture Parisienne. Sung soon learned draping, cutting, and sewing garments by hand, obtaining a sound grounding in design and clothing construction basics.

Sung studied at the Parsons School of Design for a year, and worked on Seventh Avenue in New York City for several years, eventually moving to Toronto, Canada, where he worked on Spadina Avenue for Lindzon Ltd. Wanting to be self employed, he opened a boutique named "Moon." For three years, he was responsible for all aspects of the design process, from designing, cutting and sewing, to marketing. He developed a devoted following of young people who delighted in his well-designed clothes.

Fortunately, in 1979 Sung formed a partnership with Joseph and Saul Mimran. The brothers took over the business end of the operation, allowing Sung to concentrate on designing. Based in Canada, the three men developed an operation that at one point included boutiques under the Alfred Sung name in Boston, Washington D.C., and Short Hills, New Jersey. In 1981 Sung was named one of the top new designers by Saks Fifth Avenue. Sung licensed luggage designs, sunglasses, and created his first fragrance in 1986. Unfortunately, the group licensed to manufacture Sung's clothing designs went bankrupt, creating a void in the production and distribution of his work. In spite of these problems, Sung continued to design and formed a new firm, Alfred Sung Collections Ltd., with the Mimran brothers and Michael Waitzer, formerly of Marks & Spencer.

All seemed bright for the latest Sung enterprise; the designer had new apparel lines, a bridal collection, and eyewear and fragrance deals. His three women's fragrances had been highly successful, especially the original and aptly named Sung (1986). A new scent, Forever, debuted in 1995, followed by Pure in 1997. Yet while Sung fragrances were perennial bestsellers, the designer was not so fortunate. After more lows than highs, Sung was forced once again to confront bankruptcy. His longtime backer and partners, the Mimrans,

Osaka, and her collections are sold in many major department and specialty stores. She formed Anna Sui Shoes in 1997, and her cosmetic and fragrance line is now a global brand. Even as her business branches out, Sui's commitment to fashion that is fun to wear hasn't diminished. Her 2001 collection included 59 feminine t-shirts decorated with printed designs, fabric flowers, lace, and sequins, and were as fashionable as they were affordable. Never interested in haute couture, Sui's work reflects her ongoing concern to "continue to make these clothes accessible to the people I want wearing them."

—Mary Ellen Gordon; updated by Janette Goff Dixon

SUNG, Alfred

Canadian designer

Born: 26 April 1948, in Shanghai, China; immigrated to Paris, 1966; immigrated to Canada, 1972. Education: Studied fashion design at Chambre Syndicale de la Couture Parisienne, Paris; studied one year at Parsons School of Design, New York, 1967–68. Career: Worked in New York City Garment District, late 1960s-early 1970s; moved to Toronto, 1972; worked on Spadina Avenue for Lindzon Ltd.; opened own boutique, Moon; partnered with Joseph and Saul Mimran to form Monaco, 1979; first women's fragrance, 1986; licensed with Etac Sales Ltd. to make and market the Alfred Sung line and Sung sportswear, 1991; Etac went bankrupt, 1994; Sung and the Mimran Group formed Alfred Sung Collections Ltd. and bought back licensing agreements from Etac, 1994–95; signed new bridge licensing agreement, 1994; Alfred Sung Collections Ltd. filed for bankruptcy, 1997; fragrances include: Sung, 1986; Forever, 1995; Pure, 1997; Shi, 2000. Awards: Named one of the Top Ten New Designers by Saks Fifth Avenue, 1981; HBA International Package Design award, for Shi fragrance, 2000.

PUBLICATIONS

On SUNG:

Articles

- MacKay, G., "Alfred Sung: The New King of Fashion," in Macleans, 22 August 1983.
- Bennett, J., "Designs for an Empire," in Macleans, 15 December 1986.
- Hastings, N.J., "Sung Style: Like His Fashions," in Chatelaine, January 1989.
- Wickens, B., "Sung Also Rises," in Macleans, 12 September 1994.
- Socha, Miles, "Sung Returns to Apparel with Bridge License Deal," in WWD, 3 August 1994.
- Larsen, Soren, "Sung's Forever Slated for Fall," in WWD, 31 March 1995.
- "Sung Staying Pure with Latest Fragrance," in WWD, 27 June 1997.
- "Scents and Senses," in WWD, 18 July 1997.
- Born, Pete, "Alfred Sung's Shi—Balance of Nature," in WWD, 28 July 2000.
- "The HBA Show in New York Claims Another Record," in Cosmetics International, 10 July 2001.

* * *

Alfred Sung is a Canadian designer with an international following. Based in Toronto, Sung created designs primarily for women, though he has on occasion produced for men. The most recognized of Sung's creations, however, are his fragrances, as well as bridal collections and accessories.

The hallmark of this Shanghai-born designer was simple, chic design created to be worn by women who needed stylish yet wearable clothes for busy lifestyles. Sung's designs evinced a classic feeling for line and detail, and his clothes were made from high-quality fabrics he himself had been known to design. He created separates, dresses, evening clothes, and jeans. His simple shapes were easy to wear and chosen by people in the public eye because they are neither trendy nor outrageous, and because they were somewhat conservative. His designs always complemented rather than overwhelmed their wearer; he worked towards an understated chic for real life, not for the runway.

Sung has long been a perfectionist who lived and breathed the world of fashion design and often eschewed other concerns of life. He has, however, faced more than his share of challenges as his career developed. A native of Shanghai, Sung was originally named Sung Wang Moon, which meant "a door in the cloud." When his family moved to the British colony of Hong Kong, his father changed his son's name to Alfred. From an early age he painted, drew, and wanted to continue study in this field. His father sent him to Paris, though not to study painting but fashion design at the Chambre Syndicale de la Couture Parisienne. Sung soon learned draping, cutting, and sewing garments by hand, obtaining a sound grounding in design and clothing construction basics.

Sung studied at the Parsons School of Design for a year, and worked on Seventh Avenue in New York City for several years, eventually moving to Toronto, Canada, where he worked on Spadina Avenue for Lindzon Ltd. Wanting to be self employed, he opened a boutique named "Moon." For three years, he was responsible for all aspects of the design process, from designing, cutting and sewing, to marketing. He developed a devoted following of young people who delighted in his well-designed clothes.

Fortunately, in 1979 Sung formed a partnership with Joseph and Saul Mimran. The brothers took over the business end of the operation, allowing Sung to concentrate on designing. Based in Canada, the three men developed an operation that at one point included boutiques under the Alfred Sung name in Boston, Washington D.C., and Short Hills, New Jersey. In 1981 Sung was named one of the top new designers by Saks Fifth Avenue. Sung licensed luggage designs, sunglasses, and created his first fragrance in 1986. Unfortunately, the group licensed to manufacture Sung's clothing designs went bankrupt, creating a void in the production and distribution of his work. In spite of these problems, Sung continued to design and formed a new firm, Alfred Sung Collections Ltd., with the Mimran brothers and Michael Waitzer, formerly of Marks & Spencer.

All seemed bright for the latest Sung enterprise; the designer had new apparel lines, a bridal collection, and eyewear and fragrance deals. His three women's fragrances had been highly successful, especially the original and aptly named Sung (1986). A new scent, Forever, debuted in 1995, followed by Pure in 1997. Yet while Sung fragrances were perennial bestsellers, the designer was not so fortunate. After more lows than highs, Sung was forced once again to confront bankruptcy. His longtime backer and partners, the Mimrans, terminated his licensing agreement in 1996 and Alfred Sung Collections Ltd. had to file for bankruptcy in 1997. Three Sung stores in Toronto were closed and assets liquidated to cover more than $1 million in debt.

Despite his financial woes, Alfred Sung remained an integral part of the fashion industry. His bridal collections and accessories, licensed by the Algo Group, experienced booming sales at the end of the century, as did his stable of six fragrances. Sung's latest women's scent, Shi, was released in 2000 and won an HBA International Package Design award in 2001.

—Nancy House; updated by Nelly Rhodes

SYBILLA

Spanish designer

Born: Sybilla Sorondo in New York City, 1963, to Polish/Argentinian parents; moved to Madrid, age 7; moved to Paris, 1980. Family: Married Enrique Sirera, 1992; children: Lucas. Career: Apprentice cutter and seamstress, Yves Saint Laurent, 1980; returned to Madrid, 1981, making made-to-measure clothes for friends; introduced first collection, Madrid, 1983; signed production/international distribution agreement for women's ready-to-wear, 1985; presented first collections in Milan, Paris, New York, 1985; head designer, Programas Exteriores SA, Madrid, from 1985; opened Sybilla boutique, Madrid, 1987; signed with Italian company Gibo for women's ready-to-wear, 1987; began producing knitwear with Italian company ICAP, 1988; began producing women's shoes and bags with Farrutx, and carpets with Vorwerk, 1988; agreed to exclusive license in Japan with Itokin, 1989; opened new shops in Paris and Tokyo, 1991; opened 20 in-store shops in Japan; launched second line for younger people, with 20 shops, called Jocomomola, autumn/winter 1993–94; left fashion for several years, then returned with new Noche line, 1999; also designs housewares, accessories, and costumes for Blanca Li ballet company. Exhibitions: 50 Años de Moda, Cuartel de Conde Duque, Madrid, 1987; Le Monde Selon ses Créateurs, Musée de la Mode et du Costume, Paris, 1991. Collections: Museo de la Moda, Barcelona; Musée de la Mode et du Costume, Paris; Fashion Institute of Technology, New York. Awards: Premio Balenciaga, Best Young Designer of the Year, Spain, 1987; Prix Fil d'Or, France, 1987. Address: Callejon de Jorge Juan 12, Madrid, Spain.

PUBLICATIONS

On SYBILLA:

Books

- Benaim, Laurence, L'Année de la Mode, Lyons, 1988.
 Steele, Valerie, Women of Fashion: Twentieth-Century Designers, New York, 1991.
 Stegemeyer, Anne, Who's Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.

Articles

- "Profile: Sybilla," in Harper's & Queen (London), January 1987.
 Dreier, Deborah, "Designing Women," in Art in America (New York), May 1987.

Chua, Lawrence, "Sybilla: Designing Lady of Spain," in WWD, 28 September 1987.

Gordon Lennox, Sarah, "Sybilla Reigns in Spain," in W (London), March 1988.

Fuente, Ada de la, "El Inevitable Éxito de Una Niña Salvaje," in Vogue (Spain), August 1988.

Benaim, Laurence, "L'Ange Couturier," in Vogue (Paris), October 1988.

Cocks, Jay, "A Look on the Wild Side: Two Young Designers Liven Up a Groggy Fashion Scene," in Time, 16 January 1989.

"Deux Grands d'Espagne: Sybilla et Javier Valhonrat," in Jardin des Modes (Paris), 1–8 April 1989.

Brantley, Ben, "Spain's New Flame," in Vanity Fair, November 1989.

Naeto, Maite, "El Triunfo de Una Chica Precoz," in El País (Madrid), November 1989.

Armstrong, Lisa, "She's a Wizard of Aaahs," in Harper's Bazaar, August 1990.

Mower, Sarah, et al., "The Reign of Spain," in Metropolitan Home (New York), February 1991.

Oku, Emiko, "Sybilla's 77 Answers," in Ryuko Tsushin (Tokyo), February 1992.

Alvarado, Antonio, "Sybilla, ¡Jo, Cómo Mola!" in El Mundo magazine (Madrid), March 1994.

Weisman, Katherine, "Vuitton: A Quality Harvest," in WWD, 11 January 1996.

"Brand Newsline," in Euromarketing, 20 February 1998.

"Consumer Goods Euro," in MarkIntel, 1 April 2000.

Barker, Barbara, "Loewe Show in Madrid: Under the Big Top Sybilla: Lazarus," available online at Fashion Click, www.fashionclick.com, 5 October 2001.

"Candelabro," online at Cerebella, www.cerabella.com, 7 October 2001.

"Shopping Fashion Designers," online at Time Out, www.timeout.com, 7 October 2001.

"A Short Shopping Guide for Madrid, Spain," online at www.blackwhite.freeserve.co.uk, 7 October 2001.

*

I guess people try to dress up in a way that represents themselves. Somehow we all "paint" our skin with clothes, copying an inner image of ourselves. If you're able to get to this point, you can forget what you're wearing, you can overcome your own image.... At this moment the peace and serenity you show outside can be considered elegance.

—Sybilla

* * *

Sybilla has been widely acclaimed as the most exciting designer to have emerged from Spain since Balenciaga. She was born in 1963 in New York City, the daughter of an Argentine diplomat. Her mother was a Polish aristocrat who worked as a fashion designer under the name Countess Sybilla of Saks Fifth Avenue. When Sybilla was seven years old, her family moved to Madrid, and she considers herself thoroughly Spanish; her clothes, she has said are also very Spanish—"not olé, olé," but Spanish in the classical sense.

terminated his licensing agreement in 1996 and Alfred Sung Collections Ltd. had to file for bankruptcy in 1997. Three Sung stores in Toronto were closed and assets liquidated to cover more than $1 million in debt.

Despite his financial woes, Alfred Sung remained an integral part of the fashion industry. His bridal collections and accessories, licensed by the Algo Group, experienced booming sales at the end of the century, as did his stable of six fragrances. Sung's latest women's scent, Shi, was released in 2000 and won an HBA International Package Design award in 2001.

—Nancy House; updated by Nelly Rhodes

SYBILLA

Spanish designer

Born: Sybilla Sorondo in New York City, 1963, to Polish/Argentinian parents; moved to Madrid, age 7; moved to Paris, 1980. Family: Married Enrique Sirera, 1992; children: Lucas. Career: Apprentice cutter and seamstress, Yves Saint Laurent, 1980; returned to Madrid, 1981, making made-to-measure clothes for friends; introduced first collection, Madrid, 1983; signed production/international distribution agreement for women's ready-to-wear, 1985; presented first collections in Milan, Paris, New York, 1985; head designer, Programas Exteriores SA, Madrid, from 1985; opened Sybilla boutique, Madrid, 1987; signed with Italian company Gibo for women's ready-to-wear, 1987; began producing knitwear with Italian company ICAP, 1988; began producing women's shoes and bags with Farrutx, and carpets with Vorwerk, 1988; agreed to exclusive license in Japan with Itokin, 1989; opened new shops in Paris and Tokyo, 1991; opened 20 in-store shops in Japan; launched second line for younger people, with 20 shops, called Jocomomola, autumn/winter 1993–94; left fashion for several years, then returned with new Noche line, 1999; also designs housewares, accessories, and costumes for Blanca Li ballet company. Exhibitions: 50 Años de Moda, Cuartel de Conde Duque, Madrid, 1987; Le Monde Selon ses Créateurs, Musée de la Mode et du Costume, Paris, 1991. Collections: Museo de la Moda, Barcelona; Musée de la Mode et du Costume, Paris; Fashion Institute of Technology, New York. Awards: Premio Balenciaga, Best Young Designer of the Year, Spain, 1987; Prix Fil d'Or, France, 1987. Address: Callejon de Jorge Juan 12, Madrid, Spain.

PUBLICATIONS

On SYBILLA:

Books

- Benaim, Laurence, L'Année de la Mode, Lyons, 1988.
 Steele, Valerie, Women of Fashion: Twentieth-Century Designers, New York, 1991.
 Stegemeyer, Anne, Who's Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.

Articles

- "Profile: Sybilla," in Harper's & Queen (London), January 1987.
 Dreier, Deborah, "Designing Women," in Art in America (New York), May 1987.

Chua, Lawrence, "Sybilla: Designing Lady of Spain," in WWD, 28 September 1987.

Gordon Lennox, Sarah, "Sybilla Reigns in Spain," in W (London), March 1988.

Fuente, Ada de la, "El Inevitable Éxito de Una Niña Salvaje," in Vogue (Spain), August 1988.

Benaim, Laurence, "L'Ange Couturier," in Vogue (Paris), October 1988.

Cocks, Jay, "A Look on the Wild Side: Two Young Designers Liven Up a Groggy Fashion Scene," in Time, 16 January 1989.

"Deux Grands d'Espagne: Sybilla et Javier Valhonrat," in Jardin des Modes (Paris), 1–8 April 1989.

Brantley, Ben, "Spain's New Flame," in Vanity Fair, November 1989.

Naeto, Maite, "El Triunfo de Una Chica Precoz," in El País (Madrid), November 1989.

Armstrong, Lisa, "She's a Wizard of Aaahs," in Harper's Bazaar, August 1990.

Mower, Sarah, et al., "The Reign of Spain," in Metropolitan Home (New York), February 1991.

Oku, Emiko, "Sybilla's 77 Answers," in Ryuko Tsushin (Tokyo), February 1992.

Alvarado, Antonio, "Sybilla, ¡Jo, Cómo Mola!" in El Mundo magazine (Madrid), March 1994.

Weisman, Katherine, "Vuitton: A Quality Harvest," in WWD, 11 January 1996.

"Brand Newsline," in Euromarketing, 20 February 1998.

"Consumer Goods Euro," in MarkIntel, 1 April 2000.

Barker, Barbara, "Loewe Show in Madrid: Under the Big Top Sybilla: Lazarus," available online at Fashion Click, www.fashionclick.com, 5 October 2001.

"Candelabro," online at Cerebella, www.cerabell.com, 7 October 2001.

"Shopping Fashion Designers," online at Time Out, www.timeout.com, 7 October 2001.

"A Short Shopping Guide for Madrid, Spain," online at www.blackwhite.freeserve.co.uk, 7 October 2001.

*

I guess people try to dress up in a way that represents themselves. Somehow we all "paint" our skin with clothes, copying an inner image of ourselves. If you're able to get to this point, you can forget what you're wearing, you can overcome your own image.... At this moment the peace and serenity you show outside can be considered elegance.

—Sybilla

* * *

Sybilla has been widely acclaimed as the most exciting designer to have emerged from Spain since Balenciaga. She was born in 1963 in New York City, the daughter of an Argentine diplomat. Her mother was a Polish aristocrat who worked as a fashion designer under the name Countess Sybilla of Saks Fifth Avenue. When Sybilla was seven years old, her family moved to Madrid, and she considers herself thoroughly Spanish; her clothes, she has said are also very Spanish—"not olé, olé," but Spanish in the classical sense.

She served a brief apprenticeship in Paris at the couture atelier of Yves Saint Laurent, but recoiled at what she regarded as the “snobbish, cold, and professional” aspects of French fashion, saying, “Paris scares me. ‘Fashion’ is too serious. In Spain, you can still play.” Like filmmaker Pedro Almodovar, Sybilla is a member of the post-Franco generation that launched a creative explosion in the 1980s. “We were the first generation after Franco died, and we tried to be different and creative,” recalled Sybilla. With success came greater professionalism. In 1987 Italian fashion manufacturer Gibo began producing Sybilla’s clothes en masse in Italy.

At the end of the 1980s Sybilla became famous for creating what she called “weird and outrageous designs”—such as sculpted dresses with wired hems. But there is also a soft feeling to many of her clothes, which derives both from the colors (tobacco, pumpkin, pale green) and from a tendency toward biomorphic shapes. “The dresses of Sybilla remind you of when you were a child and your mother would tell you fairy stories,” commented Almodovar actress Rossy de Palma. “But in her dresses you live that, like a dream.”

Once the celebrity maga (sorceress) of the Movida, Sybilla withdrew from media-centered fashion for seven years, then returned in 1999 to a quiet alley off the ready-to-wear center of Madrid. For her new Noche line from her bridal and couture shop, she produced chic but subdued elephantine pants and free-form, easy-wear dresses. Stressing red, green, violet, blue, olive, champagne, black, and terracotta, she gowned her models in feminine sweeps of silken, gauzy layers above Minorcan platform sandals and wedgies. Fashion analyst Barbara Barker of Fashion Click quoted her statement of intent to make clothing “as easy to wear as pajamas.”

Selling largely in Japan with an eye to outlets throughout Spain, Sybilla kept before her the tastes and needs of Generations X and Y. The sculpted crêpes and silks for long and short ensembles expressed a womanly vulnerability beneath a quiet show of self-confidence. Her media extended from her own daywear, Louis Vuitton bags, and vases for Alessi to candles for Cerabella and film costumes for the Blanca Li ballet company. With a mounting interest in the home, she intended to encompass flatware, place settings, carpets and rugs, and lamps.

—Valerie Steele; updated by Mary Ellen Snodgrass

T

TAKADA, Kenzo

See KENZO

TAM, Vivienne

American designer

Born: Yin Yok Tam in Guangzhou, China, 1957. Education: Graduated from Hong Kong Polytechnic University; also studied in London. Career: Designer, New York, 1982; established East Wind Code, and designed first collection, 1982; designed Vivienne Tam signature collection, 1993; launched first collection under the East Wind Code label, 1994; designed controversial Mao collection, 1995; Mao collection subsequently incorporated into the permanent archives of the Andy Warhol Museum, Pittsburgh, PA, and Museum of FIT, New York; signed with Candie's to create line of spring shoes, 1996; opened New York store, 1997; signed exclusive licensing agreement with Itochu Corporation for distribution in Japan, 1998; announced plans for two freestanding stores in Japan, 1998; designed interior for the new Alero from Oldsmobile, 1999; opened Tokyo store, 2000. Awards: People Weekly's 50 Most Beautiful People, 1995; Outstanding Alumnus, Hong Kong Polytechnic University, 1997; nominated for Council of Fashion Designers of America Perry Ellis award, 1997. Address: 550 Seventh Avenue, New York, NY 10018, USA.

PUBLICATIONS

By TAM:

Books

China Chic, with Martha Huang, New York, 2000.

On TAM:

Books

Stegemeyer, Anne, Who's Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.

Articles

Gordon, Maryellen, "East Wind Code by Vivienne Tam," in WWD, 29 March 1993.

Eng, Victoria, "Vivienne Tam," in Asian Magazine, 31 March 1995.

Parnes, Frances, "Vivienne Tam's SoHo Splash," in WWD, 29 March 1996.

Pointer, Nandi, "A New Fashion Sensibility," in Asian Weekly, 13 August 1998.

Vivienne Tam, fall 2001 collection. © AP/Wide World Photos.

Ma, Fiona, and Heather Harlan, "Fusion Fashion," in Asian Weekly, 25 March 1999.

Harlan, Heather, "Y2K: A Fusion of Time & Place," in Asian Weekly, 7 October 1999.

_____, "Downtown Funky in New York City," in Asian Weekly, 29 September 2000.

Landler, Mark, "An Empire Built on China Chic," in the New York Times, 31 December 2000.

"Vivienne Tam Defines China Chic as Fashions with a Western Twist," in Associated Press, 6 January 2001.

* * *

By combining culture, classic style, and an offbeat flair to her fashion design, Vivienne Tam has become one of the 21st century's most unusual and successful contemporary designers. The key to her achievement is her ability to design with an eye for East meets West, an inspiration that comes from her current home, New York City, and her childhood home, Hong Kong. Bringing these cultural inspirations together in her designs, she is able to design clothing of traditional elements with a modern edge. Her collections are perceived with the idea that each person's personality will bring out different aspects from within each design.

Tam's success was preceded by a childhood of turmoil in China. In an effort to find a better life after the 1949 revolution and to rid themselves of the Communist political system, the Tam family moved to Hong Kong. At first, Tam stayed behind with her grandparents, but soon relocated to Hong Kong to be with her parents. She entered a Catholic school, where she became Vivienne Tam instead of her birth name, Yin Yok Tam. At age eight, she learned to sew by watching her parents stitch clothing. She remained with her parents until 1982, when she moved to New York. There, she hawked her designs from a duffel bag to Henri Bendel and a couple of the city's shops.

By the end of the 1980s Tam had created her own company, East Wind Code, and was designing in earnest. She gained acclaim and controversy with her early 1990s collections, including the notorious "Mao" collection where she and Chinese artist Zhang Hongtu added unusual touches to the former Chinese leader such as a bee on his nose or putting his hair in pigtails. Chinese customers were outraged; Americans found the t-shirts and jackets amusing and the height of fashion.

Tam's collections in the late 1990s were lively and awash in color, often mixing religious symbolism with Asian art, silver, red, and beautiful embroidery becoming her trademarks. With her spring 2001 collection, aptly titled the Year of the Dragon, came varied images of dragons adorning the clothes, clearly portraying her Asian inspiration. During the fashion show, "Birdsong" played as the models glided down the runway in embroidered fabrics, again in bright color combinations. Susan Redstone, writing for the online fashion site FashionWindows, applauded the "the exotic fringed mint pointelle camisole and dress" paired with "a lime silk eyelet skirt," as well as the "chartreuse metallic halter tee and turquoise sequin dragon embroidered skirt."

In an interview with Heather Harlan from Asian Weekly about her spring 2001 collection, Tam told her, "Many of the prints and patterns in the collection are the result of the views from my terrace [in New York City]. I love watching the light shimmering as it plays with the architectural corners and angles of buildings against a grey and bluish evening sky." The results included a Chrysler building-inspired black and white print dress, sequined skirts mimicking city lights sparkling in the darkness, and a pink metallic dress Redstone likened to "sidewalks glittering under the pink glow of street lamps." The collection also artfully mixed hard and soft, uptown and downtown, grunge and glamor, black and stunning color. Tam and several fashionistas designated blue as the new black for their spring collections.

Tam's unique talent for bringing Asian and American culture together in fashion attracts many to her East Wind Code (meaning good fortune and prosperity) shops in New York, Los Angeles, Japan, and Hong Kong. Clients who admire her elegant, unconventional style include movie stars and musicians, such as Alanis Morissette, Vivienne Tam, fall 2001 collection. © AP/Wide World Photos.

Bjork, Britney Spears, Fiona Apple, Lauryn Hill, Madonna, Neve Campbell, Sandra Bullock, and Julia Roberts. Roberts commented to People Weekly in November 1998, "Tam's clothes are the perfect balance of being simple but also unique."

At the New York SoHo store, with the help of a feng shui master, Tam recreated her Chinese heritage for a distinctly Asian atmosphere, though with Western touches. The Chinese character of double happiness dominates the shop, along with Fu dogs, Ming chairs, an antique carved screen, and a "red" wall. Red, as one of Tam's favorite colors, features heavily in her décor and her designs. Zany, imaginative clothing adorned with Mao, buddhas, dragons, peonies, or mums combined with shimmering metallic or black fabrics and sequins epitomize Tam's style. The prints and characters mark a spiritual journey, one that has made Tam an accomplished trendsetter for bicultural fashion design.

For those seeking insight into Tam's life and inspiration, she wrote a book with Martha Huang entitled China Chic. Published in 2000 by Regan Books, the red coffee-table styled hardcover is full of illustrations, photographs, and Tam's brand of East-meets-West wisdom. To promote the book, Tam took over the Luk Yu Tea House in Hong Kong, and invited both Eastern and Western luminaries. "People think this book is about my fashion, but it's not," Tam told Mark Landler of the New York Times in December 2000. "It's about all the things I love: furniture, gardens, spirituality, the body, health, city life." The world of designer and author Vivienne Tam, like her book, is far reaching and filled with the union of Eastern wisdom and Western synergy.

—Kimbally A. Medeiros and Sydonie Benét

TAMOTSU

Japanese fashion designer

Born: Tokyo, Japan, 29 July 1945. Education: Kuwazawa Design School, Tokyo; Fashion Institute of Technology, New York City, 1960s. Career: Fabric designer, Itida, 1960s; pattern maker, Norma Kamali, mid-1960s; sewer, Karl Lagerfeld, mid-1960s; designer for Ann Taylor, 1980s; designer, Vogue pattern company, 1987; introduced the Hana line, 1999. Awards: D.I.V.A. (Design Impact Vision Atlanta) Bridge Designer of the Year award, Atlanta Apparel Mart, 1997. Address: 214 West 39th Street, Suite 305, New York, NY 10018 U.S.A. Website: www.tamotsu.com.

PUBLICATIONS

On TAMOTSU:

Books

Stegemeyer, Anne, Who's Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.

Articles

- Perman, Stacy, "Stores Set to Scout Fall," in WWD, 7 February 1994.
 Wiltz, Teresa, "Plus No Longer a Minus," in the Chicago Tribune, 23 March 1997.
 Foderaro, Lisa W., "Made in New York is Coming Back Into Fashion," in the New York Times, 13 January 1998.
 Swartz, Nikki, "Big is Beautiful for Tamotsu: New York-Based Manufacturer Finds Niche in Plus-Size," in Apparel Industry Magazine, 1 February 1998.
 "She Says Tamotsu," in WWD, 29 December 1998.
 Donovan, Carrie, "Carry On, Carrie," in the New York Times, 17 January 1999.
 Stein, Jeannine, "Fashion Police; Spots Where Petite or Tall is a Plus," in the Los Angeles Times, 25 June 1999.
 "Market Basket," in WWD, 12 October 1999.
 Bellafante, Ginia, "Fashion Meets Politics," in the New York Times, 29 February 2000.
 Buccoloz, Barbara, "Dressing Down Businesses Favor Substance Over Style," in the Chicago Tribune, 31 December 2000.
 Kleinman, Rebecca, "Size Matters; Manufacturers and Retailers are Finally Taking Notice of Two Long-Overlooked Categories: Pluses and Petites," in WWD, 7 June 2001.
 Barr, Vilma, "The Lucrative Plus-Size Market," in Display & Design Ideas, July 2001.
 "Designs on Success," available online at Small Business Opportunities, www.sbmag.com, 12 November 2001.

Gold, Donna, "An Elegant Spirit: Tamotsu," and "Tamotsu: The Spirit of Understatement," online at Tamotsu, www.tamotsu.com, November 2001.

* * *

In a fashion world overwhelmed by sylphs in bikinis, wrap skirts, and capri pants, Tamotsu is the one holdout, the designer who envisions consistently polished, wearable garments for a variety of female shapes. From the pursuit of a growing niche market share in pluses, talls, and misses, his vision, which he calls "The Elegance of Understatement," is gaining acceptance in more department stores, including Saks Fifth Avenue, Bloomingdale's, Harrods, House of Fraser, Jacobson's, Marshall Fields, Neiman Marcus, and Nordstrom. Tamotsu's sales manager Ellen Mullman explained to Women's Wear Daily fashion reporter Rebecca Kleinman, the concept was "not to make clothes for big people, but just to make clothes." Tamotsu's timeless, U.S.-sewn designs in gentle, body-flattering fabrics have found champions in Senator Hillary Clinton, television hostess Joan Lunden, and actresses Rosie O'Donnell, Star Jones, and Camryn Manheim, who have modeled dresses and suits for the company.

A native of Japan and graduate of Tokyo's Kuwazawa Design School, Tamotsu designed for Itida, the nation's prime fabric manufacturer. After a visit to New York, he took up permanent residence in a small West Side New York apartment in the 1960s. He studied at the Fashion Institute of Technology while earning a living freelancing in the fashion industry. By day, he made patterns for designer Norma Kamali; in the evening, he sewed uniforms for Karl Lagerfeld.

Tamotsu got his start as a private-label couturier late in the 1960s while stitching up jumpsuits to order for friends. To introduce his designs, he let the clothes speak for themselves. Late in the 1970s, a retailer saw someone wearing one of Tamotsu's simple, elegant suits and placed an order. Advanced from one sewing machine, the operation rapidly needed a pattern maker, cutter, seamstresses, sales staff, and office. To ensure quality, Tamotsu hired employees but monitored each production stage. In the 1980s Ann Taylor swamped his small firm with orders for as many coats as his staff could produce. By 1987 he became the top designer of the Vogue Pattern Company's wardrobe division and an alumnus of the Fashion Institute of Technology, for which he has served as a mentor.

Tamotsu's influence on the market grew from customer loyalty. In October 1997, Southeastern retailers voted him the Atlanta Apparel Mart's D.I.V.A. (Design Impact Vision Atlanta) Bridge Designer of the Year award. By the following year the Tamotsu label grew into a $16-million enterprise in suits, rain coats, careerwear, dresses, dress slacks, and sportswear sized 4 to 22. To meet demand, he assembled a close-knit staff of 200 to complete 10,000 to 15,000 garments per month in up to 40 styles.

Untrendy and uninterested in fashion buzz, Tamotsu focused on neutral tones as well as the red, navy, and black that suited urban needs. Introducing four to eight pieces each month, he reduced length, hem, and sleeves from standard sizes to fit women with high waistlines and short strides. Most appreciative of his unfussy basics were large women and petite larger women, ones the toasty designers had long ignored.

In business terms, Tamotsu targeted buyers wearing size 14 and above, who make up 60 percent of clothing purchases. To flatter a range of body sizes, he chose Italian viscose acetate for its fluidity, as well as imported silks, cottons, and wool blends for quality and durability. For spring 1998, he created "wedding cake" pieces, think this book is about my fashion, but it's not," Tam told Mark Landler of the New York Times in December 2000. "It's about all the things I love: furniture, gardens, spirituality, the body, health, city life." The world of designer and author Vivienne Tam, like her book, is far reaching and filled with the union of Eastern wisdom and Western synergy.

—Kimbally A. Medeiros and Sydonie Benét

TAMOTSU

Japanese fashion designer

Born: Tokyo, Japan, 29 July 1945. Education: Kuwazawa Design School, Tokyo; Fashion Institute of Technology, New York City, 1960s. Career: Fabric designer, Itida, 1960s; pattern maker, Norma Kamali, mid-1960s; sewer, Karl Lagerfeld, mid-1960s; designer for Ann Taylor, 1980s; designer, Vogue pattern company, 1987; introduced the Hana line, 1999. Awards: D.I.V.A. (Design Impact Vision Atlanta) Bridge Designer of the Year award, Atlanta Apparel Mart, 1997. Address: 214 West 39th Street, Suite 305, New York, NY 10018 U.S.A. Website: www.tamotsu.com.

PUBLICATIONS

On TAMOTSU:

Books

Stegemeyer, Anne, Who's Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.

Articles

- Perman, Stacy, "Stores Set to Scout Fall," in WWD, 7 February 1994.
 Wiltz, Teresa, "Plus No Longer a Minus," in the Chicago Tribune, 23 March 1997.
 Foderaro, Lisa W., "Made in New York is Coming Back Into Fashion," in the New York Times, 13 January 1998.
 Swartz, Nikki, "Big is Beautiful for Tamotsu: New York-Based Manufacturer Finds Niche in Plus-Size," in Apparel Industry Magazine, 1 February 1998.
 "She Says Tamotsu," in WWD, 29 December 1998.
 Donovan, Carrie, "Carry On, Carrie," in the New York Times, 17 January 1999.
 Stein, Jeannine, "Fashion Police; Spots Where Petite or Tall is a Plus," in the Los Angeles Times, 25 June 1999.
 "Market Basket," in WWD, 12 October 1999.
 Bellafante, Ginia, "Fashion Meets Politics," in the New York Times, 29 February 2000.
 Buccoloz, Barbara, "Dressing Down Businesses Favor Substance Over Style," in the Chicago Tribune, 31 December 2000.
 Kleinman, Rebecca, "Size Matters; Manufacturers and Retailers are Finally Taking Notice of Two Long-Overlooked Categories: Pluses and Petites," in WWD, 7 June 2001.
 Barr, Vilma, "The Lucrative Plus-Size Market," in Display & Design Ideas, July 2001.
 "Designs on Success," available online at Small Business Opportunities, www.sbmag.com, 12 November 2001.

Gold, Donna, "An Elegant Spirit: Tamotsu," and "Tamotsu: The Spirit of Understatement," online at Tamotsu, www.tamotsu.com, November 2001.

* * *

In a fashion world overwhelmed by sylphs in bikinis, wrap skirts, and capri pants, Tamotsu is the one holdout, the designer who envisions consistently polished, wearable garments for a variety of female shapes. From the pursuit of a growing niche market share in pluses, talls, and misses, his vision, which he calls "The Elegance of Understatement," is gaining acceptance in more department stores, including Saks Fifth Avenue, Bloomingdale's, Harrods, House of Fraser, Jacobson's, Marshall Fields, Neiman Marcus, and Nordstrom. Tamotsu's sales manager Ellen Mullman explained to Women's Wear Daily fashion reporter Rebecca Kleinman, the concept was "not to make clothes for big people, but just to make clothes." Tamotsu's timeless, U.S.-sewn designs in gentle, body-flattering fabrics have found champions in Senator Hillary Clinton, television hostess Joan Lunden, and actresses Rosie O'Donnell, Star Jones, and Camryn Manheim, who have modeled dresses and suits for the company.

A native of Japan and graduate of Tokyo's Kuwazawa Design School, Tamotsu designed for Itida, the nation's prime fabric manufacturer. After a visit to New York, he took up permanent residence in a small West Side New York apartment in the 1960s. He studied at the Fashion Institute of Technology while earning a living freelancing in the fashion industry. By day, he made patterns for designer Norma Kamali; in the evening, he sewed uniforms for Karl Lagerfeld.

Tamotsu got his start as a private-label couturier late in the 1960s while stitching up jumpsuits to order for friends. To introduce his designs, he let the clothes speak for themselves. Late in the 1970s, a retailer saw someone wearing one of Tamotsu's simple, elegant suits and placed an order. Advanced from one sewing machine, the operation rapidly needed a pattern maker, cutter, seamstresses, sales staff, and office. To ensure quality, Tamotsu hired employees but monitored each production stage. In the 1980s Ann Taylor swamped his small firm with orders for as many coats as his staff could produce. By 1987 he became the top designer of the Vogue Pattern Company's wardrobe division and an alumnus of the Fashion Institute of Technology, for which he has served as a mentor.

Tamotsu's influence on the market grew from customer loyalty. In October 1997, Southeastern retailers voted him the Atlanta Apparel Mart's D.I.V.A. (Design Impact Vision Atlanta) Bridge Designer of the Year award. By the following year the Tamotsu label grew into a $16-million enterprise in suits, rain coats, careerwear, dresses, dress slacks, and sportswear sized 4 to 22. To meet demand, he assembled a close-knit staff of 200 to complete 10,000 to 15,000 garments per month in up to 40 styles.

Untrendy and uninterested in fashion buzz, Tamotsu focused on neutral tones as well as the red, navy, and black that suited urban needs. Introducing four to eight pieces each month, he reduced length, hem, and sleeves from standard sizes to fit women with high waistlines and short strides. Most appreciative of his unfussy basics were large women and petite larger women, ones the toasty designers had long ignored.

In business terms, Tamotsu targeted buyers wearing size 14 and above, who make up 60 percent of clothing purchases. To flatter a range of body sizes, he chose Italian viscose acetate for its fluidity, as well as imported silks, cottons, and wool blends for quality and durability. For spring 1998, he created "wedding cake" pieces, textured rayon acetate garments in soft praline, cream, caramel, and oyster. Comfortable and functional, the basic pieces harmonized classic lines that suited career and social occasions.

Tamotsu's company has earned respect for consistency and quality, which he maintains through carefully controlled growth. He respects employees, a tight coterie who think of themselves as family. The staff work out problems jointly, including times when the designer is not present to guide them. To Small Business Opportunities, he remarked, "I don't ask them too many questions as long as they are doing business." Generous and unpretentious, he distributes bonuses unexpectedly and is so devoted to his workers that he flew them to Hawaii to visit his new house.

In mid-1999 Tamotsu perked up his image with more vibrant color, more variety, and a younger, more playful silhouette. He took his cue from his customers, who indicated an interest in relaxed clothes, he embellished without compromising texture and comfort. Without alienating faithful clients, he enhanced his Tamotsu line to include a second tier called Hana, a washable, long-lived collection made from tencel, nylon, and Lycra in black and ivory. The line bore the name of his cat, who he called by the Japanese word for flower. The decision to update Tamotsu's sell-out clothing collection required his usual caution. He told fashion writer Donna Gold his philosophy of change: "In the past I would try different things, but the fans didn't always accept them. Now they are giving me more freedom to experiment, and I'm very happy about that. It gives me the opportunity to discover something new, something different."

Design was only the beginning of Tamotsu's innovations. To his staff, he added Steve Jacobson as Chicago sales representative. Tamotsu increased his outreach by plotting an August ad campaign for the New York Times Magazine, Mode, Town & Country, and Harper's Bazaar. He field-tested designs for Saks at stores in Louisiana, Massachusetts, Michigan, Missouri, New York, Texas, and Virginia and sent in-house teams to educate sales staffs on fitting the "Tamotsu woman." The initial outlay of $1 million also covered trade show promotions, two color brochures, and an appealing and informative company website.

Overall, Tamotsu's career has flourished from a steady balance of familiar, enduring garment shapes in minimalist style with a hint of newness and adventure. To Small Business Opportunities magazine he confided one of the joys of popular success: "Sometimes I see people wearing my designs of 10 years ago. They still look good—I like that." He also explained his method of selecting materials, "I have a good eye; I know fabric and I look very quickly. I catch the little things people miss."

Tamotsu has summarized his business style: he began with simple, understated elegance and based his business on fabrics and designs he liked; over decades, he built a one-owner empire to suit the large female shopper; valued staff and customer loyalty and shared proceeds with his staff; chose his niche and made it a reality by developing a home business into a fabled element of the clothing world. Unconventional in managerial style and principle, he has disdained corporate hierarchy and has remained honest and responsible about paying bills, avoids incurring debt, and keeps his word.

Essential to the Tamotsu business paradigm is another element—knowing how much he needs. The control of his operation stems from his attitude toward money. In February 2000, Nikki Swartz of Apparel Industry Magazine quoted Tamotsu's haiku-like thoughts on self-enrichment: "I ask myself, 'How much do I need?' not, 'What more can I get?'"

—Mary Ellen Snodgrass

TANG, William

Chinese designer

Born: Hong Kong. Education: Graduated in Economics and Business, University of Guelph, Canada; studied fashion design, London School of Fashion. Career: Returned to Hong Kong, 1982, to design for a number of labels, including Sahara Club, Michel René, and Daniel Hechter; opened own company, W. Tang Co. Ltd., 1985, designing womenswear and menswear; labels include William Tang, and W by William Tang; opened Paris boutique, Presence II; generated controversy for drug-themed runway show, 1997; created uniforms for Hong Kong's Miramar Hotel, 1997; designed uniforms for Dragonair Airlines, 2000; created interior designs for Villa by the Park, Hong Kong housing development, 2001. Address: Flat E, Upper Ground Floor, 14/16 Aberdeen St. Central, Hong Kong, China.

William Tang, fall 2000 collection. © AFP/CORBIS.

textured rayon acetate garments in soft praline, cream, caramel, and oyster. Comfortable and functional, the basic pieces harmonized classic lines that suited career and social occasions.

Tamotsu's company has earned respect for consistency and quality, which he maintains through carefully controlled growth. He respects employees, a tight coterie who think of themselves as family. The staff work out problems jointly, including times when the designer is not present to guide them. To Small Business Opportunities, he remarked, "I don't ask them too many questions as long as they are doing business." Generous and unpretentious, he distributes bonuses unexpectedly and is so devoted to his workers that he flew them to Hawaii to visit his new house.

In mid-1999 Tamotsu perked up his image with more vibrant color, more variety, and a younger, more playful silhouette. He took his cue from his customers, who indicated an interest in relaxed clothes, he embellished without compromising texture and comfort. Without alienating faithful clients, he enhanced his Tamotsu line to include a second tier called Hana, a washable, long-lived collection made from tencel, nylon, and Lycra in black and ivory. The line bore the name of his cat, who he called by the Japanese word for flower. The decision to update Tamotsu's sell-out clothing collection required his usual caution. He told fashion writer Donna Gold his philosophy of change: "In the past I would try different things, but the fans didn't always accept them. Now they are giving me more freedom to experiment, and I'm very happy about that. It gives me the opportunity to discover something new, something different."

Design was only the beginning of Tamotsu's innovations. To his staff, he added Steve Jacobson as Chicago sales representative. Tamotsu increased his outreach by plotting an August ad campaign for the New York Times Magazine, Mode, Town & Country, and Harper's Bazaar. He field-tested designs for Saks at stores in Louisiana, Massachusetts, Michigan, Missouri, New York, Texas, and Virginia and sent in-house teams to educate sales staffs on fitting the "Tamotsu woman." The initial outlay of $1 million also covered trade show promotions, two color brochures, and an appealing and informative company website.

Overall, Tamotsu's career has flourished from a steady balance of familiar, enduring garment shapes in minimalist style with a hint of newness and adventure. To Small Business Opportunities magazine he confided one of the joys of popular success: "Sometimes I see people wearing my designs of 10 years ago. They still look good—I like that." He also explained his method of selecting materials, "I have a good eye; I know fabric and I look very quickly. I catch the little things people miss."

Tamotsu has summarized his business style: he began with simple, understated elegance and based his business on fabrics and designs he liked; over decades, he built a one-owner empire to suit the large female shopper; valued staff and customer loyalty and shared proceeds with his staff; chose his niche and made it a reality by developing a home business into a fabled element of the clothing world. Unconventional in managerial style and principle, he has disdained corporate hierarchy and has remained honest and responsible about paying bills, avoids incurring debt, and keeps his word.

Essential to the Tamotsu business paradigm is another element—knowing how much he needs. The control of his operation stems from his attitude toward money. In February 2000, Nikki Swartz of Apparel Industry Magazine quoted Tamotsu's haiku-like thoughts on self-enrichment: "I ask myself, 'How much do I need?' not, 'What more can I get?'"

—Mary Ellen Snodgrass

TANG, William

Chinese designer

Born: Hong Kong. Education: Graduated in Economics and Business, University of Guelph, Canada; studied fashion design, London School of Fashion. Career: Returned to Hong Kong, 1982, to design for a number of labels, including Sahara Club, Michel René, and Daniel Hechter; opened own company, W. Tang Co. Ltd., 1985, designing womenswear and menswear; labels include William Tang, and W by William Tang; opened Paris boutique, Presence II; generated controversy for drug-themed runway show, 1997; created uniforms for Hong Kong's Miramar Hotel, 1997; designed uniforms for Dragonair Airlines, 2000; created interior designs for Villa by the Park, Hong Kong housing development, 2001. Address: Flat E, Upper Ground Floor, 14/16 Aberdeen St. Central, Hong Kong, China.

William Tang, fall 2000 collection. © AFP/CORBIS.

PUBLICATIONS

On TANG:

Articles

- Marshall, Samantha, "Shenzhen: A Look across the China Border," in DNR, 10 January 1994.
- Farley, Maggie, "Another Kind of Streetwear," in the Los Angeles Times, 1 May 1997.
- Seno Alexandra, "People: Hong Kong Designer Redefines High Fashion," in Asia Week, 1 August 1997.
- Cheng, Scarlet, "Dressed to Kill," in the Far Eastern Economic Review, 4 September 1997.
- "Dragonair Enters the Tang Dynasty," in Inflight Asia, October 2000.
- "SHKP Recruits Famous Fashion Designer William Tang," in Sun Hung Kai Properties press release, 2 May 2001.

*

Fashion itself is an art form that moves and lives with the human body. The fashion business is also art, a form that is based on creative ideas where various commercial aspects are taken into consideration.

—William Tang

* * *

Known as the bad boy of Hong Kong fashion, William Tang has never been one to take the conventional route. After studying economics and business and then hotel management, he decided on a career in fashion. He wanted to further develop his interest in the arts, and the choice was between fashion and architecture. To him, fashion seemed closer to the fine arts and fulfilled his childhood love of drawing people. His arrival in London as a fashion student coincided with the style era of the New Romantics. Tang was in tune with their retro brand of flamboyance and glamor.

History and culture have been very important to Tang's work. In Western art and design, his particular interests have included art déco and Georgia O'Keefe. The Mediterranean has been his greatest geographical influence: he holds a special place for Venice, and ancient Greece and Egypt. Tang revived the unique technique of fine pleating originated by Mariano Fortuny to create elegant shift dresses inspired by the ancient Greek chiton. For Tang, fashion must be a means of expression, not purely concerned with commercialism. Artistic and personal fulfillment have been his major lifetime goals.

Tang has always gone his own way. Never sticking to one look, he prefers to experiment and innovate. But he has a practical side; his business education provided a sound base for the more pragmatic aspect of fashion. W by William Tang and William Tang are his two of his retail labels in Asia, where he sells through major department stores, including the Japanese Seibu and Daimaru. He has worked with the Betu Company in Hong Kong and with Seibu to produce contemporary silk collections aimed at the Japanese and Taiwanese markets. He also opened his own workshop in his home base of Hong Kong and operated a shop, Presence II, in Paris. Another shop was opening in Hong Kong's fashionable Lan Kwai Fong area. His aim is to encompass the extent of his creativity, including individual couture designs, contemporary daywear, and also his paintings.

William Tang, fall/winter 2001 collection: man's hooded full-length gown. © AP/Wide World Photos.

Tang's enthusiasms fuel his work. He reinterpreted clothes photographed by Man Ray to coincide with an exhibition of the artist's work. He has awakened others to the significance of fashion through his designs, lectures, books, and articles and his collections have echoed his knowledge of Chinese history and culture. Shanghai in the 1930s inspired a shocking pink cheong-sam dress, trimmed with ostrich feathers and worn with platform shoes, which stunned the catwalks of Hong Kong. Exquisite lace eveningwear, created from fabric handcrafted in the Shandong Province of China, was declared the triumph of the 1989 Hong Kong Fashion Week. As evidence of his diversity, the following year he showed tie-dyed coordinates topped with overvests and leggings made from rubber bands.

Tang's versatile young look is not as well known as many of his contemporaries. Insufficient financial backing and the need for better promotion have proved hurdles to wider recognition, yet Tang is relaxed about the future. He enjoys his work too much to be concerned about what lies ahead. He has been accused of "stirring things up on the Hong Kong fashion scene" by frequently playing the wild card. But Tang knows his business; he knows "good fashion should be a combination of artistic ideals and expression and the commercial process involved in producing a line of clothes that will sell well." In Hong Kong he has long been a darling of the press. His personality and presence set him apart from some of his older and more reserved contemporaries, but Tang is no mere showman. His work is lively, fresh, and worthy of greater recognition.

Tang, in the 21st century, is still one of the best-known designers in Hong Kong and Asia, but his distribution is limited primarily to China, Southeast Asia, Australia, and Europe. He has not yet broken into key markets such as Japan or the United States in a significant way, either with his proprietary William Tang and Chi Chi labels or with his products for Tienlan, where he serves as design director. His collections are popular in Asia and increasingly commercial, although he manages to solidify his "bad boy" reputation with some attention-attracting designs.

Tang continues to be inspired by the art and people of the streets, for example incorporating calligraphic graffiti (by a renowned Hong Kong street artist) into fabrics highlighted in a collection. He also holds shows in malls and housing projects, in an effort to bring his fashion "to the streets." Tang talks to Hong Kong's homeless about how they dress, and sometimes incorporates their ideas into his collections. "These people are truly original," he told the Los Angeles Times in May 1997. "The rest of us only care about how others look at us, but they don't care what people think. They dress only for themselves."

His controversial fall 1997 collection took the street images too far for some critics. It featured models poking themselves with syringes, which led observers to accuse him of promoting "heroin chic." To Asia Week, Tang argued that the theatrics were intended to show drug use as what he called "a deformed lifestyle."

Aside from his work in design, the well-rounded Tang is a short story author and a travel, culture, and fashion writer for a number of newspapers and magazines in Hong Kong, as well as the host of a television program. He even considered retiring from fashion in the late 1990s but ultimately decided to continue. Much of his revenue comes from large-scale custom work such as uniforms and interior designs for organizations such as the Hong Kong airport, the Miramar Hotel, IBA Bank, a housing development, and Hong Kong Dragon Aviation (Dragonair).

Tang combines East and West, ancient and modern. He can take styles from Chinese peasant villagers of the past and recreate them in Day-Glo colors, or fashion cheong-sams with a modern, sexy flair. His collections walk the line between the avant-garde and the commercially acceptable.

—Hazel Clark; updated by Karen Raugust

TARABINI, Gianpaolo

See BLUMARINE

TASSELL, Gustave

American designer

Born: Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, 4 February 1926. Education: Studied at Pennsylvania Academy of Fine Arts. Military Service:

Served in the U.S. Army. Career: Joined Hattie Carnegie, late 1940s, as window-dresser, later designer; designer, Elfreda Fox; designed custom clothes, Philadelphia; sketch artist for Mme. Fath and freelance sketch artist, Paris, 1952–54; designer, Hattie Carnegie fashion house, New York, 1954–55; managed own design firm, Los Angeles, 1956–72; took over design at Norman Norell, New York, after death of Norell, 1972–76; designer, Michael Forrest Furs, 1976; reestablished own firm, from 1976. Awards: International Silk Association award, 1959; Coty American Fashion Critics award, 1961; Cotton Council Fashion award, 1963.

PUBLICATIONS

On TASSELL:

Books

- Levin, Phyllis Lee, The Wheels of Fashion, Garden City, New York, 1956.
 Lambert, Eleanor, World of Fashion: People, Places, Resources, New York, 1976.
 Morris, Bernadine, and Barbara Walz, The Fashion Makers, New York, 1978.
 Milbank, Caroline Rennolds, New York Fashion: The Evolution of American Style, New York, 1989.
 Stegemeyer, Anne, Who's Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.

Articles

- Fashion profile, in Holiday, June 1962.
 Several articles in the New York Times, 24 January 1974, 6 August 1974, 8 August 1975, 12 July 1976.
 Houser, Dave G., "The Attic Spirit; Gustave Tassell's Paean to Greece in Los Angeles," in Architectural Digest, September 1983.

* * *

White gloves and pearls were the accessories one needs to wear with the refined, graceful designs of American Gustave Tassell. He designed for women who had a built-in serenity and who were not out to shock. His designs went beyond fringe and ruffle and were noted for their sense of proportion, simplicity of line, and refined detail.

Among the notable people who have worn Tassell designs were Princess Grace of Monaco and Jacqueline Kennedy Onassis—especially the latter who very influential in the fashion field when she was First Lady of the United States. She wore simple clothes, favoring sleeveless dresses without a defined waistline or much detail. Tassell's creations were perfect for the First Lady; they were youthful, elegant, without unnecessary details or defined waistlines. They would glide over the body rather than hugging it, his designs were elegant and easy to wear.

Tassell had a New York showroom, but the base of his operation was in Los Angeles. There he maintained a small organization and workroom which insured top notch quality at relatively low cost. He did not produce the extremes of fashion. In Holiday magazine (June 1962) he said "forget fashion, you can't go around startling people all the time." Fabrics were important, peau d'ange and quilted cotton damask added interest; bugle beads were used, in an understated manner, for eveningwear.

commercial process involved in producing a line of clothes that will sell well." In Hong Kong he has long been a darling of the press. His personality and presence set him apart from some of his older and more reserved contemporaries, but Tang is no mere showman. His work is lively, fresh, and worthy of greater recognition.

Tang, in the 21st century, is still one of the best-known designers in Hong Kong and Asia, but his distribution is limited primarily to China, Southeast Asia, Australia, and Europe. He has not yet broken into key markets such as Japan or the United States in a significant way, either with his proprietary William Tang and Chi Chi labels or with his products for Tienlan, where he serves as design director. His collections are popular in Asia and increasingly commercial, although he manages to solidify his "bad boy" reputation with some attention-attracting designs.

Tang continues to be inspired by the art and people of the streets, for example incorporating calligraphic graffiti (by a renowned Hong Kong street artist) into fabrics highlighted in a collection. He also holds shows in malls and housing projects, in an effort to bring his fashion "to the streets." Tang talks to Hong Kong's homeless about how they dress, and sometimes incorporates their ideas into his collections. "These people are truly original," he told the Los Angeles Times in May 1997. "The rest of us only care about how others look at us, but they don't care what people think. They dress only for themselves."

His controversial fall 1997 collection took the street images too far for some critics. It featured models poking themselves with syringes, which led observers to accuse him of promoting "heroin chic." To Asia Week, Tang argued that the theatrics were intended to show drug use as what he called "a deformed lifestyle."

Aside from his work in design, the well-rounded Tang is a short story author and a travel, culture, and fashion writer for a number of newspapers and magazines in Hong Kong, as well as the host of a television program. He even considered retiring from fashion in the late 1990s but ultimately decided to continue. Much of his revenue comes from large-scale custom work such as uniforms and interior designs for organizations such as the Hong Kong airport, the Miramar Hotel, IBA Bank, a housing development, and Hong Kong Dragon Aviation (Dragonair).

Tang combines East and West, ancient and modern. He can take styles from Chinese peasant villagers of the past and recreate them in Day-Glo colors, or fashion cheong-sams with a modern, sexy flair. His collections walk the line between the avant-garde and the commercially acceptable.

—Hazel Clark; updated by Karen Raugust

TARABINI, Gianpaolo

See BLUMARINE

TASSELL, Gustave

American designer

Born: Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, 4 February 1926. Education: Studied at Pennsylvania Academy of Fine Arts. Military Service:

Served in the U.S. Army. Career: Joined Hattie Carnegie, late 1940s, as window-dresser, later designer; designer, Elfreda Fox; designed custom clothes, Philadelphia; sketch artist for Mme. Fath and freelance sketch artist, Paris, 1952–54; designer, Hattie Carnegie fashion house, New York, 1954–55; managed own design firm, Los Angeles, 1956–72; took over design at Norman Norell, New York, after death of Norell, 1972–76; designer, Michael Forrest Furs, 1976; reestablished own firm, from 1976. Awards: International Silk Association award, 1959; Coty American Fashion Critics award, 1961; Cotton Council Fashion award, 1963.

PUBLICATIONS

On TASSELL:

Books

- Levin, Phyllis Lee, The Wheels of Fashion, Garden City, New York, 1956.
 Lambert, Eleanor, World of Fashion: People, Places, Resources, New York, 1976.
 Morris, Bernadine, and Barbara Walz, The Fashion Makers, New York, 1978.
 Milbank, Caroline Rennolds, New York Fashion: The Evolution of American Style, New York, 1989.
 Stegemeyer, Anne, Who's Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.

Articles

- Fashion profile, in Holiday, June 1962.
 Several articles in the New York Times, 24 January 1974, 6 August 1974, 8 August 1975, 12 July 1976.
 Houser, Dave G., "The Attic Spirit; Gustave Tassell's Paean to Greece in Los Angeles," in Architectural Digest, September 1983.

* * *

White gloves and pearls were the accessories one needs to wear with the refined, graceful designs of American Gustave Tassell. He designed for women who had a built-in serenity and who were not out to shock. His designs went beyond fringe and ruffle and were noted for their sense of proportion, simplicity of line, and refined detail.

Among the notable people who have worn Tassell designs were Princess Grace of Monaco and Jacqueline Kennedy Onassis—especially the latter who very influential in the fashion field when she was First Lady of the United States. She wore simple clothes, favoring sleeveless dresses without a defined waistline or much detail. Tassell's creations were perfect for the First Lady; they were youthful, elegant, without unnecessary details or defined waistlines. They would glide over the body rather than hugging it, his designs were elegant and easy to wear.

Tassell had a New York showroom, but the base of his operation was in Los Angeles. There he maintained a small organization and workroom which insured top notch quality at relatively low cost. He did not produce the extremes of fashion. In Holiday magazine (June 1962) he said "forget fashion, you can't go around startling people all the time." Fabrics were important, peau d'ange and quilted cotton damask added interest; bugle beads were used, in an understated manner, for eveningwear.

Through the use of seams, tucks, and gathers, Tassell was able to create sculptural forms which skimmed over the body, rather than a tight fit. The look was graceful and feminine. Skirts could be bell shaped, or gathered gently. The seams of a princess-style dress curved to suggest the bust and waistline. He designed clothes for both evening and daytime wear—separates, dresses, and coats. He designed versions of the black dinner dress, the shirtwaist, culottes, and the reefer coat. His interpretation was always graceful and feminine. In 1961 he received the Coty American Fashion Critics award.

Tassell did not start out to be a fashion designer, but studied painting at the Pennsylvania Academy of Fine Arts. Moving to New York, he worked in the advertising and display department for Hattie Carnegie, who was well known in the fashion design world for both custom-made and ready-to-wear clothes. Seeing the design work of Norman Norell inspired Tassell's decision to create clothes for women.

In the early 1950s Tassell moved to Europe where he did fashion sketches for Geneviève Fath and became acquainted with American designer James Galanos. It was through the encouragement of Galanos that Tassell eventually began his own business in 1956 in California, though the designs Tassell produced were closer in concept to those of Norell than Galanos. In 1972, when Norman Norell died, Tassell was asked to come to New York to maintain the line. He did this under the name House of Norell, Gustave Tassell. The Norman Norell line was permanently closed in 1976 and Tassell returned to California where he again turned out his sophisticated designs for a small group of customers.

Tassell's design sensibility changed little from the 20 to the 21st century—he sought to create forward-looking fashion appropriate for elegant, confident women. He envisioned designs in natural fibers able to serve many purposes, with changing silhouette according to how the garment was buttoned, seamed, or tucked. Tassell aimed to produce affordable clothing with a sense of proportion, grace, and design.

—Nancy House

THOMASS, Chantal

French designer

Born: Chantal Genty in Malakoff, Seine, France, 4 September 1947.
Family: Married Bruce Thomass, 1967; children: Louise, Robin.
Career: Freelance designer selling to Dorothée Bis, 1966–71; partner, Ter et Bantine boutique, Paris, 1967, renamed Chantal Thomass, 1975; introduced lingerie and hosiery collections, 1975, maternity wear, 1981, children's clothing line, from circa 1982; signed partnership with World Co. for distribution, licensing, and boutiques in Japan, 1985; opened second boutique for clothing and household accessories, Paris, 1991; fired from namesake label, owned by World Co. of Japan, 1995; original label went into bankruptcy, 1996; acted as consultant to companies such as Victoria's Secret and Wolford, 1995–98; repurchased rights to her name from World Co. and relaunched label with backing from Sara Lee's Dim division, 1999; first U.S. trunk show, at Saks Fifth Avenue, 2001. Exhibitions: Chantal Thomass: 30 ans de Créations, Musée de la Mode, Marseille, 2001. Awards: Named Chevalier des Arts et Lettres. Address: 346 rue Saint-Honoré, 75001 Paris, France.

Chantal Thomass, fall/winter 1996–97 collection: angora sweater and crêpe skirt. © AP/Wide World Photos.

PUBLICATIONS

On THOMASS:

Books

Slesin, Suzanne, and Stafford Cliff, French Style, New York and London, 1982.

Steele, Valerie, Women of Fashion: Twentieth-Century Designers, New York, 1991.

Stegemeyer, Anne, Who's Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.

Articles

"Les Stylistes," in Elle (Paris), 23 May 1977.

"Chantal Thomass: La Renouveau du Froufrou," in Jardin des Modes (Paris), October 1982.

Depardieu, Gérard, "Chantal Thomass," in La Mode en Peinture, Winter 1982–83.

"Chantal Thomass," in Profession Textile (Paris), 18 September 1987.

White, Constance C.R., "Patterns," in the New York Times, 19 March 1996.

"Chantal Thomass Studio Firm Reported to Be in Liquidation," in WWD, 26 August 1996.

"Chantal Thomass, Dim in Deal," in WWD, 17 February 1998.

Through the use of seams, tucks, and gathers, Tassell was able to create sculptural forms which skimmed over the body, rather than a tight fit. The look was graceful and feminine. Skirts could be bell shaped, or gathered gently. The seams of a princess-style dress curved to suggest the bust and waistline. He designed clothes for both evening and daytime wear—separates, dresses, and coats. He designed versions of the black dinner dress, the shirtwaist, culottes, and the reefer coat. His interpretation was always graceful and feminine. In 1961 he received the Coty American Fashion Critics award.

Tassell did not start out to be a fashion designer, but studied painting at the Pennsylvania Academy of Fine Arts. Moving to New York, he worked in the advertising and display department for Hattie Carnegie, who was well known in the fashion design world for both custom-made and ready-to-wear clothes. Seeing the design work of Norman Norell inspired Tassell's decision to create clothes for women.

In the early 1950s Tassell moved to Europe where he did fashion sketches for Geneviève Fath and became acquainted with American designer James Galanos. It was through the encouragement of Galanos that Tassell eventually began his own business in 1956 in California, though the designs Tassell produced were closer in concept to those of Norell than Galanos. In 1972, when Norman Norell died, Tassell was asked to come to New York to maintain the line. He did this under the name House of Norell, Gustave Tassell. The Norman Norell line was permanently closed in 1976 and Tassell returned to California where he again turned out his sophisticated designs for a small group of customers.

Tassell's design sensibility changed little from the 20 to the 21st century—he sought to create forward-looking fashion appropriate for elegant, confident women. He envisioned designs in natural fibers able to serve many purposes, with changing silhouette according to how the garment was buttoned, seamed, or tucked. Tassell aimed to produce affordable clothing with a sense of proportion, grace, and design.

—Nancy House

THOMASS, Chantal

French designer

Born: Chantal Genty in Malakoff, Seine, France, 4 September 1947.
Family: Married Bruce Thomass, 1967; children: Louise, Robin.
Career: Freelance designer selling to Dorothée Bis, 1966–71; partner, Ter et Bantine boutique, Paris, 1967, renamed Chantal Thomass, 1975; introduced lingerie and hosiery collections, 1975, maternity wear, 1981, children's clothing line, from circa 1982; signed partnership with World Co. for distribution, licensing, and boutiques in Japan, 1985; opened second boutique for clothing and household accessories, Paris, 1991; fired from namesake label, owned by World Co. of Japan, 1995; original label went into bankruptcy, 1996; acted as consultant to companies such as Victoria's Secret and Wolford, 1995–98; repurchased rights to her name from World Co. and relaunched label with backing from Sara Lee's Dim division, 1999; first U.S. trunk show, at Saks Fifth Avenue, 2001. Exhibitions: Chantal Thomass: 30 ans de Créations, Musée de la Mode, Marseille, 2001. Awards: Named Chevalier des Arts et Lettres. Address: 346 rue Saint-Honoré, 75001 Paris, France.

Chantal Thomass, fall/winter 1996–97 collection: angora sweater and crêpe skirt. © AP/Wide World Photos.

PUBLICATIONS

On THOMASS:

Books

Slesin, Suzanne, and Stafford Cliff, French Style, New York and London, 1982.

Steele, Valerie, Women of Fashion: Twentieth-Century Designers, New York, 1991.

Stegemeyer, Anne, Who's Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.

Articles

"Les Stylistes," in Elle (Paris), 23 May 1977.

"Chantal Thomass: La Renouveau du Froufrou," in Jardin des Modes (Paris), October 1982.

Depardieu, Gérard, "Chantal Thomass," in La Mode en Peinture, Winter 1982–83.

"Chantal Thomass," in Profession Textile (Paris), 18 September 1987.

White, Constance C.R., "Patterns," in the New York Times, 19 March 1996.

"Chantal Thomass Studio Firm Reported to Be in Liquidation," in WWD, 26 August 1996.

"Chantal Thomass, Dim in Deal," in WWD, 17 February 1998.

- Benoit, Ruth, "Chantal Thomass Back in Lingerie," in WWD, 28 December 1998.
- Weisman, Katherine, "Chantal Thomass Show Stops Traffic, Starts Protests," in WWD, 23 April 1999.
- Monget, Karyn, "Breaking into the American Boudoir," in WWD, 22 January 2001.
- Murphy, Robert, "Bring Back That Sex Appeal," in WWD, 9 July 2001.
- "Dentelles et Froufrous de Chantal Thomass sur la Canebière," in Le Monde, 20 July 2001.

* * *

Chantal Thomass has built a reputation for her tantalizing, flirtatious clothes. Much of her work pays a titillating homage to exotic underwear; there is, however, never a blatant display of overt sexuality. Instead there is always a hint of the naughty schoolgirl or a sensuous allusion to the charms of the teenage seductress, like Carole Baker in Baby Doll or Sue Lyon in Lolita. The clothes are often fitted or skimpy, trimmed in frills, ribbons, and flounces, and always produced in the most sophisticated fabrics.

Thomass had no formal training in fashion design, but as a child, dressing up proved enough of a motivation for her to design her own clothes, which were made by her mother. She began her fashion career at 18, designing clothes for girls of her own age. A year later, she married Bruce Thomass, who had studied at the École des Beaux Arts in Paris. Together they formed a small fashion company called Ter et Bantine manufacturing and selling young and unusual clothes. They created dresses from hand-painted scarves, designed by Bruce, and succeeded in selling them to Dorothée Bis. Thomass also designed dresses with flounced pinafores, schoolgirl collars, and balloon sleeves that were sold from their first boutique on Boulevard Saint Germain in 1967. Actress and French cultural symbol Brigitte Bardot became a regular customer, as did designer Jacqueline Jacobson, who ordered over a hundred dresses in one season alone.

The business was sufficiently successful for the pair to found the Chantal Thomass label in 1975, with Chantal as creative director and Bruce as licensing and sales director. As the profile of the company rose, so did the price of the clothes, although they retained their young, enchanting, and highly feminine style. Thomass has often been motivated by the progression of her own life. Her pregnancy in 1981 led her to develop a line of maternity clothes. As her daughter began growing, Thomass developed a childrenswear division that retained many of the distinctive and theatrical elements of her mainline collections. The company moved into licensing in 1985, joining forces with the Japanese group World as a financial partner. Licensed products were available throughout Europe and Japan and included fine leather goods, tights, women's shoes, eyewear, watches, children's ready-to-wear, scarves, lingerie, and swimwear. There were soon a dozen Thomass boutiques throughout France.

Thomass retains her eminence by reflecting fashion changes and adapting her look to suit the prevalent mood. A youthful feel to her clothes has kept her in the forefront of leading Paris-based designers. Yet the mid- to late 1990s were a turbulent time for Thomass. In 1995 she was fired from her own label, of which she owned a minority interest, in a dispute with Japanese majority owner World Company. World planned to continue the label, publicizing aggressive expansion plans, and released further designs, which were considered more commercial than Thomass' typical work. A year later, however, the label went into bankruptcy and liquidated its assets.

Thomass, meanwhile, stopped designing lingerie for a time, leaving the category that had become her main focus. She spent the next four years as a consultant to companies such as Austrian hosiery maker Wolford (where she designed a swimwear line), Victoria's Secret, Antinéas, and Rosy, often in categories outside lingerie. In late 1998 after a lawsuit against World was resolved, Thomass reacquired the rights to her name and found a backer, the Dim division of Sara Lee, which took a two-thirds ownership of her company and assumed manufacturing duties for the core lingerie lines. Her first products under the relaunch were available in 1999. Her reentry into lingerie design was marked by controversy when a Galeries Lafayette window display featuring live models wearing her lingerie drew protests from feminists and other groups in Paris.

Among the best-known designers in France—a retrospective of her work at Marseille's Musée de Mode in 2001 included 230 pieces—Thomass also has a strong business in Japan and began her entry into the U.S. market in the late 1990s and early 2000s, with her first Saks Fifth Avenue trunk show taking place in April 2001. Licensed lines, distributed primarily in Europe and Japan, include eyewear, among other categories.

Thomass remains best known for her sexy, comfortable lingerie, often done in black but sometimes pastels or white, or with a layering of different colors and materials. She often shows her line to retail buyers using live dioramas featuring models doing everyday tasks in their lingerie. Women's Wear Daily (5 February 2001) termed her display at the Salon International de la Lingerie as "a naughty peep show featuring saucy vignettes of boudoir voyeurism." In the future, Thomass planned to expand into apparel again, focusing on lingerie-inspired looks.

—Kevin Almond; updated by Karen Raugust

TIEL, Vicky

American designer

Born: Washington, D.C., 21 October 1943. Education: Studied fashion design at Pratt Institute, 1961–62, and at Fashion Institute of Technology, 1962–64. Family: Married Ron Berkeley, 1971 (divorced, 1986); children: Rex, Richard. Career: Film costume designer 1960s; settled in Paris, 1964; opened boutique, Mia & Vicky, later renamed Vicky Tiel; introduced fragrance line, 1990; introduced eveningwear bridge line, 1992; launched first men's fragrance, Ulysse, 1998. Address: 159 East 63rd Street, New York, NY 10021 USA. Website: www.vickytiel.com.

PUBLICATIONS

On TIEL:

Books

Leese, Elizabeth, Costume Design in the Movies, New York, 1991.

Articles

de Leusse, Claude, "Vicky Tiel: Gentleness on Her Mind," in WWD, 3 March 1972.

Grassi, Adriana, "Vicky, Elizabeth and Richard," in WWD, 27 June 1972.

- Benoit, Ruth, "Chantal Thomass Back in Lingerie," in WWD, 28 December 1998.
- Weisman, Katherine, "Chantal Thomass Show Stops Traffic, Starts Protests," in WWD, 23 April 1999.
- Monget, Karyn, "Breaking into the American Boudoir," in WWD, 22 January 2001.
- Murphy, Robert, "Bring Back That Sex Appeal," in WWD, 9 July 2001.
- "Dentelles et Froufrous de Chantal Thomass sur la Canebière," in Le Monde, 20 July 2001.

* * *

Chantal Thomass has built a reputation for her tantalizing, flirtatious clothes. Much of her work pays a titillating homage to exotic underwear; there is, however, never a blatant display of overt sexuality. Instead there is always a hint of the naughty schoolgirl or a sensuous allusion to the charms of the teenage seductress, like Carole Baker in Baby Doll or Sue Lyon in Lolita. The clothes are often fitted or skimpy, trimmed in frills, ribbons, and flounces, and always produced in the most sophisticated fabrics.

Thomass had no formal training in fashion design, but as a child, dressing up proved enough of a motivation for her to design her own clothes, which were made by her mother. She began her fashion career at 18, designing clothes for girls of her own age. A year later, she married Bruce Thomass, who had studied at the École des Beaux Arts in Paris. Together they formed a small fashion company called Ter et Bantine manufacturing and selling young and unusual clothes. They created dresses from hand-painted scarves, designed by Bruce, and succeeded in selling them to Dorothée Bis. Thomass also designed dresses with flounced pinafores, schoolgirl collars, and balloon sleeves that were sold from their first boutique on Boulevard Saint Germain in 1967. Actress and French cultural symbol Brigitte Bardot became a regular customer, as did designer Jacqueline Jacobson, who ordered over a hundred dresses in one season alone.

The business was sufficiently successful for the pair to found the Chantal Thomass label in 1975, with Chantal as creative director and Bruce as licensing and sales director. As the profile of the company rose, so did the price of the clothes, although they retained their young, enchanting, and highly feminine style. Thomass has often been motivated by the progression of her own life. Her pregnancy in 1981 led her to develop a line of maternity clothes. As her daughter began growing, Thomass developed a childrenswear division that retained many of the distinctive and theatrical elements of her mainline collections. The company moved into licensing in 1985, joining forces with the Japanese group World as a financial partner. Licensed products were available throughout Europe and Japan and included fine leather goods, tights, women's shoes, eyewear, watches, children's ready-to-wear, scarves, lingerie, and swimwear. There were soon a dozen Thomass boutiques throughout France.

Thomass retains her eminence by reflecting fashion changes and adapting her look to suit the prevalent mood. A youthful feel to her clothes has kept her in the forefront of leading Paris-based designers. Yet the mid- to late 1990s were a turbulent time for Thomass. In 1995 she was fired from her own label, of which she owned a minority interest, in a dispute with Japanese majority owner World Company. World planned to continue the label, publicizing aggressive expansion plans, and released further designs, which were considered more commercial than Thomass' typical work. A year later, however, the label went into bankruptcy and liquidated its assets.

Thomass, meanwhile, stopped designing lingerie for a time, leaving the category that had become her main focus. She spent the next four years as a consultant to companies such as Austrian hosiery maker Wolford (where she designed a swimwear line), Victoria's Secret, Antinéas, and Rosy, often in categories outside lingerie. In late 1998 after a lawsuit against World was resolved, Thomass reacquired the rights to her name and found a backer, the Dim division of Sara Lee, which took a two-thirds ownership of her company and assumed manufacturing duties for the core lingerie lines. Her first products under the relaunch were available in 1999. Her reentry into lingerie design was marked by controversy when a Galeries Lafayette window display featuring live models wearing her lingerie drew protests from feminists and other groups in Paris.

Among the best-known designers in France—a retrospective of her work at Marseille's Musée de Mode in 2001 included 230 pieces—Thomass also has a strong business in Japan and began her entry into the U.S. market in the late 1990s and early 2000s, with her first Saks Fifth Avenue trunk show taking place in April 2001. Licensed lines, distributed primarily in Europe and Japan, include eyewear, among other categories.

Thomass remains best known for her sexy, comfortable lingerie, often done in black but sometimes pastels or white, or with a layering of different colors and materials. She often shows her line to retail buyers using live dioramas featuring models doing everyday tasks in their lingerie. Women's Wear Daily (5 February 2001) termed her display at the Salon International de la Lingerie as "a naughty peep show featuring saucy vignettes of boudoir voyeurism." In the future, Thomass planned to expand into apparel again, focusing on lingerie-inspired looks.

—Kevin Almond; updated by Karen Raugust

TIEL, Vicky

American designer

Born: Washington, D.C., 21 October 1943. Education: Studied fashion design at Pratt Institute, 1961–62, and at Fashion Institute of Technology, 1962–64. Family: Married Ron Berkeley, 1971 (divorced, 1986); children: Rex, Richard. Career: Film costume designer 1960s; settled in Paris, 1964; opened boutique, Mia & Vicky, later renamed Vicky Tiel; introduced fragrance line, 1990; introduced eveningwear bridge line, 1992; launched first men's fragrance, Ulysse, 1998. Address: 159 East 63rd Street, New York, NY 10021 USA. Website: www.vickytiel.com.

PUBLICATIONS

On TIEL:

Books

Leese, Elizabeth, Costume Design in the Movies, New York, 1991.

Articles

de Leusse, Claude, "Vicky Tiel: Gentleness on Her Mind," in WWD, 3 March 1972.

Grassi, Adriana, "Vicky, Elizabeth and Richard," in WWD, 27 June 1972.

- Morris, Bernadine, "An American in Paris: The Eclectic Spirit," in the New York Times, 18 May 1978.
- "Tiel Goes Hollywood," in WWD, 31 May 1978.
- Johnson, Bonnie, "American in Paris," in People, 1 September 1986.
- Stephens, Suzanne, "Vicky Tiel: American Élan in Paris Apartment," in Architectural Digest, September 1989.
- Hunter, Catherine Ellis, "Vicky Tiel: An American in Paris," in Drug & Cosmetic Industry, August 1990.
- Pagoda, Dianne M., "Tiel Lowers Prices as Business Drops," in WWD, 30 July 1991.
- Diamond, Kerry, "Tiel's Launch: You Have Male," in WWD, 5 June 1998.
- "The Cinderella Treatment," available online at the Washington Post, www.WashingtonPost.com, 9 January 2001.

* * *

Vicky Tiel is a unique phenomenon in the international world of fashion. She is perhaps the only American to operate her own fashion design business in Paris and to do so longer than many of her French contemporaries. She holds a unique place in the history of fashion as one of the early boutique/ready-to-wear designers in Paris. Her clothes now occupy a special place between ready-to-wear and couture, both in manufacture and in marketing.

