

CONTEMPORARY FASHION

SECOND EDITION

C O N T E M P O R A R Y

FASHION

OTHER ART TITLES FROM ST. JAMES PRESS

Contemporary Architects

Contemporary Artists

Contemporary Designers

Contemporary Masterworks

Contemporary Photographers

Contemporary Women Artists

International Dictionary of Architects and Architecture

International Dictionary of Art and Artists

St. James Guide to Black Artists

St. James Guide to Hispanic Artists

St. James Guide to Native North American Artists

St. James Modern Masterpieces

C O N T E M P O R A R Y

FASHION

SECOND EDITION

Editor:
Taryn Benbow-Pfalzgraf

ST. JAMES PRESS

GALE GROUP

THOMSON LEARNING™

Detroit • New York • San Diego • San Francisco Boston • New Haven, Conn. • Waterville, Maine London • Munich

STAFF

Taryn Benbow-Pfalzgraf, Editor

Kristin Hart, Project Coordinator

Erin Bealmear, Joann Cerrito, Jim Craddock, Stephen Cusack, Miranda H. Ferrara, Melissa Hill, Margaret Mazurkiewicz, Carol A. Schwartz, Christine Tomassini, Michael J. Tyrkus, St. James Press Staff

Peter M. Gareffa, Managing Editor, St. James Press

Mary Beth Trimper, Manager, Composition and Electronic Prepress

Evi Seoud, Assistant Manager, Composition Purchasing and Electronic Prepress

Dorothy Maki, Manufacturing Manager

Rhonda Williams, Print Buyer

Barbara J. Yarrow, Manager, Imaging and Multimedia Content

Dean Dauphinais, Senior Editor, Imaging and Multimedia Content

Leitha Etheridge-Sims, Mary K. Grimes, David G. Oblender, Image Catalogers

Lezlie Light, Imaging Coordinator

Randy Bassett, Imaging Supervisor

Dan Newell, Imaging Specialist

Mike Logusz, Graphic Artist

Maria L. Franklin, Manager, Rights & Permissions

Shalice Shah-Caldwell, Permissions Associate

While every effort has been made to ensure the reliability of the information presented in this publication, St. James Press does not guarantee the accuracy of the data contained herein. St. James Press accepts no payment for listing; and inclusion of any organization, agency, institution, publication, service, or individual does not imply endorsement of the editors or publisher.

Errors brought to the attention of the publisher and verified to the satisfaction of the publisher will be corrected in future editions.

This publication is a creative work fully protected by all applicable copyright laws, as well as by misappropriation, trade secret, unfair competition, and other applicable laws. The authors and editors of this work have added value to the underlying factual material herein through one or more of the following: unique and original selection, coordination, expression, arrangement, and classification of the information.

All rights to this publication will be vigorously defended.

Copyright © 2002

St. James Press

27500 Drake Rd.

Farmington Hills, MI 48331-3535

All rights reserved including the right of reproduction in whole or in part in any form.

Cover photo: Design by Roberto Capucci, ca. 1980-97 © Massimo Listri/CORBIS.

Library of Congress Catalog Cataloging-in-Publication Data

Contemporary fashion / editor, Taryn Benbow-Pfalzgraf.—2nd ed.

p. cm.

Includes bibliographical references and index.

ISBN 1-55862-348-5

1. Fashion designers—Biographical—Encyclopedias. 2. Costume design—History—20th century—Encyclopedias. 3. Fashion—History—20th century—Encyclopedias. I. Benbow-Pfalzgraf, Taryn.

TT505.A1 C66 2002
746.9'2'0922—dc21

2002017801

Printed in the United States of America

St. James Press is an imprint of Gale
Gale and Design is a trademark used herein under license

10 9 8 7 6 5 4 3 2 1

CONTENTS

EDITOR'S NOTE FROM PREVIOUS EDITION	vii
EDITOR'S NOTE FOR CURRENT EDITION	ix
INTRODUCTION	xi
ADVISERS	xiii
CONTRIBUTORS	xv
LIST OF ENTRANTS	xix
CONTEMPORARY FASHION ENTRIES A-Z	1
NOTES ON CONTRIBUTORS	733
NATIONALITY INDEX	741

EDITOR'S NOTE FROM THE FIRST EDITION

This volume is dedicated to Colin Naylor (1944–92), who initiated its publication and was editor until his early death. Colin's distinguished contributions to the arts—as editor of Art & Artists and as editor of indispensable reference volumes published by St. James Press and the Gale Group—resonate with his lively sense of the role of contemporary arts. I had the privilege of writing for him at Art & Artists decades ago and began on this volume in order to be involved again with an old friend and an inspiring editor. While he is not present for its outcome, Contemporary Fashion will always bear Colin's sense of adventure, scope of interest, and unceasing imagination. Contemporary Fashion is, I hope, no less Colin's book and dream for his absence upon its fulfillment.

Contemporary Fashion seeks to provide information on and assessment of fashion designers active during the period from 1945 to the present. International in scope in accordance with fashion's wide resourcing and dissemination, this volume attempts to provide dependable information and substantive critical appraisal in a field often prone to excessive praise and hyperbolic language. Each entry consists of a personal and professional biography; bibliographic citations by and about the designer; when possible, a statement by the designer on his or her work and/or design philosophy; and a concise, informative essay. The book's emphasis is on design creativity and distinction; in instances of a corporation, family business, design house, or other collective enterprise, we have attempted to hone in on the distinguishing attributes of the design tradition. Much literature from specialized periodicals is assimilated in the critical essays and listed in the bibliographies, offering the reader access to a wide variety and deep concentration of specialized literature.

Special appreciation is owed to the designers and design houses who generously supplied statements, information, and visual documentation. Virtually everyone in the civilized world talks about fashion. It is an area in which most of us consider ourselves knowledgeable, if only as a function of making our own clothing decisions on a daily basis. Contemporary Fashion gives value to the data and ideas of fashion discussion; it is intended to aid the discourse about apparel and edify the lively fashion conversation. Contemporary Fashion is to stand as a solid reference where no other comparable volumes exist and to make a contribution to fashion study and its allied expressions.

—Richard Martin (1947–99)

EDITOR'S NOTE FROM THE CURRENT EDITION

I have been happy to perpetuate a project beloved by both Colin Naylor (1944–92) and Richard Martin (1947–99), and believe each would be pleased with Contemporary Fashion, 2nd Edition. Unique to the second volume is an advisory board of industry professionals, who helped select the new designers and companies added to the previous edition's international mix. Additionally, the number of photographs is more than double the original, so readers and researchers may experience both a written and visual record of this evolving field.

Contemporary Fashion, 2nd Edition, like its predecessor, is filled with informative essays mirroring the many facets of the fashion world, including extended biographical headers with website addresses whenever available, and extensive bibliographic listings. Those involved with this book have striven to be as current as possible, and developments were added up to the moment the book went into publication.

This edition would not have been possible without Kristin Hart, who offered advice and unflinching support; Barbara Coster, who tackles whatever is thrown her way; Karen Raugust, who always comes through, with good results; Jocelyn Prucha, for diving repeatedly into murky waters for up-to-the-second information; Peter Gareffa, for offering me another opportunity; and to the beloveds, who made working this hard worthwhile: John, Jordyn, Wylie, Foley, and Hadley.

Lastly, a technical note: to save space and the mindless repetition of periodicals used throughout the publications sections, abbreviations were used for the Daily News Record (as DNR) and Women's Wear Daily (WWD). Discerning readers may also note in most cases when Vogue is listed, it is accompanied by the city of its publication (Paris, Milan, etc.), except when issued from New York.

—Taryn Benbow-Pfalzgraf

INTRODUCTION

Fashion is often perceived as frivolous, irrational, and dictatorial. Changes in fashion strike many people as mysterious, arbitrary, and senseless—except as part of a conspiracy to trick “fashion victims” into buying unnecessary new clothes. In 19th-century America, dress reformers argued that contemporary fashion was created by a cabal of male couturiers and Parisian courtesans, who sought to become rich by promoting immoral styles. Although courtesans are no longer significant trendsetters, designers are still widely regarded as dictators devoted to the planned obsolescence of successive absurd and expensive clothing styles. Conversely, the fashion press tends to characterize favored designers as “geniuses” whose creations arise independently of socioeconomic forces or cultural trends. Although more flattering, this latter view of the design process is no more accurate than the antifashion critique.

Years ago, when Richard Martin edited the first edition of Contemporary Fashion, he was one of a very few scholars who took fashion seriously. Throughout his career as an author and curator, Richard argued that fashion should be acknowledged as one of the visual arts. He was well aware that fashion’s association with the female body and with the ephemeral, as well as its reputation as a commercial enterprise, had contributed to its lesser reputation in comparison with the arts identified with men. But he insisted that, on the contrary, fashion played a singularly important role in modern culture. With the publication of Contemporary Fashion, he sought to provide substantial documentation on the work of a wide range of fashion designers, believing this would empower readers to recognize how fashion provides insight into issues such as self-expression, body image, gender, sexuality, class, and the manifold relationships between high art and popular culture.

Richard was a friend and mentor, and I am honored to provide an introduction to this latest edition of Contemporary Fashion, which includes a number of new and revised essays. Like the first edition, it seeks to provide reliable information on the most important fashion designers active from 1945 to the present. Since contemporary fashion is very much a global phenomenon, the book is international in scope. Organized alphabetically, it consists of essays on individual designers (from Armani, Balenciaga, and Chanel through Westwood, Yamamoto, and Zoran) written by scholars or critics in the field of fashion history. Each entry includes biographical information, as well as a critical assessment of the designer’s contributions to fashion, and a bibliography to facilitate further research. Thanks in part to Richard’s work, fashion is now increasingly regarded as a legitimate area of research, and fashion designers receive greater recognition as creative individuals working within a complex and valuable tradition.

—Dr. Valerie Steele, Chief Curator and Acting Director,
The Museum at the Fashion Institute of Technology

ADVISERS

Dr. Leslie Davis Burns

Bobbin Educator of the Year, 2001

Author & Professor

Apparel, Interiors, Housing & Merchandising

Oregon State University

Christina Lindholm

Chair, Fashion Design & Merchandising

Virginia Commonwealth University

Cindy Marek

Offshore Manager

HMX Tailored (a division of Hartmarx)

Susan Reitman

Professor of Textiles

Fashion Institute of Technology

Dr. Valerie Steele

Chief Curator and Acting Director

The Museum at the Fashion Institute of Technology

CONTRIBUTORS

Kevin Almond
Rebecca Arnold
Andrea Arsenault

Therese Duzinkiewicz Baker
Sydonie Benét
Whitney Blausen
Sarah Bodine
Carol Mary Brown
Kim Brown
Jane Burns

Marianne T. Carlano
Barbara Cavaliere
Hazel Clark
Debra Regan Cleveland
Linda Coleing
Elizabeth A. Coleman
Arlene C. Cooper
Caroline Cox
Andrew Cunningham

Fred Dennis
Janette Goff Dixon
Jean L. Druesedow

Doreen Ehrlich
Mary C. Elliott
Jodi Essey-Stapleton

Alan J. Flux

Mary Ellen Gordon
Lisa Groshong
Roberta Hochberger Gruber

Yoko Hamada
Chris Hill
Nancy House

Diana Idzelis
Owen James

Betty Kirke
Darcy Lewis
Christina Lindholm
Brian Louwers

Daryl F. Mallett
Janet Markarian
Lisa Marsh

Kathleen Bonann Marshall
Richard Martin
Elian McCready
Kimbally A. Medeiros
Sally Ann Melia
Christine Miner Minderovic
Sally A. Myers

Janet Ozzard

Kathleen Paton
Angela Pattison

Karen Raugust
Donna W. Reamy
Jessica Reisman
Nelly Rhodes
Alan E. Rosenberg

Susan Salter
Sandra Schroeder
Margo Seaman
Molly Severson
Dennita Sewell
Madelyn Shaw
Gillion Skellenger
Mary Ellen Snodgrass
Carrie Snyder
Megan Stacy
Montse Stanley
Valerie Steele

Teal Triggs
Vicki Vasilopoulos
Gregory Votolato
Myra J. Walker
Melinda L. Watt
Catherine Woram

C O N T E M P O R A Y

FASHION

LIST OF ENTRANTS

Joseph Abboud	Bruno Magli	Christian Dior
Abercrombie & Fitch Company	Burberry	Dolce & Gabbana
Adolfo	Stephen Burrows	Adolfo Domínguez
Adri	Byblos	Dorothée Bis
Gilbert Adrian		Randolph Duke
Miguel Adrover	Jean Cacharel
Agnès B.	Calugi e Giannelli	Eddie Bauer
Akira	Roberto Capucci	Mark Eisen
Azzedine Alaïa	Pierre Cardin	Alber Elbaz
Walter Albini	Hattie Carnegie	Perry Ellis
Victor Alfaro	Carven	David and Elizabeth Emanuel
Linda Allard	Joe Casely-Hayford	English Eccentrics
Ally Capellino	Bonnie Cashin	Ermengildo Zegna Group
Sir Hardy Amies	Oleg Cassini	Erreuno SCM SpA
John Anthony	Jean-Charles de Castelbajac	Escada
Aquascutum, Ltd.	Catalina Sportswear	Esprit Holdings, Inc.
Junichi Arai	Jean Baptiste Caumont	Jacques Esterel
Giorgio Armani	Nino Cerruti	Luis Estévez
Laura Ashley	Sal Cesarani	Joseph Ettedgui
Christian Aujard	Hussein Chalayan	Alberto Fabiani
Sylvia Ayton	Champion Products Inc.	Fabrice
Jacques Azagury	Gabrielle "Coco" Chanel	Nicole Farhi
Max Azria	Caroline Charles	Kaffe Fassett
	Chloé	Jacques Fath
Badgley Mischka	Jimmy Choo	Fendi
Cristobal Balenciaga	Liz Claiborne	Han Feng
Pierre Balmain	Ossie Clark	Fenn Wright Manson
Banana Republic	Robert Clergerie	Louis Féraud
Jeff Banks	Kenneth Cole	Salvatore Ferragamo
Jeffrey Banks	Cole Haan	Gianfranco Ferré
Jhane Barnes	Cole of California	Alberta Ferretti
Sheridan Barnett	Nick Coleman	Andrew Fezza
Rocco Barocco	Sybil Connolly	David Fielden
Scott Barrie	Jasper Conran	Elio Fiorucci
John Bartlett	Corneliani SpA	John Flett
Franck Joseph Bastille	Giorgio Correggiari	Alan Flusser
Geoffrey Beene	Victor Costa	Anne Fogarty
Bellville Sassoon-Lorcan Mullany	Paul Costelloe	Brigid Foley
Benetton SpA	André Courrèges	Fontana
Patrizio Bertelli	Enrico Coveri	Tom Ford
Laura Biagiotti	Patrick Cox	Mariano Fortuny
Bianchini-Férier	C.P. Company	Diane Freis
Dirk Bikkembergs	Jules-François Crahay	French Connection
Sandy Black	Angela Cummings	Bella Freud
Manolo Blahnik	Lilly Daché	Giuliano Fujiwara
Alistair Blair	Wendy Dagworthy
Bill Blass	Sarah Dallas	James Galanos
Blumarine	Danskin	Irene Galitzine
Bodymap	Oscar de la Renta	John Galliano
Willy Bogner	Louis Dell'Olio	The Gap
Marc Bohan	Ann Demeulemeester	Sandra Garratt
Tom Brigance	Myrène de Prémontville	Jean-Paul Gaultier
Brioni	Jacqueline de Ribes	Genny Holding SpA
Donald Brooks	Elisabeth de Senneville	Georges Rech
Brooks Brothers	Jean Dessès	Rudi Gernreich
Liza Bruce

Ghost	Donna Karan	Vera Maxwell
Bill Gibb	Herbert Kasper	Claire McCardell
Romeo Gigli	Rei Kawakubo	Stella McCartney
Marithé & Fran�ois Girbaud	Patrick Kelly	Jessica McClintock
Hubert de Givenchy	Kenzo	Mary McFadden
Georgina Godley	Emmanuelle Khanh	Alexander McQueen
Madame Gr�es	Barry Kieselstein-Cord	David Meister
Jacques Griffe	Anne Klein	Nicole Miller
Gruppo GFT	Calvin Klein	Missoni
Gucci	John Kloss	Issey Miyake
Guess, Inc.	Gabriele Knecht	Isaac Mizrahi
Olivier Guillemain	Yukio Kobayashi	Edward H. Molyneux
	Yoshiyuki Konishi	Mondi Textile GmbH
Halston	Michael Kors	Claude Montana
Katharine Hamnett	Hiroko Koshino	Popy Moreni
Cathy Hardwick	Junko Koshino	Hanae Mori
Holly Harp	Michiko Koshino	Robert Lee Morris
Norman Hartnell	Lamine Kouyat�	Digby Morton
Elizabeth Hawes	Lachasse	Franco Moschino
Edith Head	Lacoste Sportswear	Rebecca Moses
Daniel Hechter	Christian Lacroix	Thierry Mugler
Jacques Heim	Karl Lagerfeld	Jean Muir
Sylvia Heisel	Ragence Lam	Muji
Gordon Henderson	Kenneth Jay Lane	Mulberry Company
Herm�es	Helmut Lang	Josie Cruz Natori
Carolina Herrera	Lanvin	Sara Navarro
Tommy Hilfiger	Guy Laroche	Neiman Marcus
Hobbs Ltd.	Byron Lars	New Republic
Pam Hogg	Andr� Laug	Next PLC
Emma Hope	Ralph Lauren	Nikos
Carol Horn	Mickey Lee	Nina Ricci
Margaret Howell	Herv� L�ger	Nordstrom
Hugo Boss AG	J�rgen Lehl	Norman Norell
Barbara Hulanicki	Judith Leiber
	Lucien Lelong	Bruce Oldfield
I. Magnin	Lolita Lempicka	Todd Oldham
Sueo Iri�	Tina Leser	Benny Ong
Isani	Levi-Strauss & Co.	Rifat Ozbek
	Liberty of London
Betty Jackson	Stephen Linard	Jenny Packham
Marc Jacobs	L.L. Bean	Mollie Parnis
Jaeger	Louis Vuitton	Guy Paulin
Charles James		Sylvia Pedlar
Jan Jansen	Walter Ma	Pepe
Jantzen, Inc.	Bob Mackie	Elsa Peretti
Eric Javits	Mad Carpenter	Bernard Perris
Jean Patou	Mainbocher	Peter Hoggard
Joan & David	Malden Mills Industries, Inc.	Andrea Pfister
John P. John	Mariuccia Mandelli	Paloma Picasso
Betsey Johnson	Judy Mann	Robert Piguet
Stephen Jones	Andrew Marc	G�r�ard Pipart
Jones New York	Mary Jane Marcasiano	Arabella Pollen
Wolfgang Joop	Martin Margiela	Carmelo Pomodoro
Charles Jourdan	Marimekko	Thea Porter
Alexander Julian	Marina Rinaldi SrL	Prada
	Marcel Marongiu	Anthony Price
Gemma Kahng	Mitsuhiro Matsuda	Pringle of Scotland
Bill Kaiserman	Max Mara SpA	Emilio Pucci
Norma Kamali	Maxfield Parrish	Lilly Pulitzer
Jacques Kaplan

Mary Quant	Hedi Slimane	Patricia Underwood
Paco Rabanne	Graham Smith	Emanuel Ungaro
Sir Edward Rayne	Paul Smith	Kay Unger
Red or Dead	Willi Smith
Tracy Reese	Per Spook	Valentina
René Lizard	Stephen Sprouse	Valentino
Maurice Rentner	George Peter Stavropoulos	Koos van den Akker
Mary Ann Restivo	Stefanel SpA	Joan Vass
Zandra Rhodes	Cynthia Steffe	Philippe Venet
John Richmond	Robert Stock	Gian Marco Venturi
Patricia Roberts	Helen Storey	Joaquim Verdù
Bill Robinson	Strenesse Group	Roberto Verino
Marcel Rochas	Jill Stuart	Donatella Versace
Rodier	Anna Sui	Gianni Versace
Carolyne Roehm	Alfred Sung	Sally Victor
Christian Francis Roth	Sybilla	Victoria's Secret
Maggy Rouf	Vivienne Tam	Victorio y Lucchino
Cynthia Rowley	Tamotsu	Viktor & Rolf
Cinzia Ruggeri	William Tang	Madeleine Vionnet
Sonia Rykiel	Gustave Tassell	Adrienne Vittadini
Gloria Sachs	Chantal Thomass	Roger Vivier
Yves Saint Laurent	Vicky Tiel	Michaele Vollbracht
Saks Fifth Avenue	Tiffany & Company	Diane Von Furstenberg
Fernando Sanchez	Jacques Tiffeau
Jil Sander	Tiktiner	Catherine Walker
Giorgio Sant'Angelo	Timney Fowler Ltd.	Vera Wang
Arnold Scaasi	Ted Tinling	Chester Weinberg
Jean-Louis Scherrer	Zang Toi	John Weitz
Elsa Schiaparelli	Isabel Toledo	Vivienne Westwood
Carolyn Schnurer	Yuki Torii	Whistles
Mila Schön	Torrente	Workers for Freedom
Ronaldus Shamask	Transport
David Shilling	Philip Treacy	Kansai Yamamoto
Simonetta	Pauline Trigère	Yohji Yamamoto
Adele Simpson	Trussardi, SpA	David Yurman
Martine Sitbon	Sally Tuffin
Sophie Sitbon	Richard Tyler	Zoran

A

ABBOUD, Joseph

American designer

Born: Boston, Massachusetts, 5 May 1950. Education: Studied comparative literature, University of Massachusetts, Boston, 1968–72; also studied at the Sorbonne. Family: Married Lynn Weinstein, 6 June 1976; children: Lila, Ari. Career: Buyer, then director of merchandise, Louis of Boston, 1968–80; designer, Southwick, 1980; associate director of menswear design, Polo/Ralph Lauren, New York, 1980–84; launched signature menswear collection, 1986; designer, Barry Bricken, New York, 1987–88. J.A. (Joseph Abboud) Apparel Corporation, a joint venture with GFT USA, formed, 1988; Joseph Abboud Womenswear and menswear collection of tailored clothing and furnishings introduced, 1990; opened first retail store, Boston, 1990; collections first shown in Europe, 1990; JA II line introduced, 1991; fragrance line introduced in Japan, 1992, in America, 1993; introduced J.O.E. (Just One Earth) sportswear line, 1992; designed wardrobes for male television announcers for 1992 Winter Olympics, Albertville, France, 1992; Joseph Abboud Environments bed and bath collection launched, 1993; Joseph Abboud fragrance launched, 1994; formed Joseph Abboud Worldwide to oversee labels and licensing, 1996; forged strategic partnership with GFT, 1997; introduced black label line for men, 1999; company acquired by GFT for $65 million, 2000. Awards: Cutty Sark award, 1988; Woolmark award, 1988; Menswear Designer of the Year award from Council of Fashion Designers of America Award, 1989, 1990; honored by Japanese Government in conjunction with the Association of Total Fashion in Osaka, 1993; Special Achievement award from Neckwear Association of America Inc., 1994. Address: 650 Fifth Avenue, New York, New York 10019, USA.

PUBLICATIONS

On ABBOUD:

Articles

- Dolce, Joe, "Last of the Updated Traditional," in Connoisseur (New York), March 1987.
Saunders, Peggy, "Joseph Abboud," in Boston Business, July/August 1987.
"A Man's Style Book, Joseph Abboud," in Esquire (New York), September 1987.
de Caro, Frank, "Men in Style: A Designer to Watch," in the Baltimore Sun, 24 September 1987.
"Designers Are Made as Well as Born," in Forbes (New York), 11 July 1988.
Carloni, Maria Vittoria, "Da commesso a mito," in Panorama, 27 November 1988.

LaFerla, Ruth, "Past as Prologue," in New York Times Magazine, 19 February 1989.

Wayne, Hollis, "Fashion Forward—the 90s," in Playboy (Chicago), March 1989.

Stern, Ellen, "Joseph Abboud, Down to Earth," in GQ (New York), October 1989.

"The Word to Men: Hang Looser," in People Weekly (Chicago), Spring 1990.

Burns, Robert, "Abboud Takes on Classics in a Big Way," in Los Angeles Times, 8 June 1990.

Hatfield, Julie, "Abboud Brings Worldly Styles Home," in Boston Globe, 5 September 1990.

Conover, Kirsten A., "Abboud Sets Tone for '90s Menswear," in Christian Science Monitor (Boston), 5 November 1990.

Roosa, Nancy, "Much Abboud about Clothing," in Boston, January 1991.

Fenichell, Stephen, "The Look of the Nineties: Four Designers Lead the Way," in Connoisseur (New York), March 1991.

Hancox, Clara, "And Now, the First Joe Abboud," in Daily News Record, 15 July 1991.

"Joseph Abboud's Next Step," in Esquire (New York), August 1992.

Beatty, Jack, "The Transatlantic Look," in Atlantic Monthly, December 1995.

Gault, Ylonda, "Fashion's Marathoner," in Crain's New York Business, 14 July 1997.

Gellers, Stan, "Joseph Abboud Goes for the Gold with Black Label Clothing," in Daily News Record, 9 June 1999.

Dodd, Annmarie, "Abboud Sells to GFT for $65 Million," in Daily News Record, 21 June 2000.

Curan, Catherine, "GFT Sews up Abboud Brand," in Crain's New York Business, 17 July 2000.

Lohrer, Robert, "Joseph Abboud Faces a Rich Future," in Daily News Record, 19 July 2000.

* * *

Joseph Abboud has said that his clothing is as much about lifestyle as design. Since 1986, after breaking away from Ralph Lauren, he has filled a niche in the fashion world with his creations for men and, more recently, for women as well. For the contemporary individual seeking a façade that is as casual, elegant, and as international as the accompanying life, the Abboud wardrobe offers comfort, beauty, and a modernity that is equally suitable in New York, Milan, or Australia. Abboud was the first menswear designer in the United States to revolutionize the concept of American style.

Born in Boston, Abboud is hardly provincial. Something of an outsider, he did not come to fashion through the usual design school training and had no pre-established world in which to fit. Instead he made his own. His approach to fashion was via studies in comparative literature, followed by study at the Sorbonne in Paris. His fall 1990 menswear collection Grand Tour pays homage to that experience with its romantic 1930s and 1940s designs, reminiscent of Hemingway, while his own rich ethnic background provided the depth of appreciation for global culture inherent in his work. Coming of age in the 1960s, Abboud began collecting early Turkish kilims (flat woven rugs) with their salient handcrafted quality and stylized geometric patterns. These motifs form a recurring theme in his work, from the handknit sweaters to the machine-knit shirts. The rugs themselves, in muted earthtones, complement the calm, natural environment of the Abboud stores. For Abboud, the presentation of the clothing mimics the aesthetics of the garments: soft, casual, and elegant in its simplicity.

Joseph Abboud adjusting an item from his spring 2001 collection. © AP/Wide World Photos.

Color, texture, and the cut of Abboud fashions express a style that lies between, and sometimes overlaps, that of Ralph Lauren and Giorgio Armani. The palette of the Joseph Abboud and the 1992 J.O.E. (Just One Earth) lines for both sexes is more subtle than the traditional Anglo-American colors of the preppie or Sloane Ranger genre, yet more varied in tone and hue than the sublimely unstated Armani colors. Neutrals from burnt sienna to cream, stucco, straw, and the colors of winter birch, together with naturals such as indigo and faded burgundy, are examples of some of the most alluring of Abboud dyestuffs.

The Pacific Northwest Collection, fall 1987, manifested rich hues, from black to maroon, but even these were harmonious, never ostentatious. The black of his leather jackets, fall 1992, appears like soft patches of the night sky due to the suppleness and unique surface treatment of the skins. The fabrics for Abboud designs represent the artist's diligent search for the world's finest materials and craftsmanship. His respect for textile traditions does not mean that his work is retrospective but that his inventiveness is grounded in the integrity of the classics. His interpretation of tweed, for example, although based on fine Scottish wool weavings, which he compares to the most beautiful artistic landscapes, differs from the conventional Harris-type tweed. Silk, alpaca, or llama are occasionally combined with the traditional wool to yield a lighter fabric.

Unique and demanding in his working methods, Abboud is at the forefront of contemporary fashion-fabric design. His fabrics drape with a grace and elegance that is enhanced by the oversize cut and fluid lines of his suits. His characteristically full, double-pleated trousers, for example, are luxurious. The romantic malt mohair gossamer-like fabrics for women in the fall 1993 collection are cut simply with no extraneous details. Even the intricate embroideries that ornament the surfaces of many of his most memorable designs, from North African suede vests with a Kashmiri boteh design to the jewel-like beadwork for evening, have a wearability uncommon in the contemporary artistic fashion.

Nature is Abboud's muse. Beyond the obvious J.O.E. line appellation, the theme of the bucolic environment provides inspiration for the garments. Country stone walls, pebbles on a beach, the light and earthtones of the Southwest are interpreted in exquisitely cut fabrics that embrace the body with a style that becomes an individual's second skin.

Abboud's easy, elegant style had translated into a $100 million business by 1997, with overseas sales accounting for about 35 percent of turnover. It was considered a healthy operation, but did not reach the heights of some of his better-known peers. In 1998 Abboud sought to boost his profile by entering into a strategic alliance with his 10-year licensee GFT USA, a subsidiary of the Italian company Holding de Participazioni Industriali (HdP). With the move, he hoped to increase synergies between Joseph Abboud Worldwide and GFT's J.A. Apparel subsidiary, both formed in 1996. The two businesses developed an integrated management structure and increased coordination among licensees.

Abboud launched an upscale black label line for men over 35 in 1999, intending to supplement his existing upper-moderate tailored clothing business. The products are sold in the designer's own shops and about 40 select doors at 10 leading retailers. They are manufactured in the U.S. using European fabrics.

In 2000 Abboud further cemented his relationship with GFT when the latter purchased Abboud's label and licensing rights for $65 million. Abboud plans to continue as creative director and chairman emeritus for at least five years. The Abboud labels generated an estimated $250 million in sales in 2000, with about 80 percent of that business from GFT, which produces and distributes Abboud's black and diamond label tailored clothing, sportswear and golfwear. The remaining sales come from 27 other licensees; Abboud's licensed lines include fragrances, furs, coats, lounge- and sleepwear, swimwear, timepieces, and home furnishings.

The GFT acquisition will enable expansion in key areas such as international distribution, golf, and women's wear, as well as boosting the company's retailing operation and enhancing the Joseph Abboud Environments bed and bath collection. GFT and Abboud are also considering the introduction of new collections, such as one geared toward younger men.

Abboud's business, at times, has been overshadowed by trendier labels such as Tommy Hilfiger, as well as by Italian designers who appeal to the same clientele. But his customer base—which includes several high-profile sports anchors and news anchor Bryant Gumbel—has long been loyal his earthy colors, use of texture, and his ability to combine the classic with the modern.

—Marianne T. Carlano; updated by Karen Raugust

ABERCROMBIE & FITCH COMPANY

American sportswear and outerwear retailer

Founded: in 1892 by David Abercrombie to sell camping supplies; joined by Ezra Fitch to become Abercrombie & Fitch, providing exclusive outdoor needs, including clothing and equipment. Company History: Moved to new Madison Avenue digs, 1917; filed for bankruptcy, 1977; bought by Oshman's Sporting Goods, 1978; bought by The Limited, 1988; Michael Jeffries became CEO, 1992; back in black ink, 1995; went public, 1996; spun off by Limited, 1998; introduced children's stores, 1998; launched Hollister stores, for younger teens, 2000; also publishes A&F Quarterly catalogue/magazine. Company Address: 6301 Fitch Path, New Albany, OH 43054 USA. Company Website: www.abercrombie.com.

PUBLICATIONS

On ABERCROMBIE & FITCH:

Articles

- Paris, Ellen, "Endangered Species? Abercrombie & Fitch," in Forbes, 9 March 1987.
 Brady, James, "Abercrombie & Fitch Forgets Its Days of Hem & Wolfe," in Advertising Age, 31 August 1998.
 Cuneo, Alice Z., "Abercrombie Helps Revive Moribund Brand via Frat Chic," in Advertising Age, 14 September 1998.
 "Fashion's Frat Boy," in Newsweek, 13 September 1999.
 Young, Vicki M., "Catalogue Controversy Rages on as More States Criticize A&F," in Women's Wear Daily, 8 December 1999.
 Goldstein, Lauren, "The Alpha Teenager," in Forbes, 20 December 1999.
 Perman, Stacy, "Abercrombie's Beefcake Brigade," in Time, 14 February 2000.
 Margaret McKegney, Margaret, "Brands Remain in the Closet for Gay TV Show," in Ad Age Global, December 2000.
 Wilson, Eric, "A&F: The Butts Start Here," in Women's Wear Daily, 5 February 2001.
 Elliott, Stuart, "Bowing to Nation's Mood, Retailer Cancels Issue of Racy Catalogue," in the New York Times, 17 October 2001.

* * *

Although Abercrombie & Fitch (A&F) has been around for about 110 years, most of its current customers could care less that it outfitted legendary explorers like arctic explorer Richard Byrd. The firm's clientèle is predominantly Generation X and Y, and the Abercrombie logo has gone way beyond its sturdy apparel and into the realm of cool.

Abercrombie & Fitch has come back from the brink of extinction several times since its founding in 1892 by David Abercrombie. Originally created to sell camping gear, Abercrombie met up with lawyer Ezra Fitch and expanded the business to include a myriad of products for the rugged outdoorsmen of the time. Yet A&F didn't cater to just anyone with a yen for adventure, but only to those who could afford to pay premium prices for high-quality goods. Among the firm's early adventurers were Rough Rider Teddy Roosevelt, Byrd, Charles "Lucky" Lindbergh, and Amelia Earhart; the next generation included Winston Guest and macho sportsman and writer Ernest Hemingway.

The company did a bumper business until the 1960s, when flower power and environmental awareness began to seep into the American consciousness. Abercrombie & Fitch's atmospheric stores, with mounted animal heads and stuffed dead animals, were soon out of sync with a country awash in change and protest. The majority of A&F merchandise catered to hunting and fishing enthusiasts, and blood sports lost their popularity as the decade ended and the 1970s began. Although the firm valiantly tried to expand its wares to appeal to more customers, A&F filed for Chapter 11 in 1977.

Nature is Abboud's muse. Beyond the obvious J.O.E. line appellation, the theme of the bucolic environment provides inspiration for the garments. Country stone walls, pebbles on a beach, the light and earthtones of the Southwest are interpreted in exquisitely cut fabrics that embrace the body with a style that becomes an individual's second skin.

Abboud's easy, elegant style had translated into a $100 million business by 1997, with overseas sales accounting for about 35 percent of turnover. It was considered a healthy operation, but did not reach the heights of some of his better-known peers. In 1998 Abboud sought to boost his profile by entering into a strategic alliance with his 10-year licensee GFT USA, a subsidiary of the Italian company Holding de Participazioni Industriali (HdP). With the move, he hoped to increase synergies between Joseph Abboud Worldwide and GFT's J.A. Apparel subsidiary, both formed in 1996. The two businesses developed an integrated management structure and increased coordination among licensees.

Abboud launched an upscale black label line for men over 35 in 1999, intending to supplement his existing upper-moderate tailored clothing business. The products are sold in the designer's own shops and about 40 select doors at 10 leading retailers. They are manufactured in the U.S. using European fabrics.

In 2000 Abboud further cemented his relationship with GFT when the latter purchased Abboud's label and licensing rights for $65 million. Abboud plans to continue as creative director and chairman emeritus for at least five years. The Abboud labels generated an estimated $250 million in sales in 2000, with about 80 percent of that business from GFT, which produces and distributes Abboud's black and diamond label tailored clothing, sportswear and golfwear. The remaining sales come from 27 other licensees; Abboud's licensed lines include fragrances, furs, coats, lounge- and sleepwear, swimwear, timepieces, and home furnishings.

The GFT acquisition will enable expansion in key areas such as international distribution, golf, and women's wear, as well as boosting the company's retailing operation and enhancing the Joseph Abboud Environments bed and bath collection. GFT and Abboud are also considering the introduction of new collections, such as one geared toward younger men.

Abboud's business, at times, has been overshadowed by trendier labels such as Tommy Hilfiger, as well as by Italian designers who appeal to the same clientele. But his customer base—which includes several high-profile sports anchors and news anchor Bryant Gumbel—has long been loyal his earthy colors, use of texture, and his ability to combine the classic with the modern.

—Marianne T. Carlano; updated by Karen Raugust

ABERCROMBIE & FITCH COMPANY

American sportswear and outerwear retailer

Founded: in 1892 by David Abercrombie to sell camping supplies; joined by Ezra Fitch to become Abercrombie & Fitch, providing exclusive outdoor needs, including clothing and equipment. Company History: Moved to new Madison Avenue digs, 1917; filed for bankruptcy, 1977; bought by Oshman's Sporting Goods, 1978; bought by The Limited, 1988; Michael Jeffries became CEO, 1992; back in black ink, 1995; went public, 1996; spun off by Limited, 1998; introduced children's stores, 1998; launched Hollister stores, for younger teens, 2000; also publishes A&F Quarterly catalogue/magazine. Company Address: 6301 Fitch Path, New Albany, OH 43054 USA. Company Website: www.abercrombie.com.

PUBLICATIONS

On ABERCROMBIE & FITCH:

Articles

- Paris, Ellen, "Endangered Species? Abercrombie & Fitch," in Forbes, 9 March 1987.
 Brady, James, "Abercrombie & Fitch Forgets Its Days of Hem & Wolfe," in Advertising Age, 31 August 1998.
 Cuneo, Alice Z., "Abercrombie Helps Revive Moribund Brand via Frat Chic," in Advertising Age, 14 September 1998.
 "Fashion's Frat Boy," in Newsweek, 13 September 1999.
 Young, Vicki M., "Catalogue Controversy Rages on as More States Criticize A&F," in Women's Wear Daily, 8 December 1999.
 Goldstein, Lauren, "The Alpha Teenager," in Forbes, 20 December 1999.
 Perman, Stacy, "Abercrombie's Beefcake Brigade," in Time, 14 February 2000.
 Margaret McKegney, Margaret, "Brands Remain in the Closet for Gay TV Show," in Ad Age Global, December 2000.
 Wilson, Eric, "A&F: The Butts Start Here," in Women's Wear Daily, 5 February 2001.
 Elliott, Stuart, "Bowing to Nation's Mood, Retailer Cancels Issue of Racy Catalogue," in the New York Times, 17 October 2001.

* * *

Although Abercrombie & Fitch (A&F) has been around for about 110 years, most of its current customers could care less that it outfitted legendary explorers like arctic explorer Richard Byrd. The firm's clientèle is predominantly Generation X and Y, and the Abercrombie logo has gone way beyond its sturdy apparel and into the realm of cool.

Abercrombie & Fitch has come back from the brink of extinction several times since its founding in 1892 by David Abercrombie. Originally created to sell camping gear, Abercrombie met up with lawyer Ezra Fitch and expanded the business to include a myriad of products for the rugged outdoorsmen of the time. Yet A&F didn't cater to just anyone with a yen for adventure, but only to those who could afford to pay premium prices for high-quality goods. Among the firm's early adventurers were Rough Rider Teddy Roosevelt, Byrd, Charles "Lucky" Lindbergh, and Amelia Earhart; the next generation included Winston Guest and macho sportsman and writer Ernest Hemingway.

The company did a bumper business until the 1960s, when flower power and environmental awareness began to seep into the American consciousness. Abercrombie & Fitch's atmospheric stores, with mounted animal heads and stuffed dead animals, were soon out of sync with a country awash in change and protest. The majority of A&F merchandise catered to hunting and fishing enthusiasts, and blood sports lost their popularity as the decade ended and the 1970s began. Although the firm valiantly tried to expand its wares to appeal to more customers, A&F filed for Chapter 11 in 1977.

Oshman's Sporting Goods bought A&F in 1978 and hoped to parlay its fame into a broad mix of sporting goods and apparel, as well as a wide range of other products. The rescue failed, despite repeated attempts to revive the Abercrombie cachet. In 1988, clothier The Limited Inc. acquired the struggling A&F for $47 million, along with its 27 stores. The Limited, however, was an evolving retailer itself, having bought Victoria's Secret, Penhaligon's, Henri Bendel, and others in quick succession. The future of A&F, however, came in the form of Michael Jeffries, who took the reins as chief executive in 1992, when there were 35 rather unimpressive A&F stores dotting the nation. Jeffries had an unusual way of conducting business, from his 29-page employee manual to his maniacal detailing of each and every store.

Jeffries' know-how and marketing savvy were put to the test. He drastically overhauled Abercrombie's image to appeal to a younger, hipper crowd, doing away with anything but apparel and accessories. Jeffries wanted to entice the collegiate crowd into A&F and did so with creative advertising and making each A&F store a cool place to visit and spend money, with blaring popular music and a sales staff with attitude. By 1995 the retailer was not only in the black but a true cultural phenomenon. Abercrombie's logoed t-shirts and cargo pants became the must-have apparel for teenagers on up, which happened to be the fastest growing segment in retail.

To keep the momentum going, Jeffries initiated the A&F Quarterly (a slick magazine-like catalogue they call the "magalogue") and aggressive advertising. Both measures received much attention but brought the ire of parents, advocacy groups, and politicians when some of the material offered drinking tips and some content was deemed pornographic. Like Calvin Klein before him, Jeffries had pushed the envelope too far but had no remorse or plans to change his ways. In 1999 the company ran its first television ads, and the company hit a staggering milestone—breaking the $1-billion sales threshold.

By the end of the 20th century, the A&F magalogue was marketed only to more mature kids (18 and older with an ID to prove it) because of its emphasis on sex and "college-age" pursuits like partying. The younger crowd, of course, and virtually anyone buying Abercrombie had already bought the image along with the jeans, baggy pants, cargo shorts, and t-shirts. Though sales remained relatively solid, A&F had its share of troubles in the new millennium. Stock prices tumbled, its television ads didn't quite hit the mark, and as always, the firm continued to receive criticism for its A&F Quarterly. Oddly, in an instance when Jeffries could have reached millions of television viewers with his products, he refused to allow A&F clothing to appear in Showtime's Queer As Folk series—featuring young, hip, sexually active teens and adults doing all the things A&F showcased in its magalogue, with the exception that these pretty boys and girls were gay.

By 2001 Abercrombie had attempted to delineate its customers into three categories: for the younger or preteen crowd, it had launched Abercrombie stores in 1998; for teens and high schoolers, there was the newly introduced Hollister Co. in 2000; and older, college-aged buyers remained prime targets of traditional A&F stores. The latter group was also those to whom A&F Quarterly was addressed, but Jeffries seemed to have gone too far with the 2001 issue featuring the usual bevy of naked males and females. Bowing to pressure Jeffries pulled the issue, titled XXX, despite pleas that the magalogue was wrapped in plastic (like Playboy) and sold only to those with proof of their age.

Abercrombie & Fitch has proven itself a purveyor of more than just style, but of fashion advocating a particular lifestyle. Some quarrel with the firm's message and methods, but millions continue to pay premium prices for the simple apparel emblazoned with its name.

—Nelly Rhodes

ADOLFO

American designer

Born: Adolfo F. Sardiña in Cardenas, Cuba, 15 February 1933; immigrated to New York, 1948, naturalized, 1958. Education: B.A., St. Ignacius de Loyola Jesuit School, Havana, 1950. Military Service: Served in the U.S. Navy. Career: Apprentice millinery designer, Bergdorf Goodman, 1948–51; apprentice milliner at Cristobal Balenciaga Salon, Paris, 1950–52, and at Bergdorf Goodman, New York; designed millinery as Adolfo of Emmé, 1951–58; also worked as unpaid apprentice for Chanel fashion house, Paris, 1956–57; apprenticed in Paris with Balenciaga; established own millinery salon in New York, 1962, later expanded into women's custom clothing; designer, Adolfo Menswear and Adolfo Scarves, from 1978; perfume Adolfo launched, 1978; closed custom workroom to concentrate on his Adolfo Enterprises licensing business, 1993; debuted limited collection through Castleberry, 1995. Exhibitions: Fashion: An Anthology, Victoria & Albert Museum, London, 1971. Collections: Metropolitan Museum of Art, New York; Smithsonian Institution, Washington, D.C.; Dallas Museum of Fine Arts; Los Angeles County Museum of Art. Awards: Coty Fashion award, New York, 1955, 1969; Neiman Marcus award, 1956. Member: Council of Fashion Designers of America.

PUBLICATIONS

On ADOLFO:

Books

- Morris, Bernadine, and Barbara Walz, The Fashion Makers, New York, 1978.
- Diamonstein, Barbaralee, Fashion: The Inside Story, New York, 1985.
- Milbank, Caroline Rennolds, New York Fashion: The Evolution of American Style, New York, 1989.
- Stegemeyer, Anne, Who's Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.

Articles

- "Adolfo," in Current Biography (New York), November 1972.
- Standhill, Francesca, "The World of Adolfo," in Architectural Digest, December 1980.
- "Oh Come All Ye Faithful to Adolfo," in Chicago Tribune, 19 June 1985.
- "In Tune on Upscale Adolfo Dresses: The Illustrious," in Chicago Tribune, 22 June 1986.
- Morris, Bernadine, "Adolfo in New York: A Richly Evocative Private Realm for the Celebrated Couturier," in Architectural Digest, September 1989.