In 1964, having graduated from the Fashion Institute of Technology in New York, Tiel arrived in Paris with the intention of designing costumes for films. During her school years in New York, she had already been actively creating youth-oriented clothes, sold in Greenwich Village boutiques. Her designs in this early period included leather skirts with matching fringe vests and a prototypical miniskirt designed in fall 1963, a full season ahead of Mary Quant's mini, introduced in London in the spring of 1964.

While looking for film work in Paris, Tiel, together with her friend Mia Fonssagrives, created innovative "youth-quaker"-style ready-to-wear. These clothes caused a stir among the fashion press, and in 1965 Tiel and Fonssagrives even appeared on the Tonight Show with Johnny Carson. At this time, fashion in Paris was still dominated by the great couturiers, and only a few designers, such as Emmanuelle Khanh and Michele Rosier, were exclusively designing ready-to-wear clothes. Subsequently Fonssagrives married couturier Louis Féraud, who, in a highly unusual move, permitted Tiel and Fonssagrives to use sample-hands and seamstresses from his atelier to produce their ready-to-wear for sale in their own boutique called Mia & Vicky.

Fonssagrives later dropped out and the boutique was renamed Vicky Tiel. As a direct result of this series of events, Tiel's clothes have come to hold a unique place between ready-to-wear and couture—they are meticulously crafted clothes of the finest fabrics, sewn in the tradition of haute couture. By 1972 Tiel's clothes had moved away from the radically young, kooky 1960s look toward a traditionally feminine style with a sexy twist, as seen in floral printed garden party dresses closely gathered through the bodice, skinny navy jersey tops with white piqué collar and cuffs, and long skirts worn with ruffled shirts.

By the mid-1970s, dramatically draped dresses in matte jersey had become a major component of Tiel's collection. From this period onward, her style has reflected her point of view that a woman can be glamorous, sexual, powerful, and feminine all at the same time. Her exemplar for the reification of this concept was the Hollywood screen goddess of the 1940s and 1950s. Her clothes appeal to the consumer's basic fantasy desire, a fantasy of glamor and sexuality mediated by quality and a refined sensibility.

In 1978, inspired by a 1940s Frederick's of Hollywood catalogue, Tiel designed a collection with the theme Fun Hollywood Trash but remarked that "the look is done in very good taste and in the most expensive fabrics." The collection featured backless tuxedo dresses and evening dresses of contrasting colored chiffon layered over jersey, creating an iridescent look. Her description of the development of her perfume could also serve as a description of her clothes: "I wanted it to reek of femininity and sensuality, but to be soft and romantic, with subtle, not overpowering sex." More recent designs continued to reflect this point of view, with a large portion of her collection devoted to eveningwear, especially her signature draped jerseys, often enhanced with appliquéd sequins and embroidery.

Tiel's clothes are sold in her own boutique in Paris and in fine department stores and specialty stores where she often makes personal appearances at trunk shows. Special and custom orders account for a large percentage of Tiel's sales, and her personal style of marketing is consistent with the caliber of these uniquely luxurious, sensual clothes. Throughout the late 1990s and early 2000s Tiel placed an increased emphasis on eveningwear. She is perhaps better known in many circles for this portion of her business than for the ready-to-wear that made her famous. Her gowns, rendered in jersey, organza, and lace, in a rainbow of rich colors as well as elegant black, are often worn by celebrities to high-profile events. She even designed dresses for several of the politically connected who were invited to the balls surrounding the 2001 inaugural of U.S. President George W. Bush. A significant percentage of her clothing business continues to be custom orders.

While her designs are popular among the rich and famous, they are not for everyone. Tiel favors tight-fitting silhouettes best suited to women in top physical condition. Even among this consumer segment, those who choose Vicky Tiel have the confidence to show their bodies to the world. And with the expansion of her fragrance line, Tiel has become more recognized, to many in the general public, for her scents than for her apparel. Manufactured by Five Star Fragrances and distributed by Riviera Concepts, the Parfums Vicky Tiel Paris label is in upscale distribution in outlets such as Neiman Marcus and Bergdorf Goodman stores, which are also key customers for her apparel. In 1998 Tiel launched Ulysse, her first men's scent.

Tiel described her women's scents, which include Originale and Sirene, to Women's Wear Daily in June 1998 as "feminine" and "seductive." These words also accurately describe her apparel designs.

—Alan E. Rosenberg; updated by Karen Raught

TIFFANY & COMPANY

American luxury goods company

Founded: in New York City in 1837 by Charles Lewis Tiffany and John Young as a stationery and "fancy goods" emporium. Company History: Began jewelry sales, 1840s; added the manufacture of silver, 1850s; purchased the Tiffany Diamond, one of the world's largest yellow diamonds, 1878; introduced a six-prong diamond engagement ring, exhibiting what became known as the "Tiffany" setting, 1886; company moved to its present Fifth Avenue location, 1940; Tiffany family sells to the Hoving Corporation, 1955; company sold to cosmetics giant Avon Products, 1979; management repurchased

- Morris, Bernadine, "An American in Paris: The Eclectic Spirit," in the New York Times, 18 May 1978.
- "Tiel Goes Hollywood," in WWD, 31 May 1978.
- Johnson, Bonnie, "American in Paris," in People, 1 September 1986.
- Stephens, Suzanne, "Vicky Tiel: American Élan in Paris Apartment," in Architectural Digest, September 1989.
- Hunter, Catherine Ellis, "Vicky Tiel: An American in Paris," in Drug & Cosmetic Industry, August 1990.
- Pagoda, Dianne M., "Tiel Lowers Prices as Business Drops," in WWD, 30 July 1991.
- Diamond, Kerry, "Tiel's Launch: You Have Male," in WWD, 5 June 1998.
- "The Cinderella Treatment," available online at the Washington Post, www.WashingtonPost.com, 9 January 2001.

* * *

Vicky Tiel is a unique phenomenon in the international world of fashion. She is perhaps the only American to operate her own fashion design business in Paris and to do so longer than many of her French contemporaries. She holds a unique place in the history of fashion as one of the early boutique/ready-to-wear designers in Paris. Her clothes now occupy a special place between ready-to-wear and couture, both in manufacture and in marketing.

In 1964, having graduated from the Fashion Institute of Technology in New York, Tiel arrived in Paris with the intention of designing costumes for films. During her school years in New York, she had already been actively creating youth-oriented clothes, sold in Greenwich Village boutiques. Her designs in this early period included leather skirts with matching fringe vests and a prototypical miniskirt designed in fall 1963, a full season ahead of Mary Quant's mini, introduced in London in the spring of 1964.

While looking for film work in Paris, Tiel, together with her friend Mia Fonssagrives, created innovative "youth-quaker"-style ready-to-wear. These clothes caused a stir among the fashion press, and in 1965 Tiel and Fonssagrives even appeared on the Tonight Show with Johnny Carson. At this time, fashion in Paris was still dominated by the great couturiers, and only a few designers, such as Emmanuelle Khanh and Michele Rosier, were exclusively designing ready-to-wear clothes. Subsequently Fonssagrives married couturier Louis Féraud, who, in a highly unusual move, permitted Tiel and Fonssagrives to use sample-hands and seamstresses from his atelier to produce their ready-to-wear for sale in their own boutique called Mia & Vicky.

Fonssagrives later dropped out and the boutique was renamed Vicky Tiel. As a direct result of this series of events, Tiel's clothes have come to hold a unique place between ready-to-wear and couture—they are meticulously crafted clothes of the finest fabrics, sewn in the tradition of haute couture. By 1972 Tiel's clothes had moved away from the radically young, kooky 1960s look toward a traditionally feminine style with a sexy twist, as seen in floral printed garden party dresses closely gathered through the bodice, skinny navy jersey tops with white piqué collar and cuffs, and long skirts worn with ruffled shirts.

By the mid-1970s, dramatically draped dresses in matte jersey had become a major component of Tiel's collection. From this period onward, her style has reflected her point of view that a woman can be glamorous, sexual, powerful, and feminine all at the same time. Her exemplar for the reification of this concept was the Hollywood screen goddess of the 1940s and 1950s. Her clothes appeal to the consumer's basic fantasy desire, a fantasy of glamor and sexuality mediated by quality and a refined sensibility.

In 1978, inspired by a 1940s Frederick's of Hollywood catalogue, Tiel designed a collection with the theme Fun Hollywood Trash but remarked that "the look is done in very good taste and in the most expensive fabrics." The collection featured backless tuxedo dresses and evening dresses of contrasting colored chiffon layered over jersey, creating an iridescent look. Her description of the development of her perfume could also serve as a description of her clothes: "I wanted it to reek of femininity and sensuality, but to be soft and romantic, with subtle, not overpowering sex." More recent designs continued to reflect this point of view, with a large portion of her collection devoted to eveningwear, especially her signature draped jerseys, often enhanced with appliquéd sequins and embroidery.

Tiel's clothes are sold in her own boutique in Paris and in fine department stores and specialty stores where she often makes personal appearances at trunk shows. Special and custom orders account for a large percentage of Tiel's sales, and her personal style of marketing is consistent with the caliber of these uniquely luxurious, sensual clothes. Throughout the late 1990s and early 2000s Tiel placed an increased emphasis on eveningwear. She is perhaps better known in many circles for this portion of her business than for the ready-to-wear that made her famous. Her gowns, rendered in jersey, organza, and lace, in a rainbow of rich colors as well as elegant black, are often worn by celebrities to high-profile events. She even designed dresses for several of the politically connected who were invited to the balls surrounding the 2001 inaugural of U.S. President George W. Bush. A significant percentage of her clothing business continues to be custom orders.

While her designs are popular among the rich and famous, they are not for everyone. Tiel favors tight-fitting silhouettes best suited to women in top physical condition. Even among this consumer segment, those who choose Vicky Tiel have the confidence to show their bodies to the world. And with the expansion of her fragrance line, Tiel has become more recognized, to many in the general public, for her scents than for her apparel. Manufactured by Five Star Fragrances and distributed by Riviera Concepts, the Parfums Vicky Tiel Paris label is in upscale distribution in outlets such as Neiman Marcus and Bergdorf Goodman stores, which are also key customers for her apparel. In 1998 Tiel launched Ulysse, her first men's scent.

Tiel described her women's scents, which include Originale and Sirene, to Women's Wear Daily in June 1998 as "feminine" and "seductive." These words also accurately describe her apparel designs.

—Alan E. Rosenberg; updated by Karen Raught

TIFFANY & COMPANY

American luxury goods company

Founded: in New York City in 1837 by Charles Lewis Tiffany and John Young as a stationery and "fancy goods" emporium. Company History: Began jewelry sales, 1840s; added the manufacture of silver, 1850s; purchased the Tiffany Diamond, one of the world's largest yellow diamonds, 1878; introduced a six-prong diamond engagement ring, exhibiting what became known as the "Tiffany" setting, 1886; company moved to its present Fifth Avenue location, 1940; Tiffany family sells to the Hoving Corporation, 1955; company sold to cosmetics giant Avon Products, 1979; management repurchased

Jewelry designs by Tiffany & Company, 2000. © AP/Wide World Photos.

the company in a leveraged buyout, 1984; Tiffany & Company becomes a publicly traded company, 1987; wholesale distribution of products to independent retailers discontinued, 1999; purchased stake in Canadian diamond miner Aber Resources, 1999. Company Address: 727 Fifth Avenue, New York, NY 10022, USA.

PUBLICATIONS

On TIFFANY & COMPANY:

Books

- Purtell, Joseph, The Tiffany Touch, New York, 1971.
 Carpenter, Charles Hope, Tiffany Silver, New York, 1978.
 Proddow, Penny, American Jewelry: Glamour and Tradition, New York, 1987.
 Loring, John, Tiffany's 20th Century: A Portrait of American Style, New York, 1997.
 Snowman, A. Kenneth, ed., The Master Jewelers, New York, 1990.

Articles

- Cohen, Daniel, "Charles Tiffany's 'Fancy Goods' Shop and How It Grew," in Smithsonian, December 1987.
 ———, "Splendor in Glass," in Historic Preservation (New York), 1987.
 Loring, John, "Tiffany & Company Celebrating 150 Years," in Architectural Digest, No. 10, 1987.
 Safford, Frances Gruber, and Ruth Wilford Caccavale, "Japanesque Silver by Tiffany & Company in the Metropolitan Museum of Art," in Magazine Antiques (New York), October 1987.
 Trachtenbert, Jeffrey, "Cocktails at Tiffany," in Forbes, 6 February 1989.
 Lorge, Sarah, "A Priceless Brand: Strategic Marketing at Tiffany & Company," in Sales & Marketing Management (New York), October 1998.
 Curan, Catherine, "Multifaceted Success: After Years of Gains, Wall Street Notices Tiffany," in Crain's New York Business, 18 October 1999.

* * *

Tiffany & Company is a name that, throughout its long history, has epitomized luxury. It is part of America's cultural lexicon, referenced in film, literature, and public discourse to signify the good life and social refinement. While linked in the popular imagination with cascades of diamonds, the firm retails a variety of selective items, including jewelry, glassware, flatware, china, writing materials, fashion accessories, and fragrances. Tiffany & Company's status as an iconic American institution is predicated on product quality and an authoritative marketing strategy promising exclusivity. All this is wrapped up in a trademark blue box, whose symbolic cachet is as valuable as the gift it holds.

Tiffany & Company trades not only in luxury products but also in a certain image. The famed ambience of the New York City flagship store, with its discreet sales staff, as well as company publications on etiquette and gem selection, are meant to position the company as far more than a retail store. Throughout its history, wealthy Americans have gone to Tiffany's to put a stamp on their own affluence and social respectability.

Part of the company's enduring legacy is its ability to draw on disparate sources for artistic inspiration while creating a distinctly Pearls in a Chicago, Illinois, Tiffany & Company display window, 1996. © Kevin Fleming/CORBIS.

American product. Tiffany's was a preeminent silver producer in the late 1800s, and its silver pieces reflected many of the influences of the time, from ornate Victorianism to simpler classical revival designs, to the growing fascination with the Orient and the Middle East. Craftspeople rigorously trained in the Tiffany apprenticeship program produced a tremendous amount of silverwork to supply the demands of a culture in which the dining room and its silver were paramount to social life and status. At exhibitions throughout the 19th century, the company won acclaim from European audiences skeptical of American ability in the decorative arts.

Innovative designers produced exclusively for the company, including Edward Moore, whose Japanese-influenced silver containers are still critically acclaimed and admired today. Moore also oversaw a celebrated collection of jewelry and silver inspired by Native American art. During this same period, a set of 25 enamel orchids designed by Paulding Farnham contributed to a European revival in enamels. With the efforts of mineralogist George Frederick Kunz, Tiffany popularized the decorative use of American gems, semiprecious stones, and freshwater pearls in jewelry design. At the same time it was promoting fine silver and jewelry, Tiffany & Company was also creating several popular sterling silver flatware lines, some of which are still produced. The late-19th century was a period of incredible design innovation for the company, and this combination of fine craftsmanship and artistic quality secured Tiffany's reputation among affluent American and international clientele.

Charles Tiffany's son Louis Comfort Tiffany dominated Tiffany style in the early 20th century. Louis Tiffany was a leading proponent of art nouveau in America, taking themes from nature (emphasizing American flowers as well as animal and insect life) and rendering them in jewelry and glass. Louis Tiffany's hand-blown Favrile glass vases and bowls, his stained glass mosaics and lamps, his exuberant use of color combinations and innovative techniques were heralded in his day. Due to the growing trend of modernism, however, interest waned in Louis Tiffany's style and by his death in 1933, Tiffany & Company had entered a period of stalled artistic innovation.

Tiffany's so-called second Golden Age commenced under the management of Walter Hoving in 1955. He hired Jean Schlumberger, whose imaginative designs uniquely combined gems in highly detailed designs. Van Day Truex became design director and redesigned Tiffany's silver, crystal, and china lines. The company continued to hire design luminaries, including Donald Claflin in 1965, known for pieces based on imaginary or fictive creatures. The work of Elsa Peretti was introduced in 1974, followed the next year by the work of Angela Cummings. Designer Paloma Picasso's jewelry was introduced in 1980. Well-known designers were also commissioned to design Tiffany tableware. Current Tiffany design director John Loring commented, "I see a thread linking all the most worthwhile of Tiffany productions, however great the successive changes in taste. They are all an authentically American phenomena, derived from but not imitating the set ideas of European and Oriental sophistication. All Tiffany pieces are emphatically New World."

Despite a period in the 1980s under the management of Avon Products in which lower-quality, inexpensive goods were introduced to the Tiffany stock, Tiffany & Company continued to symbolize a specific American refinement and sumptuousness. Marketing strategies since the 1990s have sought to retain the upper-class patina of the Tiffany name while expanding into the middle-class and younger markets with affordable items, touring jewelry collections, and a sleek website. Even though the company successfully weathered economic recessions and years when fashion trends bypassed expensive jewelry, Tiffany now seems committed to negotiating the fine balance between exclusivity and accessibility. The company has slowly established its own retail locations across the U.S.; the goal is to have 75 locations across the country, bringing Tiffany style to a broader audience. Expansion has also included several international locations and the company's mail-order business, with slick catalogues further spreading the Tiffany name.

Tiffany & Company endures, in part, because its products promise far more than quality craftsmanship: they promise to lift the possessor up into an exclusive circle of social privilege and to identify a Tiffany client as having that most elusive quality of all, good taste.

—Megan Stacy

TIFFEAU, Jacques

French designer

Born: Chenevelles, Loire Valley, France, 11 October 1927. Education: Early training in Paris couture house until World War II. Military Service: Served in the French Army Air Force, 1939–40. Career: Tailor; assistant to Dior, 1945–50; immigrated to the U.S.; studied figure drawing, Art Students' League, New York; pattern maker, then designer, Monte-Sano & Pruzan coat and suit manufacturers, circa 1952–58; partner/designer, Tiffeau & Busch Ltd. for Monte-Sano & Pruzan, New York, 1958–66; launched own firm, 1966–71; taught fashion design, Paris, 1970s; supervisor, Rive Gauche collections, Yves Saint Laurent, 1972–76; designer, Originala, and Blassport lines, New York. Awards: Coty American Fashion Critics award, 1960, 1966; National Cotton award, New York, 1961; Sunday Times International Fashion award, London, circa 1966; Tobe-Coburn Fashion award New York. Died: 1988.

PUBLICATIONS

On TIFFEAU:

Books

- Bender, Marylin, The Beautiful People, New York, 1967.
- Lambert, Eleanor, World of Fashion: People, Places, Resources, New York & London, 1976.
- Milbank, Caroline Rennolds, New York Fashion: The Evolution of American Style, New York, 1989.

Articles

Sheinman, Mort, "Jacques Tiffeau Dies in Paris," in WWD, 7 March 1968.

"The Decades (Fashion in the 1960s)," in WWD, 28 September 1998.
Brady, James, "Scoops, Scandals, and Scalawags; Merry Memories of a Giddy, Glorious Era," in WWD, 16 July 2001.

* * *

Writing about designer Jacques Tiffeau in the 1960s, fashion doyenne Diana Vreeland once grandly declared, "He's in tune." She was referring to a Tiffeau collection comprised of simple, nonchalant, elegant dresses and daytime suits, most without bust-darts or extraneous frills, many cut on the bias. The gifted designer, who once turned down an offer to replace Yves Saint Laurent at Dior, excelled at creating pared-down, sophisticated, gimmick-free clothes that derived their strong visual impact purely from the designer's manipulation of cut, shape, and color. He was one of the prescient few who understood the importance of trousers for women, including basic trousers in nearly every collection until they were no longer seen as inappropriate for certain occasions. He was also known for his uncluttered coat designs with their clean, graphic silhouettes.

A Frenchman transplanted to America, Tiffeau belonged to the 1960s pantheon of American designers which included Geoffrey Beene, Bill Blass, Donald Brooks, and James Galanos. He embraced the advanced manufacturing technologies of the post-World War II era, eagerly investigating the properties of new materials in his garments: double-knits, rayons, plastics, and polyesters. His clothes were designed with a young, affluent, fashion-conscious consumer in mind, and his styles found ready buyers in America who saw reflected in his streamlined designs the modern spirit they wished to project.

Tiffeau spent many years learning his trade. During the German Occupation of France, the teenaged Tiffeau left his small Loire village and ran off to Paris, where he apprenticed himself to a men's tailor. There he skillfully mastered the art of cutting a toile, the muslin pattern which designers used as a model for the finished pattern. He next moved to New York and became protégé and chief stylist for Max Pruzan at Monte-Sano & Pruzan, an Italian artisan tailor who had built up one of the most expensive women's coat-and-suit houses in the trade. A friendship with Christian Dior led to an offer to design at Dior New York, but Tiffeau felt his future lay in ready-to-wear. Tiffeau teamed up with Beverly Busch, Pruzan's daughter, and formed Tiffeau & Busch, a successful ready-to-wear line of young, lower-priced coats, dresses, and sportswear separates. The designer spent nearly a decade creating six collections a year between the two concerns before dedicating himself exclusively to Tiffeau & Busch.

Life-drawing art classes combined with his inspired manipulation of toiles as a tailor's apprentice had given the young Tiffeau an excellent comprehension of the body as a mobile, three-dimensional object in space. This in-depth knowledge of clothing construction came to set him apart from many other American designers of his generation. Unlike his contemporaries, who would simply give their assistants a sketch to translate into three dimensions, Tiffeau was able to cut, shape, drape, and sew a garment from start to finish. Buyers loved that Tiffeau's clothing truly fit and rarely needed alterations; but he preferred to think of himself merely as a technician, never as an artist.

Tiffeau was an inspired designer, however, often using staid gray flannel for elegant separates, making cocktail dresses of zebra-striped commented, "I see a thread linking all the most worthwhile of Tiffany productions, however great the successive changes in taste. They are all an authentically American phenomena, derived from but not imitating the set ideas of European and Oriental sophistication. All Tiffany pieces are emphatically New World."

Despite a period in the 1980s under the management of Avon Products in which lower-quality, inexpensive goods were introduced to the Tiffany stock, Tiffany & Company continued to symbolize a specific American refinement and sumptuousness. Marketing strategies since the 1990s have sought to retain the upper-class patina of the Tiffany name while expanding into the middle-class and younger markets with affordable items, touring jewelry collections, and a sleek website. Even though the company successfully weathered economic recessions and years when fashion trends bypassed expensive jewelry, Tiffany now seems committed to negotiating the fine balance between exclusivity and accessibility. The company has slowly established its own retail locations across the U.S.; the goal is to have 75 locations across the country, bringing Tiffany style to a broader audience. Expansion has also included several international locations and the company's mail-order business, with slick catalogues further spreading the Tiffany name.

Tiffany & Company endures, in part, because its products promise far more than quality craftsmanship: they promise to lift the possessor up into an exclusive circle of social privilege and to identify a Tiffany client as having that most elusive quality of all, good taste.

—Megan Stacy

TIFFEAU, Jacques

French designer

Born: Chenevelles, Loire Valley, France, 11 October 1927. Education: Early training in Paris couture house until World War II. Military Service: Served in the French Army Air Force, 1939–40. Career: Tailor; assistant to Dior, 1945–50; immigrated to the U.S.; studied figure drawing, Art Students' League, New York; pattern maker, then designer, Monte-Sano & Pruzan coat and suit manufacturers, circa 1952–58; partner/designer, Tiffeau & Busch Ltd. for Monte-Sano & Pruzan, New York, 1958–66; launched own firm, 1966–71; taught fashion design, Paris, 1970s; supervisor, Rive Gauche collections, Yves Saint Laurent, 1972–76; designer, Originala, and Blassport lines, New York. Awards: Coty American Fashion Critics award, 1960, 1966; National Cotton award, New York, 1961; Sunday Times International Fashion award, London, circa 1966; Tobe-Coburn Fashion award New York. Died: 1988.

PUBLICATIONS

On TIFFEAU:

Books

- Bender, Marylin, The Beautiful People, New York, 1967.
- Lambert, Eleanor, World of Fashion: People, Places, Resources, New York & London, 1976.
- Milbank, Caroline Rennolds, New York Fashion: The Evolution of American Style, New York, 1989.

Articles

Sheinman, Mort, "Jacques Tiffeau Dies in Paris," in WWD, 7 March 1968.

"The Decades (Fashion in the 1960s)," in WWD, 28 September 1998.
Brady, James, "Scoops, Scandals, and Scalawags; Merry Memories of a Giddy, Glorious Era," in WWD, 16 July 2001.

* * *

Writing about designer Jacques Tiffeau in the 1960s, fashion doyenne Diana Vreeland once grandly declared, "He's in tune." She was referring to a Tiffeau collection comprised of simple, nonchalant, elegant dresses and daytime suits, most without bust-darts or extraneous frills, many cut on the bias. The gifted designer, who once turned down an offer to replace Yves Saint Laurent at Dior, excelled at creating pared-down, sophisticated, gimmick-free clothes that derived their strong visual impact purely from the designer's manipulation of cut, shape, and color. He was one of the prescient few who understood the importance of trousers for women, including basic trousers in nearly every collection until they were no longer seen as inappropriate for certain occasions. He was also known for his uncluttered coat designs with their clean, graphic silhouettes.

A Frenchman transplanted to America, Tiffeau belonged to the 1960s pantheon of American designers which included Geoffrey Beene, Bill Blass, Donald Brooks, and James Galanos. He embraced the advanced manufacturing technologies of the post-World War II era, eagerly investigating the properties of new materials in his garments: double-knits, rayons, plastics, and polyesters. His clothes were designed with a young, affluent, fashion-conscious consumer in mind, and his styles found ready buyers in America who saw reflected in his streamlined designs the modern spirit they wished to project.

Tiffeau spent many years learning his trade. During the German Occupation of France, the teenaged Tiffeau left his small Loire village and ran off to Paris, where he apprenticed himself to a men's tailor. There he skillfully mastered the art of cutting a toile, the muslin pattern which designers used as a model for the finished pattern. He next moved to New York and became protégé and chief stylist for Max Pruzan at Monte-Sano & Pruzan, an Italian artisan tailor who had built up one of the most expensive women's coat-and-suit houses in the trade. A friendship with Christian Dior led to an offer to design at Dior New York, but Tiffeau felt his future lay in ready-to-wear. Tiffeau teamed up with Beverly Busch, Pruzan's daughter, and formed Tiffeau & Busch, a successful ready-to-wear line of young, lower-priced coats, dresses, and sportswear separates. The designer spent nearly a decade creating six collections a year between the two concerns before dedicating himself exclusively to Tiffeau & Busch.

Life-drawing art classes combined with his inspired manipulation of toiles as a tailor's apprentice had given the young Tiffeau an excellent comprehension of the body as a mobile, three-dimensional object in space. This in-depth knowledge of clothing construction came to set him apart from many other American designers of his generation. Unlike his contemporaries, who would simply give their assistants a sketch to translate into three dimensions, Tiffeau was able to cut, shape, drape, and sew a garment from start to finish. Buyers loved that Tiffeau's clothing truly fit and rarely needed alterations; but he preferred to think of himself merely as a technician, never as an artist.

Tiffeau was an inspired designer, however, often using staid gray flannel for elegant separates, making cocktail dresses of zebra-striped velveteen—and he was among the first to use wool for evening dresses. He was an avid collector of ancient Near-Eastern and Asian art, from which he claimed to derive ideas about purity of line. He always sought refinement in his designs, an endless paring down, saying, “the secret of good clothes is to keep taking off, simplifying, trimming down—yet to capture the shape of the human body.” Besides his mentor Christian Dior, he admired Balenciaga, Beene, Courrèges, and Norell. His minimalist, almost severe style made him one of the most renowned designers of the 1960s, but as tastes changed in the 1970s he was accused of merely “rehashing” his old styles and was never again able to regain the spotlight.

In 1972 Tiffneau left New York and returned to France, where he worked for a time for Balmain and Yves Saint Laurent. An attempt to revive his career designing coats at Originala in New York was short-lived, though he was praised for his soft, unconstructed styles in tweed, alpaca, and cashmere. Eventually he found himself again in France, this time as a fashion design instructor. He left behind the legacy of a strong-willed and talented man whom his friend artist Robert Motherwell once said was “like having a beautiful leopard in the room.”

—Kathleen Paton

TIKTINER

French fashion firm

Company History: Began as family business in Nice, 1949, expanded into sportswear with factories in the South of France. Company Address: 14 avenue de Verdun, 06000 Nice, France.

PUBLICATIONS

On TIKTINER:

Books

McDowell, Colin, McDowell's Directory of Twentieth Century Fashion, Englewood Cliffs, New Jersey, 1985.

Articles

“Tiktiner Fall,” in WWD, 26 February 1990.

* * *

The owners of Tiktiner, a family-run fashion house based in Nice, France, never really considered their position outside the urban fashion center of Paris a liability. The principles, Henri and Dina Viterbo and their daughters Miquette and Vivian, occasionally admitted to the need for stimulation beyond the French Riviera in order to inspire new ideas. But the Viterbos remained committed to their own brand of high-quality, classic-styled, resort-oriented ready-to-wear, and felt no need to leave Nice or tamper with the relaxed attitude toward clothing that supported them handsomely for decades.

The Tiktiner family members each played an important role in the company: Henri was the founder and owner; Dina was the head designer; eldest daughter Miquette, an international attorney married to American Mort Schrader, represented the company in the United States; and younger daughter Vivian helped designed collections with her mother. Together the Viterbos created and promoted dependable ready-to-wear collections with their own, recognizable “Tiktiner look,”—a look based essentially on tailored sportswear separates, with a focus on knits, basic colors, rich weaves, and youthful lines.

The combined inspiration of Vivian and mother Dina resulted in fashion-forward clothes mitigated by classicism, and Vivian often chided her mother for excessive conservatism. Yet the pair worked well together. Early collections emphasized the sleek lines in vogue during the 1960s, with clingy jersey tops over slim, hip-hugging trousers and mini-skirts. Tiktiner favored the natural fiber fabrics used in active wear, often experimenting with stretch jerseys and printed piques in their youth-oriented clothes. The polo shirt, that icon of French sportswear popularized by René Lacoste, was even fair game, given a clever twist by Vivian and Dina in their one-piece shirt dress with a polo top and faux skirt designed to look like separates. The Tiktiner style, though essentially casual, relied on the buyer’s familiarity with design classics, and the look was equally at home at a beachside tennis court or a Parisian salon.

The family firm, however, did not design only garments meant for warm weather resorts. The biannual collections included autumn-winter lines with thick knits and cold-weather layered looks. In the 1970s Tiktiner made fashion news with their sweater tunics and bulky multicolored sweater coats over plaid shirt jackets in lieu of the traditional cloth coat. Each knitted sweater layer was designed to coordinate, so a lightweight, slim jersey top might slip over a matching skirt under a fuller mohair coat, all in various shades of amber or other compatible hues. These loose, comfortable, mix-and-match cold weather knits fit perfectly into the youthful fashion mood of the period of the 1970s, when even a simple cloth coat could be seen as bourgeois and confining. But Tiktiner was not averse to more traditional coat designs, and were lauded for their updated, shaped “redingote” of rosy wool chinchilla in 1979.

Tiktiner never wavered from the Viterbos’ dedication to style combined with comfort. One clothing group comprised of over 200 pieces highlighted slim waists with drawstring closures, shirred shoulders, and back yokes for easy movement. The collections were frequently hailed for their coordinating palettes; muted earth tones, dusty blues and greens, pale pastels, and paired intensities of the same color figured largely in the Viterbos’ vision. The notion of comfort also emerges when considering Tiktiner’s attention to travel-minded clothes made from lightweight and packable wool challis, mohairs, and double-knits. Underlying the designs was a philosophy based on ease—ease of fit, of combining colors, of simply getting dressed.

—Kathleen Paton

TIMNEY FOWLER LTD.

British textile design firm

Founded: in London in 1980 by husband and wife team Sue Timney (born 9 July 1950) and Grahame Fowler (born 12 January 1956). Timney educated at Carlisle College of Art, 1966–67; Newcastle-upon-Tyne Polytechnic 1971–76, B.A.; Heriot Watt University, Edinburgh, postgraduate diploma, textiles, 1976–77; Royal College of Art, M.A., Textiles, 1977–79. Company History: Incorporated, 1985; partnership developed Japanese market for print design, clothing and accessories consultancy, 1980–84; clients included Issey Miyake and Yohji Yamamoto; opened UK retail outlets and Print velveteen—and he was among the first to use wool for evening dresses. He was an avid collector of ancient Near-Eastern and Asian art, from which he claimed to derive ideas about purity of line. He always sought refinement in his designs, an endless paring down, saying, “the secret of good clothes is to keep taking off, simplifying, trimming down—yet to capture the shape of the human body.” Besides his mentor Christian Dior, he admired Balenciaga, Beene, Courrèges, and Norell. His minimalist, almost severe style made him one of the most renowned designers of the 1960s, but as tastes changed in the 1970s he was accused of merely “rehashing” his old styles and was never again able to regain the spotlight.

In 1972 Tiffneau left New York and returned to France, where he worked for a time for Balmain and Yves Saint Laurent. An attempt to revive his career designing coats at Originala in New York was short-lived, though he was praised for his soft, unconstructed styles in tweed, alpaca, and cashmere. Eventually he found himself again in France, this time as a fashion design instructor. He left behind the legacy of a strong-willed and talented man whom his friend artist Robert Motherwell once said was “like having a beautiful leopard in the room.”

—Kathleen Paton

TIKTINER

French fashion firm

Company History: Began as family business in Nice, 1949, expanded into sportswear with factories in the South of France. Company Address: 14 avenue de Verdun, 06000 Nice, France.

PUBLICATIONS

On TIKTINER:

Books

McDowell, Colin, McDowell's Directory of Twentieth Century Fashion, Englewood Cliffs, New Jersey, 1985.

Articles

“Tiktiner Fall,” in WWD, 26 February 1990.

* * *

The owners of Tiktiner, a family-run fashion house based in Nice, France, never really considered their position outside the urban fashion center of Paris a liability. The principles, Henri and Dina Viterbo and their daughters Miquette and Vivian, occasionally admitted to the need for stimulation beyond the French Riviera in order to inspire new ideas. But the Viterbos remained committed to their own brand of high-quality, classic-styled, resort-oriented ready-to-wear, and felt no need to leave Nice or tamper with the relaxed attitude toward clothing that supported them handsomely for decades.

The Tiktiner family members each played an important role in the company: Henri was the founder and owner; Dina was the head designer; eldest daughter Miquette, an international attorney married to American Mort Schrader, represented the company in the United States; and younger daughter Vivian helped designed collections with her mother. Together the Viterbos created and promoted dependable ready-to-wear collections with their own, recognizable “Tiktiner look,”—a look based essentially on tailored sportswear separates, with a focus on knits, basic colors, rich weaves, and youthful lines.

The combined inspiration of Vivian and mother Dina resulted in fashion-forward clothes mitigated by classicism, and Vivian often chided her mother for excessive conservatism. Yet the pair worked well together. Early collections emphasized the sleek lines in vogue during the 1960s, with clingy jersey tops over slim, hip-hugging trousers and mini-skirts. Tiktiner favored the natural fiber fabrics used in active wear, often experimenting with stretch jerseys and printed piques in their youth-oriented clothes. The polo shirt, that icon of French sportswear popularized by René Lacoste, was even fair game, given a clever twist by Vivian and Dina in their one-piece shirt dress with a polo top and faux skirt designed to look like separates. The Tiktiner style, though essentially casual, relied on the buyer’s familiarity with design classics, and the look was equally at home at a beachside tennis court or a Parisian salon.

The family firm, however, did not design only garments meant for warm weather resorts. The biannual collections included autumn-winter lines with thick knits and cold-weather layered looks. In the 1970s Tiktiner made fashion news with their sweater tunics and bulky multicolored sweater coats over plaid shirt jackets in lieu of the traditional cloth coat. Each knitted sweater layer was designed to coordinate, so a lightweight, slim jersey top might slip over a matching skirt under a fuller mohair coat, all in various shades of amber or other compatible hues. These loose, comfortable, mix-and-match cold weather knits fit perfectly into the youthful fashion mood of the period of the 1970s, when even a simple cloth coat could be seen as bourgeois and confining. But Tiktiner was not averse to more traditional coat designs, and were lauded for their updated, shaped “redingote” of rosy wool chinchilla in 1979.

Tiktiner never wavered from the Viterbos’ dedication to style combined with comfort. One clothing group comprised of over 200 pieces highlighted slim waists with drawstring closures, shirred shoulders, and back yokes for easy movement. The collections were frequently hailed for their coordinating palettes; muted earth tones, dusty blues and greens, pale pastels, and paired intensities of the same color figured largely in the Viterbos’ vision. The notion of comfort also emerges when considering Tiktiner’s attention to travel-minded clothes made from lightweight and packable wool challis, mohairs, and double-knits. Underlying the designs was a philosophy based on ease—ease of fit, of combining colors, of simply getting dressed.

—Kathleen Paton

TIMNEY FOWLER LTD.

British textile design firm

Founded: in London in 1980 by husband and wife team Sue Timney (born 9 July 1950) and Grahame Fowler (born 12 January 1956). Timney educated at Carlisle College of Art, 1966–67; Newcastle-upon-Tyne Polytechnic 1971–76, B.A.; Heriot Watt University, Edinburgh, postgraduate diploma, textiles, 1976–77; Royal College of Art, M.A., Textiles, 1977–79. Company History: Incorporated, 1985; partnership developed Japanese market for print design, clothing and accessories consultancy, 1980–84; clients included Issey Miyake and Yohji Yamamoto; opened UK retail outlets and Print

velveteen—and he was among the first to use wool for evening dresses. He was an avid collector of ancient Near-Eastern and Asian art, from which he claimed to derive ideas about purity of line. He always sought refinement in his designs, an endless paring down, saying, “the secret of good clothes is to keep taking off, simplifying, trimming down—yet to capture the shape of the human body.” Besides his mentor Christian Dior, he admired Balenciaga, Beene, Courrèges, and Norell. His minimalist, almost severe style made him one of the most renowned designers of the 1960s, but as tastes changed in the 1970s he was accused of merely “rehashing” his old styles and was never again able to regain the spotlight.

In 1972 Tiffneau left New York and returned to France, where he worked for a time for Balmain and Yves Saint Laurent. An attempt to revive his career designing coats at Originala in New York was short-lived, though he was praised for his soft, unconstructed styles in tweed, alpaca, and cashmere. Eventually he found himself again in France, this time as a fashion design instructor. He left behind the legacy of a strong-willed and talented man whom his friend artist Robert Motherwell once said was “like having a beautiful leopard in the room.”

—Kathleen Paton

TIKTINER

French fashion firm

Company History: Began as family business in Nice, 1949, expanded into sportswear with factories in the South of France. Company Address: 14 avenue de Verdun, 06000 Nice, France.

PUBLICATIONS

On TIKTINER:

Books

McDowell, Colin, McDowell's Directory of Twentieth Century Fashion, Englewood Cliffs, New Jersey, 1985.

Articles

“Tiktiner Fall,” in WWD, 26 February 1990.

* * *

The owners of Tiktiner, a family-run fashion house based in Nice, France, never really considered their position outside the urban fashion center of Paris a liability. The principles, Henri and Dina Viterbo and their daughters Miquette and Vivian, occasionally admitted to the need for stimulation beyond the French Riviera in order to inspire new ideas. But the Viterbos remained committed to their own brand of high-quality, classic-styled, resort-oriented ready-to-wear, and felt no need to leave Nice or tamper with the relaxed attitude toward clothing that supported them handsomely for decades.

The Tiktiner family members each played an important role in the company: Henri was the founder and owner; Dina was the head designer; eldest daughter Miquette, an international attorney married to American Mort Schrader, represented the company in the United States; and younger daughter Vivian helped designed collections with her mother. Together the Viterbos created and promoted dependable ready-to-wear collections with their own, recognizable “Tiktiner look,”—a look based essentially on tailored sportswear separates, with a focus on knits, basic colors, rich weaves, and youthful lines.

The combined inspiration of Vivian and mother Dina resulted in fashion-forward clothes mitigated by classicism, and Vivian often chided her mother for excessive conservatism. Yet the pair worked well together. Early collections emphasized the sleek lines in vogue during the 1960s, with clingy jersey tops over slim, hip-hugging trousers and mini-skirts. Tiktiner favored the natural fiber fabrics used in active wear, often experimenting with stretch jerseys and printed piques in their youth-oriented clothes. The polo shirt, that icon of French sportswear popularized by René Lacoste, was even fair game, given a clever twist by Vivian and Dina in their one-piece shirt dress with a polo top and faux skirt designed to look like separates. The Tiktiner style, though essentially casual, relied on the buyer’s familiarity with design classics, and the look was equally at home at a beachside tennis court or a Parisian salon.

The family firm, however, did not design only garments meant for warm weather resorts. The biannual collections included autumn-winter lines with thick knits and cold-weather layered looks. In the 1970s Tiktiner made fashion news with their sweater tunics and bulky multicolored sweater coats over plaid shirt jackets in lieu of the traditional cloth coat. Each knitted sweater layer was designed to coordinate, so a lightweight, slim jersey top might slip over a matching skirt under a fuller mohair coat, all in various shades of amber or other compatible hues. These loose, comfortable, mix-and-match cold weather knits fit perfectly into the youthful fashion mood of the period of the 1970s, when even a simple cloth coat could be seen as bourgeois and confining. But Tiktiner was not averse to more traditional coat designs, and were lauded for their updated, shaped “redingote” of rosy wool chinchilla in 1979.

Tiktiner never wavered from the Viterbos’ dedication to style combined with comfort. One clothing group comprised of over 200 pieces highlighted slim waists with drawstring closures, shirred shoulders, and back yokes for easy movement. The collections were frequently hailed for their coordinating palettes; muted earth tones, dusty blues and greens, pale pastels, and paired intensities of the same color figured largely in the Viterbos’ vision. The notion of comfort also emerges when considering Tiktiner’s attention to travel-minded clothes made from lightweight and packable wool challis, mohairs, and double-knits. Underlying the designs was a philosophy based on ease—ease of fit, of combining colors, of simply getting dressed.

—Kathleen Paton

TIMNEY FOWLER LTD.

British textile design firm

Founded: in London in 1980 by husband and wife team Sue Timney (born 9 July 1950) and Grahame Fowler (born 12 January 1956). Timney educated at Carlisle College of Art, 1966–67; Newcastle-upon-Tyne Polytechnic 1971–76, B.A.; Heriot Watt University, Edinburgh, postgraduate diploma, textiles, 1976–77; Royal College of Art, M.A., Textiles, 1977–79. Company History: Incorporated, 1985; partnership developed Japanese market for print design, clothing and accessories consultancy, 1980–84; clients included Issey Miyake and Yohji Yamamoto; opened UK retail outlets and Print

Studio Workshop; interior fabric range, 1984; expanded design services to Yves Saint Laurent, Chloé, and Agnes B., produced for Italian designers Bini and Mantero; exports to Europe and U.S., and designed for Calvin Klein, Kamali, Saks Fifth Avenue, 1985–88; designed tableware and giftware for Wedgwood, 1991; fashion accessories launched in U.S., 1993; signed textile license with Linda McCartney, 1994; contracted to hotels for interior design, 1997; opened office and showroom in New York, 1999; began offering online sales, 2000; members of Chartered Society of Designers, London; Textile Institute, London; Interior Designers and Decorators Association, London. Exhibitions: Period Homes and Interiors, Olympia, London, 1992. Collections: Victoria & Albert Museum, London; Cooper-Hewitt Museum, New York City; Art Institute of Chicago. Awards: Roscoe award, Interior Fabrics, USA, 1988, 1989; Textile Institute Design gold medal, 1991. Company Address: 355 King Street, London W6 9NH, UK. Company Website: www.timneyfowler.com.

PUBLICATIONS

On TIMNEY FOWLER:

Books

- McDermott, Catherine, Street Style: British Design in the 1980s, London, 1987.
 Gordon-Clark, J., Paper Magic, London, 1991.

Articles

- “Timney Fowler Prints,” in Country Life (London), 16 September 1984.
 “England’s Fabric,” in WWD, 3 June 1985.
 “Two’s Company,” in the Sunday Express Magazine (London), 15 September 1985.
 Hall, Dinah, “Family Classics,” in World of Interiors (London), April 1988.
 Hawkins, Heidi, “Culture Club,” in Graphics World, September/October 1988.
 Crawford, I., “Artists in Residence: Mission Impossible,” in Elle Decoration (London), October 1990.
 Heinrich-Jost, Ingrid, “Alte Römer und Junge Englander,” in Frankfurter Allgemein, March 1991.
 “Duo Tones,” in Metropolitan Home, December/January 1991–92.
 Fitzmaurice, Arabella, “Appearing in Print,” in the Sunday Times Magazine (London), 1 March 1992.
 Malone, Scott, “Prints’ Future is Colorful,” in WWD, 26 January 1999.
 Gilbert, Daniela, “Dots Key at Print Shows, Embroideries Still Hot,” in WWD, 25 January 2000.
 Caplan, David Grant, “Black and White Stars at Shows,” in WWD, 30 January 2001.
 “Modernart Editions Debuts New Collection,” in Art Business News, March 2001.

*

Timney Fowler’s distinctive designs draw on the rich symbolism of European art. Neo-classical, architectural and Egyptian images are placed together in unexpected ways to create modern prints. Other designs use hand-drawn symbols to give a softer, more ethnic look.

Animals, leaves and other images from the natural world are also used in unexpected ways.

—Timney Fowler Ltd.

* * *

Sue Timney and Graham Fowler are a design team of international repute who began working together after graduating in textiles from London’s Royal College of Art. Timney had earlier studied fine art and Fowler, graphics and textiles. They launched themselves as freelance fashion designers in 1979, selling printed fabric on the roll. In 1985 they produced their own range of interior furnishings to sell in their first London showroom in Portobello Road.

Self-confessed “20th-century vultures,” their inspiration has been drawn variously from photography, mythology, classicism, and European history, and from the arts and crafts and aesthetic movements—this eclecticism expressed with bold graphic imagery and in an uncompromising monochrome. “Image rather than color is our main vehicle for expression,” Timney explained. “Black and white keeps color to its absolute classical minimum.”

If design hype were to be believed, they virtually invented black and white. This striking classical modernism was taken up avidly by the style conscious avant-garde in the early 1980s. From the early years strong links were established with Japan, from where their work derived many influences. Clients included Yohji Yamamoto and Issey Miyake and the Japanese market has remained an important business connection.

The company’s design criteria could be said to be embodied in the Neo-Classical Collection, the core of the Timney Fowler fabric range, produced in 1984–85. Drawing extensively on the history and symbolism of European art, the designs were presented in the company’s distinctive graphic style, black on white. Greek, Roman, and Florentine objects led by the bestselling Emperor’s Heads; twisted columns, sections of architectural buildings plans, elaborate montages of stonework and foliage scrolls, the unexpected and witty juxtapositions of paisley dolphins teamed with acanthus plasterwork. To complement these classical borrowings was a range of Regency stripes, latticed Victorian ironwork, and small scale heraldic repeats. Linked to all this was a small group of wallpapers, friezes, and borders.

Timney Fowler’s aim has always been to produce “20th-century classics, contemporary and exciting in mood but making few concessions to instant fashion.” The Neo-Classical Collection has been featured in some of the world’s leading museums of modern design. Over the years the duo have become truly international, supplying specialist design consultancy services to leading fashion and household names. Their position in the forefront of British design has been recognized in the UK and internationally with the prestigious Textile Institute Design Medal for “outstanding contributions to textile design and management.” Twice they have been the recipients of the Roscoe award in the United States.

In the late 1980s, Timney Fowler expanded into fashion, with a range of scarves and shawls in wool and silk, silk shirts, ties and t-shirts, waistcoats, and bags. New fabrics included velvet and plastic-coated cotton. Design features included images from Greek and Roman works of art, French tapestries, nautical instruments, along with a strong architectural theme; Russian maps, mosaic floor plans, and in the scarf range what over the years virtually became the company’s logo—the clock—all used in a thoroughly modern way. Surprisingly, having traded for so long on their black and white signature, Timney Fowler at this stage introduced color for the first time into its fashion range. Their shirts and fashion accessories sell worldwide through retail outlets, as well from a New York showroom opened in 1999.

New products continue to emerge, including umbrellas, jewelry, shoes, furniture, lights, and a collection of black and white clothes. Noteworthy is the range of ceramics, mainly neo-classical and paralleling the fabrics. But while the source remains historical, there is also wit and a sense of the surreal. Strongly inspired by the etchings of Piranesi, the 18th-century Venetian architect, they capture the romantic characteristics of his work. On a much larger scale yet maintaining the same imagery are the Timney Fowler gun-tufted rugs—manifestly intended to be centerpieces, perennial designs like Coinhead and Timepiece, all resolutely in black and white, which speak for themselves.

The company fast outgrew its original premises in Portobello Road and in 1986 moved to the highly fashionable Chelsea where they concentrated on key products suited to this more sophisticated milieu—fashion, scarves, ceramics, tableware and interiors. Timney Fowler describe its design philosophy as “a process of evolution, working through one set of ideas in a kind of natural progression, but without any ups and downs.”

Although there has been no let up in the appeal and saleability of Timney and Fowler’s original style theme, much plagiarized by lesser talents, there have been moves to get away from visual typecasting. To this end a major development was the expansion of the Interiors Collection in the early 1990s, from the original black and white neoclassical themes into new fabrics and color, including a range of deep dyed cottons and velvets. New themes have emerged based on Rococo and Toiles, 15th-century European fashion portraits and 18th-century Byzantine paintings.

Color has been creeping into the Timney Fowler scheme of things and, as the designers would have it, not before time. There is also a distinct softening of the edges. Timney has described her earlier work as “clinical and calculated,” and believes the new ecological awareness, lowering of international barriers, and the recession make for less ostentation in the 1990s and again in the early 2000s. Although interiors followed fashion’s lead towards purer, simpler lines, by the end of the century texture, embroidery, and metallics played a prominent role. Micro and miniaturized prints were popular, and Fowler noted to Women’s Wear Daily (26 January 1999), “Simple geometrics in fresh colors have gotten a great response from buyers,” while dots and horizontal borders gained as well. The following year at the English Accents show in January 2000, batik prints with wood-blocked borders and Japanese screen designs were the rage.

The dynamic couple of Timney Fowler had created a stunningly unique look; their contrasting approaches of the formal intellectual on the one hand and flamboyant practicality on the other have been the recipe for an ever-evolving success story which has yet to slow down.

—Elian McCready; updated by Owen James

TINLING, Ted

British designer

Born: Eastbourne, 23 June 1910. Military Service: Served in the British Army, 1939–47, Lieutenant Colonel. Career: Designed custom dresses and sportswear, London, 1931–39 and 1947–75; liaison

Ted Tinling, 1966 collection: dacron souffle tennis catsuit with a vinyl miniskirt decorated in a racquet motif. © AP/Wide World Photos.

committee member, Wimbledon Tennis Association, London, 1927–49, 1982–90; chief of protocol, International Tennis Federation, 1973; immigrated to the U.S., 1975; designer, Virginia Slims Tournament, 1971–78. Awards: British Clothing Institute Designer of the Year award, 1971; International Tennis Hall of Fame award, 1986. Collections: International Tennis Hall of Fame, Newport, Rhode Island. Died: 23 May 1990 in Cambridge, England.

PUBLICATIONS

By TINLING:

Books

White Ladies, London, 1963.
Love and Faults, London, 1979.
Sixty Years in Tennis, London, 1983.

Articles

Numerous columns for British Lawn Tennis.

signature, Timney Fowler at this stage introduced color for the first time into its fashion range. Their shirts and fashion accessories sell worldwide through retail outlets, as well from a New York showroom opened in 1999.

New products continue to emerge, including umbrellas, jewelry, shoes, furniture, lights, and a collection of black and white clothes. Noteworthy is the range of ceramics, mainly neo-classical and paralleling the fabrics. But while the source remains historical, there is also wit and a sense of the surreal. Strongly inspired by the etchings of Piranesi, the 18th-century Venetian architect, they capture the romantic characteristics of his work. On a much larger scale yet maintaining the same imagery are the Timney Fowler gun-tufted rugs—manifestly intended to be centerpieces, perennial designs like Coinhead and Timepiece, all resolutely in black and white, which speak for themselves.

The company fast outgrew its original premises in Portobello Road and in 1986 moved to the highly fashionable Chelsea where they concentrated on key products suited to this more sophisticated milieu—fashion, scarves, ceramics, tableware and interiors. Timney Fowler describe its design philosophy as “a process of evolution, working through one set of ideas in a kind of natural progression, but without any ups and downs.”

Although there has been no let up in the appeal and saleability of Timney and Fowler’s original style theme, much plagiarized by lesser talents, there have been moves to get away from visual typecasting. To this end a major development was the expansion of the Interiors Collection in the early 1990s, from the original black and white neoclassical themes into new fabrics and color, including a range of deep dyed cottons and velvets. New themes have emerged based on Rococo and Toiles, 15th-century European fashion portraits and 18th-century Byzantine paintings.

Color has been creeping into the Timney Fowler scheme of things and, as the designers would have it, not before time. There is also a distinct softening of the edges. Timney has described her earlier work as “clinical and calculated,” and believes the new ecological awareness, lowering of international barriers, and the recession make for less ostentation in the 1990s and again in the early 2000s. Although interiors followed fashion’s lead towards purer, simpler lines, by the end of the century texture, embroidery, and metallics played a prominent role. Micro and miniaturized prints were popular, and Fowler noted to Women’s Wear Daily (26 January 1999), “Simple geometrics in fresh colors have gotten a great response from buyers,” while dots and horizontal borders gained as well. The following year at the English Accents show in January 2000, batik prints with wood-blocked borders and Japanese screen designs were the rage.

The dynamic couple of Timney Fowler had created a stunningly unique look; their contrasting approaches of the formal intellectual on the one hand and flamboyant practicality on the other have been the recipe for an ever-evolving success story which has yet to slow down.

—Elian McCready; updated by Owen James

TINLING, Ted

British designer

Born: Eastbourne, 23 June 1910. Military Service: Served in the British Army, 1939–47, Lieutenant Colonel. Career: Designed custom dresses and sportswear, London, 1931–39 and 1947–75; liaison

Ted Tinling, 1966 collection: dacron souffle tennis catsuit with a vinyl miniskirt decorated in a racquet motif. © AP/Wide World Photos.

committee member, Wimbledon Tennis Association, London, 1927–49, 1982–90; chief of protocol, International Tennis Federation, 1973; immigrated to the U.S., 1975; designer, Virginia Slims Tournament, 1971–78. Awards: British Clothing Institute Designer of the Year award, 1971; International Tennis Hall of Fame award, 1986. Collections: International Tennis Hall of Fame, Newport, Rhode Island. Died: 23 May 1990 in Cambridge, England.

PUBLICATIONS

By TINLING:

Books

White Ladies, London, 1963.
Love and Faults, London, 1979.
Sixty Years in Tennis, London, 1983.

Articles

Numerous columns for British Lawn Tennis.

Ted Tinling, 1967 collection: tennis ensembles with racquet motif.
© AP/Wide World Photos.

"From Bustles to Bodysuits," with Camille Peri, in Women's Sports & Fitness (Boulder, Colorado), U.S. Open special advertising section, September 1986.

"Stay Back to Get Ahead," in World Tennis (New York), June 1987.

"The Goddess and the American Girl," [book review] in Tennis (New York), April 1988.

"Tennis Idol of the Twenties," [book review] in Tennis, April 1988.

"Who's the Best Ever?" in World Tennis, March 1989.

On TINLING:

Books

Glyn, Prudence, In Fashion: Dress in the 20th Century, New York, 1978.

Wade, Virginia, Ladies of the Court, London, 1984.

Articles

"An Interview with Teddy Tinling," in World Tennis, December 1954.

Glynn, Prudence, "That Tinling Feeling," in the Times (London), 11 June 1971.

Cox, Sue, "Teddy Tinling: The Go-Between," in the Sunday Express Magazine (London), 26 June 1983.

Flink, Steve, "The Professor of His Profession," in World Tennis, June 1985.

_____, "You Must Remember This," in World Tennis, February 1986.

Bodo, Peter, "Why Tinling Worries About the Women," in Tennis, May 1986.

Griggs, Barbara, "Wimbledon's Other Champion," in the Daily Telegraph (London), 19 June 1986.

Ciampa, Gail, "Tinling's Shocking Tennis Togs Now Tame Stuff," in the Providence Journal Bulletin (Rhode Island), 23 July 1987.

Rothlein, Lewis, "Combining Form with Fashion," in Women's Sports & Fitness (Boulder, Colorado), August 1988.

Thomas, Robert, "Ted Tinling, Designer, Dies at 79; A Combiner of Tennis and Lace," in the New York Times, 24 May 1990.

Cullman, Joseph F., "Tinling: Patrician Sage for the World of Tennis," in the New York Times, 27 May 1990.

Bodo, Peter, "Ted Tinling, the Doyen of Women's Tennis," in Tennis, June 1990.

"Died, Ted Tinling," in Time, 4 June 1990.

Finn, Robin, "Ted Tinling, Couturier and Critic, is Remembered at Service," in the New York Times, 25 June 1990.

Pignon, Laurie, "Ted Tinling: 1910–1990," in Women's Tennis (New York), July 1990.

Flink, Steve, "He Left Them Tinling," in World Tennis, August 1990.

* * *

Teddy Tinling was a major presence in the world of international tennis from the late 1920s until his death at the age of 79 in 1990. Among the roles he filled were player, umpire, announcer, ombudsman, raconteur, historian, and designer to generations of champions.

Tinling's entrance into the professional side of tennis came about wholly by chance. In the absence of a club official, he was asked to referee a match in Nice starring the legendary Suzanne Lenglen when he was only 13 years old. The unlikely combination of smitten teenager and temperamental tennis star gelled and Tinling accompanied Lenglen to Wimbledon. In 1927 he became Wimbledon's official liaison between the tournament's players and its committee members. He held the position until 1949.

At the age of 21, Tinling decided on dressmaking as a profession, setting himself up in South Kensington, London. His first collection was shown in 1931, and by 1939 Tinling had moved to Mayfair where a staff of 100 worked on the wedding gowns and evening dresses that were his specialty. After serving in World War II, Tinling sought to resume his business yet postwar utility regulations combined with a shortage of raw materials prevented him from creating luxurious gowns for the carriage trade. Tinling turned instead to the new phenomenon, sportswear. Standard wear at the time for women on the tennis court was a blouse or jersey and a pair of culottes, an outfit which Tinling thought utterly lacking in femininity or style. His heroine Suzanne Lenglen always looked glamorous on or off the court, always dressed as the star she was. Tinling determined to bring these qualities to women's tennis clothes.

His designs were controversial from the outset—Tinling's first commission, for Joy Gannon's Wimbledon debut in 1947, was a dress with a small colored border at the hem. A similar design the following year for champion Betty Hilton's Wightman Cup match so outraged

Hazel Wightman she threatened to ban color—if not Tinling—from future Wimbledon games. Into this brewing storm blew Gertrude “gorgeous Gussy” Moran. Could Ted, she wrote from California, design her a dress for Wimbledon? A very colorful dress?

Tinling correctly predicted that an all-white rule would prevail for the 1949 games and so he designed instead a dress in proper white of satin-trimmed rayon, which shimmered, he said, as did Moran herself. Came the fitting, it was apparent that a pair of panties would be required to complete the ensemble. As legend has it, Tinling finished off the pants with a bit of lace edging and with this act inadvertently secured his place in fashion history. Moran was besieged by the press; photographers crawled behind her on their stomachs to achieve the most advantageous camera angle. Tinling was accused of introducing sin and vulgarity to a gentleman’s game and was banned from Wimbledon for the next 33 years.

Tinling’s clothes, however, were not banned, and they continued to provoke Wimbledon officialdom as they continued to bring a sense of flair and glamour to center court. Tinling had an easy rapport with the stars of the game. He designed to suit the playing style and personality of the players he came to know so well, matching fabric, trim, and cut to the individual. Between 1952 and 1961 every female champion at Wimbledon and most winners of the U.S. Women’s Open wore Tinling’s dresses. In 1973 he dressed the winners of every major international tournament.

Tinling continued to subvert the all-white regulations, which he felt led to clothing lacking spectator appeal and contributing nothing to a player’s individuality. In 1950 he conceived a shirt and shorts ensemble of broderie anglaise which the United Press dubbed the “peekaboo” suit, thus assuring its later success in the retail market. A few years later Lea Pericoli sported a pink petticoat under her dress for the 1955 Wimbledon games. In 1962 Tinling’s designs for Maria Bueno proved too provocative to escape censure—Bueno’s Wimbledon costumes were enhanced with colored diamond-shaped petals which appeared in a sunburst pattern on her skirt lining and across her panties. One costume came suspiciously close to the official tournament colors; Bueno’s semifinal match was lost amidst outbursts of temper and flashes of hot pink. The committee closed ranks and banned color for a second time.

From 1971 to 1978 Tinling was the official designer for the Virginia Slims circuit. It was here that he was able to introduce color to the game in a significant way. For the Slims circuit Tinling might design 100 dresses per season, each unique to the player, with color as the unifying factor. When the occasion called for it, Tinling could bring a sense of drama and flamboyance to the game. For Rosie Casals, he created a three-piece ensemble in, of all things, black velvet. Billie Jean King’s “battle of the sexes” match against Bobby Riggs was fought in a sequined dress which perfectly suited the frivolity of the event, even as it made sure she would be visible to spectators at the top of Houston’s vast Astrodome.

Largely because of the Virginia Slims tournament and owing to the efforts of the women themselves, women’s tennis in the late 1970s became popular enough for sportswear manufacturers to offer lucrative endorsement contracts to the players. Unfortunately for Tinling, this ended his career as a custom designer for the women’s tennis circuit.

Within the profession Tinling was respected as the supreme arbiter who represented players to management in an official capacity not only at Wimbledon, where he was reinstated in 1982, but at the other three Grand Slam events as well as on the Slims tour. His encyclopedic knowledge of tennis and tennis players made him an oral historian of the game, and keeper of its traditions. For six decades Ted Tinling and tennis were synonymous.

—Whitney Blausen

TISE, Jane

See ESPRIT

TOI, Zang

American designer

Born: Malaysia, 11 June 1961. Education: Studied fashion design at Parsons School of Design, New York, 1981–83. Career: Production associate, Mary Jane Marcosiano, New York, 1982–87; freelance designer, Ronaldus Shamask, New York, 1988; opened own business, 1989, introduced diffusion line Z, 1992. Exhibitions: Fashion Institute of Technology Museum. Awards: Mouton-Cadet Young Designer

Zang Toi, fall 2001 collection: silk/wool/cashmere/mohair handknit cardigan wrap and turtleneck with a cashmere mini-kilt. © AP/Wide World Photos/Fashion Wire Daily.

Hazel Wightman she threatened to ban color—if not Tinling—from future Wimbledon games. Into this brewing storm blew Gertrude “gorgeous Gussy” Moran. Could Ted, she wrote from California, design her a dress for Wimbledon? A very colorful dress?

Tinling correctly predicted that an all-white rule would prevail for the 1949 games and so he designed instead a dress in proper white of satin-trimmed rayon, which shimmered, he said, as did Moran herself. Came the fitting, it was apparent that a pair of panties would be required to complete the ensemble. As legend has it, Tinling finished off the pants with a bit of lace edging and with this act inadvertently secured his place in fashion history. Moran was besieged by the press; photographers crawled behind her on their stomachs to achieve the most advantageous camera angle. Tinling was accused of introducing sin and vulgarity to a gentleman’s game and was banned from Wimbledon for the next 33 years.

Tinling’s clothes, however, were not banned, and they continued to provoke Wimbledon officialdom as they continued to bring a sense of flair and glamour to center court. Tinling had an easy rapport with the stars of the game. He designed to suit the playing style and personality of the players he came to know so well, matching fabric, trim, and cut to the individual. Between 1952 and 1961 every female champion at Wimbledon and most winners of the U.S. Women’s Open wore Tinling’s dresses. In 1973 he dressed the winners of every major international tournament.

Tinling continued to subvert the all-white regulations, which he felt led to clothing lacking spectator appeal and contributing nothing to a player’s individuality. In 1950 he conceived a shirt and shorts ensemble of broderie anglaise which the United Press dubbed the “peekaboo” suit, thus assuring its later success in the retail market. A few years later Lea Pericoli sported a pink petticoat under her dress for the 1955 Wimbledon games. In 1962 Tinling’s designs for Maria Bueno proved too provocative to escape censure—Bueno’s Wimbledon costumes were enhanced with colored diamond-shaped petals which appeared in a sunburst pattern on her skirt lining and across her panties. One costume came suspiciously close to the official tournament colors; Bueno’s semifinal match was lost amidst outbursts of temper and flashes of hot pink. The committee closed ranks and banned color for a second time.

From 1971 to 1978 Tinling was the official designer for the Virginia Slims circuit. It was here that he was able to introduce color to the game in a significant way. For the Slims circuit Tinling might design 100 dresses per season, each unique to the player, with color as the unifying factor. When the occasion called for it, Tinling could bring a sense of drama and flamboyance to the game. For Rosie Casals, he created a three-piece ensemble in, of all things, black velvet. Billie Jean King’s “battle of the sexes” match against Bobby Riggs was fought in a sequined dress which perfectly suited the frivolity of the event, even as it made sure she would be visible to spectators at the top of Houston’s vast Astrodome.

Largely because of the Virginia Slims tournament and owing to the efforts of the women themselves, women’s tennis in the late 1970s became popular enough for sportswear manufacturers to offer lucrative endorsement contracts to the players. Unfortunately for Tinling, this ended his career as a custom designer for the women’s tennis circuit.

Within the profession Tinling was respected as the supreme arbiter who represented players to management in an official capacity not only at Wimbledon, where he was reinstated in 1982, but at the other three Grand Slam events as well as on the Slims tour. His encyclopedic knowledge of tennis and tennis players made him an oral historian of the game, and keeper of its traditions. For six decades Ted Tinling and tennis were synonymous.

—Whitney Blausen

TISE, Jane

See ESPRIT

TOI, Zang

American designer

Born: Malaysia, 11 June 1961. Education: Studied fashion design at Parsons School of Design, New York, 1981–83. Career: Production associate, Mary Jane Marcosiano, New York, 1982–87; freelance designer, Ronaldus Shamask, New York, 1988; opened own business, 1989, introduced diffusion line Z, 1992. Exhibitions: Fashion Institute of Technology Museum. Awards: Mouton-Cadet Young Designer award for Outstanding Achievement in the Arts, 1990. Address: 30 West 57th Street, New York, NY 10019, USA.

Zang Toi, fall 2001 collection: silk/wool/cashmere/mohair handknit cardigan wrap and turtleneck with a cashmere mini-kilt. © AP/Wide World Photos/Fashion Wire Daily.

PUBLICATIONS

On TOI:

Books

Stegemeyer, Anne, Who's Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.

Articles

- Starzinger, Page Hill, "New Faces," in Vogue, March 1990.
 Baker, Martha, "Back to School," in New York Magazine, 17 September 1990.
 De Caro, Frank, "Fashion New Kids: On the Block," in Newsday, 3 October 1990.
 Darnton, Nina, "The New York Brat Pack," in Newsweek, 29 April 1991.
 "Great Expectations," in WWD, 12 June 1991.
 Goodman, Wendy, "Couture Cuisine," in House and Garden, December 1991.
 Ezersky, Lauren, "Going for the Glitz," in Paper (New York), October 1992.
 Pan, Esther, "Zang Toi's Zzzerious Couture," online at Newsweek.WashingtonPost.com, 20–21 February 1999.
 Redstone, Susan, "Zang Toi," at FashionWindows.com, 31 December 2000.
 Kee, William K.C., "Grand Entrance," at TheStar.com, 3 January 2001.
 Elkins, Laura Lee, "Designer Zang Toi at Gus Mayer," in the City Paper, 25 January 2001.
 Ong, Shirley, "Louis XVI Meets the Last Emperor," at TheStar.com, 31 January 2001.
 Marsh, Lisa, "Zang Toi is Rolling Out Men's Line," in the New York Post, 13 February 2001.
 Stern, Jared Paul, "Otherwise, How Was the Show?" in the New York Post, 17 February 2001.
 "Infinite Variety," in WWD, 20 February 2001.
 Townsend, Catherine, "Zang Toi's Scottish-Asian Fantasy," in Fashion Wire Daily (New York), 21 February 2001.

*

At the house of Toi, it all starts with color. Lavish hues of chartreuse, red, and hot pink...which, theoretically, should never be seen together. Here they have been combined masterfully with a flair and wit that has won the hearts of both critics and customers alike. Breaking the rules is what I do best. I try not to limit my thinking to the way things have been done before—my customers have come to expect the unexpected. Pioneering in dressing up good old all-American denim—in splashy red and hot pink stitching—and [adding] metallic gold stitching to sexy suits and little bustier dresses is the chicest way to dress.

The Zang Toi formula is creating glamorous, tailored, classic sportswear with a dramatic twist; with a surprising mixed palette and signature design finishes. Evening at Zang Toi means haute fantasy with a dash of old Hollywood glamor.

It is always a dream of mine to merge my fashion sense with fine food.... Food is like fashion; clothes are just a piece of cloth until you add the decoration and the look, then it becomes fashion. The same with food—once you start decorating it becomes appetizing. My personal philosophy is that beautiful food and clothes should always be a part of life.

—Zang Toi

* * *

Zang Toi has the dubious distinction of being a featured designer in a Newsday article of October 1990, "Fashion's New Kids: On the Block," and of being a principal in Nina Darnton's article "The New York Brat Pack," in the April 1991 issue of Newsweek. In the Newsweek article, Zang Toi had the last word, telling Darnton, "I think women are looking for good prices and styles that are new—not just young people in the same mold as the current stars." Likewise, in the Newsday article, Toi's pragmatic and sensible remarks form the article's conclusion when he says, "There are so many young designers who are eager to be stars right away. But ego can be the worst killer to any young designer. You can't let the press and the hype go to your head. If the work doesn't meet the demand and the quality, it doesn't mean anything."

Toi's work resoundingly meets demand and determined desires and styles in the early 1990s. The gifted young designer has demonstrated a color sensibility related not only to Asian textiles (the collection that earned him the Mouton-Cadet Young Designer award was inspired by Southeast Asian textiles, with rich batiks and embroideries) but perhaps equally to Matisse in his vibrant palette. Toi's color is often and aptly compared to Christian Lacroix's, but Toi has brought his tinted exuberance to serviceable sportswear separates while Lacroix tends toward almost baroque forms of highly elaborated couture. For Lacroix, the pleasure is in the whole and design by ensemble; in Toi's work, the delights are in the elements. Even within, his ingenious and extravagant details give punctuation with whimsy. Well-cut jackets, saucy skirts and shorts, spunky sarong skirts with ornament, wonderful vests and trousers provide a sensible dressing from constituents rich in color and texture. As much as Toi loves glamor, he also created a diffusion line, Z, launched in 1992, that luxuriates in denim and less expensive fabrication.

Toi did not set out to be a designer. Growing up as the youngest son of seven children of a grocer in a small town in Malaysia, he loved sketching and drawing but dreamed of being an architect or interior designer. His love of fashion came later and always in conjunction with cuisine and other pleasurable arts. He admits to wanting to combine fashion and running a restaurant. Like many designers, however, a lifetime interest in classic movie glamor and stars such as Audrey Hepburn encouraged his fashion interests. The Malay tradewinds have always brought rich interactions of British colonialism (apparent in Toi's schoolboy stripes), Chinese, Indonesian, and other converging possibilities. Exoticism and pragmatic synthesis seem to come effortlessly to Toi.

In the West, we have traditionally enjoyed an adulation of the new, and Zang Toi is a new designer. But his merit and interest reside in the fact that his design is distinguished not by novelty but by his intense commitment to color. His fashion draws eclectically and with an absorbing anachronism on history and global fashion, always keeping his international eye for color. His practicality and sensitivity to the consumer are hallmarks of smart design for the 1990s and the 21st century beyond. Infinitely personable and charming, Toi, like many Western designers, is a social mixer and has a gregarious personality. Lauren Eversky wrote, "I love Zang. Everybody loves Zang. He truly is one of the nicest designers on the scene today. And his designs are as fabulous as his gams, which he displays on a regular basis by wearing shorts."

Zang Toi, fall 2001 collection: silk/cashmere shirt and cigarette pants with a stole. © AP/Wide World Photos/Fashion Wire Daily.

In a fiercely competitive and fickle industry, Toi has flourished as a high society and movie star fashion designer. His commitment to luxury, beauty, and glamor continued to be evident in his designs, which made him the obvious choice to create a millennium gown for Melinda Gates (Mrs. Bill Gates). Whether the theme is the wild, wild West, inspired by a Montana trip (spring 2001), or "An Asian in Scotland" (fall 2001), his collections are executed in the finest fabrics and characterized by his signature use of color and attention to detail. His fall showing was one of the few to receive a standing ovation and praise from the New York fashion critics.

A favorite of Madonna, Sharon Stone, Ivana Trump, and Kirstie Alley, Toi is reaching out to their significant others by introducing a limited men's line for fall 2001. "This is really for the husbands and boyfriends of my private customers. They are the ones who pay for the clothes." Like his women's clothes, the new line is handmade or hand-knit and uses luxury fibers like cashmere and silk.

Zang Toi has held fast to his vision of fashion, despite an era of increasing informality and casual dress. "It is not a separate thing outside you, but something that flows out from inside you. That is why my clothes, my home, and my showroom all reflect a core that comes from the same source—a beauty that I see and feel and which takes its form in the look and feel of my creations and in the space where I live and work." No longer the new kid on the block, Zang Toi continues to inspire and delight and remind us of what fashion and glamor are really all about.

—Richard Martin and Christina Lindholm

TOLEDO, Isabel

Cuban designer working in New York

Born: Cuba, 9 April 1961. Education: Studied painting and ceramics, then fashion design, at the Fashion Institute of Technology and Parsons School of Design, New York. Family: Married Ruben century beyond. Infinitely personable and charming, Toi, like many Western designers, is a social mixer and has a gregarious personality. Lauren Eversky wrote, "I love Zang. Everybody loves Zang. He truly is one of the nicest designers on the scene today. And his designs are as fabulous as his gams, which he displays on a regular basis by wearing shorts."

Isabel Toledo, fall 1998 collection. © Fashion Syndicate Press.

Zang Toi, fall 2001 collection: silk/cashmere shirt and cigarette pants with a stole. © AP/Wide World Photos/Fashion Wire Daily.

In a fiercely competitive and fickle industry, Toi has flourished as a high society and movie star fashion designer. His commitment to luxury, beauty, and glamor continued to be evident in his designs, which made him the obvious choice to create a millennium gown for Melinda Gates (Mrs. Bill Gates). Whether the theme is the wild, wild West, inspired by a Montana trip (spring 2001), or "An Asian in Scotland" (fall 2001), his collections are executed in the finest fabrics and characterized by his signature use of color and attention to detail. His fall showing was one of the few to receive a standing ovation and praise from the New York fashion critics.

A favorite of Madonna, Sharon Stone, Ivana Trump, and Kirstie Alley, Toi is reaching out to their significant others by introducing a limited men's line for fall 2001. "This is really for the husbands and boyfriends of my private customers. They are the ones who pay for the clothes." Like his women's clothes, the new line is handmade or hand-knit and uses luxury fibers like cashmere and silk.

Zang Toi has held fast to his vision of fashion, despite an era of increasing informality and casual dress. "It is not a separate thing outside you, but something that flows out from inside you. That is why my clothes, my home, and my showroom all reflect a core that comes from the same source—a beauty that I see and feel and which takes its form in the look and feel of my creations and in the space where I live and work." No longer the new kid on the block, Zang Toi continues to inspire and delight and remind us of what fashion and glamor are really all about.

—Richard Martin and Christina Lindholm

TOLEDO, Isabel

Cuban designer working in New York

Born: Cuba, 9 April 1961. Education: Studied painting and ceramics, then fashion design, at the Fashion Institute of Technology and Parsons School of Design, New York. Family: Married Ruben

Isabel Toledo, fall 1998 collection. © Fashion Syndicate Press.

Toledo, 1984. Career: Showed first collection, 1985; stopped showing collections in traditional runway shows, 1988; opened first store, Isabel Toledo Lab, 1998; returned to regular showings of her collections, late 1990s. Exhibitions: Toledo/Toledo: A Marriage of Art and Fashion, Fashion Institute of Technology (traveling to other museums), 1999; Interpretation: 20th Century Clothing and Illustration, Ohio State University/Ohio Arts Council, 2000. Awards: Coty American Fashion Critics "Winnie" award; Women's Wear Designer of the Year, Hispanic Designers Inc.; Otis Critics' award named for her at the Los Angeles-based Otis School of Fashion Design. Address: 277 Fifth Avenue, New York, NY 10016, USA

PUBLICATIONS

By TOLEDO:

Books

Toledo/Toledo: A Marriage of Art and Fashion, with Ruben Toledo, New York, 1999.

On TOLEDO:

Books

Steele, Valerie, Women of Fashion: Twentieth Century Designers, New York, 1991.

Stegemeyer, Anne, Who's Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.

Articles

Schiro, Anne-Marie, "Hot New Young Designers," in Cosmopolitan, June 1987.

"Storm Over Toledo," in Connoisseur (New York), February 1992.

Rosenblum, Anne, "Partners in Style," in Harper's Bazaar, March 1992.

Gordon, Mary Ellen, "Isabel Toledo's Cottage Industry," in WWD, 27 May 1992.

"What Do Women Want?" in Mirabella (New York), October 1992. "The Toledos," in Mirabella, January 1993.

Wadyka, Sally, "A Structured Life," in Vogue, February 1995.

Mason, Christopher, "A Pair of Muses, Above It All," in the New York Times, 27 February 1997.

Spindler, Amy, "The Gutsy, the Greedy, the Humble," in the New York Times, 8 April 1997.

Granados, Christine, "Memories and Culture Inspire Isabel Toledo's Clothing Designs," in Hispanic Magazine, January-February 1998.

Edelson, Sharon, "Isabel Toledo's First Store: Staying on the Edge," in WWD, 11 March 1998.

Hastreiter, Kim, "Isabel Toledo," in Paper, Fall 1998.

Bissonnette, Anne, "Introducing Isabel Toledo," in Threads, November 2000.

* * *

The United States is better known for the mass production of clothing than for nourishing avant-garde talent. Isabel Toledo was one of the few cutting-edge designers working in New York, and financial success has been a long time coming. When she began designing professionally in 1986, Toledo was immediately recognized as a powerful talent; her clothes were featured in magazines like Vogue and Harper's Bazaar and sold in prestigious stores like Bendel's of New York. Since then, however, she has had legal difficulties with financial backers, as well as problems with American retail store executives.

Toledo did not sell a single piece of clothing at retail in the U.S. for three years in the early 1990s. She and her husband, artist Ruben Toledo, told Women's Wear Daily that they just could not afford to take orders from stores that refused to provide half payment up front. Meanwhile, store buyers worried that her line was too "experimental" for the American market. She survived on the business from sales in Japan and Paris. "It makes sense for us to sell to Japanese and European accounts because when they give you an order, they give you the money," she said. She also had the patronage of about 60 devoted private clients, who were attracted by what she calls her penchant for "practicality disguised as fantasy."

Through it all, Toledo was a cult figure among fashion enthusiasts. Her fellow designers admired her tremendously; Todd Oldham called her "one of America's greatest resources." Both Marc Jacobs and Christian Francis Roth have praised her "incredible" talent and urged retailers to advance her money. Journalists, too, agreed: "Best overall collection for our money was Isabel Toledo, who ignored the market and concentrated on a well-edited, very weird, internal vision," raved a reporter for the Village Voice. Toledo is a "great designer...traveling on that new American highway of fashion," argued Kim Hastreiter of Paper. She had finally begun to achieve the financial recognition she deserved in the middle and late 1990s, and her clothes were available in Barneys New York (Manhattan, Chicago, and Beverly Hills).

Toledo designs clothes that are structured, even architectural, and sometimes (as she says) "rather severe—a lot of black and strong shapes." She has always started with a shape, usually a circle or a curved line: a circle skirt, a curved bra, a flared apron overskirt, the sweeping arc of a coat. "I'm not a fashion designer," insists Toledo. "I'm a seamstress. I really love the technique of sewing more than anything else." She believes it is crucial to know fashion from the inside: through cutting, draping, pattern making, and sewing. Among the designers she admires are women like Madeleine Vionnet and Madame Grès, who also worked in three dimensions rather than from a flat sketch. Toledo sees definite advantages in being a woman designer, because they "experience" the way the clothing feels. Men, she believes, tend to be more "decorators of clothing."

Like Claire McCardell, creator in the 1940s of the "American look," the Cuban-born Toledo has used classic materials such as denim and cotton flannel plaid in a modern way. Although inventive tailoring is characteristic of her work, her clothes are not for "an office type of person," she admits, but for someone like herself—artistic and feminine. There is also a futuristic element in her work, which she sees as being related to her experiences as an immigrant to a new country. Unlike many designers, Toledo has never been interested in recycling styles from the past, preferring to experiment with the basic materials of her art and to explore the future of fashion.

Toledo's work has remained critically acclaimed—especially by avant-garde fashion publications such as Paper and Visionaire—but not readily adapted by the bulk of fashion consumers. Despite this lack of mass appeal, Toledo has managed to maintain a successful business by selling to an upscale clientèle embracing her nontrend-dependent creations. From her Zigzag Dress and Jellyfish Blouse to her Gym Teacher, Kangaroo, and twisting Caterpillar Dresses, Toledo's sense of shape, color, fabric, architecture, and movement have remained at the forefront of fashion.

Isabel Toledo, fall 1998 collection. © Fashion Syndicate Press.

Toledo stopped showing her collections in traditional seasonal runway shows in 1988. She believed designers rushed to get ready for such shows, ending up with unfinished pieces. She prefers to let her designs develop in their own time. In addition, to be noticed at runway shows, a designer must be "loud"—Toledo believes designs should develop organically rather than being created to attract attention. Her business even improved after she stopped showing, which she attributed to the fact that her designs were fully formed by the time they were seen by her customers. In the late 1990s, however, Toledo began to show again.

In 1998 Toledo—still without a corporate backer—opened her first store, called the Lab, in New York near Madison Square Garden. The shop featured children's clothing, menswear, home furnishings, and the womenswear for which she is known. The Toledos felt the location, atypically located on the fifth rather than ground floor and far away from other designer shops, suited Toledo well by allowing her customers privacy and by reflecting her lack of interest in following trends. The designer's latest efforts were roundly praised, by the New York Times, which had already labeled her a fashion original in 1997—"Only great designers can dispense with themes and theatrics and let the work speak instead. Ms. Toledo does just that, letting fashion itself be the theme, and the theatrics come from the improbable cuts, drapes and drawstrings that hike dresses here and there."

Toledo and her Lab shop continued to gain exposure and accolades from the fashion press. In March 1998 Women's Wear Daily commented that Toledo showed "artsy, sometimes silly pieces...[but] when she does make sense, she makes beautiful clothes." Kim Hastreiter, writing for Paper in the fall of 1998, captured the essence of Toledo's career when she noted, "Isabel Toledo is without a doubt one of America's most talented designers. Her work is so far removed from mass marketing, unfortunately, it seems she may only become recognized in museums and art books." For Toledo, however, the ambiguities of fame and widespread recognition recall a battle she won long ago.

—Valerie Steele; updated by Karen Raugust

TOMALIN, Lewis

See JAEGER

TOMPKINS, Susie and Doug

See ESPRIT

TORII, Yuki

Japanese fashion designer

Born: Tokyo, Japan, 3 January 1943. Education: Studied at the Bunka College of Art, Tokyo, 1958–61. Family: Married Takao Torii, 1974; children: Maki. Career: Freelance designer, working in Torii Ginza Boutique, Tokyo, founded by her grandmother, 1952 (now belonging to Yuki Torii); presented first designs within her mother's collection, 1962; established Torii Company Ltd., ready-to-wear firm, Tokyo, 1972; first Paris collection, autumn 1975; launched Yuki Torii Deux label and Yuki Torii International, 1983; opened Yuki Torii Design Studio, Tokyo, 1984; established Yuki Torii France S.A., 1985; designed costumes for theatre and television; designs include ready-to-wear for men and women, printed fabrics, kimonos, lacquerware, accessories, interior design items, and childrenswear; member of NDC (Nippon Designer Club), from 1984. Awards: Fashion Editors Club award, Paris, 1976; Japan Fashion Editors Club, Best Designer of the Year, 1988. Address: Yuki Torii Design Office, Daito Building, 1–5–1 Minami Azabu Minato-ku, Tokyo 106, Japan.

PUBLICATIONS

On TORII:

Books

The Tokyo Collection: Graphic Sha, Tokyo, 1986.

Isabel Toledo, fall 1998 collection. © Fashion Syndicate Press.

sense of shape, color, fabric, architecture, and movement have remained at the forefront of fashion.

Toledo stopped showing her collections in traditional seasonal runway shows in 1988. She believed designers rushed to get ready for such shows, ending up with unfinished pieces. She prefers to let her designs develop in their own time. In addition, to be noticed at runway shows, a designer must be "loud"—Toledo believes designs should develop organically rather than being created to attract attention. Her business even improved after she stopped showing, which she attributed to the fact that her designs were fully formed by the time they were seen by her customers. In the late 1990s, however, Toledo began to show again.

In 1998 Toledo—still without a corporate backer—opened her first store, called the Lab, in New York near Madison Square Garden. The shop featured children's clothing, menswear, home furnishings, and the womenswear for which she is known. The Toledos felt the location, atypically located on the fifth rather than ground floor and far away from other designer shops, suited Toledo well by allowing her customers privacy and by reflecting her lack of interest in following trends. The designer's latest efforts were roundly praised, by the New York Times, which had already labeled her a fashion original in 1997—"Only great designers can dispense with themes and theatrics and let the work speak instead. Ms. Toledo does just that, letting fashion itself be the theme, and the theatrics come from the improbable cuts, drapes and drawstrings that hike dresses here and there."

Toledo and her Lab shop continued to gain exposure and accolades from the fashion press. In March 1998 Women's Wear Daily commented that Toledo showed "artsy, sometimes silly pieces...[but] when she does make sense, she makes beautiful clothes." Kim Hastreiter, writing for Paper in the fall of 1998, captured the essence of Toledo's career when she noted, "Isabel Toledo is without a doubt one of America's most talented designers. Her work is so far removed from mass marketing, unfortunately, it seems she may only become recognized in museums and art books." For Toledo, however, the ambiguities of fame and widespread recognition recall a battle she won long ago.

—Valerie Steele; updated by Karen Raugust

TOMALIN, Lewis

See JAEGER

TOMPKINS, Susie and Doug

See ESPRIT

TORII, Yuki

Japanese fashion designer

Born: Tokyo, Japan, 3 January 1943. Education: Studied at the Bunka College of Art, Tokyo, 1958–61. Family: Married Takao Torii, 1974; children: Maki. Career: Freelance designer, working in Torii Ginza Boutique, Tokyo, founded by her grandmother, 1952 (now belonging to Yuki Torii); presented first designs within her mother's collection, 1962; established Torii Company Ltd., ready-to-wear firm, Tokyo, 1972; first Paris collection, autumn 1975; launched Yuki Torii Deux label and Yuki Torii International, 1983; opened Yuki Torii Design Studio, Tokyo, 1984; established Yuki Torii France S.A., 1985; designed costumes for theatre and television; designs include ready-to-wear for men and women, printed fabrics, kimonos, lacquerware, accessories, interior design items, and childrenswear; member of NDC (Nippon Designer Club), from 1984. Awards: Fashion Editors Club award, Paris, 1976; Japan Fashion Editors Club, Best Designer of the Year, 1988. Address: Yuki Torii Design Office, Daito Building, 1–5–1 Minami Azabu Minato-ku, Tokyo 106, Japan.

PUBLICATIONS

On TORII:

Books

The Tokyo Collection: Graphic Sha, Tokyo, 1986.

Yuki Torii, spring/summer 2001 ready-to-wear collection. © AP/Wide World Photos.

Articles

- Monique, "They Have a Yen for Traditional Japanese Styles," in the New York Daily News, 1975.
 —, "Paris' New Household Word: Yuki," in the New York Daily News, 1975.
 de Turckheim, Hélène, "Le Travail c'est la Santé de la Mode," in Le Figaro (Paris), 9 December 1975.
 "Yuki Torii," in WWD, 19 December 1975.
 "Mais Qu'est-ce qui fait courir les Japonais?" in Gap, December/January 1977–78.
 Klensch, Elsa, "Cool Kimonos: Torii's Creations are Feminine and Fun," on CNN, 25 November 1998.
 Saito, Mayumi, "Yuki Torii," in Japan Today, 19 April 2001.

*

I create clothes which make women beautiful, happy, and gay. My clothes are easy to wear. They are made in beautiful colors, vivid or tender. Reflecting well the air du temps, [my clothes] are trendy and modern, but never provocative. I like femininity and le charme based on nature and harmony.

There is no age to wear my clothes; they are for women of any age. At first sight, my clothes give the impression of being destined for the very young, because of the bright colors. But they give successfully a young and modern allure to any woman. My philosophy—the clothes should make the person who wears them beautiful and happy as well as the people who look at her.

—Yuki Torii

* * *

As a child, Yuki Torii had ambitions of becoming a painter. Pattern and color had always excited her, and when she became a professional designer in the early 1960s, her approach always began with the textile or color, with a defined choice of palette that ranged from pastels to brights. These bold, vivid colors have been an enduring and recognizable quality in Torii's work. One distinctive collection was autumn/winter 1986, which mixed rigorously colored tartans and checks for menswear, womenswear, and childrenswear. The collection consisted of lively, wearable separates; oversize tartan shirts, tartan trousers, and comfortable cardigans for men; long tartan flounced skirts for women, teamed with long, skinny rib jumpers or oversized Argyle patterned sweaters; tartan pinafore dresses for girls and a weatherbeaten, mountaineering look for boys, layering tartan overshirts over tartan Levi-style jackets.

Yuki Torii, spring/summer 2001 ready-to-wear collection. © AP/Wide World Photos.

The vibrant Yuki Torii collection sold as part of Liberty of London's Japan at Liberty promotion in 1991 and displayed a more sophisticated air, paying homage to the style of Coco Chanel combined with the color combinations of Christian Lacroix. Vibrant tweeds in unities of orange, lime green, red, grass green, yellow, pale pink, and fuchsia were made into neat, boxy suits, and separates. Much of the fabric was fringed at the hems of garments, and flower-shaped tweed emblems were interesting details appliquéd on pockets and trims.

Torii was the youngest student to have enrolled at the Bunka Gakuin College of Art in Tokyo when she was 15. This precocious talent led her to sell her first creations in her grandmother's haute couture boutique Ginza in Tokyo. By 1972 she had established her own ready-to-wear business, Torii Co. Ltd., and by 1975 had shown her first collection in the prestigious Paris ready-to-wear collections.

Torii has often been told her clothes look best on herself, and it is from this perspective that she begins designing. The approach is similar to that adopted by many other female designers, in particular Jean Muir, who is renowned for producing clothes women really want to wear and feel comfortable in. Torii thinks it natural that female designers conceive ideas from themselves and their roles and needs as women. She likes to project an overall image of sweetness in her clothes, a sweetness retained in images of childrenswear but is often lost in adult fashion. She achieves this by never presenting themes that threaten or provoke controversy. Her look instead is a harmonious combination of contrasting color and fabric that is wearable and flattering but often incorporates the unusual detailing found in children's clothes, for instance, Western cowboy detailing on children's shirts or the naive flower emblems in her tweed collection.

In 1983, two new brands were created, Yuki Torii Deux and Yuki Torii International. Licensed products like scarves, furs, gloves, belts, eyewear, neckties, and umbrellas were produced from the Yuki Torii Design Studio established in 1984. By the following year, the company was operating from both Japan and France when Yuki Torii France S.A. was established, together with the opening of the boutique at 38–40 Galerie Vivienne in Paris.

A continuing theme in Torii's work has been the kimono. Kimonos and obis have been included in her lines and influenced items in her collections for decades. Typically, she bases these designs on the traditional kimono, which is a complicated and rule-governed garment, but adds a flexibility that allows today's women to adapt them to their lifestyle. She also incorporates modern fabrics, such as polyester, which does not wrinkle.

Torii told CNN in 1998 that "the classic, traditional kimono, with all its detailing, sometimes frightens women. They're not sure exactly how to wear a kimono. So I try to push the idea that they should start simply, wear a kimono casually, and not get too bogged down with the traditional implications." Her kimono designs often combine unusual pattern combinations or unexpected fabric choices, such as creating sleeves from a men's pinstripe. Yet her kimonos, like all her designs, are as feminine as they are comfortable.

Torii's haute couture and ready-to-wear similarly feature unique mixes of fabrics and patterns, such as checks with velvet or leather with gold lamé. Her collections are often critically acclaimed, with the term "classy" frequently used. The fashion press and customers alike find them innovative yet wearable. In addition to her collections, Torii designs school uniforms, as well as licensed accessories.

—Kevin Almond; updated by Karen Raugust

TORRENTE

French fashion house

Established: in Paris by designer Rosette Torrente-Mett, in 1969.

Company History: Licensing contract for men's ready-to-wear signed with French factory, 1971; signed licensing deal with Japan, 1972; childrenswear, leather collection, luxury accessories such as checks for menswear, womenswear, and childrenswear. The collection consisted of lively, wearable separates; oversize tartan shirts, tartan trousers, and comfortable cardigans for men; long tartan flounced skirts for women, teamed with long, skinny rib jumpers or oversized Argyle patterned sweaters; tartan pinafore dresses for girls and a weatherbeaten, mountaineering look for boys, layering tartan overshirts over tartan Levi-style jackets.

Torrente, fall/winter 2001–02 ready-to-wear collection. © AP/Wide World Photos.

The vibrant Yuki Torii collection sold as part of Liberty of London's Japan at Liberty promotion in 1991 and displayed a more sophisticated air, paying homage to the style of Coco Chanel combined with the color combinations of Christian Lacroix. Vibrant tweeds in unities of orange, lime green, red, grass green, yellow, pale pink, and fuchsia were made into neat, boxy suits, and separates. Much of the fabric was fringed at the hems of garments, and flower-shaped tweed emblems were interesting details appliquéd on pockets and trims.

Torii was the youngest student to have enrolled at the Bunka Gakuin College of Art in Tokyo when she was 15. This precocious talent led her to sell her first creations in her grandmother's haute couture boutique Ginza in Tokyo. By 1972 she had established her own ready-to-wear business, Torii Co. Ltd., and by 1975 had shown her first collection in the prestigious Paris ready-to-wear collections.

Torii has often been told her clothes look best on herself, and it is from this perspective that she begins designing. The approach is similar to that adopted by many other female designers, in particular Jean Muir, who is renowned for producing clothes women really want to wear and feel comfortable in. Torii thinks it natural that female designers conceive ideas from themselves and their roles and needs as women. She likes to project an overall image of sweetness in her clothes, a sweetness retained in images of childrenswear but is often lost in adult fashion. She achieves this by never presenting themes that threaten or provoke controversy. Her look instead is a harmonious combination of contrasting color and fabric that is wearable and flattering but often incorporates the unusual detailing found in children's clothes, for instance, Western cowboy detailing on children's shirts or the naive flower emblems in her tweed collection.

In 1983, two new brands were created, Yuki Torii Deux and Yuki Torii International. Licensed products like scarves, furs, gloves, belts, eyewear, neckties, and umbrellas were produced from the Yuki Torii Design Studio established in 1984. By the following year, the company was operating from both Japan and France when Yuki Torii France S.A. was established, together with the opening of the boutique at 38–40 Galerie Vivienne in Paris.

A continuing theme in Torii's work has been the kimono. Kimonos and obis have been included in her lines and influenced items in her collections for decades. Typically, she bases these designs on the traditional kimono, which is a complicated and rule-governed garment, but adds a flexibility that allows today's women to adapt them to their lifestyle. She also incorporates modern fabrics, such as polyester, which does not wrinkle.

Torii told CNN in 1998 that "the classic, traditional kimono, with all its detailing, sometimes frightens women. They're not sure exactly how to wear a kimono. So I try to push the idea that they should start simply, wear a kimono casually, and not get too bogged down with the traditional implications." Her kimono designs often combine unusual pattern combinations or unexpected fabric choices, such as creating sleeves from a men's pinstripe. Yet her kimonos, like all her designs, are as feminine as they are comfortable.

Torii's haute couture and ready-to-wear similarly feature unique mixes of fabrics and patterns, such as checks with velvet or leather with gold lamé. Her collections are often critically acclaimed, with the term "classy" frequently used. The fashion press and customers alike find them innovative yet wearable. In addition to her collections, Torii designs school uniforms, as well as licensed accessories.

—Kevin Almond; updated by Karen Raugust

TORRENTE

French fashion house

Established: in Paris by designer Rosette Torrente-Mett, in 1969.

Company History: Licensing contract for men's ready-to-wear signed with French factory, 1971; signed licensing deal with Japan, 1972; childrenswear, leather collection, luxury accessories such as neckties, scarves, glasses, jewelry, and household linens introduced; signed with La Callonec and Murier for corporate wear; sells both couture and ready-to-wear lines; signed licensing pact with Perfumer's Workshop for fragrance line, 2000. Company Address: 1, rond-point des Champs-Elysées 75008 Paris, France.

Torrente, fall/winter 2001–02 ready-to-wear collection. © AP/Wide World Photos.

PUBLICATIONS

On TORRENTE:

Articles

- d'Aulnay, Sophie, "Vestra Weaves Its Global Web," in DNR, 25 January 1993.
 "Paris: Disco Finale," in WWD, 22 July 1994.
 Singer, Natasha, "Testing the Waters in Russia: Couture's Mission to Moscow," in WWD, 4 December 1995.
 "News in Brief," in Cosmetics International, 25 January 2000.
 Laushway, Ester, "The Haute and Mighty," in Europe, November 2000.

* * *

Torrente is a French haute couture and ready-to-wear label. The essence of the company's style is represented by its longstanding reputation in Paris as one of the finest couture houses. Torrente couture and ready-to-wear lines are made from the most exquisite, luxurious, and individual fabrics in the world. Many of the clothes are hand-finished, which although adding to the cost of the garments, gives the customer a unique and personalized purchase.

Popular and influential Torrente styles have included the satin collar in an abstract floral print on a shapely, turquoise, short-skirted suit or a classic cream collar and cuffs on elegant, checked wool coat dresses and two-pieces. Unusual, stiff, gauzy silk fabrics are used on stoles, edged in bead embroidery and thrown over short, strapless bell-skirted raw silk dresses, with matching beading on the hems. Lace is another popular fabric, used mainly in eveningwear and ranging from heavily beaded and encrusted for sculpted looks, to a soft drapable lace used in short empire dresses in cream, with décolleté necklines. The drape is positioned centrally at the cleavage and secured with the palest of pink roses. The overall look is very feminine, aimed not at fashion's vanguard, but designed for a woman secure and established in her own style, whose schedule demands a quantity of individualistic, smart occasion wear.

The company was established by its first designer Rosette Torrente-Mett in 1969 and the upper echelons of Paris society soon recognized a formidable design talent. Torrente creations began to be seen in places like Maxim's and at the Opéra; stylish names like Claudia Cardinale and Marlene Dietrich became regular clients at the Haute Boutique. Since the 1960s the company steadily expanded. In 1971 a licensing contract for men's ready-to-wear was signed with a French factory and in the following year a lucrative deal was clinched with Japan. Childrenswear, a leather collection, and luxury accessories like neckties, scarves, glasses, jewelry, and household linens have since been introduced. The company even branched out into corporate wear, signing a licensing deal with La Callonec and Murier in France.

Torrente, spring/summer 2001 haute couture collection. © AFP/CORBIS.

Madame Torrente-Mett was elected a member of the Chambre Syndicale de la Haute Couture in 1971. Her other activities in the fashion world include being founder and vice-president of the French Fashion Institute and lecturing at the Paris business school, Hautes Études Commerciales. Her fashion pedigree comes not only from her father, who was a tailor, but from working with her brother, Ted Lapidus, at his design firm before venturing out on her own.

Items from the Torrente couture range are available in hundreds of shops worldwide, while the less expensive ready-to-wear line, Miss Torrente, is found in shops throughout Europe. The firm's menswear retailed in some 500 worldwide outlets. Helping Torrente's expansion were recent forays into the burgeoning Russian market in the mid-1990s through Haute Couture Week in Moscow. "It's very important for us to come to Russia...with its extraordinary youth and energy, with its new generation besotted by fashion," Torrente-Mett told Women's Wear Daily (4 December 1995). "It's up to us to show them the best of what we have to offer.... My role is to demonstrate, to reveal to them what is beautiful and at the same time wearable."

At the turn of the century the venerable Torrente tested uncharted waters with its first fragrance, under license to Perfumer's Workshop

International. The new women's scent, part of a long-term association between the perfumery and Torrente, debuted in 2001. Yet it was still Torrente's couture line that remained the anchor and essence of Torrente style—denoting quality with an international sophistication equally at home at a society wedding in the south of France or at an opera gala in Milan.

—Kevin Almond; updated by Sydonie Benét

TRACY, Ellen

See ALLARD, Linda

TRANSPORT

British footwear firm

Founded: by Jimmy Sarvea. Company History: Opened first shop, Reading, Berkshire, 1970; firm bought by Allied Shoes Ltd. Company Address: Allied Shoes, 77–79 Great Eastern St., London EC2A 3HU, UK.

* * *

Transport shoes probably epitomized the growth of modern footwear fashion and the looks we took for granted as the street level expression of the young. The originator of the label, Jimmy Sarvea, previously a boxer, was first a shoe repairer, became an assistant manager for a major footwear retailer, and went on to become one of the leading shoe entrepreneurs of the 1970s and 1980s. From the opening of his first shop in Reading, Berkshire, in 1970 to his continued presence on the High Street, Sarvea helped ensure that the avant-garde, trend-conscious customer was well served.

Whether classic or high fashion, the original Transport shoes, manufactured in Italy, created an impressive turnover. One of the most famous outlets for their men's shoes was Succhi, a mecca for the discriminating. The menswear market in general had become increasingly aware of fashion as the decade progressed, and the individuality of the footwear sold under the Transport label became an essential ingredient of a positive statement. Sarvea was joined by Carol Sullivan and the influence they found from streetwear added charisma and a new visual freedom to their shoes. The collection continued to grow, with exciting and innovative designs for both sexes. Many styles were unisex, with wide use of the unexpected, including glitter fabrics, stinging shades of orange and purple, unforgettable last and heel shapes, platform soles, chunky silhouettes, and interesting and unusual use of laces and buckles.

Transport shoes were featured on Top of the Pops, a BBC television musical program for the young, and potential customers eagerly sought out the shoes. Transport had created the most anticipatory underground footwear fashion statement of the 1980s. Their ultimate goal, total originality, assisted in attracting celebrities of the period, and George Michael, Five Star, Duran Duran, and Ian Dury were the pioneers for those who desired, for personal or professional reasons, that their footwear be the center of attention.

—Angela Pattison

TREACY, Philip

Irish designer working in London

Born: County Galway, Ireland, 1967. Education: Attended National College of Art and Design, Dublin, 1985–87; Royal College of Art, 1988–90. Career: Hat designer; worked with John Galliano and Rifat Ozbek, 1989; opened showroom in London, 1991; began working with Karl Lagerfeld and Chanel, from 1991; began designing diffusion line for Debenhams, 1992; shows sponsored by Harvey Nichols, Debenhams, Rolls Royce, British Fashion Council, Swarovski Crystal, Max Factor, and others, 1993–98; launched accessories line, 1997; participated in British Invasion at Saks Fifth Avenue, 1998; showings in Singapore and Vienna, 1999; moved to 12 Elizabeth Street, 1999; Paris couture week appearance, 2000; signed with

Philip Treacy, spring/summer 2000 haute couture collection. © AP/Wide World Photos.

International. The new women's scent, part of a long-term association between the perfumery and Torrente, debuted in 2001. Yet it was still Torrente's couture line that remained the anchor and essence of Torrente style—denoting quality with an international sophistication equally at home at a society wedding in the south of France or at an opera gala in Milan.

—Kevin Almond; updated by Sydonie Benét

TRACY, Ellen

See ALLARD, Linda

TRANSPORT

British footwear firm

Founded: by Jimmy Sarvea. Company History: Opened first shop, Reading, Berkshire, 1970; firm bought by Allied Shoes Ltd. Company Address: Allied Shoes, 77–79 Great Eastern St., London EC2A 3HU, UK.

* * *

Transport shoes probably epitomized the growth of modern footwear fashion and the looks we took for granted as the street level expression of the young. The originator of the label, Jimmy Sarvea, previously a boxer, was first a shoe repairer, became an assistant manager for a major footwear retailer, and went on to become one of the leading shoe entrepreneurs of the 1970s and 1980s. From the opening of his first shop in Reading, Berkshire, in 1970 to his continued presence on the High Street, Sarvea helped ensure that the avant-garde, trend-conscious customer was well served.

Whether classic or high fashion, the original Transport shoes, manufactured in Italy, created an impressive turnover. One of the most famous outlets for their men's shoes was Succhi, a mecca for the discriminating. The menswear market in general had become increasingly aware of fashion as the decade progressed, and the individuality of the footwear sold under the Transport label became an essential ingredient of a positive statement. Sarvea was joined by Carol Sullivan and the influence they found from streetwear added charisma and a new visual freedom to their shoes. The collection continued to grow, with exciting and innovative designs for both sexes. Many styles were unisex, with wide use of the unexpected, including glitter fabrics, stinging shades of orange and purple, unforgettable last and heel shapes, platform soles, chunky silhouettes, and interesting and unusual use of laces and buckles.

Transport shoes were featured on Top of the Pops, a BBC television musical program for the young, and potential customers eagerly sought out the shoes. Transport had created the most anticipatory underground footwear fashion statement of the 1980s. Their ultimate goal, total originality, assisted in attracting celebrities of the period, and George Michael, Five Star, Duran Duran, and Ian Dury were the pioneers for those who desired, for personal or professional reasons, that their footwear be the center of attention.

—Angela Pattison

TREACY, Philip

Irish designer working in London

Born: County Galway, Ireland, 1967. Education: Attended National College of Art and Design, Dublin, 1985–87; Royal College of Art, 1988–90. Career: Hat designer; worked with John Galliano and Rifat Ozbek, 1989; opened showroom in London, 1991; began working with Karl Lagerfeld and Chanel, from 1991; began designing diffusion line for Debenhams, 1992; shows sponsored by Harvey Nichols, Debenhams, Rolls Royce, British Fashion Council, Swarovski Crystal, Max Factor, and others, 1993–98; launched accessories line, 1997; participated in British Invasion at Saks Fifth Avenue, 1998; showings in Singapore and Vienna, 1999; moved to 12 Elizabeth Street, 1999; Paris couture week appearance, 2000; signed with

Philip Treacy, spring/summer 2000 haute couture collection. © AP/Wide World Photos.

International. The new women's scent, part of a long-term association between the perfumery and Torrente, debuted in 2001. Yet it was still Torrente's couture line that remained the anchor and essence of Torrente style—denoting quality with an international sophistication equally at home at a society wedding in the south of France or at an opera gala in Milan.

—Kevin Almond; updated by Sydonie Benét

TRACY, Ellen

See ALLARD, Linda

TRANSPORT

British footwear firm

Founded: by Jimmy Sarvea. Company History: Opened first shop, Reading, Berkshire, 1970; firm bought by Allied Shoes Ltd. Company Address: Allied Shoes, 77–79 Great Eastern St., London EC2A 3HU, UK.

* * *

Transport shoes probably epitomized the growth of modern footwear fashion and the looks we took for granted as the street level expression of the young. The originator of the label, Jimmy Sarvea, previously a boxer, was first a shoe repairer, became an assistant manager for a major footwear retailer, and went on to become one of the leading shoe entrepreneurs of the 1970s and 1980s. From the opening of his first shop in Reading, Berkshire, in 1970 to his continued presence on the High Street, Sarvea helped ensure that the avant-garde, trend-conscious customer was well served.

Whether classic or high fashion, the original Transport shoes, manufactured in Italy, created an impressive turnover. One of the most famous outlets for their men's shoes was Succhi, a mecca for the discriminating. The menswear market in general had become increasingly aware of fashion as the decade progressed, and the individuality of the footwear sold under the Transport label became an essential ingredient of a positive statement. Sarvea was joined by Carol Sullivan and the influence they found from streetwear added charisma and a new visual freedom to their shoes. The collection continued to grow, with exciting and innovative designs for both sexes. Many styles were unisex, with wide use of the unexpected, including glitter fabrics, stinging shades of orange and purple, unforgettable last and heel shapes, platform soles, chunky silhouettes, and interesting and unusual use of laces and buckles.

Transport shoes were featured on Top of the Pops, a BBC television musical program for the young, and potential customers eagerly sought out the shoes. Transport had created the most anticipatory underground footwear fashion statement of the 1980s. Their ultimate goal, total originality, assisted in attracting celebrities of the period, and George Michael, Five Star, Duran Duran, and Ian Dury were the pioneers for those who desired, for personal or professional reasons, that their footwear be the center of attention.

—Angela Pattison

TREACY, Philip

Irish designer working in London

Born: County Galway, Ireland, 1967. Education: Attended National College of Art and Design, Dublin, 1985–87; Royal College of Art, 1988–90. Career: Hat designer; worked with John Galliano and Rifat Ozbek, 1989; opened showroom in London, 1991; began working with Karl Lagerfeld and Chanel, from 1991; began designing diffusion line for Debenhams, 1992; shows sponsored by Harvey Nichols, Debenhams, Rolls Royce, British Fashion Council, Swarovski Crystal, Max Factor, and others, 1993–98; launched accessories line, 1997; participated in British Invasion at Saks Fifth Avenue, 1998; showings in Singapore and Vienna, 1999; moved to 12 Elizabeth Street, 1999; Paris couture week appearance, 2000; signed with

Philip Treacy, spring/summer 2000 haute couture collection. © AP/Wide World Photos.

Trussardi for an exclusive women's hat collection, 2001. Exhibitions: Biennale di Firenze exhibit, Italy, 1996; Cutting Edge and One Woman's Wardrobe exhibits, Victoria & Albert Museum, London, 1997; Addressing the Century, 100 Years of Art and Fashion, Hayward Gallery, London, 1998; Satellites of Fashion, Crafts Council, London, 1998; Hyper Hall exhibit, Copenhagen, 1998; Fragile House, Soho, London, 2000; London Designers Exhibit, Natural History Museum, 2000; La Beauté Exhibition, Avignon, France, 2000. Awards: British Accessory Designer of the Year, 1991, 1992, 1993, 1996, 1997. Address: 12, Elizabeth Street, Mount Barrow House, London, SW1 W9RB, UK. Website: www.philiptreacy.co.uk.

PUBLICATIONS

On TREACY:

Articles

- Fallon, James, "Philip Treacy: The Shape of Things to Come," in WWD, 6 July 1990.
- Killen, Mary, "Hats Off to Philip Treacy—His Fanciful Designs are Turning Heads," in Vogue, October 1991.
- "Treacy: Another Feature at BG," in WWD, 15 November 1991.
- McKenna, Joe, "The Big Fat Hat," in Interview (New York), November 1991.
- Overland, Martha Ann, "Style Makers: Philip Treacy," in the New York Times, 5 April 1992.
- Bowles, Hamish, "The New Enlightenment," in Vogue, March 1993.
- Moore, Alison, "London Calling," in the New York Times Magazine, 19 December 1993.
- "Glad Hatter," in People, 4 July 1994.
- Luscombe, Belinda, "Mad About Hats: Milliner Philip Treacy's Fantastic Creations are Real Head Turners," in Time, 1 March 1999.
- Fallon, James, "Treacy's Hat Show is Going Couture," in WWD, 13 December 1999.
- Armstrong, Lisa, "The Mad Hatter of London," in the Times (London), 10 January 2000.
- "Closing Remarks: Spring Couture Season Came to a Close With a Dazzling Show by Milliner Philip Treacy..." in WWD, 20 January 2000.
- "Classic Beauty or Divine Madness," in WWD, 12 July 2001.

* * *

Former Royal College of Art student Philip Treacy was recognized as a talented milliner even before graduating from college where his final show was sponsored by Harper's & Queen magazine, London. In the years since leaving college, the Irish-born Treacy has moved to the forefront of the fashion world, producing hats for some of the most prestigious couture and ready-to-wear designers, including Chanel, Versace, Givenchy, Valentino, and Rifat Ozbek. Described as the Rembrandt of millinery by established hat designer, Shirley Hex, Treacy's monumental creations for the fashion catwalks often receive as much publicity as the outfits for which they were designed.

Treacy's millinery designs reflect his unquestionably vivid imagination, drawing upon diverse subjects such as surrealism, the dance of Martha Graham, or religious and historical imagery. Creating a hat, Treacy asserts, does not require space age influences; he prefers to plunder the past for inspiration and then make it appear totally new. A floral Treacy hat is a crash helmet covered in flowers and butterflies; a towering turban is created by an intricately wrapped blanket with fringed edging; a large cluster of black coq feathers are tied together with white feathers to form a brim and crown.

Treacy's hats, like those of other British milliners, are often described as eccentric. The designer attributes this eccentricity to the British being associated with idiosyncrasy, but says he does not set out to create deliberately unusual hats. Using what he describes as "boring" fabrics, Treacy begins working upon these materials with different treatments—feathers, for example, are singed so they take on the appearance of very fine gossamer.

An important factor in Treacy's work is his mastery of highly skilled traditional millinery techniques which ensure the correct balance, fit, and proportion for the hat which he concedes are as much mathematical as aesthetic. It is this artisan approach, with the emphasis on craft and technique, that characterizes much of Treacy's work. He produces hats for many different companies, both couture houses and ready-to-wear firms, and his annual shows in London and New York have been sponsored by a who's who of fashion and business, from Debenhams and Rolls Royce to Swarovski Crystal and Max Factor. Treacy's ability to work at all levels of the market, from the costly couture creations to the less expensive ready-to-wear field, illustrates his versatility as a designer for whom price barriers are seen as a challenge rather than an obstacle.

Philip Treacy, spring 2001 collection. © AP/Wide World Photos.

While Treacy's use of imagery and visual effects for his millinery creations is a vital element in his success, fashion critic Brenda Polan claims Treacy's mastery of technique is what singles him out as a great milliner, stating, "The balance of his hats, their swooping and curving, is perfect. A Treacy hat sits naturally upon the head, its proportions complementing those of the body, its horizontal and vertical lines extending and dramatizing the planes of the face. It is a perfection only an obsessive can achieve."

Obsessive or not, Treacy creations are unique and in demand. The designer branched out into accessories in 1997, and in 1999 was asked by the Federation Françoise de la Couture to show his hats during the spring-summer haute couture presentations. Treacy, honored and excited by the prospect, put together a small, specialized collection, telling Women's Wear Daily (13 December 1999) "I can't compete with the multizillionaire designer companies, so I plan to do a very small, discreet collection.... It's important to give a profile to hat making; hats and headdress have been around since the beginning of time, despite the fact that many people say hats are finished."

Response to Treacy's highly anticipated catwalk collection were enthusiastic, with Women's Wear Daily (20 January 2000) declaring, "Treacy's hats were sculptural, exquisite.... This season, he's fallen head over heels for orchids, and he delivered a hothouse full of exotic hand-painted blooms that were fabulous." Succeeding shows continued to be the rage for critics and fellow designers alike, placing Treacy firmly in the upper echelons of fashion royalty. His aim, however, is simple—"The object of the exercise is to beautify women," Treacy had explained to Women's Wear Daily (20 January 2000). "I want to inspire young people to wear hats and to think of hats as something new and modern. In our parents' generation, to wear a hat used to be to conform. Now, to wear a hat is to rebel." Well said by the master.

—Catherine Woram and Sydonie Benét

TRIGÈRE, Pauline

American designer

Born: Paris, 4 November 1912; immigrated to the U.S., 1937, naturalized, 1942. Education: Jules Ferry and Victor Hugo Colleges, Paris, 1923–28. Family: Married Lazar Radley, 1929 (separated); children: Jean-Pierre, Philippe. Career: Trainee clothing cutter, Martial et Armand, Paris, 1928–29; assistant cutter, fitter, in father's tailoring business, Paris, 1929–32; freelance designer, Paris, 1933–36; design assistant, Ben Gershel, New York, 1937; assistant to Travis Banton, Hattie Carnegie fashion house, New York, 1937–42; cofounder/designer, House of Trigère, from 1942; one of the original cofounders of the Council of Fashion Designers Association, 1962; closed firm, 1993; launched jewelry collection, 1994; introduced fragrance, Liquid Chic, circa 1995; retired 1997; worked for various charities, including Citymeals-on-Wheels; launched accessories line with Gold Violin web company, 2000. Awards: Coty American Fashion Critics award, 1949, 1951, 1959; Neiman Marcus award, Dallas, 1950; National Cotton Council of America award, 1951; Filene award, Boston, 1959; Silver Medal, City of Paris, 1972, 1982; CFDA Lifetime Achievement award, 1993; placed on Fashion Walk of Fame, 2001. Died: 13 February 2002.

Pauline Trigère, fall 1966 collection: American broadtail dinner dress with a rhinestone border. © AP/Wide World Photos.

PUBLICATIONS

On TRIGÈRE:

Books

- Lee, Sarah Tomerlin, American Fashion: The Life and Lines of Adrian, Mainbocher, McCordell, Norell, Trigère, New York, 1975; London, 1976.
- Morris, Bernadine, and Barbara Walz, The Fashion Makers, New York, 1978.
- Diamonstein, Barbaralee, Fashion: The Inside Story, New York, 1985.
- Milbank, Caroline Rennolds, Couture: The Great Designers, New York, 1985.

costly couture creations to the less expensive ready-to-wear field, illustrates his versatility as a designer for whom price barriers are seen as a challenge rather than an obstacle.

While Treacy's use of imagery and visual effects for his millinery creations is a vital element in his success, fashion critic Brenda Polan claims Treacy's mastery of technique is what singles him out as a great milliner, stating, "The balance of his hats, their swooping and curving, is perfect. A Treacy hat sits naturally upon the head, its proportions complementing those of the body, its horizontal and vertical lines extending and dramatizing the planes of the face. It is a perfection only an obsessive can achieve."

Obsessive or not, Treacy creations are unique and in demand. The designer branched out into accessories in 1997, and in 1999 was asked by the Federation Françoise de la Couture to show his hats during the spring-summer haute couture presentations. Treacy, honored and excited by the prospect, put together a small, specialized collection, telling Women's Wear Daily (13 December 1999) "I can't compete with the multizillionaire designer companies, so I plan to do a very small, discreet collection.... It's important to give a profile to hat making; hats and headdress have been around since the beginning of time, despite the fact that many people say hats are finished."

Response to Treacy's highly anticipated catwalk collection were enthusiastic, with Women's Wear Daily (20 January 2000) declaring, "Treacy's hats were sculptural, exquisite.... This season, he's fallen head over heels for orchids, and he delivered a hothouse full of exotic hand-painted blooms that were fabulous." Succeeding shows continued to be the rage for critics and fellow designers alike, placing Treacy firmly in the upper echelons of fashion royalty. His aim, however, is simple—"The object of the exercise is to beautify women," Treacy had explained to Women's Wear Daily (20 January 2000). "I want to inspire young people to wear hats and to think of hats as something new and modern. In our parents' generation, to wear a hat used to be to conform. Now, to wear a hat is to rebel." Well said by the master.

—Catherine Woram and Sydonie Benét

TRIGÈRE, Pauline

American designer

Born: Paris, 4 November 1912; immigrated to the U.S., 1937, naturalized, 1942. Education: Jules Ferry and Victor Hugo Colleges, Paris, 1923–28. Family: Married Lazar Radley, 1929 (separated); children: Jean-Pierre, Philippe. Career: Trainee clothing cutter, Martial et Armand, Paris, 1928–29; assistant cutter, fitter, in father's tailoring business, Paris, 1929–32; freelance designer, Paris, 1933–36; design assistant, Ben Gershel, New York, 1937; assistant to Travis Banton, Hattie Carnegie fashion house, New York, 1937–42; cofounder/designer, House of Trigère, from 1942; one of the original cofounders of the Council of Fashion Designers Association, 1962; closed firm, 1993; launched jewelry collection, 1994; introduced fragrance, Liquid Chic, circa 1995; retired 1997; worked for various charities, including Citymeals-on-Wheels; launched accessories line with Gold Violin web company, 2000. Awards: Coty American Fashion Critics award, 1949, 1951, 1959; Neiman Marcus award, Dallas, 1950; National Cotton Council of America award, 1951; Filene award, Boston, 1959; Silver Medal, City of Paris, 1972, 1982; CFDA Lifetime Achievement award, 1993; placed on Fashion Walk of Fame, 2001. Died: 13 February 2002.

Pauline Trigère, fall 1966 collection: American broadtail dinner dress with a rhinestone border. © AP/Wide World Photos.

PUBLICATIONS

On TRIGÈRE:

Books

- Lee, Sarah Tomerlin, American Fashion: The Life and Lines of Adrian, Mainbocher, McCordell, Norell, Trigère, New York, 1975; London, 1976.
- Morris, Bernadine, and Barbara Walz, The Fashion Makers, New York, 1978.
- Diamonstein, Barbaralee, Fashion: The Inside Story, New York, 1985.
- Milbank, Caroline Rennolds, Couture: The Great Designers, New York, 1985.

Pauline Trigère, fall 1966 collection: chiffon ensemble with plumes.
© AP/Wide World Photos.

New York and Hollywood Fashion: Costume Designs from the Brooklyn Museum Collection, New York, 1986.

Milbank, Caroline Rennolds, New York Fashion: The Evolution of American Style, New York, 1989.

Stegemeyer, Anne, Who's Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.

Articles

"Designers Who Are Making News," in American Fabrics & Fashions (New York), No. 38, 1956.

Alexander, J., "New York's New Queen of Fashion," in the Saturday Evening Post, 8 April 1961.

"Pauline Trigère Takes John Fairchild to Task for a Three-Year Snub from Women's Wear Daily," in Chicago Tribune, 24 August 1988.

Greene, Gael, and Peter Vitale, "The Style of Pauline Trigère," in Architectural Digest (Los Angeles), September 1988.

Woods, Vicki, "Vicki Woods Crosses Paths with the Eccentric Pauline Trigère—and Comes Away with an Earful," in Vogue, October 1989.

Brady, James, "Most Elegant Pauline," in Advertising Age, 21 November 1994.

"Fashion, Beauty Gala Will Help Fund Citymeals," in WWD, 21 April 1999.

Wilson, Eric, "Declaration of Independence: CFDA's Founders Sought to Shed Light on American Design," in WWD, 13 June 2000.

_____, "Never Too Old to Accessorize," in WWD, 27 November 2000.

"Designing Women, Meet Golden Girls," in Business Week, 25 December 2000.

Goff, Lisa "Dot-coms' Senior Circuits; Surfers are Older Than People Think," in Crain's New York Business, 22 January 2001.

McCants, Leonard, "Fashion Walk of Fame to Induct Second Class," in WWD, 1 February 2001.

Fabrikant, Geraldine, "It's Never Too Late to Accessorize (Designer Pauline Trigère)," in the New York Times, 25 February 2001.

McCants, Leonard, "Trigere Talks Tailoring at Walk of Fame Event," in WWD, 19 July 2001.

*

I've always found it difficult to talk or write about FASHION. I think FASHION—clothes, garments—should be enjoyed and worn, and certainly fill a certain purpose in one's life... I love my work, I love designing, I love folding, draping, molding the fabric in my hands and producing new shapes, new designs.

I have never gone up-up, or down-down like a yo-yo. I have tried to keep my women, my customers, happy in their Trigère clothes—hoping they bought them and wore them with pleasure, and that they were right for their lives—PTA, business meetings, concerts, theater, etc. In thinking back, I don't think that I would have enjoyed anything else but doing collection after collection, four to five times a year... (oh yes, maybe I could have been an architect, or most certainly a surgeon...).

—Pauline Trigère

* * *

Pauline Trigère was more than a designer of women's clothing, she was a fabric artisan. Trigère left her native France in 1937 and arrived in New York with practical training gathered from her parents' tailoring shop and the Parisian couture house of Martial et Armand, plus a natural talent for working with fabric. She started her own business in 1942 with a collection of just 12 dresses. During World War II, when the American fashion industry was cut off from inspiration normally coming from Paris, Trigère's combination of French elegance and American practicality proved successful. Her constant commitment to excellent design and workmanship kept her in business for 60 years.

During the 1940s Trigère became known especially for her impeccable and imaginative tailoring of women's suits and coats. She made use of all weights of wool, from sheer crêpes for eveningwear to thick tweeds for daytime coats. She was recognized early in her career as an innovator for such fashions as evening dresses made of wool or cotton, reversible coats and capes in all shapes and sizes. Another characteristic Trigère feature is the luxurious touch of fur trim at necklines, cuffs, and hems. Before the 1960s, her palette was fairly subdued and she rarely used printed fabrics; during the 1960s and 1970s she began to use more prints and softer fabrics, always retaining a tailored touch. Her use of prints is bold and deliberate, the pattern is often used to complement the structure of the piece. Notwithstanding her extensive use of wool and tailoring techniques, Trigère's clothing has always been unmistakably feminine.

While she was an acknowledged innovator of fashions, she was also known for repeating and perfecting her most successful themes. For example, her princess line dress has consistently been considered to have no equal, and her rhinestone bra top, first introduced in 1967, was revived in 1985 and again in 1992. Throughout the evolution of fashion in the six decades, Trigère worked within the mainstream while retaining her signature style. Simple elegance and timelessness are descriptions often applied to her work, but style was not her only concern. She insisted on the highest quality of materials to assure her clothing served her customers for years to come. Her collections were carefully planned so many pieces worked together, and complement past seasons' collections.

Trigère's work has been compared to that of two legendary French couturiers, Cristobal Balenciaga and Madeleine Vionnet. These designers were known for employing complex and unusual construction techniques to create simple, elegant silhouettes. Trigère herself rarely sketched her ideas; like Balenciaga and Vionnet she designed by draping and cutting the actual fabric on a dress form or live model. The fabric itself is an important part of Trigère's design process; it is her inspiration and her guide as it reveals what it is capable of doing. Trigère's continued involvement with the creative process and her insistence on quality made her unique on New York's Seventh Avenue.

Though she officially retired in 1997 at age 85, amazingly, Pauline Trigère was still going strong in the 21st century. In her 90s, she organized benefits, was inducted into the New York Fashion Walk of Fame, and launched an accessories line for seniors with Internet company Gold Violin in 2000. Time finally caught up with Trigère in February 2002 when the 93-year-old died at her New York City home; in true Trigère style she has asked to be cremated wearing her trademark red lipstick.

—Melinda L. Watt; updated by Nelly Rhodes

TRUSSARDI, SPA

Italian leathergoods and accessories manufacturer

Founded: in Bergamo, Italy, as a glove making firm by Dante Trussardi, 1910. Company History: Firm taken over by nephew Nicola Trussardi, 1970; first boutique opened, Milan, 1976; jewelery collection introduced, 1976; fragrances introduced, Action Uomo for men and Action Donna for women, early 1980s; men's and women's ready-to-wear collections and Trussardi Junior line introduced, 1983; Trussardi Jeans, Trussardi Action, and Trussardi Sport collections introduced, 1987; designed Italian Olympic team uniforms, 1988; new fragrance, Trussardi Action Sport, launched, 1993; Balenciaga designer Nicolas Ghesquière creates two collections, 1997; Jeremy Scott hired as design consultant, 1999; Francesco and Beatrice Trussardi take over after Nicola's death, 1999. Awards: Nicola

Trussardi, SpA, fall/winter 2001–02 collection. © AP/Wide World Photos.

Trussardi named Cavalier of the Great Cross, Italy, 1987. Company Address: Piazza Duse 4, 201 22 Milan, Italy.

PUBLICATIONS

On TRUSSARDI:

Books

Gasperini, Nicoletta, and Giovanni Gaspel, Trussardi estate 1985, Milan, 1985.

_____, Il mondo di Trussardi: nelle immagini di Giovanni Gastel, Milan, n.d.

The Fashion Guide: International Designers Directory, London, Paris, New York & Tokyo, 1990.

Casadio, Mariuccia, and Samuele Mazza, Trussardi, Milan & Corte Madera, California, 1998.

Articles

Frosh, Jennifer, "Camping in with Trussardi," in WWD, 8 July 1977.

subdued and she rarely used printed fabrics; during the 1960s and 1970s she began to use more prints and softer fabrics, always retaining a tailored touch. Her use of prints is bold and deliberate, the pattern is often used to complement the structure of the piece. Notwithstanding her extensive use of wool and tailoring techniques, Trigère's clothing has always been unmistakably feminine.

While she was an acknowledged innovator of fashions, she was also known for repeating and perfecting her most successful themes. For example, her princess line dress has consistently been considered to have no equal, and her rhinestone bra top, first introduced in 1967, was revived in 1985 and again in 1992. Throughout the evolution of fashion in the six decades, Trigère worked within the mainstream while retaining her signature style. Simple elegance and timelessness are descriptions often applied to her work, but style was not her only concern. She insisted on the highest quality of materials to assure her clothing served her customers for years to come. Her collections were carefully planned so many pieces worked together, and complement past seasons' collections.

Trigère's work has been compared to that of two legendary French couturiers, Cristobal Balenciaga and Madeleine Vionnet. These designers were known for employing complex and unusual construction techniques to create simple, elegant silhouettes. Trigère herself rarely sketched her ideas; like Balenciaga and Vionnet she designed by draping and cutting the actual fabric on a dress form or live model. The fabric itself is an important part of Trigère's design process; it is her inspiration and her guide as it reveals what it is capable of doing. Trigère's continued involvement with the creative process and her insistence on quality made her unique on New York's Seventh Avenue.

Though she officially retired in 1997 at age 85, amazingly, Pauline Trigère was still going strong in the 21st century. In her 90s, she organized benefits, was inducted into the New York Fashion Walk of Fame, and launched an accessories line for seniors with Internet company Gold Violin in 2000. Time finally caught up with Trigère in February 2002 when the 93-year-old died at her New York City home; in true Trigère style she has asked to be cremated wearing her trademark red lipstick.

—Melinda L. Watt; updated by Nelly Rhodes

TRUSSARDI, SPA

Italian leathergoods and accessories manufacturer

Founded: in Bergamo, Italy, as a glove making firm by Dante Trussardi, 1910. Company History: Firm taken over by nephew Nicola Trussardi, 1970; first boutique opened, Milan, 1976; jewelery collection introduced, 1976; fragrances introduced, Action Uomo for men and Action Donna for women, early 1980s; men's and women's ready-to-wear collections and Trussardi Junior line introduced, 1983; Trussardi Jeans, Trussardi Action, and Trussardi Sport collections introduced, 1987; designed Italian Olympic team uniforms, 1988; new fragrance, Trussardi Action Sport, launched, 1993; Balenciaga designer Nicolas Ghesquière creates two collections, 1997; Jeremy Scott hired as design consultant, 1999; Francesco and Beatrice Trussardi take over after Nicola's death, 1999. Awards: Nicola

Trussardi, SpA, fall/winter 2001–02 collection. © AP/Wide World Photos.

Trussardi named Cavalier of the Great Cross, Italy, 1987. Company Address: Piazza Duse 4, 201 22 Milan, Italy.

PUBLICATIONS

On TRUSSARDI:

Books

Gasperini, Nicoletta, and Giovanni Gaspel, Trussardi estate 1985, Milan, 1985.

_____, Il mondo di Trussardi: nelle immagini di Giovanni Gastel, Milan, n.d.

The Fashion Guide: International Designers Directory, London, Paris, New York & Tokyo, 1990.

Casadio, Mariuccia, and Samuele Mazza, Trussardi, Milan & Corte Madera, California, 1998.

Articles

Frosh, Jennifer, "Camping in with Trussardi," in WWD, 8 July 1977.

Trussardi, SpA, fall/winter 2001–02 collection. © AP/Wide World Photos.

"La Maison Trussardi: A Distinctive Style," in Esquire, February 1998.

Cohen, Edie, "Trussardi alla Scala: Gregotti Associati Renovates a Palazzo in Milan's Center for the Global Fashion Concern," in Interior Design, April 1998.

Nemy, Enid, "Nicola Trussardi, 56, Who Led Family Fashion House in Italy," [obituary] in the New York Times, 16 April 1999.

"Nicola Trussardi," [obituary] in the Washington Post, 17 April 1999. "Trussardi," available online at Fashion Live Interviews, www.FashionLive.com, 19 March 2001.

* * *

For over 60 years the Italian family firm of Trussardi manufactured high quality leather gloves. Opened in 1910 by Dante Trussardi in Bergamo, the company had a limited but well-respected reputation for its goods. In 1970 Nicola Trussardi, a graduate of business and economics from the University of Milan, joined the family firm and worked alongside his father, Giordano, and his older brother, Dante. After Dante died in a car accident, Nicola ran the family business with his father. With high ambitions for broadening Trussardi's scope and production and after comprehensive research, Nicola introduced a wide range of luxury goods made to the highest possible standards. Top-quality leather goods like belts, wallets, bags, and luggage were followed by umbrellas, ties, and shoes.

By 1976 the first exclusive Trussardi boutique opened in Milan and further accessory products, together with gold and silver jewelry, were presented. All merchandise was stamped with a trademark greyhound, the sleek symbol of nobility and antiquity, now well established as a mark for Italian quality. By the end of the 20th century, there were well over 50 boutiques in Italy alone, plus international boutiques throughout Europe, the U.S., and the Far East as well as exports to many luxury department stores.

By 1983 Nicola Trussardi was devoting much energy to the launch of the company's first ready-to-wear collection. Clean-cut and essentially classic, the ranges of men's and womenswear soon diversified to include knitwear, skiwear, eveningwear, and Trussardi Junior, a children's clothing line. The clothes reflected the exclusive luxury of the established leather and accessory goods, yet were modern in feel, casual, and wearable. Favored fabrics included leathers (often embossed or treated), velvets, wool jerseys, and furs. Some collections adopted more avant-garde trends such as Empire line suits in oversize plaids, sleeveless A-line leather slipovers or a side-split plaid skirt dangerously perched at hipster level. Such an approach kept the collection youthful and provided a healthy fashion content, while retaining the ever-present sense of lavish expense and exquisite taste.

Trussardi has been noted for presenting collections in prestigious sites, organized and participated in by the most noted international names in theatre, cinema, and opera. The first ready-to-wear collection was presented in La Scala in Milan; another was shown in an enormous mostly transparent cube constructed in Piazza Duomo in the heart of Milan. The theatricality of these showings was obviously designed to attract the maximum media coverage for the Trussardi name.

In 1987 Trussardi segued into jeans and sport lines, then designed Italy's team uniforms for the 1988 Olympics in Seoul, Korea. Ferently nationalist, Trussardi had also sponsored the building of the Palatrussardi in 1986, an important center for sports and entertainment ventures in Milan. The launch of a new fragrance, Trussardi Action Sport, reinforced the company's sporty image in 1993 (previous scents included Action Uomo and Action Donna), while a new 70,000-square-foot headquarters in Milan's Piazza della Scala in 1996 reflected Trussardi's enduring legacy of luxury.

Frenchman Nicolas Ghesquière, who designed for Balenciaga, created two popular collections for Trussardi for 1997, and was followed in 1999 by American Jeremy Scott, who was hired to spice up Trussardi's jeans and sports lines. Yet the deal with Scott had barely been made when tragedy again struck the Trussardi family—Nicola was in a coma following a car accident. Two days after the accident, on 15 April 1999, Nicola died from his injuries.

Nicola Trussardi's family, including his wife Maria Luisa, and children Beatrice, Francesco, Gaia, and Tomaso had all been involved in the family business in one way or another for several years. After Nicola's death Beatrice and Francesco supervised Trussardi's design department, opting to end the planned collaboration with Jeremy Scott. Collections for 2000 and 2001 were as luxe and conservative as those of previous years, including a myriad of leathers and suedes, chamois, bright neoprene, as well as crocodile and python.

—Kevin Almond; updated by Owen James

TUFFIN, Sally

British designer

Born: 1938. Education: Studied at the Walthamstow School of Art; graduated from the Royal College of Art, 1961. Family: Married. Career: Partner, Foale & Tuffin, 1962–72; opened retail store, 1965; designer, Sally Tuffin, Ltd., from mid-1970s.

PUBLICATIONS

By TUFFIN:

Books

Children's Wardrobe with Ann Ladbury, London, 1978.

On TUFFIN:

Books

Lobenthal, Joel, Radical Rags: Fashions of the Sixties, New York, 1990.

Articles

"Tuffin Alone," in WWD, 10 July 1972.

"Being There," in WWD, 16 July 2001.

* * *

Sally Tuffin was one of several designers to emerge from Professor Janey Ironside's talented stable of fashion design graduates at London's Royal College of Art in the 1960s. In company with Ossie Clark, Zandra Rhodes, and Bill Gibb she and her business partner Marion Foale (also a RCA graduate) fast came to epitomize the street style and culture of what became the trademark phrase of the decade, "Swinging London."

Based in the hotbed of trendy 1960s happenings, Carnaby Street, Tuffin and Foale produced clothes celebrating youth culture. "We were dressing ourselves and our friends and it just happened to be the things people wanted," Tuffin reminisced in the 1980s. The pair recognized that the sudden predominance of street fashion was a reaction to a previous generation's reliance on Paris for ideas. To the young, the couture direction seemed tired and inaccessible. Tuffin and Foale noted there was a fast-growing younger market which wanted something inexpensive in which to have fun and wear to dance clubs.

As designers, they incorporated both modernist and nostalgic ideas into their clothes. Beginning with the Pop Art movement that spawned prints and "keyhole" shift dresses, they moved through Op Art, into an art déco phase, and next the romantic dressing made popular by the hippie movement. They created hipster trouser suits, clean-cut crêpe dresses like cycle shirts, or vigorously banded into rugby stripes. They even printed giant Ys across a group of shift dresses intended as a pun on the male undergarment, in many ways a forerunner to the witty tactics employed by Moschino today.

Tuffin and Foale's partnership came to symbolize the greater opportunities available to young people with ideas and energy in the 1960s. Initially inspired by a lecture on garments given by Mary Quant at the Royal College of Art, the pair realized business could be fun and approached it in a lighthearted way. "As students we were trained to see, to explore, to enjoy ourselves. We felt as though we could go off and do anything without restriction," enthused Tuffin.

Tuffin and Foale's clothes sold in many outlets; their first big break came in 1962 when buyer Vanessa Denza purchased their designs for the Woollards 21 shop in London. This was followed by the opening of their one showroom in Carnaby Street and the retailing of their clothes in the famous Countdown boutique on the King's Road, Chelsea, and at various department stores throughout England. In 1965 the partners were among the first designers to be stocked in Paraphernalia in New York, where designer Betsey Johnson recalled they sold out of Tuffin and Foale's clothes almost immediately.

In 1972 the design duo dissolved their partnership. Tuffin went on to produce some collections under her own name label, which closely adhered to the cutting-edge young fashion look she and Foale had established in the 1960s. Yet Tuffin tired of designing clothes and turned to another form of art, establishing a pottery business with her husband.

—Kevin Almond

TYLER, Richard

Australian designer working in Los Angeles

Born: Sunshine, Australia, circa 1948, son of a factory foreman and a seamstress. Family: Married Doris Taylor (divorced); married Lisa Trafficante, 1989; children: Sheridan, Edward. Career: Opened store, Zippity-doo-dah, in Melbourne, Australia, late 1960s; designed outfits for rock stars, early 1970s; designed and traveled with Rod Stewart's Blondes Have More Fun tour, 1978; started the Richard Tyler collection with wife and partner, Lisa Trafficante, late 1980s; opened Los Angeles showroom, Tyler Trafficante, 1988; opened New York City showroom, 1992; named head designer for Anne Klein & Company, 1993; left Anne Klein & Company, 1994; reintroduced menswear line, 1995; hired as designer for Byblos, 1996–98; initiated bridal line, 1999. Awards: Council of Fashion Designers of America (CFDA) New Talent award, 1993; CFDA Womenswear Designer of the Year, 1994; Designer of the Year Award (CFDA), 1996; Gumleaf award by Australian American Chamber of Commerce (contribution to Australian and American Culture), 2001.

PUBLICATIONS

On TYLER:

Books

Stegemeyer, Anne, Who's Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.

Articles

Beckette, Kathleen, "Runway Report: My One and Only Hue—Richard Tyler," in the New York Post, 4 November 1994.

"New York: Richard Tyler," in WWD, 4 November 1994.

TUFFIN, Sally

British designer

Born: 1938. Education: Studied at the Walthamstow School of Art; graduated from the Royal College of Art, 1961. Family: Married. Career: Partner, Foale & Tuffin, 1962–72; opened retail store, 1965; designer, Sally Tuffin, Ltd., from mid-1970s.

PUBLICATIONS

By TUFFIN:

Books

Children's Wardrobe with Ann Ladbury, London, 1978.

On TUFFIN:

Books

Lobenthal, Joel, Radical Rags: Fashions of the Sixties, New York, 1990.

Articles

"Tuffin Alone," in WWD, 10 July 1972.

"Being There," in WWD, 16 July 2001.

* * *

Sally Tuffin was one of several designers to emerge from Professor Janey Ironside's talented stable of fashion design graduates at London's Royal College of Art in the 1960s. In company with Ossie Clark, Zandra Rhodes, and Bill Gibb she and her business partner Marion Foale (also a RCA graduate) fast came to epitomize the street style and culture of what became the trademark phrase of the decade, "Swinging London."

Based in the hotbed of trendy 1960s happenings, Carnaby Street, Tuffin and Foale produced clothes celebrating youth culture. "We were dressing ourselves and our friends and it just happened to be the things people wanted," Tuffin reminisced in the 1980s. The pair recognized that the sudden predominance of street fashion was a reaction to a previous generation's reliance on Paris for ideas. To the young, the couture direction seemed tired and inaccessible. Tuffin and Foale noted there was a fast-growing younger market which wanted something inexpensive in which to have fun and wear to dance clubs.

As designers, they incorporated both modernist and nostalgic ideas into their clothes. Beginning with the Pop Art movement that spawned prints and "keyhole" shift dresses, they moved through Op Art, into an art déco phase, and next the romantic dressing made popular by the hippie movement. They created hipster trouser suits, clean-cut crêpe dresses like cycle shirts, or vigorously banded into rugby stripes. They even printed giant Ys across a group of shift dresses intended as a pun on the male undergarment, in many ways a forerunner to the witty tactics employed by Moschino today.

Tuffin and Foale's partnership came to symbolize the greater opportunities available to young people with ideas and energy in the 1960s. Initially inspired by a lecture on garments given by Mary Quant at the Royal College of Art, the pair realized business could be fun and approached it in a lighthearted way. "As students we were trained to see, to explore, to enjoy ourselves. We felt as though we could go off and do anything without restriction," enthused Tuffin.

Tuffin and Foale's clothes sold in many outlets; their first big break came in 1962 when buyer Vanessa Denza purchased their designs for the Woollards 21 shop in London. This was followed by the opening of their one showroom in Carnaby Street and the retailing of their clothes in the famous Countdown boutique on the King's Road, Chelsea, and at various department stores throughout England. In 1965 the partners were among the first designers to be stocked in Paraphernalia in New York, where designer Betsey Johnson recalled they sold out of Tuffin and Foale's clothes almost immediately.

In 1972 the design duo dissolved their partnership. Tuffin went on to produce some collections under her own name label, which closely adhered to the cutting-edge young fashion look she and Foale had established in the 1960s. Yet Tuffin tired of designing clothes and turned to another form of art, establishing a pottery business with her husband.

—Kevin Almond

TYLER, Richard

Australian designer working in Los Angeles

Born: Sunshine, Australia, circa 1948, son of a factory foreman and a seamstress. Family: Married Doris Taylor (divorced); married Lisa Trafficante, 1989; children: Sheridan, Edward. Career: Opened store, Zippity-doo-dah, in Melbourne, Australia, late 1960s; designed outfits for rock stars, early 1970s; designed and traveled with Rod Stewart's Blondes Have More Fun tour, 1978; started the Richard Tyler collection with wife and partner, Lisa Trafficante, late 1980s; opened Los Angeles showroom, Tyler Trafficante, 1988; opened New York City showroom, 1992; named head designer for Anne Klein & Company, 1993; left Anne Klein & Company, 1994; reintroduced menswear line, 1995; hired as designer for Byblos, 1996–98; initiated bridal line, 1999. Awards: Council of Fashion Designers of America (CFDA) New Talent award, 1993; CFDA Womenswear Designer of the Year, 1994; Designer of the Year Award (CFDA), 1996; Gumleaf award by Australian American Chamber of Commerce (contribution to Australian and American Culture), 2001.

PUBLICATIONS

On TYLER:

Books

Stegemeyer, Anne, Who's Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.

Articles

Beckette, Kathleen, "Runway Report: My One and Only Hue—Richard Tyler," in the New York Post, 4 November 1994.

"New York: Richard Tyler," in WWD, 4 November 1994.

Richard Tyler, fall 2001 collection: cashmere chenille lace tuxedo.
© AFP/CORBIS.

- Schiavo, Anne-Marie, "The V-Shaped Jacket of the 1940s Makes a U-Turn," in the New York Times, 5 November 1994.
- Spindler, Amy M., "Anne Klein's Designer Departs," in the New York Times, 20 December 1994.
- Campbell, Roy H., "Richard Tyler Takes the High Fashion Moments with the Lows," in Knight-Ridder/Tribune News Service, 2 February 1995.
- LaFerla, Ruth, "Richard Tyler, Perfectionist," in Elle (New York), March 1995.
- "New York: Richard Tyler," in WWWD, 5 April 1995.
- Spindler, Amy M., "Oldham and Tyler Look Super," in the New York Times, 6 April 1995.
- Anniss, Elisa, "Richard Courts," in Footwear News, 29 July 1996.
- Conti, Samatha, "Behind the Purge at Byblos," in DNR, 4 December 1996.
- Sanchez, Eurydice, "Richard Tyler Exclusive Interview," in Men Mode Magazine, Spring 1997.
- "Richard Tyler," in Current Biography, May 1997.
- Ginsberg, Merle, "Golden Moments in Fashion," in WWWD, 8 January 2001.

Young, Kristin, "Tyler Receives Gumleaf Award," in WWWD, 1 February 2001.

Haber, Holly, "Too, Too Tyler," in WWWD, 3 March 2001.

Rubenstein, Hal, "The Look of Richard Tyler," in In Style, 1 July 2001.

Townsend, Catherine, "Bridal Collection 2002, Brides Who Rock," available online at www.fashionwindows.com, 8 August 2001.

Various articles and reviews in GQ, October 1990; Harper's Bazaar, October 1992; New York, 12 October 1992; Vogue, August 1993; New York, 13 September 1993; People, 21 February 1994; Newsweek, 4 April 1994; New York, 11 April 1994; and Vogue, October 1994.

* * *

"At my age, I'm thrilled," 46-year-old Richard Tyler told People magazine when he won the Council of Fashion Designers of America New Talent award in 1993. Just one year later, he walked away with the Council's Womenswear Designer of the Year award—one of the fashion world's highest honors. Although Tyler's fame may have come later in life than other designers, it quickly grew, earning him the respect of his peers and the devotion of his customers.

Much of Tyler's initial success was due to his celebrity clients. Julia Roberts, Janet Jackson, Sigourney Weaver, and Oprah Winfrey are just a few of the stars who have publicly praised the exemplary quality and fit of his clothes. "That's the age-old recipe for success in fashion: get the right people to wear your clothes," Patrick McCarthy, the executive editor of Women's Wear Daily, told Newsweek. Although his famous clients might have drawn new customers in, Tyler's attention to detail and fine tailoring have kept his business growing. Everything on a Richard Tyler design is done by hand. Identical and precise buttonholes are a hallmark of his collection, and his fabrics—the finest wools, silks, and linens—boast such details as individual stripes sewn onto the cloth with silk threads.

Tyler was born in Sunshine, Australia, just outside Melbourne. His mother was a costumer with the Melbourne Ballet and sewed wedding dresses, men's suits, and clerical robes as well. Tyler's father was a plastics factory foreman with one of the best wardrobes in town. It was through his mother that Tyler learned his love for fine quality tailoring. At age 16, Tyler dropped out of school and began work as a tailor at a shop known for outfitting the Australian prime minister. He also spent some time at a factory, cutting out bras. At the age of 18, with his mother's help, Tyler opened his own store, Zippity-doo-dah, in a rundown section of Melbourne. His father paid the bills and his mother sewed his designs in the back room.

By the 1970s, Tyler's shop was beginning to attract a steady clientèle. Australian celebrities, and such touring musicians as Cher, Elton John, and Alice Cooper, began to seek out his Lycra and sequined outfits. During this time, Tyler married Doris Taylor. The marriage lasted 10 years, and they had a son, Sheriden, born in the late 1970s. After Tyler's mother died in 1976, he made many trips to London, continuing to dress a growing cadre of musicians.

In 1978 Rod Stewart asked Tyler to design his Blondes Have More Fun tour. When the show stopped in Los Angeles, Tyler fell in love with the city and decided to make it his home. He continued to design for performers, including Supertramp, the Bee Gees, the Go-Gos, and Diana Ross. But as costume demands became increasingly outrageous in the mid-1980s, Tyler began to drop his work for the stars. He stayed in Los Angeles, doing odd jobs and trading his gardening and sewing skills for rent at the guest houses of friends.

Richard Tyler, fall 2001 collection: silk chiffon diagonal pintucked/stitched dress. © AFP/CORBIS.

Tyler then spent two years in Oslo, Norway, but ended up back in Los Angeles in 1987, with his last $100 and a plane ticket home to Australia. The night before he was to fly home, he met Lisa Trafficante, an actress and businesswoman, who would change his life forever. Together, Tyler and Trafficante formed a partnership enabling them to establish the Richard Tyler line of clothing. Trafficante urged Tyler to follow his strengths and design finely-tailored menswear. She took it upon herself to come up with a business plan and the necessary capital.

Tyler's clothes were so bold that many buyers thought their customers wouldn't buy them. It was during their last appointment of the day, at the boutique If in SoHo, that Tyler and Trafficante received their first order. If's customers were immediately drawn to Tyler's work, and within two years Chativari in New York City and Wilkes Bashford in San Francisco were also buying from Tyler. In 1988 Trafficante persuaded Tyler that they needed to open their own showroom in Los Angeles. With the backing of Trafficante's sister Michelle and investor Gordon DeVol, they bought a drapery manufacturing building in an out-of-the-way part of town. They gutted the interior of the art deco building and created a bare, contemporary setting for Tyler's fashion-forward designs.

The store was named Tyler Trafficante, and it was there that Tyler first became known for his trademark fitted jackets. Diana Rico, writing for GQ, described the transformation felt after trying on a Tyler jacket: "Its dashing cut and construction are so comfortable that you feel as though you're barely wearing anything at all. The sensuous silk lining and luxurious hand-tailored details bespeak an old-world emphasis on fine craftsmanship, while the stagy lapels, offbeat colors and elongated silhouette give the piece a daring rock and roll edge." Although the showroom started without a women's section, so many women came in off the street requesting clothes that the next season Tyler began designing for them.

It was the demand for women's clothes that really sparked the growth of Tyler Trafficante. Within five years, they had one of the hottest stores in Los Angeles. In 1992 Tyler decided it was time to introduce his line to New York. The New York fashion world welcomed him and the press lauded his debut show in March of 1993. The reviews were barely in when he was contacted by the upscale women's sportswear line Anne Klein & Company, asking him to sign on as their new design director. Many in the fashion world questioned the pairing of Tyler—known for his bold, sexy designs—with Klein, a label manufacturing traditional, conservative career clothes for women. The first year Tyler began designing for Anne Klein, store orders rose 30 percent. Despite the immediate jump in sales, the reviews of the Anne Klein line were mixed.

In December of 1994, Anne Klein and Tyler parted company. There were a number of problems that plagued his tenure with Anne Klein. Tyler had difficulty controlling quality and price: his demand for impeccable quality raised the price of an Anne Klein jacket by 15 percent. In addition, he was not used to overseeing a huge staff of pattern makers, tailors, design assistants, and dressmakers. Many speculated that the overriding reason for Tyler's termination, however, was that in his attempt to attract a younger customer, he made too many changes too soon and turned off Klein's traditional customers.

Industry insiders had no doubt, however, of Tyler's rebound. He left Anne Klein with a reported $2.1 million buyout of his contract. In the near future, Tyler planned to launch a secondary line, with a lower price point so that more women can afford his clothes. In 1995, Tyler relaunched his men's line. "The timing was right for coming back to menswear. I felt that at this point we could fill a niche that has opened up. I also think men are tired of wearing big baggy clothing—a look I personally hate," Tyler told Mode Magazine in the spring of 1997.

In 1996 Donatella Girombelli hired Tyler as the chief designer at Byblos, the famous Italian label. He was hired for the job because, according to Girombelli, he was both a designer and a craftsman. He produced four women's collections and two men's collections for Byblos while at the same time producing similar lines in America under his own name. Also in 1996, he joined forces with Rossimoda, a shoe manufacturer based in Italy. Tyler creates sketches with his staff and then sends them to Rossimoda for prototypes to be made. The shoes match his womenswear collections and sometimes inspire his collections because they are produced first.

Tyler was replaced at Byblos by John Bartlett in 1998 and returned to his Tyler Trafficante home base. His lines include Richard Tyler Couture, a designer sportswear line, and the most recently added Richard Tyler Bride in 1999. The bridal debut line featured quilted embroidery with handmade roses, which has become his signature on his bridal gowns. Tyler remains a choice designer for Hollywood celebrities to wear to various functions, including award shows. His clothes are well received, fashion-forward, and wearable. He describes his business as a life investment, and although he thrives on challenges, he has found his place in the fashion world and is currently has no plans for further expansion.

—Molly Severson; updated by Donna W. Reamy

U

UNDERWOOD, Patricia

British millinery designer working in New York

Born: Patricia Gilbert in Maidenhead, England, 11 October 1947. Education: Trained in millinery at Fashion Institute of Technology, New York, 1972. Family: Married Reginald Underwood, 1967 (divorced, 1976); married Jonathan Moynihan, 1980; children: Vivecca. Career: Clerk/typist at Buckingham Palace, 1966–67; secretary, United Artists, New York, 1968–69; manufactured hats with Lipp Holmfeld (Hats by Lipp), 1973–75; president/designer in own company Patricia Underwood, New York, 1976; launched Patricia Underwood Knit Collection, 1983; opened in-store shop in Saks Fifth Avenue; Patricia Underwood Too line of women's ready-to-wear introduced, 1990; featured collections in Vogue, has designed for Bill Blass, Oscar de la Renta, Carolyne Roehm, Donna Karan, Calvin Klein, and others. Exhibitions: Hats, Philadelphia Museum of Art, 1993. Awards: Coty American Fashion Critics award, 1982; Council of Fashion Designers of America award, 1983, American Accessories Achievement award, 1992. Address: 242 West 36th Street, New York, NY 10018, U.S.A.

PUBLICATIONS

On UNDERWOOD:

Books

- Khornak, Lucille, Fashion 2001, New York, 1982.
Steele, Valerie, Women of Fashion, New York, 1991.
McDowell, Colin, Hats: Status, Style, Glamour, London, 1992.
Muller, F., Les chapeaux: une histoire de tête, Paris, 1993.
Smith, R., and Smolan, L., The Hat Book, New York, 1993.
Stegemeyer, Anne, Who's Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.

Articles

- Meadus, Amanda, "Major Gripe: The Minimalist Wave," in WWD, 14 February 1994.
Gault, Ylonda, "A Crowning Achievement in Hats: Designer Builds Heady Reputation with Stylish Toques in Hatless World," in Crain's New York Business, 18 January 1999.
Karl, John, "Mad About Hats," in Sarasota Herald Tribune (Saradota, Florida), 18 April 2000.

*

I design hats which complement clothing, flatter the wearer, and rely on shape and proportion rather than ornamental trim to achieve this effect. My designs are characterized by clean, elegant lines that enhance a silhouette and complete a sophisticated look. A simplicity of design avoids the pitfalls of a hat becoming a distraction on a wearer. I create hats in a variety of materials since there are also the practical weather-related aspects to hat wearing. A hat must be comfortable and easy to wear; this is achieved by using high quality, malleable materials and handcrafted workmanship.

My inspiration for a collection comes from my travels, art, and the international world of fashion. Beautifully tailored clothing, innovative uses of materials and application of finishing details are constant sources of new ideas. Collaborations with talented designers including Bill Blass, Marc Jacobs, the late Perry Ellis, and many others, are a tremendous source of inspiration for me. I am always intrigued by color and certain tones that flatter a complexion to enhance beauty.

We are lucky today that one may choose to wear a hat or not, unlike 50 years ago when a hat was considered a necessity of good grooming. Now hat wearing has become a matter of personal style and a way of stimulating response... Hats create amazing possibilities.

—Patricia Underwood

* * *

The outstanding characteristic of millinery designer Patricia Underwood's hats is they are, for the most part, completely unadorned. There are no added trimmings, no flowers, ribbons, or even hatbands on her pieces. The shape and the materials are the statement, they provide all the texture and color she feels is necessary. Underwood works with a variety of traditional millinery materials; various straw braids, fur felts, real fur, and knitted yarns, in addition to more unusual materials such as fake furs and her signature sewn strips of leather and suede.