Oshman's Sporting Goods bought A&F in 1978 and hoped to parlay its fame into a broad mix of sporting goods and apparel, as well as a wide range of other products. The rescue failed, despite repeated attempts to revive the Abercrombie cachet. In 1988, clothier The Limited Inc. acquired the struggling A&F for $47 million, along with its 27 stores. The Limited, however, was an evolving retailer itself, having bought Victoria's Secret, Penhaligon's, Henri Bendel, and others in quick succession. The future of A&F, however, came in the form of Michael Jeffries, who took the reins as chief executive in 1992, when there were 35 rather unimpressive A&F stores dotting the nation. Jeffries had an unusual way of conducting business, from his 29-page employee manual to his maniacal detailing of each and every store.

Jeffries' know-how and marketing savvy were put to the test. He drastically overhauled Abercrombie's image to appeal to a younger, hipper crowd, doing away with anything but apparel and accessories. Jeffries wanted to entice the collegiate crowd into A&F and did so with creative advertising and making each A&F store a cool place to visit and spend money, with blaring popular music and a sales staff with attitude. By 1995 the retailer was not only in the black but a true cultural phenomenon. Abercrombie's logoed t-shirts and cargo pants became the must-have apparel for teenagers on up, which happened to be the fastest growing segment in retail.

To keep the momentum going, Jeffries initiated the A&F Quarterly (a slick magazine-like catalogue they call the "magalogue") and aggressive advertising. Both measures received much attention but brought the ire of parents, advocacy groups, and politicians when some of the material offered drinking tips and some content was deemed pornographic. Like Calvin Klein before him, Jeffries had pushed the envelope too far but had no remorse or plans to change his ways. In 1999 the company ran its first television ads, and the company hit a staggering milestone—breaking the $1-billion sales threshold.

By the end of the 20th century, the A&F magalogue was marketed only to more mature kids (18 and older with an ID to prove it) because of its emphasis on sex and "college-age" pursuits like partying. The younger crowd, of course, and virtually anyone buying Abercrombie had already bought the image along with the jeans, baggy pants, cargo shorts, and t-shirts. Though sales remained relatively solid, A&F had its share of troubles in the new millennium. Stock prices tumbled, its television ads didn't quite hit the mark, and as always, the firm continued to receive criticism for its A&F Quarterly. Oddly, in an instance when Jeffries could have reached millions of television viewers with his products, he refused to allow A&F clothing to appear in Showtime's Queer As Folk series—featuring young, hip, sexually active teens and adults doing all the things A&F showcased in its magalogue, with the exception that these pretty boys and girls were gay.

By 2001 Abercrombie had attempted to delineate its customers into three categories: for the younger or preteen crowd, it had launched Abercrombie stores in 1998; for teens and high schoolers, there was the newly introduced Hollister Co. in 2000; and older, college-aged buyers remained prime targets of traditional A&F stores. The latter group was also those to whom A&F Quarterly was addressed, but Jeffries seemed to have gone too far with the 2001 issue featuring the usual bevy of naked males and females. Bowing to pressure Jeffries pulled the issue, titled XXX, despite pleas that the magalogue was wrapped in plastic (like Playboy) and sold only to those with proof of their age.

Abercrombie & Fitch has proven itself a purveyor of more than just style, but of fashion advocating a particular lifestyle. Some quarrel with the firm's message and methods, but millions continue to pay premium prices for the simple apparel emblazoned with its name.

—Nelly Rhodes

ADOLFO

American designer

Born: Adolfo F. Sardiña in Cardenas, Cuba, 15 February 1933; immigrated to New York, 1948, naturalized, 1958. Education: B.A., St. Ignacius de Loyola Jesuit School, Havana, 1950. Military Service: Served in the U.S. Navy. Career: Apprentice millinery designer, Bergdorf Goodman, 1948–51; apprentice milliner at Cristobal Balenciaga Salon, Paris, 1950–52, and at Bergdorf Goodman, New York; designed millinery as Adolfo of Emmé, 1951–58; also worked as unpaid apprentice for Chanel fashion house, Paris, 1956–57; apprenticed in Paris with Balenciaga; established own millinery salon in New York, 1962, later expanded into women's custom clothing; designer, Adolfo Menswear and Adolfo Scarves, from 1978; perfume Adolfo launched, 1978; closed custom workroom to concentrate on his Adolfo Enterprises licensing business, 1993; debuted limited collection through Castleberry, 1995. Exhibitions: Fashion: An Anthology, Victoria & Albert Museum, London, 1971. Collections: Metropolitan Museum of Art, New York; Smithsonian Institution, Washington, D.C.; Dallas Museum of Fine Arts; Los Angeles County Museum of Art. Awards: Coty Fashion award, New York, 1955, 1969; Neiman Marcus award, 1956. Member: Council of Fashion Designers of America.

PUBLICATIONS

On ADOLFO:

Books

- Morris, Bernadine, and Barbara Walz, The Fashion Makers, New York, 1978.
- Diamonstein, Barbaralee, Fashion: The Inside Story, New York, 1985.
- Milbank, Caroline Rennolds, New York Fashion: The Evolution of American Style, New York, 1989.
- Stegemeyer, Anne, Who's Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.

Articles

- "Adolfo," in Current Biography (New York), November 1972.
- Standhill, Francesca, "The World of Adolfo," in Architectural Digest, December 1980.
- "Oh Come All Ye Faithful to Adolfo," in Chicago Tribune, 19 June 1985.
- "In Tune on Upscale Adolfo Dresses: The Illustrious," in Chicago Tribune, 22 June 1986.
- Morris, Bernadine, "Adolfo in New York: A Richly Evocative Private Realm for the Celebrated Couturier," in Architectural Digest, September 1989.

- Friedman, Arthur, "Always Adolfo," in Women's Wear Daily, 21 July 1992.
- _____, "Adolfo Closing His RTW Salon After 25 Years: Golden Era Ends," in Women's Wear Daily, 18 March 1993.
- Schiro Anne-Marie, "Adolfo Decides It's Time to Stop Designing," in the New York Times, 19 March 1993.
- "Adieu Adolfo," in Chicago Tribune, 24 March 1993.

*

To make clothes that are long-lasting and with subtle changes from season to season—this is my philosophy.

—Adolfo

* * *

In April of 1993, Adolfo closed his salon on New York's East 57th Street, after more than 25 years producing his classically elegant knit suits, dresses, and eveningwear. The outcry from his clientèle was emotional and indicative of the devotion his clothes inspired in his "ladies," including C.Z. Guest ("It's just a tragedy for me. He has such great taste, style, and manners...I've been wearing his clothes for years; they suit my lifestyle. He designs for a certain way of life that all these new designers don't seem to comprehend."); Jean Tailer ("I'm devastated.... He's the sweetest, most talented man. With Adolfo, you always have the right thing to wear."), and scores of others, such as Nancy Reagan, the Duchess of Windsor, Noreen Drexel, and Pat Mosbacher.

These loyal clients were among the many who returned to Adolfo season after season for clothes they could wear year after year, clothes that looked stylish and felt comfortable, style and comfort being the essence of his customers' elegant and effortless lifestyle.

Adolfo began his career as a milliner in the early 1950s, a time when hat designers were accorded as much respect and attention as dress designers. By 1955 he had received the Coty Fashion award for his innovative, often dramatic hat designs for Emmé Millinery. In 1962 Adolfo opened his own salon and began to design clothes to show with his hat collection. During this period, as women gradually began to wear hats less often, Adolfo's hat designs became progressively bolder. His design point of view held that hats should be worn as an accessory rather than a necessity, and this attitude was carried over into his clothing designs as well.

Adolfo's clothes of the late 1960s had the idiosyncratic quality characteristic of the period and, more importantly, each piece stood out on its own as a special item. This concept of design was incongruous with the American sportswear idea of coordinated separates but was consistent with the sensibility of his wealthy customers who regarded clothes, like precious jewelry, as adornments and indicators of their social status. Among the garments that captured the attention of clients and press during this period were felt capes, red, yellow, or purple velvet bolero jackets embroidered with jet beads and black braid, studded lace-up peasant vests, low-cut floral overalls worn over organdy blouses, and extravagant patchwork evening looks.

Adolfo remarked, in 1968, "Today, one has to dress in bits and pieces—the more the merrier." By 1969 he described his clothes as being "for a woman's fun and fantasy moods—I don't think the classic is appealing to people any more." Just one year later, however, he changed his point of view and at the same time increased the focus of his knits, which had been introduced in 1969. In a review of Adolfo's fall 1970 collection, Eugenia Sheppard, writing in the New York Post, declared "he has completely abandoned the costume look of previous years." Adolfo was always responsive to his customers' needs and this sudden change of direction probably reflected their reaction to the social upheavals and excesses of the last years of the 1960s.

By the early 1970s the 1930s look, inspired by films such as Bonnie and Clyde and The Damned, swept over fashion, drowning out the kooky individualism of seasons past. His explorations of this look led Adolfo, in 1973, to hit on what would become his signature item. Taking his cue from Coco Chanel's cardigan style suits of the 1930s, Adolfo translated the textured tweed into a pebbly knit, added a matching silk blouse, and came up with a formula his clients returned to over and over again until his retirement. These revivals of a classic became classics in their own right and the look became associated in America with Adolfo as much as with Chanel. Adolfo's collections were not limited to suits. When other American designers abandoned dresses for day in favor of sportswear separates, Adolfo continued to provide his customers with printed silk dresses appropriate for luncheons and other dressy daytime occasions. Adolfo's clients also relied on him for splendid eveningwear combining luxury with practicality. Typical evening looks included sweater knit tops with full satin or taffeta skirts, fur trimmed knit cardigans, silk pyjamas, and angora caftans.

After closing his salon to concentrate on marketing his licensed products, including perfumes, menswear, furs, handbags, sportswear, and hats, Adolfo made numerous appearances at departments stores and on QVC to promote his name and products in the early and mid-1990s, which were valued at some $5-million annually. In late 1995, he returned to designing, with a limited collection sponsored by Castleberry.

The designer himself once remarked that "an Adolfo lady should look simple, classic, and comfortable." He brought modest and characteristically American design ideals to a higher level of luxury and charm, combining quality and style with comfort and ease. While in some fashion circles, seeing women similarly dressed was a serious fashion faux pas, with Adolfo designs, women were thrilled to see their high-brow selections reflected in social scene mirrors. According to the Chicago Tribune in 1986, "Adolfo Ladies revel in duplication, triplication, quadruplication and more—much, much more." All because, as Jean Tailer told the Tribune, "we all feel a security blanket in getting the best of the collection." Adolfo provided, as the Tribune aptly called it, a "social security," to his ladies and they gave him loyalty, devotion, and upwards of $2500 per suit.

—Alan E. Rosenberg; updated by Nelly Rhodes

ADRI

American designer

Born: Mary Adrienne Steckling in St. Joseph, Missouri, 7 November 1934. Education: Attended St. Joseph Junior College, 1953; studied retailing and design, Washington University (School of Fine Arts), St.

- Friedman, Arthur, "Always Adolfo," in Women's Wear Daily, 21 July 1992.
- _____, "Adolfo Closing His RTW Salon After 25 Years: Golden Era Ends," in Women's Wear Daily, 18 March 1993.
- Schiro Anne-Marie, "Adolfo Decides It's Time to Stop Designing," in the New York Times, 19 March 1993.
- "Adieu Adolfo," in Chicago Tribune, 24 March 1993.

*

To make clothes that are long-lasting and with subtle changes from season to season—this is my philosophy.

—Adolfo

* * *

In April of 1993, Adolfo closed his salon on New York's East 57th Street, after more than 25 years producing his classically elegant knit suits, dresses, and eveningwear. The outcry from his clientèle was emotional and indicative of the devotion his clothes inspired in his "ladies," including C.Z. Guest ("It's just a tragedy for me. He has such great taste, style, and manners...I've been wearing his clothes for years; they suit my lifestyle. He designs for a certain way of life that all these new designers don't seem to comprehend."); Jean Tailer ("I'm devastated.... He's the sweetest, most talented man. With Adolfo, you always have the right thing to wear."), and scores of others, such as Nancy Reagan, the Duchess of Windsor, Noreen Drexel, and Pat Mosbacher.

These loyal clients were among the many who returned to Adolfo season after season for clothes they could wear year after year, clothes that looked stylish and felt comfortable, style and comfort being the essence of his customers' elegant and effortless lifestyle.

Adolfo began his career as a milliner in the early 1950s, a time when hat designers were accorded as much respect and attention as dress designers. By 1955 he had received the Coty Fashion award for his innovative, often dramatic hat designs for Emmé Millinery. In 1962 Adolfo opened his own salon and began to design clothes to show with his hat collection. During this period, as women gradually began to wear hats less often, Adolfo's hat designs became progressively bolder. His design point of view held that hats should be worn as an accessory rather than a necessity, and this attitude was carried over into his clothing designs as well.

Adolfo's clothes of the late 1960s had the idiosyncratic quality characteristic of the period and, more importantly, each piece stood out on its own as a special item. This concept of design was incongruous with the American sportswear idea of coordinated separates but was consistent with the sensibility of his wealthy customers who regarded clothes, like precious jewelry, as adornments and indicators of their social status. Among the garments that captured the attention of clients and press during this period were felt capes, red, yellow, or purple velvet bolero jackets embroidered with jet beads and black braid, studded lace-up peasant vests, low-cut floral overalls worn over organdy blouses, and extravagant patchwork evening looks.

Adolfo remarked, in 1968, "Today, one has to dress in bits and pieces—the more the merrier." By 1969 he described his clothes as being "for a woman's fun and fantasy moods—I don't think the classic is appealing to people any more." Just one year later, however, he changed his point of view and at the same time increased the focus of his knits, which had been introduced in 1969. In a review of Adolfo's fall 1970 collection, Eugenia Sheppard, writing in the New York Post, declared "he has completely abandoned the costume look of previous years." Adolfo was always responsive to his customers' needs and this sudden change of direction probably reflected their reaction to the social upheavals and excesses of the last years of the 1960s.

By the early 1970s the 1930s look, inspired by films such as Bonnie and Clyde and The Damned, swept over fashion, drowning out the kooky individualism of seasons past. His explorations of this look led Adolfo, in 1973, to hit on what would become his signature item. Taking his cue from Coco Chanel's cardigan style suits of the 1930s, Adolfo translated the textured tweed into a pebbly knit, added a matching silk blouse, and came up with a formula his clients returned to over and over again until his retirement. These revivals of a classic became classics in their own right and the look became associated in America with Adolfo as much as with Chanel. Adolfo's collections were not limited to suits. When other American designers abandoned dresses for day in favor of sportswear separates, Adolfo continued to provide his customers with printed silk dresses appropriate for luncheons and other dressy daytime occasions. Adolfo's clients also relied on him for splendid eveningwear combining luxury with practicality. Typical evening looks included sweater knit tops with full satin or taffeta skirts, fur trimmed knit cardigans, silk pyjamas, and angora caftans.

After closing his salon to concentrate on marketing his licensed products, including perfumes, menswear, furs, handbags, sportswear, and hats, Adolfo made numerous appearances at departments stores and on QVC to promote his name and products in the early and mid-1990s, which were valued at some $5-million annually. In late 1995, he returned to designing, with a limited collection sponsored by Castleberry.

The designer himself once remarked that "an Adolfo lady should look simple, classic, and comfortable." He brought modest and characteristically American design ideals to a higher level of luxury and charm, combining quality and style with comfort and ease. While in some fashion circles, seeing women similarly dressed was a serious fashion faux pas, with Adolfo designs, women were thrilled to see their high-brow selections reflected in social scene mirrors. According to the Chicago Tribune in 1986, "Adolfo Ladies revel in duplication, triplication, quadruplication and more—much, much more." All because, as Jean Tailer told the Tribune, "we all feel a security blanket in getting the best of the collection." Adolfo provided, as the Tribune aptly called it, a "social security," to his ladies and they gave him loyalty, devotion, and upwards of $2500 per suit.

—Alan E. Rosenberg; updated by Nelly Rhodes

ADRI

American designer

Born: Mary Adrienne Steckling in St. Joseph, Missouri, 7 November 1934. Education: Attended St. Joseph Junior College, 1953; studied retailing and design, Washington University (School of Fine Arts), St.

Adri, 1967: jersey minipants suit and shoes decorated with nail heads. © AP/Wide World Photos.

Louis, 1954–55, and fashion design at Parsons School of Design, New York, 1955–56; studied at the New School for Social Research, New York, 1956–57. Family: Married Fabio Coen, 1982. Career: Guest editor, Mademoiselle, college issue, 1955; design assistant for Oleg Cassini, Inc., New York, 1957–58; design assistant, later designer, B.H. Wragge, New York, 1960–67; opened Adri Designs Inc., 1966–67; formed Design Establishment, Inc. with Leonard Sunshine and the Anne Fogarty Co., New York, for the Clothes Circuit by Adri and Collector's Items by Adri division of Anne Fogarty, 1968–72; partner with William Parnes in Adri label for Paul Parnes's Adri Sporthoughts Ltd., 1972–74; designed for Ben Shaw company, 1975–76; Adri for Royal Robes, leisurewear, under license, 1976–77; Jerry Silverman Sport by Adri label, 1977–78; ADRI label collection for Jones New York, 1978–79; ADRI collection marketed by Habitat Industries, 1980–83; began as critic, Parsons School of Design, 1982; Japanese licensee N. Nomura & Co. Ltd, 1982–87; ADRI Collection marketed by Adri Clotheslab, 1983–87. Created Adri designer patterns for Vogue, 1982; designed several sportswear collections a year, selling to smaller specialty stores and private customers; joined Parsons School of Design faculty, 1991; corporate name changed to Adri Studio Ltd., 1994. Exhibitions: Innovative Contemporary Fashion: Adri and McCordell, Smithsonian Institution, Washington, D.C., 1971; various shows, Fashion Institute of Technology, New York City. Awards: Coty American Fashion Critics "Winnie" award, 1982; "International Best Five," Asahi Shimbun, Tokyo, 1986. Member: Council of Fashion Designers of America. Address: 143 West 20th Street, New York, NY, 10011, USA.

PUBLICATIONS

On ADRI:

Books

Lambert, Eleanor, World of Fashion: People, Places, Resources, New York, 1976.

Morris, Bernadine, and Barbara Walz, The Fashion Makers, New York, 1978.

Stegemeyer, Anne, Who's Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.

Articles

"The Find: Adri," in Women's Wear Daily (New York), 7 November 1966.

"Adri Opens the Door," in Women's Wear Daily (New York), 30 October 1968.

Banik, Sheila, "The Adventures of Adri: A Designer Goes From Wragge to Riches," in Savvy (New York), October 1980.

Burggraf, Helen, "Adri: Soft and Easy Designs for the Fast-Paced 1980s," in New York Apparel News, Spring 1982.

Morris, Bernadine, "Banks and Adri Win Coty Awards and Cheers," in the New York Times, 25 September 1982.

_____, "From Ellis, a Casual Whimsicality," in the New York Times, 27 October 1982.

_____, "A Sportswear Preview: Fall on Seventh Avenue," in the New York Times, 5 April 1983.

*

I believe in a "design continuum" of clothing that is essentially modern, that reflects the changing patterns of living, evolving gradually but continually.

Good design can be directional and timeless, functional and innovative in the tradition of American sportswear, and responsive to the needs of a woman equally committed to professional responsibilities and an enduring personal style.

—Adri

* * *

From the moment she fell in love with her first Claire McCordell dress while still a teenager—a dress she copied for herself many times because it fit her so well—Adri (Adrienne Steckling-Coen) idolized McCordell who, coincidentally, was one of her lecturers at the Parsons School of Design in New York. Adri's early years with B.H. Wragge taught her the principles of tailoring and mix-and-match separates, long a staple of American sportswear. Designing for Anne Fogarty reinforced the feminine focus of Adri's design philosophy. Always, she returned to McCordell's tenet of form following function. Shapes were simple, skimming the body without extraneous detail or fussiness, often based on the practicality of athletic wear. While McCordell favored dresses, Adri emphasized trousers, later designing skirt-length trousers, or culottes, for variety.

From the beginning Adri utilized soft, pliable fabrics such as knits, jerseys, crêpe de Chine, challis, and leather. Her clothes were identified by their floaty qualities and she maintained that this softness made them easy to wear and provided relief from the frequent harshness of modern life. They were also ideal for tall, long-limbed, slender figures like her own. During the late 1960s Adri presented V-necked short dresses with high waists or wrapped fronts, in solid colored synthetic jerseys. Natural fibers, such as unbleached linen, came of use in the 1970s and knits continued to be staples for Adri skirts, trousers, and tunics in various lengths. By 1980 a typical Adri evening look consisted of silk trousers topped by a strapless chenille top and fluid lace jacket.

Interchangeable neutral solids such as beige, black, and white were combined with bold primary colors so Adri's customers could collect the separates throughout the years and create their own ensembles, without having to purchase a new wardrobe each year. The simple timelessness of the designs, as well as their easy cut and fit, made this possible. Prices were in the moderate to better sportswear range.

Adri wore her own apparel to accept her Coty award in 1982: a belted silver-grey (she called it "platinum") mohair sweater over midcalf culottes made of grey suede. Soon afterwards she branched out into menswear, creating unisex sweaters, cardigans, and vests. Evening looks continued to be based on day shapes, but fabricated of highly colored striped shiny rayon or mohair. Pullovers, jackets, and vests were frequently long, and Adri kept experimenting with new materials, such as eelskin, for her contrasting boldly colored belts, or handloomed Japanese fabrics with interesting textures. A touch of the opulent 1980s was evident in her use of tapestry jackets to be worn with velvet trousers, as well as damask and silk Jacquard.

Clothes like these can be easily adapted for homesewers, and Adri contracted with Vogue Patterns during the mid-1980s for a relationship that continued into the 1990s. The same McCardell-inspired sporty yet fluid lines were evident; shirtwaist dresses with topstitching detail, softly gathered jackets, shaped hemlines with gracefully flounced skirts, cummerbund accents to shorten the appearance of tall, slim figures, gently gathered waists, and easy wrap dresses were some of the offerings available to seamstresses wishing to recreate Adri's classic multifunctional designs.

Since changing her corporate name to Adri Studio Ltd. in 1994, Adri has continued to design small collections. Hard at work in her New York studio, she has focused on designer collections exclusively. With her Egyptian partner, Nadia Abdella, Adri continues to fashion the fluid, timeless pieces for which she has always been known. "The concept," she says, "remains the same." This design concept was always, she noted, a very flexible, contemporary one and has continued into the 21st century quite successfully. She creates one exclusive designer collection a season that is both wholesale and retail. The Adri collections are available through exclusive stores and show in private clubs, such as The Ruins in San Francisco. This approach, both simple and consistent, and the adaptable charm and enduring quality of an Adri garment, have created a niche for the designer and, "It's working," she says.

—Therese Duzinkiewicz Baker; updated by Jessica Reisman

ADRIAN, Gilbert

American designer

Born: Gilbert Adrian Greenburgh in Naugatuck, Connecticut, 3 March 1903. Education: Studied at Parsons School of Design,

Joan Crawford modeling "Change," a two-piece silk dinner dress with gold paillettes designed by Gilbert Adrian for the film Humoresque (1946). © Bettmann/CORBIS.

New York and Paris, circa 1921–22. Family: Married Janet Gaynor in 1939; son: Robin. Career: Film and theater designer, New York, 1921–28; designer, MGM studios, Hollywood, 1928–39; ready-to-wear and custom clothing salon established, Beverly Hills, 1942–52; fragrances Saint and Sinner introduced, 1946; opened New York boutique, 1948; retired to Brasilia, Brazil, 1952–58; film designer, Los Angeles, 1958–59. Exhibitions: Retrospective, Los Angeles County Museum, circa 1967; retrospective, Fashion Institute of Technology, New York, 1971. Awards: Coty American Fashion Critics award, 1944. Died: 14 September 1959 in Los Angeles, California.

PUBLICATIONS

By ADRIAN:

Articles

- "Do American Women Want Clothes?" in Harper's Bazaar (New York), February 1934.
- "Garbo as Camille," in Vogue (New York), 15 November 1936.

slender figures like her own. During the late 1960s Adri presented V-necked short dresses with high waists or wrapped fronts, in solid colored synthetic jerseys. Natural fibers, such as unbleached linen, came of use in the 1970s and knits continued to be staples for Adri skirts, trousers, and tunics in various lengths. By 1980 a typical Adri evening look consisted of silk trousers topped by a strapless chenille top and fluid lace jacket.

Interchangeable neutral solids such as beige, black, and white were combined with bold primary colors so Adri's customers could collect the separates throughout the years and create their own ensembles, without having to purchase a new wardrobe each year. The simple timelessness of the designs, as well as their easy cut and fit, made this possible. Prices were in the moderate to better sportswear range.

Adri wore her own apparel to accept her Coty award in 1982: a belted silver-grey (she called it "platinum") mohair sweater over midcalf culottes made of grey suede. Soon afterwards she branched out into menswear, creating unisex sweaters, cardigans, and vests. Evening looks continued to be based on day shapes, but fabricated of highly colored striped shiny rayon or mohair. Pullovers, jackets, and vests were frequently long, and Adri kept experimenting with new materials, such as eelskin, for her contrasting boldly colored belts, or handloomed Japanese fabrics with interesting textures. A touch of the opulent 1980s was evident in her use of tapestry jackets to be worn with velvet trousers, as well as damask and silk Jacquard.

Clothes like these can be easily adapted for homesewers, and Adri contracted with Vogue Patterns during the mid-1980s for a relationship that continued into the 1990s. The same McCardell-inspired sporty yet fluid lines were evident; shirtwaist dresses with topstitching detail, softly gathered jackets, shaped hemlines with gracefully flounced skirts, cummerbund accents to shorten the appearance of tall, slim figures, gently gathered waists, and easy wrap dresses were some of the offerings available to seamstresses wishing to recreate Adri's classic multifunctional designs.

Since changing her corporate name to Adri Studio Ltd. in 1994, Adri has continued to design small collections. Hard at work in her New York studio, she has focused on designer collections exclusively. With her Egyptian partner, Nadia Abdella, Adri continues to fashion the fluid, timeless pieces for which she has always been known. "The concept," she says, "remains the same." This design concept was always, she noted, a very flexible, contemporary one and has continued into the 21st century quite successfully. She creates one exclusive designer collection a season that is both wholesale and retail. The Adri collections are available through exclusive stores and show in private clubs, such as The Ruins in San Francisco. This approach, both simple and consistent, and the adaptable charm and enduring quality of an Adri garment, have created a niche for the designer and, "It's working," she says.

—Therese Duzinkiewicz Baker; updated by Jessica Reisman

ADRIAN, Gilbert

American designer

Born: Gilbert Adrian Greenburgh in Naugatuck, Connecticut, 3 March 1903. Education: Studied at Parsons School of Design,

Joan Crawford modeling "Change," a two-piece silk dinner dress with gold paillettes designed by Gilbert Adrian for the film Humoresque (1946). © Bettmann/CORBIS.

New York and Paris, circa 1921–22. Family: Married Janet Gaynor in 1939; son: Robin. Career: Film and theater designer, New York, 1921–28; designer, MGM studios, Hollywood, 1928–39; ready-to-wear and custom clothing salon established, Beverly Hills, 1942–52; fragrances Saint and Sinner introduced, 1946; opened New York boutique, 1948; retired to Brasilia, Brazil, 1952–58; film designer, Los Angeles, 1958–59. Exhibitions: Retrospective, Los Angeles County Museum, circa 1967; retrospective, Fashion Institute of Technology, New York, 1971. Awards: Coty American Fashion Critics award, 1944. Died: 14 September 1959 in Los Angeles, California.

PUBLICATIONS

By ADRIAN:

Articles

- "Do American Women Want Clothes?" in Harper's Bazaar (New York), February 1934.
- "Garbo as Camille," in Vogue (New York), 15 November 1936.

Gilbert Adrian, ca. 1935. © Bettmann/CORBIS.

"Clothes," in Stephen Watts, ed., Behind the Screen: How Films Are Made, London, 1938.

On ADRIAN:

Books

- Powdermaker, Hortense, The Dream Factory, Boston, 1950.
 Riley, Robert, The Fashion Makers, New York, 1968.
 Lee, Sarah Tomerlin, ed., American Fashion, New York, 1975.
 ———, American Fashion: The Life and Lines of Adrian, Mainbocher, McCordell, Norell, Trigère, New York, 1975.
 Lambert, Eleanor, The World of Fashion: People, Places, Resources, New York and London, 1976.
 Pritchard, Susan, Film Costume: An Annotated Bibliography, Metuchen, New Jersey and London, 1981.
 Milbank, Caroline Rennolds, Couture: The Great Designers, New York, 1985.
 Maeder, Edward, et al., Hollywood and History: Costume Design in Film, New York, 1987.
 Milbank, Caroline Rennolds, New York Fashion: The Evolution of American Style, New York, 1989.
 Leese, Elizabeth, Costume Design in the Movies, New York, 1991.
 Stegemeyer, Anne, Who's Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.
 Gutner, Howard, Gowns by Adrian: The MGM Years, 1928–1941, New York, 2001.

Articles

- Gordon, James, "One Man Who Suits Women," in American Magazine (Philadelphia), March 1946.
 Obituary, the New York Times, 14 September 1959.
 Sims, Joseph, "Adrian—American Artist and Designer," in Costume, 1974.
 Kinsey, Sally Buchanan, "Gilbert Adrian: Creating the Hollywood Dream Style," in Fiberarts (Asheville, North Carolina), May/June 1987.
 Lambert, Gavin, "Janet Gaynor and Adrian," in Architectural Digest (Los Angeles), April 1992.

* * *

By the time MGM costumer Gilbert Adrian went into business for himself in the middle of World War II, his potential customers were already familiar with his work. For over a decade American women had been wearing copies of the clothes he had designed for some of the most famous movie stars of all time. Adrian's ability to develop a screen character through the progression of costumes, be they period or modern, was translated into dressing the newly modern career women while men were away at war.

Adrian was primarily an artist, having trained in France, and was able to perceive Greta Garbo's true personality—aloof, mysterious, earthy—and change the way the studios dressed her; insisting upon genuine silks, laces, and jewels to lend authenticity to her performances. For all the stars he dressed, Adrian believed the quality of materials worn by a woman affected how she behaved in the clothes, even if the details were not immediately obvious. He brought the same philosophy to his custom and ready-to-wear creations. Of course the copies MGM permitted to be made of Adrian's costumes, timed to coincide with the releases of the films, were not always of the same fine quality as the originals, but the overall look was what women wore after. While films provided a great escape from the dreariness of the American Depression, the famous white organdy dress with wide ruffled sleeves that Adrian designed for Joan Crawford in the movie Letty Lynton offered cheer and flattery. Macy's New York department store alone sold nearly half a million copies in 1932. The artist's eye perceived the need to balance Crawford's wide hips, and the broad shouldered typical "Adrian silhouette" triggered a fashion revolution in America and abroad.

For Jean Harlow in Dinner at Eight, Adrian created another widely copied sheer white bias-cut satin ballgown. Though Madeleine Vionnet invented the bias cut and Elsa Schiaparelli was credited with padded shoulders, at least in Europe, Adrian had the awareness to bring high fashion and glamour to the screen. Joan Crawford praised Adrian's emphasis on simplicity to make a dramatic point, as in the suits she wore in her later films. Even in lavishly costumed period dramas, Adrian was able to stop short of excess. Often, as in Garbo's Mata Hari, the character's evolution into purity of spirit would be expressed through increased simplicity of costume. Adrian's understanding of light and shadow made possible clothing that, due to clarity of line, looked as well in monochrome film as later black-and-white photographs of his commercial designs would show. His eye for perfect cut was impeccable. A day suit consisting of a beige wool jacket trimmed with loops of black braid, paired with a slim black skirt, black gloves, and beige cartwheel hat, looks as crisp and smart today as it did when featured in Vogue in 1946. Fluid floor-length crêpe gowns were dramatically yet whimsically decorated with asymmetrical motifs of horses, cherubs, or piano keys, or his taste for modern art would be indulged in gowns made up of abstract jigsaw puzzle shapes in several colors.

Just as in films Adrian worked within themes, so did his collections for Adrian, Ltd. develop according to such themes as gothic, Grecian, Persian, Spanish, or Americana. For the latter he appliquéd Pennsylvania Dutch designs on gowns and made tailored suits and bustled evening gowns out of checked gingham, echoing the gingham checks worn by Judy Garland in The Wizard of Oz. Adrian costumed Garbo as the essence of romance in Camille, not only in 19th-century crinolines, but in white nightgown (which could have been any female viewer's late day dinner dress) for the film's death scene. For his average American customer, Adrian recommended clothes like the "costumes worn by the heroines of light comedies...in moderate-sized towns." Katharine Hepburn in The Philadelphia Story was dressed by Adrian as the ideal girl next door, while conservative Norma Shearer mirrored the sophisticated simplicity of Adrian's future well-heeled Beverly Hills clients in The Women.

The spare, padded-shouldered, narrow waisted and skirted silhouette of the 1940s was the ideal medium for Adrian's artistry with fabric, while conforming to the wartime L-85 restrictions on materials—the U.S. government limitation on the amount of fabric used in a civilian garment for public consumption. The color inserts, appliqués, mitering of striped fabrics and combinations of materials in one ensemble allowed for savings in rationed fabrics, while creating the trademark Adrian look which was desired then and is still sought after by vintage clothing collectors. Old-time movie glamor would resurface in some of Adrian's elegant columns of crêpe, diagonally embellished by headed bands of ancient motifs, or thick gilt embroidery on dark backgrounds. Diagonal lines and asymmetry also lent interest, as in a short-sleeved wartime suit sewn of half plaid and half wool—completed by a hat trimmed in plaid edging. Having grown up observing his father's millinery trade, Adrian had included hats in his movie costuming and his designs, such as Garbo's slouch, cloche, and Eugenie, were widely copied in the 1930s.

Adrian unsuccessfully resisted Dior's round-shouldered New Look. Men returned from the war, and women returned to the home. Decades later, with the resurgence of women into the workforce, Adrian's broad shouldered looks enabled women to compete confidently with men, as designers resurrected the masterpieces of this truly American fashion virtuoso.

—Therese Duzinkiewicz Baker

ADROVER, Miguel

Spanish designer

Born: Majorca, Spain, December 1965. Education: Left school at the age of 12 to work on the family farm. Career: Teamed with American tailor Douglas Hobbs to launch clothing line Dugg, 1995; opened boutique, Horn, in New York's East Village, 1995–99; launched first collection Manaus-Chiapas-NYC, 1999; launched second collection, Midtown, 2000; received financial backing from the Pegasus Apparel Group to produce Miguel Adrover line, 2000. Awards: Council of Fashion Designers, Best New Designer of the Year, 2000.

Miguel Adrover, spring 2001 collection. © Fashion Syndicate Press.

PUBLICATIONS

On ADROVER:

Articles

- Hume, Marion, "Miguel Takes Manhattan," in Harper's Bazaar, May 2000.
- Bee, Deborah, "Uniform Chic Puts Avant Garde Into Everyday Wear," in The Guardian, 19 September 2000.
- Moore, Beth, "Rebel Designers Deconstruct Fashion Genres, Assumptions," in the Los Angeles Times, 22 September 2000.
- Goldstein, Lauren, "From New York, Miguel Adrover's Moneyed Moment," in Time, October 2000.
- Jones, Rose Apodace, "Educating Adrover," in Women's Wear Daily, 2 October 2000.
- Wilson, Eric, "The School of Miguel," in Women's Wear Daily, 2 February 2001.
- McCants, Leonard, and Julee Greenberg, "Gritty and Pretty: A New Niche Emerges in NYC's East Village," in Women's Wear Daily, 13 February 2001.

asymmetrical motifs of horses, cherubs, or piano keys, or his taste for modern art would be indulged in gowns made up of abstract jigsaw puzzle shapes in several colors.

Just as in films Adrian worked within themes, so did his collections for Adrian, Ltd. develop according to such themes as gothic, Grecian, Persian, Spanish, or Americana. For the latter he appliquéd Pennsylvania Dutch designs on gowns and made tailored suits and bustled evening gowns out of checked gingham, echoing the gingham checks worn by Judy Garland in The Wizard of Oz. Adrian costumed Garbo as the essence of romance in Camille, not only in 19th-century crinolines, but in white nightgown (which could have been any female viewer's late day dinner dress) for the film's death scene. For his average American customer, Adrian recommended clothes like the "costumes worn by the heroines of light comedies...in moderate-sized towns." Katharine Hepburn in The Philadelphia Story was dressed by Adrian as the ideal girl next door, while conservative Norma Shearer mirrored the sophisticated simplicity of Adrian's future well-heeled Beverly Hills clients in The Women.

The spare, padded-shouldered, narrow waisted and skirted silhouette of the 1940s was the ideal medium for Adrian's artistry with fabric, while conforming to the wartime L-85 restrictions on materials—the U.S. government limitation on the amount of fabric used in a civilian garment for public consumption. The color inserts, appliqués, mitering of striped fabrics and combinations of materials in one ensemble allowed for savings in rationed fabrics, while creating the trademark Adrian look which was desired then and is still sought after by vintage clothing collectors. Old-time movie glamor would resurface in some of Adrian's elegant columns of crêpe, diagonally embellished by headed bands of ancient motifs, or thick gilt embroidery on dark backgrounds. Diagonal lines and asymmetry also lent interest, as in a short-sleeved wartime suit sewn of half plaid and half wool—completed by a hat trimmed in plaid edging. Having grown up observing his father's millinery trade, Adrian had included hats in his movie costuming and his designs, such as Garbo's slouch, cloche, and Eugenie, were widely copied in the 1930s.

Adrian unsuccessfully resisted Dior's round-shouldered New Look. Men returned from the war, and women returned to the home. Decades later, with the resurgence of women into the workforce, Adrian's broad shouldered looks enabled women to compete confidently with men, as designers resurrected the masterpieces of this truly American fashion virtuoso.

—Therese Duzinkiewicz Baker

ADROVER, Miguel

Spanish designer

Born: Majorca, Spain, December 1965. Education: Left school at the age of 12 to work on the family farm. Career: Teamed with American tailor Douglas Hobbs to launch clothing line Dugg, 1995; opened boutique, Horn, in New York's East Village, 1995–99; launched first collection Manaus-Chiapas-NYC, 1999; launched second collection, Midtown, 2000; received financial backing from the Pegasus Apparel Group to produce Miguel Adrover line, 2000. Awards: Council of Fashion Designers, Best New Designer of the Year, 2000.

Miguel Adrover, spring 2001 collection. © Fashion Syndicate Press.

PUBLICATIONS

On ADROVER:

Articles

- Hume, Marion, "Miguel Takes Manhattan," in Harper's Bazaar, May 2000.
- Bee, Deborah, "Uniform Chic Puts Avant Garde Into Everyday Wear," in The Guardian, 19 September 2000.
- Moore, Beth, "Rebel Designers Deconstruct Fashion Genres, Assumptions," in the Los Angeles Times, 22 September 2000.
- Goldstein, Lauren, "From New York, Miguel Adrover's Moneyed Moment," in Time, October 2000.
- Jones, Rose Apodace, "Educating Adrover," in Women's Wear Daily, 2 October 2000.
- Wilson, Eric, "The School of Miguel," in Women's Wear Daily, 2 February 2001.
- McCants, Leonard, and Julee Greenberg, "Gritty and Pretty: A New Niche Emerges in NYC's East Village," in Women's Wear Daily, 13 February 2001.

Miguel Adrover, fall 2001 collection. © Fashion Syndicate Press.

- Menkes, Suzy, "Adrover's Egyptian Odyssey," in the International Herald Tribune, 13 February 2001.
 Porter, Charlie, "Designer Storms Fashion Desert," in The Guardian, 13 February 2001.
 Thurman, Judith, "Combat Fatigue," in the New Yorker, March 2001.
 Collins, James, "One Year Later," in the New Yorker, April 2001.
 Morra, Bernadette, "Designer Gives New Life to Old Classics," in the Toronto Star, 21 September 2001.

* * *

Miguel Adrover is a self-trained fashion designer who quit school at the age of 12 to work on the family farm located on the island of Majorca, Spain, in a small village called Calonge. His first inspiration into the fashion world came when he visited London as a teenager, where he was exposed to punk rock and the New Romantics. In his village, he became the one who was always into the latest music and punky clothes. He served in the army in his late teens and upon discharge ran a bar in Spain.

On his first visit to New York in 1991, Adrover decided to stay. He worked as a janitor and lived in a tiny basement apartment. Four years later, in 1995, he befriended a Native American tailor, Douglas Hobbs, and together they made and sold t-shirts. The same year, they opened the Horn boutique in New York's East Village. Horn soon became the playing ground for young designers from New York and London who didn't have any other place to show their clothes. These designers included Alexander McQueen, Bernadette Corporation, and Bless. Horn also carried labels such as Dugg, Bruce, and As Four. Adrover and Hobbs closed the boutique in March 1999 to concentrate on designing women's clothing.

With many friends but little money, Adrover turned out his first collection, Manaus-Chiapas NYC, at a Latin theater in New York's Lower East Side in the summer of 1999. The collection was about the journey of a woman, kicked out of her surroundings, who is struggling yet nonetheless very strong. Adrover received some favorable press, but could not afford and did not attempt to market the clothes since he had only $5 in his pocket. Although he was a newcomer to the world of fashion, he was seen as a rising star after his showing.

His second show, for fall 2000, took place in a rundown theater in the Lower East Side in February and was titled "Midtown." Adrover wanted to show the paradox of different classes of people mixing on the sidewalks of New York City, where one finds middle-class, homeless, and upper-class people. The show's theme was his interpretation of pedestrians on the streets, and drew many of the fashion world's most important people, including Anna Wintour, chief editor of American Vogue, and Cathy Horyn, fashion journalist for the New York Times. The Midtown showing had been financed by Vogue, who paid Adrover a settlement of $12,000 after his samples were stolen from the magazine's offices.

The collection was made up of borrowed classics from past designers which Adrover turned into works of art, using deconstruction and reconstruction. He flipped Burberry macs inside out, took a Louis Vuitton bag and made it into a miniskirt, and transformed writer and neighbor Quentin Crisp's mattress into an overcoat. The coat has become somewhat of a legend in itself—since everyone who worked on it developed a terrible rash.

After the Midtown show, Adrover was suddenly the next superstar fashion designer. He was soon signed by the Pegasus Group, and Judith Thurman of the New Yorker called him "a phenom." The eponymous Miguel Adrover collection debuted in May 2000 to high praise and was sold to stores worldwide. Adrover went to Italy to buy his fabrics, from old bolts of cloth, for the 36-piece collection. Adrover's designs can now be found in stores in the U.S., Europe, and the Far East.

In February 2001, Adrover showed his fourth collection, "Meeteast," an Egyptian-inspired presentation for which he spent six weeks in Egypt in order to develop ideas. The showing was a trip around the Arab world, filled with exotic designs, and like his previous collections, received much media hype—though not all positive. Meeteast was somewhat of an oddity in the fashion world, featuring military looks with traditional Arab, colonial, and missionary garments. Models wore harem pants, tunics, and supple knits; some fabrics had been soaked in the Nile River to alter their color while also allowing Adrover to make a political statement about the Third World.

Adrover is a rising star in the fashion industry, another retelling in the classic story of the American dream. "I would love to be considered a classic," the designer told W magazine, yet his version of "classic" would surely have a twist, as he aspires to be "a modern classic, an abstract classic."

—Donna W. Reamy

AGHION, Gaby

See CHLOÉ

AGNÈS B.

French designer

Born: Born Agnès Troublé in Versailles, France, 26 November 1942. Family: Married Christian Bourgois, 1958 (divorced); two additional marriages and divorces; five children. Career: Junior fashion editor, Elle magazine, Paris, 1964; designer, press attaché, and buyer for Dorothée Bis, Paris, 1965–66; freelance designer for Limitex, Pierre d'Alby, V de V, and Eversbin, Paris, 1966–75; set up CMC (Comptoir Mondial de Création) holding company for Agnès B., 1975; established first Agnès B. boutique in Les Halles, Paris, April 1975; opened second-hand shop in same street as boutique, 1977; created American subsidiary of CMC and first American boutique in Soho, New York, 1980; opened men's and children's boutique Agnès B. Enfant, Paris, 1981; license with Les Trois Suisses for mail order of selected items, 1982; opened Agnès B. Lolita boutique for teenagers, also opened La Galerie du Jour art gallery/bookshop, Paris, with ex-husband, 1984; launched Le B perfume, skincare and cosmetics products, and a maternity collection, 1987; launched ranges of sunglasses and watches, 1989; launched Le petit b.b. perfume for children, 1990; launched Courant d'air perfume, 1992; established many shops in France and worldwide, including Japan, London, and the United States. Collections: Musée des Arts de la Mode, Paris; Musée du Louvre, Paris. Awards: Order of Merit for Export, Paris. Address: 17 rue Dieu, 75010 Paris, France.

PUBLICATIONS

On AGNÈS B.:

Books

Stegemeyer, Anne, Who's Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.

Articles

Voight, R., "Success Par Excellence," in Passion (Paris), March 1983.

Jonah, Kathleen, "How to Live Straight from the Heart," in Self October 1983.

Petkanas, Christopher, "Agnès B. from A to Z," in Women's Wear Daily, 22 April 1985.

Bleichroeder, Ingrid, "A Certain Style: Agnès B.," in Vogue (London), January 1986.

"Agnès B.," in Cosmopolitan (London), September 1987.

Tretlack, Philippe, "Agnès B: Chez les Soviets," in Elle (Paris), 26 October 1987.

"Agnès B. Good," in the Daily News Record (New York), 2 May 1988.

Bucket, Debbie, "French Dressers," in Clothes Show (London), March 1989.

Tredre, Roger, "A Design Plan for No Seasons," in The Independent (London), 16 November 1989.

Weisman, Katherine, "Success Is the Key of Agnès B.," in Women's Wear Daily, 15 December 1994.

Socha, Miles, "French Fashion Retailer Agnès B. Plans to Open Its Eighth U.S. Store," in the Daily News Record, 13 November 1996.

Edelson, Sharon, "Agnès B.: Will She Play the Midwest?" in Women's Wear Daily, 14 November 1996.

Larson, Soren, "Agnès B.'s Stealth Launch," in Women's Wear Daily, 7 February 1997.

Levine, Lisbeth, "French Connection: Parisian Designer's Trend-Defying Fashions Put the Accent on Personal Style," in Chicago Tribune, 30 March 1997

Attias, Laurie, "B.-Watch," in ARTnews, Summer, 2000.

* * *

Agnès B. (the B stands for Bourgois, from her first marriage) is a French sportswear designer who has catapulted herself to fame by challenging the need for fashion in clothing design. She denies that clothes must be stylized, highly detailed, and ephemeral in order to catch the public imagination. Her ascent began in the mid-1970s when, after only a few years in the fashion business, first as junior editor at Elle magazine and then briefly as an assistant to Dorothée Bis, she opened her own boutique in a converted butcher shop in Les Halles, Paris, to sell recut and redyed French workers' uniforms, black leather blazers, and t-shirts in striped rugby fabric. Her reputation grew as one of the first young French clothing designers to sell fashion to those who did not want to look too fashionable. In fact, her clothes, while identifiably French in their no-nonsense cut, simple subdued colors (often black), and casual mood, have a timeless quality that keeps them current. The wrinkling common to natural materials and the already-worn look that characterized the hippie ethos were translated by Agnès B. into a timeless chic, combining common sense with flair.

In the age of name identification and personal marketing, Agnès B. is as respected for her business sense as for her relaxed fashion designs. The spontaneous, childlike hand with which she quickly fashioned the logo for her stores belies a sophisticated business sense. Retaining her own independent boutique rather than being swallowed up in larger department stores, she astutely perceived that the nondesign of her clothes was too inconspicuous, and that they would blend in with other, trendier lines, and be lost. She opened over a dozen shops in France, of which seven are in Paris, with branches in Amsterdam, London, Tokyo, and the United States (including Boston, Chicago, Los Angeles, and New York).

Her understated approach to design for real people (men and children, as well as women) extends to her shows, which she has called working sessions, where professional models are rarely used, and her stores, in which casual and friendly salespeople mix their own antique or mod clothes with her separates. All the stores exude the same comfortable look, with pale wooden floors, white walls, and the occasional decorative tile. The flimsy curtain that separates the display area from the communal dressing rooms is an implication of the marginal distinction between Agnès B. clothes and what everyone else is wearing.

Agnès B. has managed to keep her family-run business a success for several reasons. Her designs reflect the lives of her customers, speaking more to purpose than to style. She generally produces two collections per year but adds regularly to the collections throughout the year. She keeps the business organized by using a computerized management method of production, delivery, and inventory and keeps the boutiques and stores happy by delivering frequently and consistently. Her customers remain content because the quality of the clothing is consistent. Interestingly, unlike most designers, she keeps some items in her collection for several seasons; “You can’t destabilize the client.... Customers want to see some constant pieces.” Her clientèle includes women, men, and children and have been described as “cultish.”

Her designs have been popular in Europe, the Far East, and in several cities in the United States. In the early 1990s, she expanded her American market, and by 1996, she had a total of eight stores in the U.S., with plans to open several more. By 1997 there were 93 worldwide stores, generating some $260 million annually. Next came the opening of a new store in Chicago, Illinois, and the launch of a beauty products line of skin care, makeup, and four fragrances to the U.S. market. Agnès B. is known for her display windows, which are characteristically devoid of mannequins—where she merely hangs the clothes on hangers and the accessories are strewn about. She also includes movie posters in the display, which have become one of her trademarks.

Agnès B. strikes a commercial and creative balance—a radical chic. “I have no desire to dress an elite,” she states. “It’s all a game. I work as if I were still in my grandmother’s attic, dressing up. Clothes aren’t everything. When they become too important, when they hide the person wearing them, then I don’t like them. Clothes should make you feel happy, relaxed, and ready to tackle other problems.”

—Sarah Bodine; updated by Christine Miner Minderovic

AKIRA

Japanese designer

Born: Maki Akira, Oita, Japan, circa 1949. Education: Graduated from Oita University; worked for and studied fashion with Reiko Minami, Tokyo. Career: Moved to New York, 1974; tailor, Halston, 1976–81; showed first own collection, 1982; began designing wedding dresses for high-end department stores, from late 1990s.

PUBLICATIONS

On AKIRA:

Articles

- Morris, Bernadine, “Bolder Designs for Evening,” in the New York Times, 27 August 1985.
 Hyde, Ann, “Akira on Bias,” in Threads (Newtown, Connecticut), October/November 1991.
 Horyn, Cathy, “Saying ‘I Do’ to a Radical Gown,” in the New York Times, 4 January 2000.
 “Akira,” available online at First View Collections Online, www.firstview.com, 30 September 2001.
 “Fashion Victim,” available online at www.fashionvictim.com, 30 September 2001.

* * *

In the romantic imagination, the artist thrives on alienation, a critical distancing of an “other.” Akira is of two worlds. In Japan, he is addressed by his surname, Maki; in America, he uses his first name,

Akira. These are social conventions of two cultures, but they are also the theses and antitheses propagating Akira’s fashion. An American designer when he designs ready-to-wear clothing in Japan, Akira is conversely viewed in America as a Japanese designer working for the American custom market. He is, however, both and neither; his style is only relaxed elegance. After studying and first designing in Japan, he came to New York to work with Halston, having been inspired by the work of Halston he found in American fashion magazines.

After working with Halston until 1981, when Akira established his own business, he has become a designer of two identities, with businesses in two countries and a single design philosophy, a synthesis of East and West. In Akira’s custom business in New York, he creates out of the distilled, almost astringent principles of design he has maintained since working for Halston, with stress on bias cut, quality materials, color, and timeless elegance. His American custom clients come to him for a sense of personal comfort and self-assured dignity. While some of his American dresses, often bridal gowns, are adorned with beadwork and other decoration, their principle is in the cut. His is the abiding modernist conviction of truth to material and essential geometries of cut that animated Halston. An external simplicity, like that of a composed Japanese interior or a modern Western painting, is achieved through decisive reductivism and the primacy of the fabric.

In his Japanese productions, Akira creates clothing for young women of Japan no less elegant than their American counterparts but perhaps more fashion forward. His suits for daywear and early evening emphasize a comfortable, soft shaping inspired in part by Claude Montana. American sportswear inspirations for the collection in Japan, like Claire McCordell, help create what Akira has acknowledged is a “very American look” reflective of the emergence of Japanese women in the 1980s and 1990s into active, comfortable American lifestyles.

Ann Hyde, writing in the October/November 1991 issue Threads, pointed to the seeming contradiction between Akira’s intellect in design and his sensuous achievement. “He is a rationalist at heart,” states Hyde, referring to his intense interest in the underlying mathematics and geometry of garments, but he is also a designer of supreme elegance and grace. The unifying factor, like that of Renaissance architecture, is proportion, indivisibly a coolly mathematical calculation and a supremely romantic sensibility.

Citing that he learned from Halston the value of the designer looking in the mirror, seeing front, back, and side in cubist simultaneity and seeing thereby the garment as paramount—not the wearer—Akira points out that the mirror’s impression is more canny than the human eye in discerning proportion and balance. Working in the custom design studio of Halston and in his own design business in New York reinforced Akira’s principle of design specific to the client but generic to the design ideal in proportion. The same idea is carried through in the ready-to-wear collections in Japan.

Bias has always been an essential feature of Akira’s designs, allowing both his design primacy and comfort in wearing. Recalling Halston’s layered chiffons as “outrageously beautiful” in color and draping, Akira has used bias to wrap the form, conceiving of fashion not as a series of planes but as continuous volume realized three-dimensionally in the twist and torque of bias. Some collections were inspired by Byzantine art and Turkish culture; others by early Netherlands paintings, especially the work of Jan van Eyck.

Akira’s good business sense has kept him afloat in the high flux of the fashion world as it reached an end of a strong economy and a sure keeps the boutiques and stores happy by delivering frequently and consistently. Her customers remain content because the quality of the clothing is consistent. Interestingly, unlike most designers, she keeps some items in her collection for several seasons; “You can’t destabilize the client.... Customers want to see some constant pieces.” Her clientèle includes women, men, and children and have been described as “cultish.”

Her designs have been popular in Europe, the Far East, and in several cities in the United States. In the early 1990s, she expanded her American market, and by 1996, she had a total of eight stores in the U.S., with plans to open several more. By 1997 there were 93 worldwide stores, generating some $260 million annually. Next came the opening of a new store in Chicago, Illinois, and the launch of a beauty products line of skin care, makeup, and four fragrances to the U.S. market. Agnès B. is known for her display windows, which are characteristically devoid of mannequins—where she merely hangs the clothes on hangers and the accessories are strewn about. She also includes movie posters in the display, which have become one of her trademarks.

Agnès B. strikes a commercial and creative balance—a radical chic. “I have no desire to dress an elite,” she states. “It’s all a game. I work as if I were still in my grandmother’s attic, dressing up. Clothes aren’t everything. When they become too important, when they hide the person wearing them, then I don’t like them. Clothes should make you feel happy, relaxed, and ready to tackle other problems.”

—Sarah Bodine; updated by Christine Miner Minderovic

AKIRA

Japanese designer

Born: Maki Akira, Oita, Japan, circa 1949. Education: Graduated from Oita University; worked for and studied fashion with Reiko Minami, Tokyo. Career: Moved to New York, 1974; tailor, Halston, 1976–81; showed first own collection, 1982; began designing wedding dresses for high-end department stores, from late 1990s.

PUBLICATIONS

On AKIRA:

Articles

- Morris, Bernadine, “Bolder Designs for Evening,” in the New York Times, 27 August 1985.
 Hyde, Ann, “Akira on Bias,” in Threads (Newtown, Connecticut), October/November 1991.
 Horyn, Cathy, “Saying ‘I Do’ to a Radical Gown,” in the New York Times, 4 January 2000.
 “Akira,” available online at First View Collections Online, www.firstview.com, 30 September 2001.
 “Fashion Victim,” available online at www.fashionvictim.com, 30 September 2001.

* * *

In the romantic imagination, the artist thrives on alienation, a critical distancing of an “other.” Akira is of two worlds. In Japan, he is addressed by his surname, Maki; in America, he uses his first name,

Akira. These are social conventions of two cultures, but they are also the theses and antitheses propagating Akira’s fashion. An American designer when he designs ready-to-wear clothing in Japan, Akira is conversely viewed in America as a Japanese designer working for the American custom market. He is, however, both and neither; his style is only relaxed elegance. After studying and first designing in Japan, he came to New York to work with Halston, having been inspired by the work of Halston he found in American fashion magazines.

After working with Halston until 1981, when Akira established his own business, he has become a designer of two identities, with businesses in two countries and a single design philosophy, a synthesis of East and West. In Akira’s custom business in New York, he creates out of the distilled, almost astringent principles of design he has maintained since working for Halston, with stress on bias cut, quality materials, color, and timeless elegance. His American custom clients come to him for a sense of personal comfort and self-assured dignity. While some of his American dresses, often bridal gowns, are adorned with beadwork and other decoration, their principle is in the cut. His is the abiding modernist conviction of truth to material and essential geometries of cut that animated Halston. An external simplicity, like that of a composed Japanese interior or a modern Western painting, is achieved through decisive reductivism and the primacy of the fabric.

In his Japanese productions, Akira creates clothing for young women of Japan no less elegant than their American counterparts but perhaps more fashion forward. His suits for daywear and early evening emphasize a comfortable, soft shaping inspired in part by Claude Montana. American sportswear inspirations for the collection in Japan, like Claire McCordell, help create what Akira has acknowledged is a “very American look” reflective of the emergence of Japanese women in the 1980s and 1990s into active, comfortable American lifestyles.

Ann Hyde, writing in the October/November 1991 issue Threads, pointed to the seeming contradiction between Akira’s intellect in design and his sensuous achievement. “He is a rationalist at heart,” states Hyde, referring to his intense interest in the underlying mathematics and geometry of garments, but he is also a designer of supreme elegance and grace. The unifying factor, like that of Renaissance architecture, is proportion, indivisibly a coolly mathematical calculation and a supremely romantic sensibility.

Citing that he learned from Halston the value of the designer looking in the mirror, seeing front, back, and side in cubist simultaneity and seeing thereby the garment as paramount—not the wearer—Akira points out that the mirror’s impression is more canny than the human eye in discerning proportion and balance. Working in the custom design studio of Halston and in his own design business in New York reinforced Akira’s principle of design specific to the client but generic to the design ideal in proportion. The same idea is carried through in the ready-to-wear collections in Japan.

Bias has always been an essential feature of Akira’s designs, allowing both his design primacy and comfort in wearing. Recalling Halston’s layered chiffons as “outrageously beautiful” in color and draping, Akira has used bias to wrap the form, conceiving of fashion not as a series of planes but as continuous volume realized three-dimensionally in the twist and torque of bias. Some collections were inspired by Byzantine art and Turkish culture; others by early Netherlands paintings, especially the work of Jan van Eyck.

Akira’s good business sense has kept him afloat in the high flux of the fashion world as it reached an end of a strong economy and a sure decline in client investment in luxury clothes, furs, and accessories. The 21st century found him supplying high-end, avant-garde bridal gowns to Barneys New York, the prewedding mecca of the smart set. Within the new bridal salon, a source of a new trend toward chic understated wedding wear, Akira's line rubbed hangers with the likes of Vera Wang, Jil Sander, Christian Lacroix, and Geoffrey Beene.

If East and West, reason and style have been the antipodes of Akira's work, there is careful synthesis in Akira's garments in both the 20th and 21st centuries. It is an impressive joining of Japanese formality, American simplicity, the restraint of design, and the universal common sense of comfortable, wearable, and yet beautiful clothing.

—Richard Martin; updated by Mary Ellen Snodgrass

ALAÏA, Azzedine

French designer

Born: Tunis, Tunisia, circa 1940. Education: Studied sculpture, École des Beaux-Arts, Tunis. Career: Dressmaker's assistant, Tunis; dressed private clients before moving to Paris, 1957; part-time design assistant, Guy Laroche, Thierry Mugler, 1957–59; au pair/dressmaker for the Marquise de Mazan, 1957–60, and for Comtesse Nicole de Blégiers, 1960–65; designer, custom clothing, from 1960; introduced ready-to-wear line, Paris, 1980, and New York, 1982; opened boutiques, Beverly Hills, 1983, Paris, 1985, and New York, 1988–92.

Azzedine Alaïa in 1986. © CORBIS.

Exhibitions: Retrospective, Bordeaux Museum of Modern Art, 1984–85; Retrospective, New York, 2000. Awards: French Ministry of Culture Designer of the Year award, 1985. Address: 18 rue de la Verrerie, 75004 Paris, France.

PUBLICATIONS

By ALAÏA:

Books

Alaïa, Azzedine, and Michel Tournier, Alaïa, Göttingen, Germany, 1990.

Parent, Marc (ed.), Stella, New York, 2001; Introduction by Alaïa Azzedine.

On ALAÏA:

Books

Howell, Georgina, Sultans of Style: Thirty Years of Fashion and Passion 1960–1990, London, 1990.

Stegemeyer, Anne, Who's Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.

Articles

McCall, Patricia, "Expanded Horizons for Azzedine Alaïa," in the New York Times Magazine, 5 September 1982.

"Now that Fit is It, No One Shapes Up Better than French Designer Azzedine Alaïa," in People, 27 December 1982.

Morris, Bernadine, "The Directions of the Innovations," in the New York Times Magazine, 27 February 1983.

Talley, Andre Leon, "Azzedine Alaïa," in Interview, June 1983.

"Stirrups Sport Style: Trousers Worn with Glamour and Ease," in Vogue, September 1984.

"Fashion Meets the Body: Azzedine Alaïa on Splendid Form," in Vogue (London), July 1985.

Ettlinger, Catherine, "This Man Has Brought Back the Body," in Mademoiselle, October 1985.

Salholz, Eloise, "The Man Who Loves Women," in Newsweek, 21 October 1985.

White, Lesley, "At Long Last Alaïa, the Chic of Araby," in Elle (London), November 1985.

Buck, Joan Juliet, "Body Genius: Designer Azzedine Alaïa," in Vogue, November 1985.

"The Azzedine Mystique," in Vogue, February 1986.

Arroyuelo, Javier, "L'art de vivre d'Azzedine Alaïa," in Vogue (Paris), March 1986.

Dryansky, G. Y., "An Eye for Allure," in Connoisseur, August 1986.

Worthington, Christa, "The Rise and Fall of Azzedine Alaïa," in Women's Wear Daily, 17 October 1986.

"Trots Créateurs: Leur Classiques, Azzedine Alaïa, la Perfection des Lignes," in Elle (Paris), 10 November 1986.

"Alaïa: La Passion du Vert," in Elle (Paris), March 1987.

Gross, Michael, "The Evolution of Alaïa: A New Ease Takes Over," in the New York Times, 31 March 1987.

Drier, Deborah, "The Defiant Ones," in Art in America (New York), September 1987.

"Alaïa: The Total Look," in Elle (Paris), 26 October 1987.

decline in client investment in luxury clothes, furs, and accessories. The 21st century found him supplying high-end, avant-garde bridal gowns to Barneys New York, the prewedding mecca of the smart set. Within the new bridal salon, a source of a new trend toward chic understated wedding wear, Akira's line rubbed hangers with the likes of Vera Wang, Jil Sander, Christian Lacroix, and Geoffrey Beene.

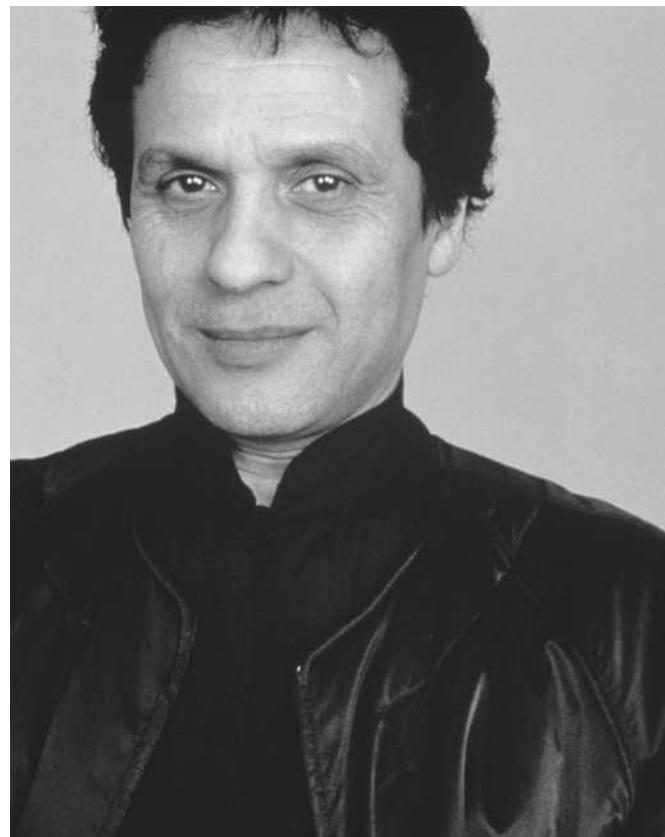

If East and West, reason and style have been the antipodes of Akira's work, there is careful synthesis in Akira's garments in both the 20th and 21st centuries. It is an impressive joining of Japanese formality, American simplicity, the restraint of design, and the universal common sense of comfortable, wearable, and yet beautiful clothing.

—Richard Martin; updated by Mary Ellen Snodgrass

ALAÏA, Azzedine

French designer

Born: Tunis, Tunisia, circa 1940. Education: Studied sculpture, École des Beaux-Arts, Tunis. Career: Dressmaker's assistant, Tunis; dressed private clients before moving to Paris, 1957; part-time design assistant, Guy Laroche, Thierry Mugler, 1957–59; au pair/dressmaker for the Marquise de Mazan, 1957–60, and for Comtesse Nicole de Blégiers, 1960–65; designer, custom clothing, from 1960; introduced ready-to-wear line, Paris, 1980, and New York, 1982; opened boutiques, Beverly Hills, 1983, Paris, 1985, and New York, 1988–92.

Azzedine Alaïa in 1986. © CORBIS.

Exhibitions: Retrospective, Bordeaux Museum of Modern Art, 1984–85; Retrospective, New York, 2000. Awards: French Ministry of Culture Designer of the Year award, 1985. Address: 18 rue de la Verrerie, 75004 Paris, France.

PUBLICATIONS

By ALAÏA:

Books

Alaïa, Azzedine, and Michel Tournier, Alaïa, Göttingen, Germany, 1990.

Parent, Marc (ed.), Stella, New York, 2001; Introduction by Alaïa Azzedine.

On ALAÏA:

Books

Howell, Georgina, Sultans of Style: Thirty Years of Fashion and Passion 1960–1990, London, 1990.

Stegemeyer, Anne, Who's Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.

Articles

McCall, Patricia, "Expanded Horizons for Azzedine Alaïa," in the New York Times Magazine, 5 September 1982.

"Now that Fit is It, No One Shapes Up Better than French Designer Azzedine Alaïa," in People, 27 December 1982.

Morris, Bernadine, "The Directions of the Innovations," in the New York Times Magazine, 27 February 1983.

Talley, Andre Leon, "Azzedine Alaïa," in Interview, June 1983.

"Stirrups Sport Style: Trousers Worn with Glamour and Ease," in Vogue, September 1984.

"Fashion Meets the Body: Azzedine Alaïa on Splendid Form," in Vogue (London), July 1985.

Ettlinger, Catherine, "This Man Has Brought Back the Body," in Mademoiselle, October 1985.

Salholz, Eloise, "The Man Who Loves Women," in Newsweek, 21 October 1985.

White, Lesley, "At Long Last Alaïa, the Chic of Araby," in Elle (London), November 1985.

Buck, Joan Juliet, "Body Genius: Designer Azzedine Alaïa," in Vogue, November 1985.

"The Azzedine Mystique," in Vogue, February 1986.

Arroyuelo, Javier, "L'art de vivre d'Azzedine Alaïa," in Vogue (Paris), March 1986.

Dryansky, G. Y., "An Eye for Allure," in Connoisseur, August 1986.

Worthington, Christa, "The Rise and Fall of Azzedine Alaïa," in Women's Wear Daily, 17 October 1986.

"Trots Créateurs: Leur Classiques, Azzedine Alaïa, la Perfection des Lignes," in Elle (Paris), 10 November 1986.

"Alaïa: La Passion du Vert," in Elle (Paris), March 1987.

Gross, Michael, "The Evolution of Alaïa: A New Ease Takes Over," in the New York Times, 31 March 1987.

Drier, Deborah, "The Defiant Ones," in Art in America (New York), September 1987.

"Alaïa: The Total Look," in Elle (Paris), 26 October 1987.

- "Finally Alaïa Shows—to Mixed Reaction," in Women's Wear Daily, 13 November 1987.
- "The New Spirit of Azzedine Alaïa," in Vogue, February 1988.
- "La Femme un peu Provocante d'Alaïa," in Elle (Paris), 4 April 1988.
- "Atmosphère Alaïa," in Vogue (Paris), August 1988.
- "Alaïa e Gaultier: Due Stilisti a Confronto," in Vogue (Milan), October 1988.
- "24 Heures de la Vie d'un Tailleur," in Elle (Paris), 24 October 1988.
- Nonkin, Leslie, "Azzedine Addicts: Affection Turns to Affliction for Alaïa's Curvaceous Clothes," in Vogue, November 1988.
- "Le Printemps d'Azzedine Alaïa," in Elle (Paris), 20 February 1989.
- Maiberger, Elise, "Azzedine Alaïa's Late Late Show," in Vogue (London), March 1989.
- Scott, Jan, "Call This Man Alaïa," in Paris Passion, March/April 1989.
- "All About Alaïa," in Elle (New York), April 1989.
- Gross, Michael, "Azzedine When He Sizzles," in New York, 15 May 1989.
- Radakovich, Anka, "Downtown Chic," in Harper's Bazaar, November 1989.
- Howell, Georgina, "The Titan of Tight," in Vogue, March 1990.
- Roberts, Michael, "Alaïa, Alaïa, Style on Fire," in the Sunday Times Magazine (London), 25 March 1990.
- Lennard, Jonathan, "Alaïa," in Paris Passion, July 1990.
- Howell, Georgina, "Acting Up for Azzedine," in the Sunday Times Magazine (London), 7 October 1990.
- Schnabel, Julian, "Azzedine Alaïa," in Interview (New York), October 1990.
- Schiros, Anne-Marie, "Alaïa for the Slim and Curvaceous," in the New York Times, 5 April 1992.
- Lindbergh, Peter, "Such Allure, Such Alaïa," in Interview, June 1992.
- "Azzedine Alaïa," in Current Biography, October 1992.
- Donovan, Carrie, "Alaïa's Devoted Fans," in the New York Times, 15 December 1992.
- Spindler, Amy, "Alaïa and Léger Loosen Up a Bit," in the New York Times, 20 March 1993.
- "Boiled Becomes Cool," in the New York Times, 3 April 1994.
- Sischy, Ingrid, "The Outsider," in the New Yorker, 7 November 1994.
- Horyn, Cathy, "Meeting the Enemy: Overstimulation," in the New York Times, 7 March 2000.
- _____, "Genius Has a Habit of Showing Up Every so Often," in the New York Times, 2 May 2000.
- Middleton, William, and Craig McDean, "Giant," in Harper's Bazaar, August 2000.
- Horyn, Cathy, "For Alaïa, a Retrospective and a New Deal," in the New York Times, 23 September 2000.

* * *

Dubbed the King of Cling by the fashion press in the 1980s, Azzedine Alaïa inspired a host of looks energizing High Street fashion, including the stretch mini, Lycra cycling shorts, and the bodysuit. His designs were renowned for displaying the female body and, accordingly, bedecked the bodies of off-duty top models and stars such as Tina Turner, Raquel Welch, Madonna, Brigitte Nielson, Naomi Campbell, and Stephanie Seymour. Alaïa's clothes caught the mood of the times when many women had turned to exercise and a new, muscled body shape had begun to appear in the pages of fashion magazines. Many women wanted to flaunt their newly-toned bodies, helped by recent developments in fabric construction that enabled designers to create clothing to accentuate the female form in a way unprecedented in European fashion.

Prior to his success in the 1980s, Alaïa studied sculpture at the School of Beaux-Arts in Tunis. He moved to Paris in 1957 and lived in a tiny apartment on the Left Bank, paying his rent and bills by babysitting while pursuing his dreams. He apprenticed to Christian Dior for five days before landing a two-year stint (1957–59) as a part-time design assistant for Guy Laroche and Thierry Mugler. He also served as an au pair and dressmaker for the likes of the Marquise de Mazan and the Comtesse Nicole de Blégiers (1957–65). He began designing private works in 1960, and his elite clientele eventually expanded to include Greta Garbo, Claudette Colbert, Cécile de Rothschild, and French film star Arletty.

Following in the footsteps of the ancien régime of Parisian haute couture, Alaïa is a perfectionist about cut, drape, and construction, preferring to work directly on the body to achieve a perfect fit. Tailoring is his great strength—he does all his own cutting—and although his clothes appear very simple, they are complex in structure. Some garments contain up to 40 individual pieces linked together to form a complex mesh that moves and undulates with the body. The beauty of his design comes from the shape and fit of the garments, enhanced by his innovative use of crisscross seaming.

His method of clothing construction includes repeated fitting and cutting on the body. His technique of sculpting and draping perhaps comes naturally to him, since he studied sculpture at L'École des Beaux-Arts in Tunis, but also owes much to Madeleine Vionnet, the great tailleur of the 1920s, famed for the intricacies of her bias-cut crêpe dresses that molded closely to the body. Vionnet applied the delicate techniques of lingerie sewing to outerwear, as has Alaïa, who combines the stitching and seaming normally used in corsetry to achieve the perfect fit of his clothes. Combined with elasticated fabrics for maximum body exposure, his garments hold and control the body, yet retain their shape.

Although, at first sight, Alaïa's clothes seem to cling to the natural silhouette of the wearer, they actually create a second skin, holding in and shaping the body by techniques of construction such as faggoting. This body consciousness is further enhanced by using materials such as stretch lace over flesh-colored fabric to give an illusion, rather than the reality, of nudity.

Alaïa introduced his first ready-to-wear collection of minimalist clothes in 1980 and continued to work privately for individual customers until the mid-1980s. Although his clothes are indebted to the perfection of the female body and indeed, at times, expose great expanses of skin, he manages to avoid vulgarity with muted colors and expert tailoring. He introduced riveted leather, industrial zippers, and a wide range of fabrics, including lace, leather, polymers, silk jersey, and tweed.

Sometime in the mid-1990s, Alaïa vanished from the fashion scene, although in an August 2000 interview in Harper's Bazaar, Alaïa insists he "never went anywhere." In 2000, he burst back into the limelight with a new collection. The new look was a drastic departure from his previous sexy, on-the-edge designs. This collection, described as "much more sober, almost Amish in comparison" by critics, has as its centerpiece the pleat, accentuated by long, Alpine-inspired flower-printed skirts, girly knit dresses, and beaded leather pleated kilt-style skirts. His classic designs of the 1980s are also being adapted by designers such as Helmut Lang, Marc Jacobs, Narciso Rodriguez, Nicolas Ghesquière, and Rei Kawakubo for the likes of Louis Vuitton, Balenciaga, and Loewe. Alaïa also had a retrospective exhibition in September 2000, with an all-star cast turning out to honor him, including fellow designer Calvin Klein, supermodels Stephanie Seymour, Iman, Heidi Klum, and Naomi Campbell, as well as Jocelyne Wildenstein, Polly Mellen, Kate Betts, Daryl Kerrigan, Amanda Lepore, David LaChapelle, and Sigourney Weaver.

In a surprising move, Alaïa joined forces with Miuccia Prada's label as a designer, joining Lang, and Prada herself. Alaïa will continue to handle all distribution in France from his boutique in Paris, and Prada will handle his worldwide distribution.

Alaïa shows regularly but nevertheless seems above the whims and vagaries of the fashion world, producing timeless garments, rather than designing new looks from season to season, and inspiring the adulation of enthusiastic collectors that was once reserved for Mariano Fortuny.

—Caroline Cox; updated by Daryl F. Mallett

ALBINI, Walter

Italian designer

Born: Born Gualtiero Albini in Busto Arsizio, near Milan, 9 March 1941. Education: Studied fashion and costume design, Istituto Statale di Belle Arti e Moda, Turin, 1959–61. Career: Illustrator for Novità and Corriere Lombardo periodicals, Milan, and freelance sketch artist, Paris, 1961–64; freelance designer for Krizia, Billy Ballo, Basile, Callaghan, Escargots, Mister Fox, Diamantis, Trell, Mario Ferari, Lanerossi, Kriziamaglia, Montedoro, and Princess Luciana, Milan, 1964–83; established Walter Albini fashion house, Milan, 1965; signature ready-to-wear collection introduced, 1978; Walter Albini Fashions branches established, London, Rome, Venice. Died: 31 May 1983, in Milan.

PUBLICATIONS

On ALBINI:

Books

- Vercelloni, Isa, and Flavio Lucchini, Milano Fashion, Milan, 1975.
 Mulassano, Adriana, The Who's Who of Italian Fashion, Florence, 1979.
 Soli, Pia, Il genio antipatico, Venice, 1984.
 Buiazzi, Graziella, ed., La moda italiana: Dall'antimoda allo stilismo, Milan, 1987.
 Bianchino, Gloria, and Bonizza Giordani Aragno, Walter Albini, Parma, 1988.
 Sozzani, Carla, and Anna Masucci, Walter Albini, Milan, 1990.

Articles

- “Walter Albini,” in the Sunday Times (London), 15 October 1972.

“In Focus: Walter Albini,” in International Textiles (London), No. 523, 1975.

Etherington-Smith, Meredith, “Albini’s New Image,” in GQ (New York), October 1976.

“Walter Albini, the Designer’s Designer,” in Manufacturing Clothier, 1976.

“Lo stile multimaglia in sfumature rare,” in Vogue (Milan), October 1978.

“Walter Albini: Italian RTW Designer is Dead,” in Women’s Wear Daily (New York), 3 June 1983.

“Walter Albini, Men’s Wear Innovator, Dies at 42,” in the Daily News Record, 3 June 1983.

Skellenger, Gillion, “Walter Albini,” in Contemporary Designers, London, 1990.

* * *

In William Shakespeare’s Richard II, “report of fashions in proud Italy” are the vanguard for what comes to England only in “base imitation.” Walter Albini epitomized the brilliant epoch of Italian fashion in the 1970s, when it seized the international imagination. At least as much as any other designer, if not more, Albini had the Italian spirit con brio. Journalists compared him to Yves Saint Laurent and Karl Lagerfeld, designers whose careers outlasted Albini’s flash of brilliance. Albini brought his obsession with the 1920s and 1930s to the elongated line and youthful energy of the 1970s; his collections of 1969 and 1970 tell the story of his encapsulation of the time: Gymnasium and Gypsy and China in 1969; Antique Market, the Pre-Raphaelites, Safari, Military, and Polaroid in 1970.

Sadly, Albini so brilliantly embodied the 1970s for Italy (as one would perhaps say of Halston in the U.S.) because of the détente of his work by 1980 and his death in 1983, just after his forty-second birthday. Isa Vercelloni and Flavio Lucchini, in their 1975 book, Milano Fashion, described Albini’s mercurial yet gifted personality and habits: “From adolescence he still retained the capacity of dreaming, but with the ability of giving body or a semblance of reality to his world of dreams. He had the rare quality of even doing this without spoiling it. This is why women like his dresses so much. They recognize immediately that imagination is given power.”

It was a wide-ranging imagination, indicative of the 1970s in its travelogue-inspired wanderlust, that captured the vivacity of Diana Vreeland’s Vogue of the 1960s. Like Vreeland, Albini loved the 1920s and extolled the freedom of women and reminded them of their liberation during that period. Also like Vreeland, Albini was smitten with North Africa and the potential for exoticism. He played with paisley and was fascinated by the pattern and design asymmetry as well as the mysterious women of China. His pragmatic exoticism is evident in a spring 1980 t-blouse and party skirt combination, described in a Harper’s Bazaar March 1980 ad as “the mystique of madras. A bit sophisticated for midnight at the oasis...but divine for sunset on the patio.”

So many collections were produced in his own name and others between the late 1960s and 1980 that he touched upon many themes, but he returned consistently to the 1920s and 1930s. He had moved to Paris because of a lifetime preoccupation with Chanel, whom he had glimpsed during her late years, but he more substantively used her as a touchstone for his collections. His fall 1978 knits, as photographed by 1980s are also being adapted by designers such as Helmut Lang, Marc Jacobs, Narciso Rodriguez, Nicolas Ghesquière, and Rei Kawakubo for the likes of Louis Vuitton, Balenciaga, and Loewe. Alaïa also had a retrospective exhibition in September 2000, with an all-star cast turning out to honor him, including fellow designer Calvin Klein, supermodels Stephanie Seymour, Iman, Heidi Klum, and Naomi Campbell, as well as Jocelyne Wildenstein, Polly Mellen, Kate Betts, Daryl Kerrigan, Amanda Lepore, David LaChapelle, and Sigourney Weaver.

In a surprising move, Alaïa joined forces with Miuccia Prada's label as a designer, joining Lang, and Prada herself. Alaïa will continue to handle all distribution in France from his boutique in Paris, and Prada will handle his worldwide distribution.

Alaïa shows regularly but nevertheless seems above the whims and vagaries of the fashion world, producing timeless garments, rather than designing new looks from season to season, and inspiring the adulation of enthusiastic collectors that was once reserved for Mariano Fortuny.

—Caroline Cox; updated by Daryl F. Mallett

ALBINI, Walter

Italian designer

Born: Born Gualtiero Albini in Busto Arsizio, near Milan, 9 March 1941. Education: Studied fashion and costume design, Istituto Statale di Belle Arti e Moda, Turin, 1959–61. Career: Illustrator for Novità and Corriere Lombardo periodicals, Milan, and freelance sketch artist, Paris, 1961–64; freelance designer for Krizia, Billy Ballo, Basile, Callaghan, Escargots, Mister Fox, Diamantis, Trell, Mario Ferari, Lanerossi, Kriziamaglia, Montedoro, and Princess Luciana, Milan, 1964–83; established Walter Albini fashion house, Milan, 1965; signature ready-to-wear collection introduced, 1978; Walter Albini Fashions branches established, London, Rome, Venice. Died: 31 May 1983, in Milan.

PUBLICATIONS

On ALBINI:

Books

- Vercelloni, Isa, and Flavio Lucchini, Milano Fashion, Milan, 1975.
 Mulassano, Adriana, The Who's Who of Italian Fashion, Florence, 1979.
 Soli, Pia, Il genio antipatico, Venice, 1984.
 Buiazzi, Graziella, ed., La moda italiana: Dall'antimoda allo stilismo, Milan, 1987.
 Bianchino, Gloria, and Bonizza Giordani Aragno, Walter Albini, Parma, 1988.
 Sozzani, Carla, and Anna Masucci, Walter Albini, Milan, 1990.

Articles

- “Walter Albini,” in the Sunday Times (London), 15 October 1972.

“In Focus: Walter Albini,” in International Textiles (London), No. 523, 1975.

Etherington-Smith, Meredith, “Albini’s New Image,” in GQ (New York), October 1976.

“Walter Albini, the Designer’s Designer,” in Manufacturing Clothier, 1976.

“Lo stile multimaglia in sfumature rare,” in Vogue (Milan), October 1978.

“Walter Albini: Italian RTW Designer is Dead,” in Women’s Wear Daily (New York), 3 June 1983.

“Walter Albini, Men’s Wear Innovator, Dies at 42,” in the Daily News Record, 3 June 1983.

Skellenger, Gillion, “Walter Albini,” in Contemporary Designers, London, 1990.

* * *

In William Shakespeare’s Richard II, “report of fashions in proud Italy” are the vanguard for what comes to England only in “base imitation.” Walter Albini epitomized the brilliant epoch of Italian fashion in the 1970s, when it seized the international imagination. At least as much as any other designer, if not more, Albini had the Italian spirit con brio. Journalists compared him to Yves Saint Laurent and Karl Lagerfeld, designers whose careers outlasted Albini’s flash of brilliance. Albini brought his obsession with the 1920s and 1930s to the elongated line and youthful energy of the 1970s; his collections of 1969 and 1970 tell the story of his encapsulation of the time: Gymnasium and Gypsy and China in 1969; Antique Market, the Pre-Raphaelites, Safari, Military, and Polaroid in 1970.

Sadly, Albini so brilliantly embodied the 1970s for Italy (as one would perhaps say of Halston in the U.S.) because of the détente of his work by 1980 and his death in 1983, just after his forty-second birthday. Isa Vercelloni and Flavio Lucchini, in their 1975 book, Milano Fashion, described Albini’s mercurial yet gifted personality and habits: “From adolescence he still retained the capacity of dreaming, but with the ability of giving body or a semblance of reality to his world of dreams. He had the rare quality of even doing this without spoiling it. This is why women like his dresses so much. They recognize immediately that imagination is given power.”

It was a wide-ranging imagination, indicative of the 1970s in its travelogue-inspired wanderlust, that captured the vivacity of Diana Vreeland’s Vogue of the 1960s. Like Vreeland, Albini loved the 1920s and extolled the freedom of women and reminded them of their liberation during that period. Also like Vreeland, Albini was smitten with North Africa and the potential for exoticism. He played with paisley and was fascinated by the pattern and design asymmetry as well as the mysterious women of China. His pragmatic exoticism is evident in a spring 1980 t-blouse and party skirt combination, described in a Harper’s Bazaar March 1980 ad as “the mystique of madras. A bit sophisticated for midnight at the oasis...but divine for sunset on the patio.”

So many collections were produced in his own name and others between the late 1960s and 1980 that he touched upon many themes, but he returned consistently to the 1920s and 1930s. He had moved to Paris because of a lifetime preoccupation with Chanel, whom he had glimpsed during her late years, but he more substantively used her as a touchstone for his collections. His fall 1978 knits, as photographed by

David Bailey, intensified the luxury of Chanel tailoring, although slightly oversized, in a palette of bronze and browns. For his Mister Fox line in beautiful geometrics, he approximated Sonia Delaunay, but echoed the feeling of Chanel. His movie and fashion magazine passions would encompass Katharine Hepburn and Marlene Dietrich, but for Albini these merely confirmed the role of Chanel in freeing women to be comfortable in sportswear- and menswear-derived styles that were luxuriously tailored for women.

Besides Chanel, Albini's other passion was for ancient Egypt, for which he felt mystical affinity and which served as an inspiration for his men's and women's fashions—especially his fashion drawings. By the mid-1970s, Albini's style was predominately an amalgam of ancient Egyptian motifs (although often attributed elsewhere in the East) and Chanel, using the Chanel suits and proportions with the accommodations of wrapping à la Egyptienne and the excuses of Venice, North Africa, and India for billowing harem pants and other pantaloons of which Chanel would scarcely have approved. In 1978 a riding skirt, with its fluid drape, was teamed with a short cropped jacket, combining tradition with contemporary 1970s style.

In some ways, Albini was the precursor of Gianni Versace. His intensely personal style respected many historical exemplars and was passionately defended and highly expressive. Like Versace, Albini combined a studious infatuation with the past with a passion for his own synthesis of styles and a comprehensive style attainment and conviction that was his own; he created this with a fervor approaching fanaticism that reinforced the sense of abiding adolescence and keenest ebullience for the work.

Vercelloni and Lucchini asked Albini what his motto was; he said, "Enjoy today and leave unpleasant things for tomorrow." For Albini and the extravagant fashion he created, fate held no tomorrow and no unpleasantness.

—Richard Martin

Victor Alfaro, fall 2001 collection. © AP/Wide World Photos/
Fashion Wire Daily.

ALFARO, Victor

American designer

Born: Chihuahua, Mexico, 26 May 1963; immigrated to the U.S., 1981. Education: Attended University of Texas, 1982; graduated from Fashion Institute of Technology, 1987. Career: Assistant to Mary Ann Restivo, late 1980s, and Joseph Abboud, 1990; established own business, early 1990s. Awards: Vidal Sassoon Excellence in New Design, 1993; Omni-Mexican award for Best Latin American Designer, 1994; Dallas Fashion award, 1994; Council of Fashion Designers of America New Fashion Talent award, 1994. Address: 130 Barrow Street, New York, NY 10014, USA.

PUBLICATIONS

On ALFARO:

Books

Stegemeyer, Anne, Who's Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.

Articles

Hochswender, Woody, "Patterns: An American Alaïa," in the New York Times, 7 April 1992.

_____, "Tufts and Tacks, Bells and Beads," in the New York Times, 9 April 1992.

Lee, Ricky, "New York to Mexico," in the New York Times, 2 August 1992.

Fischer, Laura, "The Thrill of Victor," in Avenue (New York), March 1993.

Spindler, Amy M., "For Next Wave, Attitude Counts," in the New York Times, 2 April 1993.

_____, "Fresh Talents Dig Up Tasty Design," in the New York Times, 5 November 1993.

Foley, Bridget, "Alfaro Sprouts," in W, March 1994.

"Alfaro: Beyond the Pale," in Women's Wear Daily, 9 August 1994.

Torkells, Erik, "The Night is Young," in Town & Country, September 1994.

"New York: Victor Alfaro," in Women's Wear Daily, 4 November 1994.

Spindler, Amy M., "Learning from Las Vegas and Show World," in the New York Times, 5 November 1994.

David Bailey, intensified the luxury of Chanel tailoring, although slightly oversized, in a palette of bronze and browns. For his Mister Fox line in beautiful geometrics, he approximated Sonia Delaunay, but echoed the feeling of Chanel. His movie and fashion magazine passions would encompass Katharine Hepburn and Marlene Dietrich, but for Albini these merely confirmed the role of Chanel in freeing women to be comfortable in sportswear- and menswear-derived styles that were luxuriously tailored for women.

Besides Chanel, Albini's other passion was for ancient Egypt, for which he felt mystical affinity and which served as an inspiration for his men's and women's fashions—especially his fashion drawings. By the mid-1970s, Albini's style was predominately an amalgam of ancient Egyptian motifs (although often attributed elsewhere in the East) and Chanel, using the Chanel suits and proportions with the accommodations of wrapping à la Egyptienne and the excuses of Venice, North Africa, and India for billowing harem pants and other pantaloons of which Chanel would scarcely have approved. In 1978 a riding skirt, with its fluid drape, was teamed with a short cropped jacket, combining tradition with contemporary 1970s style.