Underwood's hats are designed specifically to work with clothing and to complement it. She strives to avoid overwhelming the wearer, and to avoid crossing the fine line between the flattering and the absurd in millinery. She is described by Colin McDowell in Hats: Status Style, Glamour (1992) as, "Probably the most skilful of the middle-market milliners...Underwood's approach is entirely practical. Her paramount concern is how the hats will relate to clothing." Underwood herself explains, "Why bother to have a hat...if it doesn't go with the clothes?"

Underwood's strength lies in transforming traditional hat shapes and types and creating new interpretations of these classic forms. The change may be made by the use of an unexpected material, or by her subtle manipulation of the form, giving a familiar shape an entirely new look. A cowboy hat, for example, for her 1991 collection was made of fine straw braid, the brim slightly wider than normal, the curve of the brim more subtle, the curl of the edge was slightly exaggerated. The overall effect of the hat was more feminine and sophisticated than a cowboy hat has ever been before. A 1920s-style cloche from the same year was transformed in a similar manner—the crown was squared and the brim became a small visor off the front; the feminine cloche was given a sportier character, suggesting a modern baseball cap. Other familiar hat types she has reworked include boaters, nun's coifs, and the wide-brimmed picture hat.

By changing the expected relationships between the elements of the hat, the crown, and the brim, Underwood creates modern versions of virtually any forms. Her aesthetic is in concert with the minimalist fashions of designers such as Giorgio Armani and Calvin Klein; she takes the forms we are familiar with and eliminates detail until they are reduced to their essential shape.

In response to the frequent pronouncements that "hats are back" as mandatory fashion accessories, Underwood maintains that the hat will not return as a fashion staple, but will continue to exist as an optional accessory. The art of the milliner will therefore survive in modern fashion. Underwood's inspiration is derived from the arts, her travels, and historical fashion. Her palette for the fall-winter 1994 collection was inspired by the work of the painter Modigliani. In general, her preferred colors are muted, natural tones.

In the middle 1990s she added coordinating scarves, shawls, and gloves to her collection. Her work is mostly ready-to-wear, available through department and specialty stores such as Saks Fifth Avenue and Bergdorf Goodman, and has her own in-store boutique in the latter. Additionally, Underwood continues to do custom work for a select clientele and has expanded her horizons into Europe and Japan.

Besides her own collections, Underwood has collaborated with many of the top American fashion designers who appreciate her purity of form. Upscale retailers appreciate Underwood's creations as well. Nicole Fischelis, vice president and fashion director of Saks Fifth Avenue, a longtime admirer of Underwood told Crain's New York Business (19 January 1999), "She is very successful because she has a complete understanding of the couture customer. She has a great sense of proportion, keen color sensibility, and the style is pure, never ornamental."

—Melinda L. Watt; updated by Nelly Rhodes

UNGARO, Emanuel

French designer

Born: Aix-en-Provence, 13 February 1933. Family: Married to Laura Ungaro. Career: Worked in his father's tailoring business, Aix-en-Provence, 1951–54; stylist, Maison Camps tailors, Paris, 1955–57; designer, Balenciaga, Paris, 1958–64; head of design, Balenciaga, Madrid, 1959–61; designer, Courrèges, 1964–65; established own firm, 1965; Ungaro Parallèle ready-to-wear collection introduced, 1968; menswear collection added, 1975; sportswear line, Emanuel, introduced, 1991; launched bed and bath collection, then plus-size line, 1995; firm bought by Ferragamo, 1996; opened new Palm Beach store, 1998; Gianbattista Valli hired as creative director, 1998; launched Fever denim line, 2000; Valli took over all designs but couture, 2001; fragrances include Ungaro, 1977; Diva, 1982; Senso, 1987; Ungaro pour l'homme III, 1993; Fleur de Diva, 1997; Desnuda, 2001. Awards: Neiman Marcus award, Dallas, 1969; Dallas Fashion award, 1995, 1996; first fashion designer asked to address Oxford

Emanuel Ungaro, fall/winter 2001–02 ready-to-wear collection.
© AP/Wide World Photos.

Union, 2001. Address: 2 avenue Montaigne, 75008 Paris, France.
Website: www.emanuelungaro.fr.

PUBLICATIONS

By UNGARO:

Books

Emanuel Ungaro, Paris, with Yves Navarre, Paris, 1988.
Emanuel Ungaro, with Federico Fellini, Milan, 1992.

On UNGARO:

Books

Lyman, Ruth, ed., Couture: An Illustrated History of the Great Paris Designers and Their Creations, New York, 1972.
Perschetz, Lois, ed., W, The Designing Life, New York, 1987.
Loebenthal, Joel, Radical Rags: Fashions of the Sixties, New York, 1990.

cloche from the same year was transformed in a similar manner—the crown was squared and the brim became a small visor off the front; the feminine cloche was given a sportier character, suggesting a modern baseball cap. Other familiar hat types she has reworked include boaters, nun's coifs, and the wide-brimmed picture hat.

By changing the expected relationships between the elements of the hat, the crown, and the brim, Underwood creates modern versions of virtually any forms. Her aesthetic is in concert with the minimalist fashions of designers such as Giorgio Armani and Calvin Klein; she takes the forms we are familiar with and eliminates detail until they are reduced to their essential shape.

In response to the frequent pronouncements that "hats are back" as mandatory fashion accessories, Underwood maintains that the hat will not return as a fashion staple, but will continue to exist as an optional accessory. The art of the milliner will therefore survive in modern fashion. Underwood's inspiration is derived from the arts, her travels, and historical fashion. Her palette for the fall-winter 1994 collection was inspired by the work of the painter Modigliani. In general, her preferred colors are muted, natural tones.

In the middle 1990s she added coordinating scarves, shawls, and gloves to her collection. Her work is mostly ready-to-wear, available through department and specialty stores such as Saks Fifth Avenue and Bergdorf Goodman, and has her own in-store boutique in the latter. Additionally, Underwood continues to do custom work for a select clientele and has expanded her horizons into Europe and Japan.

Besides her own collections, Underwood has collaborated with many of the top American fashion designers who appreciate her purity of form. Upscale retailers appreciate Underwood's creations as well. Nicole Fischelis, vice president and fashion director of Saks Fifth Avenue, a longtime admirer of Underwood told Crain's New York Business (19 January 1999), "She is very successful because she has a complete understanding of the couture customer. She has a great sense of proportion, keen color sensibility, and the style is pure, never ornamental."

—Melinda L. Watt; updated by Nelly Rhodes

UNGARO, Emanuel

French designer

Born: Aix-en-Provence, 13 February 1933. Family: Married to Laura Ungaro. Career: Worked in his father's tailoring business, Aix-en-Provence, 1951–54; stylist, Maison Camps tailors, Paris, 1955–57; designer, Balenciaga, Paris, 1958–64; head of design, Balenciaga, Madrid, 1959–61; designer, Courrèges, 1964–65; established own firm, 1965; Ungaro Parallèle ready-to-wear collection introduced, 1968; menswear collection added, 1975; sportswear line, Emanuel, introduced, 1991; launched bed and bath collection, then plus-size line, 1995; firm bought by Ferragamo, 1996; opened new Palm Beach store, 1998; Gianbattista Valli hired as creative director, 1998; launched Fever denim line, 2000; Valli took over all designs but couture, 2001; fragrances include Ungaro, 1977; Diva, 1982; Senso, 1987; Ungaro pour l'homme III, 1993; Fleur de Diva, 1997; Desnuda, 2001. Awards: Neiman Marcus award, Dallas, 1969; Dallas Fashion award, 1995, 1996; first fashion designer asked to address Oxford

Emanuel Ungaro, fall/winter 2001–02 ready-to-wear collection.
© AP/Wide World Photos.

Union, 2001. Address: 2 avenue Montaigne, 75008 Paris, France.
Website: www.emanuelungaro.fr.

PUBLICATIONS

By UNGARO:

Books

Emanuel Ungaro, Paris, with Yves Navarre, Paris, 1988.
Emanuel Ungaro, with Federico Fellini, Milan, 1992.

On UNGARO:

Books

Lyman, Ruth, ed., Couture: An Illustrated History of the Great Paris Designers and Their Creations, New York, 1972.
Perschetz, Lois, ed., W, The Designing Life, New York, 1987.
Loebenthal, Joel, Radical Rags: Fashions of the Sixties, New York, 1990.

Emanuel Ungaro, spring/summer 2001 haute couture collection. © AP/Wide World Photos.

Guillen, Pierre-Yves, and Jacqueling Claude, The Golden Thimble: French Haute Couture, Paris, 1990.

Stegemeyer, Anne, Who's Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.

Orban, Christine, Emanuel Ungaro, Paris & London, 1999.

Articles

Arroyuelo, Javier, "La haute couture: Ungaro," in Vogue (Paris), March 1985.

"The Allure of Ungaro," in Vogue (New York), April 1985.

Salinger, Pierre, "Emanuel Ungaro, un homme et artiste," in Vogue (Paris), September 1985.

Brubach, Holly, "Theme and Variations: Expression of a Unique Style at Ungaro," in Vogue (New York), December 1985.

Salinger, Pierre, "Emanuel Ungaro, un homme et un artiste," in Vogue (Paris), February 1986.

Salvy, Gérard Julien, "Créer c'est rêver d'une femme," in Vogue (Paris), February 1986.

Premoti, Francesca, "Emanuel Ungaro: un'eleganza discreta," in L'Uomo Vogue (Milan), October 1986.

Bernasconi, Silvana, "Ungaro la seduzione: Senso," in Vogue (Milan), September 1987.

Williamson, Rusty, "Rapping with Ungaro: He Talks of Couture, Fashion and Texas Women," in WWD, 16 January 1990.

Howell, Georgina, "Ungaro Fortissimo," in Vogue (New York), November 1991.

Prey, Nadine, "Prints Charming," in Harper's Bazaar (New York), November 1991.

Gerrie, Anthea, "Sex, Style and a Man Called Ungaro," in Clothes Show (London), January 1992.

Yusuf, Nilgin, "Emanuel Ungaro: The British Are So Exotic," in Marie Claire (London), January 1992.

Morris, Bernadine, "House of Ungaro at 25: Seductiveness without Vulgarity," in the New York Times, 25 March 1992.

Aillaud, Charlotte, "Chez Emanuel Ungaro," in Architectural Digest (Los Angeles), July 1992.

Menkes, Suzy, "Chanel: Beauty Without Gimmicks," in the International Herald Tribune, 25 January 1995.

- Haber, Holly, "Emanuel Line Wins Dallas Award," in WWD, 13 June 1995.
- "Ferragamo Acquires the House of Ungaro; Emanuel Keeps Reins," in WWD, 3 July 1996.
- Ozzrad, Janet, "Ungaro's American Face," in WWD, 20 May 1997.
- Weisman, Katherine, "Ungaro's New Global Approach," in WWD, 16 July 1998.
- Zargani, Luisa, "Ferragamo Chooses Ungaro Licensees," in WWD, 14 July 1999.
- Pogoda, Dianne M., "Emanuel Ungaro—On Freedom, Obsession and Pleasing Women," in WWD, 13 September 1999.
- Folpe, Janet M., "Will Bestiality Sell Dresses? How About S&M?" in Fortune, 21 February 2000.
- Socha, Miles, "Ungaro: Time to Catch the Fever," in WWD, 3 August 2000.
- , "Ungaro's New Design," in WWD, 11 January 2000.
- Fallon, James, "Professor Ungaro of Oxford," in WWD, 18 May 2001.
- Socha, Miles, "Do the Rite Thing: Emanuel Ungaro Passes Control to Giambattista Valli," in WWD, 9 October 2001.

* * *

Approaching 50 years in fashion, Ungaro can look back and see he had indeed accomplished his goal of "seducing the woman." His early training in the atelier of Balenciaga taught Ungaro about line and color. He still refers to what he learned about draping directly on the model. Later, working with Courrèges, Ungaro participated in the Space Age hard chic of his mentor.

It was later suggested that many of Courrèges's successful designs might have been attributed to Ungaro, who created metal bras, skimpy cutout A-line dresses, and white boots in a hard, futuristic manner Ungaro himself later dismissed as "false modernism." The influence of two years with Courrèges carried over into the early years of Ungaro's work on his own. He continued to make young, "kicky" fashions, dresses, and coats in bold, interlaced geometrics. His turtleneck and leggings worn underneath a sleeveless pinafore was a 1960s look that was resurrected by other designers to great popularity 20 years later. With the advantage of textile designer Sonia Knapp's artistic fabric designs, Ungaro gradually developed a softness of line that was to fully develop a decade later. Of his early designs, Ungaro prefers to say little, but chenille daisy appliquéd see-through trousersuits speak for themselves.

Toward the end of the 1970s, Ungaro began to experiment with the then-taboo mixing of textures and prints, of which he has become the master. Knapp's fabrics had evolved into more painterly, impressionistic florals, abstract smears, luminous colors. In daytime clothing Ungaro would pair a paisley blouse with a plaid suit, or a striped top worn under a tweed jacket with glen plaid trousers. In 1980 this daring approach found full expression in a collection of casual but complex ensembles, featuring fantasy printed, gold-edged jackets over sheer lace blouses, luxuriant paisley shawls wrapped over quilted, fur-lined cardigans, solid chiffon blouses paired with half-patterned, half-striped skirts.

For evening, there were embellished velvet burnooses or wrapped paisley dresses, trimmed in black lace, completed this unusual eclectic look, offered through Ungaro's expensive ready-to-wear line, Parallèle. This risk taking had its early appearance in Ungaro couture, and has continued to the present day. The clothes were designed for women who chose and combined their outfits without regard to what others would think. In the wake of the drab "dress for success" uniform, Ungaro's vision offered the self-confident woman, or one who was not dependent upon conformity for job security, the opportunity for a more personal, individual look. Knapp's special fabrics made the mixtures work. Her colors were rich, with underlying coordinate properties hard to duplicate. Over the years many designers have borrowed from Ungaro's ideas, with varying degrees of success.

Borrowing from the East, in 1981, Ungaro layered fluid chinoiserie patterned tunics over contrasting colorways skirts, draped with tasseled shawls of tiny floral and undulating lines in a riot of colors. The sensual, covered-up looks suggested Gustav Klimt's paintings in their profusion of mosaic colors and patterns. Cummerbund-bound floral skirts topped with lacy blouses under boleros showed a folkloric influence, though less literal than Saint Laurent's Russians a few years before.

Ungaro's designs have been intended to convey sex appeal without being vulgar. He has said that when doing a dress he would always ask himself if the woman in the dress would be seductive. Women and music are his inspiration. One can only guess if a particular collection has been created while Ungaro was listening to Mozart, Beethoven, Wagner, Stravinsky, or Ravel. Certainly his designs possess the contrast and harmony, repose and counterpoint of a musical composition. By the mid-1980s an Ungaro dress could be immediately identified by its diagonally draped and Shirred skirt, wide shoulders gathered into gigot sleeves buttoned at the wrist, wrapped V-neckline, or jewel-toned silk jacquard fabric.

Ungaro wedding dresses were of pale pastel crêpe, sculpted, diagonally draped and caught with self-fabric flowers. At this time he introduced the short black-skirted suit with colorful jackets, both printed and plain—this look continues to be universally chic. To add to the seductiveness of his ensembles, Ungaro's models wore veiled elongated pillbox hats, pushed down over the eyes, an accessory resurrected a decade later for fall.

By 1985 Ungaro seemed to achieve a new serenity, the result of his thoughts and dreams. Since then he has repeated with variations the sleek curvaceous silhouettes, the fluid construction, ingenious cut, original color sense, and print and pattern mixtures without ever becoming boring. The self-confident Ungaro customer is also appealingly vulnerable because the fabric and cut subtly reveal her body. A flirtation with the short bubble floral skirt followed Lacroix's introduction of that silhouette, but Ungaro became even more wildly successful with his short, tightly wrapped dress. Late 1980s spring dresses featured short flounced skirts, big puffed sleeves, and bold solids or florals. Ungaro called his style a "new Baroque."

Fall 1989 ball gowns were gypsy inspired, with floor-length bouffant floral skirts trimmed with polka dotted ruffles and black lace, puffed sleeved jackets of contrasting florals trimmed with velvet and jewels. In 1990 folkloric flowers trimmed a cape worn over a short black leather skirt and deep red jacket. Voluminous Victorian-bustled plaid skirts on strapless evening dresses highlighted Ungaro's 1991 couture, while padded Asian coats were offered through his ready-to-wear line. After a cheerful, bouffant skirted spring, Ungaro presented a more somber, but no less luxurious, collection for the fall of 1992. Ungaro Parallèle continued to produce feminine floral brocade dresses and vibrant plaid suits interwoven with gold threads. In 1991 the lower priced Emanuel line was launched, with the famous tight and short Ungaro silhouette typified by a thigh-high Shirred houndstooth dress with high neck and long sleeves.

Certainly the body-hugging Ungaro designs require a trim figure, but all the shoulder and hip emphasis can also be flattering to many figures by simulating an hourglass shape. Diagonal lines have a slimming effect. Some of Ungaro's spring dresses have merely skimmed the body, hiding flaws. Slit skirts have flatteringly shown off still-good legs.

At the end of the 20th century Ungaro was a name and brand increasingly recognized worldwide. The designer's 17th freestanding boutique opened in Palm Beach, Florida, and all remaining stores were renovated to reflect a new, hipper style. The outward changes reflected some internal struggles over the last few years, including the loss of longtime designing team Ken Kaufman and Isaac Franco, who went to Anne Klein. Esther Chen took over, then Gianbattista Valli was hired in 1998.

Ungaro ignited a storm of controversy in 2000 after new ads featured model Kirsten Owen and a large German Shepard wearing unusual accoutrements and assuming unusual positions. Most laughed at the resulting bestiality and S&M jokes, and Ungaro himself was unfazed. When the new Ungaro swimwear collection was introduced a few months later, there was nary a wag about the dog.

Ever in search of pleasing women, Ungaro has endured because his clothes show profound appreciation and respect for women (with the exception of that silly canine ad). Though Ungaro stepped back a bit to design only his couture line, turning the rest of the responsibilities over to Valli, he will continue to do what he does best: make women feel beautiful.

—Therese Duzinkiewicz Baker; updated by Owen James

UNGER, Kay

American designer

Born: Chicago, Illinois, 22 May 1945. Education: Studied at Washington University, Missouri, and Parsons School of Design, New York. Career: Worked for Pattullo-Jo Copeland, Gayle Kirkpatrick, and Geoffrey Beene; became designer of Traina Boutique and Traina Sport collections, 1971; created own collection; became partner at Gillian Group, 1972, with Howard Bloom and Jon Levy; lines include Gillian, Gillian Dinner, Gillian Suits, Gillian Petites, Woman, and two other prominent dress lines, A.J. Bari and GiGi By Gillian; shut down Gillian and A.J. Bari labels, 1995; launched own company with labels Kay Unger New York and Phoebe, 1995; created eveningwear division, Unger Mindel, 1996; began separates collection, 1999; started producing lower-priced Pamela Dennis line, 2000. Awards: J.C. Penney scholarship and Irish Linen Association scholarship, Parsons School of Design. Address: Kay Unger Phoebe Enterprises, 575 Eighth Avenue, New York, NY 10018 USA. Website: www.kayunger.com.

PUBLICATIONS

On UNGER:

Books

Lambert, Eleanor, World of Fashion: People, Places, Resources, New York, 1976.

On UNGER:

Articles

Stiansen, Sarah, "Staying on Top," in Savvy Woman, November 1990.

Wilner, Rich, "Unger's Back on Seventh Avenue as Chief Designer for Phoebe," in WWD, 7 March 1995.

"Kay's Evening Bag," in WWD, 15 October 1996.

Rath, Paula, "Island Style," in Honolulu Star Advertiser, 27 December 2000.

Haber, Holly, "Oh, Kay," in WWD, 24 May 2001.

* * *

Kay Unger epitomizes the customer for whom she designs—with a clear understanding based on her own busy lifestyle. Using herself as the customer, she understands the needs of an active lifestyle, whether a woman is involved in a career or not. The specific needs of her clientèle are rooted in lifestyle dressing, primarily dresses that can be worn from the office to dinner or appropriate for luncheons or charity functions.

In 1989, recognizing a void in the marketplace for "clean dinner dresses," Unger set out to reinvent the little black dress. She designed a group of understated, tasteful, less embellished restaurant dresses, brought hemlines down—some to mid-calf and ankle length—and successfully replaced the overly opulent, short, and ornamented looks of the 1980s dress market. In addition to the void in evening dresses, she also filled a void in the daywear market with city short sets or rompers. To unite day and evening, she created ensemble dressing: two- or three-piece outfits sold as one rather than as sportswear separates. This allowed the customer a certain freedom to alter the look of a garment, depending on the occasion.

Selling her wares under the Gillian label, Unger's signature fabric was silk, in many guises and in various weaves. Other fabrics used were wool crêpe for fall and linens and linen weaves for spring and summer, always incorporating novelty fabrics and innovative color mixes. Unger's eye for color and design was honed during early training as a painter and influenced the prints appearing in every line, designed in-house by her design team and exclusive to the Gillian Group. They were often influenced by her knowledge of art history as well as home furnishings. Color was the primary strength of the Gillian line, due to its innovative and saleable quality.

Unger's clothes were categorized as bridge, falling between top-quality ready-to-wear and designer apparel, feminine and classic rather than trendy, streetwise, or masculine, and dresses following trends. Her customers were adult women, fairly affluent, with good taste, interested in the classic rather than trendy but definitely not traditional. The Gillian collection included a wide variety of classic designs for daytime, career, and dinner dressing. Comfort and affordability were important considerations for a customer whose day demanded polish and professionalism, from early meetings to late night dinners or entertaining. Bold color combinations, quality fabrics, and striking prints were consistent Gillian trademarks. Certain styles such as the longer shirt dresses, easy chemises, coat dresses, savvy suits, and understated dinner dresses met with great success.

The Gillian Group was one of the largest suppliers of women's apparel in America. Recognizing the various needs of women spanning from the Northeast to the South and to the West, these regional differences were addressed through a large variety of fabrics and Certainly the body-hugging Ungaro designs require a trim figure, but all the shoulder and hip emphasis can also be flattering to many figures by simulating an hourglass shape. Diagonal lines have a slimming effect. Some of Ungaro's spring dresses have merely skimmed the body, hiding flaws. Slit skirts have flatteringly shown off still-good legs.

At the end of the 20th century Ungaro was a name and brand increasingly recognized worldwide. The designer's 17th freestanding boutique opened in Palm Beach, Florida, and all remaining stores were renovated to reflect a new, hipper style. The outward changes reflected some internal struggles over the last few years, including the loss of longtime designing team Ken Kaufman and Isaac Franco, who went to Anne Klein. Esther Chen took over, then Gianbattista Valli was hired in 1998.

Ungaro ignited a storm of controversy in 2000 after new ads featured model Kirsten Owen and a large German Shepard wearing unusual accoutrements and assuming unusual positions. Most laughed at the resulting bestiality and S&M jokes, and Ungaro himself was unfazed. When the new Ungaro swimwear collection was introduced a few months later, there was nary a wag about the dog.

Ever in search of pleasing women, Ungaro has endured because his clothes show profound appreciation and respect for women (with the exception of that silly canine ad). Though Ungaro stepped back a bit to design only his couture line, turning the rest of the responsibilities over to Valli, he will continue to do what he does best: make women feel beautiful.

—Therese Duzinkiewicz Baker; updated by Owen James

UNGER, Kay

American designer

Born: Chicago, Illinois, 22 May 1945. Education: Studied at Washington University, Missouri, and Parsons School of Design, New York. Career: Worked for Pattullo-Jo Copeland, Gayle Kirkpatrick, and Geoffrey Beene; became designer of Traina Boutique and Traina Sport collections, 1971; created own collection; became partner at Gillian Group, 1972, with Howard Bloom and Jon Levy; lines include Gillian, Gillian Dinner, Gillian Suits, Gillian Petites, Woman, and two other prominent dress lines, A.J. Bari and GiGi By Gillian; shut down Gillian and A.J. Bari labels, 1995; launched own company with labels Kay Unger New York and Phoebe, 1995; created eveningwear division, Unger Mindel, 1996; began separates collection, 1999; started producing lower-priced Pamela Dennis line, 2000. Awards: J.C. Penney scholarship and Irish Linen Association scholarship, Parsons School of Design. Address: Kay Unger Phoebe Enterprises, 575 Eighth Avenue, New York, NY 10018 USA. Website: www.kayunger.com.

PUBLICATIONS

On UNGER:

Books

Lambert, Eleanor, World of Fashion: People, Places, Resources, New York, 1976.

On UNGER:

Articles

Stiansen, Sarah, "Staying on Top," in Savvy Woman, November 1990.

Wilner, Rich, "Unger's Back on Seventh Avenue as Chief Designer for Phoebe," in WWD, 7 March 1995.

"Kay's Evening Bag," in WWD, 15 October 1996.

Rath, Paula, "Island Style," in Honolulu Star Advertiser, 27 December 2000.

Haber, Holly, "Oh, Kay," in WWD, 24 May 2001.

* * *

Kay Unger epitomizes the customer for whom she designs—with a clear understanding based on her own busy lifestyle. Using herself as the customer, she understands the needs of an active lifestyle, whether a woman is involved in a career or not. The specific needs of her clientèle are rooted in lifestyle dressing, primarily dresses that can be worn from the office to dinner or appropriate for luncheons or charity functions.

In 1989, recognizing a void in the marketplace for "clean dinner dresses," Unger set out to reinvent the little black dress. She designed a group of understated, tasteful, less embellished restaurant dresses, brought hemlines down—some to mid-calf and ankle length—and successfully replaced the overly opulent, short, and ornamented looks of the 1980s dress market. In addition to the void in evening dresses, she also filled a void in the daywear market with city short sets or rompers. To unite day and evening, she created ensemble dressing: two- or three-piece outfits sold as one rather than as sportswear separates. This allowed the customer a certain freedom to alter the look of a garment, depending on the occasion.

Selling her wares under the Gillian label, Unger's signature fabric was silk, in many guises and in various weaves. Other fabrics used were wool crêpe for fall and linens and linen weaves for spring and summer, always incorporating novelty fabrics and innovative color mixes. Unger's eye for color and design was honed during early training as a painter and influenced the prints appearing in every line, designed in-house by her design team and exclusive to the Gillian Group. They were often influenced by her knowledge of art history as well as home furnishings. Color was the primary strength of the Gillian line, due to its innovative and saleable quality.

Unger's clothes were categorized as bridge, falling between top-quality ready-to-wear and designer apparel, feminine and classic rather than trendy, streetwise, or masculine, and dresses following trends. Her customers were adult women, fairly affluent, with good taste, interested in the classic rather than trendy but definitely not traditional. The Gillian collection included a wide variety of classic designs for daytime, career, and dinner dressing. Comfort and affordability were important considerations for a customer whose day demanded polish and professionalism, from early meetings to late night dinners or entertaining. Bold color combinations, quality fabrics, and striking prints were consistent Gillian trademarks. Certain styles such as the longer shirt dresses, easy chemises, coat dresses, savvy suits, and understated dinner dresses met with great success.

The Gillian Group was one of the largest suppliers of women's apparel in America. Recognizing the various needs of women spanning from the Northeast to the South and to the West, these regional differences were addressed through a large variety of fabrics and colorations within the different fashion divisions bearing the signature Gillian style and value. They included Gillian, Gillian Dinner, Gillian Suits, Gillian Petites, Woman, as well as the A.J. Bari and GiGi By Gillian labels.

Unger and her partners shuttered Gillian and A.J. Bari in 1995 after more than two decades in business. Within a few months, in 1995, Unger set up shop for herself as a bridge resource, establishing the brands Kay Unger New York, for misses' sizes, and Phoebe, consisting of dresses and eveningwear for younger women. The higher-priced Kay Unger New York line consists of both classic styles and more innovative pieces. In 1996 Unger launched an eveningwear division in partnership with Wendy Mindel, an assistant designer for Phoebe, under the Unger Mindel moniker. Then in 1999, Unger started a line of separates for daytime, allowing her customers to shop for mix-and-match coordinates rather than exclusively for sets.

Unger's designs are recognized for their attention to detail and for utilizing a variety of prints, nearly all created in-house. From stripes to florals, Unger's fabrics claim a central role in her designs; some pieces layer fabrics in a variety of prints. The fact that the company makes its own fabrics also gives it the flexibility to quickly react to changes in the market and to focus on bestselling items, a trait appreciated by key customers, including Neiman Marcus and Saks (for whom Unger creates some exclusive items to differentiate the line from store to store).

In 2000 the Lieber Group retained Unger to produce a lower-priced line of eveningwear under the Pamela Dennis label (although the line, designed by Lieber staffers, is thought to be in some jeopardy as of 2001 due to the Lieber Group's financial problems). Unger has also designed a line of leather goods for Vericci and has created several licensed accessories lines under her own labels.

Unger prides herself on her readiness to listen and respond to her customers. She is on the road for appearances 20 weekends a year, not only to publicize her line but to collect customer feedback. She has a following among the famous; she created Tipper Gore's gown for the 1997 inaugural ball and has designed custom attire for stars at various awards shows, including the Grammy Awards. Unger's designs have received a boost through publicity in fashion publications, particularly In Style magazine, and through product placement in television shows and films such as Bounce. Indeed, many of her designs are influenced by looks from Hollywood's heyday, with Unger claiming Audrey Hepburn as one of her muses.

Kay Unger's philosophy is "less is more." She counsels women to eschew bulky clothing and to dress appropriately but without regard to age or shape; she sometimes creates designs in the same fabrics for different figures so all customers will find something in which they feel comfortable. She urges her customers to emphasize their femininity, and she creates affordable clothing that enables them to do so.

—Roberta Hochberger Gruber; updated by Karen Raugust

V

VALENTINA

American designer

Born: Valentina Sanina in Kiev, Russia, 1 May 1904. Education: Studied drama in Kiev, 1917–19. Family: Married George Schlee, 1921 (died, 1971). Career: Dancer, Chauve Souris Theater, Paris, 1922–23; moved to New York, 1923; opened small couture house, 1925, incorporated as Valentina Gowns, Inc., 1928; introduced perfume My Own, 1950; designed for the theatre, gowns for leading ladies, 1934–54; firm closed and retired, 1957. Died: 14 September 1989, in New York.

PUBLICATIONS

On VALENTINA:

Books

- Milbank, Caroline Rennolds, Couture: The Great Designers, New York, 1985.
Owen, Bobbie, Costume Designers on Broadway: Designers and Their Credits 1915–1985, Westport, Connecticut, 1987.
Milbank, Caroline Rennolds, New York Fashion: The Evolution of American Style, New York, 1989.
Steele, Valerie, Women of Fashion, New York, 1991.

Articles

- Diesel, Leota, “Valentina Puts on a Good Show,” in Theatre Arts, April 1952.
Pope, Elizabeth, “Women Really Pay Her $600 for a Dress,” in Good Housekeeping, February 1955.
Lawford, Valentine, “Encounters with Chanel, Mainbocher, Schiaparelli, Valentina, and Charles James,” in Architectural Digest, September 1988.
“Valentina,” [obituary] in Current Biography, September 1989.
Morris, Bernadine, “Valentina, A Designer of Clothes for Stars in the Theater, Dies,” in the New York Times, 15 September 1989.
“Valentina,” [obituary] in WWD, 18 September 1989.
“Valentina,” [obituary] in the Independent (London), 28 September 1989.
Anderson, Lisa, “Garbo Walks Her Companion on Many a N.Y. Stroll...,” in Chicago Tribune, 25 October 1991.
Fraser, Kennedy, “The Valentina Vision,” in Vogue, March 1995.

* * *

Madame Valentina was as exotic as her name. A Russian emigrée, she attracted attention in New York after her arrival in 1923 by looking like a woman at a time when women were trying to look like young boys. For dining in fashionable restaurants or attending the theatre with her theatre-producer husband George Schlee, Valentina wore her own designs—full-length, high necked, long sleeved gowns with natural waistlines, made of flowing black velvet—in contrast to the short, waistless, beaded flapper fashions that prevailed at the time. Instead of bobbed hair, Valentina emphasized high cheekbones and large soulful eyes by wearing her long blonde hair in a high chignon. Slavic reserve, thick Russian accent, expressive hands, and movement with a dancer’s grace completed her personality. She was her own best model and maintained a consistency of appearance throughout her long career.

Interest in Valentina’s unusual clothes led to the establishment of Valentina Gowns, Inc. in 1928, on New York’s upper East side. Success was immediate; Valentina’s clients included luminaries from the theatre, opera, ballet, society, and film. Greta Garbo, whom Valentina was said to resemble (“I’m the Gothic version,” she once said) was one of her customers. Each of Valentina’s clients, who numbered no more than 200 at any one time, was granted personal attention. Valentina insisted that she alone knew what was best for these women and made last-minute changes in color or detail if necessary. Fashion editors were exasperated by Valentina’s insistence upon selecting and modeling her clothes herself, but, ultimately, Valentina was right. Her business remained successful for 30 years.

Valentina’s sophisticated color sense, influenced by Léon Bakst, gravitated toward subtle earth tones, “off-colors,” monochromatic schemes, and the ubiquitous black. An evening dress with a bolero might be made of three shades of grey. In the 1950s Valentina began using variations of deep colors of damask and brocade. From a visit to Greece, she learned proportion, which lent an architectural dignity to her gowns. Her couture was original, intricately cut and fitted, and avoided the popular practice of copying French haute couture.

With an innate flair for the dramatic, Valentina successfully designed for the theatre. Beginning with a play starring Judith Anderson in 1933, Valentina was known for her ability to suit the character, whether on or off the stage. Critic Brooks Atkinson had commented, “Valentina has designed clothes that act before a line is spoken.” The clothes she created for Katherine Hepburn in the 1939 stage play, The Philadelphia Story, remained in demand by her customers for five years. Timelessness of design was essential. In the 1930s and 1940s Valentina introduced hoods and snoods as headcoverings, wimple-like effects (flattering to mature throats) swathed around tall, medieval-inspired head-dresses. The diamond and emerald Maltese cross brooch she wore almost constantly was widely copied. Drawing inspiration from the art of European galleries, Valentina created striking evening ensembles along Renaissance lines such as a white crêpe floor-length gown fastened down the bodice with small fabric bows, topped by a three-quarter length beige wool cape.

Only the wealthy could afford Valentina creation. A minimum price of $250 dollars was charged per dress in the 1930s, with an average price of $600 dollars in the mid-1950s. Valentina preferred to sell entire wardrobes, presenting a unified look from formal to casual. For ease of travel she introduced coordinating pieces, like a blouse, bare top, skirt, shorts, and scarf that could be mixed and matched. She disdained fussy, frilly ornamentation, silk flowers, or sequins, relying instead on exquisite line. During the 1930s she borrowed Oriental details such as obi sashes and Indian striped embroidery used as sleeve accents. A favorite casual accessory was a coolie hat tied under the chin. In the 1940s she promoted a look that was slightly softer than the popular, manly, broad-shouldered silhouette, and she introduced the short evening dress, while promoting ballet slippers, which were not rationed, worn with dark rayon stockings.

Valentina's working costume often consisted of a simple black long-sleeved dress with a versatile neckline, cut so it could be pinned high with a contrasting brooch, or folded down and worn with a long scarf draped about the head or shoulders for evening. A slice of colored satin lining would be turned en revers for contrast with the black. By the 1950s Valentina's evening gowns featured increasingly décolletage necklines. Her casual ruffled handkerchief linen blouses, worn with pleated skirts, were widely copied, as were her aproned organdie party dresses.

The supple matte fabrics favored by Valentina included crêpe cut on the bias for daytime, wool and satin crêpes, chiffons and damasks. Elegant wraparound silhouettes were created for coats, one of which featured three layers of progressively longer capes falling from the shoulders. Valentina's idiosyncratic, though classic, fashions also included evening gowns with one bare shoulder, the other long-sleeved, dolman sleeves, large fur hats made from sable, the only fur she would accept. Plain necklines lent themselves well to showcasing a client's jewelry.

Often called "America's most glamorous dressmaker," Valentina was recognized to be one of the top U.S. couturiers and theatre costume designers. She retired in 1957, and died in 1989.

—Therese Duzinkiewicz Baker

VALENTINO

Italian designer

Born: Valentino Garavani in Voghera, Italy, 11 May 1932. Education: Studied French and fashion design, Accademia dell'Arte, Milan, to 1948; studied at the Chambre Syndicale de la Couture, 1949–51. Career: Assistant designer, Jean Dessès, 1950–55, and Guy Laroche, 1956–58; assistant to Princess Irene Galitzine, 1959; business established, Rome, 1960; showed first ready-to-wear collection, 1962; ready-to-wear boutique established, Paris, 1968; company owned by Kenton Corporation, 1968–73, Rome shop opened and menswear collection introduced, 1972; repurchased by Valentino, 1973; Valentino Più established, 1973; signature fragrance introduced, 1978; opened Milan shop, 1979; London store, 1987; founded Valentino Academy as well as LIFE, an AIDS assistance program and fund, 1990; launched Vendetta and Vendetta Pour Homme complementary fragrances, 1993; opened new boutiques in Rome and New

Valentino, spring/summer 2002 ready-to-wear collection. © AFP/CORBIS.

York, 1996; V Zone sportswear launched for fall 1997; introduced new fragrance Very Valentino, 1997; sold firm to Holding di Partecipazioni Industriali (HdP), 1998; Very Valentino Homme debuted, 1999; Valentino Roma line launched, 2000; rehauled Milan store, 2001; considered buying firm back from HdP, 2001. Exhibitions: Italian Re-Evolution, La Jolla Art Museum, California, 1982; 30 Years of Magic traveling exhibit and retrospective, 1991; retrospective, Capitoline Museum, Rome, 1991, and New York, 1992. Awards: Neiman Marcus award, 1967; National Italian American Foundation award, 1989; CFDA Lifetime Achievement award, 2000. Address: Piazza Mignanelli 22, 00187 Rome, Italy. Website: www.valentino.it.

PUBLICATIONS

On VALENTINO:

Books

- Mulassano, Adriana, I mass-modi: fatti e personaggi dell'Italian Look, Florence, 1979.
- Ricci, Franco Maria, ed., Valentino, Milan, 1982.
- Sartogo, Piero, editor, Italian Re-Evolution: Design in Italian Society in the Eighties [exhibition catalogue], La Jolla, California, 1982.

Only the wealthy could afford Valentina creation. A minimum price of $250 dollars was charged per dress in the 1930s, with an average price of $600 dollars in the mid-1950s. Valentina preferred to sell entire wardrobes, presenting a unified look from formal to casual. For ease of travel she introduced coordinating pieces, like a blouse, bare top, skirt, shorts, and scarf that could be mixed and matched. She disdained fussy, frilly ornamentation, silk flowers, or sequins, relying instead on exquisite line. During the 1930s she borrowed Oriental details such as obi sashes and Indian striped embroidery used as sleeve accents. A favorite casual accessory was a coolie hat tied under the chin. In the 1940s she promoted a look that was slightly softer than the popular, manly, broad-shouldered silhouette, and she introduced the short evening dress, while promoting ballet slippers, which were not rationed, worn with dark rayon stockings.

Valentina's working costume often consisted of a simple black long-sleeved dress with a versatile neckline, cut so it could be pinned high with a contrasting brooch, or folded down and worn with a long scarf draped about the head or shoulders for evening. A slice of colored satin lining would be turned en revers for contrast with the black. By the 1950s Valentina's evening gowns featured increasingly décolletage necklines. Her casual ruffled handkerchief linen blouses, worn with pleated skirts, were widely copied, as were her aproned organdie party dresses.

The supple matte fabrics favored by Valentina included crêpe cut on the bias for daytime, wool and satin crêpes, chiffons and damasks. Elegant wraparound silhouettes were created for coats, one of which featured three layers of progressively longer capes falling from the shoulders. Valentina's idiosyncratic, though classic, fashions also included evening gowns with one bare shoulder, the other long-sleeved, dolman sleeves, large fur hats made from sable, the only fur she would accept. Plain necklines lent themselves well to showcasing a client's jewelry.

Often called "America's most glamorous dressmaker," Valentina was recognized to be one of the top U.S. couturiers and theatre costume designers. She retired in 1957, and died in 1989.

—Therese Duzinkiewicz Baker

VALENTINO

Italian designer

Born: Valentino Garavani in Voghera, Italy, 11 May 1932. Education: Studied French and fashion design, Accademia dell'Arte, Milan, to 1948; studied at the Chambre Syndicale de la Couture, 1949–51. Career: Assistant designer, Jean Dessès, 1950–55, and Guy Laroche, 1956–58; assistant to Princess Irene Galitzine, 1959; business established, Rome, 1960; showed first ready-to-wear collection, 1962; ready-to-wear boutique established, Paris, 1968; company owned by Kenton Corporation, 1968–73, Rome shop opened and menswear collection introduced, 1972; repurchased by Valentino, 1973; Valentino Più established, 1973; signature fragrance introduced, 1978; opened Milan shop, 1979; London store, 1987; founded Valentino Academy as well as LIFE, an AIDS assistance program and fund, 1990; launched Vendetta and Vendetta Pour Homme complementary fragrances, 1993; opened new boutiques in Rome and New

Valentino, spring/summer 2002 ready-to-wear collection. © AFP/CORBIS.

York, 1996; V Zone sportswear launched for fall 1997; introduced new fragrance Very Valentino, 1997; sold firm to Holding di Partecipazioni Industriali (HdP), 1998; Very Valentino Homme debuted, 1999; Valentino Roma line launched, 2000; rehauled Milan store, 2001; considered buying firm back from HdP, 2001. Exhibitions: Italian Re-Evolution, La Jolla Art Museum, California, 1982; 30 Years of Magic traveling exhibit and retrospective, 1991; retrospective, Capitoline Museum, Rome, 1991, and New York, 1992. Awards: Neiman Marcus award, 1967; National Italian American Foundation award, 1989; CFDA Lifetime Achievement award, 2000. Address: Piazza Mignanelli 22, 00187 Rome, Italy. Website: www.valentino.it.

PUBLICATIONS

On VALENTINO:

Books

- Mulassano, Adriana, I mass-modi: fatti e personaggi dell'Italian Look, Florence, 1979.
- Ricci, Franco Maria, ed., Valentino, Milan, 1982.
- Sartogo, Piero, editor, Italian Re-Evolution: Design in Italian Society in the Eighties [exhibition catalogue], La Jolla, California, 1982.

Valentino, autumn/winter 2001–02 haute couture collection. © AFP/CORBIS.

- Alfonsi, Maria-Vittoria, Leaders in Fashion: i grandi personaggi della moda, Bologna, 1983.
 Cosi, Marina, Valentino che veste di nuovo, Milan, 1984.
 Soli, Pia, Il genio antipatico [exhibition catalogue], Venice, 1984.
 Talley, André Leon, Valentino, Milan, 1984.
 Milbank, Caroline Rennolds, Couture: The Great Designers, New York, 1985.
 Aragno, Bonizza Giordani, Moda Italia: Creativity and Technology in the Italian Fashion System, Milan, 1988.
 Howell, Georgina, Sultans of Style: 30 Years of Fashion and Passion 1960–1990, London 1990.
 Pelle, Marie-Paule, and Patrick Mauries, Valentino: Thirty Years of Magic, Rome & New York, 1991.
 Martin, Richard, and Harold Koda, Orientalism: Visions of the East in Western Dress [exhibition catalogue], New York, 1994.
 Morris, Bernadine, Valentino, New York, 1996.
 Stegemeyer, Anne, Who's Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.
 Sozzani, Franca, Valentino, New York, 2001.
Articles
 Pertile, Marina, "Valentino: 25 anni nella moda compiuti," in Vogue (Milan), September 1984.

- Buck, Joan Juliet, "An Affair Called Valentino," in Vogue, March 1985.
 Etherington-Smith, Meredith, and Caroline Clifton-Magg, "Palace Evolution," in Harpers & Queen (London), June 1989.
 Ducci, Carlo, and Lele Acquarone, "Valentino 1959–89," in Vogue (Milan), September 1989.
 Rafferty, Diane, "Valentino," in Connoisseur (New York), August 1990.
 "Viva Valentino...Marking 30 Years in Fashion," in the Chicago Tribune, 19 June 1991.
 Casadio, Mariuccia, "Valentino, Take a Bow!" in Interview (New York), September 1991.
 Koenig, Rhoda, "When Valentino Fêtes His Anniversary, There's No Place Like Rome," in Vogue (New York), September 1991.
 Mulvagh, Jane, "The Sultan of Style," in the European (London), 1 November 1991.
 Lesser, Guy, "Our Funny Valentino," in Town & Country (New York), September 1992.
 Shields, Brooke, "Hello, Valentino?" in Interview, September 1992.
 Schiff, Stephen, "Lunch with Mr. Armani, Tea with Mr. Versace, Dinner with Mr. Valentino," in the New Yorker, 7 November 1994.
 Menkes, Suzy, "Craft is in the Details: Artistry is In, Supermodels are Out," in the International Herald Tribune, 24 January 1995.
 "Valentino: For the Sophisticated Lady," in WWD, 21 March 1995.
 Menkes, Suzy, "YSL Plays Safe While Valentino Shines at Night," in the International Herald Tribune, 22 March 1995.
 Forden, Sara Gay, "Valentino—Destination 2000," in DNR, 1 January 1996.
 Born, Pete, "Valentino Back in Scent Scene," in WWD, 1 August 1997.
 Forden, Sara Gay, "Valentino's Big Move: He Agrees to Sell Firm to HdP, Parent of GFT," in WWD, 12 January 1998.
 "Name Swapping (Valentino Garavani and Giancarlo Giammetti Complete Sale of Valentino)...," in the Economist, 11 April 1998.
 Conti, Samantha, "The New Valentino," in WWD, 19 October 1998.
 —, "House of Valentino Makes Plans to Begin a New Life at Forty," in WWD, 28 June 1999.
 Herman-Cohen, Valli, "Valentino's Ageless Designs Still Shine," in the Financial Times, 3 November 2000.
 Medina, Marcy, "Painting Tinseltown Red," in WWD, 16 November 2000.
 Jewel, Dan, "Valentino Valentine," in People, 4 December 2000.
 de Courtay, Romy, "Fashion's Favorite Roman: Valentino...," in DNR, 15 January 2001.
 Conti, Samantha, "Valentino Said to be Exploring a Buyback of House from HdP," in WWD, 18 April 2001.
 Deeny, Godfrey, "Valentino: Great Glamorous Clothes," available online at Fashion Windows, www.fashionwindows.com, 8 July 2001.

* * *

Both a reverent hush and an excited clamor simultaneously surround the Italian designer Valentino. He enjoys the patronage of a long established clientèle of wealthy and aristocratic women, yet his clothes are never staid and always express a fresh, current style. His collections and his lifestyle embody the grandeur and serenity of eternal Rome, where he works from his salon near the Spanish Steps, and at the same time represents the point of view of a jetsetting citizen

Valentino, autumn/winter 2001–02 haute couture collection.
© Reuters NewMedia Inc./CORBIS.

of the world. In 2000 Valentino celebrated 40 years in business. The anniversary was celebrated in characteristic Valentino style in Los Angeles, atop the Pacific Design Center with a slew of celebrities in attendance to honor him. The gala raised more than $250,000 to go to the Children's Action Network.

In 1960, when Valentino opened his first salon in the Via Condotti, Rome was the center of fashion in Italy. The ready-to-wear designers of Milan, the industrial center, did not come to prominence until a decade later. After having served as an apprentice in Paris for five years with Jean Dessès and two years with Guy Laroche, Valentino's design foundation was firmly set in the haute couture tradition of quality, luxury, and a dose of extravagance. He immediately began to attract clients who came to him for his finely crafted, colorful, and elegant designs. By the mid-1960s he introduced his signature trouser suits for day and evening.

In 1968 he created a sensation with his White Collection, featuring short dresses shown with lace stockings and simple flat shoes. The very same year Jacqueline Kennedy chose a lace-trimmed silk two-piece dress with a short pleated skirt, for her marriage to Aristotle Onassis. Yet red has since become Valentino's signature color, a rich shade of crimson with vibrant overtones of orange. He has used it throughout his collections, especially in his lavish evening designs, characterized by magnificent embroideries and meticulous detailing. A section of his retrospective exhibition was devoted to evening jackets covered entirely in elaborately beaded decorations. Typical Valentino details include scalloped trims and hems, raglan sleeves, circular ruffles, complex plays of proportion, and extravagant pattern and texture mixes—like the combination of lace, velvet, and houndstooth in a single outfit.

In 1989 Valentino celebrated 30 years of high fashion with a two-night extravaganza in Rome, and invited hundreds of his high-profile friends, from politicos and royals such as Baroness Marie-Helene Rothschild, Mme. Claude Pompidou, Georgette Mosbacher, Pat Buckley, and Nancy Kissinger to Hollywood icons Elizabeth Taylor, Gina Lollobrigida, and Marissa Berenson. The $5-million affair was a fête to remember, with a sumptuous buffet, champagne, fireworks, flowing fountains, an American 16-piece orchestra, and a retrospective of his work at the Palazzo dei Conservatori museum, designed by Michelangelo in the 16th century. Yet for all the glamour and excess, the retrospective was set to travel to Florence, then on to London, Madrid, New York City, and Tokyo. Proceeds raised from the show were earmarked for LIFE, Valentino and Giancarlo Giammetti's private fund for AIDS victims; Giammetti is Valentino's business partner who, from the late 1960s through present day, was fundamental in the worldwide expansion and success of the fashion house.

Valentino's devotees flock to him for couture, ready-to-wear, and a vast array of products and accessories including menswear, leather goods, eyewear, furs, and fragrances. He reaches a younger market through his Oliver line of clothing, which is casual but still marked with distinctively refined Valentino sensibility. He produces a special collection of eveningwear called Valentino Night, in which the luxury of his couture designs is adapted for a wider audience. All of his designs, throughout all of his collections, express a singularly opulent view of the world. Valentino's sensibility embraces both timelessness and originality, filtered through a dedication to a luxurious way of life and the commitment to express that lifestyle in his collections. For many Valentino represents not just a style of dressing, but rather a style of living.

—Alan E. Rosenberg; updated by Sydonie Benét

VAN DEN AKKER, Koos

American designer

Born: The Hague, Netherlands, 16 March 1939; immigrated to the U.S., 1968, naturalized, 1982. Education: Studied at the Netherlands Royal Academy of Art, 1956–58; worked in department stores in The Hague and in Paris; studied fashion at L'École Guerre Lavigne, Paris, 1961. Military Service: Served in the Royal Dutch Army, 1958–60. Career: Apprenticed at Dior, Paris, 1963–65; returned to The Hague and maintained own boutique, 1965–68; lingerie designer, Eve Stillman, New York, 1969–70; freelance designer, from 1971; established first New York boutique, Columbus Avenue, 1971–75; relocated to Madison Avenue, 1975; opened second shop, Beverly Hills, 1978; opened second New York boutique, 1979; added line of handbags, 1986;

Valentino, autumn/winter 2001–02 haute couture collection.
© Reuters NewMedia Inc./CORBIS.

of the world. In 2000 Valentino celebrated 40 years in business. The anniversary was celebrated in characteristic Valentino style in Los Angeles, atop the Pacific Design Center with a slew of celebrities in attendance to honor him. The gala raised more than $250,000 to go to the Children's Action Network.

In 1960, when Valentino opened his first salon in the Via Condotti, Rome was the center of fashion in Italy. The ready-to-wear designers of Milan, the industrial center, did not come to prominence until a decade later. After having served as an apprentice in Paris for five years with Jean Dessès and two years with Guy Laroche, Valentino's design foundation was firmly set in the haute couture tradition of quality, luxury, and a dose of extravagance. He immediately began to attract clients who came to him for his finely crafted, colorful, and elegant designs. By the mid-1960s he introduced his signature trouser suits for day and evening.

In 1968 he created a sensation with his White Collection, featuring short dresses shown with lace stockings and simple flat shoes. The very same year Jacqueline Kennedy chose a lace-trimmed silk two-piece dress with a short pleated skirt, for her marriage to Aristotle Onassis. Yet red has since become Valentino's signature color, a rich shade of crimson with vibrant overtones of orange. He has used it throughout his collections, especially in his lavish evening designs, characterized by magnificent embroideries and meticulous detailing. A section of his retrospective exhibition was devoted to evening jackets covered entirely in elaborately beaded decorations. Typical Valentino details include scalloped trims and hems, raglan sleeves, circular ruffles, complex plays of proportion, and extravagant pattern and texture mixes—like the combination of lace, velvet, and houndstooth in a single outfit.

In 1989 Valentino celebrated 30 years of high fashion with a two-night extravaganza in Rome, and invited hundreds of his high-profile friends, from politicos and royals such as Baroness Marie-Helene Rothschild, Mme. Claude Pompidou, Georgette Mosbacher, Pat Buckley, and Nancy Kissinger to Hollywood icons Elizabeth Taylor, Gina Lollobrigida, and Marissa Berenson. The $5-million affair was a fête to remember, with a sumptuous buffet, champagne, fireworks, flowing fountains, an American 16-piece orchestra, and a retrospective of his work at the Palazzo dei Conservatori museum, designed by Michelangelo in the 16th century. Yet for all the glamour and excess, the retrospective was set to travel to Florence, then on to London, Madrid, New York City, and Tokyo. Proceeds raised from the show were earmarked for LIFE, Valentino and Giancarlo Giammetti's private fund for AIDS victims; Giammetti is Valentino's business partner who, from the late 1960s through present day, was fundamental in the worldwide expansion and success of the fashion house.

Valentino's devotees flock to him for couture, ready-to-wear, and a vast array of products and accessories including menswear, leather goods, eyewear, furs, and fragrances. He reaches a younger market through his Oliver line of clothing, which is casual but still marked with distinctively refined Valentino sensibility. He produces a special collection of eveningwear called Valentino Night, in which the luxury of his couture designs is adapted for a wider audience. All of his designs, throughout all of his collections, express a singularly opulent view of the world. Valentino's sensibility embraces both timelessness and originality, filtered through a dedication to a luxurious way of life and the commitment to express that lifestyle in his collections. For many Valentino represents not just a style of dressing, but rather a style of living.

—Alan E. Rosenberg; updated by Sydonie Benét

VAN DEN AKKER, Koos

American designer

Born: The Hague, Netherlands, 16 March 1939; immigrated to the U.S., 1968, naturalized, 1982. Education: Studied at the Netherlands Royal Academy of Art, 1956–58; worked in department stores in The Hague and in Paris; studied fashion at L'École Guerre Lavigne, Paris, 1961. Military Service: Served in the Royal Dutch Army, 1958–60. Career: Apprenticed at Dior, Paris, 1963–65; returned to The Hague and maintained own boutique, 1965–68; lingerie designer, Eve Stillman, New York, 1969–70; freelance designer, from 1971; established first New York boutique, Columbus Avenue, 1971–75; relocated to Madison Avenue, 1975; opened second shop, Beverly Hills, 1978; opened second New York boutique, 1979; added line of handbags, 1986; introduced diffusion line, Hot House, 1983; guest critic, Fashion Institute of Technology, 1999; created fur designs for Alixandre, from 1999; QVC showing immediate success, 2001; also designs bed linens, lingerie, and home furnishings. Awards: Gold Coast award, 1978; American Printed Fabrics Council "Tommy," award, 1983. Address: 34 East 67th Street, New York, NY, U.S.A.

PUBLICATIONS

On VAN DEN AKKER:

Books

Khornak, Lucille, Fashion 2001, London, 1982.
Contemporary Designers, Third Edition, Detroit, 1997.

Articles

- de Llosa, Martha, "Designer Koos van den Akker: Berserk on the Surface," in American Fabrics & Fashions (New York), Spring 1980.
- Revson, James A., "The Uncrowned King of Collage," in Newsday, 9 August 1984.
- Coffin, David Page, "Koos, the Master of Collage," in Threads (Newtown, CT), December/January 1989–90.
- "New York Now," in WWD, 9 April 1990.
- Struensee, Chuck, "Koos Comes Back," in WWD, 23 March 1993.
- White, Constance C.R., "Fashion Loses a Father Figure," in the New York Times, 19 September 1995.
- "Koos Into Fur," in WWD, 4 May 1999.
- "Sweaters; Chunky Knits," in the Omaha World-Herald, 9 September 1999.
- "Best Furrier in the World," available online at Alixandre, www.alixandrefurs.com, 14 October 2001.
- "Koos," online at Europa Couture, europacouture.com, 14 October 2001.
- "Koos van den Akker Marks His Return to QVC with the Debut of His Spring/Summer Collection," online at Stop the Presses, www.qvc.com, 14 October 2001.
- "Koos van den Akker," online at Texas Fashion Collection, www.web2.unt.edu, 14 October 2001.
- "Mary Wore a Little Lamb," online at Humane Society of the United States, www.hsus.org, 14 October 2001.
- "Silver Needle Awards & Fashion Show 1999: Designer Critics," online at Marist College, www.marist.edu, 14 October 2001.
- "White Noise on View at the Student Art & Design Exhibition," online at Tools for Tomorrow, www.toolsfortomorrow.com, 14 October 2001.

* * *

Koos van den Akker is known for his painterly delight in mixing colors, patterns, and textures in unusual, often one of a kind, garments. Since his arrival in the United States in 1968 with just a sewing machine, he has been delighting clients who want something a bit different to wear. His styles have not changed much, simple shapes being more amenable to rich surface manipulations. Having learned the basics of good fit and cut as an apprentice with the house of Christian Dior, van den Akker was able to proceed confidently with the fabric collages that have become his signature. Although his Koos garments recall the art-to-wear movement, they remain free of the sometimes heavy-handed messages inherent in the artifacts which seem more suitable for gallery walls—these masterpieces are meant to be worn and appreciated for their beauty.

Conservatively styled suits consisting of cardigan jackets and gored skirts might be covered with textured mixtures of fur, quilted fabric, leather strips, or pieces of wool. A dress of lace might be dramatized by bold appliqués. As many as six materials might be combined in collages of cotton, wool, furs, tweeds, sequins, and leather. Some of the results are reminiscent of grandmother's crazy quilt, but all are carried out with a true designer's skill and artistic sensitivity. Indeed, van den Akker has admitted that the designs just flow, working themselves out through the process of creation, perhaps reflecting a hereditary affinity with Dutch national costume.

Selling his own custom-made dresses in a boutique gained van den Akker enough experience to open a Madison Avenue shop, one in Beverly Hills, and a men's boutique during the 1970s. In 1983 he presented a moderately priced collection, Hot House. By 1986 he was designing lingerie, daytime and evening clothes, furs, sheets, and home furnishings. Women's clothes were made of beautiful fabrics with colorful print and lace inserts, sometimes following the lines of the garments in harmony and balance, other times contrasting shapes versus line. During the 1980s van den Akker collected a following among celebrities, including Gloria Vanderbilt, who at one point surrounded herself with patchwork, as well as Elizabeth Taylor, Cher, Barbara Walters, Glenn Close, and Bill Cosby, who wore van den Akker's sweaters on The Cosby Show.

Van den Akker has been eager to share the joy he attains from his craft. Designer Christian Francis Roth was his apprentice for several years before venturing out on his own. In late 1989 van den Akker showed the home-sewing public how to make their own creative clothing in a detailed article in Threads Magazine. The next year signaled a broadening of his range to include simpler ready-to-wear sportswear—tweed dresses and coats, coats of blanket materials, matching suede jackets and skirts, and short floral dresses with just a hint of the Koos play with fabrics in a mixed-print collar. The designer continued to refine his artistry, developing a ready-to-wear sportswear collection for DeWilde that is more subtle and interchangeable. Toned-down collage effects and texture appliqués lend interest to classic pieces in wool and cashmere, even sheer georgette.

To adoring fans of his designs, van den Akker sold all of his fall-winter 1998 collection in 27 minutes. Finding homes in closets were a big shirt, reversible silk jacket, bias patchwork skirt, pull-cord handbag, and comfy drawstring pants with cotton tee. Stop the Presses quoted his reaction to the commercial triumph, "I am delighted that people across the country will once again have the opportunity to experience my clothing."

In May 1999 he returned in triumph from Greenwich Village to Madison Avenue in uptown New York City, his former location for decades, to market unique collage and slash-technique raincoats and dresses. He extended his contributions to Alixandre, producer of elegant and fashionable fur garments, by designing Persian lamb coats and sheared beaver with one-of-a-kind glazed linen collage on the reverse side. At the Silver Needle Awards and Fashion Show 1999, he summarized his method of blending textures and weaves: "I start out simple and then I go berserk. I mix tweeds with silk. And I like lots of color, from autumn colors to nasty vibrant green."

Throughout the last months of the 20th century and into the 21st, while collectors were stocking their wardrobes with his past glories, van den Akker remained a fashion pacesetter. He served as one of four guest critics of future fashion designers at the Fashion Institute of Technology exhibit entitled White Noise. The 1999 segment of the spirited annual student show at Marist College in Poughkeepsie, New York, interpreted the psychological concept of white noise with 30 garments for adults and children. Despite PETA's protests of his use of fur in couturier collections, he, along with Oscar de la Renta and Valentino, continued to design for New York-based furrier Alixandre by applying broadtail, fox, lynx, mink, sable, and sheared beaver to winter fashions. Van den Akker's spring/summer line for 2001 perpetuated his tradition of fabric collage and appliquéd couture in softly draping shapes to flatter the figure.

—Therese Duzinkiewicz Baker; updated by Mary Ellen Snodgrass

VARTY, Keith

See BYBLOS

VASS, Joan

American designer

Born: New York City, 19 May 1925. Education: Attended Vassar College; graduated in philosophy from the University of Wisconsin, 1942; did graduate work in aesthetics at the University of Buffalo. Family: Children from first marriage: Richard, Sara, Jason. Career: Assistant curator, drawing and prints, the Museum of Modern Art, New York; freelance editor, Harry N. Abrams publishing house, New York; columnist, Art in America, New York; began designing hand-knits in the early 1970s with sales to Henri Bendel, New York; company incorporated as Joan Vass, Inc., 1977; labels included Joan Vass Sporting, Joan Vass New York, menswear and womenswear; Joan Vass USA, lower priced women's line, introduced, 1984; Joan Vass USA for Men introduced, 1988; New York flagship store opened, 1989; opened Chicago boutique, 1992; launched jewelry line and Joan Vass Spa; opened Houston shop, 1999. Awards: Smithsonian Institution, Extraordinary Women in Fashion award, 1978; Coty American Fashion Critics award, 1979, 1981; Prince Machiavelli Prix de Cachet award, 1980.

PUBLICATIONS

On VASS:

Books

Milbank, Caroline Rennolds, New York Fashion: The Evolution of American Style, New York 1989.
 Steele, Valerie, Women of Fashion, New York, 1991.
 Stegemeyer, Anne, Who's Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.
 Malcolm, Trisha, Vogue Knitting, Designer Knits, New York, 1998.

Articles

Oliver, Richard K., "Style," in People, 29 October 1979.
 Morris, Berandine, "With a Knack for Knits (Joan Vass)," in the New York Times, 4 December 1988.
 Etra, Johnathan, "Vass Horizons," in House & Garden, January 1989.
 Infantino, Vivian, "A Vass Landscape: Designer Joan Vass Paints Her Fashion Philosophy," in Footwear News, 28 August 1989.

Howard, T.J., "Joan Vass Boutique Comes to Chicago," in Chicago Tribune, 1 April 1992.

Finkelstein, Anita, "The Riches of Summerville Rags," in WWD, 4 April 1994.

Spindler, Amy M., "The Rise of the Fashion Stylist," in the New York Times, 9 April 1994.

Stephens, Suzanne, "Joan Vass of Long Island: An Eye for Understanding," in Architectural Digest, October 1994.

Hastreiter, Kim, "Vass Appeal," in Mirabella, January 1995.

"Joan Vass Boutique to Bow in Houston," in WWD, 9 April 1999.

Wilson, Eric "A Baptism by Fire: CFDA's New Boss Meets the Members," in WWD, 16 August 2001.

* * *

Joan Vass is an American designer who believes the only purpose for a label in a piece of clothing is to show which way to put it on. Her easy-to-wear designs for both men and women are beautifully crafted, in simple, elegant lines.

In college, Vass studied philosophy and aesthetics. She worked as an assistant curator of drawings and prints at the Museum of Modern spirited annual student show at Marist College in Poughkeepsie, New York, interpreted the psychological concept of white noise with 30 garments for adults and children. Despite PETA's protests of his use of fur in couturier collections, he, along with Oscar de la Renta and Valentino, continued to design for New York-based furrier Alixandre by applying broadtail, fox, lynx, mink, sable, and sheared beaver to winter fashions. Van den Akker's spring/summer line for 2001 perpetuated his tradition of fabric collage and appliquéd couture in softly draping shapes to flatter the figure.

Joan Vass, spring 1996 collection. © AP/Wide World Photos.

—Therese Duzinkiewicz Baker; updated by Mary Ellen Snodgrass

VARTY, Keith

See BYBLOS

VASS, Joan

American designer

Born: New York City, 19 May 1925. Education: Attended Vassar College; graduated in philosophy from the University of Wisconsin, 1942; did graduate work in aesthetics at the University of Buffalo. Family: Children from first marriage: Richard, Sara, Jason. Career: Assistant curator, drawing and prints, the Museum of Modern Art, New York; freelance editor, Harry N. Abrams publishing house, New York; columnist, Art in America, New York; began designing hand-knits in the early 1970s with sales to Henri Bendel, New York; company incorporated as Joan Vass, Inc., 1977; labels included Joan Vass Sporting, Joan Vass New York, menswear and womenswear; Joan Vass USA, lower priced women's line, introduced, 1984; Joan Vass USA for Men introduced, 1988; New York flagship store opened, 1989; opened Chicago boutique, 1992; launched jewelry line and Joan Vass Spa; opened Houston shop, 1999. Awards: Smithsonian Institution, Extraordinary Women in Fashion award, 1978; Coty American Fashion Critics award, 1979, 1981; Prince Machiavelli Prix de Cachet award, 1980.

PUBLICATIONS

On VASS:

Books

Milbank, Caroline Rennolds, New York Fashion: The Evolution of American Style, New York 1989.
 Steele, Valerie, Women of Fashion, New York, 1991.
 Stegemeyer, Anne, Who's Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.
 Malcolm, Trisha, Vogue Knitting, Designer Knits, New York, 1998.

Articles

Oliver, Richard K., "Style," in People, 29 October 1979.
 Morris, Berandine, "With a Knack for Knits (Joan Vass)," in the New York Times, 4 December 1988.
 Etra, Johnathan, "Vass Horizons," in House & Garden, January 1989.
 Infantino, Vivian, "A Vass Landscape: Designer Joan Vass Paints Her Fashion Philosophy," in Footwear News, 28 August 1989.

Howard, T.J., "Joan Vass Boutique Comes to Chicago," in Chicago Tribune, 1 April 1992.

Finkelstein, Anita, "The Riches of Summerville Rags," in WWD, 4 April 1994.

Spindler, Amy M., "The Rise of the Fashion Stylist," in the New York Times, 9 April 1994.

Stephens, Suzanne, "Joan Vass of Long Island: An Eye for Understanding," in Architectural Digest, October 1994.

Hastreiter, Kim, "Vass Appeal," in Mirabella, January 1995.

"Joan Vass Boutique to Bow in Houston," in WWD, 9 April 1999.

Wilson, Eric "A Baptism by Fire: CFDA's New Boss Meets the Members," in WWD, 16 August 2001.

* * *

Joan Vass is an American designer who believes the only purpose for a label in a piece of clothing is to show which way to put it on. Her easy-to-wear designs for both men and women are beautifully crafted, in simple, elegant lines.

In college, Vass studied philosophy and aesthetics. She worked as an assistant curator of drawings and prints at the Museum of Modern

Joan Vass, spring 1996 collection. © AP/Wide World Photos.

Joan Vass, spring 1996 collection. © AP/Wide World Photos.

Art in New York. At the same time she edited art books for Harry N. Abrams and wrote columns about art auctions for Art in America. Vass began a cottage industry in the early 1970s when she brought her personal interest in hand-knits and crochet to women who needed an outlet for their marketable skills.

Vass created designs for hats and mufflers which these women crocheted. Marketed at Henri Bendel, New York, they quickly sold out. She went on to create designs for sweaters for both men and women, having them produced under the label Joan Vass New York. Vass provided the designs, the yarns and buttons if necessary. Her cadre of workers, ranging in age from 20 to 70, came from a variety of backgrounds including housewives and artists. They would knit, crochet, or hand-loom the design, incorporating their personal style. The production for this line was limited, selective, and not accessible to everyone. The Joan Vass New York line was still popular in the late 1990s and into the 21st century. Craftspeople still create the designs provided by Vass and it remains a small-volume, selective design business which now includes woven materials. All of the designs from the past are still available to be produced.

The return to natural fibers, the individuality in American fashion expression, the use of knits for more than just the travel wardrobe, plus a new-found appreciation for handmade items during the 1970s all helped create a welcoming environment for Vass designs. Her work was unique, practical, and beautifully crafted. She established her own company in 1977. In the 1980s, a mid-priced licensed line was first produced on a large scale by the Signal Knitting Mills in South Carolina. Working with Vass designs, these clothes carried the label Joan Vass USA and were made of beautiful fine-gauged, natural fiber, knitted and woven fabrics.

A third design line called Joan Vass Sporting was created, a more casual collection with much more detail. Though natural fibers are still used, the designs also use some of the new synthetic fibers such as chinchilla, a 100-percent polyester fabric. Whether Joan Vass New York, Joan Vass USA, or Joan Vass Sporting, the designs Vass creates are simple and easy to wear. They are predominantly made of natural fibers, usually in subtle colors, in unstructured shapes. There are no extras such as shoulder pads. Besides sweaters, she designs trousers, skirts, and shorts and dresses. Her stated aim is to produce interchangeable, ageless designs which evolve from season to season. Reviews in the Daily News Record have described Vass' designs as classic. When the clothes are old, she wants her clients to don them for gardening.

In the 1980s and 1990s, Vass designs were perennial favorites, enough so that she opened stores across the U.S., including shops in New Orleans, Chicago, Dallas, and New York. Her designs could also be found in high-end specialty shops and better department stores as well, including newer Vass labels for plus sizes and sportswear. In addition, Vass had segued into jewelry and footwear, known for her distinctive designs.

In an interview for House & Garden (January 1989) Vass told Johnathan Etra, "If you notice me I am not well-dressed." She feels style is something that lasts, and does not preclude a sense of humor in her design work, as she has been inspired by iguanas and created bizarre and funny hats. Vass is an American woman with strong ideas and concerns reflected in her designs, and frequently expressed. In the later years of her career, Vass became an outspoken fixture at Council of Fashion Designers of America (CFDA) meetings, always letting fellow members know her sometimes controversial thoughts. Because of her outbursts, Vass deemed herself "an old crone," yet her views have often been seconded by CFDA members.

—Nancy House; updated by Nelly Rhodes

VENET, Philippe

French fashion designer

Born: Lyons, France, 22 May 1929. Education: Apprentice tailor, age 14, at Pierre Court, Lyons, until 1948. Military Service: Served in French Army, 1948–50. Career: Assistant designer for Schiaparelli, Paris, 1951–53; master tailor for Givenchy, 1953–62; established Philippe Venet couture house, Paris, 1962; launched menswear collection, 1990s. Awards: Dé d'Or, Paris, 1985. Address: 62 rue Francois Ier, 75008 Paris, France.

PUBLICATIONS

On VENET:

Books

- McDowell, Colin, McDowell's Directory of Twentieth Century Fashion, Englewood Cliffs, New Jersey, 1985.
 O'Hara, Georgina, The Encyclopaedia of Fashion, New York, 1986.
 Guillen, Pierre-Yves, and Jacqueline Claude, The Golden Thimble: French Haute Couture, Paris, 1990.
 Stegemeyer, Anne, Who's Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.

Articles

- Morris, Bernadine, "The New Looks for Nightime...Venet Offers Dresses with a Timeless Quality," in the New York Times, 27 July 1988.
 —, "New Life From Fashion's Old Guard," in the New York Times, 2 August 1988.
 —, "Chanel is Saucier, Ungaro is Cooler, and Venet Livelier," in the New York Times, 24 January 1990.
 Mazzaraco, Maragaret, "Cotton's Parisian Accent," in WWD, 1 March 1994.
 "Paris: Disco Finale," in WWD, 22 July 1994.
 Gellars, Stan, "The Big Brand Era," in DNR, 18 January 1995.
 "Moving Day in Paris...An Emotional Farewell to Givenchy," in WWD, 12 July 1995.

* * *

Philippe Venet had a long apprenticeship in fashion before opening his own couture house in 1962, at the age of 33. Born in Lyons, France, he was apprenticed at 14 to an established and respected dressmaker in the town, Pierre Court, where he was taught about fabric, manufacture, and cut, as well as learning the rudiments of tailoring, a major feature of his later work. Pierre Court held the rights to the Balenciaga label and it was Venet's association with this

Parisian couture house that led him to the fashion capital to pursue his design career.

His first job was at the house of Schiaparelli. Elsa Schiaparelli had been one of the most important and influential designers of the 1930s, when her witty surrealist and avant-garde designs broke new ground in fashion. By the 1950s, however, Schiaparelli's influence was waning and the house was soon to close. For Venet the job was a stepping stone in his career; it was at Schiaparelli that he met the young Hubert de Givenchy, who was also an employee. When Givenchy opened his own couture house in 1953, he employed Venet as his master tailor.

The 1950s were Givenchy's heyday, a success to which Venet undoubtedly contributed. Givenchy is perhaps most notable for his association with Audrey Hepburn, whom he first dressed in the 1954 film Sabrina Fair. Together, the design house and actress created a gamine look typifying the style of the late 1950s and 1960s. It was young elegance, long-legged and sophisticated, ranging from Audrey's beatnik look in the 1957 film Funny Face, to her little black dress look in the 1961 film Breakfast at Tiffany's.

Venet finally opened his own couture house in Paris in 1962. His experience and respect for the traditions of haute couture were a mainstay of his work from the beginning, as were his superb tailoring skills. His cut has always been innovative and imaginative, with a range of beautifully cut and tailored coats featured in every collection. Distinctive pieces from the 1960s were his kite coats; in the 1970s were geometric patterns, oversized capes, and jackets in flannel and reversible wools; his suits and coats in the 1980s and 1990s were fun and flirtatious, in refreshing colors. Venet's eveningwear has often been inspired by flora and fauna; the overall eveningwear look is generally romantic but sophisticated, smart but with a hint of naughtiness, and designed for a wealthy clientèle.

Philippe Venet was awarded the Dé d'Or award in January 1985. This award not only recognized his aesthetic contribution to the fashion industry but applauded the detailed attention he brought to every aspect of the business, closely monitoring the creation of each outfit and personally attending all the fittings. In the middle and late 1990s Venet divided his time between France and the United States. A third of his clients were American, and he presented annual collections in both Los Angeles and New York. Expansion near the end of the century included a new menswear line to complement his womenswear ranges.

—Kevin Almond

VENTURI, Gian Marco

Italian fashion designer

Born: Florence, Italy, circa 1955. Education: Studied at the Istituto Tessile Butti in Prato; degree in economics and commerce from Florence University. Career: Worked for Italian firms Domitilla, Lebole, Erreuno; established own label ready-to-wear, 1979, Milan; launched leather goods and accessory line, 1981; introduced men's jeans and sportswear, 1982; introduced ladies' jeans and sportswear, 1985; introduced activewear and lingerie lines, 1988. Awards: The Oner Best Designer award, Milan, 1983; Catherine de Medici Perfume award, Milan, 1986. Address: Via della Spiga 31, 20121 Milan, Italy.

and concerns reflected in her designs, and frequently expressed. In the later years of her career, Vass became an outspoken fixture at Council of Fashion Designers of America (CFDA) meetings, always letting fellow members know her sometimes controversial thoughts. Because of her outbursts, Vass deemed herself "an old crone," yet her views have often been seconded by CFDA members.

—Nancy House; updated by Nelly Rhodes

VENET, Philippe

French fashion designer

Born: Lyons, France, 22 May 1929. Education: Apprentice tailor, age 14, at Pierre Court, Lyons, until 1948. Military Service: Served in French Army, 1948–50. Career: Assistant designer for Schiaparelli, Paris, 1951–53; master tailor for Givenchy, 1953–62; established Philippe Venet couture house, Paris, 1962; launched menswear collection, 1990s. Awards: Dé d'Or, Paris, 1985. Address: 62 rue Francois Ier, 75008 Paris, France.

PUBLICATIONS

On VENET:

Books

- McDowell, Colin, McDowell's Directory of Twentieth Century Fashion, Englewood Cliffs, New Jersey, 1985.
 O'Hara, Georgina, The Encyclopaedia of Fashion, New York, 1986.
 Guillen, Pierre-Yves, and Jacqueline Claude, The Golden Thimble: French Haute Couture, Paris, 1990.
 Stegemeyer, Anne, Who's Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.

Articles

- Morris, Bernadine, "The New Looks for Nightime...Venet Offers Dresses with a Timeless Quality," in the New York Times, 27 July 1988.
 —, "New Life From Fashion's Old Guard," in the New York Times, 2 August 1988.
 —, "Chanel is Saucier, Ungaro is Cooler, and Venet Livelier," in the New York Times, 24 January 1990.
 Mazzaraco, Maragaret, "Cotton's Parisian Accent," in WWD, 1 March 1994.
 "Paris: Disco Finale," in WWD, 22 July 1994.
 Gellars, Stan, "The Big Brand Era," in DNR, 18 January 1995.
 "Moving Day in Paris...An Emotional Farewell to Givenchy," in WWD, 12 July 1995.

* * *

Philippe Venet had a long apprenticeship in fashion before opening his own couture house in 1962, at the age of 33. Born in Lyons, France, he was apprenticed at 14 to an established and respected dressmaker in the town, Pierre Court, where he was taught about fabric, manufacture, and cut, as well as learning the rudiments of tailoring, a major feature of his later work. Pierre Court held the rights to the Balenciaga label and it was Venet's association with this

Parisian couture house that led him to the fashion capital to pursue his design career.

His first job was at the house of Schiaparelli. Elsa Schiaparelli had been one of the most important and influential designers of the 1930s, when her witty surrealist and avant-garde designs broke new ground in fashion. By the 1950s, however, Schiaparelli's influence was waning and the house was soon to close. For Venet the job was a stepping stone in his career; it was at Schiaparelli that he met the young Hubert de Givenchy, who was also an employee. When Givenchy opened his own couture house in 1953, he employed Venet as his master tailor.