In some ways, Albini was the precursor of Gianni Versace. His intensely personal style respected many historical exemplars and was passionately defended and highly expressive. Like Versace, Albini combined a studious infatuation with the past with a passion for his own synthesis of styles and a comprehensive style attainment and conviction that was his own; he created this with a fervor approaching fanaticism that reinforced the sense of abiding adolescence and keenest ebullience for the work.

Vercelloni and Lucchini asked Albini what his motto was; he said, "Enjoy today and leave unpleasant things for tomorrow." For Albini and the extravagant fashion he created, fate held no tomorrow and no unpleasantness.

—Richard Martin

Victor Alfaro, fall 2001 collection. © AP/Wide World Photos/
Fashion Wire Daily.

ALFARO, Victor

American designer

Born: Chihuahua, Mexico, 26 May 1963; immigrated to the U.S., 1981. Education: Attended University of Texas, 1982; graduated from Fashion Institute of Technology, 1987. Career: Assistant to Mary Ann Restivo, late 1980s, and Joseph Abboud, 1990; established own business, early 1990s. Awards: Vidal Sassoon Excellence in New Design, 1993; Omni-Mexican award for Best Latin American Designer, 1994; Dallas Fashion award, 1994; Council of Fashion Designers of America New Fashion Talent award, 1994. Address: 130 Barrow Street, New York, NY 10014, USA.

PUBLICATIONS

On ALFARO:

Books

Stegemeyer, Anne, Who's Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.

Articles

Hochswender, Woody, "Patterns: An American Alaïa," in the New York Times, 7 April 1992.

_____, "Tufts and Tacks, Bells and Beads," in the New York Times, 9 April 1992.

Lee, Ricky, "New York to Mexico," in the New York Times, 2 August 1992.

Fischer, Laura, "The Thrill of Victor," in Avenue (New York), March 1993.

Spindler, Amy M., "For Next Wave, Attitude Counts," in the New York Times, 2 April 1993.

_____, "Fresh Talents Dig Up Tasty Design," in the New York Times, 5 November 1993.

Foley, Bridget, "Alfaro Sprouts," in W, March 1994.

"Alfaro: Beyond the Pale," in Women's Wear Daily, 9 August 1994.

Torkells, Erik, "The Night is Young," in Town & Country, September 1994.

"New York: Victor Alfaro," in Women's Wear Daily, 4 November 1994.

Spindler, Amy M., "Learning from Las Vegas and Show World," in the New York Times, 5 November 1994.

Victor Alfaro, fall 2000 collection. © Reuters NewMedia Inc./CORBIS.

Min, Janice, and Allison Lynn, "Fitting Pretty: Going for Sheer Glamor, Designer Victor Alfaro Gives Grunge the Gate," in People, 20 March 1995.

"Rising Star," in Women's Wear Daily, September 1994.

"New York Comes Alive," in Women's Wear Daily, 1 April 1996.

White, Constance C. R. "No Show Due to Lack of Finances," in the New York Times, 8 April 1997.

"Milan Haute Hippies and Good Sports," in Women's Wear Daily, 9 March 1998.

Conti, Samantha, "New Deals Focus on Control of Brand," in Women's Wear Daily, 27 May 1998.

"Alfaro, Gilmar to Launch Line," in Women's Wear Daily, 7 December 1999.

* * *

Victor Alfaro, known for his "come hither" designs, claims the only fashion design training he has ever had was poring through fashion magazines. Born and raised in Mexico, Alfaro moved to the U.S. as an exchange student to perfect his English and to study communications at the University of Texas. At the time, fashion design was "just a fantasy," but later he applied to the Fashion Institute of Technology in New York City. After graduating in 1987, Alfaro worked as an apprentice designer, and by the mid-1990s, at the age of 30, he had become recognized as one of the leading designers in the United States.

Bare simplicity and an equally frank sexuality inform Alfaro's dresses for cocktail and evening. Bridget Foley predicted in March 1994 W article, "The heir apparent to Oscar and Bill? Perhaps. Victor Alfaro may be New York's next great eveningwear designer." If Alfaro is the torchbearer of style for New York nights, his role betokens a shifting sensibility, one that pointedly exalts the body, seeks out youth, and takes risks. Skilled in the vocabulary of separates (he worked for Mary Ann Restivo and Joseph Abboud), Alfaro eagerly draws upon the street for inspiration and demands a body consciousness that have made some call him the American Alaïa. In early recognition as a designer for celebrities, photographed by Francesco Scavullo for Cosmopolitan covers in New York, Alfaro flirted with attention-getting vulgarity, though his collections have come to represent a more natural but nonetheless willfully seductive sensuality.

Amy Spindler, in an April 1993 piece for the New York Times, commented, "Victor Alfaro's clothes come with plenty of attitude." The attitude is, of course, of postfeminist women's individuality and options, including a very 1990s' reexamination of the possibilities of seductive, relatively bare clothing in the most luxurious fabrics. One needs a self-confidence approaching attitude to wear dresses and outfits of such body-revealing form, but one also needs a distinct segregation of Alfaro's partywear from day-to-day clothing. His clothes are not for the timid, but neither are they for showgirls. Spindler refers to his "sex-kitten clothes," but their relative austerity, depending entirely upon textile and shape, keeps them from being initiated by Las Vegas.

Alfaro does however raise provocative issues of women's overt and self-assured physicality and sexuality more than of sexual license. To be sure, short skirts, bared shoulders, lace in direct contact with skin, leather, and sheer skimming fabrics suggest fetishes, but there is always something strangely wholesome about Alfaro's sensibility. Singer Mariah Carey is quoted as saying very aptly that Alfaro's "clothes are fierce." Their ferocity resides in the fact that they define strong women.

According to Ricky Lee (New York Times, 2 August 1992), Alfaro was counseled by one buyer from Chicago that in order to succeed, he should add more suits to his line. But Alfaro rightly declined, knowing he was not creating professional clothes nor daywear basics. He eschews sobriety and, with it, tailoring. Rather, he was responding to sexuality's siren and creating the sexiest siren dresses for young New Yorkers of the 1990s. He is dressmaker to the legendary Generation X. Alfaro was defining a strong personal style and a clientèle that is generationally, visually, and libidinously nurtured on MTV and informed by multicultural street smarts. Woody Hochswender reporting for the New York Times in April 1992, found Alfaro's collection "suggested sex—in a voice loud enough to clear a disco. There were lace chaps and fake snake chaps, worn over bodysuits. Skintight snakeskin jeans were zipped all the way from front to back, reason unknown. Rib-knit sweater dresses were worn with harnesses of metal mesh, Mr. Alfaro's version of the bondage look sweeping fashion."

Explaining his relative restraint and deliberate avoidance of vulgarity in his fall/winter 1993–94 collection to Foley, Alfaro said, "I didn't want it to look cheap. Buyers see every trick in the book, and they want clothes that are wearable." Alfaro has consistently made unencumbered clothing, emphasizing minimalist sensibility and cut and employing luxurious materials. In these characteristics, he is a designer in the great American tradition. His distinctive deviation from this tradition might seem to be his hot sexuality, the body-tracing and body-revealing simplicity of his clothes—but again and again, 20th-century American designers have been dressing advanced new women of ever-increasing power and self-assurance.

In 1996 Women's Wear Daily claimed Alfaro's collection was his "best ever." The same year, he designed a line of coats, manufactured by Mohl Furs, featuring an ink-dyed Persian lamb pea coat, a leather trench coat, and a camel hair coat lined with mink inspired by photography of Jacques-Henri Lartigue. Despite his talent and popularity, Alfaro was experiencing financial difficulties and seeking financial backing. He entered into a licensing agreement with Italian manufacturer Gilmar in 1998 which allowed him to make long-term plans, be more involved in the manufacture of his garments, and to have a ready place in the European fashion scene.

His first collection shown under the agreement with Gilmar was well received. Merging Milanese chic with American-styled sportswear, Alfaro created a less revealing collection he "claimed to have started with the idea of a rich hippie, but in the end, this collection had little to do with a redux of counterculture references." True, his pieces were more boxy and full than his previous lines, but keeping to his unique and sensuous style, Alfaro added rabbit mules as a finishing touch. For the fall of 2000, Alfaro and Gilmar debuted their new line, Vic., which sells for nearly half the price of Alfaro's signature line. Alfaro told Women's Wear Daily (7 December 1999), "The Vic. line will be a little bit more on the fashion side and forward. It's still a designer collection; it's just another one of my personalities."

Alfaro is creating the postfeminist fashion sensibility, consummately beautiful in execution, infinitely skilled in construction, and assertively avant-garde. Even as some critics dismiss his work as offensive, Alfaro is a true fashion risk-taker and visionary. He is defining and dressing today, and will dress hereafter, the bravest woman of the future.

—Richard Martin; updated by Christine Miner Minderovic

ALLARD, Linda

American designer

Born: Akron, Ohio, 27 May 1940; grew up in Doylestown. Education: Studied fine arts, Kent State University (Ohio), 1958–62. Family: Married Herbert Gallen, 2000. Career: Design assistant, Ellen Tracy, New York, 1962–64, then director of design, from 1964; Linda Allard label introduced, 1984; design critic, Fashion Institute of Technology, New York; visiting professor, International Academy of Merchandising and Design, Chicago; board of directors, Kent State University. Member: Fashion Group International, Inc., Council of Fashion Designers of America. Awards: Dallas Fashion award, 1986, 1987, 1994. Address: 575 Seventh Avenue, New York, NY 10018, USA. Website: www.ellentracy.com.

Linda Allard, designed for Ellen Tracy's spring 2000 collection.
© Fashion Syndicate Press.

PUBLICATIONS

On ALLARD:

Books

Stegemeyer, Anne, Who's Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.

Articles

Daria, Irene, "Linda Allard: Growing up with Ellen Tracy," in Women's Wear Daily, 2 June 1986.

Caminiti, Susan, "A.K.A. Ellen Tracy," in Savvy, October 1988.

Kantrowitz, Barbara, "The Real Designer Behind that Ellen Tracy Label," in Newsweek, 24 October 1988.

"Linda Allard," in Accessories, December 1988.

Ozzard, Janet, "The Prime of Linda Allard," in Women's Wear Daily, 14 December 1994.

Schiros, Anne-Marie, "Designed for Retailers and Real Women," in the New York Times, 5 April 1995.

"Comfort Zone," in Women's Wear Daily, 18 February 1999.

didn't want it to look cheap. Buyers see every trick in the book, and they want clothes that are wearable." Alfaro has consistently made unencumbered clothing, emphasizing minimalist sensibility and cut and employing luxurious materials. In these characteristics, he is a designer in the great American tradition. His distinctive deviation from this tradition might seem to be his hot sexuality, the body-tracing and body-revealing simplicity of his clothes—but again and again, 20th-century American designers have been dressing advanced new women of ever-increasing power and self-assurance.

In 1996 Women's Wear Daily claimed Alfaro's collection was his "best ever." The same year, he designed a line of coats, manufactured by Mohl Furs, featuring an ink-dyed Persian lamb pea coat, a leather trench coat, and a camel hair coat lined with mink inspired by photography of Jacques-Henri Lartigue. Despite his talent and popularity, Alfaro was experiencing financial difficulties and seeking financial backing. He entered into a licensing agreement with Italian manufacturer Gilmar in 1998 which allowed him to make long-term plans, be more involved in the manufacture of his garments, and to have a ready place in the European fashion scene.

His first collection shown under the agreement with Gilmar was well received. Merging Milanese chic with American-styled sportswear, Alfaro created a less revealing collection he "claimed to have started with the idea of a rich hippie, but in the end, this collection had little to do with a redux of counterculture references." True, his pieces were more boxy and full than his previous lines, but keeping to his unique and sensuous style, Alfaro added rabbit mules as a finishing touch. For the fall of 2000, Alfaro and Gilmar debuted their new line, Vic., which sells for nearly half the price of Alfaro's signature line. Alfaro told Women's Wear Daily (7 December 1999), "The Vic. line will be a little bit more on the fashion side and forward. It's still a designer collection; it's just another one of my personalities."

Alfaro is creating the postfeminist fashion sensibility, consummately beautiful in execution, infinitely skilled in construction, and assertively avant-garde. Even as some critics dismiss his work as offensive, Alfaro is a true fashion risk-taker and visionary. He is defining and dressing today, and will dress hereafter, the bravest woman of the future.

—Richard Martin; updated by Christine Miner Minderovic

ALLARD, Linda

American designer

Born: Akron, Ohio, 27 May 1940; grew up in Doylestown. Education: Studied fine arts, Kent State University (Ohio), 1958–62. Family: Married Herbert Gallen, 2000. Career: Design assistant, Ellen Tracy, New York, 1962–64, then director of design, from 1964; Linda Allard label introduced, 1984; design critic, Fashion Institute of Technology, New York; visiting professor, International Academy of Merchandising and Design, Chicago; board of directors, Kent State University. Member: Fashion Group International, Inc., Council of Fashion Designers of America. Awards: Dallas Fashion award, 1986, 1987, 1994. Address: 575 Seventh Avenue, New York, NY 10018, USA. Website: www.ellentracy.com.

Linda Allard, designed for Ellen Tracy's spring 2000 collection.
© Fashion Syndicate Press.

PUBLICATIONS

On ALLARD:

Books

Stegemeyer, Anne, Who's Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.

Articles

Daria, Irene, "Linda Allard: Growing up with Ellen Tracy," in Women's Wear Daily, 2 June 1986.

Caminiti, Susan, "A.K.A. Ellen Tracy," in Savvy, October 1988.

Kantrowitz, Barbara, "The Real Designer Behind that Ellen Tracy Label," in Newsweek, 24 October 1988.

"Linda Allard," in Accessories, December 1988.

Ozzard, Janet, "The Prime of Linda Allard," in Women's Wear Daily, 14 December 1994.

Schiros, Anne-Marie, "Designed for Retailers and Real Women," in the New York Times, 5 April 1995.

"Comfort Zone," in Women's Wear Daily, 18 February 1999.

Linda Allard, designed for Ellen Tracy's spring 2000 collection.
© Fashion Syndicate Press.

Socha, Miles, "Ellen Tracy Has a New Bridal Line," in W, March 2000.

* * *

Linda Allard is the woman behind Ellen Tracy. In fact, there is no Ellen Tracy—there never was. The company was founded in 1949 by Herbert Gallen, a juniors blouse manufacturer, who invented the name Ellen Tracy for his fledgling firm. Gallen hired Allard in 1962, fresh out of college, as a design assistant. She quickly expanded the line to include trousers and jackets. Two years later, she was made director of design, and a new Ellen Tracy was born. Since then, under Allard's artistic leadership, Ellen Tracy has become synonymous with top-quality fabrics, clean lines, and the concept of a complete wardrobe for the working woman.

Allard grew up in Doyleston, Ohio, in a 100-year-old farmhouse with five brothers and sisters. Allard was taught to sew at a young age by her mother, and quickly began designing garments for her dolls. "Even before I could sew, I was always designing clothes for my paper dolls," she said. After receiving a fine arts degree from Kent

State University in 1962, she moved to New York, where she received her first job offer from Gallen.

Shortly after Allard joined the firm, Ellen Tracy moved away from junior clothing to apparel designed for the newly established female workforce of the 1960s. Allard was one of the first designers to address the shifting demographics, creating a professional look, stylish yet appropriate for the workplace. Eventually, by the mid-1970s, the company moved into the bridge market. The bridge collections (which filled the gap between upper-end designer lines and mass-market brands) have since become the fastest growing area of the women's fashion market, key to Ellen Tracy's success, with the company's volume nearly tripling over the following decade.

As the creative force behind Ellen Tracy, Allard transformed the company into one of the key anchor designers in the bridge market. To give the collection more of a designer feel, Allard's name was placed on the Ellen Tracy label in 1984. Nonetheless, Allard believes high fashion has little relevance to most women's lives. "The extreme end of fashion is overrated," she has commented. "It gets a lot of coverage by the press, but it doesn't mean anything to a lot of women. We mean more to real women."

In the 21st century, working with a 12-person design team, Allard was responsible for the entire Ellen Tracy line. To her, designing begins with an emphasis on high-quality fabrics and specific color grouping: "We start with color and a sense of the flavor of the collection. Will it be fluid or rigid, soft and slouchy or tailored? The focus is on easy dressing and effortless shapes. We develop the fabrics first, finding the texture that expresses the attitude we feel, and then comes the styling. Fabrics make the collection unique." There are three Ellen Tracy collections each year. To ensure the clothes work well with each other, each garment is sold separately. "The modern woman buys a wardrobe of jackets that work well in a variety of pairings," Allard explained.

Ellen Tracy, Inc. has grown to be one of the top 10 women's clothing companies in the United States. After 50 years, Ellen Tracy remains a dominant label and can be found at prominent department stores such as Lord & Taylor, Neiman Marcus, Bloomingdale's, Macy's, and Saks Fifth Avenue. Perhaps the essential element for its success is customer loyalty. Ellen Tracy has been able to identify its primary customers, largely made up of career women, and Allard keeps design and quality consistent. As Allard told Janet Ozzard of Women's Wear Daily, "We deal in investment clothing, although we do try to offer some fashion because our customer does demand [it.] I think it's one of the reasons we keep constant: we study our customer, we have the same viewpoint. I design for a woman who has a career or a profession and wants to feel fabulous in her clothes, but it isn't the be-all and end-all of her world."

The increase in sales and popularity of Allard's designs was also due to the growing need for stylish, comfortable, and no-nonsense wardrobes, since the number of women who hold professional jobs has increased dramatically. Allard's designs are not necessarily considered to be cutting edge; she merely includes up-to-date styling and leaves out any, as Women's Wear Daily described, "glitz or sleaze."

Another key element to Allard's success has been her ability to diversify. Allard launched a petites division in 1981 and four years later debuted a successful dress unit. To cater to the more leisure-oriented customer, Ellen Tracy introduced its latest expansion, a sportswear line called Company, in the fall of 1991. Allard said her intent is to provide "the same level of quality for the woman who doesn't need strictly career clothes, or whose career offers more fashion choices than the tailored suits we're known for." In 1992 a fragrance line was launched, followed by the introduction of plus-size clothing and a collection of sophisticated evening dresses. Ellen Tracy also has licensing agreements to produce scarves, shoes, eyewear, hosiery, and handbags.

Allard lives and works in Manhattan and spends weekends in her new country home in Connecticut, set on 60 acres of rolling countryside. She designed the house with her brother, David, an architect. The house is a 5,500-square-foot Palladian-inspired villa, complete with studio and guest quarters. "When we were designing my new house," Allard explained, "I challenged my architect brother to take strong classical designs of the past and make them livable for today."

When asked in an interview with Women's Wear Daily if there was a missing ingredient in her life, she replied, "I've always thought about the idea of having children, but I think children need to be nurtured, and I don't think you can do that from five to six at night." Additionally, she commented, "From the age of ten I always wanted to design. I never excluded having a family, but my work is so demanding. I'm happy I have a lot of nieces and nephews, so I can enjoy family life and kids." Allard did make room for a husband, however: on New Year's Eve 1999, Herbert Gallen, Ellen Tracy's company chairman, proposed to Allard, who said "Yes."

—Janet Markarian; updated by Christine Miner Minderovic

ALLY CAPELLINO

British design firm

Founded: by Middlesex Polytechnic graduates Alison Lloyd and Johnathan "Jono" Platt in 1979. Company History: After graduation, they worked for Courtaulds, then Platt worked for Betty Jackson and Lloyd made hats and jewelry at home; designed accessories, selling to Miss Selfridges chain, 1979; developed clothing range, 1980; critically acclaimed collection for Olympic Games, Moscow, 1980; introduced childrenswear line, Mini Capellino, 1981; menswear line launched, 1986; signed licensing agreement with CGO Co., Japan, 1987; opened flagship store, Soho, London, 1988; launched diffusion sportswear line, Hearts of Oak, 1990; signed agreement with textile firm Coats Viyella for promotion and marketing, 1992; design consultants to the firm, from 1992; introduced Ally-T range of t-shirts, 1993; worked with Irish Linen Guild, 1993; collaborated with Jones Bootmaker to develop dual label shoes, 1994. Company Address: N1R, Metropolitan Wharf, Wapping Wall, London E1 9SS, England.

PUBLICATIONS

On ALLY CAPELLINO:

Articles

- "Influences: Ally Capellino," in Women's Journal (London), April 1985.
- Tyrrel, Rebecca, "Rival Look on the City Streets," in the Sunday Times Magazine (London), 4 September 1988.
- "No Business Like Show Business," in Fashion Weekly (London), 9 March 1989.
- Dutt, Robin, "Ally Capellino," in Clothes Show (London), October/November 1989.

Fallon, James, "Irish Linen Makers in Clover," in Women's Wear Daily, 22 February 1994.

"Retailers Spring Season Moving Slowly," in Women's Wear Daily, 30 March 1995.

Chappell, Helen, "Causes to Die for Darling," in New Statesman & Society, 3 May 1996.

* * *

In the early 1990s a truce seemed to have been called between British fashion designers and clothing manufacturers. Large manufacturers such as Coats Viyella and Courtaulds had previously viewed the fashion designer as a suspicious entity. A change in consumer needs and public taste, however, forced many companies to rethink their strategies. High Street retailers began demanding short runs of stock in response to swiftly changing trends, which reflected designers' needs for small quantities of items difficult and expensive to produce. Ally Capellino is one of the designer names to bridge the gap between these problems.

In 1992 Ally Capellino signed an agreement with Coats Viyella, Britain's largest textile company, to promote and market their brand name and give them access to Coats Viyella's design and production facilities, among the most advanced in technological development in the world. In return Ally Capellino would bring a more fashion-oriented handwriting to the business through acting as design consultants. This would, in turn, hopefully avert the criticism aimed at British clothing manufacturers for producing unadventurous products.

Ally Capellino was founded in 1979 by Alison Lloyd and Jono Platt, creating a name based on Alison and the Italian word for "small cap," or capellino. Both were graduates from the B.A. fashion course at Middlesex Polytechnic and they initially sold accessories to British fashion chains Miss Selfridge and Elle. The company developed a distinctive clothing line that included a children's line, menswear and womenswear, with simple, well-cut lines and cotton separates. This was developed and sold to an international market, predominantly in Italy, the U.S. and Japan.

In 1987 the firm signed a licensing contract with the GCO Company in Japan, which aimed to achieve optimum positioning of the label in terms of retail, public relations, and advertising exposure. This was followed, in 1988, by the opening of the Ally Capellino store in Soho, London, which developed into an emporium for clothing, childrenswear, and lifestyle items. Hearts of Oak, a diffusion sportswear collection, was introduced in 1990, followed by the launch of Ally-T, a unisex range of t-shirts, in 1993.

Alison Lloyd sees herself as one of a new breed of fashion designers, far more commercially and market-orientated, as she said when interviewed in the Independent, in London: "We are sensible rather than outrageous. We have made many mistakes in the past, but we have learned from them, and we made them with our own money rather than relying on handouts." This is a very positive attitude in light of the agreement made between the company and Coats Viyella. Many previous associations between industrial giants and designer names have become stifling rather than creative. Ally Capellino wanted to retain its independence but capitalize on the commerciality of their association.

Ally Capellino seemed to have found the perfect solution to a classic problem and managed to establish a business association which recognized the fact that designer fashion represented just the fragrance line was launched, followed by the introduction of plus-size clothing and a collection of sophisticated evening dresses. Ellen Tracy also has licensing agreements to produce scarves, shoes, eyewear, hosiery, and handbags.

Allard lives and works in Manhattan and spends weekends in her new country home in Connecticut, set on 60 acres of rolling countryside. She designed the house with her brother, David, an architect. The house is a 5,500-square-foot Palladian-inspired villa, complete with studio and guest quarters. "When we were designing my new house," Allard explained, "I challenged my architect brother to take strong classical designs of the past and make them livable for today."

When asked in an interview with Women's Wear Daily if there was a missing ingredient in her life, she replied, "I've always thought about the idea of having children, but I think children need to be nurtured, and I don't think you can do that from five to six at night." Additionally, she commented, "From the age of ten I always wanted to design. I never excluded having a family, but my work is so demanding. I'm happy I have a lot of nieces and nephews, so I can enjoy family life and kids." Allard did make room for a husband, however: on New Year's Eve 1999, Herbert Gallen, Ellen Tracy's company chairman, proposed to Allard, who said "Yes."

—Janet Markarian; updated by Christine Miner Minderovic

ALLY CAPELLINO

British design firm

Founded: by Middlesex Polytechnic graduates Alison Lloyd and Johnathan "Jono" Platt in 1979. Company History: After graduation, they worked for Courtaulds, then Platt worked for Betty Jackson and Lloyd made hats and jewelry at home; designed accessories, selling to Miss Selfridges chain, 1979; developed clothing range, 1980; critically acclaimed collection for Olympic Games, Moscow, 1980; introduced childrenswear line, Mini Capellino, 1981; menswear line launched, 1986; signed licensing agreement with CGO Co., Japan, 1987; opened flagship store, Soho, London, 1988; launched diffusion sportswear line, Hearts of Oak, 1990; signed agreement with textile firm Coats Viyella for promotion and marketing, 1992; design consultants to the firm, from 1992; introduced Ally-T range of t-shirts, 1993; worked with Irish Linen Guild, 1993; collaborated with Jones Bootmaker to develop dual label shoes, 1994. Company Address: N1R, Metropolitan Wharf, Wapping Wall, London E1 9SS, England.

PUBLICATIONS

On ALLY CAPELLINO:

Articles

- "Influences: Ally Capellino," in Women's Journal (London), April 1985.
- Tyrrel, Rebecca, "Rival Look on the City Streets," in the Sunday Times Magazine (London), 4 September 1988.
- "No Business Like Show Business," in Fashion Weekly (London), 9 March 1989.
- Dutt, Robin, "Ally Capellino," in Clothes Show (London), October/November 1989.

Fallon, James, "Irish Linen Makers in Clover," in Women's Wear Daily, 22 February 1994.

"Retailers Spring Season Moving Slowly," in Women's Wear Daily, 30 March 1995.

Chappell, Helen, "Causes to Die for Darling," in New Statesman & Society, 3 May 1996.

* * *

In the early 1990s a truce seemed to have been called between British fashion designers and clothing manufacturers. Large manufacturers such as Coats Viyella and Courtaulds had previously viewed the fashion designer as a suspicious entity. A change in consumer needs and public taste, however, forced many companies to rethink their strategies. High Street retailers began demanding short runs of stock in response to swiftly changing trends, which reflected designers' needs for small quantities of items difficult and expensive to produce. Ally Capellino is one of the designer names to bridge the gap between these problems.

In 1992 Ally Capellino signed an agreement with Coats Viyella, Britain's largest textile company, to promote and market their brand name and give them access to Coats Viyella's design and production facilities, among the most advanced in technological development in the world. In return Ally Capellino would bring a more fashion-oriented handwriting to the business through acting as design consultants. This would, in turn, hopefully avert the criticism aimed at British clothing manufacturers for producing unadventurous products.

Ally Capellino was founded in 1979 by Alison Lloyd and Jono Platt, creating a name based on Alison and the Italian word for "small cap," or capellino. Both were graduates from the B.A. fashion course at Middlesex Polytechnic and they initially sold accessories to British fashion chains Miss Selfridge and Elle. The company developed a distinctive clothing line that included a children's line, menswear and womenswear, with simple, well-cut lines and cotton separates. This was developed and sold to an international market, predominantly in Italy, the U.S. and Japan.

In 1987 the firm signed a licensing contract with the GCO Company in Japan, which aimed to achieve optimum positioning of the label in terms of retail, public relations, and advertising exposure. This was followed, in 1988, by the opening of the Ally Capellino store in Soho, London, which developed into an emporium for clothing, childrenswear, and lifestyle items. Hearts of Oak, a diffusion sportswear collection, was introduced in 1990, followed by the launch of Ally-T, a unisex range of t-shirts, in 1993.

Alison Lloyd sees herself as one of a new breed of fashion designers, far more commercially and market-orientated, as she said when interviewed in the Independent, in London: "We are sensible rather than outrageous. We have made many mistakes in the past, but we have learned from them, and we made them with our own money rather than relying on handouts." This is a very positive attitude in light of the agreement made between the company and Coats Viyella. Many previous associations between industrial giants and designer names have become stifling rather than creative. Ally Capellino wanted to retain its independence but capitalize on the commerciality of their association.

Ally Capellino seemed to have found the perfect solution to a classic problem and managed to establish a business association which recognized the fact that designer fashion represented just the tip of a multibillion-pound industry, in terms of prestige and kudos. Ally Capellino continued to create attractive, comfortable wear in the middle and later 1990s, with innovations such as using Irish linen and lace in 1994 and 1995; contributing to a fashion show benefit for the London Zoo's endangered species along with fellow designers Paul Costelloe and Zandra Rhodes in 1996; and mixing fashion with politics by dressing Cherie Blair in the last few years of the 20th century.

—Kevin Almond; updated by Owen James

AMIES, Sir Hardy

British designer

Born: Edwin Hardy Amies in London, 17 July 1909. Education: Studied at Brentwood School to 1927. Career: School teacher, Antibes, 1927; office assistant, Bendorf, Germany, 1928–30; trainee, W. & T. Avery Ltd., Birmingham, England, 1930–34; managing designer, Lachasse, 1934, managing director, 1935–39; served in the British Army Intelligence Corps, 1939–45; lieutenant colonel; head of Special Forces Commission to Belgium, 1944; designed for Worth and for the British government Utility Scheme during the war; established own couture business, Hardy Amies Ltd., 1946; introduced ready-made line, 1950; dressmaker by appointment for HM Queen Elizabeth II, England, from 1955; added menswear, 1959; firm owned by Debenhams, 1973–81, repurchased by Amies, 1981; also designed menswear for Hepworths, from 1961; vice-chairman, 1954–56, and chairman, 1959–60, Incorporated Society of London Fashion Designers. Exhibitions: Court Couture 1992, exhibition at Kensington Palace, London. Awards: Named Officier de l'Ordre de la Couronne, Belgium, 1946; Royal Warrant awarded, 1955; Harper's Bazaar award, 1962; Caswell-Massey International award, 1962, 1964, 1968; Ambassador Magazine award, 1964; the Sunday Times special award, London, 1965; Commander of the Royal Victorian Order, 1977; Personnalité de l'Année (Haute Couture), Paris, 1986; British Fashion Council Hall of Fame award, 1989; Knight Commander of the Victorian Order, 1989. Address: Hardy Amies Ltd., 14 Savile Row, London W1X 2JN, England.

PUBLICATIONS

By AMIES:

Books

- Here Lived...*, Cambridge, 1948.
- Just So Far*, London, 1954.
- The ABC of Men's Fashion*, London, 1964.
- Still Here*, London, 1984.
- The Englishman's Suit*, London, 1994.

Articles

"A Century of Fashion," in the RSA Journal (London), March 1989.

On AMIES:

Books

- Lambert, Eleanor, World of Fashion: People, Places, Resources, New York and London, 1976.
- McDowell, Colin, A Hundred Years of Royal Style, London, 1985.
- Milbank, Caroline Rennolds, Couture: The Great Designers, New York, 1985.
- Stegemeyer, Anne, Who's Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.

Articles

- "Hardy Country," in Vogue (London), March 1975.
- Boyd, Ann, "Hardy Amies, Haute Couturier," in The Observer (London), 3 February 1980.
- Hauptfuhrer, Fred, "Oh, Those Polka Dots! Oh, Those Bows! Hardy Amies Designs Queen Elizabeth's Clothes," in People, 8 October 1984.
- "Happy Birthday Mr. Amies," in Vogue (London), July 1989.
- Ginsburg, Madeleine, "Tailor-made," in Country Life (London), 13 July 1989.

Sir Hardy Amies, 1955: lamé suit with mink collar. © Hulton-Deutsch Collection/CORBIS.

tip of a multibillion-pound industry, in terms of prestige and kudos. Ally Capellino continued to create attractive, comfortable wear in the middle and later 1990s, with innovations such as using Irish linen and lace in 1994 and 1995; contributing to a fashion show benefit for the London Zoo's endangered species along with fellow designers Paul Costelloe and Zandra Rhodes in 1996; and mixing fashion with politics by dressing Cherie Blair in the last few years of the 20th century.

—Kevin Almond; updated by Owen James

AMIES, Sir Hardy

British designer

Born: Edwin Hardy Amies in London, 17 July 1909. Education: Studied at Brentwood School to 1927. Career: School teacher, Antibes, 1927; office assistant, Bendorf, Germany, 1928–30; trainee, W. & T. Avery Ltd., Birmingham, England, 1930–34; managing designer, Lachasse, 1934, managing director, 1935–39; served in the British Army Intelligence Corps, 1939–45; lieutenant colonel; head of Special Forces Commission to Belgium, 1944; designed for Worth and for the British government Utility Scheme during the war; established own couture business, Hardy Amies Ltd., 1946; introduced ready-made line, 1950; dressmaker by appointment for HM Queen Elizabeth II, England, from 1955; added menswear, 1959; firm owned by Debenhams, 1973–81, repurchased by Amies, 1981; also designed menswear for Hepworths, from 1961; vice-chairman, 1954–56, and chairman, 1959–60, Incorporated Society of London Fashion Designers. Exhibitions: Court Couture 1992, exhibition at Kensington Palace, London. Awards: Named Officier de l'Ordre de la Couronne, Belgium, 1946; Royal Warrant awarded, 1955; Harper's Bazaar award, 1962; Caswell-Massey International award, 1962, 1964, 1968; Ambassador Magazine award, 1964; the Sunday Times special award, London, 1965; Commander of the Royal Victorian Order, 1977; Personnalité de l'Année (Haute Couture), Paris, 1986; British Fashion Council Hall of Fame award, 1989; Knight Commander of the Victorian Order, 1989. Address: Hardy Amies Ltd., 14 Savile Row, London W1X 2JN, England.

PUBLICATIONS

By AMIES:

Books

- Here Lived...*, Cambridge, 1948.
- Just So Far*, London, 1954.
- The ABC of Men's Fashion*, London, 1964.
- Still Here*, London, 1984.
- The Englishman's Suit*, London, 1994.

Articles

"A Century of Fashion," in the RSA Journal (London), March 1989.

On AMIES:

Books

- Lambert, Eleanor, World of Fashion: People, Places, Resources, New York and London, 1976.
- McDowell, Colin, A Hundred Years of Royal Style, London, 1985.
- Milbank, Caroline Rennolds, Couture: The Great Designers, New York, 1985.
- Stegemeyer, Anne, Who's Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.

Articles

- "Hardy Country," in Vogue (London), March 1975.
- Boyd, Ann, "Hardy Amies, Haute Couturier," in The Observer (London), 3 February 1980.
- Hauptfuhrer, Fred, "Oh, Those Polka Dots! Oh, Those Bows! Hardy Amies Designs Queen Elizabeth's Clothes," in People, 8 October 1984.
- "Happy Birthday Mr. Amies," in Vogue (London), July 1989.
- Ginsburg, Madeleine, "Tailor-made," in Country Life (London), 13 July 1989.

Sir Hardy Amies, 1955: lamé suit with mink collar. © Hulton-Deutsch Collection/CORBIS.

Design by Sir Hardy Amies, ca. 1951. © Norman Parkinson Limited/Fiona Cowan/CORBIS.

- Lambert, Elizabeth, and Derry Moore, "The Reign of Hardy Amies: The Queen's Couturier in London and Gloucestershire," in Architectural Digest (Los Angeles), September 1989.
- "Hardy Perennial," in Fashion Weekly (London), 19 October 1989.
- "What's a Couturier to Do?" in Chicago Tribune, 21 May 1990.
- "Royal Attire on Exhibit in London Palace," in Chicago Tribune, 20 September 1992.
- "The Englishman's Suit," in the Economist (U.S.), 16 July 1994.
- Williams, Hugo, "The Englishman's Suit: A Personal View of its History, its Place in the World Today, its Future and the Accessories which Support It," in the Times Literary Supplement (TLS), 22 July 1994.

* * *

Hardy Amies began his career as a couturier when he was brought in as managing designer at Lachasse, in London, after the departure in 1933 of Digby Morton. He acknowledges that by examining the models left by Morton he learned the construction of tailored suits. The 1930s was an auspicious time for the new generation of London couture houses emerging, for British tailored suit reigned supreme in America. Amies' contribution to the construction of the tailored suit for women was to lower the waistline of the jacket, which he believed Morton had always set too high, thus giving the "total effect of a more important-looking suit." His fashion philosophy, that elegant clothes must have a low waistline, characterized his work ever since and his clothes have always been just above the hipline rather than on the natural waistline. Working on his theory that fashion design should be a process of "evolution rather than revolution," Amies has conceded that his duty as a designer was to vary the cut and design of the tailored suit to make it as feminine as possible, without departing from the canons of good tailoring.

Like his counterparts in the London couture, Amies' work was always tempered by the requirements of the private couture customer who formed the majority of his business. Unlike the Paris couture houses who enjoyed the support of large textile firms and saw the link with couture as a beneficial form of publicity, as well as backing from the French Government for its industrie de luxe, the London couture houses did not benefit from such aid. The main role of the London couture, according to Amies, was not to create avant-garde clothes for publicity purposes but to design for the individual customer.

Amies is perhaps best known for his work for Queen Elizabeth II for whom he began a long association as a royal dressmaker in 1950 when he made several outfits for the then Princess Elizabeth's royal tour to Canada. Although the couture side of the Hardy Amies business was traditionally its less financially successful area, it has nonetheless given his house a degree of respectability as a royal warrant holder. One of his best known creations is the gown he designed in 1977 for Queen Elizabeth's Silver Jubilee portrait which, he said, was "immortalized on a thousand biscuit tins." While Amies' royal patronage clearly enforced his international image, his menswear and related fashion spinoffs (such as licenses) were by far his most successful enterprise. His small leather goods, ties, knitwear, and shirts, produced and sold under licensing agreements in various countries including America, Canada, Australia, and Japan, made the Hardy Amies label a household name.

Another side of Amies' work is in corporate uniform designing for the service industries, such as hotels and airlines, where his reputation both as a designer of tailored clothes and his royal association have undoubtedly made him an appealing choice.

Amies weathered the transformation of London's fashion image as the home of the thoroughbred tailored suit to a veritable melting pot of creativity, during a career that spanned more than fifty years. And even after his retirement in 1994, he remained one of Britain's best known establishment designers. Though he has admitted "I'm absolutely astonished at my success," and downplayed his talent, everyone agrees Hardy Amies has inimitable style.

—Catherine Woram; updated by Nelly Rhodes

ANSELM, Marilyn and Yoram

See HOBBS, LTD

ANTHONY, John

American designer

Born: Gianantonio Iorio in New York City, 28 April 1938. Education: Studied at the Academia delle Belle Arti, Rome, 1956–57; graduated from Fashion Institute of Technology, New York, 1959. Family: Married Molly Anthony; children: Mark. Career: Designer, Devonbrook, New York, 1959–68; designer, Adolph Zelinka, 1968–70; established John Anthony Inc., New York, 1971–79; custom tailoring, from 1986; debuted ready-to-wear collections, 1994, 1996, and 2001. Exhibitions: Riverside Theatre and the Center for the Arts, Palm Beach, Florida, 2001. Awards: Maison Blanche award, New Orleans, 1964; Silver Cup award, Kaufmann's Department Stores, Pittsburgh, 1964; Mortimer C. Ritter award, Fashion Institute of Technology, New York, 1964; Coty American Fashion Critics "Winnie" award, 1972; Coty Return award, 1976.

PUBLICATIONS

On ANTHONY:

Books

- Morris, Bernadine, and Barbara Walz, The Fashion Makers, New York, 1978.
- Milbank, Caroline Rennolds, New York Fashion: The Evolution of American Style, New York, 1989.
- Stegemeyer, Anne, Who's Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.

Articles

- Morris, Bernadine, "Evening Dresses: Taking it Easy," in the New York Times, 5 June 1984.
- _____, "In Two New Couture Collections, Glamor is a Theme," in the New York Times, 30 June 1987.
- _____, "Dressing Up, and Down," in the New York Times, 19 September 1989.
- Heimel, Cynthia, "Service, Fit, Original Design are What Make the New American Couturiers Hot," in Vogue, January 1990.

- Lambert, Elizabeth, and Derry Moore, "The Reign of Hardy Amies: The Queen's Couturier in London and Gloucestershire," in Architectural Digest (Los Angeles), September 1989.
- "Hardy Perennial," in Fashion Weekly (London), 19 October 1989.
- "What's a Couturier to Do?" in Chicago Tribune, 21 May 1990.
- "Royal Attire on Exhibit in London Palace," in Chicago Tribune, 20 September 1992.
- "The Englishman's Suit," in the Economist (U.S.), 16 July 1994.
- Williams, Hugo, "The Englishman's Suit: A Personal View of its History, its Place in the World Today, its Future and the Accessories which Support It," in the Times Literary Supplement (TLS), 22 July 1994.

* * *

Hardy Amies began his career as a couturier when he was brought in as managing designer at Lachasse, in London, after the departure in 1933 of Digby Morton. He acknowledges that by examining the models left by Morton he learned the construction of tailored suits. The 1930s was an auspicious time for the new generation of London couture houses emerging, for British tailored suit reigned supreme in America. Amies' contribution to the construction of the tailored suit for women was to lower the waistline of the jacket, which he believed Morton had always set too high, thus giving the "total effect of a more important-looking suit." His fashion philosophy, that elegant clothes must have a low waistline, characterized his work ever since and his clothes have always been just above the hipline rather than on the natural waistline. Working on his theory that fashion design should be a process of "evolution rather than revolution," Amies has conceded that his duty as a designer was to vary the cut and design of the tailored suit to make it as feminine as possible, without departing from the canons of good tailoring.

Like his counterparts in the London couture, Amies' work was always tempered by the requirements of the private couture customer who formed the majority of his business. Unlike the Paris couture houses who enjoyed the support of large textile firms and saw the link with couture as a beneficial form of publicity, as well as backing from the French Government for its industrie de luxe, the London couture houses did not benefit from such aid. The main role of the London couture, according to Amies, was not to create avant-garde clothes for publicity purposes but to design for the individual customer.

Amies is perhaps best known for his work for Queen Elizabeth II for whom he began a long association as a royal dressmaker in 1950 when he made several outfits for the then Princess Elizabeth's royal tour to Canada. Although the couture side of the Hardy Amies business was traditionally its less financially successful area, it has nonetheless given his house a degree of respectability as a royal warrant holder. One of his best known creations is the gown he designed in 1977 for Queen Elizabeth's Silver Jubilee portrait which, he said, was "immortalized on a thousand biscuit tins." While Amies' royal patronage clearly enforced his international image, his menswear and related fashion spinoffs (such as licenses) were by far his most successful enterprise. His small leather goods, ties, knitwear, and shirts, produced and sold under licensing agreements in various countries including America, Canada, Australia, and Japan, made the Hardy Amies label a household name.

Another side of Amies' work is in corporate uniform designing for the service industries, such as hotels and airlines, where his reputation both as a designer of tailored clothes and his royal association have undoubtedly made him an appealing choice.

Amies weathered the transformation of London's fashion image as the home of the thoroughbred tailored suit to a veritable melting pot of creativity, during a career that spanned more than fifty years. And even after his retirement in 1994, he remained one of Britain's best known establishment designers. Though he has admitted "I'm absolutely astonished at my success," and downplayed his talent, everyone agrees Hardy Amies has inimitable style.

—Catherine Woram; updated by Nelly Rhodes

ANSELM, Marilyn and Yoram

See HOBBS, LTD

ANTHONY, John

American designer

Born: Gianantonio Iorio in New York City, 28 April 1938. Education: Studied at the Academia delle Belle Arti, Rome, 1956–57; graduated from Fashion Institute of Technology, New York, 1959. Family: Married Molly Anthony; children: Mark. Career: Designer, Devonbrook, New York, 1959–68; designer, Adolph Zelinka, 1968–70; established John Anthony Inc., New York, 1971–79; custom tailoring, from 1986; debuted ready-to-wear collections, 1994, 1996, and 2001. Exhibitions: Riverside Theatre and the Center for the Arts, Palm Beach, Florida, 2001. Awards: Maison Blanche award, New Orleans, 1964; Silver Cup award, Kaufmann's Department Stores, Pittsburgh, 1964; Mortimer C. Ritter award, Fashion Institute of Technology, New York, 1964; Coty American Fashion Critics "Winnie" award, 1972; Coty Return award, 1976.

PUBLICATIONS

On ANTHONY:

Books

- Morris, Bernadine, and Barbara Walz, The Fashion Makers, New York, 1978.
- Milbank, Caroline Rennolds, New York Fashion: The Evolution of American Style, New York, 1989.
- Stegemeyer, Anne, Who's Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.

Articles

- Morris, Bernadine, "Evening Dresses: Taking it Easy," in the New York Times, 5 June 1984.
- _____, "In Two New Couture Collections, Glamor is a Theme," in the New York Times, 30 June 1987.
- _____, "Dressing Up, and Down," in the New York Times, 19 September 1989.
- Heimel, Cynthia, "Service, Fit, Original Design are What Make the New American Couturiers Hot," in Vogue, January 1990.