The 1950s were Givenchy's heyday, a success to which Venet undoubtedly contributed. Givenchy is perhaps most notable for his association with Audrey Hepburn, whom he first dressed in the 1954 film Sabrina Fair. Together, the design house and actress created a gamine look typifying the style of the late 1950s and 1960s. It was young elegance, long-legged and sophisticated, ranging from Audrey's beatnik look in the 1957 film Funny Face, to her little black dress look in the 1961 film Breakfast at Tiffany's.

Venet finally opened his own couture house in Paris in 1962. His experience and respect for the traditions of haute couture were a mainstay of his work from the beginning, as were his superb tailoring skills. His cut has always been innovative and imaginative, with a range of beautifully cut and tailored coats featured in every collection. Distinctive pieces from the 1960s were his kite coats; in the 1970s were geometric patterns, oversized capes, and jackets in flannel and reversible wools; his suits and coats in the 1980s and 1990s were fun and flirtatious, in refreshing colors. Venet's eveningwear has often been inspired by flora and fauna; the overall eveningwear look is generally romantic but sophisticated, smart but with a hint of naughtiness, and designed for a wealthy clientèle.

Philippe Venet was awarded the Dé d'Or award in January 1985. This award not only recognized his aesthetic contribution to the fashion industry but applauded the detailed attention he brought to every aspect of the business, closely monitoring the creation of each outfit and personally attending all the fittings. In the middle and late 1990s Venet divided his time between France and the United States. A third of his clients were American, and he presented annual collections in both Los Angeles and New York. Expansion near the end of the century included a new menswear line to complement his womenswear ranges.

—Kevin Almond

VENTURI, Gian Marco

Italian fashion designer

Born: Florence, Italy, circa 1955. Education: Studied at the Istituto Tessile Butti in Prato; degree in economics and commerce from Florence University. Career: Worked for Italian firms Domitilla, Lebole, Erreuno; established own label ready-to-wear, 1979, Milan; launched leather goods and accessory line, 1981; introduced men's jeans and sportswear, 1982; introduced ladies' jeans and sportswear, 1985; introduced activewear and lingerie lines, 1988. Awards: The Oner Best Designer award, Milan, 1983; Catherine de Medici Perfume award, Milan, 1986. Address: Via della Spiga 31, 20121 Milan, Italy.

and concerns reflected in her designs, and frequently expressed. In the later years of her career, Vass became an outspoken fixture at Council of Fashion Designers of America (CFDA) meetings, always letting fellow members know her sometimes controversial thoughts. Because of her outbursts, Vass deemed herself "an old crone," yet her views have often been seconded by CFDA members.

—Nancy House; updated by Nelly Rhodes

VENET, Philippe

French fashion designer

Born: Lyons, France, 22 May 1929. Education: Apprentice tailor, age 14, at Pierre Court, Lyons, until 1948. Military Service: Served in French Army, 1948–50. Career: Assistant designer for Schiaparelli, Paris, 1951–53; master tailor for Givenchy, 1953–62; established Philippe Venet couture house, Paris, 1962; launched menswear collection, 1990s. Awards: Dé d'Or, Paris, 1985. Address: 62 rue Francois Ier, 75008 Paris, France.

PUBLICATIONS

On VENET:

Books

- McDowell, Colin, McDowell's Directory of Twentieth Century Fashion, Englewood Cliffs, New Jersey, 1985.
 O'Hara, Georgina, The Encyclopaedia of Fashion, New York, 1986.
 Guillen, Pierre-Yves, and Jacqueline Claude, The Golden Thimble: French Haute Couture, Paris, 1990.
 Stegemeyer, Anne, Who's Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.

Articles

- Morris, Bernadine, "The New Looks for Nightime...Venet Offers Dresses with a Timeless Quality," in the New York Times, 27 July 1988.
 —, "New Life From Fashion's Old Guard," in the New York Times, 2 August 1988.
 —, "Chanel is Saucier, Ungaro is Cooler, and Venet Livelier," in the New York Times, 24 January 1990.
 Mazzaraco, Maragaret, "Cotton's Parisian Accent," in WWD, 1 March 1994.
 "Paris: Disco Finale," in WWD, 22 July 1994.
 Gellars, Stan, "The Big Brand Era," in DNR, 18 January 1995.
 "Moving Day in Paris...An Emotional Farewell to Givenchy," in WWD, 12 July 1995.

* * *

Philippe Venet had a long apprenticeship in fashion before opening his own couture house in 1962, at the age of 33. Born in Lyons, France, he was apprenticed at 14 to an established and respected dressmaker in the town, Pierre Court, where he was taught about fabric, manufacture, and cut, as well as learning the rudiments of tailoring, a major feature of his later work. Pierre Court held the rights to the Balenciaga label and it was Venet's association with this

Parisian couture house that led him to the fashion capital to pursue his design career.

His first job was at the house of Schiaparelli. Elsa Schiaparelli had been one of the most important and influential designers of the 1930s, when her witty surrealist and avant-garde designs broke new ground in fashion. By the 1950s, however, Schiaparelli's influence was waning and the house was soon to close. For Venet the job was a stepping stone in his career; it was at Schiaparelli that he met the young Hubert de Givenchy, who was also an employee. When Givenchy opened his own couture house in 1953, he employed Venet as his master tailor.

The 1950s were Givenchy's heyday, a success to which Venet undoubtedly contributed. Givenchy is perhaps most notable for his association with Audrey Hepburn, whom he first dressed in the 1954 film Sabrina Fair. Together, the design house and actress created a gamine look typifying the style of the late 1950s and 1960s. It was young elegance, long-legged and sophisticated, ranging from Audrey's beatnik look in the 1957 film Funny Face, to her little black dress look in the 1961 film Breakfast at Tiffany's.

Venet finally opened his own couture house in Paris in 1962. His experience and respect for the traditions of haute couture were a mainstay of his work from the beginning, as were his superb tailoring skills. His cut has always been innovative and imaginative, with a range of beautifully cut and tailored coats featured in every collection. Distinctive pieces from the 1960s were his kite coats; in the 1970s were geometric patterns, oversized capes, and jackets in flannel and reversible wools; his suits and coats in the 1980s and 1990s were fun and flirtatious, in refreshing colors. Venet's eveningwear has often been inspired by flora and fauna; the overall eveningwear look is generally romantic but sophisticated, smart but with a hint of naughtiness, and designed for a wealthy clientèle.

Philippe Venet was awarded the Dé d'Or award in January 1985. This award not only recognized his aesthetic contribution to the fashion industry but applauded the detailed attention he brought to every aspect of the business, closely monitoring the creation of each outfit and personally attending all the fittings. In the middle and late 1990s Venet divided his time between France and the United States. A third of his clients were American, and he presented annual collections in both Los Angeles and New York. Expansion near the end of the century included a new menswear line to complement his womenswear ranges.

—Kevin Almond

VENTURI, Gian Marco

Italian fashion designer

Born: Florence, Italy, circa 1955. Education: Studied at the Istituto Tessile Butti in Prato; degree in economics and commerce from Florence University. Career: Worked for Italian firms Domitilla, Lebole, Erreuno; established own label ready-to-wear, 1979, Milan; launched leather goods and accessory line, 1981; introduced men's jeans and sportswear, 1982; introduced ladies' jeans and sportswear, 1985; introduced activewear and lingerie lines, 1988. Awards: The Oner Best Designer award, Milan, 1983; Catherine de Medici Perfume award, Milan, 1986. Address: Via della Spiga 31, 20121 Milan, Italy.

PUBLICATIONSOn VENTURI:*Articles

- “Gian Marco Venturi: Gessati et Jabot,” Donna (Milan), 7 August 1987.
- Muritti, Elisabetta, “Venturing on His Own,” in Donna, March 1989.
- “Italy’s Coolest Shades: Maurizio Marcolin,” in WWD Italy Supplement, January 1997.
- “Manufacturers and Distributors,” in Cosmetics International, 10 January 1997.
- “Italy: Room for Improvement,” in European Cosmetic Markets, May 1999.
- “Gian Marco Venturi,” available online at www.insurance-y2k.com, 14 October 2001.
- “Gian Marco Venturi,” online at Fashion Video, www.albertodellorto.com, 14 October 2001.
- “Gian Marco Venturi,” online at Moda Online, www.modaonline.it, 14 October 2001.

* * *

Gian Marco Venturi worked for many companies as a designer and stylist before his own ready-to-wear label was launched in 1979. Born in Florence, Italy, he attended the Istituto Tessile Butti in Prato, then took a degree in business and economics at the University of Florence. He did not enter the fashion business until 1974, when he was 19, instead, he spent time traveling the world, gaining a rich variety of cultural and aesthetic experience that has provided useful inspiration for his subsequent design career.

Venturi first began designing for a firm called Domitilla. The company produced jersey clothes very much in the style of Emilio Pucci. It was Venturi’s task to update the range and give it the right look for the mid-1970s. The first collection was shown in the Palazzo Pitti in Florence. He then went on to work on leather garments (leather has always been a strong feature in his work) for Sander’s, while at the same time he also designed knitwear for Beba. Graziella Ronchi hired Venturi in 1979 to design for her Erreuno collections. Working with the company for six seasons, it was Venturi who helped develop and establish the soft, neutral look combined with architectural correctness for which the company became known.

Venturi’s women’s ready-to-wear has always been stylish and expensive—sexy, sometimes suggestive, sometimes blatant or tarty. His sensuous side is perhaps best exemplified in his autumn-winter 1989–90 collection. A masculine, black snakeskin jacket with astrakhan collar and cuffs was belted over black trousers and sweater, highlighted with a white shirt collar. Black snakeskin gloves, dark glasses, and a model with a short black bob gave the impression of Louise Brooks on a black and white aviation excursion. Dark glasses were the distinctive accessory running through a collection that also included fit and flare double-breasted coats with astrakhan cuffs, then, in a softer vein, reversible cashmere with huge shawl collars and patch pockets in sand and warm gray.

Another distinctive Venturi ready-to-wear collection was spring-summer 1993. It featured hipster chain mail belts slung over skirts and tabards in a red, white, and blue color palette. There were blue leather safari jackets, boldly printed Capri trousers, skinny ribbed knits with chain mail embroidery, topped off with gold leather jinkins, belts, and lots of gold jewelry. It was a fun, dynamic, swingy look suggesting a star or opera diva lost in Miami and featured favorite fabrics such as white lace and organza.

Venturi’s menswear is usually classic and traditional but is sometimes highlighted by a touch of ornamentation, such as crests and stars lifted from the naval styles or a gold ribbon-embroidered waistcoat. The clothes are disciplined and produced in seasonal colors. Favorite fabrics include linens, flannels, and gabardines. Sober jackets, waistcoats, close-fitting trousers, and blouses are the main separates, coordinated to create these looks.

Venturi has also produced lines of leather garments, jeans, casual clothing, sportswear, and perfume, all marked by the label Gian Marco Venturi Made in Italy in black on a white ground. He has been awarded several prizes during his career, including the Oner for best designer of 1983 and the Catherine de Medici prize for the greatest sales of men’s aftershave in 1986. The company moved from Florence in 1983 and began occupying studios on the prestigious Via della Spiga in Milan.

For spring/summer 1997, Venturi focused on a folk-based palette of lavender blue, violet, royal blue, and Irish green in solids, stripes, and mixed tones pearlized to give his suits an air of informality. His chose blocky, undarted shaping in stretch fabric and revived the cadet look in traditional blazers with pocket insignia. His choices of viscose acetate, cotton acetate, and wool viscose crêpe with nickel buttons, zippers, and buckles supported tailored lines. Detailing with lace and grosgrain, pinstripes, checks, and chevrons revived standard black on white for a contemporary feel.

Venturi took charge of the indomitable blazer, touching up sporty styling with a military touches. For Nehru jackets, he stressed reed-matting and silk bourette. To soften jackets, he stressed a cardigan look in drapey jersey. Practical, wearable outfits in neutral tones of beige, chalk, and white suited the season. The ensemble of jackets, vests, and trousers in broderie anglaise-style cambric added luxe to functional wardrobe standards.

—Kevin Almond; updated by Mary Ellen Snodgrass

VERDÙ, Joaquim

Spanish designer

Born: Barcelona, Spain. Education: Attended Feli’s fashion school; studied anatomical drawing and painting; apprenticed under Pedro Rodríguez. Career: Became known for knitwear; own label manufactured by Pulligan, from 1991. Address: Riera del Pinar, 12, 08360 Carnet de Mar, Spain.

PUBLICATIONSOn VERDÙ:*Articles

- Klensch, Elsa, “España!,” in Vogue, October 1988.
- “Highlights of the Spanish Cibeles Autumn/Winter 1999–2000 Fashion Shows in the Words of Pedro Mansilla,” available online at Fashion Click, www.fashionclick.com, 14 October 2001.
- “Joaquim Verdù Runway Fashion Photos,” online at www.fashionshowroom.com, 14 October 2001.

PUBLICATIONSOn VENTURI:*Articles

- “Gian Marco Venturi: Gessati et Jabot,” Donna (Milan), 7 August 1987.
- Muritti, Elisabetta, “Venturing on His Own,” in Donna, March 1989.
- “Italy’s Coolest Shades: Maurizio Marcolin,” in WWD Italy Supplement, January 1997.
- “Manufacturers and Distributors,” in Cosmetics International, 10 January 1997.
- “Italy: Room for Improvement,” in European Cosmetic Markets, May 1999.
- “Gian Marco Venturi,” available online at www.insurance-y2k.com, 14 October 2001.
- “Gian Marco Venturi,” online at Fashion Video, www.albertodellorto.com, 14 October 2001.
- “Gian Marco Venturi,” online at Moda Online, www.modaonline.it, 14 October 2001.

* * *

Gian Marco Venturi worked for many companies as a designer and stylist before his own ready-to-wear label was launched in 1979. Born in Florence, Italy, he attended the Istituto Tessile Butti in Prato, then took a degree in business and economics at the University of Florence. He did not enter the fashion business until 1974, when he was 19, instead, he spent time traveling the world, gaining a rich variety of cultural and aesthetic experience that has provided useful inspiration for his subsequent design career.

Venturi first began designing for a firm called Domitilla. The company produced jersey clothes very much in the style of Emilio Pucci. It was Venturi’s task to update the range and give it the right look for the mid-1970s. The first collection was shown in the Palazzo Pitti in Florence. He then went on to work on leather garments (leather has always been a strong feature in his work) for Sander’s, while at the same time he also designed knitwear for Beba. Graziella Ronchi hired Venturi in 1979 to design for her Erreuno collections. Working with the company for six seasons, it was Venturi who helped develop and establish the soft, neutral look combined with architectural correctness for which the company became known.

Venturi’s women’s ready-to-wear has always been stylish and expensive—sexy, sometimes suggestive, sometimes blatant or tarty. His sensuous side is perhaps best exemplified in his autumn-winter 1989–90 collection. A masculine, black snakeskin jacket with astrakhan collar and cuffs was belted over black trousers and sweater, highlighted with a white shirt collar. Black snakeskin gloves, dark glasses, and a model with a short black bob gave the impression of Louise Brooks on a black and white aviation excursion. Dark glasses were the distinctive accessory running through a collection that also included fit and flare double-breasted coats with astrakhan cuffs, then, in a softer vein, reversible cashmere with huge shawl collars and patch pockets in sand and warm gray.

Another distinctive Venturi ready-to-wear collection was spring-summer 1993. It featured hipster chain mail belts slung over skirts and tabards in a red, white, and blue color palette. There were blue leather safari jackets, boldly printed Capri trousers, skinny ribbed knits with chain mail embroidery, topped off with gold leather jinkins, belts, and lots of gold jewelry. It was a fun, dynamic, swingy look suggesting a star or opera diva lost in Miami and featured favorite fabrics such as white lace and organza.

Venturi’s menswear is usually classic and traditional but is sometimes highlighted by a touch of ornamentation, such as crests and stars lifted from the naval styles or a gold ribbon-embroidered waistcoat. The clothes are disciplined and produced in seasonal colors. Favorite fabrics include linens, flannels, and gabardines. Sober jackets, waistcoats, close-fitting trousers, and blouses are the main separates, coordinated to create these looks.

Venturi has also produced lines of leather garments, jeans, casual clothing, sportswear, and perfume, all marked by the label Gian Marco Venturi Made in Italy in black on a white ground. He has been awarded several prizes during his career, including the Oner for best designer of 1983 and the Catherine de Medici prize for the greatest sales of men’s aftershave in 1986. The company moved from Florence in 1983 and began occupying studios on the prestigious Via della Spiga in Milan.

For spring/summer 1997, Venturi focused on a folk-based palette of lavender blue, violet, royal blue, and Irish green in solids, stripes, and mixed tones pearlized to give his suits an air of informality. His chose blocky, undarted shaping in stretch fabric and revived the cadet look in traditional blazers with pocket insignia. His choices of viscose acetate, cotton acetate, and wool viscose crêpe with nickel buttons, zippers, and buckles supported tailored lines. Detailing with lace and grosgrain, pinstripes, checks, and chevrons revived standard black on white for a contemporary feel.

Venturi took charge of the indomitable blazer, touching up sporty styling with a military touches. For Nehru jackets, he stressed reed-matting and silk bourette. To soften jackets, he stressed a cardigan look in drapey jersey. Practical, wearable outfits in neutral tones of beige, chalk, and white suited the season. The ensemble of jackets, vests, and trousers in broderie anglaise-style cambric added luxe to functional wardrobe standards.

—Kevin Almond; updated by Mary Ellen Snodgrass

VERDÙ, Joaquim

Spanish designer

Born: Barcelona, Spain. Education: Attended Feli’s fashion school; studied anatomical drawing and painting; apprenticed under Pedro Rodríguez. Career: Became known for knitwear; own label manufactured by Pulligan, from 1991. Address: Riera del Pinar, 12, 08360 Carnet de Mar, Spain.

PUBLICATIONSOn VERDÙ:*Articles

- Klensch, Elsa, “España!,” in Vogue, October 1988.
- “Highlights of the Spanish Cibeles Autumn/Winter 1999–2000 Fashion Shows in the Words of Pedro Mansilla,” available online at Fashion Click, www.fashionclick.com, 14 October 2001.
- “Joaquim Verdù Runway Fashion Photos,” online at www.fashionshowroom.com, 14 October 2001.

"La Moda Nupcial Empieza en Punto," online at La Vanguardia, www.lavanguardia.es, 14 October 2001.
 "Noticias: Joaquim Verdù," online at Solo Moda, www.solomoda.com, 14 October 2001.

* * *

Joaquim Verdù is rare among fashion designers in showing a preference for knitted rather than woven fabrics—to the extent that since his label began to be manufactured by Pulligan in 1991, Verdù has devoted himself exclusively to knitting. Underlying the eminently wearable collections is a philosophy of less is more. The keynotes are well-defined volumes, fluid lines, and immaculate detailing; colors are mostly plain. What interests the designer is the knitted fabric in its own right, rather than knitting as a vehicle for multicolored jacquards and intarsias. Apart from occasional stripes or prints, if Verdù combines colors it is on a large scale. He might, for example, use a different shade for each part of an outfit or for each garment of a range. That he had intended to be a painter is always apparent in the subtle choice and juxtaposition of brights, pastels, or neutrals.

Early collections were exuberant, with a clever mix of knitted and woven materials. When mixing fabrics, Verdù tends to play a teasing game of "spot the knitting." He chooses knitted fabrics that look so much like weaves that only a very close inspection reveals what they are; then he reverses traditional roles and takes us light years away from the woven suit teamed with a sweater. In a Verdù runway, knitting, identifiable or not, is always the star of the show. Weaves become complementary or, at best, equal partners.

Handling knitting in this way is a difficult exercise, especially when tailoring is involved, and Verdù has been known to dress male models in suits entirely made out of jersey. The very same qualities that make knitting feel like a second skin turn it awkward in the workroom as knitted fabrics can be unpredictable. Pressing can stretch them; some curl, others have a sideways slant, difficult to control and impossible to correct. Half the time, the fabric needs to be designed from scratch, and here lies the greatest challenge—to start a garment not from a bale of jersey but from a cone of yarn.

Verdù's designs for the straight knitting machine show him in complete control of the fabric and of the manufacturing process. This is one of the aspects that makes his work so successful, but there are others; another is his skill at producing infinite variations on a theme, however simple. Verdù devotees know for a fact that, in any given range, they will find something to fit their age, lifestyle, and bone structure. Then there is the way in which the designer combines chic with exquisite comfort, something that international models appearing in his shows have been quick to point out. Finally, there is the clearly distinctive signature, the very personal imprint Verdù leaves on everything he does, because, except for making the clothes, he actually does everything. From the moment he chooses a yarn or fabric and reaches for the sketch pad, up to the final fitting, nobody else works on the design. In the era of the franchise, a Joaquim Verdù label means exactly what it says.

As a young man, Verdù started his studies at Feli's fashion school. He had not been there more than a few weeks before his potential was spotted by one of the lecturers. Pedro Rodríguez obtained permission from the school to take Verdù to his own couture house, where he personally introduced him to the intricacies of cut and drape. On his death, many years later, Rodríguez left him his scissors. The man who shares with Balenciaga the honor of being the father of Spanish couture could not have paid Verdù a greater compliment.

Spanning the end of the millennium, Verdù welcomed the 21st century at the Spanish Cibeles. According to commentator Pedro Mansilla, Verdù avoided the fashion vapors of no-show designers and regional divas to showcase practical Spanish goods. As in the past, he presented a wearable collection of knits in contrasting colors, his signature style. In Madrid for fall 2001, his clingy, monochromatic knits presented a vulnerable, sensuous youth in thigh-hugging pants and matching bateau-neck top and ethereal slip dress.

—Montse Stanley; updated by Mary Ellen Snodgrass

VERINO, Roberto

Spanish fashion designer

Born: Manuel Roberto Marino, Verin, Spain, May 1945. Education: Studied business and fine arts in Paris, mid-1960s. Family: Children: Cristina, Jose Manuel. Career: Left studies to take charge of parents' leather garments business, 1967; in 1970s, worked for MARPY Jeans; launched ready-to-wear collection for women, Roberto Verino; a year later, opened his first shop in Paris; introduced cosmetics line, 1993; collections represented in over 20 countries; specializes in

Roberto Verino, fall 2001 collection. © Fashion Syndicate Press.

"La Moda Nupcial Empieza en Punto," online at La Vanguardia, www.lavanguardia.es, 14 October 2001.
 "Noticias: Joaquim Verdù," online at Solo Moda, www.solomoda.com, 14 October 2001.

* * *

Joaquim Verdù is rare among fashion designers in showing a preference for knitted rather than woven fabrics—to the extent that since his label began to be manufactured by Pulligan in 1991, Verdù has devoted himself exclusively to knitting. Underlying the eminently wearable collections is a philosophy of less is more. The keynotes are well-defined volumes, fluid lines, and immaculate detailing; colors are mostly plain. What interests the designer is the knitted fabric in its own right, rather than knitting as a vehicle for multicolored jacquards and intarsias. Apart from occasional stripes or prints, if Verdù combines colors it is on a large scale. He might, for example, use a different shade for each part of an outfit or for each garment of a range. That he had intended to be a painter is always apparent in the subtle choice and juxtaposition of brights, pastels, or neutrals.

Early collections were exuberant, with a clever mix of knitted and woven materials. When mixing fabrics, Verdù tends to play a teasing game of "spot the knitting." He chooses knitted fabrics that look so much like weaves that only a very close inspection reveals what they are; then he reverses traditional roles and takes us light years away from the woven suit teamed with a sweater. In a Verdù runway, knitting, identifiable or not, is always the star of the show. Weaves become complementary or, at best, equal partners.

Handling knitting in this way is a difficult exercise, especially when tailoring is involved, and Verdù has been known to dress male models in suits entirely made out of jersey. The very same qualities that make knitting feel like a second skin turn it awkward in the workroom as knitted fabrics can be unpredictable. Pressing can stretch them; some curl, others have a sideways slant, difficult to control and impossible to correct. Half the time, the fabric needs to be designed from scratch, and here lies the greatest challenge—to start a garment not from a bale of jersey but from a cone of yarn.

Verdù's designs for the straight knitting machine show him in complete control of the fabric and of the manufacturing process. This is one of the aspects that makes his work so successful, but there are others; another is his skill at producing infinite variations on a theme, however simple. Verdù devotees know for a fact that, in any given range, they will find something to fit their age, lifestyle, and bone structure. Then there is the way in which the designer combines chic with exquisite comfort, something that international models appearing in his shows have been quick to point out. Finally, there is the clearly distinctive signature, the very personal imprint Verdù leaves on everything he does, because, except for making the clothes, he actually does everything. From the moment he chooses a yarn or fabric and reaches for the sketch pad, up to the final fitting, nobody else works on the design. In the era of the franchise, a Joaquim Verdù label means exactly what it says.

As a young man, Verdù started his studies at Feli's fashion school. He had not been there more than a few weeks before his potential was spotted by one of the lecturers. Pedro Rodríguez obtained permission from the school to take Verdù to his own couture house, where he personally introduced him to the intricacies of cut and drape. On his death, many years later, Rodríguez left him his scissors. The man who shares with Balenciaga the honor of being the father of Spanish couture could not have paid Verdù a greater compliment.

Spanning the end of the millennium, Verdù welcomed the 21st century at the Spanish Cibeles. According to commentator Pedro Mansilla, Verdù avoided the fashion vapors of no-show designers and regional divas to showcase practical Spanish goods. As in the past, he presented a wearable collection of knits in contrasting colors, his signature style. In Madrid for fall 2001, his clingy, monochromatic knits presented a vulnerable, sensuous youth in thigh-hugging pants and matching bateau-neck top and ethereal slip dress.

—Montse Stanley; updated by Mary Ellen Snodgrass

VERINO, Roberto

Spanish fashion designer

Born: Manuel Roberto Marino, Verin, Spain, May 1945. Education: Studied business and fine arts in Paris, mid-1960s. Family: Children: Cristina, Jose Manuel. Career: Left studies to take charge of parents' leather garments business, 1967; in 1970s, worked for MARPY Jeans; launched ready-to-wear collection for women, Roberto Verino; a year later, opened his first shop in Paris; introduced cosmetics line, 1993; collections represented in over 20 countries; specializes in women's ready-to-wear. Awards: T for Triumph (Telva magazine, Spain), 1991 and 1994; Aguja de Oro (Golden Needle), Spanish Press, 1992. Address: Amaro Refojo 12, 36200 Verin (Orense), Spain.

Roberto Verino, fall 2001 collection. © Fashion Syndicate Press.

PUBLICATIONS

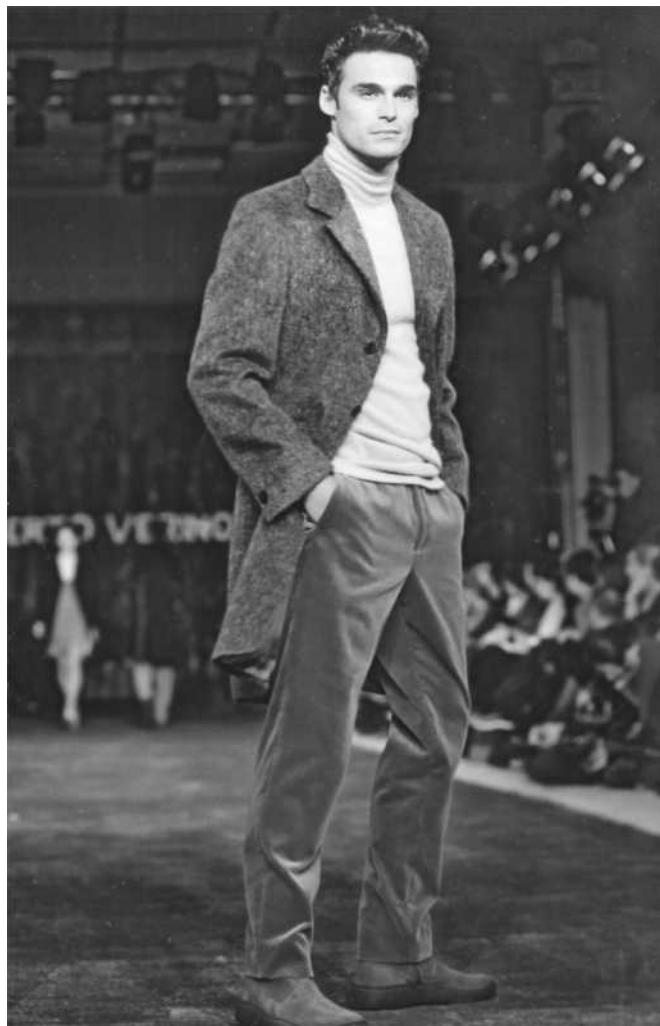

On VERINO:

Articles

Mattioni, Marina, "Roberto Verino," in Donna (Milan), June 1990.
"Consumer Goods Euro: Womenswear in Spain," in MarkIntel, 1 April 2000.

* * *

Roberto Verino is a Spanish designer who first trained in Paris before returning to take over the family leather clothing business in northern Spain. Throughout the 1970s he built a small concern into a prosperous local industry; then, in 1982, he launched his first collection of prêt-à-porter. His success was almost immediate, and year by year his fame has grown so that by 1994 he was the premier Spanish fashion designer.

Roberto Verino, fall 2001 collection. © Fashion Syndicate Press.

From the beginning, Verino has set himself the highest standards of artistry. He collaborated with well-known Spanish painter Xaime Quesada and as early as 1984 designed his prototype around the work of Joan Pere Viladecans for display at the Barcelona International Cotton Institute. In more recent years, designs for his new collections have been drawn by Arturo Elenor, whose style is similar to the British political cartoonist Gerald Scarfe, so that the fashion plates are not just design drafts but art in their own right.

As well as this strong accent on artistry, Verino makes clothes that are both practical and comfortable. To these ends, he looks to masculine fashion to create feminine clothes. All his designs are a clash of male and female—masculine lines, female detail, male fabrics, feminine cuts, masculine shape, feminine colors.

Verino prides himself on his use of cotton and linen, no longer, if ever, uniquely masculine fabrics, except that Verino prefers black, gray, and brown, pinstriped, flecked, or even tartan colors and patterns. Verino's favorite clothing is jacket and trousers, double-breasted, broad lapels, wide collars, neither cuffs nor turn-ups. Eschewing the traditional suit, the cut is pure feminine, the trousers fit snugly at the waist, then flare at the ankle or hug the waist in layers of wraparound fabric that sculpt the leg down to a tight ankle fit. The jackets have tailored waists and soft shoulders to enhance feminine profiles.

Comfort and practicality should never preclude stylishness, and it is the feminine detail of Roberto Verino's creations that make his work so original. Sparkling gems and brooches replace buttons, waistcoats shimmer and shine, shirts have full-flowing sleeves and lace collars, coats have satin linings, trousers and skirts are split high to reveal first ankle, tibia, and thigh. It would be wrong to give the impression Verino uses uniquely dark colors; he has, in fact, built entire collections around white, contrasting male versus female by mixing male form with female colors. His collection includes royal blue trousers and coats, poppy red double-breasted jackets, angel white suits, and yellow gold waistcoats. For all his use of masculine materials and his adoption of male styles, Verino's clothes are pure female.

If Verino's masculine fabrics pay homage to Giorgio Armani, he is by no means a satellite of this Italian designer. Armani's reinvention of male fashion inspired designers across Europe, but Verino's genius is to twist Armani's ideas into a uniquely feminine creation. Many other influences are also apparent; Verino takes a pinch of humor from Moschino, mixes and matches colors in the style of Christian Lacroix, and draws on the same sources of subtlety and sophistication as Sybilla and Claude Montana. Further geographic influences are readily apparent to northern Europeans: the delicate jeweled sandals straight out of a souk; the flowing gowns, high necklines, and modesty-preserving tops so reminiscent of heroines from Arabian Nights. The 1994 collection showed new influences from Asia and the Far East, square jackets, long lines, intricate toggle buttons, marvelous gold, red, and orange silks.

Verino's collections have been shown in Paris and Madrid, Barcelona and London, but his work is not uniquely haute couture as he designs for three markets. First is sport and urban, where he makes maximum use of male shapes to create practical styles for women; Look Comfortable is a younger line, with emphasis on comfort where miniskirts turn out to be shorts and blouses are long, light, and full. Espadrilles, rope, and canvas sandals are de rigueur. Finally comes his Night-time collection, where elegance meets comfort and seduction is inevitable. So reads the advertising copy, but it is clear Verino designs with a woman's wants as well as needs in mind. Back in 1993 Verino launched of a line of cosmetics. Together with his clothes, they are found in shops and boutiques in the UK, Germany, France, and Japan, making Verino a truly European designer.

—Sally Anne Melia; updated by Mary Ellen Snodgrass

VERSACE, Donatella

Italian designer

Born: Reggio Calabria, Italy, 1955. Sister of internationally renowned fashion great Gianni Versace [deceased] and often named as his chief muse. Education: Studied literature in Florence. Family: Married Paul Beck, 1987; children: Allegra, Daniel. Career: Significant creative force in Gianni Versace's design empire as both muse and fashion consultant, 1970s and 1980s; formal role with Gianni was as Design Studio assistant, as well as product placement, development, distribution, and public relations; Gianni's fragrance Blonde, launched chiefly for her, 1995; with Gianni's untimely death in 1997, she assumed the role of principal designer for the Versace company. Address: c/o Keeble Cavaco and Duka Inc., 450 West 15th Street, Suite 604, New York, NY 10011, U.S.A.

Donatella Versace, fall/winter 2001–02 collection. © AP/Wide World Photos.

PUBLICATIONS

On VERSACE:

Articles

- Spindler, Amy M., "Versace," in the New York Times, 10 October 1997.
- "Donatella Versace," in Current Biography Yearbook, 1998.
- Helter, Zoe, "Survivor," in Harper's Bazaar, August 2000.
- "The Good, the Bad and the Ugly," in the Washington Post, 2 March 2001.
- "Flash and Dash," in WWD, 12 March 2001.
- "Glitter Girl," in WWD, 29 June 2001.
- "Donatella Versace: Perfectly Wicked," in the Washington Post, 4 October 2001.
- "Roots," in the Fashion of the Times (New York), Fall 2001.

* * *

Donatella Versace was born with a natural Italian flair for personal style. Her emerging creative talents were nurtured by her mother and by the majestic, wild, and sun-drenched atmosphere of the Calabrian southwest coast of Italy where she grew up. Versace's mother, Francesca, the inspired and doted-upon couturier to the Italian aristocracy of postwar Europe, had a strength of character and boldness as a designer that shaped both her son Gianni Versace's extraordinary career and the personality of her daughter.

As a teenager, Donatella was as untamed as the countryside she grew up in. She was the darling of her older brother, Gianni, who took her everywhere and whose admiration sharpened her already vivid sense of the dramatic opportunities that life might hold for her. Versace introduces herself with a vignette about her adolescent style: "When I was a teenager, I wore black fitted shirts with tight black pants and a leather jacket. This, over the years, became my signature look. This style became the basis of many of my designs." She was and remains supremely self-confident and self-assured. Her brother was both appalled by these tight clothes and high heels and fascinated by her apparent satisfaction with her body.

Donatella's clothing design today with its sexy, feminine, powerful look is as much a reflection of her early personal style as of the fashion world in which she is a major presence. Because of the enormous success of her brother and his couture line and Donatella's role as his assistant and muse, she was well known and respected in the Italian fashion world. Gianni's early years of apprenticeship in Milan were punctuated by visits from Donatella, whose opinion he sought and valued because of her strong unconventional fashion sense and her intimate connections to the very celebrities he hoped to dress.

When Gianni established his own atelier on the Via della Spiga in Milan, he invited Donatella to join the business. Although the newspapers at the time denominated her role as muse to her brother, Versace was quite insistent that hers was an active role. Indeed, it seems that her appearance, blond and lithe and very stylish, in her brother's designs was instrumental in encouraging those celebrities and the nouveau riche set to demand Versace fashion for themselves.

his Night-time collection, where elegance meets comfort and seduction is inevitable. So reads the advertising copy, but it is clear Verino designs with a woman's wants as well as needs in mind. Back in 1993 Verino launched of a line of cosmetics. Together with his clothes, they are found in shops and boutiques in the UK, Germany, France, and Japan, making Verino a truly European designer.

—Sally Anne Melia; updated by Mary Ellen Snodgrass

VERSACE, Donatella

Italian designer

Born: Reggio Calabria, Italy, 1955. Sister of internationally renowned fashion great Gianni Versace [deceased] and often named as his chief muse. Education: Studied literature in Florence. Family: Married Paul Beck, 1987; children: Allegra, Daniel. Career: Significant creative force in Gianni Versace's design empire as both muse and fashion consultant, 1970s and 1980s; formal role with Gianni was as Design Studio assistant, as well as product placement, development, distribution, and public relations; Gianni's fragrance Blonde, launched chiefly for her, 1995; with Gianni's untimely death in 1997, she assumed the role of principal designer for the Versace company. Address: c/o Keeble Cavaco and Duka Inc., 450 West 15th Street, Suite 604, New York, NY 10011, U.S.A.

Donatella Versace, fall/winter 2001–02 collection. © AP/Wide World Photos.

PUBLICATIONS

On VERSACE:

Articles

- Spindler, Amy M., "Versace," in the New York Times, 10 October 1997.
- "Donatella Versace," in Current Biography Yearbook, 1998.
- Helter, Zoe, "Survivor," in Harper's Bazaar, August 2000.
- "The Good, the Bad and the Ugly," in the Washington Post, 2 March 2001.
- "Flash and Dash," in WWD, 12 March 2001.
- "Glitter Girl," in WWD, 29 June 2001.
- "Donatella Versace: Perfectly Wicked," in the Washington Post, 4 October 2001.
- "Roots," in the Fashion of the Times (New York), Fall 2001.

* * *

Donatella Versace was born with a natural Italian flair for personal style. Her emerging creative talents were nurtured by her mother and by the majestic, wild, and sun-drenched atmosphere of the Calabrian southwest coast of Italy where she grew up. Versace's mother, Francesca, the inspired and doted-upon couturier to the Italian aristocracy of postwar Europe, had a strength of character and boldness as a designer that shaped both her son Gianni Versace's extraordinary career and the personality of her daughter.

As a teenager, Donatella was as untamed as the countryside she grew up in. She was the darling of her older brother, Gianni, who took her everywhere and whose admiration sharpened her already vivid sense of the dramatic opportunities that life might hold for her. Versace introduces herself with a vignette about her adolescent style: "When I was a teenager, I wore black fitted shirts with tight black pants and a leather jacket. This, over the years, became my signature look. This style became the basis of many of my designs." She was and remains supremely self-confident and self-assured. Her brother was both appalled by these tight clothes and high heels and fascinated by her apparent satisfaction with her body.

Donatella's clothing design today with its sexy, feminine, powerful look is as much a reflection of her early personal style as of the fashion world in which she is a major presence. Because of the enormous success of her brother and his couture line and Donatella's role as his assistant and muse, she was well known and respected in the Italian fashion world. Gianni's early years of apprenticeship in Milan were punctuated by visits from Donatella, whose opinion he sought and valued because of her strong unconventional fashion sense and her intimate connections to the very celebrities he hoped to dress.

When Gianni established his own atelier on the Via della Spiga in Milan, he invited Donatella to join the business. Although the newspapers at the time denominated her role as muse to her brother, Versace was quite insistent that hers was an active role. Indeed, it seems that her appearance, blond and lithe and very stylish, in her brother's designs was instrumental in encouraging those celebrities and the nouveau riche set to demand Versace fashion for themselves.

Donatella Versace, autumn/winter 2001–02 high couture collection. © Reuters NewMedia Inc./CORBIS.

Her natural gift for the dramatic was also instrumental in drawing vast public attention to her brother's annual shows. Harper's Bazaar (1995) recognized that Donatella's demand for the most famous models as a part of the publicity surrounding each season's latest designs launched "the supermodel" cult, though it must be said that she was herself the most recognizable supermodel that Gianni engaged.

Her notoriously high standards attracted precisely the attention to Versace products that guaranteed their marketability. She was dissatisfied with the fragrance Blonde, and, determined to ensure the Versace signature perfume's ultimate success, had the fragrance reformulated despite time constraints and an enormously expensive ad campaign completed by famed photographer Richard Avedon.

Her personal life was not entirely ignored during this period of Versace's parallel ascent with her brother's design empire. She married an American, Paul Beck, formerly a model for Versace men's clothing and together they produced two children, upon whom both she and her brother lavished their attention, love, and financial resources. As her fame and the demands on her time have escalated, Versace insists that the important relationship with her children, "our reality, our family," provides an appropriate anchor in her personal life as well as in her marriage to Beck.

Versace's leap to national prominence came in late 1997 when she delivered and showed the Versace collections on time, just three months after her brother was murdered. The New York Times wrote, "in a state of mourning, with so much pressure and so much pain, [that] Ms. Versace could produce anything at all" was remarkable. Donatella reinvented herself as the strong designing presence of Versace Couture when her role as muse and collaborator with her brother, Gianni, was instantly destroyed by the same bullet that killed him. A passionate feminist in her life as well as in the designs she produces, Donatella was determined not to give up the central position Versace Couture held under her brother's reign. She continues to cultivate the celebrity crowd; designing, for example, the extraordinary palm-leaf printed gown that Jennifer Lopez wore at a Grammy Awards ceremony where a huge sensation greeted the appearance of so much of Ms. Lopez, and entertaining, either at her palazzo at Como or in the Versace family apartments in Milan, everyone who is anyone—or who wants to be seen.

Donatella's collections in recent years have concentrated on the sexy natural shape of a woman's body, which may be an ideal but is certainly exemplified by Versace herself. Her use of clinging chiffons that hug every curve, subtle designs that follow those curves like a whisper, and sparkles of sequins highlighting those curves have perfected her look as "maybe risqué, but not reckless." Her most recent ventures into giftware—Jungle from Versace (a Rosenthal fine porcelain for the table) and lifestyle hotels (a six-star establishment on the Australian gold coast is set to open in 2001)—will certainly be successful.

Versace never appears to suffer from the decline of the economy, having overcome "crippling Italian inheritance taxes" and a vast restructuring at the time of Gianni's death. She is poised, full of the energy and naughty confidence that distinguished her youth, to mature into a major fashion leader independent of her brother but upholding the high standards of elegance, sensuality, and opulence that were and remain the Versace trademark.

—Kathleen Bonann Marshall

VERSACE, Gianni

Italian designer

Born: Reggio Calabria, Italy, 2 December 1946. Education: Studied architecture, Calabria, 1964–67. Family: Brother Santo, sister Donatella, and four nieces and nephews. Career: Designer and buyer in Paris and London, for his mother's dressmaking studio, 1968–72; freelance designer, Callaghan, Complice, Genny, Milan, 1972–77; formed own company, Milan, 1978; showed first womenswear collection, 1978, first menswear collection, 1979; signature fragrance introduced, 1981; home furnishings collection launched, 1993; launched Blonde fragrance and opened New York flagship store, 1996; introduced V2 diffusion line for 1997; firm continued after his death by siblings Donatella and Santo; Donatella took over designing duties, 1997; formed joint venture with Sunland Group for luxury hotels,

Gianni Versace, fall 1996 haute couture collection: panne velvet and silk crêpe dress. © AP/Wide World Photos.

1999; plans to take the firm public, 2001–02. Exhibitions: Galleria Rizzardi, Milan, 1982; Studio La Città, Verona, 1983; Galerie Focus, Munich, 1983; Gianni Versace: dialogues de mode, Palais Galliera, Paris, 1986; retrospective, Fashion Institute of Technology, New York, 1992–93; Metropolitan Museum of Art, 1997. Awards: Occhio d'Oro award, Milan, 1982, 1984, 1990, 1991; Cutty Sark award, 1983, 1988; CFDA International award, 1993. Died: 15 July 1997, in Miami, Florida. Company Address: Via Gesù, 20121 Milan, Italy. Company Website: www.versace.it.

PUBLICATIONS

By VERSACE:

Books

Vanitas: lo stile dei sensi, with Omar Calabrese, Rome 1991.
Versace Signatures, with Omar Calabrese, Rome 1992.
Gianni Versace, with Bruce Weber, Milan, 1994.
Men Without Ties, with Hannah Barry, New York, 1994.
Rock & Royalty, Milan, 1996.
The Art of Being You, with Germano Celant, New York & Milan, 1997.

Versace insists that the important relationship with her children, "our reality, our family," provides an appropriate anchor in her personal life as well as in her marriage to Beck.

Versace's leap to national prominence came in late 1997 when she delivered and showed the Versace collections on time, just three months after her brother was murdered. The New York Times wrote, "in a state of mourning, with so much pressure and so much pain, [that] Ms. Versace could produce anything at all" was remarkable. Donatella reinvented herself as the strong designing presence of Versace Couture when her role as muse and collaborator with her brother, Gianni, was instantly destroyed by the same bullet that killed him. A passionate feminist in her life as well as in the designs she produces, Donatella was determined not to give up the central position Versace Couture held under her brother's reign. She continues to cultivate the celebrity crowd; designing, for example, the extraordinary palm-leaf printed gown that Jennifer Lopez wore at a Grammy Awards ceremony where a huge sensation greeted the appearance of so much of Ms. Lopez, and entertaining, either at her palazzo at Como or in the Versace family apartments in Milan, everyone who is anyone—or who wants to be seen.

Donatella's collections in recent years have concentrated on the sexy natural shape of a woman's body, which may be an ideal but is certainly exemplified by Versace herself. Her use of clinging chiffons that hug every curve, subtle designs that follow those curves like a whisper, and sparkles of sequins highlighting those curves have perfected her look as "maybe risqué, but not reckless." Her most recent ventures into giftware—Jungle from Versace (a Rosenthal fine porcelain for the table) and lifestyle hotels (a six-star establishment on the Australian gold coast is set to open in 2001)—will certainly be successful.

Versace never appears to suffer from the decline of the economy, having overcome "crippling Italian inheritance taxes" and a vast restructuring at the time of Gianni's death. She is poised, full of the energy and naughty confidence that distinguished her youth, to mature into a major fashion leader independent of her brother but upholding the high standards of elegance, sensuality, and opulence that were and remain the Versace trademark.

—Kathleen Bonann Marshall

VERSACE, Gianni

Italian designer

Born: Reggio Calabria, Italy, 2 December 1946. Education: Studied architecture, Calabria, 1964–67. Family: Brother Santo, sister Donatella, and four nieces and nephews. Career: Designer and buyer in Paris and London, for his mother's dressmaking studio, 1968–72; freelance designer, Callaghan, Complice, Genny, Milan, 1972–77; formed own company, Milan, 1978; showed first womenswear collection, 1978, first menswear collection, 1979; signature fragrance introduced, 1981; home furnishings collection launched, 1993; launched Blonde fragrance and opened New York flagship store, 1996; introduced V2 diffusion line for 1997; firm continued after his death by siblings Donatella and Santo; Donatella took over designing duties, 1997; formed joint venture with Sunland Group for luxury hotels,

Gianni Versace, fall 1996 haute couture collection: panne velvet and silk crêpe dress. © AP/Wide World Photos.

1999; plans to take the firm public, 2001–02. Exhibitions: Galleria Rizzardi, Milan, 1982; Studio La Città, Verona, 1983; Galerie Focus, Munich, 1983; Gianni Versace: dialogues de mode, Palais Galliera, Paris, 1986; retrospective, Fashion Institute of Technology, New York, 1992–93; Metropolitan Museum of Art, 1997. Awards: Occhio d'Oro award, Milan, 1982, 1984, 1990, 1991; Cutty Sark award, 1983, 1988; CFDA International award, 1993. Died: 15 July 1997, in Miami, Florida. Company Address: Via Gesù, 20121 Milan, Italy. Company Website: www.versace.it.

PUBLICATIONS

By VERSACE:

Books

Vanitas: lo stile dei sensi, with Omar Calabrese, Rome 1991.
Versace Signatures, with Omar Calabrese, Rome 1992.
Gianni Versace, with Bruce Weber, Milan, 1994.
Men Without Ties, with Hannah Barry, New York, 1994.
Rock & Royalty, Milan, 1996.
The Art of Being You, with Germano Celant, New York & Milan, 1997.

Gianni Versace standing with two of his silk crêpe designs, 1996.
© AP/Wide World Photos.

On VERSACE:

Books

- Alfonso, Maria-Vittoria, Leaders in Fashion: i grandi personaggi della moda, Bologna, 1983.
 Giacomondi, Silvia, The Italian Look Reflected, Milan, 1984.
 Soli, Pia, Il genio antipatico [exhibition catalogue], Venice, 1984.
 Palais Galliera Musée de la Mode, Gianni Versace: dialogues de mode [exhibition catalogue], Milan, 1986.
 Pasi, Mario, Versace Teatro (two volumes), Milan, 1987.
 Bocca, Nicoletta, and Chiara Buss, Gianni Versace: l'abito per pensare, Milan, 1989.
 Martin, Richard, and Harold Koda, Infra-Apparel, New York, 1993.
 ———, Orientalism: Visions of the East in Western Dress [exhibition catalogue], New York, 1994.
 Turner, Lowri, Gianni Versace: Fashion's Last Emperor, London, 1997.
 Martin, Richard, Gianni Versace, [exhibition catalogue], Metropolitan Museum of Art, New York, 1997.
 Martin, Richard, and Sophie Léchauguette, Gianni Versace, Paris, 1997.

- Avedon, Richard, The Naked & the Dresses: Twenty Years of Versace, London, 1998.
 Casadio, Mariuccia and Samuele Mazza, Versace, London, 1998.
 Mason, Christopher, Undressed: A Biography of Gianni Versace, London, 1999.
 White, Nicola, Versace, London, 2000.

Articles

- Carlsen, Peter, "Gianni Versace: Disciplined Negligence," in GQ, August 1979.
 Withers, Jane, "The Palace of Versace," in The Face (London), December 1984.
 Simpson, Helen, "Gianni Versace: ordito e trama," in Vogue (Milan), October 1985.
 Petkanas, Christopher, "A Dialogue with Gianni Versace," in WWD, 22 October 1986.
 Del Pozo, Silvia, "Gianni Versace: l'immigrato eccellente," in L'Uomo Vogue (Milan), October 1987.
 Phillips, Kathy, "The Satanic Versace," in You, magazine of the Mail on Sunday (London), 19 March 1989.
 Martin, Richard, "Sailing to Byzantium: A Fashion Odyseyy, 1990–91," in Textile & Text, 14 February 1991.
 Servin, James, "Chic or Cruel? Gianni Versace's Styles Take a Cue from the World of S&M," in the New York Times, 1 November 1992.
 Morris, Bernadine, "The Once and Future Versace," in the New York Times, 8 November 1992.
 "Gianni Versace," in Current Biography, April 1993.
 Schiff, Stephen, "Lunch with Mr. Armani, Tea with Mr. Versace, Dinner with Mr. Valentino," in the New Yorker (New York), 7 November 1994.
 Forden, Sara Gay, "Very Versace: Making America No. 1," in WWD, 1 November 1994.
 Gandee, Charles, "Versace's Castle in the Sand," in Vogue, December 1994.
 Menkes, Suzy, "Versace's Pastiche Amid Couture Upheaval," in the International Herald Tribune, 23 January 1995.
 Spindler, Amy M., "Versace: Clean and Mean for Fall," in the New York Times, 8 March 1995.
 "Gianni Versace: The Right Stuff," in WWD, 8 March 1995.
 Van Lenten, Barry, "Gianni's American Dream," in WWD, 10 April 1995.
 "Gianni vs. Giorgio: Is fashion dead?" in WWD, 11 September 1996.
 Sullivan, Ruth, "High Fashion and a Head for Figures (Profile of Santo Versace)," in the European 12 June 1997.
 Porter, Henrym and Susannah Barron, "A Tribute to the King of Glamour," in The Guardian, 16 July 1997.
 Marlow, Michael, et al., "Fashion World Mourns Loss of a Leader," in DNR, 16 July 1997.
 Socha, Miles, "The Versace Legacy," in DNR, 16 July 1997.
 Reed, Paula, et al., "Fashion Victim," in the European, 17 July 1997.
 Forden, Sara Gay, "Versace: The Milan Farewell," in WWD, 23 July 1997.
 Bellafante, Ginia, "La Dolce Vita: Gianni Versace," [cover story] in Time, 28 July 1997.
 Foley, Bridget, "Donatella's First Collection," in WWD, 1 October 1997.
 Costin, Glynnis, "Gianni Versace: A Reflection on Pride, Honesty, and Women," in WWD, 13 September 1999.

Spindler, Amy M., "The Great Gianni," in the New York Times, 18 February 2001.

"The Renaissance of Gianni Versace," in the Economist, 7 April 2001.

* * *

Gianni Versace's work was both metaphorical opera and real clothing, the first in its larger-than-life exuberance and design bravura and the latter in its unpretentious, practical application to the comfort of the wearer and the expressiveness of the body. Versace made all the world a stage for flamboyant and fascinating costume with the knowledgeable pageantry of the Renaissance, a Fellini-like sensuality of burlesque, and the brilliant notes of operatic color and silhouette. Richly cultivated in historical materials and vividly committed to the hedonism of late 20th-century culture, Versace created distinctive, at-the-edge designs that achieved the aesthetic limit of the avant-garde and the commercial success of viable apparel.

Versace expressed his admiration for Poiret, the fashion revolutionary who in a brief éclat of design genius combined a theatrical fantasy with legerdemain eclecticism. Similarly, Versace functioned as a kind of impresario to his own style, commanding authority over his image and advertising, menswear, womenswear, and accessories. His apparel design was characterized by a particular interest in bias, itself a means of revealing the body in dramatic, sexy clothing for women. His embroideries (and metal mesh) harkened back to the art déco, but were as mod as magazine covers. Likewise, his fascination with black-and-white grids and alternations recalled the 1920s and 1930s.

His abundant swathings suggested Vionnet, Madame Grès, and North Africa. Line was important, with many Versace suits, dresses, and coats marked by lines as if the bound edges of fabric would in outline define waistlines, shoulders, or center front. Like any great showman on stage, Versace was also concerned with metamorphic clothing; that which could be worn or perceived in several different ways. In these respects, it is clear the Milanese designer looked to Tokyo as well as to Milan and Paris. His metallics, trousers for women (ranging from voluminous pantaloons to cigarette-trouser leg wrappings), leather for women, and chunky, glittery accessories have created an image of women as a cross between Amazon and siren.

The boldness of silhouette in his womenswear was only reinforced in his work with photographers to represent the clothing, generally against a pure white field to grant further starkness and aggressiveness. But, in person and in the individual item, Versace's clothing was far less diva and dominatrix than it might seem. Versace's jewel-like colors, his geometric line in pattern, his recurrent fascination with the asymmetrical collars engendered by bias, and his flamboyant juxtapositions of pattern were all elegant traits. Likewise, Versace employed luxurious textiles, classical references, bias cut, and such combinations as leather reversible to wool, and embroidery-encrusted bodies and soft flowing skirts, to his unmistakable fashion.

Versace's menswear was also accented by leather, body wrapping for sensuality, audacious silhouette, and oversizing for comfort. Even in menswear, Versace played with asymmetry and the bias-influenced continuous rotation around the body, rather than a disjunctive front and back. Versace's menswear in particular was sometimes criticized as being futuristic with its big shoulders and technological detailing seeming to suggest science fiction. Yet Versace employed the most elegant menswear materials in a loose, capacious drape defying any space-age references. His designs did, however, recall a futurist ideal of clothing fully realized for the first time with sensuality and practicality.

Versace was an encyclopedist of classical tradition. His insistence upon directing all aspects of his fashion, from publicity and his books to the exhibitions interpreting his work reflected a consummate craftsman. Versace was neither a secluded scholastic, though, nor merely the glittery dresser of stars and celebrities some have perceived. The truth was somewhere in between, in a design imagination of brilliant theatrical insight, probing and analytical interest in bias, and a desire to reconcile the use of fashion history with making apparel appropriate for today.

After overcoming cancer of the lymph nodes, Versace was facing life with renewed vigor. Yet on the morning of 15 July 1997, a gunman named Andrew Cunanan, after a multi-state killing spree, shot Versace on the steps of his Miami home. The fashion industry united in outrage and grief and Versace stores were shuttered for a day in his memory. Donatella and Santo vowed to carry on in their brother's name, releasing a statement that read, "It must be remembered that Gianni Versace stood for the future, and so, of course, we stand dedicated to the future of our company." And so they soldiered on, building the Versace business to new heights amidst the tragedy.

By the year 2000, three years after Gianni's death, the Versace empire had been reorganized, streamlined, and poised for a possible initial public offering. Though Gianni was prepared to take the firm public in 1997, the plans had been tabled after his death. On the design front, Donatella's expertise grew with each succeeding collection, maintaining the Versace sensationalism and colorful style. In addition to the evolving apparel and accessories offered with the Versace label, the firm's name became associated with luxury hotels and resorts through an alliance with the Sunland Group. Gianni's former South Beach home in Miami, was also turned into a hotel.

—Richard Martin; updated by Sydonie Benét

VICTOR, Sally

American milliner

Born: Sally Josephs in Scranton, Pennsylvania, 23 February 1905.

Education: Studied painting in Paris. Family: Married Sergiu Victor, 1927; children: Richard. Career: Saleswoman, then millinery buyer, Macy's, New York, 1923–25; assistant millinery buyer, 1925, and head buyer, 1926, Bamberger's, New Jersey; designer, Serge millinery, New York, 1927–34; opened own made-to-order millinery establishment, 1934; Sally V ready-to-wear line introduced, from 1951; firm closed, 1968. Exhibitions: The Brooklyn Museum, 1942. Awards: Fashion Critics Millinery award, 1943; Coty American Fashion Critics award, 1944, 1956. Died: 14 May 1977, in New York.

PUBLICATIONS

On VICTOR:

Books

Lambert, Eleanor, World of Fashion: People, Places, Resources, New York & London, 1976.

McDowell, Colin, Hats: Status, Style, Glamour, London, 1992.

Spindler, Amy M., "The Great Gianni," in the New York Times, 18 February 2001.

"The Renaissance of Gianni Versace," in the Economist, 7 April 2001.

* * *

Gianni Versace's work was both metaphorical opera and real clothing, the first in its larger-than-life exuberance and design bravura and the latter in its unpretentious, practical application to the comfort of the wearer and the expressiveness of the body. Versace made all the world a stage for flamboyant and fascinating costume with the knowledgeable pageantry of the Renaissance, a Fellini-like sensuality of burlesque, and the brilliant notes of operatic color and silhouette. Richly cultivated in historical materials and vividly committed to the hedonism of late 20th-century culture, Versace created distinctive, at-the-edge designs that achieved the aesthetic limit of the avant-garde and the commercial success of viable apparel.

Versace expressed his admiration for Poiret, the fashion revolutionary who in a brief éclat of design genius combined a theatrical fantasy with legerdemain eclecticism. Similarly, Versace functioned as a kind of impresario to his own style, commanding authority over his image and advertising, menswear, womenswear, and accessories. His apparel design was characterized by a particular interest in bias, itself a means of revealing the body in dramatic, sexy clothing for women. His embroideries (and metal mesh) harkened back to the art déco, but were as mod as magazine covers. Likewise, his fascination with black-and-white grids and alternations recalled the 1920s and 1930s.

His abundant swathings suggested Vionnet, Madame Grès, and North Africa. Line was important, with many Versace suits, dresses, and coats marked by lines as if the bound edges of fabric would in outline define waistlines, shoulders, or center front. Like any great showman on stage, Versace was also concerned with metamorphic clothing; that which could be worn or perceived in several different ways. In these respects, it is clear the Milanese designer looked to Tokyo as well as to Milan and Paris. His metallics, trousers for women (ranging from voluminous pantaloons to cigarette-trouser leg wrappings), leather for women, and chunky, glittery accessories have created an image of women as a cross between Amazon and siren.

The boldness of silhouette in his womenswear was only reinforced in his work with photographers to represent the clothing, generally against a pure white field to grant further starkness and aggressiveness. But, in person and in the individual item, Versace's clothing was far less diva and dominatrix than it might seem. Versace's jewel-like colors, his geometric line in pattern, his recurrent fascination with the asymmetrical collars engendered by bias, and his flamboyant juxtapositions of pattern were all elegant traits. Likewise, Versace employed luxurious textiles, classical references, bias cut, and such combinations as leather reversible to wool, and embroidery-encrusted bodies and soft flowing skirts, to his unmistakable fashion.

Versace's menswear was also accented by leather, body wrapping for sensuality, audacious silhouette, and oversizing for comfort. Even in menswear, Versace played with asymmetry and the bias-influenced continuous rotation around the body, rather than a disjunctive front and back. Versace's menswear in particular was sometimes criticized as being futuristic with its big shoulders and technological detailing seeming to suggest science fiction. Yet Versace employed the most elegant menswear materials in a loose, capacious drape defying any space-age references. His designs did, however, recall a futurist ideal of clothing fully realized for the first time with sensuality and practicality.

Versace was an encyclopedist of classical tradition. His insistence upon directing all aspects of his fashion, from publicity and his books to the exhibitions interpreting his work reflected a consummate craftsman. Versace was neither a secluded scholastic, though, nor merely the glittery dresser of stars and celebrities some have perceived. The truth was somewhere in between, in a design imagination of brilliant theatrical insight, probing and analytical interest in bias, and a desire to reconcile the use of fashion history with making apparel appropriate for today.

After overcoming cancer of the lymph nodes, Versace was facing life with renewed vigor. Yet on the morning of 15 July 1997, a gunman named Andrew Cunanan, after a multi-state killing spree, shot Versace on the steps of his Miami home. The fashion industry united in outrage and grief and Versace stores were shuttered for a day in his memory. Donatella and Santo vowed to carry on in their brother's name, releasing a statement that read, "It must be remembered that Gianni Versace stood for the future, and so, of course, we stand dedicated to the future of our company." And so they soldiered on, building the Versace business to new heights amidst the tragedy.

By the year 2000, three years after Gianni's death, the Versace empire had been reorganized, streamlined, and poised for a possible initial public offering. Though Gianni was prepared to take the firm public in 1997, the plans had been tabled after his death. On the design front, Donatella's expertise grew with each succeeding collection, maintaining the Versace sensationalism and colorful style. In addition to the evolving apparel and accessories offered with the Versace label, the firm's name became associated with luxury hotels and resorts through an alliance with the Sunland Group. Gianni's former South Beach home in Miami, was also turned into a hotel.

—Richard Martin; updated by Sydonie Benét

VICTOR, Sally

American milliner

Born: Sally Josephs in Scranton, Pennsylvania, 23 February 1905.

Education: Studied painting in Paris. Family: Married Sergiu Victor, 1927; children: Richard. Career: Saleswoman, then millinery buyer, Macy's, New York, 1923–25; assistant millinery buyer, 1925, and head buyer, 1926, Bamberger's, New Jersey; designer, Serge millinery, New York, 1927–34; opened own made-to-order millinery establishment, 1934; Sally V ready-to-wear line introduced, from 1951; firm closed, 1968. Exhibitions: The Brooklyn Museum, 1942. Awards: Fashion Critics Millinery award, 1943; Coty American Fashion Critics award, 1944, 1956. Died: 14 May 1977, in New York.

PUBLICATIONS

On VICTOR:

Books

Lambert, Eleanor, World of Fashion: People, Places, Resources, New York & London, 1976.

McDowell, Colin, Hats: Status, Style, Glamour, London, 1992.

Design by Sally Victor, 1966. © AP/Wide World Photos.

Articles

- “Sally Victor,” in Colliers (New York), 11 March 1939.
- “Sally Victor,” in Current Biography, April 1954.
- Sheppard, Eugenia, “Sally Victor,” in the New York Herald Tribune, 25 March 1964.
- , “Sally Victor,” [obituary], in the New York Times, 16 May 1977.

* * *

Just as the American sportswear designers were establishing the look of mix-and-match separates during the 1930s and 1940s, American milliners, especially Sally Victor, established the look in their own craft. Learning millinery first from the point of view of the buyer and customer, while working at Macy’s in New York, Victor focused on “designing pretty hats that make women look prettier.”

Victor aspirations were simple and pure; she believed women loved pretty things and liked to be noticed wearing them. Although she was occasionally denigrated for her pursuits, like when Eugenia Sheppard of the New York Herald Tribune (25 March 1964) said Victor was “sometimes accused of designing too pretty, too feminine, too becoming, too matronly hats,” Victor was credited for reviving the Ecuadorean economy by making the Panama straw hat popular again, even with the young women of the mid-1960s.

Victor customers read like a who’s who of the world’s famous, including Mamie Eisenhower, Eleanor Roosevelt, Queen Elizabeth II, Judy Garland, and Helen Hayes. In addition to her designs being attractive, they were sophisticated, had clean lines, were considered especially “American.” Victor was even called “a magnificent sculptress of straws and felts,” by the New Yorker magazine in 1954.

Influences on her work were many and varied, and among those Victor readily acknowledged were art exhibitions and architecture. The 1948 exhibition of art from the museums of Berlin at New York’s Metropolitan Museum of Art inspired her to create hats in a Franco-Flemish mode, with coifs and beret-like shapes taken from the paintings. In 1952 she did a series, in commemoration of Marco Polo’s birth, on oriental themes using shapes inspired by fans, lanterns, and pinwheels. In the late 1950s and early 1960s she looked for inspiration to such buildings as Frank Lloyd Wright’s Guggenheim Museum, which she interpreted in straw.

From early in her career she was counted with Lilly Daché and John Fredericks among the most important American milliners. Sally Victor hats were used to accessorize the catwalk models of American designers from Hattie Carnegie to Anne Klein. She was not only prolific in the variety of her made-to-order hats for each season, but was also among the first to establish a ready-to-wear line, Sally V. Her retirement in 1968 coincided with the demise of the hat as an essential fashion accessory and the increasing casualness of the American lifestyle. She died in New York in 1977.

—Jean Druesedow

VICTORIA'S SECRET

American Intimate apparel and accessories for women

Founded: by Roy Raymond in 1977, in San Francisco. Company History: Published first catalogue, 1978; sold for $4 million to The Limited apparel group, 1982; Cacique sibling formed to market French-styled lingerie, 1988; introduced swimwear, 1991; began selling cotton panties, 1993; launched bath and body line and introduced Miracle Bra, 1994; first runway show, 1995; spun off by The Limited, 1995; introduced seamless bras, 1996; launched legwear, 1998; went online with firm website, 1998; first live web fashion show, 1999; debuted Dream Angels fragrance collection, 1999; sponsored AIDS fundraiser with Miramax Films, 2000; launched first men’s fragrance collection, 2001; launched Pink fragrance and aired first television fashion show, 2001; signed license with Shiseido Company Ltd. for cosmetics, 2001. Company Address: 3 Limited Parkway, Columbus, OH 43216, U.S.A. Company Website: www.VictoriasSecret.com.

Design by Sally Victor, 1966. © AP/Wide World Photos.

Articles

- “Sally Victor,” in Colliers (New York), 11 March 1939.
- “Sally Victor,” in Current Biography, April 1954.
- Sheppard, Eugenia, “Sally Victor,” in the New York Herald Tribune, 25 March 1964.
- , “Sally Victor,” [obituary], in the New York Times, 16 May 1977.

* * *

Just as the American sportswear designers were establishing the look of mix-and-match separates during the 1930s and 1940s, American milliners, especially Sally Victor, established the look in their own craft. Learning millinery first from the point of view of the buyer and customer, while working at Macy’s in New York, Victor focused on “designing pretty hats that make women look prettier.”

Victor aspirations were simple and pure; she believed women loved pretty things and liked to be noticed wearing them. Although she was occasionally denigrated for her pursuits, like when Eugenia Sheppard of the New York Herald Tribune (25 March 1964) said Victor was “sometimes accused of designing too pretty, too feminine, too becoming, too matronly hats,” Victor was credited for reviving the Ecuadorean economy by making the Panama straw hat popular again, even with the young women of the mid-1960s.

Victor customers read like a who’s who of the world’s famous, including Mamie Eisenhower, Eleanor Roosevelt, Queen Elizabeth II, Judy Garland, and Helen Hayes. In addition to her designs being attractive, they were sophisticated, had clean lines, were considered especially “American.” Victor was even called “a magnificent sculptress of straws and felts,” by the New Yorker magazine in 1954.

Influences on her work were many and varied, and among those Victor readily acknowledged were art exhibitions and architecture. The 1948 exhibition of art from the museums of Berlin at New York’s Metropolitan Museum of Art inspired her to create hats in a Franco-Flemish mode, with coifs and beret-like shapes taken from the paintings. In 1952 she did a series, in commemoration of Marco Polo’s birth, on oriental themes using shapes inspired by fans, lanterns, and pinwheels. In the late 1950s and early 1960s she looked for inspiration to such buildings as Frank Lloyd Wright’s Guggenheim Museum, which she interpreted in straw.

From early in her career she was counted with Lilly Daché and John Fredericks among the most important American milliners. Sally Victor hats were used to accessorize the catwalk models of American designers from Hattie Carnegie to Anne Klein. She was not only prolific in the variety of her made-to-order hats for each season, but was also among the first to establish a ready-to-wear line, Sally V. Her retirement in 1968 coincided with the demise of the hat as an essential fashion accessory and the increasing casualness of the American lifestyle. She died in New York in 1977.

—Jean Druesedow

VICTORIA'S SECRET

American Intimate apparel and accessories for women

Founded: by Roy Raymond in 1977, in San Francisco. Company History: Published first catalogue, 1978; sold for $4 million to The Limited apparel group, 1982; Cacique sibling formed to market French-styled lingerie, 1988; introduced swimwear, 1991; began selling cotton panties, 1993; launched bath and body line and introduced Miracle Bra, 1994; first runway show, 1995; spun off by The Limited, 1995; introduced seamless bras, 1996; launched legwear, 1998; went online with firm website, 1998; first live web fashion show, 1999; debuted Dream Angels fragrance collection, 1999; sponsored AIDS fundraiser with Miramax Films, 2000; launched first men’s fragrance collection, 2001; launched Pink fragrance and aired first television fashion show, 2001; signed license with Shiseido Company Ltd. for cosmetics, 2001. Company Address: 3 Limited Parkway, Columbus, OH 43216, U.S.A. Company Website: www.VictoriasSecret.com.

Victoria's Secret, spring 2002 collection. © AP/Wide World Photos.

PUBLICATIONS

On VICTORIA'S SECRET:

Articles

- Perman, Stacy, "Victoria's Secret Hitting the Beach," in WWWD, 30 March 1994.
- Belcove, Julie L., "Victoria's Secret—Boudoir to Bath with July Entry," in WWWD, 6 May 1994.
- Moin, David, "The Intimate Category Killer," in WWWD, 13 March 1995.
- Machan, Dyan, "Sharing Victoria's Secrets," in Forbes, 5 June 1995.
- Brady, Jennifer L., "Victoria's Secret Seamless Bra Sews Up Sales," in WWWD, 16 September 1996.
- Palmieri, Christopher, "Victoria's Little Secret," in Forbes, 24 August 1998.
- Moin, David, and Laura Kelpacki, "Victoria's Secret Puts Sex Appeal and Color into Cosmetics Line," in WWWD, 18 September 1998.
- Napoli, Lisa, "Bared-Bones Fashions, Fully Covered Publicity," in the International Herald Tribune, 11 February 1999.

Moin, David, and Pete Born, "IBI Giving Victoria's Secret Push Into Global Prominence," in WWWD, 29 September 1999.

"Victoria's Secret to Cosponsor AIDS Benefit," in WWWD, 9 February 2000.

Hickins, Michael, "Victoria's Secret Shifts Into Global Overdrive," in WWWD, 5 April 2000.

Klepaki, Laura, "Victoria's Secret Takes a Brave Step," in WWWD, 27 January 2001.

Born, Pete, "Victoria's Secret's New Interest: Guys," in WWWD, 12 October 2001.

"Victoria's Secret Launches Something Very Sexy for Him," in Cosmetics International, November 2001.

"FCC Fields Complaints About Victoria's Secret Show," in Adweek, 19 November 2001.

* * *

Victoria's Secret made buying lingerie not only a pleasure but a must in the late 1980s and 1990s. The upscale lingerie and apparel firm took shopping for lingerie from the neglected corners of department stores and put it front and center in thousands of boutiques throughout the United States. Both men and women happily flocked to the sensuous, sumptuously decorated shops and buying sexy innerwear was no longer a chore or embarrassing for either sex.

Victoria's Secret, spring 2002 collection. © AP/Wide World Photos.

Victoria's Secret, spring 2002 collection. © AP/Wide World Photos.

Men gladly accompanied their wives or lovers to Victoria's Secret, while women enjoyed finding a myriad of products in every size and shape imaginable. This was the experience Roy Raymond had in mind when he founded Victoria's Secret in 1977 in San Francisco. Loath to shop for lingerie or foundations for his wife in austere surroundings, Raymond envisioned an appealing shop with a stylish decor—somewhere with a Victorian-boudoir feel. The next year, Raymond took his lingerie fantasies a step further, creating a mail order catalogue to sell his growing selection of bras, panties, slips, and loungewear.

The response to the Victoria's Secret catalogue was immediate and stunning; Raymond's business mushroomed in size and scope yet he had problems meeting demand and running the mail order business. While there were rivals, such as Frederick's of Hollywood which sold many of the same products, Frederick's had a raunchy feel to its stores and looked more like an S&M supplier than intimate apparel retailer. In 1982, Raymond sold the company, which consisted of six faltering stores and its catalogue, for $4 million to Leslie Wexner, founder of The Limited women's apparel firm.

Throughout the remainder of the 1980s, the Victoria's Secret mystique grew and Wexner decided to add another lingerie maker to his fold, launching Cacique as a French counterpart to Victoria's faux English styling. While Cacique stores opened near or by Victoria's Secret stores in 1988 and 1989, the older sibling's catalogues had reached the pinnacle of popularity. The thick magazine-like editions became acceptable "girlie" material for men of all ages. Women awaited the arrival of catalogues almost as eagerly as men; soon the pages were crowded with not only intimate apparel but sportswear and accessories as well. Gone were the posed couples that had populated Raymond's catalogue, replaced by sexy, pouty, internationally known models. Being selected to pose for a Victoria's Secret catalogue became a much sought after job, a stepping stone to model superstardom.

In the early 1990s Victoria's Secret continued to broaden its product line with swimsuits (and a special swimwear catalogue reminiscent of the annual Sports Illustrated edition), simple, cotton panties—which suddenly made the old-fashioned underwear hip and must-have—and a bath and body line called Second Skin Satin Luxury Bath Collection. Next came the Miracle Bra in 1994, released months ahead of Warner's Wonderbra. The Limited, which had created a subsidiary called Intimate Brands to manage Victoria's Secret and its sister company, Bath & Body Works, spun the company off in 1995, retaining a majority stake when the firm went public.

Despite its similarity to its sibling, Cacique failed to gain the notoriety or clientèle of its much famed elder. Intimate Brands closed the chain in 1998, putting a new home furnishings concept into many of the stores called the White Barn Candle Company. Around the same time, Victoria's Secret introduced cosmetics into its stores and catalogue, setting the stage for Victoria's Secret Beauty, which began as in-store shops. The firm then joined the wave of the future by launching a company website. Although many retailers had websites for information, store locations, and to sell products, Victoria's Secret decided to broadcast its spring fashion show live via the Internet in early 1999. Servers were completely unprepared for the 1.5 million viewers who tried to log on; they were not only completely overwhelmed by the response but jammed for hours and eventually crashed due to the unexpected crush of web surfers.

In 1999 parent company Intimate Brands introduced additional cosmetics to Bath & Body Works and Victoria's Secret stores, and took the in-store Victoria's Beauty shops and started creating separate stores either adjacent to or near existing Victoria's Secret boutiques. Over the next two years, the company moved in several new directions. A men's fragrance collection, called Very Sexy for Him, was developed for a 2001 launch while the firm entered talks with Japan's Shiseido Company Ltd. to create a cosmetics line. Additionally, after the success of its website fashion show, Victoria's Secret raised the bar and took its spin on fashion to prime-time television. Its first-ever televised fashion show, aired by ABC in November, stirred controversy when concerned viewers complained to the Federal Communications Commission (FCC) about the "indecency" of the scantily clad models. Fortunately for Victoria's Secret, neither the FCC nor most of viewing public found the showing indecent. On the contrary, millions tuned in and enjoyed the provocative parade.

By 2002 there were about 2,300 Victoria's Secret boutiques in the U.S., and its racy and lacy catalogues were mailed to more than 350 million households annually. Its stores had become as much about attitude and indulgence as undergarment needs—women loved the sexy, ultrafeminine innerwear, and it made them feel sexy and beautiful regardless of their age, size, or inclination.

—Nelly Rhodes

VICTORIO Y LUCCHINO

Italian fashion design company

Founded: by José Luis Medina del Corral (born in 1954 in Seville) and José Victor Rodríguez Caro (born in 1952 in Cordoba); met in 1972, working for a Seville design group. Company History: Fragrances include Carmen, 1992, followed by V&L launch; introduced leather apparel and accessories; financial backing provided by the Puig family. Exhibitions: Sevilla Barroca, Museo de Ferrocarriles,

Victorio y Lucchino, spring 2001 collection. © AP/Wide World Photos.

Madrid, 1986; British Designers Fair, Olympia, London, 1987, 1988, 1989; Cibeles Fashion Show, Madrid, 1987–91; Festa de la moda, Barcelona, 1988; IGEDO, Dusseldorf, 1989, 1990; Mode Woche, Munich, 1990; Fashion Coterie, New York, 1990; Milanovende, Milan, 1991; Festival de Disenadores Hispanos, Washington, D.C. 1991; Expo 92; Hotel Ritz, Barcelona, 1992. Company Address: Padre Luis Mallop, 4 Casa Natal de Velazquez, 41004 Seville.

PUBLICATIONS

On VICTORIO Y LUCCHINO:

Articles

- “Victorio & Lucchino,” in Vanidad, No. 1, 1992.
- “Pasarela Cibeles: la moda esta de moda,” in ¡Hola!, 4 March 1993.
- “Victorio y Lucchino suspiran por Espana,” in El País (Madrid), 19 February 1994.
- Barker, Barbara, “Fashion’s Strain in Spain,” in WWD, 2 March 1995.
- Raper, Sarah, “A Younger Generation Takes Over at Puig,” in WWD, 19 June 1998.
- Corson, Alice, “Living la vida regalada,” in Soap, Perfumery & Cosmetics, May 2001.

* * *

Victorio y Lucchino is a Spanish design duo, combining the talents of the founding partners, José Victor Rodríguez Caro and José Luis Medina del Corral. Caro comes from Palma Del Rio in Córdoba and was born during the early 1950s. He was originally inspired by the Parisian designers of the decade who dominated the pages of Spanish fashion magazines. As a teenager, he worked as an assistant for several fashion companies, collaborating in the preparation of their collections.

Del Corral, also born in the 1950s, hails from Seville. From an early age he, too, felt that his vocation was to be in fashion design. After his studies, he began work with a Seville design company where Caro was also working and, after several months at the company, the pair decided to join forces and create their own line, “Victorio y Lucchino.”

The Victorio y Lucchino style is purely Spanish in origin; designs are particularly inspired by the spirit of Andalucia in the southern region of Spain where the team lives and work. The bright light creates very rich shadows, colors and textures, awakening the senses to the tastes, touches, and smells that stimulate exciting design. The visual imagery also inspires, like the religious rituals, such as the slaves of the Phoenician Goddess of Estarte as they bedeck her in heavy jewels amidst a haze of incense, myrrh and amber. The duo themselves have declared, “We create our fashions amid scents of geraniums, basil, and myrtle. Our influences are mixed and melted together to form ideas reminiscent of the streets, squares, and the river bejewelled with stars.”

Luscious opulence is reflected in the type of fabrics Victorio y Lucchino choose to work with—smooth velvets in burgundies, dark olive greens, and sunlit yellows and oranges; iridescent velvets reflecting the light and ribbed and striped velvets that shimmer; crinkled and bubbled organza, and organza with tone on tone marble effects; satin, and the luxurious effect of chenille, are other popular fabrics.

Sensual eveningwear is a favorite look. Bustiers with long, attached sleeves leaving shoulders revealed and lots of room for full viewing public found the showing indecent. On the contrary, millions tuned in and enjoyed the provocative parade.

By 2002 there were about 2,300 Victoria's Secret boutiques in the U.S., and its racy and lacy catalogues were mailed to more than 350 million households annually. Its stores had become as much about attitude and indulgence as undergarment needs—women loved the sexy, ultrafeminine innerwear, and it made them feel sexy and beautiful regardless of their age, size, or inclination.

—Nelly Rhodes

VICTORIO Y LUCCHINO

Italian fashion design company

Founded: by José Luis Medina del Corral (born in 1954 in Seville) and José Victor Rodríguez Caro (born in 1952 in Cordoba); met in 1972, working for a Seville design group. Company History: Fragrances include Carmen, 1992, followed by V&L launch; introduced leather apparel and accessories; financial backing provided by the Puig family. Exhibitions: Sevilla Barroca, Museo de Ferrocarriles,

Victorio y Lucchino, spring 2001 collection. © AP/Wide World Photos.

Madrid, 1986; British Designers Fair, Olympia, London, 1987, 1988, 1989; Cibeles Fashion Show, Madrid, 1987–91; Festa de la moda, Barcelona, 1988; IGEDO, Dusseldorf, 1989, 1990; Mode Woche, Munich, 1990; Fashion Coterie, New York, 1990; Milanovende, Milan, 1991; Festival de Disenadores Hispanos, Washington, D.C. 1991; Expo 92; Hotel Ritz, Barcelona, 1992. Company Address: Padre Luis Mallop, 4 Casa Natal de Velazquez, 41004 Seville.

PUBLICATIONS

On VICTORIO Y LUCCHINO:

Articles

- “Victorio & Lucchino,” in Vanidad, No. 1, 1992.
- “Pasarela Cibeles: la moda esta de moda,” in ¡Hola!, 4 March 1993.
- “Victorio y Lucchino suspiran por Espana,” in El País (Madrid), 19 February 1994.
- Barker, Barbara, “Fashion’s Strain in Spain,” in WWD, 2 March 1995.
- Raper, Sarah, “A Younger Generation Takes Over at Puig,” in WWD, 19 June 1998.
- Corson, Alice, “Living la vida regalada,” in Soap, Perfumery & Cosmetics, May 2001.

* * *

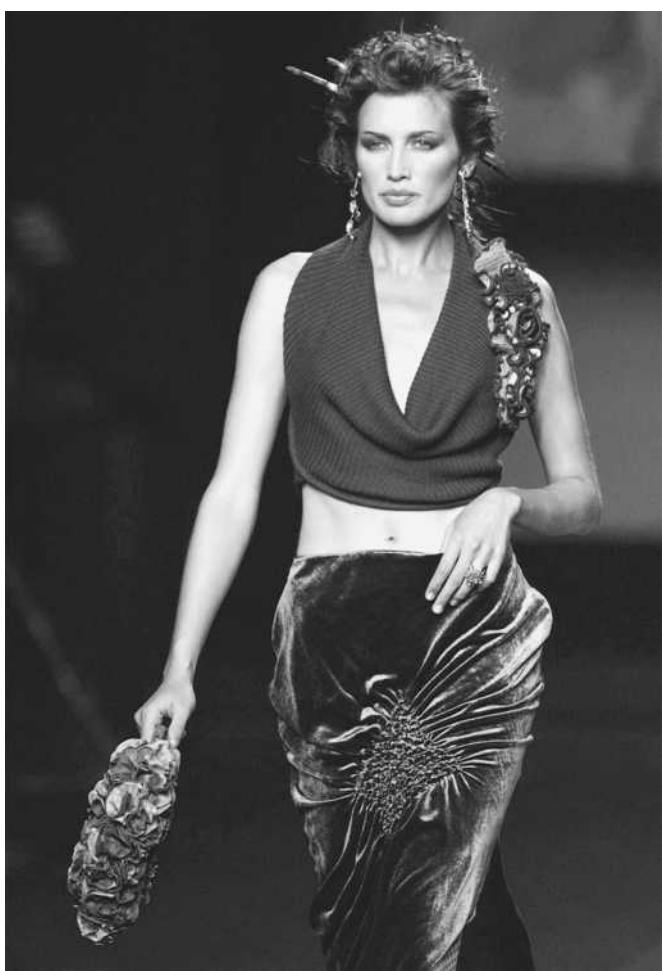

Victorio y Lucchino is a Spanish design duo, combining the talents of the founding partners, José Victor Rodríguez Caro and José Luis Medina del Corral. Caro comes from Palma Del Rio in Córdoba and was born during the early 1950s. He was originally inspired by the Parisian designers of the decade who dominated the pages of Spanish fashion magazines. As a teenager, he worked as an assistant for several fashion companies, collaborating in the preparation of their collections.

Del Corral, also born in the 1950s, hails from Seville. From an early age he, too, felt that his vocation was to be in fashion design. After his studies, he began work with a Seville design company where Caro was also working and, after several months at the company, the pair decided to join forces and create their own line, “Victorio y Lucchino.”

The Victorio y Lucchino style is purely Spanish in origin; designs are particularly inspired by the spirit of Andalucia in the southern region of Spain where the team lives and work. The bright light creates very rich shadows, colors and textures, awakening the senses to the tastes, touches, and smells that stimulate exciting design. The visual imagery also inspires, like the religious rituals, such as the slaves of the Phoenician Goddess of Estarte as they bedeck her in heavy jewels amidst a haze of incense, myrrh and amber. The duo themselves have declared, “We create our fashions amid scents of geraniums, basil, and myrtle. Our influences are mixed and melted together to form ideas reminiscent of the streets, squares, and the river bejewelled with stars.”

Luscious opulence is reflected in the type of fabrics Victorio y Lucchino choose to work with—smooth velvets in burgundies, dark olive greens, and sunlit yellows and oranges; iridescent velvets reflecting the light and ribbed and striped velvets that shimmer; crinkled and bubbled organza, and organza with tone on tone marble effects; satin, and the luxurious effect of chenille, are other popular fabrics.

Sensual eveningwear is a favorite look. Bustiers with long, attached sleeves leaving shoulders revealed and lots of room for full straps. Clingy, sculpted dresses and lily-shaped jackets are other popular innovations. The Victorio y Lucchino woman is calm, deep, and sensual; she is dressed to make an impact on a Spanish balcony or on the street. It is an outdoor, Mediterranean glamour, born of a bright and orange-scented afternoon.

Victorio y Lucchino, fall 2001 collection: velvet skirt and top.
© AFP/CORBIS.

The nationalistic flavor of Victorio y Lucchino collections is enhanced by recurring themes plucked from Spanish culture. Ranges have been christened with titles such as Spanish Barroca, The Comb and Manstilla, Carmen, and Vestales Hispalenses. In 1992 the design duo even launched a fragrance called Carmen, paying homage to Bizet's famous opera and his fiery heroine.

The Victorio y Lucchino design label has points of sale in Europe, Hong Kong, Japan, Kuwait, and the United States. Shows are seasonal, at the Cibeles fashion show in Madrid as well as other popular international trade shows, such as the Fashion Coterie in New York and Milanovendemoda in Milan. The design team has their own shop in Seville, and with financial backing from the Puig beauty and fashion empire, was able to expand in several directions. New in the middle and late 1990s were leather separates and matching accessories, another fragrance, V&L, and an increased presence in Asia, primarily in Hong Kong.

—Kevin Almond

VIKTOR & ROLF

Dutch designers

Born: (both Viktor and Rolf) Netherlands, 1969. Education: Both graduated from the Academia of Amhem, 1992. Company History: Created first collection, 1993; created second collection, 1994; "Winter of Love" presented at the Musée d'Art Moderne de la Ville de Paris, 1994; third collection, 1994; created photographic collection, 1995; clothing exhibition in art gallery, 1995; created the Prêt-à-Porter Catalogue, 1995; launched Viktor & Rolf Le Parfum, 1996; Torch Gallery installation, Amsterdam, 1996; continued developing fashion trends as art exhibitions; collection exhibited in Groninger Museum, 1998; designs turned more towards ready-to-wear, 2000. Awards: International Festival of Hyeres, 1993; ANDAM, 1994. Exhibitions: Visionaire Gallery, SoHo, 1999; Groninger Museum, Netherlands, 2001.

PUBLICATIONS

On VIKTOR & ROLF:

Books

Horsting, Viktor, Viktor & Rolf, Artimo Foundation, Amsterdam, 1999.

Articles

Martin, Richard, "Viktor & Rolf: Le Regard Noir," in N-28, 1997. Goldberg, Rose Lee, "Claude Wampler [Performance Art]," Artforum, September 1997.

Phillips, Ian, "Fashion: 21st Century Boys Meet Viktor & Rolf," in Newspaper Publishing PLC, 3 October 1998.

Horyn, Cathy, "Two Dutch Designers Take Couture to the Surreal Side," in the New York Times, 1 June 1999.

—, "Is There Room for Fashion at the Paris Haute Couture Shows?" in the New York Times, 25 July 1999.

Bell, Katy, "Amsterdammer Anarchy: Viktor & Rolf are Mad as Hell and They're Not Going to Wear It Anymore," in Metro Active, January 2000.

Socha, Miles, "Christmas Comes Early at Viktor & Rolf Exhibit," in WWD, Groningen, Netherlands, 10 November 2000.

Bellafante, Ginia, "This is Paris: No Giggling, Please," in the New York Times, 21 March 2001.

Wilson, Eric, "Viktor & Rolf to ICV," in Women's Wear Daily, 5 September 2001.

* * *

Viktor Horsting and Rolf Snoeren, more commonly known as Viktor & Rolf—purveyors of elaborate style and exotic design, are as much known for their works of art as they are for fashion. They sculpt their designs by distorting proportions—creating high collars and elaborate draping to hide the body, making it seemingly vanish into the sculpture. Always adding to the fabrics, Viktor & Rolf often use ornamentation that mocks accessories, including Christmas trees balls, colorful tinsel garlands, and pleated Pierrot collars. This is a clear indication of their reputation to shock and challenge fashion and remain with the forerunners of originality. Their creation of the unusual "atomic bomb," for example, was a shrewd combination of straps. Clingy, sculpted dresses and lily-shaped jackets are other popular innovations. The Victorio y Lucchino woman is calm, deep, and sensual; she is dressed to make an impact on a Spanish balcony or on the street. It is an outdoor, Mediterranean glamour, born of a bright and orange-scented afternoon.

Victorio y Lucchino, fall 2001 collection: velvet skirt and top.
© AFP/CORBIS.

The nationalistic flavor of Victorio y Lucchino collections is enhanced by recurring themes plucked from Spanish culture. Ranges have been christened with titles such as Spanish Barroca, The Comb and Manstilla, Carmen, and Vestales Hispalenses. In 1992 the design duo even launched a fragrance called Carmen, paying homage to Bizet's famous opera and his fiery heroine.

The Victorio y Lucchino design label has points of sale in Europe, Hong Kong, Japan, Kuwait, and the United States. Shows are seasonal, at the Cibeles fashion show in Madrid as well as other popular international trade shows, such as the Fashion Coterie in New York and Milanovendemoda in Milan. The design team has their own shop in Seville, and with financial backing from the Puig beauty and fashion empire, was able to expand in several directions. New in the middle and late 1990s were leather separates and matching accessories, another fragrance, V&L, and an increased presence in Asia, primarily in Hong Kong.

—Kevin Almond

VIKTOR & ROLF

Dutch designers

Born: (both Viktor and Rolf) Netherlands, 1969. Education: Both graduated from the Academia of Amhem, 1992. Company History: Created first collection, 1993; created second collection, 1994; "Winter of Love" presented at the Musée d'Art Moderne de la Ville de Paris, 1994; third collection, 1994; created photographic collection, 1995; clothing exhibition in art gallery, 1995; created the Prêt-à-Porter Catalogue, 1995; launched Viktor & Rolf Le Parfum, 1996; Torch Gallery installation, Amsterdam, 1996; continued developing fashion trends as art exhibitions; collection exhibited in Groninger Museum, 1998; designs turned more towards ready-to-wear, 2000. Awards: International Festival of Hyeres, 1993; ANDAM, 1994. Exhibitions: Visionaire Gallery, SoHo, 1999; Groninger Museum, Netherlands, 2001.

PUBLICATIONS

On VIKTOR & ROLF:

Books

Horsting, Viktor, Viktor & Rolf, Artimo Foundation, Amsterdam, 1999.

Articles

Martin, Richard, "Viktor & Rolf: Le Regard Noir," in N-28, 1997. Goldberg, Rose Lee, "Claude Wampler [Performance Art]," Artforum, September 1997.

Phillips, Ian, "Fashion: 21st Century Boys Meet Viktor & Rolf," in Newspaper Publishing PLC, 3 October 1998.

Horyn, Cathy, "Two Dutch Designers Take Couture to the Surreal Side," in the New York Times, 1 June 1999.

—, "Is There Room for Fashion at the Paris Haute Couture Shows?" in the New York Times, 25 July 1999.

Bell, Katy, "Amsterdammer Anarchy: Viktor & Rolf are Mad as Hell and They're Not Going to Wear It Anymore," in Metro Active, January 2000.

Socha, Miles, "Christmas Comes Early at Viktor & Rolf Exhibit," in WWD, Groningen, Netherlands, 10 November 2000.

Bellafante, Ginia, "This is Paris: No Giggling, Please," in the New York Times, 21 March 2001.

Wilson, Eric, "Viktor & Rolf to ICV," in Women's Wear Daily, 5 September 2001.

* * *

Viktor Horsting and Rolf Snoeren, more commonly known as Viktor & Rolf—purveyors of elaborate style and exotic design, are as much known for their works of art as they are for fashion. They sculpt their designs by distorting proportions—creating high collars and elaborate draping to hide the body, making it seemingly vanish into the sculpture. Always adding to the fabrics, Viktor & Rolf often use ornamentation that mocks accessories, including Christmas trees balls, colorful tinsel garlands, and pleated Pierrot collars. This is a clear indication of their reputation to shock and challenge fashion and remain with the forerunners of originality. Their creation of the unusual "atomic bomb," for example, was a shrewd combination of extreme fashion and art. The costume had the model's head resting on top of a huge mushroom form, a chiffon blouse inflated with brightly colored balloons, jackets with neon mink dots, and a black-and-white collection shown under scant neon light in a dark room. "Fashion doesn't hold a big value with Dutch people," Snoeren commented to the New York Times' Cathy Horyn. "In Holland," Horsting continued, "the mentality is you're not supposed to want to stand out. We made our collections to be noticed, but it was also a reaction."

Viktor & Rolf, fall/winter 2000–01 haute couture collection: pants with bells sown down the sides and matching bell-covered jacket.
© AP/Wide World Photos.

Adhering to their reputation to intrigue and fascinate, Viktor & Rolf created Le parfum to awaken the fashion industry's senses with a perfume that provided no scent. The 250 limited edition bottles of Le parfum were never meant to be opened; another step clearly meant to integrate fashion as an art form.

Viktor & Rolf's first clothing collection was shown at a competition called Salon European des Jeunes Stylistes in 1993. The collection was comprised of preexisting pieces of garments blended into a collage, to create new clothing. In 1994 Viktor & Rolf created two collections, the first consisting of several variations of a white dress, most of which were high-waisted and long, like ballgowns, but there were also shirts blown up with balloons and confetti, giving the presentation a satirical bent. The other collection revolved around the aptly named "Black Square Dress," with squared-off shoulders to create an illusion of abstract art.

In 1995 their collection appeared at the Galerie Patricia Dorfmann in Paris, and consisted of five suspended gold garments of several different silhouettes. Next came the "Shadowdress," a dark, opaque dress which was a three-dimensional form of the pieces from the collection. Tracing back history, the "Shadow Cape" of 1996 featured the strong silhouette of an 1890s torso but in light, silk fabric. Softness and versatility were behind the addition of a grey bodysuit and supple white dress added to the collection.

Viktor & Rolf have proven that fashion and art can be interchangeable, and the Groninger Museum recognized their efforts in 1998. A permanent collection of 28 pieces from five collections exhibited fashion as an art form. The apparel, eerily exhibited on mannequins in a dark room, were illuminated as lights hit their rotating platforms. In January 1999, the designing duo created a black and white collection with firm skirts and poofy ruffs. Presentation of the collection involved ultraviolet lights so every white object glowed. Three of the 17 outfits from this collection were put on display at the trendy Visionaire art gallery and publishing house in SoHo, where fellow designers Diane von Furstenberg and Ronald van der Kemp were in attendance, along with a variety of celebrities. In a July 1999 show, the designers presented a collection by placing their model atop a revolving turntable. Dressed in a silk minidress, additional clothing was placed on the model by the designers with every revolution of the platform. By the ninth rotation, she was seemingly engulfed in Viktor & Rolf's designs—and so was the audience. Horyn decreed the show, "the most brilliant of the week."

With their reputation as fashion designers and artists, Viktor & Rolf have recently segued more into ready-to-wear collections, yet without detracting from their reputations as designers of art. Their first ready-to-wear collection, in collaboration with Gibo SpA, was launched in 2000; the lines was more wearable and functional, like jeans, ruffled shirts, and sexy pantsuits, which exhibited the designers' fondness for masculine styling for women. Yet the most popular portion of the spring collection was a stars-and-stripes motif, on jackets and shirts, inspired by the song "American Pie" by Don McLean. Several upscale retailer, including Barneys New York, placed orders.

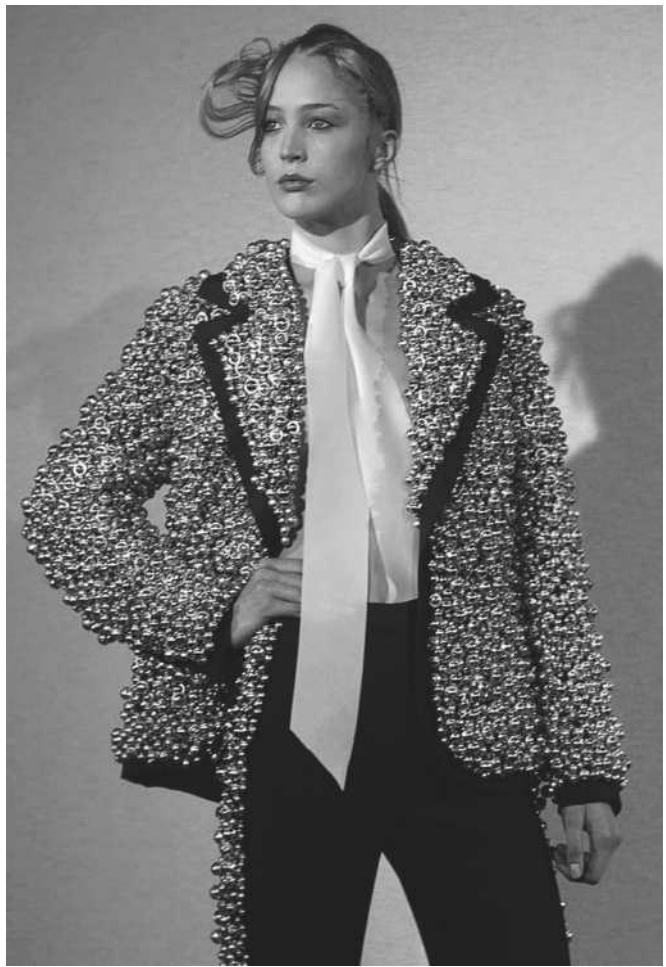

A spring 2001 collection at the famed Louvre museum featured American classics, especially old Hollywood, and the styles from the glory days of the 1920s, 1930s, and 1940s—as modernized by Viktor & Rolf. The new line included fluid cabaret trouser suits, variations on the basic white shirt, trench coats, swinging skirts, and tap shorts. Silver seemed to be the hot accessory of the season, with metallic flashes seen on tops, shirt collars, pants, and even tuxedos. Always paying close attention to bringing art into fashion, Viktor & Rolf ended a 2000 fashion show by tap-dancing together in white tuxedos.

—Kimbally A. Medeiros

VIONNET, Madeleine

French designer

Born: Chilleurs-aux-Bois, 22 June 1876. Family: Married in 1893 (divorced, 1894); one child (died); married Dmitri Netchvolodov, 1925 (divorced, 1955). Career: Dressmaker's apprentice, Aubervilliers, 1888–93; dressmaker, House of Vincent, Paris, 1893–95; cutter, then

Viktor & Rolf, fall/winter 2000–01 haute couture collection: pants with bells sown down the sides and matching bell-covered jacket.
© AP/Wide World Photos.

extreme fashion and art. The costume had the model's head resting on top of a huge mushroom form, a chiffon blouse inflated with brightly colored balloons, jackets with neon mink dots, and a black-and-white collection shown under scant neon light in a dark room. "Fashion doesn't hold a big value with Dutch people," Snoeren commented to the New York Times' Cathy Horyn. "In Holland," Horsting continued, "the mentality is you're not supposed to want to stand out. We made our collections to be noticed, but it was also a reaction."

Adhering to their reputation to intrigue and fascinate, Viktor & Rolf created Le parfum to awaken the fashion industry's senses with a perfume that provided no scent. The 250 limited edition bottles of Le parfum were never meant to be opened; another step clearly meant to integrate fashion as an art form.

Viktor & Rolf's first clothing collection was shown at a competition called Salon European des Jeunes Stylistes in 1993. The collection was comprised of preexisting pieces of garments blended into a collage, to create new clothing. In 1994 Viktor & Rolf created two collections, the first consisting of several variations of a white dress, most of which were high-waisted and long, like ballgowns, but there were also shirts blown up with balloons and confetti, giving the presentation a satirical bent. The other collection revolved around the aptly named "Black Square Dress," with squared-off shoulders to create an illusion of abstract art.

In 1995 their collection appeared at the Galerie Patricia Dorfmann in Paris, and consisted of five suspended gold garments of several different silhouettes. Next came the "Shadowdress," a dark, opaque dress which was a three-dimensional form of the pieces from the collection. Tracing back history, the "Shadow Cape" of 1996 featured the strong silhouette of an 1890s torso but in light, silk fabric. Softness and versatility were behind the addition of a grey bodysuit and supple white dress added to the collection.

Viktor & Rolf have proven that fashion and art can be interchangeable, and the Groninger Museum recognized their efforts in 1998. A permanent collection of 28 pieces from five collections exhibited fashion as an art form. The apparel, eerily exhibited on mannequins in a dark room, were illuminated as lights hit their rotating platforms. In January 1999, the designing duo created a black and white collection with firm skirts and poofy ruffs. Presentation of the collection involved ultraviolet lights so every white object glowed. Three of the 17 outfits from this collection were put on display at the trendy Visionaire art gallery and publishing house in SoHo, where fellow designers Diane von Furstenberg and Ronald van der Kemp were in attendance, along with a variety of celebrities. In a July 1999 show, the designers presented a collection by placing their model atop a revolving turntable. Dressed in a silk minidress, additional clothing was placed on the model by the designers with every revolution of the platform. By the ninth rotation, she was seemingly engulfed in Viktor & Rolf's designs—and so was the audience. Horyn decreed the show, "the most brilliant of the week."

With their reputation as fashion designers and artists, Viktor & Rolf have recently segued more into ready-to-wear collections, yet without detracting from their reputations as designers of art. Their first ready-to-wear collection, in collaboration with Gibo SpA, was launched in 2000; the lines was more wearable and functional, like jeans, ruffled shirts, and sexy pantsuits, which exhibited the designers' fondness for masculine styling for women. Yet the most popular portion of the spring collection was a stars-and-stripes motif, on jackets and shirts, inspired by the song "American Pie" by Don McLean. Several upscale retailer, including Barneys New York, placed orders.

A spring 2001 collection at the famed Louvre museum featured American classics, especially old Hollywood, and the styles from the glory days of the 1920s, 1930s, and 1940s—as modernized by Viktor & Rolf. The new line included fluid cabaret trouser suits, variations on the basic white shirt, trench coats, swinging skirts, and tap shorts. Silver seemed to be the hot accessory of the season, with metallic flashes seen on tops, shirt collars, pants, and even tuxedos. Always paying close attention to bringing art into fashion, Viktor & Rolf ended a 2000 fashion show by tap-dancing together in white tuxedos.

—Kimbally A. Medeiros

VIONNET, Madeleine

French designer

Born: Chilleurs-aux-Bois, 22 June 1876. Family: Married in 1893 (divorced, 1894); one child (died); married Dmitri Netchvolodov, 1925 (divorced, 1955). Career: Dressmaker's apprentice, Aubervilliers, 1888–93; dressmaker, House of Vincent, Paris, 1893–95; cutter, then head of workroom, Kate Reilly, London, 1895–1900; saleswoman, Bechoff David, Paris, 1900–01; head of studios under Marie Gerber, Callot Soeurs, Paris, 1901–05; designer, Doucet, 1905–11; designer, Maison Vionnet, 1912–14, 1919–39; retired, 1940. Awards: Légion d'Honneur, 1929. Exhibitions: Three Women: Madeleine Vionnet, Claire McCardell and Rei Kawakubo, Fashion Institute of Technology, New York, 1987; Madeleine Vionnet, 1876–1975—l'art de la couture: Centre de la Vieille Charité, retrospective, Musée de Marseille, 1991; Madeleine Vionnet—les années d'innovation: 1919–1939, exposition, Musée historique des tissus de Lyon, 1994. Died: 2 March 1975, in Paris.

Viktor & Rolf, fall/winter 1998–99 haute couture collection: wool suit over puffed shirt. © AP/Wide World Photos.

PUBLICATIONS

On VIONNET:

Books

- Latour, Anny, Kings of Fashion, London, 1958.
Milbank, Caroline Rennolds, Couture: The Great Designers, New York, 1985.

- Koda, Harold, Richard Martin, and Laura Sinderbrand, Three Women: Madeleine Vionnet, Claire McCardell, and Rei Kawakubo [exhibition catalogue], New York, 1987.
Demornex, Jacqueline, Madeleine Vionnet, Paris, 1989.
Madeleine Vionnet, 1876–1975—l'art de la couture: Centre de la Vieille Charité, [exhibition catalogue], Marseille, 1991.
Kirke, Betty, Vionnet, Tokyo & San Francisco, 1991, 1998.
Steele, Valerie, Women of Fashion: Twentieth Century Designers, New York, 1991.
Alaïa, Azzedine, Madeleine Vionnet [exhibition catalogue], Marseille, 1991.
Madeleine Vionnet—les années d'innovation: 1919–1939, [exposition catalogue], Lyon, 1994.
Kamitsis, Lydia, Madeleine Vionnet, London & Paris, 1996.
Stegemeyer, Anne, Who's Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.

Articles

- Chatwin, Bruce, "Surviving in Style," in the Sunday Times Magazine (London), 4 March 1973 (later republished as "Madeleine Vionnet" in his book, What Am I Doing Here?, London, 1989).
"Madeleine Vionnet, A Revolution in Dressmaking," in The Times (London), 6 March 1975.
Imatake, S., "Inventive Clothes 1909–39," in Idea (Concord, New Hampshire), September 1975.
Morris, Bernadine, "Three Who Redirected Fashion," in the New York Times, 24 February 1987.
_____, "A New York Exhibition Traces the Evolution of Modern Fashion in the Designs of Vionnet, McCardell and Kawakubo," in the Chicago Tribune, 11 March 1987.
Smith, Roberta, "Three Women at the Fashion Institute of Technology," in the New York Times, 13 March 1987.
Weinstein, Jeff, "Vionnet, McCardell, Kawakubo: Why There are Three Great Women Artists," in the Village Voice, 31 March 1987.
Drier, Deborah, "Designing Women," in Art in America (New York), May 1987.
Kirke, Betty, "A Dressmaker Extrordinaire," in Threads (Newtown, Connecticut), February/March 1989.
Dryansky, G.Y., "Madeleine Vionnet: The Modest Charms of a Farmhouse in Cely-en-Biere," in Architectural Digest, October 1994.
McColl, Patricia, "Madeleine Vionnet: A Youth Movement for the Venerable Couturiere," in WWD, 13 September 1999.
Loyer, Michelle, "The Sleeping Beauties of Fashion are Waking," in the International Herald Tribune, 11 October 2000.

* * *

Madeleine Vionnet's inexorable synergy is the body of her extraordinary dresses. Her draping on the bias gave stretch to the fabric, a fully three-dimensional and even gyroscopic geometry to the garment, and a fluid dynamic of the body in motion as radical as cubism and futurism in their panoramas on the body. Her work inevitably prompts the analogy to sculpture in its palpable revelation of the form within. Some accused Vionnet of a shocking déshabillé, but Vionnet was seeking only the awareness of volume. Bruce Chatwin, writing in the Sunday Times Magazine in March 1973, commented, "No one knew better how to drape a torso in the round. She handled fabric as a master sculptor realizes the possibilities latent in a marble block; and like a sculptor too she understood the subtle beauty of the female body in motion and that graceful movements were enhanced by asymmetry of cut."

The only rigidity ever associated with Vionnet was her definite sense of self: she closed her couture house in 1939, although she lived until 1975. She lamented the work of other designers and disdained much that occurred in fashion as unprincipled and unworthy; she was a true believer in the modern, scorning unnecessary adornment, seeking structural principles, demanding plain perfection. Fernand Léger said that one of the finest things to see in Paris was Vionnet cutting. He used to go there when he felt depleted in his own work.

Vionnet draped on a reduced-scale mannequin. There she played her cloth in the enhanced elasticity of its diagonal bias to create the garment. In creating the idea in miniature, Vionnet may have surpassed any sense of weight of the fabric and achieved her ideal and effortless rotation around the body in a most logical way. When the same garments achieved human proportion—their sheerness, the avoidance of decorative complication, the absence of planes front and back, and the supple elegance of fabric that caresses the body in a continuous peregrination—were distinctly Vionnet.

While bias cut was quickly emulated in the Paris couture, Vionnet's concepts of draping were not pursued only by Claire McCardell (who bought Vionnets to study their technique) before World War II, but by Geoffrey Beene, Halston, and other Americans in the 1960s and 1970s, Azzedine Alaïa in France, and Japanese designers Issey Miyake and Rei Kawakubo in the 1970s and 1980s. Mikaye and Kawakubo were alerted to Vionnet by her strong presence in The 10s, 20s, 30s exhibition organized by Diana Vreeland for the Costume Institute of the Metropolitan Museum of Art in 1973 and 1974.

One of Vionnet's most-quoted aphorisms is "when a woman smiles, her dress must smile with her." By making the dress dependent on the form of the wearer rather than an armature of its own, Vionnet assured the indivisibility of the woman and the garment. It is as if she created a skin or a shell rather than the independent form of a dress. Like many designers of her time, Vionnet's external references were chiefly to classical art and her dresses could resemble the wet drapery of classical statues and their cling and crêpey volutes of drapery.

At Doucet, she had discarded the layer of the underdress. In her own work, Vionnet eliminated interfacing in order to keep silhouette and fabric pliant; she brought the vocabulary of lingerie to the surface in her détente of all structure; she avoided any intrusion into fabric that could be avoided. Darts are generally eliminated. In a characteristic example, her "honeycomb dress," all structure resided in the manipulation of fabric to create the honeycomb, a pattern that emanates the silhouette. Elsewhere, fagoting and drawnwork displaced the need for darts or other impositions and employed a decorative field to generate the desired form of the garment. The fluidity of cowl neckline, the chiffon handkerchief dress, and hemstitched blouse were trademarks and soft symbols of a virtuoso designer.

In insisting on the presence of a body and on celebrating the body within clothing, Vionnet was an early-century original in the manner of Diaghilev, Isadora Duncan, and Picasso. But there is also a deeply hermetic aspect to Vionnet who remained, despite the prodigious research revelations of Betty Kirke, a designer's designer, so subtle were the secrets of her composition, despite the outright drama of being one of the most revolutionary and important fashion designers.

At the end of the 20th century, Vionnet's name was revived and once again adorning fashion. After the label was acquired in 1994, scarves and fragrances tested the waters for a full revival of the Vionnet name. A new boutique on the rue Montaigne, where Vionnet's own house used to reside, was planned as well as ready-to-wear and couture lines.

—Richard Martin

VITTADINI, Adrienne

American designer

Born: Adrienne Toth, in Budapest, Hungary, 1944; immigrated to the U.S., 1956. Education: Studied at the Moore College of Art, Philadelphia, 1962–66; received academic scholarship to apprentice with Louis Féraud, Paris, 1965. Family: Married Gianluigi Vittadini, 1972. Career: Designer, Sport Tempo, New York, 1967; designer, SW1 line for Rosanna division, Warnaco, New York, 1968–71; designer, Adrienne Vittadini collection for Avanzara division, Kimberly Knits, New York, 1976–79; with partner Victor Coopersmith, established own firm, AVVC, 1979, bought out partner, renamed company Adrienne Vittadini, 1982; designed swimsuits for Cole of California, 1984–93; formed Vopco Inc., franchising company, New York, 1987; first boutique opened, Beverly Hills, California, 1987; returned to swimwear designs with O.A.S. Industries, 1994; launched first fragrance, AV, 1995; introduced AV Options line (later renamed Vittadini), 1996; sold to Marisa Christina Inc. and closed Beverly Hills store, 1996; announced bath and body collection for 1997; Vittadini and husband resigned from business, 1998; launched new fragrance, Adrienne Vittadini, 1999; firm sold to de V&P Inc., 1999; de V&P went bankrupt, 2000; Vittadini brand bought by Casual Corner Group, 2001. Awards: Coty American Fashion Critics award, 1984.

PUBLICATIONS

On VITTADINI:

Books

- Milbank, Caroline Rennolds, New York Fashion: The Evolution of American Style, New York, 1989.
- Daria, Irene, The Fashion Cycle: A Behind-the-Scenes Look at a Year with Bill Blass, Liz Claiborne, Donna Karan, Arnold Scaasi, and Adrienne Vittadini, New York, 1990.
- Stegemeyer, Anne, Who's Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.
- Malcolm, Trisha, Designer Knits, New York, 1998.

Articles

- Conant, Jennet, "Sweaters for the Self Assured," in Newsweek, 3 February 1986.
- Boyes, Kathleen, "Adrienne Vittadini: From Aesthetics to Reality," in WWD, 25 January 1988.
- Schiros, Anne-Marie, "Adrienne Vittadini: From Sweaters to an Empire," in the New York Times, 19 July 1988.
- Patrini, Anita, "A Magic Moment for Adrienne," in Donna (Milan), November 1989.
- White, Constance C.R., "Adrienne Vittadini: The Power of Knits," in WWD, 7 August 1991.

master sculptor realizes the possibilities latent in a marble block; and like a sculptor too she understood the subtle beauty of the female body in motion and that graceful movements were enhanced by asymmetry of cut."

The only rigidity ever associated with Vionnet was her definite sense of self: she closed her couture house in 1939, although she lived until 1975. She lamented the work of other designers and disdained much that occurred in fashion as unprincipled and unworthy; she was a true believer in the modern, scorning unnecessary adornment, seeking structural principles, demanding plain perfection. Fernand Léger said that one of the finest things to see in Paris was Vionnet cutting. He used to go there when he felt depleted in his own work.

Vionnet draped on a reduced-scale mannequin. There she played her cloth in the enhanced elasticity of its diagonal bias to create the garment. In creating the idea in miniature, Vionnet may have surpassed any sense of weight of the fabric and achieved her ideal and effortless rotation around the body in a most logical way. When the same garments achieved human proportion—their sheerness, the avoidance of decorative complication, the absence of planes front and back, and the supple elegance of fabric that caresses the body in a continuous peregrination—were distinctly Vionnet.

While bias cut was quickly emulated in the Paris couture, Vionnet's concepts of draping were not pursued only by Claire McCardell (who bought Vionnets to study their technique) before World War II, but by Geoffrey Beene, Halston, and other Americans in the 1960s and 1970s, Azzedine Alaïa in France, and Japanese designers Issey Miyake and Rei Kawakubo in the 1970s and 1980s. Mikaye and Kawakubo were alerted to Vionnet by her strong presence in The 10s, 20s, 30s exhibition organized by Diana Vreeland for the Costume Institute of the Metropolitan Museum of Art in 1973 and 1974.

One of Vionnet's most-quoted aphorisms is "when a woman smiles, her dress must smile with her." By making the dress dependent on the form of the wearer rather than an armature of its own, Vionnet assured the indivisibility of the woman and the garment. It is as if she created a skin or a shell rather than the independent form of a dress. Like many designers of her time, Vionnet's external references were chiefly to classical art and her dresses could resemble the wet drapery of classical statues and their cling and crêpey volutes of drapery.

At Doucet, she had discarded the layer of the underdress. In her own work, Vionnet eliminated interfacing in order to keep silhouette and fabric pliant; she brought the vocabulary of lingerie to the surface in her détente of all structure; she avoided any intrusion into fabric that could be avoided. Darts are generally eliminated. In a characteristic example, her "honeycomb dress," all structure resided in the manipulation of fabric to create the honeycomb, a pattern that emanates the silhouette. Elsewhere, fagoting and drawnwork displaced the need for darts or other impositions and employed a decorative field to generate the desired form of the garment. The fluidity of cowl neckline, the chiffon handkerchief dress, and hemstitched blouse were trademarks and soft symbols of a virtuoso designer.

In insisting on the presence of a body and on celebrating the body within clothing, Vionnet was an early-century original in the manner of Diaghilev, Isadora Duncan, and Picasso. But there is also a deeply hermetic aspect to Vionnet who remained, despite the prodigious research revelations of Betty Kirke, a designer's designer, so subtle were the secrets of her composition, despite the outright drama of being one of the most revolutionary and important fashion designers.

At the end of the 20th century, Vionnet's name was revived and once again adorning fashion. After the label was acquired in 1994, scarves and fragrances tested the waters for a full revival of the Vionnet name. A new boutique on the rue Montaigne, where Vionnet's own house used to reside, was planned as well as ready-to-wear and couture lines.

—Richard Martin

VITTADINI, Adrienne

American designer

Born: Adrienne Toth, in Budapest, Hungary, 1944; immigrated to the U.S., 1956. Education: Studied at the Moore College of Art, Philadelphia, 1962–66; received academic scholarship to apprentice with Louis Féraud, Paris, 1965. Family: Married Gianluigi Vittadini, 1972. Career: Designer, Sport Tempo, New York, 1967; designer, SW1 line for Rosanna division, Warnaco, New York, 1968–71; designer, Adrienne Vittadini collection for Avanzara division, Kimberly Knits, New York, 1976–79; with partner Victor Coopersmith, established own firm, AVVC, 1979, bought out partner, renamed company Adrienne Vittadini, 1982; designed swimsuits for Cole of California, 1984–93; formed Vopco Inc., franchising company, New York, 1987; first boutique opened, Beverly Hills, California, 1987; returned to swimwear designs with O.A.S. Industries, 1994; launched first fragrance, AV, 1995; introduced AV Options line (later renamed Vittadini), 1996; sold to Marisa Christina Inc. and closed Beverly Hills store, 1996; announced bath and body collection for 1997; Vittadini and husband resigned from business, 1998; launched new fragrance, Adrienne Vittadini, 1999; firm sold to de V&P Inc., 1999; de V&P went bankrupt, 2000; Vittadini brand bought by Casual Corner Group, 2001. Awards: Coty American Fashion Critics award, 1984.

PUBLICATIONS

On VITTADINI:

Books

- Milbank, Caroline Rennolds, New York Fashion: The Evolution of American Style, New York, 1989.
- Daria, Irene, The Fashion Cycle: A Behind-the-Scenes Look at a Year with Bill Blass, Liz Claiborne, Donna Karan, Arnold Scaasi, and Adrienne Vittadini, New York, 1990.
- Stegemeyer, Anne, Who's Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.
- Malcolm, Trisha, Designer Knits, New York, 1998.

Articles

- Conant, Jennet, "Sweaters for the Self Assured," in Newsweek, 3 February 1986.
- Boyes, Kathleen, "Adrienne Vittadini: From Aesthetics to Reality," in WWD, 25 January 1988.
- Schiros, Anne-Marie, "Adrienne Vittadini: From Sweaters to an Empire," in the New York Times, 19 July 1988.
- Patrini, Anita, "A Magic Moment for Adrienne," in Donna (Milan), November 1989.
- White, Constance C.R., "Adrienne Vittadini: The Power of Knits," in WWD, 7 August 1991.

- Schiro, Anne-Marie, "On Opposite Sides of the Cutting Edge," in the New York Times, 6 November 1992.
- "Vittadini Returns to Swimwear," in WWD, 6 July 1994.
- Born, Pete, "Vittadini to Launch First Scent at Bloomingdale's," in WWD, 13 January 1995.
- "Swimwear: Designer Views," [interviews], in WWD, 13 April 1995.
- "Vittadini Said Restructuring for New Units, Licenses," in WWD, 14 June 1995.
- D'Innocenzio, Anne, "Vittadini's Growth Options," in WWD, 25 October 1995.
- Ozzard, Janet, "Expansion Strategy for Marisa Christina: Revitalizing Vittadini," in WWD, 22 January 1996.
- "A New Vision at Vittadini," in WWD, 16 October 1996.
- D'Innocenzio, Anne, "More Finetuning at Adrienne Vittadini," in WWD, 19 March 1997.
- , "Vittadini's Shuttering Business," in WWD, 13 October 1998.
- Wilson, Eric, "The Vittadini Brand: A New Phase," in WWD, 14 October 1998.
- "U.S. Designers Extend Fragrance Collections," in Cosmetics International, 10 May 1999.
- Socha, Miles, "de V&P Planning Revamp, Relaunch of Vittadini Brand," in WWD, 7 September 1999.
- "News: de V&P to Close Shop," in WWD, 17 November 2000.
- Moin, David, "Casual Corner Buys Vittadini from de V&P," in WWD, 7 February 2001.

* * *

To the industry and the fashion press, Hungarian-born Adrienne Vittadini was known as the Queen of Knits. In 1979, after working with several knitwear firms, Vittadini started her own knitwear company, always asserting that knitwear was more than just sweaters. Vittadini was far more than a knitwear designer, she also created textiles and reinvented fashion. Vittadini maintained, "creating fabrics, then silhouettes, is the essence of fashion."

Vittadini began with a concept or theme for a collection, based on a mood or a feeling, which she then connected with a particular inspiration. The inspiration could evolve from an individual artist, an artistic movement, or her travels. Once she settled on a theme, came the intensive research in libraries, museums, books, and magazines. Her collections were inspired by the works of Alexander Calder, Pablo Picasso, Joan Miró, and Max Bill as well as Norwegian design and early Russian embroidery. She also tapped into contemporary pop culture for ideas, such as the line she designed based on the cartoon character Dick Tracy.

After establishing a theme, Vittadini created knit fabric by selecting and creating unusually textured yarns with Italian yarn spinners. She then oversaw the dyeing to obtain her own distinctive colorings and often supervised the initial samples off the knitting machines. Once the color and pattern were finalized, the fit, finishing, and quality were considered, which allowed her to maintain a sense of control over the design process from start to finish. Vittadini likened this entire process to painting, relating to her background in fine arts study at Moore College of Art in Philadelphia.

The Vittadini look has been characterized by knitwear of all-natural fibers, a certain practical, casual ease, and contemporary design with a feminine appeal. Her trademark knit silhouettes were loose-fit sweaters worn over short skirts, sophisticated ensembles, and sweater dresses which could all be interchanged. Vittadini has long asserted that knits are the most modern way of dressing. In her collections, she balanced her love of European elegance in design with American practicality and ease by creating clothes which were "feminine without fussiness," and possessed "a certain cleanliness and pureness without hardness." Vittadini's simple knit silhouettes created seductive looks as they molded to the shape of the body.

First and foremost, Vittadini design was defined by the textile. She expanded the knitwear industry by inventing and developing new computer knitting techniques in textures, prints, and patterns as well as shapes and colors. Vittadini cites Lycra as the most important development in knitwear; she used it as a technological and functional tool to keep shape in her knits—especially trousers. Vittadini also expanded the fabrics used in her collections to include wovens, prints, suedes, and leathers. Her later lines included licensing arrangements for cotton swimwear, accessories, girlswear, sleepwear, sunglasses, home furnishings, wallcoverings, and decorative fabrics. Roughly two-thirds of her line was knits.

Vittadini always stressed the advantage she had as a woman designer. She believed because she was a woman, she innately knew what other women wanted—clothes which reflected modern lifestyles. For many years, knits were looked upon by the industry as dowdy. Vittadini, however, revolutionized the power of knits, and most all Seventh Avenue fashion firms eventually included knits in their collections. By promoting the ease and practicality of knits as well as the fact they travel well, the Vittadini customer was both suburban and city, housewife and businesswomen, with a diverse set of needs from clothes.

Unfortunately for Vittadini, her design firm suffered a series of missteps in the hands of several owners. While struggling in the middle 1990s, Vittadini was forced to cancel of 1995 show and rely on mail order to promote her collections. She then reorganized her business and launched a more competitively priced line, AV Options, for spring 1996. Vittadini explained the move to Women's Wear Daily (25 October 1995), "It is very frustrating as a designer these days. With all the mergers and consolidations of department stores, I am finding less pockets to sell my bridge and designer clothes. In order to grow, I have to look at other areas."

A few months after launching the AV Options line, Vittadini decided to sell her firm to Marisa Christina Inc., a publicly-owned knitwear company. The plan was to grow the Vittadini line to compete with such market stalwarts as Liz Claiborne and Jones New York. Yet Marisa Christina and its newly acquired Vittadini unit failed to meet expectations over the next 18 months, and amid rumors of discord, Vittadini and her husband/partner announced their resignation from the firm bearing her name. "For me, the company has been like a family," Vittadini told Women's Wear Daily (13 October 1998), "but I'm ready to do something else... I have a wonderful team in place, and they don't need my day-to-day input." The Vittadini and Adrienne Vittadini ranges, as well as the licensed footwear, were continued by Marisa Christina until the Vittadini unit was abruptly sold to de V&P Inc. in September 1999.

The acquisition, however, was a disaster. After a scant 14 months, de V&P Inc. went bankrupt; luckily for Vittadini, Claudio del Vecchio's Casual Corner came forward and bought the brand in 2001. Vittadini apparel would not be sold in Casual Corner's 1,000-plus retail outlets across the U.S., rather, the firm planned to slowly open Adrienne Vittadini shops, starting in 2002. Vittadini herself said of the new ownership, "I am extremely excited about the acquisition by Claudio del Vecchio," she told Women's Wear Daily (7 February 2001). "Mr. del Vecchio will do an outstanding job in maintaining the integrity, image, and the aesthetics of all the products."

—Margo Seaman; updated by Owen James

VIVIER, Roger

French footwear designer

Born: Paris, 13 November 1913. Education: Studied sculpture at l'École des Beaux Arts, Paris. Family: Adopted son, Gérard Benoît-Vivier. Military Service: Performed military service, 1938–39. Career: Designed shoe collection for friend's shoe factory; opened own atelier, 1937, designing for Pinet and Bally in France, Miller and Delman in U.S., Rayne and Turner in UK; designed exclusively for Delman, New York, 1940–41 and 1945–47; studied millinery, 1942; opened New York store, Suzanne & Roger, with milliner Suzanne Remy, 1945; returned to Paris, 1947, designing freelance; designed for Dior's new shoe department, 1953–63; showed signature collections, from 1963; reopened own business in Paris, 1963; designs collections for couture houses, including Grès, St. Laurent, Ungaro, and Balmain; resigned with Delman, 1992–94; new licensing pact with Rautureau, 1994; opened new Paris boutique, 1995. Exhibitions: Musée des Arts de la Mode, Paris, 1987 [retrospective]; Nina Footwear Showroom, New York, [retrospective], 1998; Folies de dentelles, Musée des Beaux-arts et de la dentelle, Alençon, France, 2000. Awards: Neiman Marcus award, 1961; Daniel & Fischer award; Riberio d'Oro; honored by Nina Footwear, 1998. Died: 2 October 1998, in Toulouse, France.

PUBLICATIONS

By VIVIER:

Books

Vivier, Paris, 1979.

Vivier, Roger, and Cynthia Hampton, Les souliers de Roger Vivier [exhibition catalogue], Paris, 1987.

On VIVIER:

Books

Swann, June, Shoes, London, 1982.

McDowell, Colin, Shoes: Fashion and Fantasy, New York, 1989.

Trasko, Mary, Heavenly Soles: Extraordinary Twentieth-Century Shoes, New York, 1989.

Provoyer, Pierre, Vivier, Paris, 1991.

Pringle, Colombe, Roger Vivier, New York & London, 1999.

Musée des Beaux-arts et de la dentelle, Folies de dentelles, [exhibition catalogue], Alençon, France, 2000.

Articles

Cassullo, Joanne L., "Four Hundred Shoes," in Next, December 1984.

Bricker, Charles, "Fashion Afoot: Roger Vivier, the Supreme Shoemaker Comes to New York," in Connoisseur (New York), December 1986.

Buck, Joan J., "A Maker of Magic," in Vogue (New York), December 1987.

"Styles," in the New York Times, 9 August 1992.

Weisman, Katherine, "Rautureau Sell Stake; Ink Vivier Deal," in Footwear News, 28 February 1994.

Menkes, Suzy, "Master Cobbler Sets Up Shop Again," in the International Herald Tribune, 24 January 1995.

Baber, Bonnie, et al., "The Design Masters," in Footwear News, 17 April 1995.

Weisman, Katherine, "Roger Vivier, 90, Mourned by Shoe World," in Footwear News, 12 October 1998.

"Died, Roger Vivier," in Time, 19 October 1998.

"Roger Vivier, France's Footwear Extraordinaire," [obituary] in People, 26 October 1998.

Carmichael, Celia, "Legendary Status: Nina Honors the Creative Genius of Roger Vivier," in Footwear News, 21 December 1998.

* * *

Roger Vivier was perhaps the most innovative shoe designer of the 20th century and beyond. Vivier's shoes have had the remarkable ability to seem avant-garde yet destined at the same time to become classics. He maintained an eye for the cutting edge of fashion for six decades. Vivier looked back into the history of fashion and forward to the disciplines of engineering and science for inspiration. The shoes may seem shocking at first; however, it is the way they complete the silhouette that has made Vivier so coveted by top fashion designers for decades. With a sophisticated eye for line, form, and the use of innovative materials, Vivier created footwear worn by some of the most stylish and prestigious people of both the 20th and 21st centuries, among them Diana Vreeland, the Queen of England, and Marlene Dietrich.

Vivier worked with some of the most innovative fashion designers, such as Elsa Schiaparelli, Christian Dior, and Yves Saint Laurent, at the height of their careers. Schiaparelli was the first designer to include Vivier's shoes in her collections. Vivier was working for the American firm Delman at the time; Delman rejected Vivier's sketch of the shocking platform shoe which Schiaparelli included in her 1938 collection. In 1947 Vivier began to work for Christian Dior and the New Look brought new emphasis to the ankle and foot. Vivier created a number of new heel shapes for Dior, including the stiletto and the comma heel. During their ten-year association, Dior and Vivier created a golden era of design. In the 1960s Vivier created the low heeled "pilgrim pump" with a square silver buckle, and this shoe is often cited as fashion's most copied footwear.

Vivier was one of the first designers to use clear plastic in the design of shoes. His first plastic designs were created in the late 1940s after World War II; however, in the early 1960s he created entire collections in plastic. Vivier popularized the acceptance of the thigh-high boot in the mid-1960s, a fashion considered unacceptable for women. Vivier teamed with Delman again in 1992, and the mood his later collections continued to be imaginative and forward thinking. Drawing his inspiration from nature, contemporary fashion, the history of fashion, painting, and literature, Vivier updated some of his earlier designs and was constantly creating new ones to challenge the ideas of footwear design.

Vivier studied sculpture at the École des Beaux-Arts in Paris and later apprenticed at a shoe factory. It was this solid base of training in both aesthetics and technical skills that led him to become known for precision fit as well as innovative design. A Vogue ad for his shoes in 2001). "Mr. del Vecchio will do an outstanding job in maintaining the integrity, image, and the aesthetics of all the products."

—Margo Seaman; updated by Owen James

VIVIER, Roger

French footwear designer

Born: Paris, 13 November 1913. Education: Studied sculpture at l'École des Beaux Arts, Paris. Family: Adopted son, Gérard Benoît-Vivier. Military Service: Performed military service, 1938–39. Career: Designed shoe collection for friend's shoe factory; opened own atelier, 1937, designing for Pinet and Bally in France, Miller and Delman in U.S., Rayne and Turner in UK; designed exclusively for Delman, New York, 1940–41 and 1945–47; studied millinery, 1942; opened New York store, Suzanne & Roger, with milliner Suzanne Remy, 1945; returned to Paris, 1947, designing freelance; designed for Dior's new shoe department, 1953–63; showed signature collections, from 1963; reopened own business in Paris, 1963; designs collections for couture houses, including Grès, St. Laurent, Ungaro, and Balmain; resigned with Delman, 1992–94; new licensing pact with Rautureau, 1994; opened new Paris boutique, 1995. Exhibitions: Musée des Arts de la Mode, Paris, 1987 [retrospective]; Nina Footwear Showroom, New York, [retrospective], 1998; Folies de dentelles, Musée des Beaux-arts et de la dentelle, Alençon, France, 2000. Awards: Neiman Marcus award, 1961; Daniel & Fischer award; Riberio d'Oro; honored by Nina Footwear, 1998. Died: 2 October 1998, in Toulouse, France.

PUBLICATIONS

By VIVIER:

Books

Vivier, Paris, 1979.

Vivier, Roger, and Cynthia Hampton, Les souliers de Roger Vivier [exhibition catalogue], Paris, 1987.

On VIVIER:

Books

Swann, June, Shoes, London, 1982.

McDowell, Colin, Shoes: Fashion and Fantasy, New York, 1989.

Trasko, Mary, Heavenly Soles: Extraordinary Twentieth-Century Shoes, New York, 1989.

Provoyer, Pierre, Vivier, Paris, 1991.

Pringle, Colombe, Roger Vivier, New York & London, 1999.

Musée des Beaux-arts et de la dentelle, Folies de dentelles, [exhibition catalogue], Alençon, France, 2000.

Articles

Cassullo, Joanne L., "Four Hundred Shoes," in Next, December 1984.

Bricker, Charles, "Fashion Afoot: Roger Vivier, the Supreme Shoemaker Comes to New York," in Connoisseur (New York), December 1986.

Buck, Joan J., "A Maker of Magic," in Vogue (New York), December 1987.

"Styles," in the New York Times, 9 August 1992.

Weisman, Katherine, "Rautureau Sell Stake; Ink Vivier Deal," in Footwear News, 28 February 1994.

Menkes, Suzy, "Master Cobbler Sets Up Shop Again," in the International Herald Tribune, 24 January 1995.

Baber, Bonnie, et al., "The Design Masters," in Footwear News, 17 April 1995.

Weisman, Katherine, "Roger Vivier, 90, Mourned by Shoe World," in Footwear News, 12 October 1998.

"Died, Roger Vivier," in Time, 19 October 1998.

"Roger Vivier, France's Footwear Extraordinaire," [obituary] in People, 26 October 1998.

Carmichael, Celia, "Legendary Status: Nina Honors the Creative Genius of Roger Vivier," in Footwear News, 21 December 1998.

* * *

Roger Vivier was perhaps the most innovative shoe designer of the 20th century and beyond. Vivier's shoes have had the remarkable ability to seem avant-garde yet destined at the same time to become classics. He maintained an eye for the cutting edge of fashion for six decades. Vivier looked back into the history of fashion and forward to the disciplines of engineering and science for inspiration. The shoes may seem shocking at first; however, it is the way they complete the silhouette that has made Vivier so coveted by top fashion designers for decades. With a sophisticated eye for line, form, and the use of innovative materials, Vivier created footwear worn by some of the most stylish and prestigious people of both the 20th and 21st centuries, among them Diana Vreeland, the Queen of England, and Marlene Dietrich.

Vivier worked with some of the most innovative fashion designers, such as Elsa Schiaparelli, Christian Dior, and Yves Saint Laurent, at the height of their careers. Schiaparelli was the first designer to include Vivier's shoes in her collections. Vivier was working for the American firm Delman at the time; Delman rejected Vivier's sketch of the shocking platform shoe which Schiaparelli included in her 1938 collection. In 1947 Vivier began to work for Christian Dior and the New Look brought new emphasis to the ankle and foot. Vivier created a number of new heel shapes for Dior, including the stiletto and the comma heel. During their ten-year association, Dior and Vivier created a golden era of design. In the 1960s Vivier created the low heeled "pilgrim pump" with a square silver buckle, and this shoe is often cited as fashion's most copied footwear.

Vivier was one of the first designers to use clear plastic in the design of shoes. His first plastic designs were created in the late 1940s after World War II; however, in the early 1960s he created entire collections in plastic. Vivier popularized the acceptance of the thigh-high boot in the mid-1960s, a fashion considered unacceptable for women. Vivier teamed with Delman again in 1992, and the mood his later collections continued to be imaginative and forward thinking. Drawing his inspiration from nature, contemporary fashion, the history of fashion, painting, and literature, Vivier updated some of his earlier designs and was constantly creating new ones to challenge the ideas of footwear design.

Vivier studied sculpture at the École des Beaux-Arts in Paris and later apprenticed at a shoe factory. It was this solid base of training in both aesthetics and technical skills that led him to become known for precision fit as well as innovative design. A Vogue ad for his shoes in 1953 educates the viewer to look beyond the design. Showing the shoes embraced in callipers and other precision tools the ad read, "Now study the heel. It announces an entirely new principle—the heel moved forward, where it carries the body's weight better." In another ad from Vogue (1954) the experience of owning a pair of Vivier shoes was likened to owning a couturier suit or dress, "a perfection of fit and workmanship."

Vivier's shoes not only had the ability to complete a silhouette with an eloquence that made a whole, but the beauty of their line, form, and craftsmanship made them creations that stood alone as objects of art. Vivier's strong combination of design and craftsmanship allowed his shoes to stand prominently in the permanent collections of some of the world's most prestigious museums—the Costume Institute of the Metropolitan Museum of Art, New York; the Victoria & Albert Museum, London; and the Musée du Costume et de la Mode of the Louvre, Paris.

In 1994 the 86-year-old Vivier signed a new licensing agreement with Rautureau Apple Shoes, which in turn allowed him to open a boutique in Paris the following year. The Rautureau venture gave Vivier the backing to continue doing what he loved most—designing shoes. Yet three years later, in October 1998, Vivier died in Toulouse, France. He was remembered by many, including fellow shoe designer Manolo Blahnik, who told People magazine, "People try to copy him, but it's impossible to find that mix of technical skill and design." Kenneth Jay Lane, who had worked with the master craftsman, declared, "He was the world's greatest artist of shoe design."

—Dennita Sewell; updated by Sydonie Benét

VOLLBRACHT, Michael

American designer

Born: Michael Vollbracht in Quincy, Illinois, 17 November 1947. Education: Studied at Parsons School of Design, New York, 1965–67. Career: Design assistant in New York to Geoffrey Beene, 1967–69, to Donald Brooks, then back to Beene and Beene Bazaar line, then returned to Brooks, 1969–71; designed for Norman Norell until Norell's death in 1972; illustrator, Henri Bendel, 1972–74, and Bloomingdale's, 1975; Vollbracht Design Studios, producing garments from hand-printed silks (by Belotti) of his design launched, 1977, New York; swimwear designer, Sofere company, 1979; launched Vollbracht Too division of Manhattan Industries, 1981; Michaelle Vollbracht Sport line introduced, 1983; has also designed sheets for Burlington Industries, table linens for Audrey Company, Dallas. Awards: Golden Thimble award, Parsons School of Design, 1967; Coty American Fashion Critics award, 1980; American Printed Fashion Council's Tommy award, 1984.

PUBLICATIONS

By VOLLBRACHT:

Books

Michaelle Vollbracht's Nothing Sacred: Cartoons and Comments, New York, 1985.

On VOLLBRACHT:

Books

Khornak, Lucille, Fashion 2001, New York, 1982.

Articles

Schiro, Anne-Marie, "And Then They Turned to Clothes," in the New York Times, 8 July 1978.

Langway, Lynn, "A Fashion Comet Returns," in Newsweek, 25 May 1981.

Heiderstadt, Donna, "The Tranquil Force Behind Michaelle Vollbracht's Bold Art," in California Apparel News (Los Angeles), 19 August 1983.

Radakovich, Anka, "Vollbracht Perfects a 'Starring Role' for Every Fashion Fantasy," in Apparel News South (Atlanta, Georgia), March 1985.

Larkin, Kathy, "Michaelle Vollbracht," in the New York Daily News, 29 December 1985.

Lavina, Bettie Jean, "Portrait of a New Life," in the Los Angeles Times, 16 October 1992.

* * *

Dubbed "a fashion comet" by Newsweek magazine in 1981, Michaelle Vollbracht blazed across the New York fashion scene for a 10-year period beginning in 1977. When he left Parsons School of Design, New York, towards the end of the 1960s, Vollbracht logged time as a design assistant on Seventh Avenue, found it not to his liking, and turned instead to fashion illustration and graphic design. A shopping bag he created for Bloomingdale's department store in 1975 became an instant conversation piece and collector's item. It pictured an idealized woman's face, the artist's signature, and no other identifier, least of all the store name. The bag became the all-purpose tote, a symbol of reverse chic, acceptable because it carried no advertising, although everyone knew what it represented.

By 1977 Vollbracht was one of the top illustrators in the field. At the same time, sensing women were ready to turn away from the conservative, monochromatic look which had characterized much of the 1970s, Vollbracht established his fashion company. "We have been beige to death," he told Priscilla Tucker for a May 1978 issue of the New York Daily News.

Bringing his skills as a graphic artist to the new company, Vollbracht created huge patterns in bright colors, hand screened onto lengths of silk, then cut into simple kaftan or kimono-like shapes, sometimes further embellished with sequins or bugle beads. These were entrance-making clothes with humor and panache for a confident clientèle. Vollbracht's celebrity customers included Elizabeth Taylor, Diahann Carroll, and Joan Rivers. For his first collection in 1978, many of Vollbracht's prints consisted of a single stylized element, such as a palm frond or a panther's head, enlarged to full body proportion and placed asymmetrically at the shoulder or side seam so that the motif was not quickly perceived—and the negative space of the ground formed a pattern of competing interest.

By the early 1980s Vollbracht's work included more sophisticated shaping and traditional fabrics in addition to his enormous signature prints. "I had to prove I'm not just some outrageous designer, waving fabric over women's heads," he told Newsweek in 1981, "I want to demonstrate that I can cut an armhole and shape a dress—maybe not as beautifully as Givenchy, but I can do it." Indeed he could—a black

1953 educates the viewer to look beyond the design. Showing the shoes embraced in callipers and other precision tools the ad read, "Now study the heel. It announces an entirely new principle—the heel moved forward, where it carries the body's weight better." In another ad from Vogue (1954) the experience of owning a pair of Vivier shoes was likened to owning a couturier suit or dress, "a perfection of fit and workmanship."

Vivier's shoes not only had the ability to complete a silhouette with an eloquence that made a whole, but the beauty of their line, form, and craftsmanship made them creations that stood alone as objects of art. Vivier's strong combination of design and craftsmanship allowed his shoes to stand prominently in the permanent collections of some of the world's most prestigious museums—the Costume Institute of the Metropolitan Museum of Art, New York; the Victoria & Albert Museum, London; and the Musée du Costume et de la Mode of the Louvre, Paris.

In 1994 the 86-year-old Vivier signed a new licensing agreement with Rautureau Apple Shoes, which in turn allowed him to open a boutique in Paris the following year. The Rautureau venture gave Vivier the backing to continue doing what he loved most—designing shoes. Yet three years later, in October 1998, Vivier died in Toulouse, France. He was remembered by many, including fellow shoe designer Manolo Blahnik, who told People magazine, "People try to copy him, but it's impossible to find that mix of technical skill and design." Kenneth Jay Lane, who had worked with the master craftsman, declared, "He was the world's greatest artist of shoe design."

—Dennita Sewell; updated by Sydonie Benét

VOLLBRACHT, Michael

American designer

Born: Michael Vollbracht in Quincy, Illinois, 17 November 1947. Education: Studied at Parsons School of Design, New York, 1965–67. Career: Design assistant in New York to Geoffrey Beene, 1967–69, to Donald Brooks, then back to Beene and Beene Bazaar line, then returned to Brooks, 1969–71; designed for Norman Norell until Norell's death in 1972; illustrator, Henri Bendel, 1972–74, and Bloomingdale's, 1975; Vollbracht Design Studios, producing garments from hand-printed silks (by Belotti) of his design launched, 1977, New York; swimwear designer, Sofere company, 1979; launched Vollbracht Too division of Manhattan Industries, 1981; Michaelle Vollbracht Sport line introduced, 1983; has also designed sheets for Burlington Industries, table linens for Audrey Company, Dallas. Awards: Golden Thimble award, Parsons School of Design, 1967; Coty American Fashion Critics award, 1980; American Printed Fashion Council's Tommy award, 1984.

PUBLICATIONS

By VOLLBRACHT:

Books

Michaelle Vollbracht's Nothing Sacred: Cartoons and Comments, New York, 1985.

On VOLLBRACHT:

Books

Khornak, Lucille, Fashion 2001, New York, 1982.

Articles

Schiro, Anne-Marie, "And Then They Turned to Clothes," in the New York Times, 8 July 1978.

Langway, Lynn, "A Fashion Comet Returns," in Newsweek, 25 May 1981.

Heiderstadt, Donna, "The Tranquil Force Behind Michaelle Vollbracht's Bold Art," in California Apparel News (Los Angeles), 19 August 1983.

Radakovich, Anka, "Vollbracht Perfects a 'Starring Role' for Every Fashion Fantasy," in Apparel News South (Atlanta, Georgia), March 1985.

Larkin, Kathy, "Michaelle Vollbracht," in the New York Daily News, 29 December 1985.

Lavina, Bettie Jean, "Portrait of a New Life," in the Los Angeles Times, 16 October 1992.

* * *

Dubbed "a fashion comet" by Newsweek magazine in 1981, Michaelle Vollbracht blazed across the New York fashion scene for a 10-year period beginning in 1977. When he left Parsons School of Design, New York, towards the end of the 1960s, Vollbracht logged time as a design assistant on Seventh Avenue, found it not to his liking, and turned instead to fashion illustration and graphic design. A shopping bag he created for Bloomingdale's department store in 1975 became an instant conversation piece and collector's item. It pictured an idealized woman's face, the artist's signature, and no other identifier, least of all the store name. The bag became the all-purpose tote, a symbol of reverse chic, acceptable because it carried no advertising, although everyone knew what it represented.

By 1977 Vollbracht was one of the top illustrators in the field. At the same time, sensing women were ready to turn away from the conservative, monochromatic look which had characterized much of the 1970s, Vollbracht established his fashion company. "We have been beige to death," he told Priscilla Tucker for a May 1978 issue of the New York Daily News.

Bringing his skills as a graphic artist to the new company, Vollbracht created huge patterns in bright colors, hand screened onto lengths of silk, then cut into simple kaftan or kimono-like shapes, sometimes further embellished with sequins or bugle beads. These were entrance-making clothes with humor and panache for a confident clientèle. Vollbracht's celebrity customers included Elizabeth Taylor, Diahann Carroll, and Joan Rivers. For his first collection in 1978, many of Vollbracht's prints consisted of a single stylized element, such as a palm frond or a panther's head, enlarged to full body proportion and placed asymmetrically at the shoulder or side seam so that the motif was not quickly perceived—and the negative space of the ground formed a pattern of competing interest.

By the early 1980s Vollbracht's work included more sophisticated shaping and traditional fabrics in addition to his enormous signature prints. "I had to prove I'm not just some outrageous designer, waving fabric over women's heads," he told Newsweek in 1981, "I want to demonstrate that I can cut an armhole and shape a dress—maybe not as beautifully as Givenchy, but I can do it." Indeed he could—a black velvet dress from his 1980 collection was softly draped diagonally across the back from the left shoulder almost to the waist at right, presenting the bare back as a piece of sculpture.

At the height of his career in the mid-1980s, Vollbracht was responsible for three ready-to-wear lines, Vollbracht Too, Michaele Vollbracht Sport, and Overs by Michaele Vollbracht, as well as a line of swimwear for the American manufacturer Sofere. His licensing agreements included sheets, towels, table linens, and a line of women's blouses. Vollbracht's whimsical, eye catching prints characterized his swimwear just as they did his custom line. In 1985 Vollbracht parted company with his backer. Apparently unable or unwilling to obtain financing elsewhere, he discontinued his custom business. Two years later, in 1987, he retired from Seventh Avenue for the second time to concentrate on illustration and portraiture. His work was used in the New Yorker and in Vogue as well as in his 1985 illustrated memoir Nothing Sacred.

—Whitney Blausen

VON FURSTENBERG, Diane

Belgian designer working in New York

Born: Diane Michelle Halfin in Brussels, Belgium, 31 December 1946; immigrated to the U.S., 1969. Education: Studied at the University of Madrid, graduated in economics, University of Geneva. Family: Married Prince Egon Von Furstenberg, 1969 (divorced, 1983); married USA Network Chairman Barry Diller, 2001; children: Alexandre, Tatiana. Career: Owner/designer, Diane Von Furstenberg Studio, 1970–77, and from 1985; established couture house, 1984–88; produced signature cosmetics line, 1977–83; introduced Tatiana fragrance, 1977; began marketing products on QVC, 1990s; named planning director, Q2, 1994; relaunched business, 1997; published autobiography, 1998; opened in-store boutiques at Henri Bendel, 2001. Awards: Fragrance Foundation award, 1977; City of Hope Spirit of Life award, Los Angeles, 1983; Savvy Magazine award, New York, 1984, 1985, 1986, 1987, 1988; Einstein College of Medicine Spirit of Achievement award, New York, 1984; Mayor of the City of New York's Statue of Liberty medal, 1986. Address: 385 West 12th Street, New York, NY, U.S.A.

PUBLICATIONS

By VON FURSTENBERG:

Books

Diane Von Furstenberg's Book of Beauty, New York, 1976.
Beds, New York, 1991.
Diane: A Signature Life, with Linda Bird Francke, New York, 1998.

On VON FURSTENBERG:

Books

Reeves, Richard, Convention, New York, 1977.
 Morris, Bernadine, and Barbara Walz, The Fashion Makers, New York, 1978.
 Milbank, Caroline Rennolds, New York Fashion: The Evolution of American Style, New York, 1989.

Diane Von Furstenberg, spring 2002 collection. © Reuters NewMedia Inc./CORBIS.

velvet dress from his 1980 collection was softly draped diagonally across the back from the left shoulder almost to the waist at right, presenting the bare back as a piece of sculpture.

At the height of his career in the mid-1980s, Vollbracht was responsible for three ready-to-wear lines, Vollbracht Too, Michaele Vollbracht Sport, and Overs by Michaele Vollbracht, as well as a line of swimwear for the American manufacturer Sofere. His licensing agreements included sheets, towels, table linens, and a line of women's blouses. Vollbracht's whimsical, eye catching prints characterized his swimwear just as they did his custom line. In 1985 Vollbracht parted company with his backer. Apparently unable or unwilling to obtain financing elsewhere, he discontinued his custom business. Two years later, in 1987, he retired from Seventh Avenue for the second time to concentrate on illustration and portraiture. His work was used in the New Yorker and in Vogue as well as in his 1985 illustrated memoir Nothing Sacred.

—Whitney Blausen

VON FURSTENBERG, Diane

Belgian designer working in New York

Born: Diane Michelle Halfin in Brussels, Belgium, 31 December 1946; immigrated to the U.S., 1969. Education: Studied at the University of Madrid, graduated in economics, University of Geneva. Family: Married Prince Egon Von Furstenberg, 1969 (divorced, 1983); married USA Network Chairman Barry Diller, 2001; children: Alexandre, Tatiana. Career: Owner/designer, Diane Von Furstenberg Studio, 1970–77, and from 1985; established couture house, 1984–88; produced signature cosmetics line, 1977–83; introduced Tatiana fragrance, 1977; began marketing products on QVC, 1990s; named planning director, Q2, 1994; relaunched business, 1997; published autobiography, 1998; opened in-store boutiques at Henri Bendel, 2001. Awards: Fragrance Foundation award, 1977; City of Hope Spirit of Life award, Los Angeles, 1983; Savvy Magazine award, New York, 1984, 1985, 1986, 1987, 1988; Einstein College of Medicine Spirit of Achievement award, New York, 1984; Mayor of the City of New York's Statue of Liberty medal, 1986. Address: 385 West 12th Street, New York, NY, U.S.A.

PUBLICATIONS

By VON FURSTENBERG:

Books

Diane Von Furstenberg's Book of Beauty, New York, 1976.
Beds, New York, 1991.
Diane: A Signature Life, with Linda Bird Francke, New York, 1998.

On VON FURSTENBERG:

Books

Reeves, Richard, Convention, New York, 1977.
 Morris, Bernadine, and Barbara Walz, The Fashion Makers, New York, 1978.
 Milbank, Caroline Rennolds, New York Fashion: The Evolution of American Style, New York, 1989.

Diane Von Furstenberg, spring 2002 collection. © Reuters NewMedia Inc./CORBIS.

Diane Von Furstenberg, fall 2001 collection: silk jersey dress. © AP/Wide World Photos.

Stegemeyer, Anne, Who's Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.

[profile] in Almanac of Famous People, Sixth Edition, Detroit, 1998. [profile] in Encyclopedia of World Biography, Second Edition, Detroit, 1998.

contributor, to Bonnie Miller Rubin, Fifty on Fifty: Wisdom, Inspiration, and Reflection on Women's Lives Well Lived, New York, 1998.

Articles

Rothmyer, Karen, "Once Upon a Time a Princess Made It with the Hoi Polloi," in the Wall Street Journal 17 January 1976.

Francke, Linda Bird et al, "Princess of Fashion," in Newsweek 28 March 1976.

Rowes, Barbara, "Women Buy, But Men Dominate...Then Came DVF," in People, 14 May 1979.

Wallach, Leah, "What Makes Diane Run?" in Metropolitan Home (New York), September 1982.

Blandford, Linda, "I Was Very Very Clever and Very Very Devious," in The Guardian, 9 March 1983.

Scholl, Jaye, and Paula Span, "The Savvy 60: The Top U.S. Businesses Run by Women," in Savvy (New York), February 1984.

Alai, Susan, "Fashion's Shy Di: DVF through the Ages," in W, October 1985.

Szabo, Julia, "Diane Von Furstenberg," in Vogue, January 1991.

Dyett, Linda, "Women of Style: Princess Di and Her Daughter," in Lears, June 1991.

Podolsky, J.D., "Not Lying on Her Laurels," in People, 7 December 1991.

Givhan, Robin D., "Cut-Rate Princess; Designer Diane Von Furstenburg Caters to the Masses—and Their Money," in the Washington Post, 5 January 1996.

White, Constance C.R., "Von Furstenberg's Return," in the New York Times, 22 April 1997.

Spindler, Amy M., "Breaking the Rules, Again," in the New York Times, 16 September 1997.

"In Style," in Paris Match, May 1998.

Barron, James, "Accidental Tourist," in the New York Times, 1 September 1998.

Chin, Paula, "Diane: A Signature Life by Diane Von Furstenberg," in People, 9 November 1998.

"DVF's Open House," in WWD, 27 April 2000.

Ferla, Ruth, "For Diller and Von Furstenberg, a Merger," in the New York Times, 3 February 2001.

"It's a Wrap," in Harper's Bazaar, March 2001.

Foley, Bridget, "DVF's New Life," in W, April 2001.

McCants, Leonard, "DVF Set to Open First Store," in WWD, 18 April 2001.

Czarra, Kerstin, and Anna Rachmansky, "Ladies Night; Two Powerful Forces of American Style...," in Footwear News, 30 April 2001.

McCants, Leonard, "DVF's New Uptown Outpost," in WWD, 29 May 2001.

Horyn, Cathy, "Mysteries of Inspiration: Spring 2002 in the Making," in the New York Times, 4 September 2001.

Menkes, Suzy, "Theater, Von Furstenberg-Style," in the International Herald Tribune, 11 September 2001.

"Diane Von Furstenberg: Runway Fashion Photos," available online at Fashion Showroom, www.fashionshowroom.com, 16 October 2001.

"Diane Von Furstenberg: The Queen of the Wrap," online at from Lifetime TV, www.lifetimetv.com, 16 October 2001.

"Diane Von Furstenberg," available online at Vintage Vixen, www.vintagevixen.com, 16 October 2001.

*

I got into fashion almost by accident, inspired to create the pieces I wanted, but couldn't find, in my own wardrobe. From my original 1970s' knit wrap dress, to my new 1990s' stretch "sock dress," I believe in marrying fashion and function—chic style and easy comfort, maximum impact and minimum fuss. Today I look to the modern woman; pulled in many different directions in the course of a day, she juggles multiple roles depending on the situation, but always knows who she is and what's really important in her life.

I like to say that "I design a line the way I pack a suitcase," visualizing all of the different places I'm going to be, and then creating the appropriate outfits. My clothing must be timeless and versatile, so that a few simple pieces add up to many different looks. I think building a wardrobe should be like compiling a scrapbook of your life—over the years you accumulate favorite pieces, like old friends, that you always come back to for their unfailing ability to make you feel safe or confident, sexy or secure, depending on what you need.

Fabrics are key, since they're like a second skin, and should always be soft to the touch and breathable. Colors should be beautiful and harmonious, and silhouettes simple, allowing the body to move freely. All in all, clothes should complement a woman, the perfect accessories to her beauty and lifestyle.