- Morris, Bernadine, "The Rebirth of New York Couture," in the New York Times, 1 May 1990.
- Larmoth, Jeanine, "Haute Couture American Style: The Free Spirit," in Town & Country, May 1991.
- Morris, Bernadine, "Dramatic Tailoring for Day and Night," in the New York Times, 17 September 1991.
- _____, "A Compromise Made of Jersey," in the New York Times, 15 September 1992.
- "John Anthony Back in Wholesale," in Women's Wear Daily, 26 April 1994.
- "Anthony's New Venture: Ready-to-Wear," in Women's Wear Daily, 4 May 1994.
- Vienne, Veronique, "The Chivalrous Couturier," in Town & Country, September 1995.
- La Ferla, Ruth, "A Fashion Show to Chamber Music," in the New York Times, 17 September 2000.
- Canupp, Shelley, "So Haute...John Anthony," in the Palm Beach Press Journal, 15 February 2001.

* * *

Born Gianantonio Iorio in Queens, New York, to a metalworker, John Anthony has evolved into a dress designer who uses the most luxurious fabrics in the simplest shapes with unequalled taste. Educated at the Academia delle Belle Arti in Rome, and the Fashion Institute of Technology, Anthony worked for several wholesale companies before opening his own house with the manufacturer Robert Levine in 1971. He immediately marketed his look towards the top end of ready-to-wear, establishing a glossy, up-to-the-minute fashion image and selling to leading retail stores.

Anthony's first collection was an edited Marlene Dietrich look, featuring masculine tailoring in pinstripe and herringbone wools, softened with blouses underneath, or pleated and smocked crêpe dresses. By 1976, he was showing the soft, liquid separates that became his trademark; ice cream colors seemed to melt into clothes that were so light they almost floated. Anthony believes designing clothes is a fusion of function and purpose. The function appears to be his logical, wearable approach; the purpose lies in his pared-down minimalist ideas. He edits collections down to their bare essentials and, while other designers often show over 100 styles per collection, he makes his statement in half this number. His subtle, understated clothes are designed for a young, sophisticated woman. He uses natural fabrics like wool, crêpe, chiffon, jersey, satin, and menswear fabrics. He is particularly noted for his cardigan sweaters or pullovers, teamed with skirts and his elegant gala evening gowns, in contradictory daywear fabrics.

His modern understatements have brought him commissions from high-profile clients like the wives of U.S. presidents, including Betty Ford, Rosalynn Carter, and Jacqueline Kennedy Onassis, who needed to attract attention through impeccable taste rather than outrageous overstatement. Performers Lena Horne, Audrey Meadows, and Julie Andrews were also among his customers through the years. Muted color is another strong feature of Anthony's work. He believes the color palette in a collection should intermingle, so one item can easily go with everything else. His first collection was predominantly black with white, navy, and red. He claims to hate shock colors like turquoise or fuschia, and has usually been faithful to a range of beiges, christened with names such as peanut and cinnamon.

Anthony considers the designer's job as one to make things easy for the customer. Yet behind this ease lies a renowned skill for cutting, tailoring, and overall dedication to developing a specialist style, which has won the designer Coty awards. He was one of the first designers to promote the idea of easy-to-travel clothes that could be rolled up in a ball and thrown into a suitcase with no danger of wrinkling. Anthony recommends his customer buy a few things that work for her each season, then interchange and adapt these garments to create several different looks.

For the fall 1994 season, Anthony released his first ready-to-wear collection in nearly a decade, called John Anthony Couture. Featuring coats, suits, day dresses, and cocktail and evening dresses consisting of lamb-trimmed brown wool, navy mandarin-collared pantsuits, and little wool jersey dresses with full, above-the-knee skirts, the collection pieces wholesaled at $500 to $1,900. Showing his charitable side, Anthony's show was a benefit for pediatric cancer patients at Sloane Kettering Memorial Hospital. The spring collection featured, according to Women's Wear Daily, "A line dresses in red silk for day, evening columns in white taffeta and silk and two stunning ball gowns, one a whirl of strapless tulle, the other a pale pink silk gown overlaid with black lace."

Anthony's masterpieces have traditionally sold in the higher-end marketplace, with a coat going for $6,000, a suit for $8,000, and an evening gown for $20,000, but the line he released in 2001 featured sizes up to 16 and the price tags range from $1,800 to $5,000, putting his works within reach of the average upper middle-class consumer.

—Kevin Almond; updated by Daryl F. Mallett

APOSTOLOPOULIS, Nikos

See NIKOS

AQUASCUTUM, LTD.

British ready-to-wear firm

Founded: by John Emery in London, 1851. Company History: Early firsts include rain-repellent woollen cloth, the raglan sleeve, and the trench coat. Manufacturer of outerwear, from 1851; introduced womenswear, 1909; New York showroom opened, 1948; manufacturing outlet in Canada opened, 1949; Manchester and Bristol shops opened, 1950s; added suits for men, 1951; introduced full line of women's fashions, 1986; granted royal warrants, 1897, 1902, 1903, 1911, 1929, 1949, 1952. Awards: Clothing Oscar, 1958; Queen's award for Export Achievement, 1966, 1967, 1971, 1976, 1979, 1990; British Knitting and Clothing Export Council Export award, 1986. Company Address: 100 Regent St., London W1A 2AQ, England.

PUBLICATIONS

By AQUASCUTUM LTD.:

Books

- The Story of Aquascutum*, London, 1959.
The Aquascutum Story, London, 1976, 1991.
The Aquascutum Heritage, London, 1984.

- Morris, Bernadine, "The Rebirth of New York Couture," in the New York Times, 1 May 1990.
- Larmoth, Jeanine, "Haute Couture American Style: The Free Spirit," in Town & Country, May 1991.
- Morris, Bernadine, "Dramatic Tailoring for Day and Night," in the New York Times, 17 September 1991.
- _____, "A Compromise Made of Jersey," in the New York Times, 15 September 1992.
- "John Anthony Back in Wholesale," in Women's Wear Daily, 26 April 1994.
- "Anthony's New Venture: Ready-to-Wear," in Women's Wear Daily, 4 May 1994.
- Vienne, Veronique, "The Chivalrous Couturier," in Town & Country, September 1995.
- La Ferla, Ruth, "A Fashion Show to Chamber Music," in the New York Times, 17 September 2000.
- Canupp, Shelley, "So Haute...John Anthony," in the Palm Beach Press Journal, 15 February 2001.

* * *

Born Gianantonio Iorio in Queens, New York, to a metalworker, John Anthony has evolved into a dress designer who uses the most luxurious fabrics in the simplest shapes with unequalled taste. Educated at the Academia delle Belle Arti in Rome, and the Fashion Institute of Technology, Anthony worked for several wholesale companies before opening his own house with the manufacturer Robert Levine in 1971. He immediately marketed his look towards the top end of ready-to-wear, establishing a glossy, up-to-the-minute fashion image and selling to leading retail stores.

Anthony's first collection was an edited Marlene Dietrich look, featuring masculine tailoring in pinstripe and herringbone wools, softened with blouses underneath, or pleated and smocked crêpe dresses. By 1976, he was showing the soft, liquid separates that became his trademark; ice cream colors seemed to melt into clothes that were so light they almost floated. Anthony believes designing clothes is a fusion of function and purpose. The function appears to be his logical, wearable approach; the purpose lies in his pared-down minimalist ideas. He edits collections down to their bare essentials and, while other designers often show over 100 styles per collection, he makes his statement in half this number. His subtle, understated clothes are designed for a young, sophisticated woman. He uses natural fabrics like wool, crêpe, chiffon, jersey, satin, and menswear fabrics. He is particularly noted for his cardigan sweaters or pullovers, teamed with skirts and his elegant gala evening gowns, in contradictory daywear fabrics.

His modern understatements have brought him commissions from high-profile clients like the wives of U.S. presidents, including Betty Ford, Rosalynn Carter, and Jacqueline Kennedy Onassis, who needed to attract attention through impeccable taste rather than outrageous overstatement. Performers Lena Horne, Audrey Meadows, and Julie Andrews were also among his customers through the years. Muted color is another strong feature of Anthony's work. He believes the color palette in a collection should intermingle, so one item can easily go with everything else. His first collection was predominantly black with white, navy, and red. He claims to hate shock colors like turquoise or fuschia, and has usually been faithful to a range of beiges, christened with names such as peanut and cinnamon.

Anthony considers the designer's job as one to make things easy for the customer. Yet behind this ease lies a renowned skill for cutting, tailoring, and overall dedication to developing a specialist style, which has won the designer Coty awards. He was one of the first designers to promote the idea of easy-to-travel clothes that could be rolled up in a ball and thrown into a suitcase with no danger of wrinkling. Anthony recommends his customer buy a few things that work for her each season, then interchange and adapt these garments to create several different looks.

For the fall 1994 season, Anthony released his first ready-to-wear collection in nearly a decade, called John Anthony Couture. Featuring coats, suits, day dresses, and cocktail and evening dresses consisting of lamb-trimmed brown wool, navy mandarin-collared pantsuits, and little wool jersey dresses with full, above-the-knee skirts, the collection pieces wholesaled at $500 to $1,900. Showing his charitable side, Anthony's show was a benefit for pediatric cancer patients at Sloane Kettering Memorial Hospital. The spring collection featured, according to Women's Wear Daily, "A line dresses in red silk for day, evening columns in white taffeta and silk and two stunning ball gowns, one a whirl of strapless tulle, the other a pale pink silk gown overlaid with black lace."

Anthony's masterpieces have traditionally sold in the higher-end marketplace, with a coat going for $6,000, a suit for $8,000, and an evening gown for $20,000, but the line he released in 2001 featured sizes up to 16 and the price tags range from $1,800 to $5,000, putting his works within reach of the average upper middle-class consumer.

—Kevin Almond; updated by Daryl F. Mallett

APOSTOLOPOULIS, Nikos

See NIKOS

AQUASCUTUM, LTD.

British ready-to-wear firm

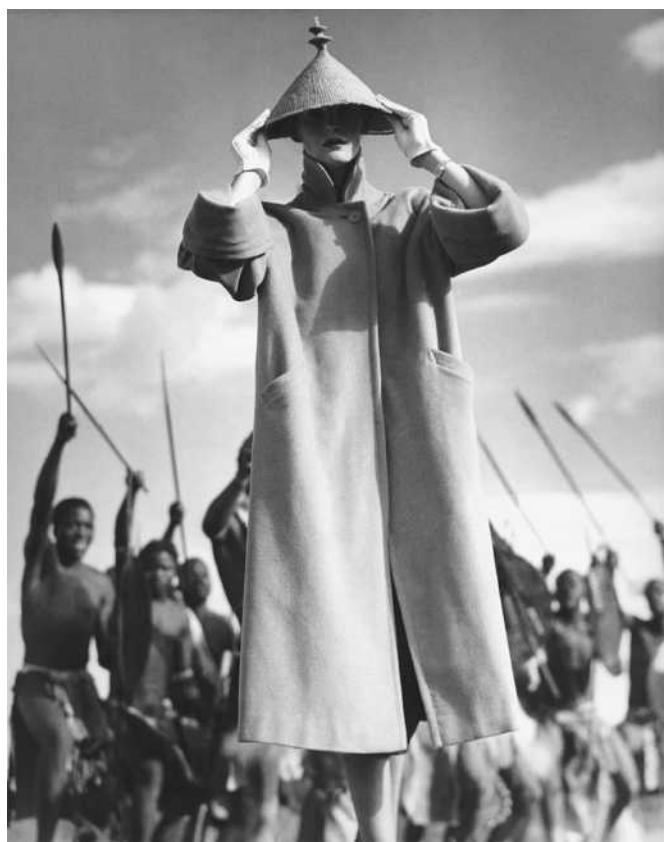

Founded: by John Emery in London, 1851. Company History: Early firsts include rain-repellent woollen cloth, the raglan sleeve, and the trench coat. Manufacturer of outerwear, from 1851; introduced womenswear, 1909; New York showroom opened, 1948; manufacturing outlet in Canada opened, 1949; Manchester and Bristol shops opened, 1950s; added suits for men, 1951; introduced full line of women's fashions, 1986; granted royal warrants, 1897, 1902, 1903, 1911, 1929, 1949, 1952. Awards: Clothing Oscar, 1958; Queen's award for Export Achievement, 1966, 1967, 1971, 1976, 1979, 1990; British Knitting and Clothing Export Council Export award, 1986. Company Address: 100 Regent St., London W1A 2AQ, England.

PUBLICATIONS

By AQUASCUTUM LTD.:

Books

- The Story of Aquascutum*, London, 1959.
The Aquascutum Story, London, 1976, 1991.
The Aquascutum Heritage, London, 1984.

Design by Aquascutum, Ltd., ca. 1951. © Norman Parkinson Limited/Fiona Cowan/CORBIS.

On AQUASCUTUM LTD.:

Books

- Bentley, Nicolas, A Man's Clothes, London, 1952.
 Adburgham, Alison, Shops and Shopping, London, 1964.
 Hobhouse, Hermione, A History of Regent Street, London, 1975.

Articles

- “Aquascutum—100 Years Proof,” in Vogue (London), March 1976.
 “Purses, Umbrellas, and Gloves, Oh My!” in Chicago Tribune, 20 July 1988.
 York, Peter, and Page Hill Starzinger, “Americans Have Often Taken Fashion Inspiration from the British,” in Vogue (New York), February 1990.
 Fallon, James, “Aquascutum Accepts $121m Buyout Offer,” in the Daily News Record (New York), 25 April 1990.
 Taylor, John, “The Aquascutum Heritage,” in British Style, No. 3, 1990.
 Skolnik, Lisa, “Let Raindrops Keep Falling—Women are Ready With Their Trenches,” in Chicago Tribune, 12 April 2000.

* * *

Aquascutum’s distinctive name is two Latin words meaning “watershield”—a name which has become synonymous with the best of traditional British clothing. Aquascutum originated as a name for the finely tailored coats made of showerproof natural fabrics developed by a small tailoring firm based in London’s Regent Street. They were ideal protection from England’s inclement weather, and, like many ostensibly functional items of clothing and footwear, the Aquascutum raincoat or cape also achieved high fashion status, worn even in fine weather. Today’s equivalent may be seen in the likes of the Burberry jacket, originally created for outdoor enthusiasts of fishing and hunting, but as likely to be seen worn over a city suit as on the moors. Timberland boots and Levis were also developed originally as workwear but have achieved cult fashion status.

A royal customer has always been an important asset to any business, and Aquascutum was fortunate in attracting the custom of Edward VII, Prince of Wales, who wore both greatcoats and capes made of the miraculously rain-repellent cloth. In 1897 the company was awarded its first royal warrant as “Waterproofers” to HRH The Prince of Wales.

For the first 50 years of business, Aquascutum was involved solely in the production of clothing for gentlemen. In 1909 the company launched its first collection of womenswear, prompted by the increasing popularity of sportswear for women. The often-romanticized imaged of the landed gentlemen and his tweed-clad lady have become potent symbols of English culture, and a persistent element in Britain’s international fashion image. It is interesting to note that when fashion designer Katherine Hamnett first showed her collection in Paris in 1989, Le Figaro remarked upon the fact that England now produced clothes other than cashmere sweaters and raincoats. In this light it is understandable that, when foreigners refer to English style, they are usually implying the quintessentially English look of companies such as Aquascutum or Burberry, rather than the avant-garde style of contemporary designers. Aquascutum represents the traditional image of thoroughly good British taste which lent itself perfectly to the sporting events that dominated the English Season.

While Aquascutum is perhaps best recognized for its clothing, it is in fact the company’s technical achievements in the textiles field that are most remarkable. The 1950s were an important period for the company in terms of textile developments. In 1955 Aquascutum introduced an iridescent-toned cotton gabardine for men’s and women’s raincoats. Three years later they launched a black evening coat made of showerproof wool and mohair fabric which won the company a clothing Oscar. In 1959 a rainproof cloth (called Aqua 5) was introduced which eliminated the need for reproofing after dry cleaning, which resulted in worldwide acclaim for Aquascutum. The company’s breakthroughs in textile development, including more recent work with microfibers, found the new fabrics incorporated into both the menswear and womenswear collections.

Aquascutum continued to produce an extensive collection of clothing and accessories for men and women, with a full range of womenswear introduced in 1986. A high profile client soon emerged in the person of Prime Minister Margaret Thatcher, dressed exclusively by the company for years during her terms in office. Aquascutum also introduced accessories, including handbags and travel bags, umbrellas, hats, scarves, and small leather goods, many of which bear the company’s coat of arms. In the first part of the 21st century, trench coats were suddenly back at the height of fashion, with Aquascutum and its longtime rival, Burberrys, once again at the forefront of the industry.

Viscount Thurso wearing an Aquascutum Ltd.-designed ensemble, ca. 1985. © Norman Parkinson Limited/Fiona Cowan/CORBIS.

As a company that originated producing clothing to protect its wearer from an unruly native climate, Aquascutum became a recognized brand label at international level. Though generally considered “conservative” fashion, dressing royalty and government officials, or “vintage” by others, Aquascutum outerwear has endured for 150 years and will never be out of style.

—Catherine Woram; updated by Nelly Rhodes

ARAI, Junichi

Japanese textile designer

Born: Kiryu City, Gunma Prefecture, 13 March 1932. Education: Trained in weaving at his father's textile factory, 1950–55; also studied at the Theater Arts Institute, Tokyo, 1953. Family: Married

Riko Tanagawa, 1958; children: Motomi, Mari. Career: formed Tomodachi Za puppet theater group, 1950; independent textile designer in Tokyo, from 1955; developed new metallic yarn techniques, 1955–66; worked with fashion designers Rei Kawakubo, Issey Miyake, Shin Hosokawa, and others, from 1970; produced computer-designed woven fabrics, from 1979; founded Anthology studio, 1979, and Arai Creation System company, 1987; opened Nuno fabrics shop, Tokyo, 1984; advisor, Yuki Tsumugi Producers Assn., Japanese Ministry of Trade, and International Wool Secretariat, from 1987; teaches at Otsuka Textile Design Institute. Exhibitions: Gen Gallery, Tokyo, 1983; Nichifutsu Gallery, Kyoto, 1984; Sagacho Exhibition Space, Tokyo, 1984; Shimin Gallery, Sapporo, 1985; Axis Gallery, Tokyo, 1986; Rhode Island School of Design, Providence, 1988; Hand and Technology: Textiles by Junichi Arai 1992, Yurakucho Asashi Gallery, Asashi, Japan; Pacific Art Center, Los Angeles, 1993; Junichi: Glistening Fabrics, Kemper Museum of Contemporary Art, Kansas City, Missouri, 1997. Awards: Mainichi Fashion award, Tokyo, 1983; Honorary Royal Designer for Industry, London, 1987. Address: Shinsyuku Kiryu-city, Gunma-pref 376, Japan.

Viscount Thurso wearing an Aquascutum Ltd.-designed ensemble, ca. 1985. © Norman Parkinson Limited/Fiona Cowan/CORBIS.

As a company that originated producing clothing to protect its wearer from an unruly native climate, Aquascutum became a recognized brand label at international level. Though generally considered “conservative” fashion, dressing royalty and government officials, or “vintage” by others, Aquascutum outerwear has endured for 150 years and will never be out of style.

—Catherine Woram; updated by Nelly Rhodes

ARAI, Junichi

Japanese textile designer

Born: Kiryu City, Gunma Prefecture, 13 March 1932. Education: Trained in weaving at his father's textile factory, 1950–55; also studied at the Theater Arts Institute, Tokyo, 1953. Family: Married

Riko Tanagawa, 1958; children: Motomi, Mari. Career: formed Tomodachi Za puppet theater group, 1950; independent textile designer in Tokyo, from 1955; developed new metallic yarn techniques, 1955–66; worked with fashion designers Rei Kawakubo, Issey Miyake, Shin Hosokawa, and others, from 1970; produced computer-designed woven fabrics, from 1979; founded Anthology studio, 1979, and Arai Creation System company, 1987; opened Nuno fabrics shop, Tokyo, 1984; advisor, Yuki Tsumugi Producers Assn., Japanese Ministry of Trade, and International Wool Secretariat, from 1987; teaches at Otsuka Textile Design Institute. Exhibitions: Gen Gallery, Tokyo, 1983; Nichifutsu Gallery, Kyoto, 1984; Sagacho Exhibition Space, Tokyo, 1984; Shimin Gallery, Sapporo, 1985; Axis Gallery, Tokyo, 1986; Rhode Island School of Design, Providence, 1988; Hand and Technology: Textiles by Junichi Arai 1992, Yurakucho Asashi Gallery, Asashi, Japan; Pacific Art Center, Los Angeles, 1993; Junichi: Glistening Fabrics, Kemper Museum of Contemporary Art, Kansas City, Missouri, 1997. Awards: Mainichi Fashion award, Tokyo, 1983; Honorary Royal Designer for Industry, London, 1987. Address: Shinsyuku Kiryu-city, Gunma-pref 376, Japan.

PUBLICATIONSBy ARAI:*Articles

"Nuno Choryu," in Ginka Bunka Shuppan, No. 63, 1985.

On ARAI:Books

- Tulokas, Maria, ed., Fabrics for the 1980s (exhibition catalogue), Providence, RI, 1985.
- Sutton, Ann, and Diane Saheenan, Ideas in Weaving, Loveland, CO, and London, 1989.
- Arai, Junichi, et al., Hand and Technology: Textiles by Junichi Arai 1992 (exhibition catalogue), Asashi, Japan, 1992.

Articles

- Tulokas, Maria, "Textiles for the Eighties," in Textilforum (Hanover, Germany), September 1985.
- Cannarella, D., "Fabric About Fabric," in Threads (Newtown, CT), November 1985.
- Popham, P., "Man of Cloth," in Blueprint (London), December/January 1987–88.
- Tulokas, Maria, "Textiles by Junichi Arai, 1979–1988," in Textilforum (Hanover, Germany), June 1989.
- "Junichi Arai," in the New York Times, 16 April 1990.
- MacIsaac, Heather Smith, "Arai Arrives: Japanese Textile Designer Junichi Arai Makes His American Debut," in House & Garden, August 1990.
- "Junichi Arai and Reiko Sudo," in Design Journal, No. 42, 1991.
- Livingston, David, "Junichi Arai's Creations Provoke, Mystify," in the Toronto Globe and Mail, 16 January 1992.
- Pollock, Naomi R., "Dream Weavers," in Metropolis, September 1992.
- Louie, Elaine, "A Fabric that is Light, in Both Senses," in the New York Times, 25 March 1993.
- Self, Dana, "Junichi Arai: Glistening Fabrics," available online at www.Kemperart.org, 17 July 2001.
- "Quality Fabric of the Month," available online at Textile Industries, www.textileindustries.com, 18 July 2001.
- "Tsunami: Yardage Exhibit," online at www.weavespindye.org, 18 July 2001.

* * *

Junichi Arai creates the stuff of dreams, fabrics never seen before. His work is a true collaboration: innovators in yarn and slit film production, in computers, and in loom technology are essential partners. But the finished product, the textiles "like stone" or "like clouds" created for Issey Miyake at his suggestion, or the fabrics Arai calls Spider Web, Titanium Poison, and Driving Rain, are pure Arai in inspiration, imagination, and execution. They could only have been created in Japan.

The great-grandson and grandson of spinners, and the son and nephew of weavers, Arai was born and raised in Kiryu, a historic textile center north of Tokyo. Steeped in Japanese textile tradition, he nevertheless dreamed of becoming an actor. Instead, at the age of 18, he began working in his father's factory, weaving obi and kimono cloth, including one that involved the twisting of gold or silver fibers around a core of silk yarn. The family firm also made synthetic and metallic fabrics for the U.S. cocktail dress market. In developing these fabrics, Arai acquired 36 patents. The eight years he spent helping run the business provided him with technical expertise but little satisfaction. It all paved the way, however, for his years of experimentation, teaching him the rules he would later break.

One of Arai's innovations is a burn-out process that dissolves the cotton covering from metallic thread, creating a new type of fabric. He also experimented with "melt-off," in which metal between two layers of lacquer in a slit film yarn is dissolved, producing an unusual, filmy fabric. Among his other creations are a stretchy yarn made of tightly coiled nylon covered by wool and another metallic fabric constructed from slit film polyester/silver yarn used in home furnishings. He has experimented with techniques such as using materials with different rates of shrinkage to create unusual puckers, then pulls in the fabric and transferring dye-embedded paper into wrinkled cloth—creating permanent folds of color.

Longtime colleague Reiko Sudo wrote in the exhibition catalogue for Hand and Technology: Textiles by Junichi Arai 1992, "He is truly the enfant terrible of Japanese textiles, delighting in snubbing convention, a naughty boy playing with ultra-high-tech toys." His genius consists of what Milton Sonday of the Cooper-Hewitt Museum in New York termed "pushing the limits" of both new and traditional technology, having the vision to take it one step further, or to combine fibers and technologies in new ways. The digital computer is his drawing board, freeing him to explore design possibilities and select the best ones. With it and the Jacquard loom, Arai hopes someday to create a fabric whose pattern changes as subtly as the days in a lifetime, never exactly repeating. For one exhibition, Arai concentrated on the combination of high technology and handcraft, using two different kinds of warp and weft, woven by the same machine, and limiting himself to two weave structures.

In a review of an Arai exhibit at the Kemper Museum of Contemporary Art in Kansas City, Missouri, in 1997 Curator Dana Self emphasized Arai's insistence that fabrics must resemble human skin in their flexibility and combinations of earthly elements, while possessing an ability to reshape themselves and retain their original essence. Arai, Self wrote, "merges traditional and nontraditional, simplicity and complexity," and draws on centuries of Japanese textile tradition. According to Self, he also understands that "textiles and clothing reverberate with ideas about how we clothe ourselves, how certain fabrics make us feel physically and emotionally, and how fabrics and clothing function in our culture."

Fashion designers like Miyake, Rei Kawakubo, and Yoshiki Hishinuma, a former Miyake apprentice, are among the collaborators whose imaginations Arai has challenged. Some of his fabrics are suitable for home furnishings; these are sold in Nuno showrooms in Tokyo, New York, Los Angeles, and Chicago. End use, however, is not really an Arai concern. In fact, some of his fabrics may only be suitable for museum installations, but that is quite beside the point of his work. Tiny print at the bottom of a hang tag, from a scarf purchased in an Issey Miyake boutique, whispers, "This work is the product of a weaving technology invented by Junichi Arai." As an innovator in weaving technology and the creation of new fabrics, he has no equal; in his work, the future is now.

—Arlene C. Cooper; updated by Sally A. Myers

ARMANI, Giorgio

Italian designer

Born: Piacenza, Italy, 11 July 1934. Education: Studied medicine, University of Bologna, 1952–53; also studied photography. Military Service: Served in the Italian Army, 1953–54. Family: Life partner, Sergio Galeotti (died 1985). Career: Window display designer, La Rinascente department stores, 1954; stylist, menswear buyer, La Rinascente stores, 1954–60; menswear designer, Nino Cerruti, 1960–70; freelance designer, 1970–75; first Armani menswear collection, 1974; introduced womenswear, 1975; launched Emporio Armani and Armani Jeans, 1981; Mani womenswear debuted, mid-1980s; Giorgio Armani Occhiali and Giorgio Armani Calze, 1987; sportswear range and Emporio Armani shops selling younger collection opened in London, 1989; Giorgio Armani USA formed, 1980; bought Antinea, 1990; AX, Armani Exchange, boutiques with lesser-priced basics opened in the U.S., 1991; acquired majority stake in Simint, 1996; bought Intai accessories producer, 1998; forged alliance with Ermenegildo Zegna, 2000; launched website, 2000; opened new Hong Kong and SoHo stores, 2001; fragrances include Armani le Parfum, 1982, Armani Eau pour Homme, 1984, and Gio, 1992; Acqua di Gio, 1995; Emporio Armani (his and hers), 1997; Mania, 2000.

Exhibitions: Intimate Architecture: Contemporary Clothing Design, Massachusetts Institute of Technology, Cambridge, 1982; Giorgio Armani: Images of Man, Fashion Institute of Technology, New York, 1990–91, traveled to Tokyo, Paris, London; retrospective Armani: 1972–92, Palazzo Pitti, Florence, 1992; Giorgio Armani, 25-year retrospective, Guggenheim Museum, New York, 2000. Awards: Neiman Marcus award, 1979; Cutty Sark award, 1980, 1981, 1984; Gentlemen's Quarterly Manstyle award, 1982; Grand'Ufficiale dell'Ordine al Merito award, Italy, 1982; Gold Medal from Municipality of Piacenza, 1983; CFDA International Designer award, 1983, 1987; L'Occchio d'Oro award, 1984, 1986, 1987, 1988, 1994; Cutty Sark Men's Fashion award, 1985; Bath Museum of Costume Dress of the Year award, 1986; named Gran Cavaliere della Repubblica, Italy, 1987; Lifetime Achievement award, 1987; Christobal Balenciaga award, 1988; Media Key award, 1988; Woolmark award, 1989, 1992; Senken award, 1989; honorary doctorate, Royal College of Art, 1991; Fiorino d'Oro award, Florence, 1992; Golden Effie award, 1993; Aguja de Oro award, Spain, 1993; Academia del Profumo Award, Italy, 1993. Address: Via Borgonuovo 21, 20121 Milan, Italy. Website: www.giorgioarmani.com.

PUBLICATIONS

On ARMANI:

Books

- Combray, Richard de, and Arturo Carlo Quintavalle, Giorgio Armani, Milan, 1982.
 Hayden Gallery, Massachusetts Institute of Technology, Intimate Architecture: Contemporary Clothing Design [exhibition catalogue], Cambridge, MA., 1982.
 Barbieri, Gian Paolo, Artificial, Paris, 1982.
 Alfonsi, Maria-Vittoria, Leaders in Fashion: I grandi personaggi della moda, Bologna, 1983.
 Milbank, Caroline Rennolds, Couture: The Great Designers, New York, 1985.
 Perschitz, Lois, ed., W, The Designing Life, New York, 1987.
 Coleridge, Nicholas, The Fashion Conspiracy, London, 1988.
 Howell, Georgina, Sultans of Style: 30 Years of Fashion and Passion 1960–1990, London, 1990.
 Martin, Richard, and Harold Koda, Giorgio Armani: Images of Man, New York, 1990.
 White, Nicola, Giorgio Armani, New York, 2000.
 Celant, Germano, and Harold Koda, New York & London, 2000.
Giorgio Armani: Twenty-Five Photographers, Ostfildern, 2001.
Giorgio Armani, Fundación del Museo Guggenheim, Bilbao, 2001.

Articles

- Hamilton, Rita, "Giorgio Armani's Fine Italian Hand," in Esquire (New York), 22 May 1979.
 "Giorgio Armani," in Time, May 1982.
 Barbieri, Giampaolo, "La moda diventa arte," in Amica (Milan), December 1982.
 Teston, E., "A Visit With Giorgio Armani," in Architectural Digest, May 1983.
 "Armani: Success, Tailor Made," in Vogue, August 1984.
 Mower, Sarah, "Giorgio Armani: A Man for All Seasons," in Woman's Journal (London), April 1986.

Giorgio Armani, fall/winter 2001 ready-to-wear collection. © AFP/CORBIS.

- Thurman, Judith, "A Cut Above," in Connoisseur (New York), August 1986.
- Romanelli, Marco, "Giorgio Armani: Il progetto dell'abito 1988," in Domus (Milan), January 1988.
- Brantley, Ben, "The Armani Mystique," in Vanity Fair, June 1988.
- Brantley, Bill, "The Emperor of New Clothes," in the Daily Telegraph Weekend Magazine (London), 17 December 1988.
- Mower, Sarah, "Emperor Armani," in Vogue (London), January 1989.
- Keers, Paul, "The Emporio of Style," in GQ (London), February/March 1989.
- Kostner, Kevin, "The Emporio Strikes Back," in Sky (London), March 1989.
- West, Carinthia, "Giorgio Armani," in Marie Claire (London), April 1989.
- Cohen, Eddie Lee, "Giorgio Armani," in Interior Design, April 1989.
- Furness, Janine, "Alluring Armani," in Interior Design, May 1989.
- Cohen, Eddie Lee, "Emporio Armani," in Interior Design, September 1989.
- Brampton, Sally, "Armani's Island," in Elle Decoration (London), Autumn 1989.
- Howell, Georgina, "Armani: The Man Who Fell to Earth," in the Sunday Times Magazine (London), 18 February 1990.
- Mardore, Lucienne, "La storia di Giorgio Armani," in Marie Claire (Paris), May 1990.
- Borioli, Gisella, "Giorgio Armani: This is the Real Me," in Donna (Milan), October 1990.
- LaFerla, Ruth, "Sizing Up Giorgio Armani," in the New York Times Magazine, 21 October 1990.
- Gerrie, Anthea, "Giorgio Armani," in Clothes Show (London), June 1991.
- Friend, Ted, "The Armani Edge," in Vogue, March 1992.
- Doyle, Kevin, "Armani's True Confessions," in Women's Wear Daily, 25 June 1992.
- Hutton, Lauren, "Giorgio Armani," in Interview (New York), April 1993.
- Forden, Sara Gay, "Numero Uno: Giorgio Armani, the World's Most Successful Designer, Still Isn't Satisfied," in Women's Wear Daily, 26 October 1994.
- Schiff, Stephen, "Lunch with Mr. Armani, Tea with Mr. Versace, Dinner with Mr. Valentino," in the New Yorker, 7 November 1994.
- Menkes, Suzy, "Armani's Off-the-Rack Mozart," in the International Herald Tribune, 17 January 1995.
- Forden, Sara Gay, "According to Armani," in DNR, 19 January 1995.
- Spindler, Amy M. "Armani and Ferré: A Study in Contrast," in the New York Times, 11 March 1995.
- Moin, David, Sharon Edelson, and Samantha Conti, "The Armani Blitz Begins (Giorgio Armani Stores in New York, New York)" in Women's Wear Daily, 9 September 1996.
- Rawsthorn, Alice, "Master of the Cool Classic," in the Financial Times, 25 August 1997.
- Socha, Miles, "Giorgio Armani," in Women's Wear Daily, 3 April 1998.
- Conti, Samantha, "Giorgio Armani: The Changing Face of Elegance," in Women's Wear Daily, 23 June 1999.
- Zargani, Luisa, "Armani and Zegna Form Joint Venture," in Women's Wear Daily, 25 July 2000.
- Conti, Samantha, "At Home with Giorgio Armani," in Women's Wear Daily, 14 September 2000.

- Heller, Richard, "Last Man Standing (Designer Giorgio Armani)," in Forbes, 12 November 2001.

* * *

Giorgio Armani is a design colonialist responsible for the creation of an aesthetic in both menswear and womenswear that had a firm grip on international style in the 1980s. Renowned for his use of fabric and expertise in tailoring, he is a world leader in menswear design responsible for the wide-shouldered look for executive women. His pared-down unstructured silhouette moved away from the standard tailored look epitomizing menswear since the 19th century; by eliminating interfaces, linings, and shoulder pads, Armani restructured the jacket, creating a softly tailored look.

Although Armani produces entire ranges of these functional, adaptable, flexible items of clothing that seem almost throwaway in their simplicity, they are, in fact, luxurious designs made of high-quality cloth. His clothes, however, although expensive, have their own understated glamour and could never be described as ostentatious. Neither trend nor tradition, the Armani style draws a fine line between the two. Eschewing change for its own sake, he believes in quality rather than invention. His collections are redefinitions of a soft, unstructured style, playing with layers of texture and color but constantly renegotiating proportions. Elegant and understated, they have a timeless quality, a classicism often emphasized in nostalgic advertising campaigns by Italian photographer Aldo Fallai.

Giorgio Armani, spring/summer 2001 collection. © AP/Wide World Photos.

Born in Piacenza, Italy, in 1934, Armani's first taste of the fashion industry was with La Rinascita, a large Italian department store chain where in 1954 he worked on the window displays. He then transferred to the Office of Fashion and Style where he had an invaluable training in the use of fabrics and the importance of customer profiling and targeting. After seven years he left to design menswear for Nino Cerruti, and for a month worked in one of the firm's textile factories where he learned to appreciate fabric, the skills that went into its production, and the techniques of industrial tailoring.

In 1974 Armani launched his own label, which was to become incredibly successful—the biggest-selling line of European design in America. His first designs revolved around the refining of the male jacket, which he believed to be the most important invention in the history of dress, being both versatile and functional and suited to all social occasions. His idea was to instill the relaxation of sports clothing into its tailored lines. He later applied similar notions to womenswear, evolving a new manner of dress for women. He further developed a style for working women with an understated, almost androgynous chic.

In these years, Armani designs were very expensive, being made out of the most luxurious materials such as alpaca, cashmere, and suede. To expand his customer base and meet the increasing demands of a fashion conscious public for clothes with a designer label, he produced a cheaper womenswear range entitled Mani, made out of synthetics so advanced they could not be copied, together with the popular Emporio Armani range of sportswear. For men he produced definitive navy blazers, crumpled linen jackets, and leather separates, which he introduced in 1980, and oversized overcoats and raincoats. Impeccably tailored, with faltering cut, easy lines, and subtle textures, patterns, and colors, he introduced twists such as low-slung button placement on double-breasted suits for men and experimental blends of fabrics such as viscose with wool or linen with silk.

Like his contemporaries in the industry, Armani diversified into jeans, undergarments, neckwear, golf apparel, accessories, fragrances, and more recently, cosmetics. With more than a dozen clothing lines, the quality has not diminished, merely attracted a wider clientèle which in turn attracted the notice of luxury conglomerates LVMH and Gucci Group. Both approached Armani with acquisitive offers, but he refused. "Of course, I was flattered," he told Richard Heller of Forbes (12 November 2001), "But I decided to keep my independence." He is, indeed, one of a disappearing breed, without stockholders or backers to answer to—rather, he has increasingly bought his licensees and brought most Armani brand in-house.

If ever there was a doubt about how the world felt about Armani and his contributions to fashion, they were completely dispelled in November 2000 when the Guggenheim Museum threw a lavish gala to mark the opening of its Giorgio Armani retrospective in New York. Covering 25 years of Armani creativity and featuring 400 garments, the exhibition attracted a glittering crowd including Hollywood celebrities, athletes, and musicians. Giorgio Armani, now and forever, represents the finest in elegant, sophisticated style.

—Caroline Cox; updated by Nelly Rhodes

ASHLEY, Laura

Welsh designer

Born: Laura Mountney in Dowlais, Glamorgan, Wales, 7 September 1925. Education: Attended Marshall's School, Merthyr Tydfil, Wales, until 1932; mainly self-taught in design. Military Service: Served in the Women's Royal Naval Service. Family: Married Bernard Ashley, 1949; children: Jane, David, Nick, and Emma. Career: Worked as secretary, National Federation of Women's Institutes, London, 1945–52; founder/partner, with Bernard Ashley, Ashley-Mountney Ltd. printed textiles, 1954–68, in Kent, 1956–61, and in Carno, Wales, from 1961; opened first retail outlet, London, 1967; Laura Ashley Ltd. established, 1968; Geneva and Amsterdam stores opened, 1972; Paris, 1973; first U.S. shop, San Francisco, 1974; New York store opened, 1977; son Nick Ashley took over as design director, 1984; Laura Ashley Foundation created, 1984; company went public, 1985; shops topped 550 shops in 63 countries, 1993; Bernard Ashley resigned from board, 1998; stake (40-percent) of company sold to Malaysian United Industries, 1998; North American stores sold, 1999; flagship Regent Street store redone and reopened, 2000; plans for 100 home furnishings initiated, 2001. Awards: Queen's award for Export Achievement, 1977; Bernard Ashley knighted, 1987. Died: 17 September 1985, in Coventry, England. Company Address: 27 Bagley's Lane, Fulham, London SW6 2QA, England. Company Website: www.lauraashley.com.

PUBLICATIONS

By ASHLEY:

Books

- Laura Ashley Home Furnishings 1981*, Carno, Wales, 1981.
- Laura Ashley Home Furnishings 1982*, Carno, Wales, 1982.
- Laura Ashley Home Furnishings 1983*, Carno, Wales, 1983.
- Laura Ashley Home Furnishings 1984*, Carno, Wales, 1984.
- Laura Ashley Home Decoration 1985*, Carno, Wales, 1985.
- Laura Ashley Book of Home Decorating* (with Elizabeth Dickson), Carno, Wales, London & New York, 1985, 1988, 1990, 1997.
- Laura Ashley Home Furnishings 1986*, Carno, Wales, 1986.
- Laura Ashley Home Furnishings 1987*, Carno, Wales, 1987.
- Laura Ashley Complete Guide to Home Decorating*, Carno, Wales, 1987.
- Laura Ashley at Home: Six Family Homes and Their Transformation* (with Nick Ashley), London, 1988.
- Laura Ashley Guide to Country Decorating* (with Lorrie Mack and Lucinda Edgerton), London, 1992.
- Leitch, Michael, The Laura Ashley Book of Anniversary Delights, 1993.
- Laura Ashley Decorating with Fabric: A Room-by-Room Guide to Home Decorating* (with Lorrie Mack and Diana Dodge), New York, 1995.
- Berry, Susan, Laura Ashley Decorating with Paper & Paint: A Room-by-Room Guide to Home Decorating, New York, 1995.
- , Laura Ashley: The Color Book, Using Color to Decorate Your Home, New York & London, 1995.
- Laura Ashley Decorating with Patterns & Textures: Using Color, Pattern, and Texture in the Home*, London, 1996.

soft, unstructured style, playing with layers of texture and color but constantly renegotiating proportions. Elegant and understated, they have a timeless quality, a classicism often emphasized in nostalgic advertising campaigns by Italian photographer Aldo Fallai.

Born in Piacenza, Italy, in 1934, Armani's first taste of the fashion industry was with La Rinascita, a large Italian department store chain where in 1954 he worked on the window displays. He then transferred to the Office of Fashion and Style where he had an invaluable training in the use of fabrics and the importance of customer profiling and targeting. After seven years he left to design menswear for Nino Cerruti, and for a month worked in one of the firm's textile factories where he learned to appreciate fabric, the skills that went into its production, and the techniques of industrial tailoring.

In 1974 Armani launched his own label, which was to become incredibly successful—the biggest-selling line of European design in America. His first designs revolved around the refining of the male jacket, which he believed to be the most important invention in the history of dress, being both versatile and functional and suited to all social occasions. His idea was to instill the relaxation of sports clothing into its tailored lines. He later applied similar notions to womenswear, evolving a new manner of dress for women. He further developed a style for working women with an understated, almost androgynous chic.

In these years, Armani designs were very expensive, being made out of the most luxurious materials such as alpaca, cashmere, and suede. To expand his customer base and meet the increasing demands of a fashion conscious public for clothes with a designer label, he produced a cheaper womenswear range entitled Mani, made out of synthetics so advanced they could not be copied, together with the popular Emporio Armani range of sportswear. For men he produced definitive navy blazers, crumpled linen jackets, and leather separates, which he introduced in 1980, and oversized overcoats and raincoats. Impeccably tailored, with faltering cut, easy lines, and subtle textures, patterns, and colors, he introduced twists such as low-slung button placement on double-breasted suits for men and experimental blends of fabrics such as viscose with wool or linen with silk.

Like his contemporaries in the industry, Armani diversified into jeans, undergarments, neckwear, golf apparel, accessories, fragrances, and more recently, cosmetics. With more than a dozen clothing lines, the quality has not diminished, merely attracted a wider clientèle which in turn attracted the notice of luxury conglomerates LVMH and Gucci Group. Both approached Armani with acquisitive offers, but he refused. "Of course, I was flattered," he told Richard Heller of Forbes (12 November 2001), "But I decided to keep my independence." He is, indeed, one of a disappearing breed, without stockholders or backers to answer to—rather, he has increasingly bought his licensees and brought most Armani brand in-house.

If ever there was a doubt about how the world felt about Armani and his contributions to fashion, they were completely dispelled in November 2000 when the Guggenheim Museum threw a lavish gala to mark the opening of its Giorgio Armani retrospective in New York. Covering 25 years of Armani creativity and featuring 400 garments, the exhibition attracted a glittering crowd including Hollywood celebrities, athletes, and musicians. Giorgio Armani, now and forever, represents the finest in elegant, sophisticated style.

—Caroline Cox; updated by Nelly Rhodes

ASHLEY, Laura

Welsh designer

Born: Laura Mountney in Dowlais, Glamorgan, Wales, 7 September 1925. Education: Attended Marshall's School, Merthyr Tydfil, Wales, until 1932; mainly self-taught in design. Military Service: Served in the Women's Royal Naval Service. Family: Married Bernard Ashley, 1949; children: Jane, David, Nick, and Emma. Career: Worked as secretary, National Federation of Women's Institutes, London, 1945–52; founder/partner, with Bernard Ashley, Ashley-Mountney Ltd. printed textiles, 1954–68, in Kent, 1956–61, and in Carno, Wales, from 1961; opened first retail outlet, London, 1967; Laura Ashley Ltd. established, 1968; Geneva and Amsterdam stores opened, 1972; Paris, 1973; first U.S. shop, San Francisco, 1974; New York store opened, 1977; son Nick Ashley took over as design director, 1984; Laura Ashley Foundation created, 1984; company went public, 1985; shops topped 550 shops in 63 countries, 1993; Bernard Ashley resigned from board, 1998; stake (40-percent) of company sold to Malaysian United Industries, 1998; North American stores sold, 1999; flagship Regent Street store redone and reopened, 2000; plans for 100 home furnishings initiated, 2001. Awards: Queen's award for Export Achievement, 1977; Bernard Ashley knighted, 1987. Died: 17 September 1985, in Coventry, England. Company Address: 27 Bagley's Lane, Fulham, London SW6 2QA, England. Company Website: www.lauraashley.com.

PUBLICATIONS

By ASHLEY:

Books

- Laura Ashley Home Furnishings 1981*, Carno, Wales, 1981.
- Laura Ashley Home Furnishings 1982*, Carno, Wales, 1982.
- Laura Ashley Home Furnishings 1983*, Carno, Wales, 1983.
- Laura Ashley Home Furnishings 1984*, Carno, Wales, 1984.
- Laura Ashley Home Decoration 1985*, Carno, Wales, 1985.
- Laura Ashley Book of Home Decorating* (with Elizabeth Dickson), Carno, Wales, London & New York, 1985, 1988, 1990, 1997.
- Laura Ashley Home Furnishings 1986*, Carno, Wales, 1986.
- Laura Ashley Home Furnishings 1987*, Carno, Wales, 1987.
- Laura Ashley Complete Guide to Home Decorating*, Carno, Wales, 1987.
- Laura Ashley at Home: Six Family Homes and Their Transformation* (with Nick Ashley), London, 1988.
- Laura Ashley Guide to Country Decorating* (with Lorrie Mack and Lucinda Edgerton), London, 1992.
- Leitch, Michael, The Laura Ashley Book of Anniversary Delights, 1993.
- Laura Ashley Decorating with Fabric: A Room-by-Room Guide to Home Decorating* (with Lorrie Mack and Diana Dodge), New York, 1995.
- Berry, Susan, Laura Ashley Decorating with Paper & Paint: A Room-by-Room Guide to Home Decorating, New York, 1995.
- , Laura Ashley: The Color Book, Using Color to Decorate Your Home, New York & London, 1995.
- Laura Ashley Decorating with Patterns & Textures: Using Color, Pattern, and Texture in the Home*, London, 1996.

On ASHLEY:Books

- Carter, Ernestine, Magic Names of Fashion, Englewood Cliffs, New Jersey, 1980.
- Dickson, Elizabeth, and Margaret Colvin, The Laura Ashley Book of Home Decorating, London, 1982; New York, 1984.
- Gale, Iain, and Susan Irvine, Laura Ashley Style, New York & London, 1987.
- Sebba, Anne, Laura Ashley: A Life by Design, London, 1990, 1991.
- Evans, John, and Gabrielle Stoddard, Laura Ashley: Fashion Designer, Caerdydd, Wales, 1996.
- Stegemeyer, Anne, Who's Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.

Articles

- "Queen Victorian," in Sophisticat (London), November 1974.
- "The Laura Ashley Look," in Brides (London), Spring 1975.
- Dumoulin, Marie-Claude, "Chez Laura Ashley," in Elle (Paris), 11 October 1976.
- Gould, Rachael, "From Patchwork to a Small Print to World Wide: How the Laura Ashley Family Business Grew Up," in Vogue (London), 15 April 1980.
- Cleave, Maureen, "Makers of Modern Fashion: Laura Ashley," in the Observer supplement, (London), 12 October 1980.
- Sheffield, Robert, "The Twist in the Tail," in Creative Review (London), January 1984.
- "Young Nick," in She (London), April 1984.
- "Cut From the Same Cloth as Mom and Dad, Laura Ashley's Kids Get All Wrapped Up in the Family Business," in People Weekly, 24 September 1984.
- Slesin, Suzanne, "Laura Ashley, British Designer, is Dead at 60," in the New York Times, 18 September 1985.
- Dickson, Elizabeth, "Laura Ashley: Her Life and Gifts, by Those Who Knew Her," in the Observer, 22 September 1985.
- Sulitzer, Paul-Loup, "Laura Ashley: Une impression d'éternité," in Elle (Paris), 4 August 1986.
- "The Ashley Empire," in the Sunday Express Magazine (London), 25 September 1988.
- Ducas, June, "Inside Story," in Woman's Journal (London), October 1988.
- "Laura Ashley, A Licensing Legend," in HFD—The Weekly Home Furnishings Newspaper, 26 December 1988.
- Finnerty, Anne, "Profile of Laura Ashley," in Textile Outlook International (London), January 1990.
- Fernaud, Dierdre, and Margaret Park, "After Laura," in the Sunday Times (London), 4 February 1990.
- Grieve, Amanda, "Clotheslines," in Harpers & Queen (London), April 1993.
- Bain, Sally, "Life Begins at 40 for Laura Ashley," in Marketing, 13 May 1993.
- Levine, Joshua, "Wilted Flowers: Laura Ashley Holdings Plc.," in Forbes, 10 April 1995.
- Flynn, Julia, "Giving Laura Ashley a Yank: Anne Iverson Has Restored Profits and Refocused on the Home," in Business Week, 27 May 1996.
- Lee, Julian, "The Floral Dance," in Marketing, 28 August 1997.
- White, Constance C.R., "A Makeover for Laura Ashley," in the New York Times, 19 May 1998.

- Hosenball, Mark, "Rendering Unto Laura," in Newsweek, 8 February 1999.
- Smith, Alison, "Laura Ashley Shows Flower Power," in the Financial Times, 27 May 2001.

* * *

Welsh designer Laura Ashley developed and distilled the British romantic style of neo-Victorianism, reflecting past eras in clothing, textiles, accessories, and furnishings and did so demonstrating classic country styling. Her approach to design was inspired by her environment, the surrounding Welsh countryside, and her yearning to return to all things natural. Integrating ideas adopted from the designs and qualities of past eras, she combined elements to create a look of nostalgic simplicity and naive innocence. Floral sprigged cotton fabrics, often directly adapted and developed from 18th- and 19th-century patterns, paisleys, and tiny prints worked with romantic detailing to create a style that was original and easily recognized.

Ashley's style possessed old world charm with individual rustic freshness, reflected in traditional beliefs of bygone days. Victorian nightshirts, Edwardian-style dresses, the introduction of the long smock in 1968, delicately trimmed with lace, pin-tucked bodices, tiered skirts, and full puffed sleeves became her trademark, aimed at the middle market and retailed at affordable prices. Laura Ashley Ltd. rose from the modest beginnings of a small cottage industry, producing a simple range of printed headscarves and table mats in the Ashley kitchen, to the development of a company that became a huge enterprise of international renown. It was a fairy story in itself.

Ashley's self-taught skill produced ranges of womenswear, childrenswear, bridalwear, accessories, and furnishings. She established home interiors consisting of coordinated ranges of bed linens, wall tiles, curtains, cushions, and upholstery. Her brilliant concept of fabrics, her discerning research of past eras for new inspiration, and her study and reinterpretation of antique textiles led to the considerable success and endurance of the Laura Ashley label.

Traditional floral prints combined together, printed in two colors and various color combinations, distinguished her work. Through the technical expertise and experimentation of Bernard Ashley, Laura's husband and business partner, came new developments and improved machinery, which in turn extended versatility. New and subtle color combinations were produced, often to Laura's own design. Natural fibres, crisp cottons, and lawn fabrics expanded to include ranges in twill, silk, wool, crêpe, velvet, corduroy, and eventually jersey fabrics.

Along with the 1960s youth revolution came a move towards romanticism, conservation, and world peace, an alternative to modern living, pop culture, mass-produced clothing, and vivid Parisian fashions. Due to her convincing beliefs in past values, quality, and the revival of romantic simplicity, Ashley's success was overwhelming. Bernard's business acuity and Laura's determination led to the development of excellent marketing techniques. Retail settings, complementary to the old world style of neo-Victorianism, promoted a look of individuality and quality.

Throughout the 1980s the Laura Ashley style retained its unique and easily recognizable image, even after the real Laura Ashley's tragic death, after a fall, in September 1985. The Ashleys' son, Nick, took over as design director in the year before his mother's death, and the Laura Ashley style evolved, extending to all ranges to incorporate contemporary fashion ideas, including the introduction of jersey for practical and easy-to-wear clothing. In addition to Nick, the other Ashley children, Jane, David, and Emma, all had roles within the family business.

In the 1990s the company lost its way; its lovely clothing was perceived as outdated and frumpy and the Laura Ashley image suffered considerably. Amid a series of executive changes, restructuring, and loss of market share in the years following founder Laura Ashley's death, the company finally regained its footing by retooling its image, updating its clothing, and expanding its home furnishings collection. A series of coffee-table books, which had been published annually in the late 1980s, grew to include how-to guides on home decorating in a myriad of styles from the Laura Ashley Guide to Country Decorating in 1992 to the Laura Ashley Decorating with Patterns & Textures: Using Color, Pattern, and Texture in the Home, in 1997.

Selling a 40-percent stake in the company to Malaysia United Industries in 1998, for $74 million, gave Laura Ashley a desperately needed infusion of cash. Next came the difficult decision to close many of its manufacturing facilities in Wales, then the sale of its underperforming North American stores to an investor group funded by Mayalsia United. By the start of the 21st century, Laura Ashley's Regent Street flagship store had reopened after a ceiling to floor refurbishment, and the company announced plans for its own website as well as opening 100 home furnishings stores by 2005. Rejuvenated and in the black after years of losses, Laura Ashley has regained its status, rediscovered its identity, and repositioned its signature style.

—Carol Mary Brown; updated by Nelly Rhodes

AUJARD, Christian

French designer

Born: Brittany in 1945. Family: Married Michele Domercq, 1972; children: Richard, Giles. Career: Worked as a delivery boy, stock clerk, then financial manager for Charles Maudret wholesale ready-to-wear firm, 1964–67; formed own ready-to-wear company with Michele Aujard, 1968; firm carried by Michele after Christian's death, 1977; first freestanding boutique opened, Paris, 1978; company purchased by Société Bic, 1983; fashions manufactured and distributed by Guy Laroche, and licensed to Japan's Itokin Group. Died: 8 March 1977, in Paris.

PUBLICATIONS

On AUJARD:

Articles

- Hyde, Nina, "Continuing the Aujard Collection," in the Washington Post, 23 September 1978.
- "Christian Aujard," in Sir, February 1982.
- Palmieri, Jean E., "Barneys New York; Pioneering Designer Names for More Than Thirty Years," in DNR, 1 June 1995.
- D'Aulnay, Sophie, "Alain Adjadj's Single-Minded Approach to French Retailing," in DNR, 7 August 1995.
- Bow, Josephine, "The China Challenge: What it Takes to Enter Retailing in the World's Largest Potential Consumer Market," in Women's Wear Daily, 22 July 1997.

* * *

From the moment Christian Aujard premiered his first women's ready-to-wear collection in Paris, his designs were acclaimed for their youthful appeal, vibrant colors, and lively prints. The Aujard label quickly became recognized for its fresh attitude toward contemporary, updated sportswear. Aujard's first collection, directed towards the young, fashion-conscious consumer, successfully blended both classic and innovative elements into chic, wearable clothes, and thus instantly established his talent among the fashion world.

Michele Domercq, a former art student, began as Christian Aujard's designer of silks before becoming his wife and business partner. Combining her styling skills with his vision, the couple's ready-to-wear line for women took off as it was eagerly embraced by upmarket retailers, first in Europe and then in America. Aujard won acclaim for his upbeat attitude toward the tried-and-true, with youthful trench coats, blazers, trousers, pleated skirts, and shirtdresses. The clothes were tailored but relaxed, with features like elasticized waistbands and dolman sleeves that allowed ease of movement. Detailing was a focus, with interesting yokes and seams, and fagoting was a favored trim. Another Aujard hallmark was his use of natural fibers. Cotton, cashmere, linen, silk, wool tweed, crepe, and mohair—all found expression, as in his soft beige Honan silk blouson sweater and trousers of 1972.

In the 1960s and 1970s when women began to ask for access to the power traditionally enjoyed by men, designers answered with menswear styles for women, and Aujard's lines were no exception. But his menswear-inspired designs remained resolutely feminine, as seen in the bestselling Officer's Pantsuit. This ensemble, a double-breasted blazer over wide-legged trousers in a navy/white nautical palette, transformed the notion of an authoritative military uniform into a charming, yet provocative daytime look. Aujard also won much attention for his man-tailored oxford cloth shirts, crisp shirtdresses in dotted silk and wrinkled linen, and his double-faced beige wool wrap coat which reversed to tweed.

Women's eveningwear included elegant, refined short cocktail dresses of silk inset with bands of lace. The special domain of Michele, the silk clothes for evening were so successful she spun off a separate label under her own name. It was understood between the couple that Christian designed daywear and Michele designed eveningwear, and they often did not see each other's collections until they premiered.

Aujard ventured into men's ready-to-wear a few years after his womenswear. The collections for men featured both dress suits and casual separates, and continued the philosophy of elegant simplicity updated with youthful vigor. Vibrant, rich color, lively patterns, and prints became a signature, allowing men a wide range of fashion expression. Checks mixed with plaids and houndstooths, bright dotted patterns, and unexpected combinations created a cheerful, yet sophisticated look. In menswear, Aujard's typical attention to detail, use of fine materials, and witty attitude could be translated into a glamorous double-breasted suit of unexpected and dazzling white wool.

At the time of her husband's accidental death in March 1977, Michele took over the business and continued designing under the Christian Aujard name. At first she did not change the spirit of the Aujard collections, but by the late 1970s the lines were totally of her design. For both mens and womenswear she favored a mixture of textures and a palette of soft, saturated hues. Muted colors were chosen so that separates—jackets, sweaters, shirts, trousers, or skirts—would all coordinate. Crisp lines gave way to less constructed pieces

Ashley children, Jane, David, and Emma, all had roles within the family business.

In the 1990s the company lost its way; its lovely clothing was perceived as outdated and frumpy and the Laura Ashley image suffered considerably. Amid a series of executive changes, restructuring, and loss of market share in the years following founder Laura Ashley's death, the company finally regained its footing by retooling its image, updating its clothing, and expanding its home furnishings collection. A series of coffee-table books, which had been published annually in the late 1980s, grew to include how-to guides on home decorating in a myriad of styles from the Laura Ashley Guide to Country Decorating in 1992 to the Laura Ashley Decorating with Patterns & Textures: Using Color, Pattern, and Texture in the Home, in 1997.

Selling a 40-percent stake in the company to Malaysia United Industries in 1998, for $74 million, gave Laura Ashley a desperately needed infusion of cash. Next came the difficult decision to close many of its manufacturing facilities in Wales, then the sale of its underperforming North American stores to an investor group funded by Mayalsia United. By the start of the 21st century, Laura Ashley's Regent Street flagship store had reopened after a ceiling to floor refurbishment, and the company announced plans for its own website as well as opening 100 home furnishings stores by 2005. Rejuvenated and in the black after years of losses, Laura Ashley has regained its status, rediscovered its identity, and repositioned its signature style.

—Carol Mary Brown; updated by Nelly Rhodes

AUJARD, Christian

French designer

Born: Brittany in 1945. Family: Married Michele Domercq, 1972; children: Richard, Giles. Career: Worked as a delivery boy, stock clerk, then financial manager for Charles Maudret wholesale ready-to-wear firm, 1964–67; formed own ready-to-wear company with Michele Aujard, 1968; firm carried by Michele after Christian's death, 1977; first freestanding boutique opened, Paris, 1978; company purchased by Société Bic, 1983; fashions manufactured and distributed by Guy Laroche, and licensed to Japan's Itokin Group. Died: 8 March 1977, in Paris.

PUBLICATIONS

On AUJARD:

Articles

- Hyde, Nina, "Continuing the Aujard Collection," in the Washington Post, 23 September 1978.
- "Christian Aujard," in Sir, February 1982.
- Palmieri, Jean E., "Barneys New York; Pioneering Designer Names for More Than Thirty Years," in DNR, 1 June 1995.
- D'Aulnay, Sophie, "Alain Adjadj's Single-Minded Approach to French Retailing," in DNR, 7 August 1995.
- Bow, Josephine, "The China Challenge: What it Takes to Enter Retailing in the World's Largest Potential Consumer Market," in Women's Wear Daily, 22 July 1997.

* * *

From the moment Christian Aujard premiered his first women's ready-to-wear collection in Paris, his designs were acclaimed for their youthful appeal, vibrant colors, and lively prints. The Aujard label quickly became recognized for its fresh attitude toward contemporary, updated sportswear. Aujard's first collection, directed towards the young, fashion-conscious consumer, successfully blended both classic and innovative elements into chic, wearable clothes, and thus instantly established his talent among the fashion world.

Michele Domercq, a former art student, began as Christian Aujard's designer of silks before becoming his wife and business partner. Combining her styling skills with his vision, the couple's ready-to-wear line for women took off as it was eagerly embraced by upmarket retailers, first in Europe and then in America. Aujard won acclaim for his upbeat attitude toward the tried-and-true, with youthful trench coats, blazers, trousers, pleated skirts, and shirtdresses. The clothes were tailored but relaxed, with features like elasticized waistbands and dolman sleeves that allowed ease of movement. Detailing was a focus, with interesting yokes and seams, and fagoting was a favored trim. Another Aujard hallmark was his use of natural fibers. Cotton, cashmere, linen, silk, wool tweed, crepe, and mohair—all found expression, as in his soft beige Honan silk blouson sweater and trousers of 1972.

In the 1960s and 1970s when women began to ask for access to the power traditionally enjoyed by men, designers answered with menswear styles for women, and Aujard's lines were no exception. But his menswear-inspired designs remained resolutely feminine, as seen in the bestselling Officer's Pantsuit. This ensemble, a double-breasted blazer over wide-legged trousers in a navy/white nautical palette, transformed the notion of an authoritative military uniform into a charming, yet provocative daytime look. Aujard also won much attention for his man-tailored oxford cloth shirts, crisp shirtdresses in dotted silk and wrinkled linen, and his double-faced beige wool wrap coat which reversed to tweed.

Women's eveningwear included elegant, refined short cocktail dresses of silk inset with bands of lace. The special domain of Michele, the silk clothes for evening were so successful she spun off a separate label under her own name. It was understood between the couple that Christian designed daywear and Michele designed eveningwear, and they often did not see each other's collections until they premiered.

Aujard ventured into men's ready-to-wear a few years after his womenswear. The collections for men featured both dress suits and casual separates, and continued the philosophy of elegant simplicity updated with youthful vigor. Vibrant, rich color, lively patterns, and prints became a signature, allowing men a wide range of fashion expression. Checks mixed with plaids and houndstooths, bright dotted patterns, and unexpected combinations created a cheerful, yet sophisticated look. In menswear, Aujard's typical attention to detail, use of fine materials, and witty attitude could be translated into a glamorous double-breasted suit of unexpected and dazzling white wool.

At the time of her husband's accidental death in March 1977, Michele took over the business and continued designing under the Christian Aujard name. At first she did not change the spirit of the Aujard collections, but by the late 1970s the lines were totally of her design. For both mens and womenswear she favored a mixture of textures and a palette of soft, saturated hues. Muted colors were chosen so that separates—jackets, sweaters, shirts, trousers, or skirts—would all coordinate. Crisp lines gave way to less constructed pieces in yielding fabrics like wool challis and satin. And while styling and managing the Aujard lines, Michele Aujard continued to oversee her own label.

The Aujard name continued to thrive as Michele invested ordinary styles with new life. For menswear she created wildly patterned waistcoats and drapey pleated pants, and she let color loose, using daring palettes considered taboo for men. She might mix violet, red, and emerald with gray, or playfully contrast textures, as in a rust tweed blazer against a persimmon satin shirt. Casual separates, such as a royal blue sport jacket over pale lemon trousers, glowed with intensity and radiated novelty, so that perceived boundaries between appropriate colors for men and women were blurred. The sweater woven with painterly motifs in brilliant color combinations also became a hallmark of Aujard.

The company's formula for success was its ability to push fashion limits while essentially remaining within the boundaries of convention. The Christian Aujard label has stood for sophisticated, affordable, and stylishly upbeat ready-to-wear clothing for men and women. On the label's longevity, French retailer Alain Adjadj told the Daily News Record (7 August 1995) sophisticated brands like Georges Rech and Christian Aujard, if marketed properly could certainly "relaunch the men's apparel business in France and [create] a worldwide boom."

—Kathleen Paton; updated by Sydonie Benét

AYTON, Sylvia

British designer

Born: Ilford, Essex, England, 27 November 1937. Education: Attended Walthamstow School of Art, 1953–57, and the Royal College of Art, London, 1957–60. Career: Freelance design work from 1959–63 included B.E.A. air hostess uniforms, 1959, clothing for B. Altman and Co. (New York), Count Down and Pallisades stores (London); worked at Costume Museum, Bath, England, 1960; designed hats for film Freud, 1960; formed partnership with Zandra Rhodes to open Fulham Road Clothes Shop, London, 1964; outerwear designer for the Wallis Fashion Group, Ltd., London, from 1969; freelance designer and pattern cutter for Keith Taylor, Ltd., London, 1975–80; part-time lecturer at Kingston Polytechnic (London), 1961–65, Ravensbourne College of Art and Design (London), 1961–67, Middlesex Polytechnic 1967–71; also external assessor for B.A. (Honors) fashion and textile courses, from 1976. Awards: Fellow, Royal Society of Arts, 1986; awarded MBE (Member of the British Empire), 1990. Address: c/o The Wallis Fashion Group Ltd., 22 Garrick Industrial Centre, Garrick Road, Hendon, London NW9 6AQ, England.

PUBLICATIONS

On AYTON:

Books

Mulvagh, Jane, Vogue History of Twentieth-Century Fashion, London, 1988.

Lebenthal, Joel, Radical Rags: Fashions of the 1960s, New York, 1990.

Debrett's People of Today, London, 1991.

Articles

Palen, Brenda, "Fashion on Fire," in The Guardian (London), September 1984.

Sinha, Pammi, and Chris Rivlin, "Describing the Fashion Design Process," [conference paper for the Second European Academy of Design Conference], Stockholm, 1997.

*

I design for a chain of High Street shops, so I sell to a very wide range of customers who expect well-designed, well-made and well-priced garments.

The coats and raincoats I design must be extremely "wantable." My aim is to make thousands of women feel wonderful by providing garments that are not too boring, too safe, or too extreme but sharp, minimal, very functional, uncontrived, all very easy but with an element of surprise. I am a perfectionist. I care desperately about the shapes and proportions of my designs. I care about every detail, every stitch, button, and buckle. If the design is easy on my eye, it will also please my customer.

I don't design to a theme or for myself. Most of my ideas evolve from season to season, or a new idea just flashes into my head. I am very aware of my customers' lifestyle, and, as fashion is constantly evolving, I must be aware of the changing needs of women, and yet remain creative, experimental, and forward thinking. I design for a type of woman, not for an age group, and I become that woman as I design. I believe there are basically three types of women—the feminine woman, the classic woman, the fashion woman—and I feel she stays that type all of her life, whether she is 16 or 60.

I adore designing. I am always enthusiastic about my work, and get great joy from seeing so many women wearing my clothes. It is my job and my joy to make her feel good and very special, and to encourage her to return to the shops to buy again and again.

—Sylvia Ayton

* * *

The name Sylvia Ayton probably means little to most British women, yet for the last several decades she has had a significant influence on what they wear. As outerwear designer for the Wallis Fashion Group, Ltd., Ayton produced fashion ranges in good quality fabrics at reasonable prices. Over the years, her coats and suits gained a rightful place in the forefront of High Street fashion.

Ayton's original ambition was to make women feel wonderful and special, as if each one were a "fairy princess." She dressed her first "fairy princesses" in the 1960s when she worked with Zandra Rhodes, Marion Foale, and Sally Tuffin. Some were private customers, but to her surprise, Ayton found that working for one person did not always provide satisfaction. During her career, she found the greatest fulfillment in designing a coat that will give pleasure to nearly 5,000 women. At Wallis, she produced two annual outerwear collections, mainly coats and suits. The cloth provided the starting point; each season came new fabrics and colors yet they had to be the right quality in yielding fabrics like wool challis and satin. And while styling and managing the Aujard lines, Michele Aujard continued to oversee her own label.

The Aujard name continued to thrive as Michele invested ordinary styles with new life. For menswear she created wildly patterned waistcoats and drapey pleated pants, and she let color loose, using daring palettes considered taboo for men. She might mix violet, red, and emerald with gray, or playfully contrast textures, as in a rust tweed blazer against a persimmon satin shirt. Casual separates, such as a royal blue sport jacket over pale lemon trousers, glowed with intensity and radiated novelty, so that perceived boundaries between appropriate colors for men and women were blurred. The sweater woven with painterly motifs in brilliant color combinations also became a hallmark of Aujard.

The company's formula for success was its ability to push fashion limits while essentially remaining within the boundaries of convention. The Christian Aujard label has stood for sophisticated, affordable, and stylishly upbeat ready-to-wear clothing for men and women. On the label's longevity, French retailer Alain Adjadj told the Daily News Record (7 August 1995) sophisticated brands like Georges Rech and Christian Aujard, if marketed properly could certainly "relaunch the men's apparel business in France and [create] a worldwide boom."

—Kathleen Paton; updated by Sydonie Benét

AYTON, Sylvia

British designer

Born: Ilford, Essex, England, 27 November 1937. Education: Attended Walthamstow School of Art, 1953–57, and the Royal College of Art, London, 1957–60. Career: Freelance design work from 1959–63 included B.E.A. air hostess uniforms, 1959, clothing for B. Altman and Co. (New York), Count Down and Pallisades stores (London); worked at Costume Museum, Bath, England, 1960; designed hats for film Freud, 1960; formed partnership with Zandra Rhodes to open Fulham Road Clothes Shop, London, 1964; outerwear designer for the Wallis Fashion Group, Ltd., London, from 1969; freelance designer and pattern cutter for Keith Taylor, Ltd., London, 1975–80; part-time lecturer at Kingston Polytechnic (London), 1961–65, Ravensbourne College of Art and Design (London), 1961–67, Middlesex Polytechnic 1967–71; also external assessor for B.A. (Honors) fashion and textile courses, from 1976. Awards: Fellow, Royal Society of Arts, 1986; awarded MBE (Member of the British Empire), 1990. Address: c/o The Wallis Fashion Group Ltd., 22 Garrick Industrial Centre, Garrick Road, Hendon, London NW9 6AQ, England.

PUBLICATIONS

On AYTON:

Books

Mulvagh, Jane, Vogue History of Twentieth-Century Fashion, London, 1988.

Lebenthal, Joel, Radical Rags: Fashions of the 1960s, New York, 1990.

Debrett's People of Today, London, 1991.

Articles

Palen, Brenda, "Fashion on Fire," in The Guardian (London), September 1984.

Sinha, Pammi, and Chris Rivlin, "Describing the Fashion Design Process," [conference paper for the Second European Academy of Design Conference], Stockholm, 1997.

*

I design for a chain of High Street shops, so I sell to a very wide range of customers who expect well-designed, well-made and well-priced garments.

The coats and raincoats I design must be extremely "wantable." My aim is to make thousands of women feel wonderful by providing garments that are not too boring, too safe, or too extreme but sharp, minimal, very functional, uncontrived, all very easy but with an element of surprise. I am a perfectionist. I care desperately about the shapes and proportions of my designs. I care about every detail, every stitch, button, and buckle. If the design is easy on my eye, it will also please my customer.

I don't design to a theme or for myself. Most of my ideas evolve from season to season, or a new idea just flashes into my head. I am very aware of my customers' lifestyle, and, as fashion is constantly evolving, I must be aware of the changing needs of women, and yet remain creative, experimental, and forward thinking. I design for a type of woman, not for an age group, and I become that woman as I design. I believe there are basically three types of women—the feminine woman, the classic woman, the fashion woman—and I feel she stays that type all of her life, whether she is 16 or 60.

I adore designing. I am always enthusiastic about my work, and get great joy from seeing so many women wearing my clothes. It is my job and my joy to make her feel good and very special, and to encourage her to return to the shops to buy again and again.

—Sylvia Ayton

* * *

The name Sylvia Ayton probably means little to most British women, yet for the last several decades she has had a significant influence on what they wear. As outerwear designer for the Wallis Fashion Group, Ltd., Ayton produced fashion ranges in good quality fabrics at reasonable prices. Over the years, her coats and suits gained a rightful place in the forefront of High Street fashion.

Ayton's original ambition was to make women feel wonderful and special, as if each one were a "fairy princess." She dressed her first "fairy princesses" in the 1960s when she worked with Zandra Rhodes, Marion Foale, and Sally Tuffin. Some were private customers, but to her surprise, Ayton found that working for one person did not always provide satisfaction. During her career, she found the greatest fulfillment in designing a coat that will give pleasure to nearly 5,000 women. At Wallis, she produced two annual outerwear collections, mainly coats and suits. The cloth provided the starting point; each season came new fabrics and colors yet they had to be the right quality and price. These were used to create garments both fashionable but realistic—the typical Wallis customer was Ms. Average, but each woman had her own personality and lifestyle.

Ayton believed it most useful to divide women by type, rather than age group, categorizing them as “feminine,” “classic,” or “fashionable” types. This guided her attitude to her collections and dictated shapes and details. Each season, there were the classics: wool velour winter coats, gabardine trench styles, blousons. Of course there were always new ideas, unexpected twists, trims, or fabrics or completely experimental designs manufactured in small numbers for a few outlets. Alpaca wool coats, for example, were a luxury item featured only in a small number of shops. Ayton continually checked what customer were buying, and weekly sales figures provided an important guide. Sales influenced her ideas as much as the latest design intelligence.

Ayton has always been a realist who knows that business awareness is essential for a designer. This lesson was first learned in the 1960s when she opened the Fulham Road Clothes Shop with Zandra Rhodes, creating garments from fabric designed and printed by Rhodes. The press loved them, but their lack of backers, finance, and business sense proved fatal. For later designing, she thought like a buyer: pragmatic in seeking the best quality at a sensible price.

Ayton has worked unstintingly with British fashion design courses to instill high standards and to provide students with a realistic view of the industry. Annually, she organized placements in the Wallis design studio and pattern cutting rooms. Upholding standards is, in her view, essential. Having found her “fairy princess,” she has spent years trying to teach young designers how to do the same.

Ayton visits Wallis clothing stores as often as possible to observe customers for herself, making her better able to create clothing for them when she returns to the design studio. She also collects fashion magazines from around the world and attends fabric fairs, usually in Europe, to keep at the forefront of the industry. Yet Ayton was never overly concerned with drawing up the newest, wildest outerwear on the market; instead, she focused on what clients will purchase. Her design process is cyclical, building upon the previous season as well as the last cold-weather season. She loses no time in warm weather, always looking ahead, researching markets and materials for the coming season as soon as production has begun on her previous work.

Working exclusively for a company label meant Ayton’s name was not used to sell her designs. Her work, however, did not go unnoticed. She has received many awards, including the MBE for her services to fashion. The accolades are well deserved: as a designer Ayton has the right combination of qualities. She is a perfectionist and an idealist, but one with a very firm grasp of reality.

—Hazel Clark; updated by Carrie Snyder

AZAGURY, Jacques

French fashion designer working in London

Born: Casablanca, Morocco, 1956. Education: Studied at London College of Fashion, 1972–73; completed education at St. Martin’s School of Art, London. Career: Worked for dress company in London’s East End, 1972; began own business, 1975 (closed after one year; opened again, 1977); joined London Design Collections, 1978; judge, J&B Rare Designers Award, South Africa, 1997. Address: 50 Knightsbridge, London SW1, England.

PUBLICATIONS

On AZAGURY:

Articles

- “How the Glamour Boys Are You,” in Cosmopolitan (London), December 1987.
- Dutt, Robin, “Jacques Azagury,” in Clothes Show (London), April/May 1990.
- Rodgers, Toni, “Double Vision,” in Elle (London), March 1991.
- “Relative Values,” in the Sunday Times Magazine (London), 29 August 1993.
- Watson, Ines, “Designs for High Living,” in Dispatch, 12 December 1997.

* * *

Jacques Azagury is a designer of spectacular eveningwear for such high-profile clients as the Duchess of Kent, Joan Collins, Madonna, Emma Thompson, Elizabeth Taylor, Demi Moore, and Britain’s First Lady, Cherie Blair. Azagury’s reputation was enhanced when the late Diana, Princess of Wales, began to favor his designs. His glamorous style was perhaps best epitomized by the princess in the summer of 1994 when she walked out of the Ritz Hotel in London, to be met by the glare of the awaiting paparazzi, in a stunning Azagury black, graphite, and bugle bead sheath with sensuous side split.

Glamor and exoticism have always been part of the Azagury mystique. Born in Casablanca in 1956, he describes this environment as being exactly like a Hollywood film set. The precedent set by Ingrid Bergman in the film Casablanca or Lauren Bacall in To Have and Have Not established a culture that demanded a fabulously chic approach to dress. This was the ideal breeding ground for a fledgling fashion designer, and Azagury often attributes his sources of inspiration to a collection of photographs of his mother and her friends, lunching and partying in chic Casablanca style.

The Azagury family moved to London in the early 1960s so the children could benefit from an English education. His enthusiasm for fashion and style eventually led Jacques to study the subject at St. Martin’s College of Art in London, which he entered at the young age of 13; after graduating, he quickly established his own label. Browns in London was one of the first high-fashion retail outlets to place an order. Joan Burstein, the owner of the boutique, recognized that the Azagury signature had an individual sophistication and luxury that easily complemented the slick appeal of her other labels, such as Claude Montana or Thierry Mugler.

Azagury began his own retail operation in London’s Knightsbridge. As well as specializing in exclusive cocktail and special occasion wear for private clients, he also sells pieces to other fashion stores and top couture retailers throughout the UK. The operation is as chic as any Parisian couture salon and was complemented by Azagury’s sister, Elizabeth, and her exclusive floristry business, Azagury Fleurs, which is run from the basement of the shop. His brother’s shoe design label, Joseph Azagury, is run from premises nearby.

Azagury does not design for one particular type of woman, preferring to appeal to a huge cross-section from the ages of 13 to 60. He is adamant that what a woman does not want when purchasing eveningwear is fancy dress. Some eveningwear designers layer sequins, frills, ruching, and draping to create an overstated, unflattering fantasy, but Azagury uses sequins and frills with taste and and price. These were used to create garments both fashionable but realistic—the typical Wallis customer was Ms. Average, but each woman had her own personality and lifestyle.

Ayton believed it most useful to divide women by type, rather than age group, categorizing them as “feminine,” “classic,” or “fashionable” types. This guided her attitude to her collections and dictated shapes and details. Each season, there were the classics: wool velour winter coats, gabardine trench styles, blousons. Of course there were always new ideas, unexpected twists, trims, or fabrics or completely experimental designs manufactured in small numbers for a few outlets. Alpaca wool coats, for example, were a luxury item featured only in a small number of shops. Ayton continually checked what customer were buying, and weekly sales figures provided an important guide. Sales influenced her ideas as much as the latest design intelligence.

Ayton has always been a realist who knows that business awareness is essential for a designer. This lesson was first learned in the 1960s when she opened the Fulham Road Clothes Shop with Zandra Rhodes, creating garments from fabric designed and printed by Rhodes. The press loved them, but their lack of backers, finance, and business sense proved fatal. For later designing, she thought like a buyer: pragmatic in seeking the best quality at a sensible price.

Ayton has worked unstintingly with British fashion design courses to instill high standards and to provide students with a realistic view of the industry. Annually, she organized placements in the Wallis design studio and pattern cutting rooms. Upholding standards is, in her view, essential. Having found her “fairy princess,” she has spent years trying to teach young designers how to do the same.

Ayton visits Wallis clothing stores as often as possible to observe customers for herself, making her better able to create clothing for them when she returns to the design studio. She also collects fashion magazines from around the world and attends fabric fairs, usually in Europe, to keep at the forefront of the industry. Yet Ayton was never overly concerned with drawing up the newest, wildest outerwear on the market; instead, she focused on what clients will purchase. Her design process is cyclical, building upon the previous season as well as the last cold-weather season. She loses no time in warm weather, always looking ahead, researching markets and materials for the coming season as soon as production has begun on her previous work.

Working exclusively for a company label meant Ayton’s name was not used to sell her designs. Her work, however, did not go unnoticed. She has received many awards, including the MBE for her services to fashion. The accolades are well deserved: as a designer Ayton has the right combination of qualities. She is a perfectionist and an idealist, but one with a very firm grasp of reality.

—Hazel Clark; updated by Carrie Snyder

AZAGURY, Jacques

French fashion designer working in London

Born: Casablanca, Morocco, 1956. Education: Studied at London College of Fashion, 1972–73; completed education at St. Martin’s School of Art, London. Career: Worked for dress company in London’s East End, 1972; began own business, 1975 (closed after one year; opened again, 1977); joined London Design Collections, 1978; judge, J&B Rare Designers Award, South Africa, 1997. Address: 50 Knightsbridge, London SW1, England.

PUBLICATIONS

On AZAGURY:

Articles

- “How the Glamour Boys Are You,” in Cosmopolitan (London), December 1987.
- Dutt, Robin, “Jacques Azagury,” in Clothes Show (London), April/May 1990.
- Rodgers, Toni, “Double Vision,” in Elle (London), March 1991.
- “Relative Values,” in the Sunday Times Magazine (London), 29 August 1993.
- Watson, Ines, “Designs for High Living,” in Dispatch, 12 December 1997.

* * *

Jacques Azagury is a designer of spectacular eveningwear for such high-profile clients as the Duchess of Kent, Joan Collins, Madonna, Emma Thompson, Elizabeth Taylor, Demi Moore, and Britain’s First Lady, Cherie Blair. Azagury’s reputation was enhanced when the late Diana, Princess of Wales, began to favor his designs. His glamorous style was perhaps best epitomized by the princess in the summer of 1994 when she walked out of the Ritz Hotel in London, to be met by the glare of the awaiting paparazzi, in a stunning Azagury black, graphite, and bugle bead sheath with sensuous side split.

Glamor and exoticism have always been part of the Azagury mystique. Born in Casablanca in 1956, he describes this environment as being exactly like a Hollywood film set. The precedent set by Ingrid Bergman in the film Casablanca or Lauren Bacall in To Have and Have Not established a culture that demanded a fabulously chic approach to dress. This was the ideal breeding ground for a fledgling fashion designer, and Azagury often attributes his sources of inspiration to a collection of photographs of his mother and her friends, lurching and partying in chic Casablanca style.

The Azagury family moved to London in the early 1960s so the children could benefit from an English education. His enthusiasm for fashion and style eventually led Jacques to study the subject at St. Martin’s College of Art in London, which he entered at the young age of 13; after graduating, he quickly established his own label. Browns in London was one of the first high-fashion retail outlets to place an order. Joan Burstein, the owner of the boutique, recognized that the Azagury signature had an individual sophistication and luxury that easily complemented the slick appeal of her other labels, such as Claude Montana or Thierry Mugler.

Azagury began his own retail operation in London’s Knightsbridge. As well as specializing in exclusive cocktail and special occasion wear for private clients, he also sells pieces to other fashion stores and top couture retailers throughout the UK. The operation is as chic as any Parisian couture salon and was complemented by Azagury’s sister, Elizabeth, and her exclusive floristry business, Azagury Fleurs, which is run from the basement of the shop. His brother’s shoe design label, Joseph Azagury, is run from premises nearby.

Azagury does not design for one particular type of woman, preferring to appeal to a huge cross-section from the ages of 13 to 60. He is adamant that what a woman does not want when purchasing eveningwear is fancy dress. Some eveningwear designers layer sequins, frills, ruching, and draping to create an overstated, unflattering fantasy, but Azagury uses sequins and frills with taste and discretion. The clothes never make major fashion statements but veer instead toward the classic and flattering. Their innovation and style come from Azagury's respect for cut and fit, and he devotes a great deal of time to getting this right.

In an article by Ines Watson (Dispatch, 12 December 1997), Azagury commented that Mrs. Blair, one of his most visible clients, "has great presence. She's now looking better than ever, she's affectionate, loves people and is always ready and willing to take suggestions." He reserves his deepest respect for the late Princess of Wales, of whom he said, "Dressing her was the highlight of my career. She was the most undemanding client and the best model that any designer could have. She was truly a lovely person, a gorgeous woman who will never be replaced. She would often phone me after an event where she wore one of my dresses, just to thank me. There aren't many people like that."

Azagury has survived and flourished in the ever-changing world of fashion because he insists upon perfect workmanship and continues to appeal to a broad-based international clientele. He told Watson, "I found a great need for formal eveningwear that doesn't make the woman look like a grandmother. My designs are elegant and glamorous, yet they are still young." Additionally, he says he chooses only the best fabrics and never uses synthetics.

The Azagury family are a closely linked unit. As well as Elizabeth, two other sisters, Solange and Sylvia, and their father are involved in the companies. Creatively, what links the family together and motivates it is a united quest for design perfection. Grown-up, sexy sophistication sums up Jacques Azagury's style—never extreme but exquisitely made and fitted, whether it be a short, silver sequin cocktail dress, a crossover blouse in peacock silk, or a fabulously expensive full-length evening gown. Azagury never wants to compromise his look. "I don't like to see my clothes worn with other things," he declared in a Clothes Show magazine interview. He is protective of his designer's vision and does not want his customer to make sartorial mistakes, which epitomizes his continuing pursuit of chic and glamor in special occasion dressing.

—Kevin Almond; updated by Sally A. Myers

AZRIA, Max

American designer

Born: 1 January 1949, Sfax, Tunisia. Education: Dropped out of school to become a fashion entrepreneur. Career: Manufactured a variety of contemporary women's lines in Paris, 1970–81; founder/chief designer, Jess (U.S. retail stores carrying French-inspired women's ready-to-wear apparel), 1982–88; president/designer, and owner of BCBG Max Azria Group, including BCBG Max Azria (women's and men's designer label), Hervé Léger (French couture and deluxe ready-to-wear label), Parallel (contemporary label), and To The Max (young contemporary/better junior label), from 1989. Awards: California Designer of the Year, 1995; Atlanta Designer of the Year, 1996; Fashion Performance award, 1997; Seat on the Council of Fashion Designers of America, 1998; Divine Design's Women's Designer of the Year, 1998; Otis College of Art and Design's Fashion Achievement award, 2000; Top 50 Private Companies in Los Angeles, Los Angeles Business Journal, 2000. Website: www.BCBG.com.

Max Azria, designed for BCBG Max Azria's 2000 collection: silk chiffon dress with an organdy hat. © AP/Wide World Photos.

PUBLICATIONS

On AZRIA:

Books

- Kronzek, Lynn C., Los Angeles: Place of Possibilities, Carlsbad, California, 1998.
 Abramson, Susan, and Marcie Stuchin, Shops & Boutiques 2000, Glen Cover, New York, 1999.

Articles

- "To the Max," in Women's Wear Daily, 23 September 1998.
 Fox, Marissa, "Celebrities Put the Pizazz in New York Fashion Shows," in Chicago Tribune, 16 September 1999.
 Servin, James, "Mad Max," in Harper's Bazaar, October 1999.
 Davis, Boyd, "BCBG Max Azria," online at www.FashionWindows.com, 25 October 1999.
 Dam, Julie K. L., and Samantha Miller, "The Max Factor," in People, 22 November 1999.

discretion. The clothes never make major fashion statements but veer instead toward the classic and flattering. Their innovation and style come from Azagury's respect for cut and fit, and he devotes a great deal of time to getting this right.

In an article by Ines Watson (Dispatch, 12 December 1997), Azagury commented that Mrs. Blair, one of his most visible clients, "has great presence. She's now looking better than ever, she's affectionate, loves people and is always ready and willing to take suggestions." He reserves his deepest respect for the late Princess of Wales, of whom he said, "Dressing her was the highlight of my career. She was the most undemanding client and the best model that any designer could have. She was truly a lovely person, a gorgeous woman who will never be replaced. She would often phone me after an event where she wore one of my dresses, just to thank me. There aren't many people like that."

Azagury has survived and flourished in the ever-changing world of fashion because he insists upon perfect workmanship and continues to appeal to a broad-based international clientele. He told Watson, "I found a great need for formal eveningwear that doesn't make the woman look like a grandmother. My designs are elegant and glamorous, yet they are still young." Additionally, he says he chooses only the best fabrics and never uses synthetics.

The Azagury family are a closely linked unit. As well as Elizabeth, two other sisters, Solange and Sylvia, and their father are involved in the companies. Creatively, what links the family together and motivates it is a united quest for design perfection. Grown-up, sexy sophistication sums up Jacques Azagury's style—never extreme but exquisitely made and fitted, whether it be a short, silver sequin cocktail dress, a crossover blouse in peacock silk, or a fabulously expensive full-length evening gown. Azagury never wants to compromise his look. "I don't like to see my clothes worn with other things," he declared in a Clothes Show magazine interview. He is protective of his designer's vision and does not want his customer to make sartorial mistakes, which epitomizes his continuing pursuit of chic and glamor in special occasion dressing.

—Kevin Almond; updated by Sally A. Myers

AZRIA, Max

American designer

Born: 1 January 1949, Sfax, Tunisia. Education: Dropped out of school to become a fashion entrepreneur. Career: Manufactured a variety of contemporary women's lines in Paris, 1970–81; founder/chief designer, Jess (U.S. retail stores carrying French-inspired women's ready-to-wear apparel), 1982–88; president/designer, and owner of BCBG Max Azria Group, including BCBG Max Azria (women's and men's designer label), Hervé Léger (French couture and deluxe ready-to-wear label), Parallel (contemporary label), and To The Max (young contemporary/better junior label), from 1989. Awards: California Designer of the Year, 1995; Atlanta Designer of the Year, 1996; Fashion Performance award, 1997; Seat on the Council of Fashion Designers of America, 1998; Divine Design's Women's Designer of the Year, 1998; Otis College of Art and Design's Fashion Achievement award, 2000; Top 50 Private Companies in Los Angeles, Los Angeles Business Journal, 2000. Website: www.BCBG.com.