—Diane Von Furstenburg

* * *

When Diane Von Furstenburg married Prince Egon Von Furstenburg in 1969, she became a princess—this aristocratic title proved no mean asset when she embarked on a fashion career in 1969, after moving from Europe with her husband to the United States. The cachet of “Princess” on a label proved especially potent to American buyers, aware of the American public’s fascination with titles.

Putting the preeminence of rank aside, Von Furstenburg began her career with no fashion training. Her qualifications were a degree in economics from the University of Geneva and fluency in five languages. She did, however, have knowledge of international high society and culture. For a short period after her marriage, both she and her husband were celebrities among the party-going jet set of the late 1960s, and for a time there was not a party that they did not attend. Von Furstenburg started her business during this period with a range of simple dresses she had produced in Italy. They were a reaction to the jeans dressing so prevalent at the time, providing an easy, elegant alternative for women who wanted to wear a dress. Selling the clothes herself by tugging a sample rail around various American stores, she became an immediate success and a known designer name almost overnight.

Her philosophy was simple—to create elegant ease for all women. “There was a need for my things, for very simple dresses everyone could wear,” she said in an interview for the book The Fashion Makers (New York, 1978). Both slim and large women could wear the clothes, senator’s wives or secretaries. They were sexy and chic regardless of the customer because they were designed to be sexy, accessible, and easy to wear. Von Furstenburg’s business quickly flourished and expanded. Highly successful lines of cosmetics, scent, handbags, shoes, jewelry, table linens, furs, stationery, wallpaper, and designs for Vogue Patterns were produced. She even published a Book of Beauty in 1976 detailing many of her philosophies toward life and design. She established herself as a liberated role model for many women. When she declared, “You don’t sit around in little white gloves and big hats and try to look fashionable. You have a job, a husband or lover and children,” she was stressing the practicality with style needed to adapt to modern life, which in many ways sums up her design philosophy.

Von Furstenburg resumed her business in the 1990s selling via television. Her contribution to fashion rests on a universal practicality; she believes in the importance of finding a style right for the individual, which is why many of her collections have featured very simple, flattering clothes. They can be dressed up or down and versatile enough for all sorts of women to feel attractive in. “Stick with them,” she advises her customers when they have found Diane Von Furstenburg clothes to suit them.

When Von Furstenberg succeeded on QVC, the home-shopping network, she and daughter-in-law Alexandra relaunched her business in 1997 at a freestanding boutique/studio/residence in West Village, New York. The store revitalized her standby, the slinky knit wrap dress, and ventured into new territory with sportswear and intimate apparel. In 1998 Von Furstenberg, with the help of Linda Bird Francke, published an autobiography, Diane: A Signature Life, which New York Times book critic Michele Orecklin described as “breezy reading for anyone who enjoys columns with a plenitude of bold-faced names,” including Henry Kissinger and Jerry Brown, former governor of California. Feminist icon Gloria Steinem saluted the work as a record of Von Furstenberg’s “professional struggles as well as her private ones to raise children and stay a whole person.”

In late April 2001, Von Furstenburg began merchandising her expanded line in a 600-square-foot shop-within-a-shop upstairs at Henri Bendel on Fifth Avenue in Manhattan. Under one roof, she coordinated designs, showing, and sales. Amid the signature DVF inlaid frosted mirrors, black slate floors, and see-through lightboxes, her staff attempted to match fashions to womanly, self-confident customers. Supported by vintage 1972 advertising on a billboard in the meat-packing district opposite the restaurant Pastis, the new store promoted the designer’s mantra: “Feel like a woman, wear a dress.”

Directing retail at the Hudson River location was Nicole Martaheleur, formerly a jewelry merchandiser for Agatha. Of the store’s unified effort, Von Furstenberg told Women’s Wear Daily, “I needed to do a store to have a full showcase. This is the one place in the world where you can see the full selection.” She promised a steady flow of surprises, including plans for a Paris outlet.

—Kevin Almond; updated by Mary Ellen Snodgrass

VUITTON, Louis

See LOUIS VUITTON

W

WALKER, Catherine

French designer working on London

Born: Catherine Marguerite Marie-Therese Baheux-Lefebvre, in Pas de Calais, France. Education: Graduated in philosophy from Lille University, and received Maître-ès-Lettres in aesthetics, Aix-en-Provence. Family: Married John David Walker, 1969 (died, 1975); children: Naomi, Marianne. Career: Worked in film department, French Institute, London, 1970; lecture department, French Embassy, London, 1971; designed childrenswear, 1977–86; opened shop, Chelsea Design Co., 1977; first womenswear collection, 1980, under Chelsea label; opened bridal shop, Fulham Road, London, 1986; favorite designer of Princess Diana (until her death); published autobiography, 1998. Awards: Designer of the Year award for British Couture, 1990–91, and for Glamour, 1991–92. Address: Chelsea Design Co., 65 Sydney Street, London SW3 6PX, England.

PUBLICATIONS

By WALKER:

Books

Catherine Walker: An Autobiography by the Private Couturier to Diana, Princess of Wales, New York, 1998.

On WALKER:

Books

McDowell, Colin, A Hundred Years of Royal Style, London, 1985.
Coleridge, Nicholas, The Fashion Conspiracy, London, 1988.
Debrett's Illustrated Fashion Guide—The Princess of Wales, London, 1989.

Articles

Jobey, L., "Designing Women," in Vogue (London), July 1987.
Alexander, H., "When Discretion Is the Better Part of Glamour," in the Daily Telegraph (London), 26 November 1987.
Modlinger, J., "Di's Designer Walker," in the Daily Express (London), 7 March 1988.
Menkes, Suzy, "Who Dresses Princess Diana?" in the International Herald Tribune, 8 November 1988.
Darnton, Nina, "Fashion Fit for a Princess—Di's Secret Designer," in Newsweek, 27 March 1989.
Jeal, N., "Catherine Walker," in the Observer Magazine (London), 16 September 1990.
Hauptfuhrer, Fred, and Louise Lague, "She Designs Dresses to Di For," in People, 6 May 1991.

"Designer Aims for Elegance of Simplicity," in the Independent, 16 July 1991.

Hume, Marion, "Joely Richardson Puts Sex into Catherine Walker," in the Tatler (London), July/August 1991.

Mower, Sarah, "The Discreet Charm of Catherine Walker," in Vogue (London), November 1991.

Armstrong, Lisa, "A Couture Fairy Tale (Princess Included)," in the Independent, 16 July 1992.

"The Undying Fascination With Di," in Publishers Weekly, 25 May 1998.

Mehle, Aileen, "Suzy," in WWD, 19 November 1999.

*

My initial interest in fashion revolved around two things: to elongate the body, and the general underlying technical composition of clothes. This took its own course towards designing glamorous, lean, fluid (1930s inspired) suits, cocktail and evening dresses, and a penchant towards couture.

I try to focus on making the above relevant to the lifestyle of today, that is to design clothes which give poise to women without being rigid, and which are poetic without being overworked.

—Catherine Walker

* * *

French-born couturier Catherine Walker established the Chelsea Design Company Ltd. in London in 1977 with no formal training in fashion design. Her educational background was in philosophy, for which she took a Maître-ès-Lettres, roughly the equivalent to a UK doctorate. Walker claims the title of her company, which did not bear her own name until 1993, was in deference to her lack of experience as a fashion designer.

The decision to start her own company was made when Walker was widowed in 1975 and left with two young children. She began making childrenswear, and the transition to making maternity wear was in fact a natural one, according to Walker, since the pregnant female form resembles the generally shapeless figure of a child. Walker affirms that it was many years before she thought of herself as a fashion designer, and that it was a purely technical interest in the construction of garments which initially inspired her.

During the first 12 years of business Walker consolidated her knowledge of pattern cutting, fitting, and sewing, and later couture dressmaking, and tailoring. As her reputation grew by word of mouth, she attracted press attention, and British Vogue first photographed one of her dresses for its January 1982 issue. Although the designer's clothes have been regularly featured in editorial fashion pages, Walker is renowned for her dislike of publicity and has never held a catwalk show. She views her personal development as a designer in a series of stages—first dressing, then tailoring, followed by embroidered decoration and, finally, draping.

Catherine Walker with some of her designs. © Julian Calder/CORBIS.

It is her tailoring and decorative use of beading that have become the hallmarks of Walker's designs. There is always an emphasis on the midriff, which Walker attributes to her French background. This structured effect around the waist, which though not fitted gives the illusion of elongating it, is apparent not only in her tailored jackets but on both day dresses and evening gowns. British journalist Lisa Armstrong, writing in the Independent (London, 16 July 1992), believes Walker's skill as a couturier lies in her ability to create clothes possessing the subtle, unlabored tailoring that on the surface seems not to be doing anything, but somehow manages to eliminate unwanted contours and add curves.

Another characteristic of Walker's designs is her use of plain colors such as black, navy, cream, and red, which are enhanced not through the use of printed textiles but with applied decoration such as hand-embroidery, heavy beading, and frogging. Her attention to detail is legendary; articles about the designer mention how she has been known to fly to Paris to find three buttons for a particular jacket.

Catherine Walker-designed silk crêpe dress owned by the late Princess Diana on display at Christie's London auction house, 1996. © AP/Wide World Photos.

While the bulk of her business is the made-to-measure couture collection, Walker also produced a ready-to-wear range called De Luxe and has designed hats made for her by Mailson Michel in Paris. She designs both fine jewelry and a collection of costume jewelry, which include earrings and bracelets to accessorize the clothes. Walker also designs a collection of couture bridal gowns which she launched in 1986 with the opening of a second shop on London's Fulham Road. She, along with others, was responsible for designing the wedding dress worn by Lady Helen Windsor at her marriage in July 1992.

Walker is perhaps best known for her creations for the late Princess of Wales, which attracted widespread publicity for her as a couturier, although she had always tried to avoid this aspect of the fashion world. It is important to note, however, that a close study of the Princess of Wales' wardrobe designed by Walker would not produce an accurate image of the designer. The requirements of the public royal wardrobe that the wearer stand out from the crowd—particularly important for television cameras and photographers—meant strong, often harsh colors were used, which were not typical of Walker's style.

The draped gowns, column evening dresses, and decorated tailored jacket worn by the Princess of Wales on numerous occasions do however illustrate the designer's signature use of beading and embroidery as well as her cutting technique of emphasizing the midriff and waistline. After Diana's death, Walker was outraged when the Victoria & Albert Museum refused to display the Princess' gowns and dresses in 1999, mostly designed by Walker. Many Brits took this as an affront to Diana's memory, especially when the London museum had expressed interest in displaying a dress worn by Posh Spice, a member of the pop recording group Spice Girls, and one from Sophie Rhys-Jones was already on the premises. The imbroglio came a year after Walker published her autobiography, recounting her experiences dressing Princess Diana.

Catherine Walker's impressive clientèle, which listed not only British but foreign royalty, bears testament to her skill as a designer, despite the fact that she did not consider herself one for the first dozen years of her successful business.

—Catherine Woram; updated by Owen James

WANG, Vera

American designer

Born: New York City, 27 June 1949. Education: Sarah Lawrence College, B.A. in Art History, 1971; studied abroad at the Sorbonne, Paris, during her sophomore year in college. Family: Married Arthur Becker, 1989; children: two daughters. Career: Fashion editor, Vogue, 1971–87; design director, Ralph Lauren, 1987–89; opened Vera Wang Bridal House, 1990; took classes and taught herself design techniques, designed hand-beaded ensemble for figure skater Nancy Kerrigan, 1994 Olympics; introduced Vera Wang Made to Order couture collection, 1996; authored first book, Vera Wang on Weddings, October 2001; signed an exclusive license agreement with Unilever Cosmetics International to develop a signature fragrance in spring 2002. Awards: Chinese American Planning Council's Honoree of the Year award, 1993; Girl Scout Council's Woman of Distinction award, 1994; elected member, Council of Fashion Designers of America, 1994. Address: Vera Wang Bridal House, 225 West 39th Street, New York, NY 10018, U.S.A. Website: www.verawang.com.

PUBLICATIONS

By WANG:

Books

Vera Wang on Weddings, New York, 2001.

Vera Wang, 2001: evening gown with a tulle beaded bodice designed as an option for an Academy Award® nominee. © AP/Wide World Photos.

On WANG:

Articles

- Sporkin, Elizabeth M., "Wedding Belle: When the Glitterati Get the Urge to Merge, They Flock to Bridal Expert Vera Wang," in People, 8 July 1991.
- Carr, Debra, "Wang's World," in Footwear News, 5 May 1997.
- Zaslow, Jeffrey, "Vera Wang," in USA Weekend, 8 May 1997.
- "Different Strokes," in WWD, 24 September 2000.
- "Vera Wang, by Vera Wang," in Vogue, March 2001.
- Woods, Vicki, "Taking the Plunge," in Vogue, September 2001.
- "Unilever Cosmetics International," in Cosmetics International, 10 September 2001.

* * *

Vera Wang was exposed to fashion early in her life through her mother's style and her affluent upbringing on Manhattan's East Side. Her parents were strong role models. Her mother, Florence Wu, a Princess of Wales' wardrobe designed by Walker would not produce an accurate image of the designer. The requirements of the public royal wardrobe that the wearer stand out from the crowd—particularly important for television cameras and photographers—meant strong, often harsh colors were used, which were not typical of Walker's style.

The draped gowns, column evening dresses, and decorated tailored jacket worn by the Princess of Wales on numerous occasions do however illustrate the designer's signature use of beading and embroidery as well as her cutting technique of emphasizing the midriff and waistline. After Diana's death, Walker was outraged when the Victoria & Albert Museum refused to display the Princess' gowns and dresses in 1999, mostly designed by Walker. Many Brits took this as an affront to Diana's memory, especially when the London museum had expressed interest in displaying a dress worn by Posh Spice, a member of the pop recording group Spice Girls, and one from Sophie Rhys-Jones was already on the premises. The imbroglio came a year after Walker published her autobiography, recounting her experiences dressing Princess Diana.

Catherine Walker's impressive clientèle, which listed not only British but foreign royalty, bears testament to her skill as a designer, despite the fact that she did not consider herself one for the first dozen years of her successful business.

—Catherine Woram; updated by Owen James

WANG, Vera

American designer

Born: New York City, 27 June 1949. Education: Sarah Lawrence College, B.A. in Art History, 1971; studied abroad at the Sorbonne, Paris, during her sophomore year in college. Family: Married Arthur Becker, 1989; children: two daughters. Career: Fashion editor, Vogue, 1971–87; design director, Ralph Lauren, 1987–89; opened Vera Wang Bridal House, 1990; took classes and taught herself design techniques, designed hand-beaded ensemble for figure skater Nancy Kerrigan, 1994 Olympics; introduced Vera Wang Made to Order couture collection, 1996; authored first book, Vera Wang on Weddings, October 2001; signed an exclusive license agreement with Unilever Cosmetics International to develop a signature fragrance in spring 2002. Awards: Chinese American Planning Council's Honoree of the Year award, 1993; Girl Scout Council's Woman of Distinction award, 1994; elected member, Council of Fashion Designers of America, 1994. Address: Vera Wang Bridal House, 225 West 39th Street, New York, NY 10018, U.S.A. Website: www.verawang.com.

PUBLICATIONS

By WANG:

Books

Vera Wang on Weddings, New York, 2001.

Vera Wang, 2001: evening gown with a tulle beaded bodice designed as an option for an Academy Award® nominee. © AP/Wide World Photos.

On WANG:

Articles

- Sporkin, Elizabeth M., "Wedding Belle: When the Glitterati Get the Urge to Merge, They Flock to Bridal Expert Vera Wang," in People, 8 July 1991.
- Carr, Debra, "Wang's World," in Footwear News, 5 May 1997.
- Zaslow, Jeffrey, "Vera Wang," in USA Weekend, 8 May 1997.
- "Different Strokes," in WWD, 24 September 2000.
- "Vera Wang, by Vera Wang," in Vogue, March 2001.
- Woods, Vicki, "Taking the Plunge," in Vogue, September 2001.
- "Unilever Cosmetics International," in Cosmetics International, 10 September 2001.

* * *

Vera Wang was exposed to fashion early in her life through her mother's style and her affluent upbringing on Manhattan's East Side. Her parents were strong role models. Her mother, Florence Wu, a

Vera Wang with her gowns for the “China Without Borders” exhibition at Sotheby’s in New York, 2001. © AFP/CORBIS.

United Nations translator, and her father, Cheng Ching, an oil and pharmaceuticals tycoon, gave Vera and her brother, Kenneth, a very comfortable childhood. When she was seven years old, Wang’s parents bought her a pair of ice skates for Christmas. She fell in love with skating and competed during her early teens and twenties. She proved herself a talented figure skater, competing at the U.S. National Championships and placing fifth in 1968 and 1969 with her skating partner, James Stuart. “The only thing that I loved as much as skating were clothes,” she once commented to People magazine in July 1991. It was a good thing, because not qualifying for the 1968 Olympic team and not wanting to tour with an ice show gave Wang a new career direction.

After graduation from college in 1971, Wang began working for Vogue magazine. At the end of her first year, she was promoted to fashion editor, the youngest in Vogue’s history. In a nostalgic piece written for the magazine in March 2001, editors said of Wang, “As a young fashion editor, she used the perfection she learned as a skater to produce shoots with an ice-cool edge.” Despite a few fashion-shoot snafus, Wang held the position for the next 16 years.

After her stint at Vogue, Wang worked as a design director at Ralph Lauren; her responsibility included overseeing 13 accessory lines. Throughout her career, she wanted to be a fashion designer and this desire started to grow while she was shopping for a wedding gown for her upcoming nuptials to Arthur Becker in 1989. Frustrated with the gowns she saw, she designed her own and hired a dressmaker to create it at a cost of $10,000. Discovering a market niche for contemporary and elegant wedding gowns, in 1990 Wang opened her own bridal boutique with financial backing from her father in the upscale Carlyle Hotel on Madison Avenue in New York. She carried elegant bridal wear by well-known designers, but also to design wedding gowns herself.

Her first international attention as a designer came when she designed Nancy Kerrigan’s skating outfit for the 1992 and 1994 Olympics. In her March 2001 profile in Vogue Wang wrote, “I felt as though my life had come full circle; I didn’t make it to that level of competition, but my clothes did.” Most notably, her designs are rich with luxurious fabrics and very classic lines. Her name alone conjures up images of fabulously simple wedding gowns. Brides as glamorous as Sharon Stone and as traditional as Karenna Gore have sought her out for their special day.

Wang has revolutionized the way people look at bridal dresses—transforming them in the last decade from cookie-cutter froufrou concoctions to stylish, couture-look gowns taking into consideration that brides might actually be grown up and want sophisticated dresses. “Before we brought sexuality to weddings,” she said, most brides “looked like the bride on top of a cake, very decorated,” she stated to USA Weekend in May 1997. Her ready-to-wear wedding dresses average $3,500.

The next sensible step in her career was to begin designing eveningwear. "Fashion offers no greater challenge than finding what works for night without looking like you are wearing a costume," says Wang. The world's most fashionable women, including Jane Fonda, Helen Hunt, and Kate Capshaw, quickly embraced her eveningwear. Celebrities continue to seek her advice on their most important appearances. Along with her bridal and eveningwear, Wang offers Vera Wang Made to Order, a collection of couture designs, fur, and footwear at her boutique. Her designs can also be found at Saks Fifth Avenue, Barneys, Bergdorf Goodman, and Neiman Marcus.

In 1997 Wang and Italian shoe company Rossimoda developed a line of women's dress shoes, catering to the designs of her evening and bridal gowns. The shoes have been very popular, given the design and platform heel that gives women height. "Clothes are my passion and my knowledge. I've studied fashion from every angle—historically and critically, cerebrally and emotionally." She understands how a woman wants to feel in her clothes. "Dressing celebrities gets you noticed. But I really do design for myself. And when my husband says I look sexy, I know I'm going to have a good night," she told InStyle magazine in December 2000.

Wang is a genius when it comes to understanding the fit of clothing. In her InStyle profile, she said, "For me, the magic is in weightless clothes, cutting armholes that add grace, cleverly exposing the best parts and sensuously draping fabric over less fabulous ones, offering enough internal support to allow a woman to feel secure while being totally comfortable. A woman is never sexier than when she is comfortable in her clothes."

Vera Wang's first signature fragrance launched in spring 2002, under a licensing agreement with Unilever Cosmetics International. Her first book, entitled Vera Wang on Weddings, became available in bookstores in 2001.

—Donna W. Reamy

WEINBERG, Chester

American designer

Born: New York City, 23 September 1930. Education: High School of Music and Art; graduated Parsons School of Design, 1951; B.S., Art Education, New York University. Career: Worked for Seventh Avenue clothing manufacturers; established own label, 1966; women's seasonal collections, 1966–75; label folded 1975; freelance designer 1975–78; consultant at Calvin Klein, 1978–81; design director of Calvin Klein jeans, 1981; critic, teacher, and member of Board of Overseers, Parsons School of Design; guest lecturer, Art Institute of Chicago. Collections: Texas Fashion Collection, University of North Texas. Awards: Coty American Fashion "Winnie" award, 1970; Maison Blanche "Rex" award, New Orleans, 1972. Died: 24 April 1985 in New York City.

PUBLICATIONS

On WEINBERG:

Books

Stegemeyer, Anne, Who's Who in Fashion, New York, 1980.

Milbank, Caroline Reynolds, New York Fashion: The Evolution of American Style, New York, 1989.

Stegemeyer, Anne, Who's Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.

Articles

Skurka, Norma, "Chester Weinberg," in the New York Times, 6 January 1974.

* * *

American fashion is said to have come of age in the 1960s, and Chester Weinberg is counted among those designers such as Bill Blass, Geoffrey Beene, Oscar de la Renta, and Donald Brooks who are credited with helping American fashion grow up. Specifically, Weinberg designed clothes notable enough to garner the sort of distinction and reputation that only French fashion had previously enjoyed.

A native New Yorker who attended the High School of Music and Art and went on to Parsons School of Design, Weinberg designed anonymously as an assistant at a number of clothing manufacturers on Seventh Avenue, among them Harvey Berin, Teal Traina, Leonard Arkin, and Herbert Sondheim. His first collection in 1966 was a great success and launched him into the fashion limelight. Preferring soft lines, ruffles, and an unstructured form, Weinberg designed a wide variety of evening dresses and daywear, including caftans, one-shouldered dresses with slash hems, elegant ball gowns, culotte suits, mod A-line dresses, exquisite dyed silk Japanese dresses, sweaters, jumpsuits, and soft, uniquely detailed suits with distinctive silhouettes. He was especially fond of good fabrics, using textiles from all over the world in bold, nontraditional colors. Urbane and timeless, his designs were never baroque or overwhelming.

Weinberg brought the first longer skirts to the runway in 1965, showing A-lines ending below the knee. He frequently used prints, often gigantic prints in vivid colors. He was one of the proponents of the baby-doll look and the loose, gypsy- and flower child-inspired styles of the early 1970s. Weinberg loved to travel and spent some time in Japan, adapting what he saw there into his own designs. His design range took in everything from a midi baby-doll dress with eyelet ruffles to a black-sequined mini jumpsuit over a Pierrot-collared blouse of dark green silk chiffon; from evening dresses with little tailoring at all—just an unrestrained sweep of silk chiffon from a wrapped bodice, tie-dyed lush sunset blue and cerise—to finely detailed evening dresses with rows of buttons at the wrists.

The look of a Weinberg is familiar even to those who have never heard of him, for his designs were some of the defining looks of the late 1960s and early 1970s. Black-scarfed models in swirling, long black dresses topped by smock jackets in Jackson Pollock-like yellow silk or apple green mohair, a vivid wool gabardine suit with an empire waist, cinched by a wide contrasting belt, a gray geometric print dress, all are images of "mod." At the same time, Weinberg's designs were classically simple and elegant, with details like ribbons, princess seams, inverted pleating, and his signature ruffles. From a navy blue, silk dress with an empire waist to a wool crêpe chemise dress with black lace over a lining of light cocoa, vintage Weinberg is still fashionable.

stated to USA Weekend in May 1997. Her ready-to-wear wedding dresses average $3,500.

The next sensible step in her career was to begin designing eveningwear. "Fashion offers no greater challenge than finding what works for night without looking like you are wearing a costume," says Wang. The world's most fashionable women, including Jane Fonda, Helen Hunt, and Kate Capshaw, quickly embraced her eveningwear. Celebrities continue to seek her advice on their most important appearances. Along with her bridal and eveningwear, Wang offers Vera Wang Made to Order, a collection of couture designs, fur, and footwear at her boutique. Her designs can also be found at Saks Fifth Avenue, Barneys, Bergdorf Goodman, and Neiman Marcus.

In 1997 Wang and Italian shoe company Rossimoda developed a line of women's dress shoes, catering to the designs of her evening and bridal gowns. The shoes have been very popular, given the design and platform heel that gives women height. "Clothes are my passion and my knowledge. I've studied fashion from every angle—historically and critically, cerebrally and emotionally." She understands how a woman wants to feel in her clothes. "Dressing celebrities gets you noticed. But I really do design for myself. And when my husband says I look sexy, I know I'm going to have a good night," she told InStyle magazine in December 2000.

Wang is a genius when it comes to understanding the fit of clothing. In her InStyle profile, she said, "For me, the magic is in weightless clothes, cutting armholes that add grace, cleverly exposing the best parts and sensuously draping fabric over less fabulous ones, offering enough internal support to allow a woman to feel secure while being totally comfortable. A woman is never sexier than when she is comfortable in her clothes."

Vera Wang's first signature fragrance launched in spring 2002, under a licensing agreement with Unilever Cosmetics International. Her first book, entitled Vera Wang on Weddings, became available in bookstores in 2001.

—Donna W. Reamy

WEINBERG, Chester

American designer

Born: New York City, 23 September 1930. Education: High School of Music and Art; graduated Parsons School of Design, 1951; B.S., Art Education, New York University. Career: Worked for Seventh Avenue clothing manufacturers; established own label, 1966; women's seasonal collections, 1966–75; label folded 1975; freelance designer 1975–78; consultant at Calvin Klein, 1978–81; design director of Calvin Klein jeans, 1981; critic, teacher, and member of Board of Overseers, Parsons School of Design; guest lecturer, Art Institute of Chicago. Collections: Texas Fashion Collection, University of North Texas. Awards: Coty American Fashion "Winnie" award, 1970; Maison Blanche "Rex" award, New Orleans, 1972. Died: 24 April 1985 in New York City.

PUBLICATIONS

On WEINBERG:

Books

Stegemeyer, Anne, Who's Who in Fashion, New York, 1980.

Milbank, Caroline Reynolds, New York Fashion: The Evolution of American Style, New York, 1989.

Stegemeyer, Anne, Who's Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.

Articles

Skurka, Norma, "Chester Weinberg," in the New York Times, 6 January 1974.

* * *

American fashion is said to have come of age in the 1960s, and Chester Weinberg is counted among those designers such as Bill Blass, Geoffrey Beene, Oscar de la Renta, and Donald Brooks who are credited with helping American fashion grow up. Specifically, Weinberg designed clothes notable enough to garner the sort of distinction and reputation that only French fashion had previously enjoyed.

A native New Yorker who attended the High School of Music and Art and went on to Parsons School of Design, Weinberg designed anonymously as an assistant at a number of clothing manufacturers on Seventh Avenue, among them Harvey Berin, Teal Traina, Leonard Arkin, and Herbert Sondheim. His first collection in 1966 was a great success and launched him into the fashion limelight. Preferring soft lines, ruffles, and an unstructured form, Weinberg designed a wide variety of evening dresses and daywear, including caftans, one-shouldered dresses with slash hems, elegant ball gowns, culotte suits, mod A-line dresses, exquisite dyed silk Japanese dresses, sweaters, jumpsuits, and soft, uniquely detailed suits with distinctive silhouettes. He was especially fond of good fabrics, using textiles from all over the world in bold, nontraditional colors. Urbane and timeless, his designs were never baroque or overwhelming.

Weinberg brought the first longer skirts to the runway in 1965, showing A-lines ending below the knee. He frequently used prints, often gigantic prints in vivid colors. He was one of the proponents of the baby-doll look and the loose, gypsy- and flower child-inspired styles of the early 1970s. Weinberg loved to travel and spent some time in Japan, adapting what he saw there into his own designs. His design range took in everything from a midi baby-doll dress with eyelet ruffles to a black-sequined mini jumpsuit over a Pierrot-collared blouse of dark green silk chiffon; from evening dresses with little tailoring at all—just an unrestrained sweep of silk chiffon from a wrapped bodice, tie-dyed lush sunset blue and cerise—to finely detailed evening dresses with rows of buttons at the wrists.

The look of a Weinberg is familiar even to those who have never heard of him, for his designs were some of the defining looks of the late 1960s and early 1970s. Black-scarfed models in swirling, long black dresses topped by smock jackets in Jackson Pollock-like yellow silk or apple green mohair, a vivid wool gabardine suit with an empire waist, cinched by a wide contrasting belt, a gray geometric print dress, all are images of "mod." At the same time, Weinberg's designs were classically simple and elegant, with details like ribbons, princess seams, inverted pleating, and his signature ruffles. From a navy blue, silk dress with an empire waist to a wool crêpe chemise dress with black lace over a lining of light cocoa, vintage Weinberg is still fashionable.

After his company folded, Weinberg designed dresses and sportswear for a company backed by Jones Apparel Group, cashmere sweaters for Ballantyne of Scotland, furs, costumes for the Twyla Tharp ballet As Time Goes By, and patterns for Vogue and Butterick. In 1978 he became a consultant for Calvin Klein, who had admired his work for many years. Weinberg went on to become the design director at Calvin Klein jeans. Throughout his career, he taught and lectured at Parsons School of Design and the Art Institute of Chicago. An award and a scholarship were named for him: the Chester Weinberg Gold Thimble award and the Chester Weinberg Scholarship, both established in 1985, the year of his death. His untimely loss to the fashion world was much mourned, and his contributions to the American look are still relevant.

—Jessica Reisman

WEITZ, John

American fashion and industrial designer

Born: Berlin, Germany, 25 May 1923; immigrated to Britain, 1934, and to the United States, 1940; naturalized American, 1943. Education: Studied at the Hall School, 1936, at St. Paul's School, London, 1936–39; apprenticed to Edward Molyneux, Paris, 1939–40. Family: Married Sally Bauner (divorced); married Eve Orten (divorced); married Susan Kohner, 1964; children: Karen, Robert, Paul, Christopher. Military Service: Served in the U.S. Army, 1943–46; became Captain; also worked in the OSS. Career: Designer of women's sportswear, working with several companies in London and New York, until 1954; founder/designer and chairman, John Weitz Designs, Inc., men's fashion designs, New York, from 1964; signed licenses with Lakeland, Gina Hosiery; also an author (from the early 1960s), yachtsman, and ex-racecar driver. Awards: Sports Illustrated award, 1959; NBC Today Show award, 1960; Caswell-Massey awards, 196–66; Harper's Bazaar Medallion, New York, 1966; Moscow Diploma, 1967; Coty American Fashion Critics award, 1974; Cartier Design award, 1981; Mayor's Liberty medal, New York, 1986; First Class Order of Merit, Germany, 1988; Dallas Menswear Mart award, 1990; Fashion Institute of Technology President's award, New York, 1990. Address: 600 Madison Avenue, New York, NY 10022, U.S.A.

PUBLICATIONS

By WEITZ:

Books

- Sports Clothes for Your Sports Car*, New York, 1959.
- The Value of Nothing*, New York & London, 1970.
- Man in Charge*, New York, 1974.
- Friends in High Places*, New York, 1982.
- Hitler's Diplomat*, London, 1992.
- Hitler's Banker: Hjalmar Horace Greeley Schacht*, New York, 1997.

Articles

- "Auto Motives," in the New York Times Magazine, 27 March 1988.

"Jocks and Nerds: Men's Style in the Twentieth Century" (book review), in the New York Times Book Review, 3 December 1989.
 "Home Away from Home," in New York Magazine, 19 February 1990.

"Fashion Statements," in Town & Country (New York), July 1994.

On WEITZ:

Books

- Bender, Marilyn, The Beautiful People, New York, 1968.

Articles

Talley, André Leon, "John Weitz," in Interview (New York), March 1983.

Gross, Michael, "Design for Living," in GQ, September 1985.

Ferrari, Lynn, "John Weitz: Image of Distinction," in Millionaire, December 1987.

Brady, James, "In Step with John Weitz," in Parade Magazine, 31 July 1988.

Christy, Marian, "A Stylist with the Power of Politeness," in the Boston Globe, 9 April 1989.

Harris, Joyce Saenz, "The Novel Life of John Weitz," in the Dallas Morning News (Texas), 8 April 1990.

Simon, Cecelia Capuzzi, "Can You Explain John Weitz?" in the New York Observer, 10 September 1990.

Parola, Robert, "The Way It Was: John Weitz," in DNR, 22 May 1992.

Van Lenten, Barry, "Menswear Designer Pioneers: John Weitz," in DNR, 18 January 1995.

Taffin, William E., "In the Beginning...Menswear Designer John Weitz Helps Start the Men's Sportswear Revolution," in DNR, 18 January 1995.

Flanagan, William G., and Diana Merelman, "Tribalwear," in Forbes, 5 May 1997.

Murray, David, "Hitler's Banker: Hjalmar Horace Greeley Schacht," in the New York Times Book Review, 25 January 1998.

Horyn, Cathy, "Growing up Weitz," in New York Times Magazine, 20 February 2000.

* * *

John Weitz explained to the Boston Globe (9 April 1989) why he never wears a formal dress shirt with his tuxedo, "I wear white business shirts; I can't take the time to fiddle with front studs. The last thing I want is to be controlled by fashion." No one would say—and certainly no one would dare say in his presence—that Weitz is controlled by fashion. Rather he has treated fashion as a chosen field, one among many. He abandoned the competitive field of womenswear for a mannerly, self-invented calling in menswear. Even there, he stayed slightly aloof, choosing to be the debonair gentleman rather than fashion victim/victimizer. He has two rare personalities—a late New York intellectual and a natural aristocrat who has seen aristocracies disintegrate, but who persists in imagining new ones.

Since the 1940s, Weitz has spoken a gentlemanly common sense about fashion for men and women. First encouraged by Dorothy Shaver of Lord & Taylor in the 1940s to pursue women's sportswear

After his company folded, Weinberg designed dresses and sportswear for a company backed by Jones Apparel Group, cashmere sweaters for Ballantyne of Scotland, furs, costumes for the Twyla Tharp ballet As Time Goes By, and patterns for Vogue and Butterick. In 1978 he became a consultant for Calvin Klein, who had admired his work for many years. Weinberg went on to become the design director at Calvin Klein jeans. Throughout his career, he taught and lectured at Parsons School of Design and the Art Institute of Chicago. An award and a scholarship were named for him: the Chester Weinberg Gold Thimble award and the Chester Weinberg Scholarship, both established in 1985, the year of his death. His untimely loss to the fashion world was much mourned, and his contributions to the American look are still relevant.

—Jessica Reisman

WEITZ, John

American fashion and industrial designer

Born: Berlin, Germany, 25 May 1923; immigrated to Britain, 1934, and to the United States, 1940; naturalized American, 1943. Education: Studied at the Hall School, 1936, at St. Paul's School, London, 1936–39; apprenticed to Edward Molyneux, Paris, 1939–40. Family: Married Sally Bauner (divorced); married Eve Orten (divorced); married Susan Kohner, 1964; children: Karen, Robert, Paul, Christopher. Military Service: Served in the U.S. Army, 1943–46; became Captain; also worked in the OSS. Career: Designer of women's sportswear, working with several companies in London and New York, until 1954; founder/designer and chairman, John Weitz Designs, Inc., men's fashion designs, New York, from 1964; signed licenses with Lakeland, Gina Hosiery; also an author (from the early 1960s), yachtsman, and ex-racecar driver. Awards: Sports Illustrated award, 1959; NBC Today Show award, 1960; Caswell-Massey awards, 196–66; Harper's Bazaar Medallion, New York, 1966; Moscow Diploma, 1967; Coty American Fashion Critics award, 1974; Cartier Design award, 1981; Mayor's Liberty medal, New York, 1986; First Class Order of Merit, Germany, 1988; Dallas Menswear Mart award, 1990; Fashion Institute of Technology President's award, New York, 1990. Address: 600 Madison Avenue, New York, NY 10022, U.S.A.

PUBLICATIONS

By WEITZ:

Books

- Sports Clothes for Your Sports Car*, New York, 1959.
- The Value of Nothing*, New York & London, 1970.
- Man in Charge*, New York, 1974.
- Friends in High Places*, New York, 1982.
- Hitler's Diplomat*, London, 1992.
- Hitler's Banker: Hjalmar Horace Greeley Schacht*, New York, 1997.

Articles

- "Auto Motives," in the New York Times Magazine, 27 March 1988.

"Jocks and Nerds: Men's Style in the Twentieth Century" (book review), in the New York Times Book Review, 3 December 1989.
 "Home Away from Home," in New York Magazine, 19 February 1990.

"Fashion Statements," in Town & Country (New York), July 1994.

On WEITZ:

Books

- Bender, Marilyn, The Beautiful People, New York, 1968.

Articles

Talley, André Leon, "John Weitz," in Interview (New York), March 1983.

Gross, Michael, "Design for Living," in GQ, September 1985.

Ferrari, Lynn, "John Weitz: Image of Distinction," in Millionaire, December 1987.

Brady, James, "In Step with John Weitz," in Parade Magazine, 31 July 1988.

Christy, Marian, "A Stylist with the Power of Politeness," in the Boston Globe, 9 April 1989.

Harris, Joyce Saenz, "The Novel Life of John Weitz," in the Dallas Morning News (Texas), 8 April 1990.

Simon, Cecelia Capuzzi, "Can You Explain John Weitz?" in the New York Observer, 10 September 1990.

Parola, Robert, "The Way It Was: John Weitz," in DNR, 22 May 1992.

Van Lenten, Barry, "Menswear Designer Pioneers: John Weitz," in DNR, 18 January 1995.

Taffin, William E., "In the Beginning...Menswear Designer John Weitz Helps Start the Men's Sportswear Revolution," in DNR, 18 January 1995.

Flanagan, William G., and Diana Merelman, "Tribalwear," in Forbes, 5 May 1997.

Murray, David, "Hitler's Banker: Hjalmar Horace Greeley Schacht," in the New York Times Book Review, 25 January 1998.

Horyn, Cathy, "Growing up Weitz," in New York Times Magazine, 20 February 2000.

* * *

John Weitz explained to the Boston Globe (9 April 1989) why he never wears a formal dress shirt with his tuxedo, "I wear white business shirts; I can't take the time to fiddle with front studs. The last thing I want is to be controlled by fashion." No one would say—and certainly no one would dare say in his presence—that Weitz is controlled by fashion. Rather he has treated fashion as a chosen field, one among many. He abandoned the competitive field of womenswear for a mannerly, self-invented calling in menswear. Even there, he stayed slightly aloof, choosing to be the debonair gentleman rather than fashion victim/victimizer. He has two rare personalities—a late New York intellectual and a natural aristocrat who has seen aristocracies disintegrate, but who persists in imagining new ones.

Since the 1940s, Weitz has spoken a gentlemanly common sense about fashion for men and women. First encouraged by Dorothy Shaver of Lord & Taylor in the 1940s to pursue women's sportswear with his demanding sense of a contemporary postwar lifestyle, Weitz carried his marrow of American practicality within the genteel spirit of his own European and English cultivation. As much a man of letters and ideas as of fashion, once an adventurer who drove race cars and was solicited to portray James Bond, Weitz is a consummate gentleman in the sometimes less than genteel world of fashion.

While his great achievements in apparel in the 1950s were of women's sportswear, he became one of the first men's fashion designers in the early 1960s, shifting his emphasis to this field for its capability to fulfill his interest in classic looks, utmost practicality, and no-nonsense durability. Until Giorgio Armani and Ralph Lauren in the late 1970s and 1980s, no designer was as faithful as Weitz to menswear. In personal style as well as his design, Weitz exemplified the refined but unpretentious good taste that comes of humane attention to what is important in life, with clothing following as a consequence of those values. Even in the extreme years of menswear in the late 1960s and early 1970s, Weitz's vision was always tempered.

If Weitz was first a visionary of the disciplines of sportswear for women in America, he transferred his allegiance to menswear in the early 1960s when a number of designers were testing the waters of menswear, among them Geoffrey Beene and Bill Blass in America, Hardy Amies in England, and Pierre Cardin in France. Weitz alone gave his primary attention to menswear, a field where his own principal ideas had first come from observing the Duke of Windsor. Long before absorbing and ultimately creating the ethos of sportswear, Weitz had been an assistant to Molyneux in London. There, he was a part of fashion that was fastidious, client-driven, and rich in protocol and money.

When asked in Interview (March 1983) if he considered himself a couturier, Weitz replied, "Good God, no. I'm a modern-day creature that emerged from an old couture assistant into a sort of inventive concept, which I don't mind at all." His acumen for business and licensing has enabled Weitz to build an empire in menswear with a minimum of participation from the designer. His own engaging and cosmopolitan charm establishes only the guidelines for product development. In many ways, Weitz was the first to be such a designer—god-like then thereafter far removed from the world of his own creation. Weitz makes a point, however, of wearing his own clothes; this is a matter of honor for a man of Boy Scoutish, even knightly, integrity.

At the end of the 20th century Weitz still offered a graceful conceptual model of a fashion designer, though he had significantly segued into other professions as well. As an author of several books, both novels and historical biographies, the designer had been spending more time writing than sketching.

"Dress is a form of tribalism," Weitz commented to Forbes (5 May 1997), "People wear what their tribe wears—executives, blue-collar workers, undertakers, accountants. They want to feel tribally appropriate. Distinguishing yourself within your tribe is a matter of style, not fashion."

"...I never planned on being a great couturier," says Weitz, who switched to menswear in 1964. "To me fashion is not an art but a craft...." told People (Oct 26, 1992) While Weitz himself is a longtime member of internationally best-dressed Hall of Fame, his long wool coats still sell as do his tailored men's shirts, socks, and a host of other accessories.

—Richard Martin

WESTWOOD, Vivienne

British designer

Born: Vivienne Isabel Swire in Glossop, Derbyshire, 8 April 1941.

Education: Studied one term at Harrow Art School, then trained as a teacher. Family: Children: Ben, Joseph. Career: Taught school before working as designer, from circa 1971; with partner Malcolm McLaren, proprietor of boutique variously named Let It Rock, 1971, Too Fast to Live, Too Young to Die, 1972, Sex, 1974, Seditionaries, 1977, and World's End, from 1980; second shop, Nostalgia of Mud, opened, 1982; Mayfair shop opened, 1990; first showed under own name, 1982; taught at Academy of Applied Arts, Vienna, 1989–91; first full menswear collection launched, 1990; opened Tokyo shop, 1996; introduced denim line, Anglomania, 1997; fragrances include Boudoir, 1998; and Boudoir, 2000. Exhibitions: Retrospective, Galerie Buchholz & Schipper, Cologne, 1991; retrospective, Bordeaux, 1992; Vivienne Westwood: The Collection of Romilly McAlpine, Museum of London, 2000. Awards: British Designer of the Year award, 1990, 1991; Order of the British Empire (OBE), 1992; Fashion with his demanding sense of a contemporary postwar lifestyle, Weitz carried his marrow of American practicality within the genteel spirit of his own European and English cultivation. As much a man of letters and ideas as of fashion, once an adventurer who drove race cars and was solicited to portray James Bond, Weitz is a consummate gentleman in the sometimes less than genteel world of fashion.

Vivienne Westwood, autumn/winter 2001–02 ready-to-wear collection. © AFP/CORBIS.

While his great achievements in apparel in the 1950s were of women's sportswear, he became one of the first men's fashion designers in the early 1960s, shifting his emphasis to this field for its capability to fulfill his interest in classic looks, utmost practicality, and no-nonsense durability. Until Giorgio Armani and Ralph Lauren in the late 1970s and 1980s, no designer was as faithful as Weitz to menswear. In personal style as well as his design, Weitz exemplified the refined but unpretentious good taste that comes of humane attention to what is important in life, with clothing following as a consequence of those values. Even in the extreme years of menswear in the late 1960s and early 1970s, Weitz's vision was always tempered.

If Weitz was first a visionary of the disciplines of sportswear for women in America, he transferred his allegiance to menswear in the early 1960s when a number of designers were testing the waters of menswear, among them Geoffrey Beene and Bill Blass in America, Hardy Amies in England, and Pierre Cardin in France. Weitz alone gave his primary attention to menswear, a field where his own principal ideas had first come from observing the Duke of Windsor. Long before absorbing and ultimately creating the ethos of sportswear, Weitz had been an assistant to Molyneux in London. There, he was a part of fashion that was fastidious, client-driven, and rich in protocol and money.

When asked in Interview (March 1983) if he considered himself a couturier, Weitz replied, "Good God, no. I'm a modern-day creature that emerged from an old couture assistant into a sort of inventive concept, which I don't mind at all." His acumen for business and licensing has enabled Weitz to build an empire in menswear with a minimum of participation from the designer. His own engaging and cosmopolitan charm establishes only the guidelines for product development. In many ways, Weitz was the first to be such a designer—god-like then thereafter far removed from the world of his own creation. Weitz makes a point, however, of wearing his own clothes; this is a matter of honor for a man of Boy Scoutish, even knightly, integrity.

At the end of the 20th century Weitz still offered a graceful conceptual model of a fashion designer, though he had significantly segued into other professions as well. As an author of several books, both novels and historical biographies, the designer had been spending more time writing than sketching.

"Dress is a form of tribalism," Weitz commented to Forbes (5 May 1997), "People wear what their tribe wears—executives, blue-collar workers, undertakers, accountants. They want to feel tribally appropriate. Distinguishing yourself within your tribe is a matter of style, not fashion."

"...I never planned on being a great couturier," says Weitz, who switched to menswear in 1964. "To me fashion is not an art but a craft...." told People (Oct 26, 1992) While Weitz himself is a longtime member of internationally best-dressed Hall of Fame, his long wool coats still sell as do his tailored men's shirts, socks, and a host of other accessories.

—Richard Martin

WESTWOOD, Vivienne

British designer

Born: Vivienne Isabel Swire in Glossop, Derbyshire, 8 April 1941.

Education: Studied one term at Harrow Art School, then trained as a teacher. Family: Children: Ben, Joseph. Career: Taught school before working as designer, from circa 1971; with partner Malcolm McLaren, proprietor of boutique variously named Let It Rock, 1971, Too Fast to Live, Too Young to Die, 1972, Sex, 1974, Seditionaries, 1977, and World's End, from 1980; second shop, Nostalgia of Mud, opened, 1982; Mayfair shop opened, 1990; first showed under own name, 1982; taught at Academy of Applied Arts, Vienna, 1989–91; first full menswear collection launched, 1990; opened Tokyo shop, 1996; introduced denim line, Anglomania, 1997; fragrances include Boudoir, 1998; and Boudoir, 2000. Exhibitions: Retrospective, Galerie Buchholz & Schipper, Cologne, 1991; retrospective, Bordeaux, 1992; Vivienne Westwood: The Collection of Romilly McAlpine, Museum of London, 2000. Awards: British Designer of the Year award, 1990, 1991; Order of the British Empire (OBE), 1992; Fashion

Vivienne Westwood, autumn/winter 2001–02 ready-to-wear collection. © AFP/CORBIS.

Group International awards, 1996. Address: Unit 3, Old School House, The Lanterns, Bridge Lane, Battersea, London SW11 3AD, England. Website: www.viviennewestwood.com.

PUBLICATIONS

By WESTWOOD:

Books

Vivienne Westwood: A London Fashion, with Romilly McAlpine, London, 2000.

Articles

- “Youth: Style and Fashion, Opinion,” in the Observer (London), 10 February 1985.
- “Paris, Punk and Beyond,” in Blitz (London), May 1986.
- “Pursuing an Image Without Any Taste,” in the Independent (London), 9 September 1989.
- “My Decade: Vivienne Westwood,” in the Sunday Correspondent Magazine (London), 19 November 1989.
- “Vivienne Westwood Writes...,” in the Independent, 2 December 1994.

Vivienne Westwood, spring/summer 2002 ready-to-wear collection. © AFP/CORBIS.

On WESTWOOD:

Books

- Polhemus, Ted, Fashion and Anti-Fashion, London, 1978.
- McDermott, Catherine, Street Style: British Design in the 1980s, London, 1987.
- Howell, Georgina, Sultans of Style: 30 Years of Fashion and Passion 1960–1990, London, 1990.
- Steele, Valerie, Women of Fashion: Twentieth Century Designers, New York, 1991.
- Stegemeyer, Anne, Who's Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.
- Vermoral, Fred, Fashion & Perversity: A Life of Vivienne Westwood and the Sixties Laid Bare, Woodstock, New York & London, 1996.
- Krell, Gene, Vivienne Westwood, Paris, 1997.
- Lehnert, Gertrud, Frauen machen Mode—Coco Chanel, Jil Sander, Vivienne Westwood, Dortmund, Germany, 1998.
- Mulvagh, Jane, Vivienne Westwood: An Unfashionable Life, London, 1998, 1999.
- McDermott, Catherine, Vivienne Westwood, London, 1999.

Articles

- Sutton, Ann, “World’s End: Mud, Music and Fashion: Vivienne Westwood,” in American Fabrics & Fashions (Columbia, South Carolina), No. 126, 1982.
- Gleave, M., “Queen of the King’s Road,” in the Observer (London), 8 December 1982.
- Warner, M., “Counter Culture: Where London’s Avant-garde Designers Get Their Ideas,” in Connoisseur, May 1984.
- McDermott, Catherine, “Vivienne Westwood: Ten Years On,” in i-D (London), February 1986.
- Mower, Sarah, “First Lady of Punk,” in The Guardian (London), 11 December 1986.
- Buckley, Richard, and Anne Bogart, “Westwood: The ‘Queen’ of London,” in WWD, 17 March 1987.
- Barber, Lynn, “Queen of the King’s Road,” in the Sunday Express Magazine (London), 12 July 1987.
- Mower, Sarah, “The Triumphal Reign of Queen Vivienne,” in the Observer, 25 October 1987.
- Brampton, Sally, “The Prime of Miss Vivienne Westwood,” in Elle (London), September 1988.
- Roberts, Michael, “From Punk to PM,” in the Tatler (London), April 1989.
- Barber, Lynn, “How Vivienne Westwood Took the Fun Out of Frocks,” in the Independent, 18 February 1990.
- Fleury, Sylvia, “Vivienne Westwood,” in Flash Art (Milan), November-December 1994.
- Spindler, Amy M., “Four Who Have No Use for Trends,” in the New York Times, 20 March 1995.
- Menkes, Suzy, “Show, Not Clothes, Becomes the Message,” in the International Herald Tribune (Paris), 20 March 1995.
- Peres, Daniel, et al., “Blonde Ambition,” in WWD, 18 September 1996.
- Larsen, Soren, “Vivienne Westwood to Get her Own Scent in Deal with Lancaster,” in WWD, 24 January 1997.
- Lohrer, Robert, “Birds of Paradise: After 27 Years Vivienne Westwood Still Shocks and Rocks,” in DNR, 16 January 1998.

- Menkes, Suzy, "The Essence of Westwood," in the International Herald Tribune, 30 June 1998.
- "Vivienne Westwood," in Current Biography, July 1999.
- Menkes, Suzy, "Westwood: A Designer in the Wardrobe," in the International Herald Tribune, 9 May 2000.
- Jones, Rose Apodaca, "On the Road with Viv," in WWD, 27 November 2000.
- Jensen, Tanya, "Vivienne Westwood: Fairy Tale," at Fashion Windows, www.fashionwindows.com, 11 October 2001.

* * *

Vivienne Westwood's clothes have been described as perverse, irrelevant, and unwearable. Her creations have also been described as brilliant, subversive, and incredibly influential. She is unquestionably among the most important fashion designers of the late 20th century and beyond.

Westwood will go down in history as the fashion designer most closely associated with punks, the youth subculture that developed in England in the 1970s. Although her influence extends far beyond the era, Westwood's relationship with the punk subculture is critically important to an understanding of her style. Just as the mods and hippies had developed their own styles of dress and music, so did the punks. Yet while the hippies extolled love and peace, the punks emphasized sex and violence. Punk was about nihilism, blankness and chaos, and sexual deviancy, especially sadomasochism and fetishism. The classic punk style featured safety pins piercing cheeks or lips, spiky hairstyles, and deliberately revolting clothes, which often appropriated the illicit paraphernalia of pornography.

Westwood captured the essence of confrontational antifashion long before other designers recognized the subversive power of punk style. In the 1970s Westwood and her partner Malcolm McLaren had a shop in London successively named Let It Rock (1971), Too Fast to Live, Too Young to Die (1972), Sex (1974), and Seditionaries (1977). In the beginning the emphasis was on a 1950s-revival look derived from the delinquent styles of 1950s youth culture. In 1972 the shop was renamed after the slogan on a biker's leather jacket, heralding the new brutalism that would soon spread throughout both street fashion and high fashion. Black leather evoked not only antisocial bikers like the Hell's Angels, but also sadomasochistic sex, which was then widely regarded as "the last taboo."

Westwood's Bondage collection of 1976 was particularly important. Working primarily in black, especially black leather and rubber, she designed clothes that were studded, buckled, strapped, chained, and zippered. Westwood talked to people who were into sadomasochistic sex and researched the "equipment" they used. "I had to ask myself, why this extreme form of dress? Not that I strapped myself up and had sex like that. But on the other hand I also didn't want to liberally understand why people did it. I wanted to get hold of those extreme articles of clothing and feel what it was like to wear them." Taken from the hidden sexual subculture that spawned it and flaunted it on the street, bondage fashion began to take on a new range of meanings. "The bondage clothes were ostensibly restricting," she said, "but when you put them on they gave you a feeling of freedom."

Sex was "one of the all-time greatest shops in history," recalled pop star Adam Ant. The shop sign was in padded pink letters and the window was covered, except for a small opening, through which one could peep and see items like pornographic t-shirts. Westwood, in fact, was prosecuted and convicted for selling a t-shirt depicting two cowboys with exposed penises. Other shirts referred to child molesting and rape, or bore aggressive slogans like "Destroy" superimposed over a swastika and an image of the Queen.

Sex was implicitly political for Westwood; when she renamed the shop Seditionaries, it was to show "the necessity to seduce people into revolt." She insisted sex was fashion, and deliberately torn clothing was inspired by old movie stills. She also launched the fashion for underwear as outerwear, showing bras worn over dresses. From the beginning she exploited the erotic potential of extreme shoe fashions, from leopard-print stiletto-heeled pumps to towering platform shoes and boots with multiple straps and buckles.

"When we finished punk rock we started looking at other cultures," recalled Westwood. "Up till then we'd only been concerned with emotionally charged rebellious English youth movements.... We looked at all the cults that we felt had this power." The result was the Pirates Collection of 1981, which heralded the beginning of the New Romantics Movement. The Pirates Collection utilized historical revivalism, 18th-century shirts and hats, rather than fetishism, but like the sexual deviant, the pirate also evoked the mystique of the romantic rebel as outcast and criminal. Meanwhile, in 1980 the shop was renamed World's End, and in 1981 Westwood began to show her collections in Paris, finally recognized internationally as a major designer.

Like pirates and highwaymen, Westwood and McLaren wanted "to plunder the world of its ideas." The Savages Collection (1982) showed Westwood gravitating toward a tribal look—the name was deliberately offensive and shocking—and the clothes oversized, in rough fabrics, and with exposed seams. Subsequent collections, like Buffalo, Hoboes, Witches, and Punkature, continued Westwood's postmodern collage of disparate objects and images.

In 1985 Westwood launched her "mini-crini," a short hooped skirt inspired by the Victorian crinoline, and styled with a tailored jacket and platform shoes. "I take something from the past which has a sort of vitality that has never been exploited—like the crinoline," she said. Westwood insisted that "there was never a fashion invented that was more sexy, especially in the big Victorian form." She also revived the corset, another much maligned item of Victoriana—and an icon of fetish fashion. Certainly her corsets and crinolines forced people to reexplore the meaning of controversial fashions. As she moved into the late 1980s and 1990s, Westwood continued to transgress boundaries, not least by rejecting her earlier faith in antiestablishment style in favor of a subversive take on power dressing. Like "Miss Marple on acid," Westwood appropriated twinsets and tweeds, and even the traditional symbols of royal authority.

As the century drew to a close, Westwood still delighted in taking the fashion world to task. While her contemporaries and a crop of new designers were concentrating on airy, fluid, feminine ensembles, Westwood took the opposite tack with revealingly tight, clinging dresses with bawdy drawings. She expanded her reach with her first store outside the UK, in Tokyo in 1996, then launched a new denim collection, Anglomania, in 1997. Her own fragrances followed, with Boudoir in 1998 and Libertine in 2000. By the time Westwood opened a flagship store in New York, appropriately located in SoHo, she already had 20 in Asia, five in England, and another slated for Los Angeles.

Though the business part of her growing empire isn't nearly as fun as designing, the Vivienne Westwood name had been attracting new generations, even cyber shoppers. Westwood accessories and her fragrances sell at various Internet sites, and the irreverent fashion queen even launched her own website. Talking with Women's Wear

Daily (27 November 2000), she mused on her recognition. "Most people have never seen my clothes," she said, "but they've heard of me." Indeed.

—Valerie Steele; updated by Sydonie Benét

WHISTLES

British retailing firm

Established: by Lucille Lewin, in George Street, London, 1976. Lewin studied fine art in South Africa, moved to the U.S., sold furniture in Cambridge, Massachusetts; joined Conran Group, London; worked for Harvey Nichols as a buyer, until 1976. Company History: In-house range of clothes introduced, 1985; stores in the UK and in-store boutiques at Harrods, Selfridges, and Fenwicks, all in London; began exporting to U.S., to Nordstrom, Big Drop, and Charivari; opened two stores in Japan; introduced accessories line; sought location for first U.S. store, 2000. Awards: Design Led Retail award, 1994. Company Address: 12 Saint Christopher's Place, London W1M 5HB, England.

PUBLICATIONS

On WHISTLES:

Articles

- McDowell, Colin, "Whistling," in Country Life (London), 5 February 1987.
 Polan, Brenda, "Lucille Has a Ball," in the Independent (London), 16 December 1988.
 Pascal, Béatrice, "La Chaine Anglaise Whistles reve de Vendre sa Mode a Paris," in Dossier, 14 October 1991.
 "Cost Effective: The Designer," in Marie Claire, November 1993.
 "The Latest Wrinkle," in WWD, 24 November 1993.
 Fallon, James, "Whistles' New Overseas Pitch," in WWD, 25 September 1996.
 Menkes, Suzy, "What's Next—Previews from Furnishings to Fashion," in the International Herald Tribune, 9 August 1998.
 "Whistles Looks for Sites," in UK Retail Report, December 2000.

* * *

Uncomplicated, classic, and comfortable are words often used to describe the clothes designed by Lucille Lewin and sold under the Whistles retail label. Lewin combines her own moderately priced designs with other top name designer garments to create individual style for what is described as the confident and independent woman. Inspired by the fine arts, history, and culture, Lewin's collection is designed along a narrow color range, setting the foundation and tone for each season in Whistles' shops. In many respects, Whistles may be compared with other British retailers such as Terence Conran and Joseph Ettedgui—all of whom are concerned with creating identities and consistency of style.

Lewin was originally a fine arts student from South Africa. After a brief period in the U.S., Lewin and her husband moved to London and opened the first of the Whistles shop in 1974. Lewin gained considerable retail experience at Harvey Nichols' 21 Shop in London, and developed an aptitude for finding new talent. Owning her own shop provided an opportunity to stock clothes by young, often virtually unknown designers. In the early 1970s the careers of British designers Wendy Dagworthy, Betty Jackson, Ally Capellino, and French designer Myrène de Prémonville were launched by Lewin and have proven to be major sales successes.

To reinforce the Whistles identity, Lewin began producing her own range of clothes in 1985. The collection consists of tailored garments, knitwear, swimwear, accessories, and shoes, with cuts ranging from classic to baggy. Natural fabrics, such as cotton and linen, were the mainstay of the collection, but Lewin is not averse to experimenting with new synthetic fabrics she deems appropriate to achieve the looks and the feel of a collection. Lewin draws inspiration from a variety of sources reinforced by her training as an artist. Morocco, India, and Tunisia have inspired desert-colored jersey sarong skirts and wrapover tops. In contrast, her designs of crisp, sporty navy-and-white garments in gabardine, linen, and cotton were influenced by baggy sailor trousers and tailored jackets from the 1920s. Another influence may be traced in her tweed suits, which are reminiscent of Chanel's simple and classic tailoring.

Lewin promotes her designs as mix-and-match pieces—not only with her own designs but with those of other designers. In effect, Lewin is acting as fashion "editor," both buying and designing garments. Her approach provides greater flexibility and choice in responding to individual preferences and budgets. In addition, through carefully considered color groups and fabric selections, overall moods may be more easily and effectively established than if garments were designed as self-contained sets. Her approach is similar in attitude to the collections of American designer Donna Karan, and has provided British women with affordable, casual apparel preserving classical appeal.

In the middle 1990s there Whistles shops dotting the UK, two freestanding stores in Japan, and growing international recognition. Exports to U.S. retailers such as Nordstrom, Scoop, and Big Drop had also grown substantially, making the country Lewin's biggest wholesaler. To further capitalize on demand, Lewin launched a coordinating accessories line of handbags, gloves, hats, and footwear. Next on the agenda were swimwear and an innerwear collection, and a more integrated range of separates for the U.S. market. By 2000, Lewin was scouting locations in the U.S. to open Whistles' first freestanding American store.

Lucille Lewin's contribution to British fashion can be recognized on at least two levels—first, she provided a moderately priced retail shop for women who want to create an individual look without succumbing to trendy fashions; and second, her unique approach to fashion retailing has enabled her to design under the Whistles label, thereby establishing and maintaining a strong and consistent foundation for the each season's garments. This combination of retail and design distinguishes her work from other contemporary British fashion designers.

—Teal Triggs; updated by Nelly Rhodes

WORKERS FOR FREEDOM

British design firm

Founded: in 1985 by Richard Nott and Graham Fraser. Nott was born in Hastings, England, 3 October 1947; studied at Kingston University; design assistant to Valentino, Rome, 1972–75; principal lecturer,

Daily (27 November 2000), she mused on her recognition. "Most people have never seen my clothes," she said, "but they've heard of me." Indeed.

—Valerie Steele; updated by Sydonie Benét

WHISTLES

British retailing firm

Established: by Lucille Lewin, in George Street, London, 1976. Lewin studied fine art in South Africa, moved to the U.S., sold furniture in Cambridge, Massachusetts; joined Conran Group, London; worked for Harvey Nichols as a buyer, until 1976. Company History: In-house range of clothes introduced, 1985; stores in the UK and in-store boutiques at Harrods, Selfridges, and Fenwicks, all in London; began exporting to U.S., to Nordstrom, Big Drop, and Charivari; opened two stores in Japan; introduced accessories line; sought location for first U.S. store, 2000. Awards: Design Led Retail award, 1994. Company Address: 12 Saint Christopher's Place, London W1M 5HB, England.

PUBLICATIONS

On WHISTLES:

Articles

- McDowell, Colin, "Whistling," in Country Life (London), 5 February 1987.
 Polan, Brenda, "Lucille Has a Ball," in the Independent (London), 16 December 1988.
 Pascal, Béatrice, "La Chaine Anglaise Whistles reve de Vendre sa Mode a Paris," in Dossier, 14 October 1991.
 "Cost Effective: The Designer," in Marie Claire, November 1993.
 "The Latest Wrinkle," in WWD, 24 November 1993.
 Fallon, James, "Whistles' New Overseas Pitch," in WWD, 25 September 1996.
 Menkes, Suzy, "What's Next—Previews from Furnishings to Fashion," in the International Herald Tribune, 9 August 1998.
 "Whistles Looks for Sites," in UK Retail Report, December 2000.

* * *

Uncomplicated, classic, and comfortable are words often used to describe the clothes designed by Lucille Lewin and sold under the Whistles retail label. Lewin combines her own moderately priced designs with other top name designer garments to create individual style for what is described as the confident and independent woman. Inspired by the fine arts, history, and culture, Lewin's collection is designed along a narrow color range, setting the foundation and tone for each season in Whistles' shops. In many respects, Whistles may be compared with other British retailers such as Terence Conran and Joseph Ettedgui—all of whom are concerned with creating identities and consistency of style.

Lewin was originally a fine arts student from South Africa. After a brief period in the U.S., Lewin and her husband moved to London and opened the first of the Whistles shop in 1974. Lewin gained considerable retail experience at Harvey Nichols' 21 Shop in London, and developed an aptitude for finding new talent. Owning her own shop provided an opportunity to stock clothes by young, often virtually unknown designers. In the early 1970s the careers of British designers Wendy Dagworthy, Betty Jackson, Ally Capellino, and French designer Myrène de Prémonville were launched by Lewin and have proven to be major sales successes.

To reinforce the Whistles identity, Lewin began producing her own range of clothes in 1985. The collection consists of tailored garments, knitwear, swimwear, accessories, and shoes, with cuts ranging from classic to baggy. Natural fabrics, such as cotton and linen, were the mainstay of the collection, but Lewin is not averse to experimenting with new synthetic fabrics she deems appropriate to achieve the looks and the feel of a collection. Lewin draws inspiration from a variety of sources reinforced by her training as an artist. Morocco, India, and Tunisia have inspired desert-colored jersey sarong skirts and wrapover tops. In contrast, her designs of crisp, sporty navy-and-white garments in gabardine, linen, and cotton were influenced by baggy sailor trousers and tailored jackets from the 1920s. Another influence may be traced in her tweed suits, which are reminiscent of Chanel's simple and classic tailoring.

Lewin promotes her designs as mix-and-match pieces—not only with her own designs but with those of other designers. In effect, Lewin is acting as fashion "editor," both buying and designing garments. Her approach provides greater flexibility and choice in responding to individual preferences and budgets. In addition, through carefully considered color groups and fabric selections, overall moods may be more easily and effectively established than if garments were designed as self-contained sets. Her approach is similar in attitude to the collections of American designer Donna Karan, and has provided British women with affordable, casual apparel preserving classical appeal.

In the middle 1990s there Whistles shops dotting the UK, two freestanding stores in Japan, and growing international recognition. Exports to U.S. retailers such as Nordstrom, Scoop, and Big Drop had also grown substantially, making the country Lewin's biggest wholesaler. To further capitalize on demand, Lewin launched a coordinating accessories line of handbags, gloves, hats, and footwear. Next on the agenda were swimwear and an innerwear collection, and a more integrated range of separates for the U.S. market. By 2000, Lewin was scouting locations in the U.S. to open Whistles' first freestanding American store.

Lucille Lewin's contribution to British fashion can be recognized on at least two levels—first, she provided a moderately priced retail shop for women who want to create an individual look without succumbing to trendy fashions; and second, her unique approach to fashion retailing has enabled her to design under the Whistles label, thereby establishing and maintaining a strong and consistent foundation for the each season's garments. This combination of retail and design distinguishes her work from other contemporary British fashion designers.

—Teal Triggs; updated by Nelly Rhodes

WORKERS FOR FREEDOM

British design firm

Founded: in 1985 by Richard Nott and Graham Fraser. Nott was born in Hastings, England, 3 October 1947; studied at Kingston University; design assistant to Valentino, Rome, 1972–75; principal lecturer,

Daily (27 November 2000), she mused on her recognition. "Most people have never seen my clothes," she said, "but they've heard of me." Indeed.

—Valerie Steele; updated by Sydonie Benét

WHISTLES

British retailing firm

Established: by Lucille Lewin, in George Street, London, 1976. Lewin studied fine art in South Africa, moved to the U.S., sold furniture in Cambridge, Massachusetts; joined Conran Group, London; worked for Harvey Nichols as a buyer, until 1976. Company History: In-house range of clothes introduced, 1985; stores in the UK and in-store boutiques at Harrods, Selfridges, and Fenwicks, all in London; began exporting to U.S., to Nordstrom, Big Drop, and Charivari; opened two stores in Japan; introduced accessories line; sought location for first U.S. store, 2000. Awards: Design Led Retail award, 1994. Company Address: 12 Saint Christopher's Place, London W1M 5HB, England.

PUBLICATIONS

On WHISTLES:

Articles

- McDowell, Colin, "Whistling," in Country Life (London), 5 February 1987.
 Polan, Brenda, "Lucille Has a Ball," in the Independent (London), 16 December 1988.
 Pascal, Béatrice, "La Chaine Anglaise Whistles reve de Vendre sa Mode a Paris," in Dossier, 14 October 1991.
 "Cost Effective: The Designer," in Marie Claire, November 1993.
 "The Latest Wrinkle," in WWD, 24 November 1993.
 Fallon, James, "Whistles' New Overseas Pitch," in WWD, 25 September 1996.
 Menkes, Suzy, "What's Next—Previews from Furnishings to Fashion," in the International Herald Tribune, 9 August 1998.
 "Whistles Looks for Sites," in UK Retail Report, December 2000.

* * *

Uncomplicated, classic, and comfortable are words often used to describe the clothes designed by Lucille Lewin and sold under the Whistles retail label. Lewin combines her own moderately priced designs with other top name designer garments to create individual style for what is described as the confident and independent woman. Inspired by the fine arts, history, and culture, Lewin's collection is designed along a narrow color range, setting the foundation and tone for each season in Whistles' shops. In many respects, Whistles may be compared with other British retailers such as Terence Conran and Joseph Ettedgui—all of whom are concerned with creating identities and consistency of style.

Lewin was originally a fine arts student from South Africa. After a brief period in the U.S., Lewin and her husband moved to London and opened the first of the Whistles shop in 1974. Lewin gained considerable retail experience at Harvey Nichols' 21 Shop in London, and developed an aptitude for finding new talent. Owning her own shop provided an opportunity to stock clothes by young, often virtually unknown designers. In the early 1970s the careers of British designers Wendy Dagworthy, Betty Jackson, Ally Capellino, and French designer Myrène de Prémonville were launched by Lewin and have proven to be major sales successes.

To reinforce the Whistles identity, Lewin began producing her own range of clothes in 1985. The collection consists of tailored garments, knitwear, swimwear, accessories, and shoes, with cuts ranging from classic to baggy. Natural fabrics, such as cotton and linen, were the mainstay of the collection, but Lewin is not averse to experimenting with new synthetic fabrics she deems appropriate to achieve the looks and the feel of a collection. Lewin draws inspiration from a variety of sources reinforced by her training as an artist. Morocco, India, and Tunisia have inspired desert-colored jersey sarong skirts and wrapover tops. In contrast, her designs of crisp, sporty navy-and-white garments in gabardine, linen, and cotton were influenced by baggy sailor trousers and tailored jackets from the 1920s. Another influence may be traced in her tweed suits, which are reminiscent of Chanel's simple and classic tailoring.

Lewin promotes her designs as mix-and-match pieces—not only with her own designs but with those of other designers. In effect, Lewin is acting as fashion "editor," both buying and designing garments. Her approach provides greater flexibility and choice in responding to individual preferences and budgets. In addition, through carefully considered color groups and fabric selections, overall moods may be more easily and effectively established than if garments were designed as self-contained sets. Her approach is similar in attitude to the collections of American designer Donna Karan, and has provided British women with affordable, casual apparel preserving classical appeal.

In the middle 1990s there Whistles shops dotting the UK, two freestanding stores in Japan, and growing international recognition. Exports to U.S. retailers such as Nordstrom, Scoop, and Big Drop had also grown substantially, making the country Lewin's biggest wholesaler. To further capitalize on demand, Lewin launched a coordinating accessories line of handbags, gloves, hats, and footwear. Next on the agenda were swimwear and an innerwear collection, and a more integrated range of separates for the U.S. market. By 2000, Lewin was scouting locations in the U.S. to open Whistles' first freestanding American store.

Lucille Lewin's contribution to British fashion can be recognized on at least two levels—first, she provided a moderately priced retail shop for women who want to create an individual look without succumbing to trendy fashions; and second, her unique approach to fashion retailing has enabled her to design under the Whistles label, thereby establishing and maintaining a strong and consistent foundation for the each season's garments. This combination of retail and design distinguishes her work from other contemporary British fashion designers.

—Teal Triggs; updated by Nelly Rhodes

WORKERS FOR FREEDOM

British design firm

Founded: in 1985 by Richard Nott and Graham Fraser. Nott was born in Hastings, England, 3 October 1947; studied at Kingston University; design assistant to Valentino, Rome, 1972–75; principal lecturer, Kingston University Fashion School, 1975–85. Fraser was born in Bournemouth, 20 July 1948; studied accountancy and fashion retailing; worked as buyer/accountant, Feathers Boutique, London, 1970–71; assistant buyer, Harrods, London, 1975–78; buyer for Wallis Shops, London, 1978–81; advertising manager, Fortnum & Mason, London, 1981–82; fashion director, Liberty, London, 1982–85. Company History: Nott and Fraser operated first Workers for Freedom shop, Soho, London, 1985–92; introduced menswear and womenswear wholesale collections for Littlewoods Home Shopping catalogue, beginning in summer 1993; womenswear collection for A-Wear, Dublin, summer 1994; signed licensing deal with Mark Margolis, 1996; Anthony Cuthbertson hired as designer (left in 2000). Exhibitions: Dayton Hudson, Minneapolis, 1991; Fenit, São Paolo, Brazil, 1992. Awards: British Fashion Council Designers of the Year award, 1990; Viyella Designer of the Year award, 1990. Company Address: 6 Spice Court, Ivory Square, Plantation Wharf, London SW11 3UE, England.

PUBLICATIONS

On WORKERS FOR FREEDOM:

Books

- Coleridge, Nicholas, The Fashion Conspiracy, London, 1988.
 Wilson, Elizabeth, and Lou Taylor, Through the Looking Glass, to accompany BBC TV series, London, 1989.

Articles

- Anderson, Lisa, "London's New 'New Look' British Designers Come of Age," in Chicago Tribune, 22 October 1986.
 Lorna, James, "Fashion Review," in the Independent (London), 20 February 1987.
 "An Overnight Sensation in London," in Newsweek, 30 March 1987.
 Cenac, Laetitia, profile, in Madame Figaro (Paris), October 1988.
 Anderson, Lisa, "London Sees the Light," in Chicago Tribune, 19 October 1989.
 Roberts, Nancy, "Workers White," in Marie Claire (London), April 1990.
 Flett, Kathryn, fashion reviews, in the Sunday Times Magazine (London), 2 September 1990.
 Buck, Genevieve, "...Moderately Priced Lines," in Chicago Tribune, 6 March 1991.
 Fallon, James, "Workers Pave Wider Trail (Designers Richard Nott and Graham Fraser)," 25 September 1996.
 Klensch, Elsa, "Workers for Freedom March Down the Runway in London," from Style Online, CNN.com, www.cnn.com, 9 January 1997.

* * *

Graham Fraser and Richard Nott launched their company, Workers for Freedom, in 1985 leaving behind their respective former careers as merchandising manager for fashion and accessories at Liberty in London and principal fashion lecturer at Kingston University in Surrey. Nott came from an art school background, and also worked for three years as design assistant to Valentino in Rome.

The company name was chosen to emphasize what they saw as their freedom from the large companies for whom they had previously worked. Their former experience in the fashion field left them well qualified to set up their own fashion company which, among other things, earned them the title Designer of the Year at the British Fashion Awards in 1990. The reason behind the formation of their own label, according to Nott and Fraser, was their mutual disillusion with what was happening in the field of menswear at the time and their aversion to very "preppy" styles with little or no decorative adornment.

The first Workers for Freedom collection, which was sold through their retail shop in Lower John Street in London's Soho district, was comprised solely of menswear. The garment that became their hallmark was the embroidered shirt, in black-on-white or white-on-black combinations. The success of this first collection, which attracted both male and female customers, prompted Workers for Freedom to extend the next collection to womenswear, at the request of the American and Japanese buyers who bought their apparel.

In the beginning, Nott and Fraser designs were outside mainstream fashion trends, and their customers were not concerned with being in fashion. Though not antifashion exactly, the evolutionary nature of their designs meant that each season customers could add an outfit or single garment to those from previous collections. Nott described Workers for Freedom clothing as "very gentle" and admitted that at one point during the 1980s, with the advent of designers like Christian Lacroix, their designs seemed somewhat out of place with what was happening in fashion as a whole.

According to Nott, who designed the early collections (Fraser handled the administrative and promotions side), his inspiration came from the fabric itself, which ultimately determined the shape or form of the garment. Nott viewed each garment within a collection as an individual piece, designed as a separate item and the collection is styled afterwards. The fabric for which Workers for Freedom became best known was silk, which they used either plain or in Nott's textile prints. Signature colors were subtle, with a predominant use of black, brown, ivory, and indigo blue.

In late 1991 Workers for Freedom began working for Littlewoods mail order catalogue, for whom they designed a separate collection each season. The Littlewoods connection was viewed by Nott and Fraser as a diffusion collection, produced at a lower price range which helped maintain their name at the High Street level. This left them free to make their mainline collection more "rarefied," since the sports-wear element was soon incorporated into other ranges such as Littlewoods and a collection for A-Wear shops in Ireland, distributed by the company Brown Thomas.

The decision by Workers for Freedom to move to France in 1992 attracted a considerable amount of publicity from the British press. Nott and Fraser had sold their shop in Soho and considered moving the business to Toulouse where they found a château and hoped to establish the company. This fell through when the exchange rate dropped and they found themselves unable to sell their London house. During this period they kept a low profile, did not produce a collection for fall/winter 1993 and moved the company headquarters to Battersea, South London.

The six-month break from producing spurred a reevaluation period for Workers for Freedom, and succeeding collections indicated a definite change in direction, as well as limiting sales to primarily the UK. Their signature use of embroidery was dropped ("because everyone has it now," says Nott), and there was an emphasis on shape using bias-cutting Nott saw as the new softer alternative to stretch Lycra fabrics. The fall/winter collection for 1994–95 was produced entirely in black and brown, without embroidery or other form of decoration.

In 1996 Nott and Fraser took their design business in a new direction, severing ties with Littlewoods in favor of aggressive global expansion. The duo forged an alliance with the Los Angeles-based Michael Margolis, to bring a new collection of Workers for Freedom sportswear to the U.S. market. The threesome formed Workers for Freedom Inc., based in Los Angeles, to handle manufacturing and distribution of the new apparel, priced to sell alongside such hip brands as CK and DKNY in better department stores. The first collection debuted in Paris, followed by a stint at London Fashion Week, with jeans, Lycra separates, cotton and nylon skirts, and jackets.

Commenting on the new Workers for Freedom line to Women's Wear Daily (25 September 1996), Nott enthused, "This is an entirely new price point and market for us, and we're taking it stage by stage.... We are extremely confident about the future; this is what we have been trying to do for all these years. For me, it's true freedom at last." Elsa Klensch, writing for Style online at CNN's website (9 January 1997), praised Nott and Fraser's new direction, saying, "The constant in Workers for Freedom is the collection's casual nature—and its dare to give femininity a special flair." Workers for Freedom's flair remained intact for the remainder of the 1990s and into the 21st century, despite some changes within the firm's ranks. Anthony Cuthbertson joined Nott and Fraser, designing popular collections in 1999, but left the Workers for Freedom fold in 2000.

—Catherine Woram; updated by Owen James

WRIGHT, Trevor

See FENN WRIGHT MANSON

Y-Z

YAMAMOTO, Kansai

Japanese designer

Born: Yokohama, Japan, 1944. Education: Studied civil engineering and English, Nippon University; graduated from Bunka College of Fashion, 1967. Career: Apprenticed with Junko Koshino and Hosano; designer, Hisashi Hosono, circa 1968–71; opened firm, Yamamoto Kansai Company, Ltd., Tokyo, and showed first collection, London, 1971; first Paris showing, 1975; opened Kansai Boutique, Paris, 1977; organized program for India-Japan Mixed Cultural Cooperation Committee, 1997; worked with Junko Koshino revitalizing the kimono, 1999; took Ningensanka eyewear line to the Middle East; signed licensing deal with Ayoyama USA for eyewear, 2001. Awards: Soen prize, Bunka College of Fashion, 1967; Fashion Editors award, Tokyo, 1977. Address: 4–3–15 Jungumae, Shibuya-ku, Tokyo 150, Japan.

PUBLICATIONS

On YAMAMOTO:

Books

Koren, Leonard, New Fashion Japan, Tokyo, 1984.
Contemporary Designers, Third Edition, Detroit, 1997.

Articles

- Queen, Bobbie, “Kansai Confidence,” in WWD, 28 January 1985.
Steber, Maggie, “Future Shock, with the Brilliant Innovators of Japanese Fashion,” in Connoisseur, September 1986.
DuCann, Charlotte, “Zen and the Art of the Real Shirt,” in the Independent (London), 29 June 1989.
Strauss, Frédéric, “Au Vrai Chic Wendersein,” in Cahiers du Cinema (Paris), December 1989.
Martin, Richard, “Sailing to Byzantium: A Fashion Odyssey, 1990–91,” in Textile & Test, 14 February 1991.
“Emerging Vision and Aoyama USA Sign Trading Partnership Contract,” in Business Wire, 15 February 2001.
“Ajisu-cho in Yamaguchi Hosts the Japan Expo Yamaguchi 2001,” available online at Japan Travel Updates, www.jnto.go.jp, 14 October 2001.
“The Investigation of the Truth of the Design and the Beauty,” available online at Gifu City Women’s College, www.gifu-cwc.ac.jp, 14 October 2001.
“More Opportunity Surfaces in the Gulf as Eyewear Demand Levels Up,” online at Optical Middle East, www.opticalmiddleeast.com, 14 October 2001.
“1980s Kansai Yamamoto Silk Scribble Skirt,” online at Enoki World, www.enokeworld.com, 14 October 2001.

“Signed Kansai Yamamoto,” online at Yoko Trading Company, www.yokotrading.com, 14 October 2001.

“Yukata,” online at What’s Cool in Japan, www.jcic.or.jp, 14 October 2001.

* * *

Kansai Yamamoto’s presentation of his fall-winter 1981–82 collection was divided into 14 parts, among them Peruvian Geometry, Sarraku (Japanese 17th-century painter), Korean Tiger, Ainu, and Sea Foam 5 Men Kabuki Play. Yamamoto declared in the accompanying program notes: “True originality is almost impossible to imitate as it is the expression of the creator’s personal experience and cultural environment. As a Japanese, I always seek the ‘Oriental quality’ that is within me.” Yet Yamamoto’s personal sensibility is a single aspect of Orientalism and reflects a style relatively little known in the West in Asian forms, but comparable to many traditions of the West.

Yamamoto is Kabuki in his overt theatricality, flamboyant sense of gesture and design, and brilliant colorful design as much to be read from afar as admired at close range. Leonard Koren, writing in New Fashion Japan, (1984) said, “For Kansai, fashion means creating a festival-like feeling using brightly colored clothes with bold design motifs inspired by the kimono, traditional Japanese festival wear, and military clothes.” Gaudy by desire, larger-than-life by theater’s intensity, and virtually to Japanese culture what Pop style was to Anglo-American culture, Yamamoto has consistently cultivated a fashion of fantastic images, extravagant imagination, and sensuous approach to both tradition and a view of the future.

Unabashed entertainer and impresario (long a familiar product spokesman on Japanese television), Yamamoto achieved cult status in the 1970s for his worldly transmission of Japanese culture. His work has often been controversial in Japan inasmuch as it is thought to promote and exploit images of Japanese vulgarity internationally. Is Yamamoto creating an “airport art,” expensive exoticism for the West that still thinks of an East Asia of bright colors, lanterned festivals, Kabuki masks, and fabulist stories with dragons and tigers? Yamamoto seems poised between traditional Japanese culture, the Pop sensibility of the late 20th century, and a longing for a millennial future.

Central to Yamamoto’s work is his delight in mass entertainment and popular culture, a sense of both following and leading the ordinary population whether in graphic t-shirts or the convenience of knitwear. His silhouettes for both menswear and womenswear are extreme, suggesting either the most wondrous last samurai or the most magnificent first warriors for intergalactic futures; his appliqués have been in the ambiguous realm between primitive art and 20th-century abstraction.

In a West frightened by Japanese militarism (no Yukio Mishima, but no Buddhist monk either, Yamamoto has drawn inspiration from firefighter’s uniforms and other easily identified work vestments traditional in Japanese subcultures of conformity) and prone to disregard any popular culture if not its own, Yamamoto became a designer of special but limited interest in the 1980s. His less-than-solemn work is ridiculous to some, celebratory to others. Cerebral, spiritual, aestheticized Japan (as represented by Issey Miyake or Rei Kawakubo) seemed more ideal, especially to the West. Yamamoto's plebeian flash was for many in the West the worst of two worlds.

Kansai Yamamoto, 1995: Vietnamese children wearing Yamamoto-designed turtle outfits for a re-enactment of the Vietnamese Hoan Kiem Lake turtle folktale during Ciao! Vietnam Kansai Super Event, Hanoi, Vietnam. © AP/Wide World Photos.

Yamamoto's sensibility, however, is universal. If he was the first fashion designer to bring Kabuki circus-like joy, impertinence, and Japanese common culture to international fashion, and has remained a significant figure in espousing such conspicuous love of theater, a love of life, and love of exaggeration. His aggrandizements begin in delight and exuberance and end in celebration of the most universal kind. They benefit from a relationship to costume, though Yamamoto is always grounded in the wearability of his clothing. They often function as happy graphic signs, emblems of the most bold in fashion. On the opening of his Madison Avenue boutique in 1985, Kansai remarked to Women's Wear Daily, "My clothes are no good for someone who loves chicness." If we understand chic to be slightly haughty and narrowly sophisticated, Yamamoto misses the mark by express intention. Rather, he is seeking an earthy, populist ideal of clothing created in the grand gesture for the great audience. "I am making happiness for people with my clothes. If you walk through Central Park in them you create a 'wow.'"

In July 1999 Yamamoto explored the yukato, the traditional single-layered cotton kimono worn next to the skin. He and Japanese designer Junko Koshina helped to update and popularize the versatile garment for sale in department stores. Initially intended for after-bath and relaxing, it began to appear in outdoor styles featuring Western flower, fruit, and animal prints in black and dark green with matching obi, geta, ornamental hairpins, fans, and cloth.

At the end of the year, as demand for eyewear in the Middle East expanded rapidly, Yamamoto showed his stylish Ningensanka line at the Middle Eastern optical exhibition held at the Dubai World Trade Center in the United Arab Emirates. The exhibit targeted medium and upper-level consumers, the eyeglass shoppers for whom Yamamoto designs frames. In February 2001, Emerging Vision Inc. announced formation of a trading partnership with Aoyama USA, leading Japanese manufacturer of high-end titanium eyeglass frames and sunglasses. Employing online services to support their supply chain worldwide, Aoyama retained exclusive U.S. distribution of Yamamoto's brand.

In addition to garments and eyeglasses, Yamamoto's creative contributions influenced a variety of venues. In November 1997, following the ninth meeting of the India-Japan Mixed Cultural Cooperation Committee, he organized "Hello India," a program promoting relations between the two countries. For the Japan Expo in 2001 he designed daily performances for the main pavilion. At Gifu

City Women's College, he has served annually as designer-in-residence and delivered lectures to students who intend to specialize in fashion design, production, distribution, and advertisement.

—Richard Martin; updated by Mary Ellen Snodgrass

YAMAMOTO, Yohji

Japanese designer

Born: Yokohama, Japan, 1943. Education: Graduated in Law, Keio University, 1966; studied at Bunka College of Fashion, Tokyo, 1966–68, won Soen and Endu prizes; earned scholarship to Paris, 1968, studied fashion, 1968–70. Career: Designer, custom clothing, Tokyo, from 1970; formed ready-to-wear company, 1972; showed first collection, Tokyo, 1976; launched men's line, 1984; Yohji Yamamoto design studio, Tokyo, established, 1988; also opened Paris boutique; collaborated with Wim Wenders on film Notebook on Cities and Clothes, Berlin, 1989; signed licensing deal with Patou for

Yohji Yamamoto, fall/winter 2001–02 ready-to-wear collection.
© AP/Wide World Photos.

fragrances, 1994; first fragrance, for women, Yohji, 1996; debuted womenswear collection in New York, 1996; opened new store in London, 1997; second women's scent, Yohji Essential, 1998; first men's fragrance, Yohji Homme, 1999; opened first freestanding boutique in SoHo, 1999; considered introducing cosmetics line, early 2000s. Exhibitions: A New Wave in Fashion: 3 Japanese Designers, Phoenix Art Museum, Arizona, 1983. Awards: Fashion Editors Club award, Tokyo, 1982; Mainichi grand prize, 1984, Fashion Group International, Master of Design, 1997. Address: San Shin Building 1, 1–22–11 Higashi Shibuya-ku, Tokyo, Japan.

PUBLICATIONS

By YAMAMOTO:

Books

Yohji Yamamoto, with François Baudot, Paris, 1997.

On YAMAMOTO:

Books

Phoenix Art Museum, A New Wave in Fashion: Three Japanese Designers [exhibition catalogue], Phoenix, Arizona 1983.

Koren, Leonard, New Fashion Japan, Tokyo, 1984.

Fraser, Kennedy, Scenes from the Fashionable World, New York, 1987.

Sparke, Penny, Japanese Design, London, 1987.

Coleridge, Nicholas, The Fashion Conspiracy, London, 1988.

Stegemeyer, Anne, Who's Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.

Articles

"Big, Bold and Black: The Japanese Fashion Invasion," in Life, April 1983.

"Yohji Yamamoto: Fashion Designer," in Blueprint (London), February 1987.

"In Pursuit of Excellence," in i-D (London), May 1987.

"Mr. Yamamoto Comes Back to Town," in Blueprint (London), December 1987.

"Yohji Yamamoto: La vie d'artiste," in Elle (Paris), 19 September 1988.

Montagu, Georgina, "A Life in the Day of Yohji Yamamoto," in the Sunday Times Magazine (London), 26 February 1989.

Flett, Kathryn, "Yohji by Knight: Photography at Work," in The Face (London), April 1989.

Deslaudieres, Ainree, "Le long voyage à la rencontre de Yohji Yamamoto," in L'Officiel (Paris), May 1989.

"Yohji Yamamoto: Les femmes et moi," in Vogue (Paris), November 1989.

Sudjic, Deyan, "Go Yohji, Go!," in the Sunday Times Magazine (London), 2 December 1990.

"Yohji Yamamoto in Deal to Develop Fragrance," in WWD, 5 July 1994.

Koshi, Lorna, "Yohji's New York Minute," in WWD, 12 December 1994.

"The Paris Collections—The Ideas of March: Yohji Yamamoto," in WWD, 17 March 1995.

Kerwin, Jessica, "Yamamoto Bites into the Big Apple," in WWD, 26 March 1996.

Aktar, Alev, "Yohji Readies Scent," in WWD, 12 July 1996.

City Women's College, he has served annually as designer-in-residence and delivered lectures to students who intend to specialize in fashion design, production, distribution, and advertisement.

—Richard Martin; updated by Mary Ellen Snodgrass

YAMAMOTO, Yohji

Japanese designer

Born: Yokohama, Japan, 1943. Education: Graduated in Law, Keio University, 1966; studied at Bunka College of Fashion, Tokyo, 1966–68, won Soen and Endu prizes; earned scholarship to Paris, 1968, studied fashion, 1968–70. Career: Designer, custom clothing, Tokyo, from 1970; formed ready-to-wear company, 1972; showed first collection, Tokyo, 1976; launched men's line, 1984; Yohji Yamamoto design studio, Tokyo, established, 1988; also opened Paris boutique; collaborated with Wim Wenders on film Notebook on Cities and Clothes, Berlin, 1989; signed licensing deal with Patou for

Yohji Yamamoto, fall/winter 2001–02 ready-to-wear collection.
© AP/Wide World Photos.

fragrances, 1994; first fragrance, for women, Yohji, 1996; debuted womenswear collection in New York, 1996; opened new store in London, 1997; second women's scent, Yohji Essential, 1998; first men's fragrance, Yohji Homme, 1999; opened first freestanding boutique in SoHo, 1999; considered introducing cosmetics line, early 2000s. Exhibitions: A New Wave in Fashion: 3 Japanese Designers, Phoenix Art Museum, Arizona, 1983. Awards: Fashion Editors Club award, Tokyo, 1982; Mainichi grand prize, 1984, Fashion Group International, Master of Design, 1997. Address: San Shin Building 1, 1–22–11 Higashi Shibuya-ku, Tokyo, Japan.

PUBLICATIONS

By YAMAMOTO:

Books

Yohji Yamamoto, with François Baudot, Paris, 1997.

On YAMAMOTO:

Books

Phoenix Art Museum, A New Wave in Fashion: Three Japanese Designers [exhibition catalogue], Phoenix, Arizona 1983.

Koren, Leonard, New Fashion Japan, Tokyo, 1984.

Fraser, Kennedy, Scenes from the Fashionable World, New York, 1987.

Sparke, Penny, Japanese Design, London, 1987.

Coleridge, Nicholas, The Fashion Conspiracy, London, 1988.

Stegemeyer, Anne, Who's Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.

Articles

"Big, Bold and Black: The Japanese Fashion Invasion," in Life, April 1983.

"Yohji Yamamoto: Fashion Designer," in Blueprint (London), February 1987.

"In Pursuit of Excellence," in i-D (London), May 1987.

"Mr. Yamamoto Comes Back to Town," in Blueprint (London), December 1987.

"Yohji Yamamoto: La vie d'artiste," in Elle (Paris), 19 September 1988.

Montagu, Georgina, "A Life in the Day of Yohji Yamamoto," in the Sunday Times Magazine (London), 26 February 1989.

Flett, Kathryn, "Yohji by Knight: Photography at Work," in The Face (London), April 1989.

Deslaudieres, Ainree, "Le long voyage à la rencontre de Yohji Yamamoto," in L'Officiel (Paris), May 1989.

"Yohji Yamamoto: Les femmes et moi," in Vogue (Paris), November 1989.

Sudjic, Deyan, "Go Yohji, Go!," in the Sunday Times Magazine (London), 2 December 1990.

"Yohji Yamamoto in Deal to Develop Fragrance," in WWD, 5 July 1994.

Koshi, Lorna, "Yohji's New York Minute," in WWD, 12 December 1994.

"The Paris Collections—The Ideas of March: Yohji Yamamoto," in WWD, 17 March 1995.

Kerwin, Jessica, "Yamamoto Bites into the Big Apple," in WWD, 26 March 1996.

Aktar, Alev, "Yohji Readies Scent," in WWD, 12 July 1996.

- Born, Peter, "Yohji Scent to Make U.S. Debut—Quietly," in WWD, 31 January 1997.
- Foley, Bridget, "The Master Builders: Three Paris Titans Show How It's Done—Karl Lagerfeld at Chanel, Yohji Yamamoto, and Jean-Paul Gaultier)," in WWD, 16 March 1998.
- Ozzard, Janet, "May Debut for Yohji Homme, in WWD, 2 April 1999.
- Chua, Lawrence, "Yohji Yamamoto—Exploring the Yamamoto Cult," in WWD, 13 September 1999.
- "Punk Power or Rich Romantics," in WWD, 29 February 2000.
- "A Languid Air—Designer Yohji Yamamoto's Spring Collection," in WWD, 1 November 2000.

* * *

Part of a pioneering fashion sensibility that erupted onto the Parisian catwalks of the early 1980s, Yohji Yamamoto has a philosophical approach to fashion that makes him interested in more than just covering the body: there has to be some interaction between the body, the wearer, and the essential spirit of the designer. With Issey Miyake and Rei Kawakubo, Yamamoto is exploring new ways of dressing by synthesizing Western clothing archetypes and indigenous Japanese clothing. Refusing to accept traditional ideas of female sexual display and reacting against the Western notion of female glamour as expressed in titillating figure-hugging garments, Yamamoto employs a method of layering, draping, and wrapping the body, disguising it with somber, unstructured, swathed garments based on the kimono that ignore the usual accentuation points.

Yohji Yamamoto, fall/winter 2001–02 ready-to-wear collection.
© AP/Wide World Photos.

Uncompromising to Western eyes, Yamamoto is in fact investigating the traditional Japanese conviction in beauty being not naturally given but expressed through the manipulation of the possibilities of the colours and materials of garments. Consequently, Yamamoto's clothing construction is viewed in the round rather than vertically, not from the neck down as in Western fashion, but a rectilinear, two dimensional approach that explores the visual appeal of asymmetry, the notion of the picturesque that plays an important part in Japanese design philosophy where irregular forms are appreciated for their lack of artifice and thus closeness to nature. Therefore, Yamamoto's garments have strange flaps, pockets, and layers, lopsided collars and hems, set off by the body in motion, and the labels inside are inscribed with the epithet, "There is nothing so boring as a neat and tidy look."

By not referring to Western fashion but to a fixed form of Japanese dress that has been developed and refined over the centuries, Yamamoto produces anti-fashion—non-directional garments that ignore contemporary Western developments of the silhouette but influence Western designers in turn. Beauty is more indefinable, to be found in the texture of materials rather than applied decoration, with the use of fabrics like linen and rayon that have been deliberately chosen and developed for their likelihood of wrinkling and heavy knitted surfaces. Like a number of Japanese designers, Yamamoto is interested in developing new materials.

Yamamoto's source material is idiosyncratic and derives from a vast library that he draws on for inspiration. One book to which he consistently refers is a collection of photographs by August Sander, a photographer based in Cologne in the early 20th century, who took photographs of representative types in the everyday clothes that sharply reflect their lives. Yamamoto is also inspired by utilitarian outfits such as the protective clothing worn by women munitions workers in the 1940s, and has been known to reproduce the coat lapel worn by Jean-Paul Sartre discovered in an old photograph.

Notable for his relentless use of black, a colour traditionally associated in Japanese culture with the farmer and the spirit of the samurai, Yamamoto's move into navy and purple in the 1980s was shortlived—he found it roused too many complicated emotions for him!

His company, launched in 1976, produces the experimental, idiosyncratic Yohji Yamamoto line, the Y & Y line for men that is moderately priced and extremely successful, made up of an easy to wear mixture of integrated separates and the Workshop line of casual leisurewear.

In 1989 Yamamoto, along with director Wim Wenders and producer Ulrich Felsberg, created a film based on his experiences of putting together one of his collections. The result, Notebook on Cities and Clothes, dealt with perceptions of dress, contained interviews with Yamamoto and his staff, and compared the film and fashion industries. The film was released on videocassette in 1993. The following year Yamamoto signed with Patou to produce several fragrances. The first, Yohji, was in development for two years and was released in France in 1996 (in the U.S. in 1997), and was followed by a second scent for women, Yohji Essential in 1998. Yamamoto's first fragrance for men, Yohji Homme, debuted in 1999, as his first freestanding U.S. boutique opened its door in New York's SoHo neighborhood, and the designer was considering a line of cosmetics in the near future.

Considered one of the brightest and most creative minds in the fashion industry, Yamamoto's showings consistently draw cheer from fellow designers and the press alike. In Paris in early 2000, Yamamoto "used his runway in an elaborate celebration of romance, from start to finish," said Women's Wear Daily, (29 February 2000) including coats, suede dresses, and "fabulous suits, inventively cut and draped." His spring showing in late 2000 was "infused with a quiet elegance," according to Women's Wear Daily (1 November 2000), which further commented, "Do designers have to shout to be heard? Not always. Yohji Yamamoto certainly doesn't."

—Caroline Cox; updated by Nelly Rhodes

YURMAN, David

American jewelry designer

Born: circa 1950. Education: Attended New York University. Family: Married to Sybil Yurman; children: one son. Career: Art apprentice with sculptors Jacques Lipchitz and Theodore Rozark, early years; started David Yurman, Inc. with wife and partner, Sybil, 1979; launched the Gold-Segment Collection, 1982; launched women's watch in a cable-cuff style, 1995; launched Midnight Ice Collection, 1999; launched David Yurman Thoroughbred Watch Collection, 1999; celebrated the 20th anniversary, 2000; opened flagship boutique on Madison Avenue in New York, 2000; opened a new boutique in Saks Fifth Avenue in Houston, Texas, 2000. Awards: Cultured Pearl Designer of the Year, 1983; InterGold Design award, 1983; Contemporary Design Guild Hall of Fame award, 2000. Address: 501 Madison Avenue, New York, NY 10022, USA. Website: www.DavidYurman.com.

PUBLICATIONS

On YURMAN:

Articles

- "Lopez Named Yurman Sr. VP," in WWD, 30 October 1995.
- "Yurman Sues to Restraine Price at Costco," in WWD, 2 December 1996.
- Hessen, Wendy, "The Brand Behemoth," in WWD, 24 May 1999.
- Brodsky, Renatt, "Fighting Copycats is a Yurman Task," in Daily News Record, 19 November 1999.
- Nielsen, Karen Britton, "Dazzling Designs," in Dallas Business Journal, 17 December 1999.
- Shuster, William George, "Yurman Wins $1-Million in Copyright-Infringement Case," in Jewelers Circular Keystone, January 2000.
- Kletter, Melanie, "Yurman Flagship Opens with Strong Early Sales," in WWD, 14 February 2000.
- Schupak, Hedda T., "Yurman's on Madison," in Jewelers Circular Keystone, March 2000.
- "Art in the Street," in WWD, 11 May 2000.
- Hessen, Wendy, "More Yurman in Houston," in WWD, 5 June 2000.
- Soucy, Carrie, "Charity Becomes Them," in Jewelers Circular Keystone, August 2000.
- "Yurman Celebrates 20 Years," in Jewelers Circular Keystone, October 2000.

* * *

With his signature cable look, David Yurman has created a name for himself as an artistic designer of fine, classic, and contemporary jewelry. The cable design, which was inspired by everything from simple, ordinary objects to art, is Yurman's creative use of silver or a combination of silver and gold. Then, depending on the collection, he adds stones or jewels to the pieces to add character and life. According to Yurman, inspiration for his designs has "always been touched by magical, ancient forms...There is a common thread in recognizable symbols that seems to bind people together."

Yurman does in fact make every effort to bring people together, both with his designs and within his community and business. In 1999, he presented Steven Spielberg with the first David Yurman Humanitarian award as part of the GQ magazine's Men of the Year awards. The award honored Spielberg's selfless contributions to both the arts and to the betterment of society. The ceremony also allowed Yurman the opportunity to launch his Thoroughbred Watch line. Each award-winner was presented with a first edition, hand-inscribed watch from the collection. To honor Spielberg, Yurman created a bronze sculpture of his inspirational angel. According to Yurman, the angel is a symbol of hope and charity, representing "the hope of the human spirit."

In 2000 the David Yurman Humanitarian award was given to Sir Elton John, who was presented an angel pin created by the designer. The pin, made of sterling silver, which can be worn by both men and women, had a signature cable bridge linking the delicate wingspan together. Hand-made replicas of the pin were also available for sale in stores to raise funds for Sir John's AIDS foundations.

Yurman's designs are stylish and clearly unique. His earrings, necklaces, bracelets, rings, and watches clearly exude luxury. The Midnight Ice Collection, introduced in 1999, featured diamonds and black onyx set in sterling silver and 18-karat gold. Yurman's popular Cable Collection has a signature look of its own, and the intertwined gold and silver have become an enduring classic—a look and style that unmistakably say Yurman. Among the Quatrefoil Collection is a beautiful gold and diamond watch, while the Silver Ice Collection is designed with diamonds in sterling silver cable. The Blue Ice Collection continues Yurman's use of cabled sterling silver, and throws 18-karat yellow gold and blue chalcedony into the mix.

In 2001 Yurman launched the Women's Thoroughbred Watch Collection, featuring soft pastels of green and pink with black and white dials. The bands, which can be accessorized, come in a variety of soft colors as well as bright orange or red, and even a cable bracelet.

David Yurman's collections are continually evolving; looking into the future, he anticipates a collection of plain gold, and perhaps another of platinum and gold. The Silver Ice Collection is being expanded to include a White Ice Collection, putting pearls and diamonds into the jewelry. One of his design trends emphasizes a much cleaner look, using a dominant hue or stone, rather than a mixture of colored jewels per piece. In addition, Yurman is also considering other accessories, such as belts and leather items, with which he has dabbled in the past.

—Kimbally A. Medeiros

ZAHM, Herwig

See MONDI TEXTILE, GmbH

neighborhood, and the designer was considering a line of cosmetics in the near future.

Considered one of the brightest and most creative minds in the fashion industry, Yamamoto's showings consistently draw cheer from fellow designers and the press alike. In Paris in early 2000, Yamamoto "used his runway in an elaborate celebration of romance, from start to finish," said Women's Wear Daily, (29 February 2000) including coats, suede dresses, and "fabulous suits, inventively cut and draped." His spring showing in late 2000 was "infused with a quiet elegance," according to Women's Wear Daily (1 November 2000), which further commented, "Do designers have to shout to be heard? Not always. Yohji Yamamoto certainly doesn't."

—Caroline Cox; updated by Nelly Rhodes

YURMAN, David

American jewelry designer

Born: circa 1950. Education: Attended New York University. Family: Married to Sybil Yurman; children: one son. Career: Art apprentice with sculptors Jacques Lipchitz and Theodore Rozark, early years; started David Yurman, Inc. with wife and partner, Sybil, 1979; launched the Gold-Segment Collection, 1982; launched women's watch in a cable-cuff style, 1995; launched Midnight Ice Collection, 1999; launched David Yurman Thoroughbred Watch Collection, 1999; celebrated the 20th anniversary, 2000; opened flagship boutique on Madison Avenue in New York, 2000; opened a new boutique in Saks Fifth Avenue in Houston, Texas, 2000. Awards: Cultured Pearl Designer of the Year, 1983; InterGold Design award, 1983; Contemporary Design Guild Hall of Fame award, 2000. Address: 501 Madison Avenue, New York, NY 10022, USA. Website: www.DavidYurman.com.

PUBLICATIONS

On YURMAN:

Articles

- "Lopez Named Yurman Sr. VP," in WWD, 30 October 1995.
- "Yurman Sues to Restraine Price at Costco," in WWD, 2 December 1996.
- Hessen, Wendy, "The Brand Behemoth," in WWD, 24 May 1999.
- Brodsky, Renatt, "Fighting Copycats is a Yurman Task," in Daily News Record, 19 November 1999.
- Nielsen, Karen Britton, "Dazzling Designs," in Dallas Business Journal, 17 December 1999.
- Shuster, William George, "Yurman Wins $1-Million in Copyright-Infringement Case," in Jewelers Circular Keystone, January 2000.
- Kletter, Melanie, "Yurman Flagship Opens with Strong Early Sales," in WWD, 14 February 2000.
- Schupak, Hedda T., "Yurman's on Madison," in Jewelers Circular Keystone, March 2000.
- "Art in the Street," in WWD, 11 May 2000.
- Hessen, Wendy, "More Yurman in Houston," in WWD, 5 June 2000.
- Soucy, Carrie, "Charity Becomes Them," in Jewelers Circular Keystone, August 2000.
- "Yurman Celebrates 20 Years," in Jewelers Circular Keystone, October 2000.

* * *

With his signature cable look, David Yurman has created a name for himself as an artistic designer of fine, classic, and contemporary jewelry. The cable design, which was inspired by everything from simple, ordinary objects to art, is Yurman's creative use of silver or a combination of silver and gold. Then, depending on the collection, he adds stones or jewels to the pieces to add character and life. According to Yurman, inspiration for his designs has "always been touched by magical, ancient forms...There is a common thread in recognizable symbols that seems to bind people together."

Yurman does in fact make every effort to bring people together, both with his designs and within his community and business. In 1999, he presented Steven Spielberg with the first David Yurman Humanitarian award as part of the GQ magazine's Men of the Year awards. The award honored Spielberg's selfless contributions to both the arts and to the betterment of society. The ceremony also allowed Yurman the opportunity to launch his Thoroughbred Watch line. Each award-winner was presented with a first edition, hand-inscribed watch from the collection. To honor Spielberg, Yurman created a bronze sculpture of his inspirational angel. According to Yurman, the angel is a symbol of hope and charity, representing "the hope of the human spirit."

In 2000 the David Yurman Humanitarian award was given to Sir Elton John, who was presented an angel pin created by the designer. The pin, made of sterling silver, which can be worn by both men and women, had a signature cable bridge linking the delicate wingspan together. Hand-made replicas of the pin were also available for sale in stores to raise funds for Sir John's AIDS foundations.

Yurman's designs are stylish and clearly unique. His earrings, necklaces, bracelets, rings, and watches clearly exude luxury. The Midnight Ice Collection, introduced in 1999, featured diamonds and black onyx set in sterling silver and 18-karat gold. Yurman's popular Cable Collection has a signature look of its own, and the intertwined gold and silver have become an enduring classic—a look and style that unmistakably say Yurman. Among the Quatrefoil Collection is a beautiful gold and diamond watch, while the Silver Ice Collection is designed with diamonds in sterling silver cable. The Blue Ice Collection continues Yurman's use of cabled sterling silver, and throws 18-karat yellow gold and blue chalcedony into the mix.

In 2001 Yurman launched the Women's Thoroughbred Watch Collection, featuring soft pastels of green and pink with black and white dials. The bands, which can be accessorized, come in a variety of soft colors as well as bright orange or red, and even a cable bracelet.

David Yurman's collections are continually evolving; looking into the future, he anticipates a collection of plain gold, and perhaps another of platinum and gold. The Silver Ice Collection is being expanded to include a White Ice Collection, putting pearls and diamonds into the jewelry. One of his design trends emphasizes a much cleaner look, using a dominant hue or stone, rather than a mixture of colored jewels per piece. In addition, Yurman is also considering other accessories, such as belts and leather items, with which he has dabbled in the past.

—Kimbally A. Medeiros

ZAHM, Herwig

See MONDI TEXTILE, GmbH

ZEGNA, Ermenegildo

See ERMENEGILDO ZEGNA GROUP

ZEHNTBAUER, John A. and C. Ray

See JANTZEN, INC.

ZEIGLER, Mel and Patricia

See BANANA REPUBLIC

ZORAN

American designer

Born: Zoran Ladicorbic in Banat, Yugoslavia, 1947; immigrated to the U.S., 1971. Education: Studied architecture at the University of Belgrade. Career: Worked variously in New York as coat checker at Candy Store club, salesman at Balmain boutique, accessory designer for Scott Barrie, salesman/designer for Julio, 1971–76; freelance designer in New York, from 1976; first collection shown, 1977; Washington, D.C. showroom established, 1982; fined by FTC for not including care and content labels in garments, 1998.

PUBLICATIONS

On ZORAN:

Books

Milbank, Caroline Rennolds, New York Fashion: The Evolution of American Style, New York, 1989.

Stegemeyer, Anne, Who's Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.

Watson, Linda, Twentieth Century Fashion: 100 Years of Style by Decade & Designer, London, 2000.

Articles

Morris, Bernadine, "Zoran and Kamali: Success with the Offbeat," in The New York Times, 4 January 1983.

"Cue: Zoran Design for Living," in Vogue (London), March 1983.

"Zoran: The Wizard of Ease," in Vogue, March 1983.

Barron, Pattie, "Style: Less is Good for You," in Cosmopolitan, June 1983.

Watters, Susan, "Zoran Entertains at the Capital," in WWD, 19 October 1988.

Brantley, Ben, "Zoran Zeitgeist," in Vanity Fair, March 1992.

Giovannini, Joseph, "Brilliant Emptiness," in House Beautiful (London), March 1994.

Edelson, Sharon, "Bendel's: The Limited Version," in WWD, 1 July 1996,

"Designing Dior—Who's Next?" in WWD, 16 July 1996.

"Designer Agrees to Label Fine," in WWD, 27 July 1998.

"FTC Penalizes NYC's Zoran With Care Label, Fiber Violations," in the Discount Store News, 10 August 1998.

* * *

Zoran Ladicorbic was born in Banat, Yugoslavia in 1947. The designer, who goes by his first name, was trained in his native country as an architect, and a love of geometric shapes and straight lines is evident in his clothing design.

Zoran came to the United States in 1972. Although he had no formal education in fashion, he worked for the first few years in retail. He was also an accessories designer for the 1970s women's fashion designer, Scott Barrie.

In 1976 Zoran started his own collection, using only the best and most luxurious fabrics. Cashmere, satin, velvet, and high-quality wool are staples of his collection. He creates two collections a year, spring and fall, and shows them in his New York loft-workplace located in the downtown SoHo neighborhood.

He is obsessive about cutting and finishing a garment. His clothes create a feeling of luxury through perfect craftsmanship and materials, not through ostentatious embellishment, bright color, or showy fabrics. He uses the same muted color palette over and over: black and white, ivory, gray, and navy, with an occasional washed-out pastel such as pale pink or celery thrown in to liven the mix.

Zoran has kept to this minimalist aesthetic even during the more flamboyant 1980s. In the somewhat more abashed 1990s, his designs have gathered more momentum and his customer base has increased. His designs are not cheap, but he has a loyal following that snaps up his designs year after year. Among the Zoran devotees are model-actresses such as Lauren Hutton, Candice Bergen, and Isabella Rossellini, the painter Jennifer Hartley, socialite Amanda Burden, and Tipper Gore, the former U.S. vice-president's wife. His clothes are sold by high-level, slightly avant-garde stores such as Barney's and Henri Bendel in New York, as well as out of his workplace.

Zoran believes that his typical customer visits him once a year and buys several thousand dollars' worth of pieces at one time. Like the color palette, the silhouettes vary only slightly from season to season. Core pieces include a cardigan jacket, a T-shirt, crewneck cashmere sweaters, loose trousers, loose shorts, and a sarong skirt, which the designer claims he wore himself for a year to make sure the fit was correct.

The designer eschews the typical New York fashion life. He prefers solitude and is said to keep a constant supply of Stolichnaya vodka close at hand at all times of the day. He has an apartment in New York and a house in the resort community of Naples, Florida.

Zoran resortwear and knitwear collections remained strong sellers throughout the late 1990s. "The clientèle we see in Zoran is very interesting," Ted Marlow, president of Henri Bendel, commented to Women's Wear Daily (1 July 1996), "Zoran works well on every woman, no matter what size or age." Joan Weinstein, owner of Ultimo boutiques, carried Zoran in all her stores and the minimalist designs were often her top sellers. When Ultimo opened a new store in Dallas, Texas, it was Zoran's first foray in the state; the added exposure came at a time when many designers had lost their footing and were hurting for sales. Not so for Zoran, "We have a lot of Zoran," Weinstein said, "and we sell it like crazy. We never put it on sale; our sales just go up and up and up."

Zoran's minimalist designs, often called "spare luxury," appeal to a select and increasingly visible clientèle. Once hard to come by, Zoran apparel is now available at many high-end department stores, from Ultimo to Henry Bendel, Saks Fifth Avenue to Bergdorf Goodman. Zoran is popular with not only his growing client base, but with his fellow designers as well. When Women's Wear Daily had asked 50 designers in 1996 who should replace the departing Gianfranco Ferré at the House of Dior, Fabrizio Ferri perhaps gave Zoran the ultimate compliment: "The people who wear couture today wear it as a status symbol, rather than because they have style. In my view, if couture is going to move into the future...the designer should be someone who doesn't overpower the fabrics and the artisans—someone like Zoran who is known for the purity of his lines and doesn't overdesign."

—Janet Ozzard; updated by Owen James

NOTES ON ADVISERS AND CONTRIBUTORS

ALMOND, Kevin. Fashion director, Leeds College of Art and Design. Designer, Enrico Coveri, 1988–89, assistant designer, Woman Hautwell Ltd., 1989–90. Senior lecturer in fashion/fashion promotions, University of Central Lancashire, 1990–94. Contributor of “Camp Dressing” article to Components of Dress, 1988. Essays: Ally Capellino; John Anthony; Jacques Azagury; Sheridan Barnett; Rocco Barocco; Scott Barrie; Bellville Sassoon-Lorcan Mullany; Alistair Blair; Blumarine; Bodysmap; Jean Cacharel; Oleg Cassini; Corneliani SpA; Giorgio Correggiari; Paul Costelloe; Enrico Coveri; Jules-François Crahay; Wendy Dagworthy; Oscar de la Renta; Myrène de Prémonville; Christian Dior; Erreuno SCM SpA; Escada; Luis Estévez; Louis Féraud; Gianfranco Ferré; David Fielden; John Flett; Georgina Godley; Norman Hartnell; Daniel Hechter; Betty Jackson; Bill Kaiserman; Jacques Kaplan; Donna Karan; Herbert Kasper; Christian Lacroix; Guy Laroche; Jürgen Lehl; Lolita Lempicka; Marina Rinaldi SrL; Marcel Marongiu; Mondi Textile GmbH; Popy Moreni; Jean Muir; Nina Ricci; Bruce Oldfield; Benny Ong; Peter Hoggard; Arabella Pollen; Gloria Sachs; Mila Schön; David Shilling; Sophie Sitbon; Per Spook; Stefanel SpA; Strenesse Group; Chantal Thomass; Yuki Torii; Torrente; Trussardi, SpA; Sally Tuffin; Philippe Venet; Gian Marco Venturi; Victorio y Lucchino; Diane Von Furstenberg.

ARNOLD, Rebecca. Lecturer in fashion history and cultural theory, Kent Institute of Art and Design. Essays: Dirk Bikkembergs; Marc Bohan; Liza Bruce; Joe Casely-Hayford; Chloé; Nick Coleman; Ann Demeulemeester; Dolce & Gabbana; Joseph Ettegui; John Galliano; Romeo Gigli; Pam Hogg; Michiko Koshino; Karl Lagerfeld; Helmut Lang; Hervé Léger; Hanae Mori; Pepe; Emilio Pucci; John Richmond; Martine Sitbon.

ARSENAULT, Andrea. Professor of Fashion Design, School of the Art Institute of Chicago. Designer. Former chair of the Fashion Department, and the Faculty Senate, School of the Art Institute of Chicago. Contributor, Jean Charles de Castelbajac Album; contributor and adviser, Contemporary Designers and Contemporary Masterworks. Essay: Jean-Charles de Castelbajac.

BAKER, Therese Duzinkiewicz. Associate professor/extended campus librarian, Western Kentucky University, Bowling Green, Kentucky. Author of journal articles on library service for off-campus students. Book reviewer in decorative arts for Library Journal. Contributor to Dictionary of American Biography. Essays: Adri; Gilbert Adrian; Jacqueline de Ribes; Norma Kamali; Emmanuelle Khanh; Mainbocher; Jessica McClintock; Mary McFadden; Norman Norell; Thea Porter; Jean-Louis Scherrer; Adele Simpson; Emanuel Ungaro; Valentina; Koos Van Den Akker.

BENÉT, Sydonie. Writer currently residing in the Chicago area. Also contributor to newspapers, magazines, and books. Essays: Christian Aujard; Benetton SpA; Bianchini-Férrier; Roberto Capucci; Pierre Cardin; Gabrielle “Coco” Chanel; André Courrèges; Christian Dior; Ermengildo Zegna Group; Luis Estévez; Georges Rech; Jacques Griffé; Halston; Karl Lagerfeld; Lucien Lelong; Jessica McClintock; Mary McFadden; Franco Moschino; Muji; New Republic; Next Plc; Marcel Rochas; Rodier; Martine Sitbon; Vivienne Tam; Torrente; Philip Treacy; Valentino; Gianni Versace; Roger Vivier; Vivienne Westwood.

BLAUSEN, Whitney. Independent writer and researcher. Former administrator, The Costume Collection, Theatre Development Fund.

Contributor of numerous articles to various periodicals, journals, and books, including Theatre Crafts International, Fiber Arts, Surface Design Journal, Dictionnaire de la mode au xx^e siècle, 1995, 50 American Designers, 1995, and Dictionary of Women Artists, 1996. Essays: Bianchini-Férrier; Donald Brooks; Bonnie Cashin; Fabrice; Elizabeth Hawes; Edith Head; Betsey Johnson; Bob Mackie; Sylvia Pedlar; Zandra Rhodes; Rodier; Cynthia Rowley; Ted Tinling; Michaela Vollbracht.

BODINE, Sarah (with Michael Dunas). Independent lecturer and writer in design and craft studies and criticism. Teacher, senior thesis studio, University of the Arts. Visiting lecturer and critic at various institutions, including Cleveland Institute of Art, Akron University, Tyler School of Art, RISD, Cranbrook Academy of Art, University of Michigan, Alfred University, Massachusetts College of Art, Parsons School of Design, Miami University, and Moore College of Art. Whitney Library of Design, 1973–79. Editor, Metalsmith, 1979–92; editorial director, Documents of American Design, 1988–91. Contributor to numerous periodicals and volumes, including Industrial Design and Design Book Review. Essays: Agnès B; Rei Kawakubo.

BROWN, Mary Carol. Freelance essayist based in England. Essays: Laura Ashley; Gabrielle “Coco” Chanel; Salvatore Ferragamo.

BURNS, Jane. B.A. in ecology and environmental studies, University of Georgia; studied fashion design at Fashion Institute of Technology. Designed Christmas windows for Hermès, New York; worked as a dresser for the Macy’s Thanksgiving Day parade. Essays: Badgley Mischka; Patrick Kelly.

CARLANO, Marianne T. Formerly curator of costume and textiles at both the Wadsworth Atheneum in Hartford and the Museum of Fine Arts, Boston. Textile scholar. Author of catalogue essays and articles in Art Journal and Arts Magazine. Essays: Joseph Abboud; Gruppo GFT; Carmelo Pomodoro.

CAVALIERE, Barbara. Freelance writer on art and design, New York City. Associate editor, Womanart magazine, 1976–78; contributing editor, Arts Magazine, 1976–83. Fellowship in art criticism, National Endowment for the Arts, 1979–80. Author of exhibition catalogues. Essay: Mariuccia Mandelli.

CLARK, Hazel. Head of School of Design, Hong Kong Polytechnic University, Hong Kong. Contributor to various journals, including Journal of Design History, Design, Design Week, Design Review, Monument, and Women’s Art Journal. Author of “Selling Design and Craft” and “Footprints Textile Printing Workshop” in Women Designing: Redefining Design in Britain between the Wars, 1994. Essays: Sylvia Ayton; Jeff Banks; Sandy Black; Sarah Dallas; Diane Freis; Ragence Lam; Ralph Lauren; Mickey Lee; Walter Ma; Judy Mann; Muji; Mary Quant; William Tang.

CLEVELAND, Debra Regan. Contributing editor and book reviewer, The Lady’s Gallery Magazine and The Vintage Gazette newsletter; feature writer/respondent, The Antiques Journal and Antique Week; freelance writer specializing in period fashion and antiques. Co-founder of the first New England vintage clothing show and sale and of The Vintage Gazetteer newsletter. Contributor of freelance and in-house work for antiques and marketing trade publications, including Antiques and Collecting Hobbies and Costume.

Society of America, Region 1 Newsletter. Essays: Catalina Sports-wear; Jantzen, Inc.; Lacoste Sportswear.

COLEING, Linda. Freelance essayist. Essays: Ossie Clark; Emma Hope.

COLEMAN, Elizabeth A. Curator, Textiles and Costumes, Museum of Fine Arts, Houston, Texas; former curator of Costumes and Textiles, The Brooklyn Museum. Adjunct professor, Fashion Institute of Technology, New York. Rice University Fellow. Author of The Genius of Charles James, 1982, and The Opulent Era: Fashions of Worth, Doucet, and Pingat, 1989. Essay: Charles James.

COOPER, Arlene C. Consulting curator, European Textiles and Shawls, Museum for Textiles, Toronto, Ontario, Canada. President, Arlene C. Cooper Consulting (consultant to museums and private collectors of shawls, European textiles, and 20th-century fashion). Senior research assistant for textiles, Department of European Sculpture and Decorative Arts, Metropolitan Museum of Art. Author of "The Kashmir Shawl and Its Derivatives in North American Collections," 1987, and "How Madame Grès Sculpts with Fabric," in Great Sewn Clothes from Threads Magazine, 1991. Essays: Junichi Arai; Hubert de Givenchy; Sonia Rykiel.

COX, Caroline. Freelance essayist based in England. Essays: Azzedine Alaïa; Giorgio Armani; Pierre Cardin; André Courrèges; Jean-Paul Gaultier; Rudi Gernreich; Hobbs Ltd.; Margaret Howell; Hugo Boss AG; Hiroko Koshino; Maxfield Parrish; Franco Moschino; Rifat Ozbek; Paco Rabanne; Yves Saint Laurent; Fernando Sanchez; Stephen Sprouse; Yohji Yamamoto.

CUNNINGHAM, Andrew. Freelance writer living in Falmouth, Massachusetts. Essays: Todd Oldham; Carolyne Roehm.

DENNIS, Fred. Coordinator of Costume Collections, Museum at Fashion Institute of Technology, New York. Essay: Gabriele Knecht.

DIXON, Jeanette Goff. Freelance writer. Essays: Sal Ceserani; Victor Costa; Luis Estévez; John Galliano; Sandra Garratt; Nicole Miller; Issey Miyake; Cynthia Rowley; Anna Sui.

DRUESEDOW, Jean L. Director, Kent State University Museum. Associate curator in charge, The Costume Institute, Metropolitan Museum of Art, New York, 1984–92. Adjunct full professor, New York University. Author of Jno. J. Mitchell Co. Men's Fashion Illustrations from the Turn of the Century, 1990, and "Who Wears the Pants," chapter in Androgyny, 1992. Essays: Roberto Capucci; Vera Maxwell; Sally Victor.

EHRLICH, Doreen. Tutor in Art and Design History, Hillcroft College. Author of Twentieth Century Painting, 1989, and The Bauhaus, 1991. Essays: Julian Alexander; Burberry; Liz Claiborne; Nicole Farhi; Fenn Wright Manson; Brigid Foley; French Connection; Jaeger; Alexander Julian; Liberty of London; Louis Vuitton; Mulberry Company; Pringle of Scotland; Helen Storey.

ELLIOTT, Mary C. Curator of Historic Costume and Textiles, Mount Mary College, Milwaukee, Wisconsin. Essay: Lucien Lelong.

ESSEY-STAPLETON, Jodi. Freelance writer. Essays: John Bartlett; Marc Bohan; Marc Jacobs; Norma Kamali; Ralph Lauren.

FLUX, Alan J. Freelance essayist. Essays: Lilly Daché; Stephen Jones; Stephen Linard; Anthony Price; Graham Smith.

GORDON, Mary Ellen. Freelance writer. Associate editor, Women's Wear Daily, 1989–94. Contributor to periodicals, including Elle, Self, InStyle, and Paper Magazine. Essay: Anna Sui.

GROSHONG, Lisa. MFA earned in fiction writing from the University of Alabama. She enjoys reading nonfiction, watching lowbrow movies, and making art projects involving paper, fabric, and glue sticks. She lives in Columbia, Missouri, with her husband, Trevor, and is also a certified Kripalu yoga teacher. Essays: Nicole Farhi; Kaffe Fassett; Margaret Howell; Barbara Hulanicki; Joan & David; Bill Kaiserman; Kenzo; Kenneth Jay Lane.

GRUBER, Roberta Hochberger. Assistant professor, Fashion Design, Drexel University. Co-director, Design Arts Gallery, Drexel University. Freelance designer and fashion illustrator. Curator of several exhibitions, including Fashion Imagery, 1991, Hat Formation, 1993, and Designer Sketchbook, 1995. Essays: Mariano Fortuny; Mary Jane Marcosiano; Nicole Miller; Robert Lee Morris; Elsa Schiaparelli Kay Unger.

HAMADA, Yoko. (Deceased.) Fashion journalist involved in the connections between Japanese fashion and New York. Author of HiFashion and Men's Club. Essays: Giuliano Fujiwara; Yoshiyuki Konishi.

HILL, Chris. Senior lecturer, Cordwainers College, London. Company director, Fancy Footwork Ltd. Essays: Patrick Cox; Charles Jourdan; Sara Navarro; Andrea Pfister; Sir Edward Rayne; Red or Dead.

HOUSE, Nancy. Adjunct faculty, Art History, Wilmington College; also taught at Ohio State University and Salem State College, Massachusetts. Essays: Banana Republic; Brooks Brothers; Anne Fogarty; I. Magnin; Joan & David; John Kloss; Levi-Strauss & Co; Carolyne Roehm; Alfred Sung; Gustave Tassell; Joan Vass.

IDZELIS, Diana. Freelance writer who also has experience in news writing and advertising copywriting. She earned her B.A. in journalism and Mass Communications from the University of Iowa. Essays: Jeffrey Banks; Laura Biagiotti; Katharine Hamnett; Cathy Hardwick; Rei Kawakubo; Barry Kieselstein-Cord; Lolita Lempicka; Bob Mackie; Stella McCartney; Ronaldus Shamask; Helen Storey.

JAMES, Owen. Freelance writer who divides his time between Michigan and Illinois. Essays: Ally Capellino; Bellville Sassoon-Lorcan Mullany; Burberry; Jean Cacharel; Chloé; Mark Eisen; Perry Ellis; Esprit Holdings, Inc.; Fenn Wright Manson; Salvatore Ferragamo; Gianfranco Ferré; Andrew Fezza; Mariano Fortuny; James Galanos; Gucci; Guess, Inc.; I. Magnin; Jan Jansen; Anne Klein; Byron Lars; Levi-Strauss & Co.; Louis Vuitton; Walter Ma; Malden Mills Industries, Inc.; Mariuccia Mandelli; Marimekko; Marina Rinaldi SrL; Maxfield Parrish; Missoni; Isaac Mizrahi; Nina Ricci; Thea Porter; Pringle of Scotland; Emilio Pucci; Lilly Pulitzer; Mary Quant; Paco Rabanne; Fernando Sanchez; Willi Smith; Stefanel SpA; Robert Stock; Timney Fowler Ltd.; Trussardi SpA; Emanuel Ungaro; Adrienne Vittadini; Catherine Walker; Workers for Freedom; Zoran.

KIRKE, Betty. Retired Head Conservator, Edward C. Blum Design Laboratory, Fashion Institute of Technology. Created and taught graduate curriculum in costume conservation at Fashion Institute of Technology, in the 1980s. Author of Vionnet, 1991. Essays: Jacques Griffe; Lanvin.

LEWIS, Aldarcy C. Award-winning freelance writer based in Riverside, Illinois, with an abiding interest in the arts in all forms. She has contributed to a variety of magazines, newspapers, and arts-related books. Essay: Max Azria.

LINDHOLM, Christina. Chairs of the Department of Fashion Design & Merchandising at Virginia Commonwealth University. She was an associate professor at the University of Cincinnati from 1980 to 1995, and is also a design and product development consultant. Essays: Jimmy Choo; Eddie Bauer; David Meister; Neiman Marcus; Saks Fifth Avenue; Zang Toi.

LOUWERS, Brian. Freelance writer. Essays: Badgley Mischka; Joseph Ettedgui.

MALLETT, Daryl F. Freelance writer, editor, publisher, actor and producer/director. He has written and edited over 50 volumes in diverse fields and has been published in the U.S., Canada, Ireland and Romania. He is one of only a handful of writers in the world to have worked on both Star Trek and Star Wars. Mallett splits his time between Phoenix, Southern California, Minnesota, and the rest of the world and is involved in the Society for Creative Anachronism. Essays: Azzedine Alaïa; John Anthony; Sheridan Barnett; Sandy Black; Stephen Burrows; Joe Casely-Hayford; Nino Cerruti; Nick Coleman; Dorothée Bis; Alber Elbaz; Andrew Fezza; Emmanuelle Khanh; Gabriele Knecht; Lanvin; Byron Lars; Stephen Linard; Walter Ma; Mariuccia Mandelli; Judy Mann; Robert Lee Morris; Thierry Mugler; Josie Cruz Natori; Sara Navarro; Jenny Packham; Elsa Peretti; Simonetta.

MARKARIAN, Janet. Textile specialist. Taught textile studies at many colleges and universities. Taught master's program at The Costume Institute, Metropolitan Museum of Art, and New York University. Worked in the Metropolitan Museum's Ratti Textile Center, 1995. Essays: Linda Allard; Kenneth Jay Lane.

MARSH, Lisa. Sportswear reporter with Women's Wear Daily (New York). Essays: Champion Products Inc.; Perry Ellis; David and Elizabeth Emanuel; Alan Flusser; Guess, Inc.; Robert Stock.

MARSHALL, Kathleen Bonann. Writer with undergraduate and graduate degrees in English from UCLA. She has taught writing at the University of Iowa and the University of Illinois at Chicago. Since 1995 she has been assistant director of the Center for Writing Arts at Northwestern University. In 2001 she joined the faculty of Northwestern's Department of Comparative Literary Studies. Essays: Manolo Blahnik; Oscar de la Renta; Donna Karan; Donatella Versace.

MARTIN, Richard. (Deceased.) Curator, The Costume Institute, Metropolitan Museum of Art. Among numerous other posts: Editor of Arts Magazine, 1974–88; editor of Textile & Text, 1988–92. Executive director of the Shirley Goodman Resource Center, 1980–93, and professor of art history, 1973–93, at the Fashion Institute of Technology. Taught at Columbia University, New York University, School of Visual Arts, The Juilliard School, Parsons School of Design, and the School of the Art Institute of Chicago. Books include Fashion and Surrealism and The New Urban Landscape. More than 300 essays have appeared in various journals, including Vogue (Munich), Journal of American Culture, Los Angeles Times, International Herald Tribune, and Artforum. Essays: Akira; Walter Albini; Victor Alfaro; Cristobal Balenciaga; Jeffrey Banks; John Bartlett; Geoffrey Beene; Laura Biagiotti; Bill Blass; Tom Brigance; Brioni; Stephen Burrows; Byblos; Calugi e Giannelli; Nino Cerruti; Sal Ceserani; Cole of California; Han Feng; Andrew Fezza; Fontana; Irene Galitzine; Marithé & Fran ois Girbaud; Madame Gr es; Halston; Jacques Heim; Gordon Henderson; Tommy Hilfiger; Isani; Marc Jacobs; Eric Javits; John P. John; Wolfgang Joop; Gemma Kahng; Kenzo; Barry Kieselstein-Cord; Calvin Klein; Yukio Kobayashi; Michael Kors; Junko Koshino; Lamine Kouyat ; Byron Lars; Andr  Laug; Judith Leiber; Mad Carpenter; Mitsuhiro Matsuda; Missoni; Issey Miyake; Isaac Mizrahi; Edward H. Molyneux; Claude Montana; Josie Cruz Natori; Nikos; Todd Oldham; Elsa Peretti; Lilly Pulitzer; Mary Ann Restivo; Marcel Rochas; Christian Francis Roth; Ronaldus Shamask; Simonetta; Willi Smith; Zang Toi; Gianni Versace; Madeleine Vionnet; John Weitz; Kansai Yamamoto.

MCREADY, Elian. Painter and textile designer. Churchill fellow, 1985. Design writing includes Glorious Needlepoint, 1987, Kaffe Fassett at the V & A, 1988, Glorious Inspiration, 1991, Fruits of the Earth, 1991, and Ehrman Tapestry Book, 1995. Essays: Caroline Charles; Kaffe Fassett; Bill Gibb; Patricia Roberts; Timney Fowler Ltd.

MEDEIROS, Kimbally A. Freelance writer based in Miami, Florida. Writer for St. James Press for over three years and featured in such books as American Women Writers and the International Directory of Company Histories. Essays: Robert Clergerie; Randolph Duke; Carol Horn; Andrew Marc; Rebecca Moses; Nordstrom; Paloma Picasso; Anthony Price; Zandra Rhodes; Vivienne Tam; Viktor & Rolf; David Yurman.

MELIA, Sally Anne. Science and culture freelance journalist and author. Contributor to St. James Guide to Fantasy Writers, 1994, Larousse Encyclopedia, 1995, Lexus Dictionary of French Life and Culture, 1995; author of celebrity interviews and articles for magazines in the United Kingdom and the United States, including SF Chronicle and Interzone. Essays: Ermengildo Zegna Group; Sueo Iri ; Ren  Lezard; Roberto Verino.

MINDEROVIC, Christine Miner. Freelance writer for several years. She has a B.S. from Wayne State University and attended the School of Art and Architecture at the University of Michigan. Essays: Agn s B.; Victor Alfaro; Linda Allard; Banana Republic; Liza Bruce; Bonnie Cashin; Jasper Conran; Bella Freud; Wolfgang Joop; Helmut Lang; Tracy Reese.

MYERS, Sally A. Freelance writer/editor living in Ohio and the sole proprietor of an editorial services business. She holds a Ph.D. in American studies. Essays: Junichi Arai; Jacques Azagury; Dirk Bikkembergs; Betty Jackson.

OZZARD, Janet. Graduate of Bryn Mawr College; M.A. in fashion history, Fashion Institute of Technology. Reporter for Women's Wear Daily (New York). Essays: Zoran.

PATON, Kathleen. Writer, researcher, and editor specializing in cultural history. Freelance graphic designer, since 1988. M.A. in Museum Studies, State University of New York, Fashion Institute of Technology, 1993. Research and essays for In A Rising Public Voice: Women in Politics Worldwide. Essays: Christian Aujard; Franck Joseph Bastille; Jean Baptiste Caumont; Jacques Esterel; Georges Rech; Olivier Guillemin; Hermès; Guy Paulin; Bernard Perris; Gérard Pipart; Jacques Tiffreau; Tiktiner.

PATTISON, Angela. Lecturer in design. Program leader, Cordwainers College. International design consultant. Trained as a fashion designer in the early 1960s. Specializes in trend predictions, fashion forecasting, and designing footwear and accessories with major manufacturers and retailers throughout the world. Essays: Manolo Blahnik; Elio Fiorucci; Jan Jansen; Transport.

RAUGUST, Karen. Minneapolis-based freelance writer who contributed to publications ranging from Publishers Weekly to Animation Magazine. Her books include The Licensing Business Handbook (EPM Communications), Merchandise Licensing for the Television Industry (Focal Press), and the upcoming Animation Business Handbook (St. Martin's). Essays: Joseph Abboud; Julian Alexander; Jeff Banks; Rocco Barocco; Brioni; Bruno Magli; Byblos; Carven; Jean-Charles de Castelbajac; Caroline Charles; Cole Haan; Corneliani SpA; Paul Costelloe; Patrick Cox; C.P. Company; Angela Cummings; Wendy Dagworthy; Louis Dell'Olio; Ann Demeulemeester; Dolce & Gabbana; David and Elizabeth Emanuel; Alberto Fabiani; Han Feng; Diane Freis; French Connection; Jean-Paul Gaultier; Marithé & François Girbaud; Sylvia Heisel; Gordon Henderson; Carolina Herrera; Tommy Hilfiger; Jones New York; Yukio Kobayashi; Yoshiyuki Konishi; Michael Kors; Hiroko Koshino; Junko Koshino; Michiko Koshino; Lamine Kouyaté; Liberty of London; L.L. Bean; Hedi Slimane; William Tang; Chantal Thomass; Vicky Tiel; Isabel Toledo; Yuki Torii; Kay Unger.

REAMY, Donna W. Assistant professor at Virginia Commonwealth University in the Department of Fashion Design and Merchandising. As a visiting professor at the Universidad de Palermo, she presented a paper entitled, "The Role of the Fashion Merchandiser," in August 2000. Research includes importing and exporting fashion, and merchandising in Latin America. Essays: Miguel Adrover; Liz Claiborne; Tom Ford; Calvin Klein; Alexander McQueen; Richard Tyler; Vera Wang.

REISMAN, Jessica. Fiction writer and researcher living in Austin, Texas. Essays: Adri; Hussein Chalayan; Kenneth Cole; Sybil Connolly; Christian Lacroix; Chester Weinberg.

RHODES, Nelly. Freelance writer based in the Midwest. Essays: Abercrombie & Fitch Company; Adolfo; Sir Hardy Amies; Aquascutum, Ltd.; Giorgio Armani; Laura Ashley; Badgley Mischka; Cristobal Balenciaga; Pierre Balmain; Patrizio Bertelli; Bodysmap; Willy Bogner; Brooks Brothers; Oleg Cassini; Catalina Sportswear; Champion Products Inc.; Cole of California; Jacqueline de Ribes; Elisabeth de Senneville; Escada; Jacques Esterel; Joseph Etchedgui; Fabrice; Louis Féraud; David Fielden; Fontana; The Gap; Genny

Holding SpA; Ghost; Romeo Gigli; Hubert de Givenchy; Gruppo GFT; Holly Harp; Edith Head; Hermès; Hugo Boss AG; Jean Patou; Charles Jourdan; Guy Laroche; Mitsuhiro Matsuda; Max Mara SpA; Mondi Textile GmbH; Claude Montana; Mulberry Company; Nikos; Bruce Oldfield; Todd Oldham; Pepe; Carmelo Pomodoro; Prada; Red or Dead; Mary Ann Restivo; Bill Robinson; Christian Francis Roth; Sonia Rykiel; Gloria Sachs; Yves Saint Laurent; Jean-Louis Scherrer; Elsa Schiaparelli; Mila Schön; Strenesse Group; Alfred Sung; Pauline Trigère; Patricia Underwood; Joan Vass; Victoria's Secret; Whistles; Yohji Yamamoto.

ROSENBERG, Alan E. Studied fashion design at The Fashion Institute of Technology and art history at Hunter College of the City University of New York. Director of the Metropolitan Historic Structures Association for several years. Studying for master's degree in museum studies, Fashion Institute of Technology. Essays: Adolfo; Carven; Elisabeth de Senneville; Dorothée Bis; George Peter Stavropoulos; Vicky Tiel; Valentino.

SALTER, Susan. Writer/contributor to several reference series, including Contemporary Authors, Newsmakers, and Major Authors and Illustrators for Children and Young Adults. Essay: Esprit Holdings, Inc.

SCHROEDER, Sandra. Freelance writer based in the Chicago area. Essays: Jhane Barnes; Danskin; Alberta Ferretti; Mickey Lee.

SEAMAN, Margo. Graduate of the College of Wooster; master's degrees from the Fashion Institute of Technology and Bank Street College of Education. Teacher and freelance writer. Essays: Pierre Balmain; Carolina Herrera; Jean Patou; Anne Klein; Claire McCordell; Paloma Picasso; Adrienne Vittadini.

SEVERSON, Molly. Freelance writer. Essay: Richard Tyler.

SEWELL, Dennita. Graduate of the University of Missouri and Yale School of Drama. Collections manager in The Costume Institute, The Metropolitan Museum of Art, since 1992. Essays: Cathy Hardwick; Roger Vivier.

SHAW, Madelyn. Collections manager, The Textile Museum, Washington, D.C. Former member of the curatorial staff, The Museum at the Fashion Institute of Technology, New York, and The Gallery of Cora Ginsburg, Inc., New York. Instructor, Boston University School of Theatre Arts, Boston, Massachusetts. Also involved in freelance exhibition consultation and preparation. Contributor to A World of Costume and Textiles: A Handbook of the Collection, 1988, and of "Women's Flying Clothing: 1910–1940," in Cutter's Research Journal, 1992–93. Essays: Hattie Carnegie; Jean Dessès; Tina Leser; Robert Piguet; Maurice Rentner; Maggy Rouff; Carolyn Schnurer.

SKELLENGER, Gillion. Freelance wallpaper and fabric designer, Chicago. Instructor, Fashion Department, School of the Art Institute of Chicago, beginning in 1977. Essays: Patrizio Bertelli; Prada; Cinzia Ruggeri.

SNODGRASS, Mary Ellen. Veteran high school teacher of English and Latin Hickory from North Carolina, and the author of some 85 textbooks and general reference works. Her awards include an American Library Association reference book of the year for Encyclopedia of Utopian Literature. Essays: Akira; Bill Blass; Blumarine; Ossie Clark; Myrène de Prémonville; English Eccentrics; Fendi; Giuliano Fujiwara; Georgina Godley; Olivier Guillemin; Eric Javits; Ragence Lam; Marcel Marongiu; Benny Ong; Rifat Ozbek; Peter Hoggard; Gérard Pipart; Arabella Pollen; John Richmond; Cinzia Ruggeri; Jil Sander; Arnold Scaasi; Sophie Sitbon; Per Spook; Stephen Sprouse; Cynthia Steffe; Jill Stuart; Sybilla; Tamotsu; Koos van den Akker; Gian Marco Venturi; Joaquim Verdù; Roberto Verino; Diane Von Furstenberg; Kansai Yamamoto.

SNYDER, Carrie. Freelance writer and editor for numerous projects. Contributor to American Women Writers and Contemporary Authors. She is a graduate of Calvin College in Grand Rapids, Michigan. Essays: Sylvia Ayton; Geoffrey Beene; Giorgio Correggiari; Adolfo Domínguez; Elio Fiorucci; David Hechter; Hobbs Ltd.; Emma Hope; Sueo Irié; Isani; Jaeger; Jantzen, Inc.; Stephen Jones; Lacoste Sportswear; Hervé Léger; Jürgen Lehl; Judith Leiber; Hanae Mori; René Lezard.

STACY, Megan. Freelance writer and graduate of Trinity University, where she received a degree in American History. Essays: Alan Flusser; Betsey Johnson; Gemma Kahng; Mary Jane Marcosiano; Martin Margiela; Bernard Perris; Andrea Pfister; Tiffany & Company.

STANLEY, Montse. Director, Knitting Reference Library, Cambridge, United Kingdom. Author of Knitting Your Own Designs for a Perfect Fit, 1982, and The Knitter's Handbook, 1986. Essay: Joaquim Verdù.

STEELE, Valerie. Author and professor at New York's Fashion Institute of Technology. Author of Fashion and Eroticism, 1985, Paris Fashion, 1988, Women of Fashion, 1991, and Fetish: Fashion, Sex and Power, 1995. Co-editor of Men and Women: Dressing the Part, 1989. Essays: Jacques Fath; Martin Margiela; Jil Sander; Sybilla; Isabel Toledo; Vivienne Westwood.

TRIGGS, Teal. Course leader, School of Graphic Design, Ravensbourne College of Design and Communication, London. Design historian. Editor, Communicating Design, 1995, and (post-conference publication) Rear Window: American and European Graphic Design, 1995. Author of "Framing Masculinity: Herb Ritts, Bruce Weber and the Body Perfect" in Chic Thrills: A Fashion Reader, 1992. Contributor of articles to numerous periodicals and books, including Eye magazine, Visible Language, Contemporary Designers, and Contemporary Masterworks. Essays: Benetton SpA; Jasper Conran; Sylvia Heisel; Marimekko; Whistles.

VASIOPOULOS, Vicki. Senior fashion editor, Daily News Record, Fairchild Fashion Group. Essays: C.P. Company; New Republic; Bill Robinson.

VOTOLATO, Gregory. Essayist. Head of Art History, Buckinghamshire College, High Wycombe. Essays: Adolfo Domínguez; Barbara Hulanicki; L.L. Bean; Thierry Mugler.

WALKER, Myra J. Associate professor of fashion history, School of Visual Arts at the University of North Texas in Denton. Director, Texas Fashion Collection. Curator, "The Art of Fashion: The Radical Sixties," Kimbell Art Museum, 1990. Exhibition organizer, JC Penney National Headquarters, 1993–95. Specialist in 20th-century fashion history. Essays: Victor Costa; Sandra Garratt; Holly Harp; Giorgio Sant'Angelo; Arnold Scaasi.

WATT, Melinda L. Study storage assistant, The Costume Institute, Metropolitan Museum of Art. M.A. in Costume Studies from New York University. Essays: Willy Bogner; James Galanos; Mollie Parnis; Pauline Trigère; Patricia Underwood.

WORAM, Catherine. Freelance fashion writer/stylist. Author of Wedding Dress Style, 1993. Essays: Sir Hardy Amies; Aquascutum, Ltd.; English Eccentrics; Fendi; Bella Freud; Genny Holding SpA; Ghost; Gucci; Katharine Hamnett; Lachasse; Max Mara SpA; Digby Morton; Next Plc; Jenny Packham; Paul Smith; Philip Treacy; Catherine Walker; Workers for Freedom.

NATIONALITY INDEX

American

Joseph Abboud
Abercrombie & Fitch Company
Adolfo
Adri
Gilbert Adrian
Victor Alfaro
Linda Allard
John Anthony
Max Azria
Badgley Mischka
Banana Republic
Jeffrey Banks
Jhane Barnes
Scott Barrie
John Bartlett
Geoffrey Beene
Bill Blass
Tom Brigance
Donald Brooks
Brooks Brothers
Liza Bruce
Stephen Burrows
Hattie Carnegie
Bonnie Cashin
Oleg Cassini
Catalina Sportswear
Sal Cesarani
Champion Products Inc.
Liz Claiborne
Kenneth Cole
Cole Haan
Cole of California
Victor Costa
Angela Cummings
Lilly Daché
Danskin
Louis Dell'Olio
Randolph Duke
Eddie Bauer
Alber Elbaz
Perry Ellis
Esprit Holdings, Inc.
Luis Estévez
Fabrice
Kaffe Fassett
Andrew Fezza
Alan Flusser
Anne Fogarty
Tom Ford
Diane Freis
James Galanos
The Gap
Sandra Garratt
Rudi Gernreich
Guess, Inc.
Halston
Cathy Hardwick
Holly Harp
Elizabeth Hawes

Edith Head
Sylvia Heisel
Gordon Henderson
Tommy Hilfiger
Carol Horn
I. Magnin
Marc Jacobs
Charles James
Jantzen, Inc.
Eric Javits
Joan & David
John P. John
Betsey Johnson
Jones New York
Alexander Julian
Gemma Kahng
Bill Kaiserman
Norma Kamali
Donna Karan
Herbert Kasper
Patrick Kelly
Barry Kieselstein-Cord
Calvin Klein
Anne Klein
John Kloss
Gabriele Knecht
Michael Kors
Kenneth Jay Lane
Byron Lars
Ralph Lauren
Judith Leiber
Tina Leser
Levi-Strauss & Co
L.L. Bean
Bob Mackie
Mad Carpenter
Mainbocher
Malden Mills Industries, Inc.
Andrew Marc
Mary Jane Marcosiano
Vera Maxwell
Claire McCardell
Jessica McClintock
Mary McFadden
David Meister
Nicole Miller
Isaac Mizrahi
Robert Lee Morris
Rebecca Moses
Josie Cruz Natori
Neiman Marcus
New Republic
Nordstrom
Norman Norell
Todd Oldham
Mollie Parnis
Sylvia Pedlar
Carmelo Pomodoro
Lilly Pulitzer
Tracy Reese

Maurice Rentner
Mary Ann Restivo
Bill Robinson
Carolyne Roehm
Christian Francis Roth
Cynthia Rowley
Gloria Sachs
Saks Fifth Avenue
Giorgio Sant' Angelo
Arnold Scaasi
Carolyn Schnurer
Adele Simpson
Willi Smith
Stephen Sprouse
Cynthia Steffe
Robert Stock
Jill Stuart
Anna Sui
Vivienne Tam
Gustave Tassell
Vicky Tiel
Tiffany & Company
Zang Toi
Pauline Trigère
Kay Unger
Valentina
Koos van den Akker
Joan Vass
Sally Victor
Victoria's Secret
Adrienne Vittadini
Michaele Vollbracht
Vera Wang
Chester Weinberg
John Weitz
David Yurman
Zoran

Australian

Richard Tyler

Austrian

Helmut Lang

Belgian

Dirk Bikkembergs
Ann Demeulemeester
Martin Margiela
Diane Von Furstenberg

British

Ally Capellino
Sir Hardy Amies
Aquascutum, Ltd.
Sylvia Ayton
Jeff Banks
Sheridan Barnett
Bellville Sassoon-Lorcan Mullany
Sandy Black
Alistair Blair

Bodymap	Helen Storey	Myrène de Prémonville
Burberry	Timney Fowler Ltd.	Jacqueline de Ribes
Joe Casely-Hayford	Ted Tinling	Elisabeth de Senneville
Hussein Chalayan	Transport	Jean Dessès
Caroline Charles	Sally Tuffin	Christian Dior
Ossie Clark	Patricia Underwood	Dorothée Bis
Nick Coleman	Vivienne Westwood	Jacques Esterel
Jasper Conran	Whistles	Louis Féraud
Wendy Dagworthy	Workers for Freedom	Jacques Fath
Sarah Dallas		Jean-Paul Gaultier
David and Elizabeth Emanuel		Georges Rech
English Eccentrics	Canadian	Marithé & François Girbaud
Joseph Ettedgui	Patrick Cox	Hubert de Givenchy
Nicole Farhi	Alfred Sung	Madame Grès
Fenn Wright Manson		Jacques Griffe
David Fielden	Chinese	Olivier Guillemin
John Flett	Han Feng	Daniel Hechter
Brigid Foley	Mickey Lee	Jacques Heim
French Connection	Walter Ma	Hermès
Bella Freud	Judy Mann	Jean Patou
John Galliano	William Tang	Charles Jourdan
Ghost		Jacques Kaplan
Bill Gibb	Cuban	Emmanuelle Khanh
Georgina Godley	Luis Estévez	Hervé Léger
Katharine Hamnett	Isabel Toledo	Bernard Lacoste
Norman Hartnell		Lacoste Sportswear
Hobbs Ltd.	Dominican	Christian Lacroix
Pam Hogg	Oscar de la Renta	Lanvin
Emma Hope		Guy Laroche
Margaret Howell	Dutch	André Laug
Barbara Hulanicki	Jan Jansen	Lucien Lelong
Betty Jackson	Ronaldus Shamask	Lolita Lempicka
Jaeger	Viktor & Rolf	Louis Vuitton
Stephen Jones		Marcel Marongiu
Lachasse	English	Claude Montana
Ragence Lam	Stella McCartney	Popy Moreni
Liberty of London	Alexander McQueen	Thierry Mugler
Stephen Linard	David Shilling	Nina Ricci
Maxfield Parrish		Guy Paulin
Edward H. Molyneux	Finnish	Bernard Perris
Jean Muir	Marimekko	Paloma Picasso
Mulberry Company		Robert Piguet
Next Plc	French	Gérard Pipart
Bruce Oldfield	Agnès B.	Paco Rabanne
Benny Ong	Azzedine Alaïa	Marcel Rochas
Rifat Ozbek	Christian Aujard	Rodier
Jenny Packham	Jacques Azagury	Maggy Rouff
Pepe	Pierre Balmain	Sonia Rykiel
Peter Hoggard	Franck Joseph Bastille	Yves Saint Laurent
Arabella Pollen	Bianchini-Férier	Jean-Louis Scherrer
Thea Porter	Marc Bohan	Elsa Schiaparelli
Anthony Price	Jean Cacharel	Sophie Sitbon
Mary Quant	Pierre Cardin	Martine Sitbon
Sir Edward Rayne	Carven	Hedi Slimane
Red or Dead	Jean-Charles de Castelbajac	Chantal Thomass
Zandra Rhodes	Jean Baptiste Caumont	Jacques Tiffeau
John Richmond	Gabrielle "Coco" Chanel	Tiktiner
Patricia Roberts	Chloé	Torrente
Paul Smith	Robert Clergerie	Emanuel Ungaro
Graham Smith	André Courrèges	Philippe Venet
	Jules-François Crahay

Madeleine Vionnet
Roger Vivier
Catherine Walker

German

Willy Bogner
Escada
Hugo Boss AG
Wolfgang Joop
Karl Lagerfeld
Jürgen Lehl
Mondi Textile GmbH
René Lezard
Jil Sander
Strenesse Group

Greek

Nikos
George Peter Stavropoulos

Irish

Sybil Connolly
Paul Costeloe
Digby Morton
Philip Treacy

Israeli

Alber Elbaz

Italian

Walter Albini
Giorgio Armani
Rocco Barocco
Benetton SpA
Patrizio Bertelli
Laura Biagiotti
Blumarine
Brioni
Bruno Magli
Byblos
Calugi e Giannelli
Roberto Capucci
Nino Cerruti
Corneliani SpA
Giorgio Correggiari
Enrico Coveri
C.P. Company
Dolce & Gabbana
Ermengildo Zegna Group
Erreuno SCM SpA

Alberto Fabiani
Fendi
Gianfranco Ferré
Salvatore Ferragamo

Alberta Ferretti
Elio Fiorucci
Fontana
Genny Holding SpA
Romeo Gigli
Gruppo GFT
Gucci
Mariuccia Mandelli
Marina Rinaldi SrL
Max Mara SpA
Missoni
Franco Moschino

Elsa Peretti
Andrea Pfister
Prada
Emilio Pucci
Cinzia Ruggeri
Simonetta
Stefanel SpA
Trussardi, SpA
Valentino
Gian Marco Venturi
Donatella Versace
Gianni Versace
Victorio y Lucchino

Japanese

Akira
Junichi Arai
Giuliano Fujiwara
Sueo Irié
Rei Kawakubo
Kenzo
Yukio Kobayashi
Yoshiyuki Konishi
Hiroko Koshino
Junko Koshino
Michiko Koshino
Mitsuhiro Matsuda
Issey Miyake
Hanae Mori
Muji
Tamotsu
Yuki Torii
Kansai Yamamoto
Yohji Yamamoto

Korean
Isani

Malaysian
Jimmy Choo

Malian
Lamine Kouyaté

Norwegian
Per Spook

Russian
Irene Galitzine

Scottish
Pringle of Scotland

Singaporean
Benny Ong

South African Mark Eisen

Spanish
Miguel Adrover
Cristobal Balenciaga
Manolo Blahnik
Adolfo Domínguez
Mariano Fortuny
Sara Navarro
Fernando Sanchez
Sybilla
Joaquim Verdú
Roberto Verino

Swiss
Robert Piguet

Venezuelan
Carolina Herrera

Welsh
Laura Ashley

Yugoslavian
Mila Schön