Max Azria, designed for BCBG Max Azria's 2000 collection: silk chiffon dress with an organdy hat. © AP/Wide World Photos.

PUBLICATIONS

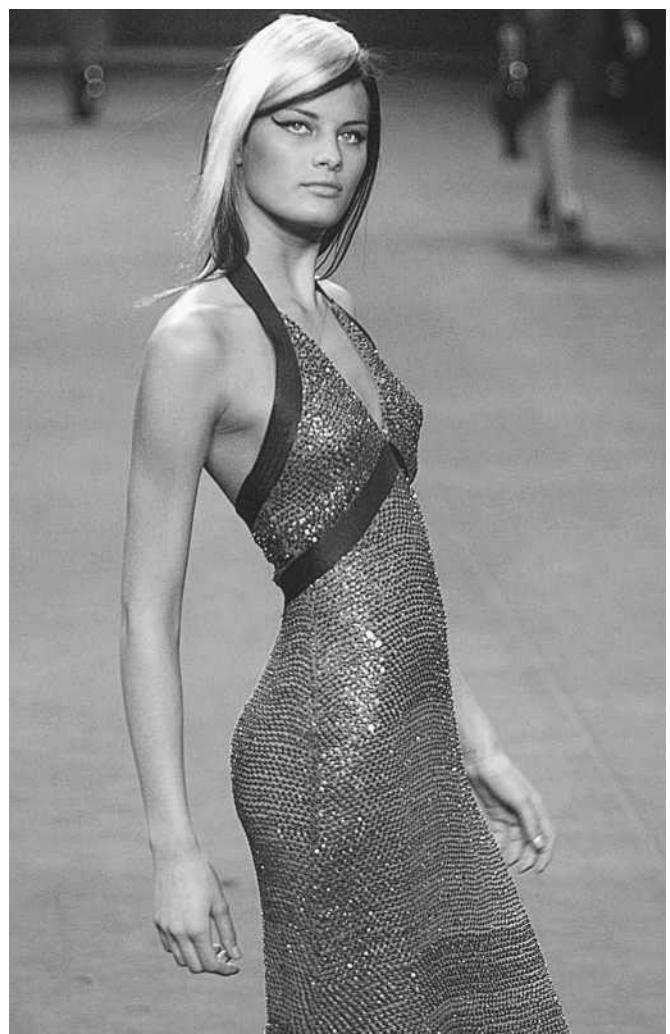

On AZRIA:

Books

- Kronzek, Lynn C., Los Angeles: Place of Possibilities, Carlsbad, California, 1998.
 Abramson, Susan, and Marcie Stuchin, Shops & Boutiques 2000, Glen Cover, New York, 1999.

Articles

- "To the Max," in Women's Wear Daily, 23 September 1998.
 Fox, Marissa, "Celebrities Put the Pizazz in New York Fashion Shows," in Chicago Tribune, 16 September 1999.
 Servin, James, "Mad Max," in Harper's Bazaar, October 1999.
 Davis, Boyd, "BCBG Max Azria," online at www.FashionWindows.com, 25 October 1999.
 Dam, Julie K. L., and Samantha Miller, "The Max Factor," in People, 22 November 1999.

Max Azria, designed for BCBG Max Azria's fall 2001 collection: silk chiffon beaded dress. © AFP/CORBIS.

Morgan, Erinn, "Bon Chic, Bon Genre: A Conversation With Max Azria," at www.2020mag.com, 1999.

* * *

Longtime entrepreneur Max Azria began his career in his adopted hometown of Paris in 1970 by designing a line of women's wear. In 1981 Azria moved to the U.S. and in 1982 launched Jess, a series of new-concept retail boutiques whose goal was to introduce chic French fashion to American women. By the time he launched the design house BCBG Max Azria in 1989, Azria had gained expertise in all aspects of the fashion business, including retail operations, accounting and finance, production, sales, merchandising, and design.

BCBG Max Azria is the means through which Azria has fulfilled a revolutionary goal: bringing high-style, high-quality fashions to American women at a fraction of the typical four-figure price. Named for the French phrase bon chic, bon genre (Parisian slang meaning "good style, good attitude"), Azria's brashness in building a global fashion empire in Los Angeles instead of New York can be interpreted as distinctly American. Observers have long commented on Azria's seemingly uncanny ability to make major fashion ideas accessible to the general marketplace.

Azria claims not to have had a mentor within the industry; however, he does cite two major design influences. "Audrey Hepburn's chic, clean, sophisticated style has been a continuous inspiration for my collections," he says. "Los Angeles itself is also one of my biggest influences. The city is the center of so many industries—entertainment, music and technology—that there is always something new to inspire me. This inspiration could be literal, like a specific film, or more general, like the continuous sunshine."

In true entrepreneurial fashion, Azria launched BCBG Max Azria with a handful of clothing items. Early successes included novel cashmere sweater sets and baby-doll dresses. Since then, he has developed a diverse array of collections for women, including evening dresses, denim, footwear, eyewear, swimwear, intimates, handbags, and small leather goods. For men, Azria has created casual wear, suits, outerwear, and footwear. In 2001, Azria announced a partnership with global consumer-product manufacturer Unilever to introduce a collection of fragrance and beauty products under the BCBG Max Azria label.

Azria has also diversified his holdings via branding in an attempt to become a true life-cycle nameplate—his customers range in age from 15 to about 60. In 1996, he launched To The Max, a junior sportswear line, and relaunched Parallel, a contemporary line. With his 1998 acquisition of Hervé Léger—known for its beautiful, seductive couture and deluxe ready-to-wear—Azria became the first American designer to own a major French couturier. In 2000, he formed a strategic alliance with Procter & Gamble to revitalize Rodeo Drive's unofficial landmark, Giorgio Beverly Hills. Azria now controls the boutique's retail operations and has created a more focused merchandising concept for upscale retailer.

Azria has become something of a retail giant. As of 2001, the company operated more than 150 of its own retail outlets worldwide. BCBG Max Azria's collections are sold in specialty stores throughout North America, as well as in in-store shops in major department stores, including Neiman Marcus, Bloomingdale's, Nordstrom, and Macy's.

Although Azria has always been happy to rely on celebrity customers—and there are many—to further his wares, he has also mastered another important tool in today's self-promotion arsenal: product placement. The stars of television shows as Ally McBeal, Sex in the City, Friends, and Buffy the Vampire Slayer are regularly seen sporting BCBG Max Azria apparel. Ironically, his core 25- to 40-year-old customers may tune out these television shows, but they're still buying Azria's designs. Azria singles out as his main competition some true fashion behemoths: Donna Karan, Calvin Klein, Ralph Lauren, Prada, LVMH, and the Gucci Group. These choices may evoke images of Azria playing David to the industry's Goliaths, but consider just how far BCBG Max Azria has come in little more than a decade. His rare combination of aggressive pricing, fresh interpretations of major trends, and effective self-promotion indicate that Azria will likely be able to go the distance with even his fiercest competitors.

—Darcy Lewis

B

B., AGNÈS

See AGNÈS B.

BACHELLERIE, Marithé

See GIRBAUD, Marithé & François

BADGLEY MISCHKA

American design team

Established: New York, in 1988, by Mark Badgley and James Mischka. Badgley born in East Saint Louis, Illinois, 12 January 1961; raised in Oregon; studied business, University of Southern California, to 1982; graduated from Parsons School of Design, New York, 1985. Mischka born in Burlington, Wisconsin, 23 December 1960; studied management and art history, Rice University, Houston, Texas, to 1982; graduated from Parsons School of Design, 1985. Before forming own company, Badgley designed for Jackie Rogers and Donna Karan, New York, 1985–88; Mischka designed for Willi Smith, New York, 1985–88. Company History: Acquired by Escada USA, 1992; introduced bridalwear, 1996; launched footwear line, 1999; opened first store, Beverly Hills, 2000. Awards: Mouton Cadet Young Designer award, 1989; Dallas International Apparel Mart Rising Star award, 1992; Marymount Designer[s] of the Year, 2001. Company Address: 525 Seventh Avenue, New York, NY 10018, U.S.A.

PUBLICATIONS

On BADGLEY MISCHKA:

Books

Stegemeyer, Anne, Who's Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.

Articles

Starzinger, Page Hill, "New Faces," in Vogue, March 1990.

"Badgley Mischka: A Single Focus," in Women's Wear Daily, 4 June 1990.

Kazanjian, Dodie, "Little Black Dress," in Vogue (New York), July 1991.

Badgley Mischka, fall 2001 collection: gold sparkle top over a leather skirt. © AP/Wide World Photos.

Lear, Frances, "Relevant Dress," in Lear's (New York), September 1991.

Barbee, Pat, "Glamor Boys: Badgley Mischka," in Beverly Hills 213 (Los Angeles), 21 July 1993.

Friedman, Arthur, "Badgley Mischka: Into the Day," in Women's Wear Daily, 12 April 1994.

Torkells, Erik, "The Night is Young," in Town & Country, September 1994.

"Not Your Everyday Bride," in Women's Wear Daily, 11 December 1998.

Badgley Mischka, spring 2001 collection: silver sequined gown.
© AP/Wide World Photos.

- Boehning, Julie, "Lasting Charm: Badgley Mischka...," in Footwear News, 19 July 1999.
- Young, Kristin, "Beverly Hills Opening for Badgley Mischka," in Women's Wear Daily, 8 June 2000.
- "High Spirits...Badgley Mischka Got a Bit Lighter and Sportier," in Women's Wear Daily, 20 September 2000.
- Jensen, Tanya, "Badgley Mischka's Midas Touch," from Fashion Wire Daily, 30 April 2001.
- Ramey, Joanna, "Badgley, Mischka Honored in Washington," in Women's Wear Daily, 2 May 2001.

* * *

Designers Mark Badgley and James Mischka have said of their clothing, "one zip and you're glamorous." Their clothing radiates youthful confidence; fanciful but realistic, their designs recall the elegance of an age when one dressed for evening. The two young designers, who introduced their first collection in 1988 under the label Badgley Mischka in New York, have made glamour attainable by demystifying and simplifying it.

Uptown diners and downtown executives alike find something appropriate and pleasing in Badgley Mischka designs. Evening suits and dresses are refined and uncontrived—form-fitting wool jersey, cotton brocade, faille, embroidered lace, silk, and baby bouclé are used to create suits with long fitted jackets and pencil-thin or swingy full short skirts. One versatile wool jersey dress, perfect for career dressing, looks like two pieces, with a rib knit turtleneck and either a permanently pleated or straight wrap skirt, in gray or pale yellow.

The combination of fine crisp and softly draping fabrics (bouclé and silk, velvet trimmed wool, organza and silk chiffon) adds dimension and drama. Fitted, empire, or lowered, waistlines are superbly shaped. Expertly mixed cocktail dresses—with evocative cocktail names such as the Tom Collins, the Delmonico, the Bacardi—are off-the-shoulder, décolleté, bowed, lacy, or beaded and above the knee. All are subtly provocative, feminine, and flirtatious. Their bridal gowns cause women to swoon, such as the V-backed ivory lace and silk-crêpe dress, or the off-white silk brocade coatdress, with front wrap and jeweled buttons. Badgley Mischka bridal dresses are for the grown-up sweet tooth, confections allowing the beauty of the wearer to shine through the frills.

In July 1991 Vogue's Dodie Kazanjian looked to six designers (including Bill Blass, Donna Karan, and Michael Kors) for the perfect "little black dress," and found it at Badgley Mischka. Frances Lear, writing in Lear's (September 1991), also chose a Badgley Mischka wool jersey as the magazine's "Relevant Dress," calling it "reminiscent of other seminal dresses, yet perfectly contemporary...as comfortable as your own skin." Such is the unerring sense of ease and balance in Badgley Mischka designs—they create something expertly vital without superfluidity or trendiness.

Lilly Daché, the great stylemaker of the 1950s once said, "real fashion begins with simplicity," and Badgley and Mischka employ this mandate, creating clothing that is not only beautifully made but beautiful to wear. By the end of the 20th century the designing duo dominated the eveningwear market, and had begun to make their mark on the bridalwear. Introduced in 1996, their gowns won raves from critics, stores, and brides-to-be.

In addition to eveningwear and bridal gowns, Badgley Mischka wanted to carve a niche in hip streetwear as well. While critics and celebrities crammed the runway for their opulently beaded gowns, many had little interest for the designers' more casual creations. Yet by 2000 their "tough chic" separates in colorful leather with chunky belts and bikerish cool garnered notice. Women's Wear Daily (20 September 2000) enthused, "Mark Badgley and James Mischka have lightened their touch considerably.... Hemlines rose, shapes got sportier and...though the overall effect was more buoyant, their signature sophistication remained. And it was nowhere more apparent than in the white leather-wrapped miniskirt worn with a gold knit t-shirt...and the flirty gold-accented halter dress—all of which fit to perfection."

Another milestone for the designers was opening their first store, in Beverly Hills, in fall 2000. The stylish Rodeo Drive boutique featured all of their signature creations, including their new footwear collection, launched the year before. The designers had plans for additional stores in New York and Florida, and had been negotiating a licensing agreement for a signature fragrance as well. And as if several starlets wearing their wares for the Academy Awards wasn't enough, Badgley and Mischka were awarded the Marymount Designer of the Year award from Marymount University in May 2001.

—Jane Burns; updated by Brian Louwers and Nelly Rhodes

BALENCIAGA, Cristobal

Spanish designer

Born: Guetaria, San Sebastian, 21 January 1895. Education: Studied needlework and dressmaking with his mother until 1910. Career: Established tailoring business, with sponsorship of the Marquesa de Casa Torres, San Sebastian, 1915–21; founder/designer, Elsa fashion house, Barcelona, 1922–31, and Madrid, 1932–37; director, Maison Balenciaga, Paris, 1937–40, 1945–68; spent war years in Madrid; fragrances include le Dix, 1948, Quadreille, 1955, and Pour Homme, introduced by House of Balenciaga, 1990; couture house closed, 1968; retired to Madrid, 1968–72; House of Balenciaga managed by German group Hoechst, 1972–86; Jacques Bogart S.A. purchased Balenciaga Couture et Parfums, 1986; couture discontinued and ready-to-wear collection launched under designer Michel Goma, 1987; reopening of Balenciaga stores launched, 1989; Josephus Melchior Thimister takes over as head designer, 1992–97; Balenciaga name rejuvenated with Nicolas Ghesquière as head designer, from 1997. Exhibitions: Balenciaga, Bellerive Museum, Zurich, 1970; Fashion: An Anthology, Victoria & Albert Museum, London, 1971; The World of Balenciaga, Metropolitan Museum of Art, New York, Cristobal Balenciaga, spring 2001 collection. © AP/Wide World Photos/Fashion Wire Daily.

1973; El Mundo de Balenciaga, Palacio de Bellas Artes, Madrid, 1974; Hommage à Balenciaga, Musée Historique des Tissus, Lyon, 1985; Balenciaga, Fashion Institute of Technology, New York, 1986; Cristobal Balenciaga, Fondation de la Mode, Tokyo, 1987; Hommage to Balenciaga, Palacio de la Virreina, Barcelona, and Palacio Miramar, San Sebastian, Spain, 1987. Awards: Chevalier de la Légion d'Honneur; named Commander, L'Ordre d'Isabelle-la-Catholique. Died: 23 March 1972, in Valencia, Spain. Company Address: 12 rue François 1er, 75008, Paris, France. Company Website: www.balenciaga.net.

PUBLICATIONS

On BALENCIAGA:

Books

- Lyman, Ruth, Paris Fashion: The Great Designers and Their Creations, London, 1972.
 Vreeland, Diana, The World of Balenciaga (exhibition catalogue), Metropolitan Museum of Art, New York, 1973.
 Milbank, Caroline Rennolds, Couture: The Great Designers, New York, 1985.
 Musée Historique des Tissus, Hommage à Balenciaga (exhibition catalogue), Lyon, 1985.
 Fondation de la Mode, Tokyo, and Musée de la Mode et du Costume, Palais Galliera, Cristobal Balenciaga (exhibition catalogue), Paris & Tokyo, 1987.
 Jouve, Marie-Andrée, and Jacqueline Demornex, Balenciaga, New York, 1989.
 Howell, Georgina, Sultans of Style: 30 Years of Fashion and Passion 1960–1990, London, 1990.
 Healy, Robin, Balenciaga: Masterpieces of Fashion Design, Melbourne, 1992.
 Stegemeyer, Anne, Who's Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.
 Jouve, Marie-Andrée, Balenciaga, New York, 1997.

Articles

- “Cristobal Balenciaga,” [obituary] in the New York Times, 25 March 1972.
 “Cristobal Balenciaga: A Most Distinguished Couturier of His Time,” in The Times (London), 25 March 1972.
 Berenson, Ruth, “Balenciaga at the Met,” in National Review (New York), 31 August 1973.
 Mulvagh, Jane, “The Balenciaga Show,” in Vogue (London), March 1985.
 “Homage to Balenciaga,” in Art and Design, October 1985.
 Savage, Percy, “Balenciaga the Great,” in the Observer (London), 13 October 1985.
 Braux, Diane de, “L’Exposition en hommage à Balenciaga,” in Vogue (Paris), December/January 1985/86.
 “Nostra Leone: Grande esposizione consacrata a Balenciaga,” in Vogue (Milan), February 1986.
 Martin, Richard, “Balenciaga,” in American Fabrics and Fashions (New York), September/October 1986.
 Koda, Harold, “Balenciaga and the Art of Couture,” in Threads (Newtown, Connecticut), June/July 1987.
 Paquin, Paquita, “Le Ceremonial de Cristobal Balenciaga,” in Vogue (Paris), November 1988.

Design by Cristobal Balenciaga, 1954. © Bettmann/CORBIS.

Baudet, Francois, "Leur maître à tous," in Elle (Paris), 19 December 1988.

McDowell, Colin, "Balenciaga: The Quiet Revolutionary," in Vogue (London), June 1989.

Howell, Georgina, "Balenciagas Are Forever," in the Sunday Times Magazine (London), 23 July 1989.

Auchincloss, Eve, "Balenciaga: Homage to the Greatest," in Connoisseur (New York), September 1989.

Morera, Daniela, "Balenciaga lo charme del silenzio: Il grande couturier spagnolo," in Vogue (Milan), September 1990.

Drake, Laurie, "Courreges and Balenciaga: Some of the Best Spring Fashion Bears the Signature—or the Spirit—of Two Great Designers," in Vogue, March 1991.

White, Edmund, "Cristobal Balenciaga: The Spanish Master at La Reynerie," in Architectural Digest, October 1994.

Horyn, Cathy, "Filling Balenciaga's Shoes a Hard Row to Clothe," in Chicago Tribune, 2 December 1999.

* * *

Cristobal Balenciaga's primary fashion achievement was in tailoring, the Spanish-born couturier was a virtuoso in knowing, comforting, and flattering the body. He could demonstrate tailoring proficiency in a tour de force one-seam coat, its shaping created from the innumerable darts and tucks shaping the single piece of fabric. His consummate tailoring was accompanied by a pictorial imagination that encouraged him to appropriate ideas of kimono and sari, return to the Spanish vernacular dress of billowing and adaptable volume, and create dresses with arcs that could swell with air as the figure moved. There was a traditional Picasso-Matisse question of postwar French fashion: who was greater, Dior or Balenciaga? Personal sensibility might support one or the other, but it is hard to imagine any equal to Balenciaga's elegance, then or since.

Balenciaga was a master of illusion. The waist could be strategically low, it could be brought up to the ribs, or it could be concealed in a tunic or the subtle opposition of a boxy top over a straight skirt. Balenciaga envisioned the garment as a three-dimensional form encircling the body, occasionally touching it and even grasping it, but also spiraling away so the contrast in construction was always between the apparent freedom of the garment and its body-defining moments. Moreover, he regularly contrasted razor-sharp cut, including instances of the garment's radical geometry, with soft fragile features.

A perfectionist who closed down his business in 1968 rather than see it be compromised in a fashion era he did not respect, Balenciaga projected ideal garments, but allowed for human imperfection. He was, in fact, an inexorable flatterer, a sycophant to the imperfect body. To throw back a rolled collar gives a flattering softness to the line of the neck into the body; his popular seven-eighths sleeve flattered women of a certain age, while the tent-like drape of coats and jackets were elegant on clients without perfect bodies. His fabrics had to stand up to his almost Cubist vocabulary of shapes, and he loved robust wools with texture, silk gazar for evening, corduroy (surprising in its inclusion in the couture), and textured silks.

Balenciaga's garments lack pretension; they were characterized by self-assured couture of simple appearance, austerity of details, and reserve in style. For the most part, the garments seemed simple. American manufacturers, for example, adored Balenciaga for his adaptability into simpler forms for the American mass market in suits and coats. The slight rise in the waistline at center front or the proportions of chemise tunic to skirt make Balenciaga clothing as harmonious as a musical composition, but the effect was always one of utmost insouciance and ease of style. Balenciaga delved deeply into traditional clothing, seeming to care more for regional dress than for any prior couture house.

As Marie-Andrée Jouve demonstrated in Balenciaga, (New York, 1989), his garments allude to Spanish vernacular costume and to Spanish art: his embroidery and jet-beaded evening coats, capelettes, and boleros are redolent of the torero, while his love of capes emanates from the romance of rustic apparel. Chemise, cape, and baby doll shapes might seem antithetical to the propensities of a master of tailoring, but Balenciaga's 1957 baby doll dress exemplifies the correlation he made between the two. The lace cage of the baby doll floats free from the body, suspended from the shoulders, but it is matched by the tailored dress beneath, providing a layered and analytical examination of the body within and the Cubist cone on the exterior, a tantalizing artistry of body form and perceived shape.

The principal forms for Balenciaga were the chemise, tunic, suit—with more or less boxy top—narrow skirt, and coats, often with astonishing sleeve treatments, suggesting an arm transfigured by the sculptor Brancusi into a puff or into almost total disappearance. Balenciaga perceived a silhouette that could be with or without arms, but never with the arms interfering. A famous Henry Clark photograph of a 1951 Balenciaga black silk suit focuses on silhouette: narrow and high waist with a pronounced flare of the peplum below and sleeves that billow from elbow to seven-eighths length; an Irving Penn photograph concentrates on the aptly named melon sleeve of a coat. Like a 20th-century artist, Balenciaga directed himself to a part of the body, giving us a selective, concentrated vision. His was not an all-over, all-equal vision, but a discriminating, problem-solving exploration of tailoring and picture-making details of dress. Balenciaga was so very like a 20th-century artist because in temperament, vocabulary, and attainment, he was one.

When Cristobal Balenciaga retired (though he briefly came out of retirement to design a wedding dress for Franco's granddaughter), his fashion empire was run by the German chemical group Hoechst. Balenciaga died in March 1972 and Hoechst managed the business until 1986 when Jacques Bogart S.A. acquired the company. Couture was discontinued in favor of ready-to-wear and the first Balenciaga collection, designed by Michel Goma, debuted in 1987. Over the next several years, the company began opening Balenciaga boutiques and brought in a new head designer, Josephus Thimister, in 1992. Dutch designer Thimister created predominately eveningwear and some Basque-flavored loungewear, but he left in 1997 and was replaced by a young designer named Nicolas Ghesquière.

Ghesquière had worked in Balenciaga's licensed clothing lines and while his ascension to head designer wasn't met with the enthusiasm of Givenchy's Alexander McQueen, or John Galliano taking over at Christian Dior, Ghesquière soon brought Balenciaga a welcome renaissance. His first collection, spring/summer 1998 attracted little attention, but his second showing garnered accolades from critics and fellow designers alike. Balenciaga in the 21st century is tremendously popular, featuring shades of original Cristobal Balenciaga designs with a Ghesquière twist. Sales under Ghesquière's reign have doubled in the last few years; the venerable Maison Balenciaga is alive and well, and its future is bright.

—Richard Martin; updated by Nelly Rhodes

BALMAIN, Pierre

French designer

Born: Saint-Jean-de-Maurienne, Savoie, 18 May 1914. Education: Studied architecture, École Nationale Supérieure des Beaux-Arts, Paris, 1933–34. Military Service: French Air Force, 1936–38, French Army Pioneer Corps, 1939–40. Career: Freelance sketch artist for Robert Piguet, Paris, 1934; assistant designer, Molyneux, Paris, 1934–38; designer, Lucien Lelong, Paris, 1939, 1941–45; founder/director, Maison Balmain, Paris, 1945–1982, Balmain Fashions, New York, 1951–55, Balmain Fashions, Caracas, 1954; director, Balmain S.A., Paris, 1977–82; ready-to-wear line launched, 1982; fragrances include Vent Vert, 1945, Jolie Madame, 1953, Miss Balmain, 1967, and Ivoire, 1980; fragrance business purchased by Revlon, 1960; also designed for the stage and films, from 1950. Company continued on

* * *

Cristobal Balenciaga's primary fashion achievement was in tailoring, the Spanish-born couturier was a virtuoso in knowing, comforting, and flattering the body. He could demonstrate tailoring proficiency in a tour de force one-seam coat, its shaping created from the innumerable darts and tucks shaping the single piece of fabric. His consummate tailoring was accompanied by a pictorial imagination that encouraged him to appropriate ideas of kimono and sari, return to the Spanish vernacular dress of billowing and adaptable volume, and create dresses with arcs that could swell with air as the figure moved. There was a traditional Picasso-Matisse question of postwar French fashion: who was greater, Dior or Balenciaga? Personal sensibility might support one or the other, but it is hard to imagine any equal to Balenciaga's elegance, then or since.

Balenciaga was a master of illusion. The waist could be strategically low, it could be brought up to the ribs, or it could be concealed in a tunic or the subtle opposition of a boxy top over a straight skirt. Balenciaga envisioned the garment as a three-dimensional form encircling the body, occasionally touching it and even grasping it, but also spiraling away so the contrast in construction was always between the apparent freedom of the garment and its body-defining moments. Moreover, he regularly contrasted razor-sharp cut, including instances of the garment's radical geometry, with soft fragile features.

A perfectionist who closed down his business in 1968 rather than see it be compromised in a fashion era he did not respect, Balenciaga projected ideal garments, but allowed for human imperfection. He was, in fact, an inexorable flatterer, a sycophant to the imperfect body. To throw back a rolled collar gives a flattering softness to the line of the neck into the body; his popular seven-eighths sleeve flattered women of a certain age, while the tent-like drape of coats and jackets were elegant on clients without perfect bodies. His fabrics had to stand up to his almost Cubist vocabulary of shapes, and he loved robust wools with texture, silk gazar for evening, corduroy (surprising in its inclusion in the couture), and textured silks.

Balenciaga's garments lack pretension; they were characterized by self-assured couture of simple appearance, austerity of details, and reserve in style. For the most part, the garments seemed simple. American manufacturers, for example, adored Balenciaga for his adaptability into simpler forms for the American mass market in suits and coats. The slight rise in the waistline at center front or the proportions of chemise tunic to skirt make Balenciaga clothing as harmonious as a musical composition, but the effect was always one of utmost insouciance and ease of style. Balenciaga delved deeply into traditional clothing, seeming to care more for regional dress than for any prior couture house.

As Marie-Andrée Jouve demonstrated in Balenciaga, (New York, 1989), his garments allude to Spanish vernacular costume and to Spanish art: his embroidery and jet-beaded evening coats, capelettes, and boleros are redolent of the torero, while his love of capes emanates from the romance of rustic apparel. Chemise, cape, and baby doll shapes might seem antithetical to the propensities of a master of tailoring, but Balenciaga's 1957 baby doll dress exemplifies the correlation he made between the two. The lace cage of the baby doll floats free from the body, suspended from the shoulders, but it is matched by the tailored dress beneath, providing a layered and analytical examination of the body within and the Cubist cone on the exterior, a tantalizing artistry of body form and perceived shape.

The principal forms for Balenciaga were the chemise, tunic, suit—with more or less boxy top—narrow skirt, and coats, often with astonishing sleeve treatments, suggesting an arm transfigured by the sculptor Brancusi into a puff or into almost total disappearance. Balenciaga perceived a silhouette that could be with or without arms, but never with the arms interfering. A famous Henry Clark photograph of a 1951 Balenciaga black silk suit focuses on silhouette: narrow and high waist with a pronounced flare of the peplum below and sleeves that billow from elbow to seven-eighths length; an Irving Penn photograph concentrates on the aptly named melon sleeve of a coat. Like a 20th-century artist, Balenciaga directed himself to a part of the body, giving us a selective, concentrated vision. His was not an all-over, all-equal vision, but a discriminating, problem-solving exploration of tailoring and picture-making details of dress. Balenciaga was so very like a 20th-century artist because in temperament, vocabulary, and attainment, he was one.

When Cristobal Balenciaga retired (though he briefly came out of retirement to design a wedding dress for Franco's granddaughter), his fashion empire was run by the German chemical group Hoechst. Balenciaga died in March 1972 and Hoechst managed the business until 1986 when Jacques Bogart S.A. acquired the company. Couture was discontinued in favor of ready-to-wear and the first Balenciaga collection, designed by Michel Goma, debuted in 1987. Over the next several years, the company began opening Balenciaga boutiques and brought in a new head designer, Josephus Thimister, in 1992. Dutch designer Thimister created predominately eveningwear and some Basque-flavored loungewear, but he left in 1997 and was replaced by a young designer named Nicolas Ghesquière.

Ghesquière had worked in Balenciaga's licensed clothing lines and while his ascension to head designer wasn't met with the enthusiasm of Givenchy's Alexander McQueen, or John Galliano taking over at Christian Dior, Ghesquière soon brought Balenciaga a welcome renaissance. His first collection, spring/summer 1998 attracted little attention, but his second showing garnered accolades from critics and fellow designers alike. Balenciaga in the 21st century is tremendously popular, featuring shades of original Cristobal Balenciaga designs with a Ghesquière twist. Sales under Ghesquière's reign have doubled in the last few years; the venerable Maison Balenciaga is alive and well, and its future is bright.

—Richard Martin; updated by Nelly Rhodes

BALMAIN, Pierre

French designer

Born: Saint-Jean-de-Maurienne, Savoie, 18 May 1914. Education: Studied architecture, École Nationale Supérieure des Beaux-Arts, Paris, 1933–34. Military Service: French Air Force, 1936–38, French Army Pioneer Corps, 1939–40. Career: Freelance sketch artist for Robert Piguet, Paris, 1934; assistant designer, Molyneux, Paris, 1934–38; designer, Lucien Lelong, Paris, 1939, 1941–45; founder/director, Maison Balmain, Paris, 1945–1982, Balmain Fashions, New York, 1951–55, Balmain Fashions, Caracas, 1954; director, Balmain S.A., Paris, 1977–82; ready-to-wear line launched, 1982; fragrances include Vent Vert, 1945, Jolie Madame, 1953, Miss Balmain, 1967, and Ivoire, 1980; fragrance business purchased by Revlon, 1960; also designed for the stage and films, from 1950. Company continued on after his death in 1982. Exhibitions: Pierre Balmain: 40 années de création, Musée de la Mode et du Costume, Palais Galliera, Paris, 1985–86. Awards: Neiman Marcus award, Dallas, 1955; Knight of the Order of Dannebrog, Copenhagen, 1963; Cavaliere Ufficiale del Merito Italiano, Rome, 1966; Officier de la Légion d'Honneur, 1978; Vermillion Medal, City of Paris. Died: 29 June 1982, in Paris. Company Address: 44 rue François-1er, 75008 Paris, France.

Pierre Balmain, fall/winter 2000–01 haute couture collection: fringed transparent top over silver metallic pants designed by Oscar de la Renta. © AFP/CORBIS.

PUBLICATIONS

By BALMAIN:

Books

My Years and Seasons, London, 1964.

On BALMAIN:

Books

Latour, Anny, Kings of Fashion, London, 1958.

Lynam, Ruth, ed., Paris Fashion: The Great Designers and Their Creations, London, 1972.

Pierre Balmain, fall/winter 2001–02 ready-to-wear collection: knit top and embroidered skirt. © AP/Wide World Photos.

Milbank, Caroline Rennolds, Couture: The Great Designers, New York, 1985.

Musée de la Mode et du Costume, Pierre Balmain: 40 années de création, Paris, 1985.

Maeder, Edward, et al, Hollywood and History: Costume Design in Film, New York, 1987.

Guillen, Pierre-Yves, and Jacqueline Claude, The Golden Thimble: French Haute Couture, Paris, 1990.

Stegemeyer, Anne, Who's Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.

Articles

Verdier, Rosy, "Balmain: le décor total," in L'Officiel (Paris), April 1985.

"Le point sur les collections: Pierre Balmain," in L'Officiel (Paris), March 1986.

Janssen, Brigid, "A Fashionable Canadian Connection: Pierre Balmain's New Ownership," in Maclean's, 16 November 1987.

Duffy, Martha, "Mais oui! Oscar," in Time, 8 February 1993.

- Bowles, Hamish, "Well Suited: Balmain Collection by Oscar de la Renta," in Vogue, May 1993.
- Moukheiber, Zina, "The Face Behind the Perfume: Eric Fayer, Owner of Pierre Balmain," in Forbes, 27 September 1993.

* * *

French couturier Pierre Balmain believed "dressmaking is the architecture of movement." His mission, as he saw it, was to beautify the world like an architect, and the relationship between architecture and couture was emphasized throughout Balmain's career. He initially studied to be an architect, yet the beauty of couture, Balmain often argued, was when it was brought to life on the human form. He also believed "nothing is more important in a dress than its construction."

The House of Balmain opened, with great acclaim from the fashion press, in 1945. Alice B. Toklas wrote, "A dress is to once more become a thing of beauty, to express elegance and grace." Prior to opening his own house, Balmain apprenticed with couturier Edward Molyneux, in Paris, for five years. These years with Molyneux taught him about the business of couture, as Molyneux was at the height of his success during this time. Balmain defined him as a true creator and learned about the elegance of simplicity from Molyneux, which was so evident in Balmain's later designs under his own name.

After leaving Molyneux, Balmain joined the firm of Lucien Lelong, where he worked from 1939 to 1944 off and on during the war and the German Occupation. In 1941 the House of Lelong reopened and Pierre Balmain adjusting one of his evening dresses. © CORBIS.

Balmain returned to work with a newly hired designer, Christian Dior. Balmain credited himself with the now famous "New Look" and cited his first collection (1945), pictured in American Vogue, as evidence. These designs did illustrate the feminine silhouette of longer, bell-shaped, higher bustlines, narrow shoulders, and smaller waists. The collections of Jacques Fath and Balenciaga were also reflective of the New Look silhouette with which Christian Dior was ultimately credited.

Balmain believed that the ideal of elegance in clothing was achieved only through simplicity. He detested ornamentation for the sake of making a garment spectacular and offended the American fashion press by stating that Seventh Avenue fashion was vulgar. As a couturier he was not interested in fashion per se; rather he sought to dress women who appreciated an elegant appearance and possessed sophisticated style. Balmain once said, "Keep to the basic principles of fashion and you will always be in harmony with the latest trends without falling prey to them."

The basic Balmain silhouette for day was slim, with evening being full-skirted. He was credited with the popularization of the stole as an accessory for both day and evening. Balmain also used fur as trim throughout his collections. He was also remembered for his exquisite use of embroidered fabrics for evening.

After the war, Balmain toured the world giving lectures on the virtues of French fashion. He promoted the notion that French couture defined the ideal of elegance and refinement; his visits and lectures were intended to revive French haute couture, which had been virtually shut down during the war. As a result of Balmain's tours, he recognized the potential of the American market and opened a boutique in New York, offering his distinctly French fashions.

Balmain was one of the few French couturiers of his generation to also design for the theatre, ballet, and cinema, as well as for royalty. He was commissioned by Queen Sirikit of Thailand in 1960 to design her wardrobe for her official visit to the United States.

When Pierre Balmain died in 1982, his standards of elegance were still highly regarded in the world of couture. The tradition continued with Erik Mortensen, who had been with the company since the late 1940s, as head designer. In the late 1980s German-born Canadian financier Erich Fayer bought Ted Lapidus and perfumer Jacomo, then set his sights on Balmain. Fayer, along with Copeba, a Belgian investment firm, bought Balmain for around $30 million, which included reclaiming its fragrances from Revlon.

Fayer and Copeba soon parted ways after financial disputes and Fayer aggressively licensed the Balmain name, marketing champagne, rugs, furnishings, and virtually anything that could be sold under the Balmain brand. Balmain lost much of its cache, as well as many of its loyal customers and was put up for sale in 1989. Alain Chevalier bought Balmain in 1990 and brought in Hervé Pierre to lead the design team. After substantial losses and charges he looted the company of its assets, Fayer repurchased Balmain.

By late 1992 Balmain was poised for a welcome resurgence when American Oscar de la Renta was named its head designer. A star-studded gala in Paris marked de la Renta's official ascension to the post in January 1993, and his first collection for Balmain debuted the following February to rave reviews. Could an American designer bring the French Balmain back to its former glory in haute couture? Martha Duffy, writing for Time magazine in February 1993 said it succinctly, "If Balmain wants to catch up to the 1990s without leaping into the 21st century, the house made a very shrewd choice."

Balmain under the direction of de la Renta is a different couture house than when Pierre was at the helm, yet enduringly successful. The timeless elegance of Pierre Balmain's vision, however, lives on.

—Margo Seaman; updated by Nelly Rhodes

Articles also in Newsweek, 28 September 1987; DNR, 21 April 1988; Women's Wear Daily, 9 March 1989; and San Francisco Business Times, 18 August 2000.

* * *

BANANA REPUBLIC

American clothing store chain and mail order company

Founded: by Mel and Patricia Ziegler in Mill Valley, California, in 1978. Company History: First Banana Republic Travel Bookstore opened, San Francisco, 1978; Travel Bookstore Catalogue first published, 1986; quarterly travel magazine, Trips, introduced, 1987; business acquired by The Gap, Inc., 1983; founding partners Mel and Patricia Ziegler resigned from firm, 1988. Awards: Direct Mail Marketing Association Gold Echo award, 1985, 1986; American Catalogue Gold award, 1987. Company Address: 1 Harrison Street, San Francisco, California, 94105, USA. Company Website: www.bananarepublic.com.

PUBLICATIONS

On BANANA REPUBLIC:

Books

Ziegler, Patricia, and Mel Ziegler, Banana Republic Guide to Travel and Safari Clothing, New York, 1986.

Articles

Gammon, Clive, "Banana Republic's Survival Chic is Winning Bunches of Trendy Buyers," in Sports Illustrated (New York), 19 August 1985.

Weil, Henry, "Keeping Up with the (Indiana) Joneses," in Savvy (New York), February 1986.

Grossberger, Lewis, "Yes, Do We Have Bananas!?" in Esquire (New York), September 1986.

"From Jungle to Drawing Room," in the Economist (London), 14 March 1987.

"Banana Republic Founders Quit Firm," in Women's Wear Daily, 22 April 1988.

MacIntosh, Jeane, "Wall Street Eyes Banana Republic," Women's Wear Daily, 9 March 1989.

"Ripe Banana," in Women's Wear Daily, 17 March 1992.

Campbell, Roy H., "Banana Republic Stores Undergo a Fashion Makeover," Knight-Ridder/Tribune News Service, 10 December 1998.

Mullins, David Phillip, "Bananarama," Footwear News, 6 December 1999.

Tsui, Bonnie, "Banana Republic Bus Ad Campaign Shines," Crain's New York Business, 18 September 2000.

Jones, Rose Apodaca, "Messing With the Republic," Women's Wear Daily, 17 November 2000.

Banana Republic was a creative fashion adventure in the United States that began when writer Mel Ziegler needed a new jacket. He wanted one without extraneous zippers or buttons, and not made in bright-colored polyester. While on assignment in Sydney, Australia, he bought three British Burma jackets. His wife Patricia, an artist, restyled the three jackets into one, using the various parts to make necessary repairs. She added elbow patches, horn buttons, and a wood buckle. Friends and acquaintances liked Mel's "new" jacket and inquired about purchasing one. It seems other people wanted clothing that was usable and stylish, without designer labels. Seeing a potential market, the Zieglers set off in search of army surplus and other items that could be converted into usable clothing. They traveled to South America, Africa, London, and Madrid, searching out usable goods. According to their book Banana Republic Guide to Travel and Safari Clothing, their motto became, "in surplus we trust."

Banana Republic display window featuring two ensembles, 1998.
© Fashion Syndicate Press.

Balmain under the direction of de la Renta is a different couture house than when Pierre was at the helm, yet enduringly successful. The timeless elegance of Pierre Balmain's vision, however, lives on.

—Margo Seaman; updated by Nelly Rhodes

Articles also in Newsweek, 28 September 1987; DNR, 21 April 1988; Women's Wear Daily, 9 March 1989; and San Francisco Business Times, 18 August 2000.

* * *

BANANA REPUBLIC

American clothing store chain and mail order company

Founded: by Mel and Patricia Ziegler in Mill Valley, California, in 1978. Company History: First Banana Republic Travel Bookstore opened, San Francisco, 1978; Travel Bookstore Catalogue first published, 1986; quarterly travel magazine, Trips, introduced, 1987; business acquired by The Gap, Inc., 1983; founding partners Mel and Patricia Ziegler resigned from firm, 1988. Awards: Direct Mail Marketing Association Gold Echo award, 1985, 1986; American Catalogue Gold award, 1987. Company Address: 1 Harrison Street, San Francisco, California, 94105, USA. Company Website: www.bananarepublic.com.

PUBLICATIONS

On BANANA REPUBLIC:

Books

Ziegler, Patricia, and Mel Ziegler, Banana Republic Guide to Travel and Safari Clothing, New York, 1986.

Articles

Gammon, Clive, "Banana Republic's Survival Chic is Winning Bunches of Trendy Buyers," in Sports Illustrated (New York), 19 August 1985.

Weil, Henry, "Keeping Up with the (Indiana) Joneses," in Savvy (New York), February 1986.

Grossberger, Lewis, "Yes, Do We Have Bananas!?" in Esquire (New York), September 1986.

"From Jungle to Drawing Room," in the Economist (London), 14 March 1987.

"Banana Republic Founders Quit Firm," in Women's Wear Daily, 22 April 1988.

MacIntosh, Jeane, "Wall Street Eyes Banana Republic," Women's Wear Daily, 9 March 1989.

"Ripe Banana," in Women's Wear Daily, 17 March 1992.

Campbell, Roy H., "Banana Republic Stores Undergo a Fashion Makeover," Knight-Ridder/Tribune News Service, 10 December 1998.

Mullins, David Phillip, "Bananarama," Footwear News, 6 December 1999.

Tsui, Bonnie, "Banana Republic Bus Ad Campaign Shines," Crain's New York Business, 18 September 2000.

Jones, Rose Apodaca, "Messing With the Republic," Women's Wear Daily, 17 November 2000.

Banana Republic was a creative fashion adventure in the United States that began when writer Mel Ziegler needed a new jacket. He wanted one without extraneous zippers or buttons, and not made in bright-colored polyester. While on assignment in Sydney, Australia, he bought three British Burma jackets. His wife Patricia, an artist, restyled the three jackets into one, using the various parts to make necessary repairs. She added elbow patches, horn buttons, and a wood buckle. Friends and acquaintances liked Mel's "new" jacket and inquired about purchasing one. It seems other people wanted clothing that was usable and stylish, without designer labels. Seeing a potential market, the Zieglers set off in search of army surplus and other items that could be converted into usable clothing. They traveled to South America, Africa, London, and Madrid, searching out usable goods. According to their book Banana Republic Guide to Travel and Safari Clothing, their motto became, "in surplus we trust."

Banana Republic display window featuring two ensembles, 1998.
© Fashion Syndicate Press.

Display window at a Banana Republic store, 1998. © Fashion Syndicate Press.

At first they marketed their finds at flea markets, selling the surplus as it was or restyled. Basque sleeping bags became Basque sheepskin vests. Shirts with tattered collars were given new ones. Eventually the market grew so much the Zieglers moved into a storefront in Mill Valley, California. This became the second part of the Ziegler adventure in fashion and merchandising. Lacking funds for extensive decorating, they painted the walls in a zebra stripe, and added other decor to create the image of a jungle trading post. The background music was provided by their personal tapes of 1940s and 1950s jazz. The store was a dramatic, rather theatrical, setting for their surplus and redesigned articles of clothing.

The third part of this fashion adventure was the nontraditional catalogue the Zieglers developed to sell their product to both men and women. Again, due to limited funding, Patricia drew pictures of the clothes. Mel wrote text that went beyond bland descriptions of the clothes, to include their place of origin, or how to use the items.

Calling their enterprise Banana Republic to denote change, the Zieglers began a unique merchandising adventure. People liked the stylish, rugged surplus goods sold at relatively low cost. The business grew quickly, and in 1983 the Zieglers decided to sell Banana Republic to The Gap, Inc. The Gap provided the business know-how, which the Zieglers admittedly lacked, allowing the Zieglers to continue to concentrate on the creative end of the business, at which they excelled.

When demand outpaced the supply of surplus goods, Patricia designed clothing which was then manufactured for Banana Republic. The clothes and accessories were always stylish, comfortable, and high quality. The designs suggested travel, safari, and camping. The clothes were utilitarian, they could be dressed up or dressed down, and most articles were made of durable, natural, neutral-colored fabrics or fabrics that traveled well. Another likable feature of the company was customer service—free alterations were offered for much of the company's clothing. Walking into a Banana Republic store was like walking on to a movie set for a jungle outpost, an African hunting lodge, or British officers' club. Mock elephant tusks were hung and jeeps became part of the decor, as did old furniture and luggage. The Zieglers' original jazz collection was enhanced by animal sounds from the jungle.

The expanded catalogue had fashion descriptions written by a number of professional writers and journalists. The text included background stories, travel adventure vignettes, and endorsements written by famous people. Drawings were still used for the clothing but were now in color. In addition, photographs of people in various places, wearing the same or similar clothes were included. The catalogue had become an adventure to read.

Banana Republic emerged at a time when there was a general shift away from all-purpose department stores, towards smaller stores which concentrated on doing one thing well. They were one of the first stores to concentrate on clothing made of natural fabrics, in stylishly rugged designs. Catalogue selling was an integral part of their merchandising operation. Their customers were not concerned with the dictates of the fashion world. With Gap's input, sales increased dramatically and many new stores were opened. By 1986 Banana Republic was one of the hottest retail concepts, but the appeal for safari and khaki clothing was dwindling. By the end of the 1980s, new items, fabrics, and colors were introduced, but sales slowed even further and Gap announced plans to remodel and recreate all their stores. By early 1990 some of the stores were remodeled and stores were showing new merchandise. To maintain consumer traffic while changes took place, prices on remaining articles were substantially lowered and new merchandise was being introduced. New clothing, which featured brighter colors and a "cruise line" appeal were placed at the front of the store while the more traditional khaki apparel was placed in the back. Another big change was the disappearance of the theatrical props that had made the original stores unique.

With the changes, Banana Republic seemed to be back on track. The stores were less cluttered, were lighter and brighter, and the phrase, "Travel and Safari Clothing" was dropped from the name. Clothing articles included apparel for various occasions, including weekend wear, professional attire, and dressy casual items made of more luxuriant fabrics such as cashmere and suede. The change in decor, style, and fabrics was necessary given that many retailers were carrying travel-look attire such as cargo pants and Jeeps (or jeep-like vehicles) seemed to be parked in every other driveway. By the mid-1990s, following a growing trend, Banana Republic launched bath and body care products including a Banana Republic cologne and undergarments. Later, "whole concept stores" were created which included home accessories such as bedding, sofa pillows, candles, and picture frames. In 1996 Banana Republic opened stores exclusively for men and women.

In 1998 Banana Republic launched its most extensive marketing campaign, which included its first TV spots, print ads, magazine inserts, and outdoor kiosks. More interesting was the reintroduction of the catalogue—the first in over a decade. In addition to the catalogue, keeping customer service was kept in the forefront, with telephone order representatives called "style consultants." In the late 1990s, Banana Republic offered e-commerce, allowing customers to return articles at local stores rather than send them back through the post office. In 2000 Banana Republic reopened its flagship store in San Francisco on the corner of Grant Avenue and Sutter Street; this store offers valet parking, personal shoppers, and free cell-phone charging services.

Through Banana Republic, Mel and Patricia Ziegler filled a niche for comfortable, rugged, yet stylish clothes. They marketed their product through a catalogue that was interesting to read, and at stores that were an adventure to enter. Banana Republic has changed dramatically since the days when the Zieglers started the company;

however, keeping with their original intent, customers are offered quality items and where customer service is still important.

—Nancy House; updated by Christine Miner Minderovic

BANKS, Jeff

British designer, retailer, and entrepreneur

Born: Ebbw Vale, Wales, 1943. Education: Studied textile and interior design, Camberwell School of Art, 1959–62, and St. Martin's School of Art, 1962–64. Family: Married Sandy Shaw (divorced). Career: Opened first shop, Clobber, 1964; freelance designer, Liberty, London, and Rembrandt manufacturers, 1975–78; designed bed linen collection, 1978; launched Warehouse chain of stores, 1978; initiated Warehouse Utility Clothing Company catalogue, early 1980s; host and co-producer, The Clothes Show for BBC television; designed clothes care products for Dexam International, 1998; created uniforms for Boots the Chemist, 1998; designed jewelry line for G&A, 1999; launched exclusive jewelry through QVC, 2000; developed uniforms for Abbey National, 2000; designed fashion concept for Sainsbury's, 2000. Awards: Woman magazine British Fashion award, 1979, 1982. Address: 21 D'Arblay St., London W1V 3FN, England.

PUBLICATIONS

On BANKS:

Articles

- "Jeff Banks Designs," in the Sunday Times (London), 11 January 1976.
- McCartney, Margaret, "Mr. Banks Bounces Back," in the Sunday Times (London), 11 January 1976.
- McCormack, Mary, "Trend Setter," in Annabel (London), June 1983.
- "Behind the Scenes—Fashion Line-up: The Entrepreneur," in Living (London), October 1983.
- Hennessy, Val, "Banks, the Scruff Fashion Designer," in You, magazine of the Mail on Sunday (London), 11 December 1983.
- Brooks, Barry, "Banking on Fashion," in Creative Review (London), October 1984.
- "Influences: Jeff Banks," in Women's Journal (London), April 1985.
- Mower, Sarah, "Dennis and the Menace," in The Guardian (London), 9 January 1986.
- Rumbold, Judy, "Listening Banks," in Company (London), December 1986.
- Robson, Julia, "Will Men Buy It?" in the Sunday Telegraph Magazine (London), 9 August 1987.
- "Banks's Shock Exit," in Drapers Record (DR): The Fashion Business (London), 15 July 1989.
- Brennon, Steve, "Banking on the Future," in Fashion Weekly (London), 26 October 1989.
- McCooey, Meriel, "Be Prepared," in the Sunday Times Magazine (London), 15 April 1990.
- Tredre, Roger, "Out of the Warehouse and into the News," in The Independent (London), 5 May 1990.
- Barber, Richard, "Jeff Banks: Back Where He Belongs," in Clothes Show (London), March 1992.
- "Boots Banks on £5.5 Million New Look," in Community Pharmacy, December 1998.

background stories, travel adventure vignettes, and endorsements written by famous people. Drawings were still used for the clothing but were now in color. In addition, photographs of people in various places, wearing the same or similar clothes were included. The catalogue had become an adventure to read.

Banana Republic emerged at a time when there was a general shift away from all-purpose department stores, towards smaller stores which concentrated on doing one thing well. They were one of the first stores to concentrate on clothing made of natural fabrics, in stylishly rugged designs. Catalogue selling was an integral part of their merchandising operation. Their customers were not concerned with the dictates of the fashion world. With Gap's input, sales increased dramatically and many new stores were opened. By 1986 Banana Republic was one of the hottest retail concepts, but the appeal for safari and khaki clothing was dwindling. By the end of the 1980s, new items, fabrics, and colors were introduced, but sales slowed even further and Gap announced plans to remodel and recreate all their stores. By early 1990 some of the stores were remodeled and stores were showing new merchandise. To maintain consumer traffic while changes took place, prices on remaining articles were substantially lowered and new merchandise was being introduced. New clothing, which featured brighter colors and a "cruise line" appeal were placed at the front of the store while the more traditional khaki apparel was placed in the back. Another big change was the disappearance of the theatrical props that had made the original stores unique.

With the changes, Banana Republic seemed to be back on track. The stores were less cluttered, were lighter and brighter, and the phrase, "Travel and Safari Clothing" was dropped from the name. Clothing articles included apparel for various occasions, including weekend wear, professional attire, and dressy casual items made of more luxuriant fabrics such as cashmere and suede. The change in decor, style, and fabrics was necessary given that many retailers were carrying travel-look attire such as cargo pants and Jeeps (or jeep-like vehicles) seemed to be parked in every other driveway. By the mid-1990s, following a growing trend, Banana Republic launched bath and body care products including a Banana Republic cologne and undergarments. Later, "whole concept stores" were created which included home accessories such as bedding, sofa pillows, candles, and picture frames. In 1996 Banana Republic opened stores exclusively for men and women.

In 1998 Banana Republic launched its most extensive marketing campaign, which included its first TV spots, print ads, magazine inserts, and outdoor kiosks. More interesting was the reintroduction of the catalogue—the first in over a decade. In addition to the catalogue, keeping customer service was kept in the forefront, with telephone order representatives called "style consultants." In the late 1990s, Banana Republic offered e-commerce, allowing customers to return articles at local stores rather than send them back through the post office. In 2000 Banana Republic reopened its flagship store in San Francisco on the corner of Grant Avenue and Sutter Street; this store offers valet parking, personal shoppers, and free cell-phone charging services.

Through Banana Republic, Mel and Patricia Ziegler filled a niche for comfortable, rugged, yet stylish clothes. They marketed their product through a catalogue that was interesting to read, and at stores that were an adventure to enter. Banana Republic has changed dramatically since the days when the Zieglers started the company;

however, keeping with their original intent, customers are offered quality items and where customer service is still important.

—Nancy House; updated by Christine Miner Minderovic

BANKS, Jeff

British designer, retailer, and entrepreneur

Born: Ebbw Vale, Wales, 1943. Education: Studied textile and interior design, Camberwell School of Art, 1959–62, and St. Martin's School of Art, 1962–64. Family: Married Sandy Shaw (divorced). Career: Opened first shop, Clobber, 1964; freelance designer, Liberty, London, and Rembrandt manufacturers, 1975–78; designed bed linen collection, 1978; launched Warehouse chain of stores, 1978; initiated Warehouse Utility Clothing Company catalogue, early 1980s; host and co-producer, The Clothes Show for BBC television; designed clothes care products for Dexam International, 1998; created uniforms for Boots the Chemist, 1998; designed jewelry line for G&A, 1999; launched exclusive jewelry through QVC, 2000; developed uniforms for Abbey National, 2000; designed fashion concept for Sainsbury's, 2000. Awards: Woman magazine British Fashion award, 1979, 1982. Address: 21 D'Arblay St., London W1V 3FN, England.

PUBLICATIONS

On BANKS:

Articles

- "Jeff Banks Designs," in the Sunday Times (London), 11 January 1976.
- McCartney, Margaret, "Mr. Banks Bounces Back," in the Sunday Times (London), 11 January 1976.
- McCormack, Mary, "Trend Setter," in Annabel (London), June 1983.
- "Behind the Scenes—Fashion Line-up: The Entrepreneur," in Living (London), October 1983.
- Hennessy, Val, "Banks, the Scruff Fashion Designer," in You, magazine of the Mail on Sunday (London), 11 December 1983.
- Brooks, Barry, "Banking on Fashion," in Creative Review (London), October 1984.
- "Influences: Jeff Banks," in Women's Journal (London), April 1985.
- Mower, Sarah, "Dennis and the Menace," in The Guardian (London), 9 January 1986.
- Rumbold, Judy, "Listening Banks," in Company (London), December 1986.
- Robson, Julia, "Will Men Buy It?" in the Sunday Telegraph Magazine (London), 9 August 1987.
- "Banks's Shock Exit," in Drapers Record (DR): The Fashion Business (London), 15 July 1989.
- Brennon, Steve, "Banking on the Future," in Fashion Weekly (London), 26 October 1989.
- McCooey, Meriel, "Be Prepared," in the Sunday Times Magazine (London), 15 April 1990.
- Tredre, Roger, "Out of the Warehouse and into the News," in The Independent (London), 5 May 1990.
- Barber, Richard, "Jeff Banks: Back Where He Belongs," in Clothes Show (London), March 1992.
- "Boots Banks on £5.5 Million New Look," in Community Pharmacy, December 1998.

- "G&A Creates Jeff Banks Jewelry Range," in Duty-Free News International, 5 March 1999.
- "Abbeycrest Plans Designer Jewelry," in The Financial Times (London), 13 May 1999.

* * *

For many Britons Jeff Banks is the face of fashion. The television magazine he devised and hosts, The Clothes Show, has helped to democratize and demystify fashion. It spawned a monthly magazine, generated its own annual exhibition, and sponsored student fashion shows. The program epitomizes Banks' nonelitist attitude to fashion; his career has been devoted to making fashion available to a wide range of people.

Banks' greatest successes have been in the High Street: Clobber, his first London shop, carried the work of young designers such as Foale and Tuffin, and Janice Wainwright. Over ten years later, in the late 1970s, his Warehouse Utility Clothing company introduced designer looks at nondesigner prices. An initial setback—when the first London Warehouse shop and its contents were destroyed by fire—did not quell Banks' irrepressible energy. From their beginnings in London, the Warehouse shops have gained a national and international reputation. Started as a means of combatting wastage, the company utilized stocks of fabrics piling up in warehouses all over Europe. The resulting collections were retailed at almost wholesale prices. The shops, which have had a distinct design and style, sell only Warehouse merchandise, created by a team of designers. The interiors are minimal and logically planned, and the merchandise reflects the current fashion look, without being too extreme for the High Street. Ranges are regularly updated; the Warehouse equals lively, fresh ideas, translated into womenswear and the formula has proved attractive. Warehouse shops can be found in most major UK shopping venues, and in the mid-1980s outlets were opened in the United States.

The Warehouse concept helped to revolutionize shopping by post. Freemans, a traditional mail order company, launched Bymail, which brought the Warehouse style to a wider range of customers. The venture was a great success and was quickly followed by Classics Bymail and Men Bymail. With an emphasis on fabrics and cut, the classics included the perennial trenchcoat, suits, dresses, and separates in versatile and interchangeable dark and soft colors. The catalogues set new standards for mail order; created by top models, stylists, and photographers, the visually attractive spreads helped to sell the clothes. Like the shops, they had their imitators, both good and bad.

Sound team work has provided the essential backup for Banks' ideas, and he has inspired many people over the last several decades. Variety has been a mark of his career. As a designer, illustrator, retailer, manager, design director, consultant, and educator he has helped improve fashion attitudes and awareness. Business training is as important for him as design education, and he has made his views known by acting as a consultant and examiner for several British fashion degree courses. Fashion graduates are employed straight from college by Warehouse.

Banks' greatest achievement perhaps has been in promoting genuine fashion awareness, and he has the ability to fire up others with his own enthusiasm. In the early 21st century he continued to be a high-profile name in the industry, working to support British fashion by heading up, with others, Graduate Fashion Week, one of the main showcases for young UK talent. Banks also continued to create his own branded collections in apparel, accessories, and home furnishings. Additionally, he was active in designing custom uniforms for corporations.

Banks has created several licensed product lines for British manufacturers such as William Baird (apparel), Dexam International (clothes care products and storage boxes), Argos (china), and G&A and Abbeycrest (silver and gold jewelry). His products are sold through many distribution points, from mail-order catalogues to department stores including Marks & Spencer and Debenhams. His well-known brands include the high-end, classically styled Jeff Banks Collection, Jeff Banks Studio, and his lower- to mid-price range, Jeff Banks Ports of Call. The last is more exotic in styling, inspired by warm Southern cultures from around the world, such a Mexican-themed line of jewelry sold exclusively through home shopping network QVC. Banks is known for his inspired use of inexpensive fabrics, making fashionable, affordable apparel and accents available to young women.

Banks, through his consultancy, HQ, has also designed uniforms for many corporations. In 1998 he redesigned the uniforms worn by staff at the UK drugstore chain Boots the Chemist, creating outfits in lilac, white, green, and navy blue for 43,000 employees in 1,350 stores. In 2000 he designed uniforms for 9,500 workers at 800 branches of Abbey National, which were supplied by uniform maker InCorporateWear.

Banks signed a three-year partnership with the grocery store chain Sainsbury's in 2000, whereby he agreed to design a new in-store fashion concept for the retailer's large-format outlets. He created clothing collections for men and women and designed the boutique where the clothes are displayed, as well as supplying the visual merchandising and training Sainsbury's staff to sell the clothes.

Just as Banks was a pioneer in democratizing fashion through his appearances on British television, he has, through the Sainsbury's deal, become one of the first designers to translate fashion retailing to the supermarket setting. For three decades, Banks has made a significant impact on the British fashion industry and how it is perceived by the people of the United Kingdom.

—Hazel Clark; updated by Karen Raugust

BANKS, Jeffrey

American designer

Born: Washington D.C., 3 November 1955. Education: Studied at Pratt Institute, Brooklyn, New York, 1972–74; graduated from Parsons School of Design, New York, 1977. Career: Part-time assistant to Ralph Lauren, New York, 1972–74, and to Calvin Klein, 1974–76; designer, Nik Nik, 1976–77; designer in New York for Concorde International, Alixandre, Merona Sport, 1977–circa 1980; launched own menswear company, 1980; introduced boyswear collection, 1980; formed joint venture for designer line with Takihyo Inc., Hong Kong, 1988; design consultant, Herman Geist, New York, 1990; designer, Jeffrey Banks label for Hartz & Company, New York, beginning in 1984; Jeffrey Banks menswear, neckwear, and eyewear licensed for production in Japan, beginning in 1982; menswear consultant, Bloomingdale's, New York, beginning in 1993; extended sportswear collection with Johnnie Walker, 1998. Awards: Coty American Fashion Critics award, 1977, 1982; "Earnie" award for

- "G&A Creates Jeff Banks Jewelry Range," in Duty-Free News International, 5 March 1999.
 "Abbeycrest Plans Designer Jewelry," in The Financial Times (London), 13 May 1999.

* * *

For many Britons Jeff Banks is the face of fashion. The television magazine he devised and hosts, The Clothes Show, has helped to democratize and demystify fashion. It spawned a monthly magazine, generated its own annual exhibition, and sponsored student fashion shows. The program epitomizes Banks' nonelitist attitude to fashion; his career has been devoted to making fashion available to a wide range of people.

Banks' greatest successes have been in the High Street: Clobber, his first London shop, carried the work of young designers such as Foale and Tuffin, and Janice Wainwright. Over ten years later, in the late 1970s, his Warehouse Utility Clothing company introduced designer looks at nondesigner prices. An initial setback—when the first London Warehouse shop and its contents were destroyed by fire—did not quell Banks' irrepressible energy. From their beginnings in London, the Warehouse shops have gained a national and international reputation. Started as a means of combatting wastage, the company utilized stocks of fabrics piling up in warehouses all over Europe. The resulting collections were retailed at almost wholesale prices. The shops, which have had a distinct design and style, sell only Warehouse merchandise, created by a team of designers. The interiors are minimal and logically planned, and the merchandise reflects the current fashion look, without being too extreme for the High Street. Ranges are regularly updated; the Warehouse equals lively, fresh ideas, translated into womenswear and the formula has proved attractive. Warehouse shops can be found in most major UK shopping venues, and in the mid-1980s outlets were opened in the United States.

The Warehouse concept helped to revolutionize shopping by post. Freemans, a traditional mail order company, launched Bymail, which brought the Warehouse style to a wider range of customers. The venture was a great success and was quickly followed by Classics Bymail and Men Bymail. With an emphasis on fabrics and cut, the classics included the perennial trenchcoat, suits, dresses, and separates in versatile and interchangeable dark and soft colors. The catalogues set new standards for mail order; created by top models, stylists, and photographers, the visually attractive spreads helped to sell the clothes. Like the shops, they had their imitators, both good and bad.

Sound team work has provided the essential backup for Banks' ideas, and he has inspired many people over the last several decades. Variety has been a mark of his career. As a designer, illustrator, retailer, manager, design director, consultant, and educator he has helped improve fashion attitudes and awareness. Business training is as important for him as design education, and he has made his views known by acting as a consultant and examiner for several British fashion degree courses. Fashion graduates are employed straight from college by Warehouse.

Banks' greatest achievement perhaps has been in promoting genuine fashion awareness, and he has the ability to fire up others with his own enthusiasm. In the early 21st century he continued to be a high-profile name in the industry, working to support British fashion by heading up, with others, Graduate Fashion Week, one of the main showcases for young UK talent. Banks also continued to create his own branded collections in apparel, accessories, and home furnishings. Additionally, he was active in designing custom uniforms for corporations.

Banks has created several licensed product lines for British manufacturers such as William Baird (apparel), Dexam International (clothes care products and storage boxes), Argos (china), and G&A and Abbeycrest (silver and gold jewelry). His products are sold through many distribution points, from mail-order catalogues to department stores including Marks & Spencer and Debenhams. His well-known brands include the high-end, classically styled Jeff Banks Collection, Jeff Banks Studio, and his lower- to mid-price range, Jeff Banks Ports of Call. The last is more exotic in styling, inspired by warm Southern cultures from around the world, such a Mexican-themed line of jewelry sold exclusively through home shopping network QVC. Banks is known for his inspired use of inexpensive fabrics, making fashionable, affordable apparel and accents available to young women.

Banks, through his consultancy, HQ, has also designed uniforms for many corporations. In 1998 he redesigned the uniforms worn by staff at the UK drugstore chain Boots the Chemist, creating outfits in lilac, white, green, and navy blue for 43,000 employees in 1,350 stores. In 2000 he designed uniforms for 9,500 workers at 800 branches of Abbey National, which were supplied by uniform maker InCorporateWear.

Banks signed a three-year partnership with the grocery store chain Sainsbury's in 2000, whereby he agreed to design a new in-store fashion concept for the retailer's large-format outlets. He created clothing collections for men and women and designed the boutique where the clothes are displayed, as well as supplying the visual merchandising and training Sainsbury's staff to sell the clothes.

Just as Banks was a pioneer in democratizing fashion through his appearances on British television, he has, through the Sainsbury's deal, become one of the first designers to translate fashion retailing to the supermarket setting. For three decades, Banks has made a significant impact on the British fashion industry and how it is perceived by the people of the United Kingdom.

—Hazel Clark; updated by Karen Raugust

BANKS, Jeffrey

American designer

Born: Washington D.C., 3 November 1955. Education: Studied at Pratt Institute, Brooklyn, New York, 1972–74; graduated from Parsons School of Design, New York, 1977. Career: Part-time assistant to Ralph Lauren, New York, 1972–74, and to Calvin Klein, 1974–76; designer, Nik Nik, 1976–77; designer in New York for Concorde International, Alixandre, Merona Sport, 1977–circa 1980; launched own menswear company, 1980; introduced boyswear collection, 1980; formed joint venture for designer line with Takihyo Inc., Hong Kong, 1988; design consultant, Herman Geist, New York, 1990; designer, Jeffrey Banks label for Hartz & Company, New York, beginning in 1984; Jeffrey Banks menswear, neckwear, and eyewear licensed for production in Japan, beginning in 1982; menswear consultant, Bloomingdale's, New York, beginning in 1993; extended sportswear collection with Johnnie Walker, 1998. Awards: Coty American Fashion Critics award, 1977, 1982; "Earnie" award for boyswear, 1980; Cutty Sark award, 1987. Address: 12 East 26th Street, New York, NY 10010, USA.

PUBLICATIONS

On BANKS:

Books

Trachtenberg, Jeffrey A., Ralph Lauren: The Man Behind the Mystique, New York, 1988.

On BANKS:

Articles

Bloom, Ellye, "Jeffrey Banks: To Boyswear with Love," in Teens and Boys (New York), October 1979.

Kleinfeld, N. R., "Jeffrey Banks Suits the Mood," in the New York Times Magazine, 2 March 1980.

Gruen, John, "The Designer's Eye for Timeless Fashion Photography," in Architectural Digest, September 1989.

Gite, Lloyd, "Breaking into the Fashion Biz," in Black Enterprise (New York), June 1997.

White, Constance C.R., "Patterns," in the New York Times, 16 June 1998.

Wells, Melanie, "Johnnie Walker's First Nips at Apparel Strut to Shelves," in USA Today, 19 October 1998.

* * *

At the age of 15, Jeffrey Banks was working as a salesman at the menswear store Britches of Georgetown, where he had already been a regular customer since he was 12. "He was surely the only high school student in Washington, D.C., with his own subscriptions to Daily News Record and Women's Wear Daily," recounts Jeffrey Trachtenberg in Ralph Lauren: The Man Behind the Mystique. Banks is the consummate clothing aficionado and stylist, one who is positively obsessed with fashion. For some, apparel is simply the family business or narcissist's self-realization. For Banks, clothing is an ecstatic vocation.

A devoted movie fan since childhood, Banks has made his cinematic dream come true in clothing that evokes the golden age of Hollywood, in nuanced references to such stars as Audrey Hepburn (later a friend) and in a styling of menswear in the tradition of the debonair man about town. When Ralph Lauren visited Washington, Banks was chosen to pick him up at the airport. Fully dressed in Lauren clothing, Banks appeared as a precocious high school student and was asked by Lauren to come see him for a job when he came to New York for design school. While still in art school, Banks became Lauren's assistant and protégé in fulfillment of his interpretation of the traditional in menswear and in continuing development of his talents as a designer and stylist.

Banks subsequently designed furs for Alixandre, apprenticed with Calvin Klein, and designed for Merona sportswear. Even at Merona, his style was considered spectator sportswear, meaning the extended vision of sportswear but also the sportswear edited by Banks' keen eye to what is being worn and how it can be subtly improved. His deepest affection has always been, however, the romantic tradition of tailored clothing, a debonair style burnished by a sense of artisto nonchalance. In sportswear, Banks' strong sense of color is notable, but even for color his tailored clothing is his more natural medium. He calls himself a romanticist, but the term is weak for one so smitten by a passion for traditional clothing—a tradition that works for the most conservative gentleman but can be assembled with panache for the urbane sophisticate. Even more outside his own country, Banks' clothing in Japan epitomizes the grand sensibility of menswear brought into a fresh American focus.

Walt Whitman argued that American democracy promotes uniformity, even a sense of unimportance in individual citizens. American menswear in the second half of the 20th century was internationally effective in seeking distinction within the homogeneity of modern appearance. Designers such as Lauren and Banks addressed the social need for a traditional demeanor that would not disturb the standard of uniformity, albeit with a kind of smartness of detailing that is distinguished without being dandified. Both have, of course, learned a great deal from images in film and photography as well as keenly observing men of classic style. They then reinterpreted and refined that style.

Some would argue that a designer's transformative skill is honed in part by being an outsider—by observing that which cannot be possessed in its present form and by inherently needing and seeking change. Banks has given significant personal inflection to inbred, rarefied traditions of menswear, often connoting class. His customer—probably younger, because of his palette, than Lauren's—buys not to climb socially but to fit into a fantasy of best-dressed nattiness, perfect in effortless grooming, and informal high style.

Yet Banks' preppy, "dressed for success" image cannot be attributed to his look alone. The designer has more than just fashion sense; he has a proven business sense. He learned many things from his former mentor Ralph Lauren, and one was how to run a business. Although most designers tried to make it on their sketches, hoping to catch the eye of anyone who would look, Banks told Black Enterprise in June 1997, "Fashion is not art. It often comes very close, but at the end of the day it's commerce."

Planning and investing have been key elements to success for Banks. He may be one of a growing number of African American designers, but what separates him from others is his ability to secure sales of his designs to major department stores. Studies show African Americans spend more money on clothing than any other race, yet only a handful of African American designers have developed successful lines. Banks' $20 million companies, Jeffrey Banks Ltd. and Jeffrey Banks International, speak volumes.

After a lengthy hiatus, Banks came back in full swing in the fall of 1998. Teaming up with liquor company Johnnie Walker, Banks extended his line of rugged sportswear and accessories collection. Sold exclusively in Bloomingdales, the collection's signature trademark resembled a silhouette of a man in a top hat with a cane—not quite Johnnie Walker's ever-popular scotch liquor label. "That is the guy two years ago who wore his baseball cap backwards, drank beer out of a can and wore baggy jeans," Banks explained to the New York Times. "He now wears a $1,000 suit and is working on Wall Street, and he wants to look as good on the weekends as he does during the week."

—Richard Martin; updated by Diana Idzelis

BARNES, Jhane

American designer

Born: Jane Barnes in Phoenix, Maryland, 4 March 1954. Education: Graduated from Fashion Institute of Technology, New York, 1975. Family: Married Howard Ralph Feinberg, 1981 (divorced); married Katsuhiko Kawasaki, 1988. Career: Menswear company established as Jhane Barnes Ltd., 1977; president, Jane Barnes for ME, New York 1976–78, and Jhane Barnes Inc., from 1978; introduced women's collection, 1979; launched neckwear line, 1989; began designing home furnishing fabrics, 1989; footwear collection created, 1991; clothing licensed by American Fashion Company (San Diego, CA), from 1990; listed among the Who's Who in America, 1992; leatherwear licensed by Group Five Leather, (Minneapolis, MN), from 1994; launched first furniture collection for Bernhardt, 1995; created Jhane Barnes Textiles as a collaboration between Jhane Barnes, Inc. and Bernhardt Furniture Company, 1998; designed Orlando Magic basketball uniforms, 1998; opened second freestanding store, 1998; third store, 1999; fourth store, 2000; began formal alliance with furniture designer Herman Miller, June 2000. Awards: Coty American Fashion Critics award for Menswear 1980; Cutty Sark Most Prominent Designer award, 1980; Council of Fashion Designers of America (CFDA) Outstanding Menswear Designer, 1981; Cutty Sark Outstanding Designer award 1982; Coty Return Menswear award, 1984; Council of Fashion Designers of America award, 1981, 1984; Contract Textile award, American Society of Interior Designers 1983, 1984; Product Design award, Institute of Business Designers, 1983, 1984, 1985, 1986, 1989; American Association of Industrial Designers for Textile Collection, Gold award, 1990; Woolmark award, 1991; Resource Council Gold award, 1994; Best of NeoCon (National Exhibition of Contract Furniture) award, 1995, 1996; Good Design award, 1996; Neckwear Achievement award from the Neckwear Association of America, 1997; DuPont Antron Product Innovation award, First Place, 1998; Best of NeoCon award, 1998, 1999; Gold award for Textiles, 1999; Most Innovative award, 1999; Chicago Anthaneum Good Design award, Best of NeoCon award, 2000. Address: 575 Seventh Avenue, New York, NY 10018, USA. Website: www.jhanebarnes.com.

PUBLICATIONS

On BARNES:

Books

Stegemeyer, Anne, Who's Who in Fashion, Second Edition, New York, 1988.
———, Who's Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.

Articles

Burggraf, Helen, "Jhane Barnes," in Men's Apparel News, 14 October 1980.
Ettorre, Barbara, "Success Looms," in Working Woman (New York), June 1981.
"Jhane Barnes: A Material Force," in GQ (New York), November 1981.
Fendel, Alyson, "Jhane Barnes: 'For Inspiration I Look to the Future, Not the Past,'" in Apparel World, 22 March 1982.

- Groos, Michael, "Loosening Up: A New Look in Menswear for Fall," in the New York Times, 5 January 1988.
"The Americans: Jhane Barnes," in the Daily News Record (DNR) (New York), 15 August 1989.
"Tiny Pieces of Fabric," in the New Yorker, 29 October 1990.
Furman, Phyllis, "Resuiting American Men," in Crain's New York Business, 15 July 1991.
"Menswear Creator Jhane Barnes Makes her Case for Invention...the Technetronic Way," in Chicago Tribune, 11 September 1991.
"He's Got the Look...of Four Menswear Designers who are Showing and Telling Their Signature Looks for Spring," in Chicago Tribune, 25 March 1992.
Maycumber, Gray, "Fabrics a Weapon at Jhane Barnes: Designer Sees Textiles Winning Half the Men's Fashion Battle," in the DNR, 15 October 1992.
Agins, Teri, "Karan Gambles on Expanding Men's Line," in the Wall Street Journal, 9 February 1993.
"New York Reviews: Jhane Barnes," in DNR, 11 August 1994.
Savage, Todd, "Men's Fashion Designer Unveils Her Crossover Furniture Collection at NeoCon," in Chicago Tribune, 18 June 1995.
Geran, Monica, "MIC for Jhane Barnes (Matsuyama International Co. Clothing Store)," in Interior Design, May 1996.
Bucholz, Barbara B., "So This is Where You Work, Flexible, Genderless, Homier: Office Furnishings Adapt to Change," in Chicago Tribune, 1 September 1996.
———, "Best of Show, Buzz at NeoCon: the Interchangeable Office," in Chicago Tribune, 9 August 1998.
Strauss, Gary, "Casual Clothes by Intense Design, Jhane Barnes Wields Software to Weave Menswear Empire," in USA Today, 10 August 1999.
Bucholz, Barbara B., "Best & Raves, Two Judges Rate the Recent Winners for Office Furnishings," in Chicago Tribune, 26 September 1999.
Feldman, Melissa, "In Stitches," in Interiors, May 2000.
Swanson, James L., "Tactical Maneuvers Sighted: A Four Star General and Fabrics All-Star," in Chicago Tribune, 20 August 2000.
Rohrlich, Marianne, "Techno Fabrics Suffer Red Wine Stylishly," in the New York Times, 28 September 2000.

* * *

While trekking through the southwestern U.S., one might encounter increasingly intricate patterns within the simplicity of the unaffected surroundings. A convoluted pattern found on a leaf, perhaps, or the dewy complexities of a spider's web found in the early morn. Perhaps the sharp contrast of a red mountaintop against the azure sky, or the ripples of a stone tossed into a puddle. Wherever we may find beauty in our natural world, Jhane Barnes strives and succeeds to assimilate the same into her concurrent design work. Her propensity towards nature is evident from her intricately patterned ties to a subtle environmentalist stand evident in minimal packaging and recycling-themed weekend wear.

While still in school, Jhane (then minus the "h") Barnes had thought to turn her talents toward the worlds of science or music. Realizing her talents didn't necessarily lie in those specialties, she set off for the Fashion Institute of Technology in New York. Fortuitously for the design world, Jhane landed her first big job in 1979, when a pair of trousers designed for a friend sparked the interest of an area retail executive to the tune of a $1,000-pair order. This charmed event triggered her formal debut into the world of retail fashion. No longer a plain Jane (she added the “h” to her name at the suggestion of an earlier partner), the transformation helped broaden her appeal and menswear marketability.

Work that started on a handloom during her early design years accelerated when Barnes discovered the mathematical design capabilities of the computer. With her computer, she has redefined the fashion textile, causing her already complex fabric design to explode within the boundaries of her own creative possibilities in revolutionary fabric design intricacies. Her use of the computer is so extensive in her design work that it has caught the attention of the mathematical world. Barnes was featured in a chapter of a McDougal Littell textbook entitled Algebra II: Explorations and Applications, in a section entitled “Sequences and Series: Fractals for Fashions.” Barnes also is part of the Ohio Math Works, which prepares ninth-grade math students for the real world job application of their math studies.

The Jhane Barnes Menswear line is comfortable yet classy, with an eye towards the somewhat larger-framed physique. Barnes told the Chicago Tribune, “I tend to design for men with generous thighs and behinds.” Her renowned clothing line has had a bit of assistance through advertisements placed in women’s magazines, a growing trend among menwear designers, including Perry Ellis and Phillips-Van Heusen. Stylish women seek out equally sophisticated clothing for the men in their lives, and where better to advertise than in magazines written by and for women.

The unique look of Barnes’ apparel appeals to a distinctive type of clientele. Even Nokia’s chief designer Frank Nuovo, who turned the cellular phone into a fashion statement, joined the ranks of her admiring patronage. According to Katie Hafner of the New York Times, Nuovo was wearing a Jhane Barnes silk shirt during a 1999 interview. Other celebrities spotted wearing Barnes designs include Magic Johnson, Tony Danza, Billy Joel and his band leader, Mark Rivera, and Don Johnson on his Nash Bridges television series. Gary Strauss, writing for USA Today in August 1999 reported, “Barnes’ clothing isn’t for the fashion-timid or fashion challenged. The typical Jhane Barnes aficionado is affluent, self-assured and, unlike most fashion impaired men, likes being noticed.”

Reflected in her menswear as well as her innovative furniture, which was unveiled in 1995, Barnes shows a flair for striking yet classically composed appearance in her design. Her furniture line has a clearly defined Japanese influence, and as Barnes told the Chicago Tribune’s Todd Savage in June 1995, “I’ve always loved Japanese architecture and been jealous that their traditional Japanese architecture is so modern. It’s so much more modern and beautiful than even our Shaker. You can take an American antique, and it looks like an old antique out of another century, but you can take a Japanese antique and it looks timeless.” A variety of elegantly simple chairs and sofas made their debut in her collection.

The timeless elegance observant in her work is an appealing factor indeed. Barnes works with natural colors, ranging from subtle to bold, and pairs it with arresting patterns. Bold stripes and computer-generated design are paired with the soft allure of natural color suited to a variety of preferences. The Chicago Tribune (August 9, 1998) commented that Barnes, “creates textiles that reflect the same quiet elegance as her clothing lines, but are practical for panels, walls, upholstery and drapery. She does them in slightly different colors to suit regional tastes.” Barnes further explained, “New Yorkers like darker colors, Chicagoans more pattern, and those in Los Angeles want things lighter, brighter, and in larger patterns.”

The design work of Barnes has become a fashion statement that will hold allure for many years to come. Her natural and ageless design approach has lent her exertions a classic tone with an architecturally digital feel. While she may not gain the appreciation of the masses, her unique combinations have done well and should continue to attract many loyal clients down the road. With such an innovative approach to textile design, the richness of Japanese architecture and Mother Nature for inspiration, one can only marvel at what the next Jhane Barnes design will reveal.

—Sandra Schroeder

BARNETT, Sheridan

British designer

Born: Bradford, England, 1951. Education: Studied at Hornsey and Chelsea Colleges of Art, 1969–73. Career: Pattern grader (with Ossie Clark and Celia Birtwell), then designer, Quorum, 1975–76; first collection under own label, 1976; designer, Barnett and Brown (with Sheila Brown), 1976–80; taught fashion at St. Martins School of Art, and textiles at Chelsea College of Art; freelance designer, Jaeger, Norman Hartnell, Salvador and Annalena, beginning in 1980; also designed own label range for Reldan. Awards: Bath Museum of Costume Dress of the Year award, 1983.

PUBLICATIONS

On BARNETT:

Articles

- “Zandra Rhodes Conjures Medieval Spell in London,” in Women’s Wear Daily, 15 March 1983.
- Brampton, Sally, “Showing the Rest of the World,” in the Observer (London), 20 March 1983.
- Petkanas, Christopher, “London: A Burst of Energy,” in Women’s Wear Daily, 11 October 1983.
- “London Attracts U.S. Buyers,” in Women’s Wear Daily, 19 March 1984.
- Jones, Mark, “Followers of Fashion,” in Creative Review (London), December 1984.
- Fallon, James, “Designers Set London Benefit to Fight Famine,” in Women’s Wear Daily, 6 August 1985.
- , “Designers Plan ‘Fashion Aid’ for Ethiopian Famine Relief,” in DNR, 6 August 1985.
- Kerrigan, Marybeth, and Etta Froio, “U.S. Stores Are Cool to London Styles, Prices,” in Women’s Wear Daily, 18 March 1986.
- Mower, Sarah, “The Trick Up His Sleeve,” in The Guardian (London), 21 August 1986.
- Fallon, James, “House of Fraser to Open 1st London Unit,” in Women’s Wear Daily, 16 December 1986.
- “Sheridan Barnett With a Twist,” in Vogue (London), April 1987.
- Fallon, James, “Hartnell Names Fratini to Design Spring 1990 Line,” in Women’s Wear Daily, 5 December 1989.
- Thim, Dennis, “Bohan Nearing Deal to Design Hartnell Couture,” in Women’s Wear Daily, 19 June 1990.
- Gabb, Annabella, “Blenheim’s Traveling Show...,” in Management Today, February 1991.

retail executive to the tune of a $1,000-pair order. This charmed event triggered her formal debut into the world of retail fashion. No longer a plain Jane (she added the “h” to her name at the suggestion of an earlier partner), the transformation helped broaden her appeal and menswear marketability.

Work that started on a handloom during her early design years accelerated when Barnes discovered the mathematical design capabilities of the computer. With her computer, she has redefined the fashion textile, causing her already complex fabric design to explode within the boundaries of her own creative possibilities in revolutionary fabric design intricacies. Her use of the computer is so extensive in her design work that it has caught the attention of the mathematical world. Barnes was featured in a chapter of a McDougal Littell textbook entitled Algebra II: Explorations and Applications, in a section entitled “Sequences and Series: Fractals for Fashions.” Barnes also is part of the Ohio Math Works, which prepares ninth-grade math students for the real world job application of their math studies.

The Jhane Barnes Menswear line is comfortable yet classy, with an eye towards the somewhat larger-framed physique. Barnes told the Chicago Tribune, “I tend to design for men with generous thighs and behinds.” Her renowned clothing line has had a bit of assistance through advertisements placed in women’s magazines, a growing trend among menwear designers, including Perry Ellis and Phillips-Van Heusen. Stylish women seek out equally sophisticated clothing for the men in their lives, and where better to advertise than in magazines written by and for women.

The unique look of Barnes’ apparel appeals to a distinctive type of clientele. Even Nokia’s chief designer Frank Nuovo, who turned the cellular phone into a fashion statement, joined the ranks of her admiring patronage. According to Katie Hafner of the New York Times, Nuovo was wearing a Jhane Barnes silk shirt during a 1999 interview. Other celebrities spotted wearing Barnes designs include Magic Johnson, Tony Danza, Billy Joel and his band leader, Mark Rivera, and Don Johnson on his Nash Bridges television series. Gary Strauss, writing for USA Today in August 1999 reported, “Barnes’ clothing isn’t for the fashion-timid or fashion challenged. The typical Jhane Barnes aficionado is affluent, self-assured and, unlike most fashion impaired men, likes being noticed.”

Reflected in her menswear as well as her innovative furniture, which was unveiled in 1995, Barnes shows a flair for striking yet classically composed appearance in her design. Her furniture line has a clearly defined Japanese influence, and as Barnes told the Chicago Tribune’s Todd Savage in June 1995, “I’ve always loved Japanese architecture and been jealous that their traditional Japanese architecture is so modern. It’s so much more modern and beautiful than even our Shaker. You can take an American antique, and it looks like an old antique out of another century, but you can take a Japanese antique and it looks timeless.” A variety of elegantly simple chairs and sofas made their debut in her collection.

The timeless elegance observant in her work is an appealing factor indeed. Barnes works with natural colors, ranging from subtle to bold, and pairs it with arresting patterns. Bold stripes and computer-generated design are paired with the soft allure of natural color suited to a variety of preferences. The Chicago Tribune (August 9, 1998) commented that Barnes, “creates textiles that reflect the same quiet elegance as her clothing lines, but are practical for panels, walls, upholstery and drapery. She does them in slightly different colors to suit regional tastes.” Barnes further explained, “New Yorkers like darker colors, Chicagoans more pattern, and those in Los Angeles want things lighter, brighter, and in larger patterns.”

The design work of Barnes has become a fashion statement that will hold allure for many years to come. Her natural and ageless design approach has lent her exertions a classic tone with an architecturally digital feel. While she may not gain the appreciation of the masses, her unique combinations have done well and should continue to attract many loyal clients down the road. With such an innovative approach to textile design, the richness of Japanese architecture and Mother Nature for inspiration, one can only marvel at what the next Jhane Barnes design will reveal.

—Sandra Schroeder

BARNETT, Sheridan

British designer

Born: Bradford, England, 1951. Education: Studied at Hornsey and Chelsea Colleges of Art, 1969–73. Career: Pattern grader (with Ossie Clark and Celia Birtwell), then designer, Quorum, 1975–76; first collection under own label, 1976; designer, Barnett and Brown (with Sheila Brown), 1976–80; taught fashion at St. Martins School of Art, and textiles at Chelsea College of Art; freelance designer, Jaeger, Norman Hartnell, Salvador and Annalena, beginning in 1980; also designed own label range for Reldan. Awards: Bath Museum of Costume Dress of the Year award, 1983.

PUBLICATIONS

On BARNETT:

Articles

- “Zandra Rhodes Conjures Medieval Spell in London,” in Women’s Wear Daily, 15 March 1983.
- Brampton, Sally, “Showing the Rest of the World,” in the Observer (London), 20 March 1983.
- Petkanas, Christopher, “London: A Burst of Energy,” in Women’s Wear Daily, 11 October 1983.
- “London Attracts U.S. Buyers,” in Women’s Wear Daily, 19 March 1984.
- Jones, Mark, “Followers of Fashion,” in Creative Review (London), December 1984.
- Fallon, James, “Designers Set London Benefit to Fight Famine,” in Women’s Wear Daily, 6 August 1985.
- , “Designers Plan ‘Fashion Aid’ for Ethiopian Famine Relief,” in DNR, 6 August 1985.
- Kerrigan, Marybeth, and Etta Froio, “U.S. Stores Are Cool to London Styles, Prices,” in Women’s Wear Daily, 18 March 1986.
- Mower, Sarah, “The Trick Up His Sleeve,” in The Guardian (London), 21 August 1986.
- Fallon, James, “House of Fraser to Open 1st London Unit,” in Women’s Wear Daily, 16 December 1986.
- “Sheridan Barnett With a Twist,” in Vogue (London), April 1987.
- Fallon, James, “Hartnell Names Fratini to Design Spring 1990 Line,” in Women’s Wear Daily, 5 December 1989.
- Thim, Dennis, “Bohan Nearing Deal to Design Hartnell Couture,” in Women’s Wear Daily, 19 June 1990.
- Gabb, Annabella, “Blenheim’s Traveling Show...,” in Management Today, February 1991.

* * *

"We are dressmakers," insisted Sheridan Barnett in an interview with journalist Sarah Mower for The Guardian (21 August 1986). "I think it's ludicrous that designers should be made into superstars when they're just out of college. Nobody's a true dress designer until they've worked in the industry at least three years." Barnett passionately believes in the value of training, practice, and apprenticeship to the designer. To Barnett, design is a practical, problem-solving exercise that should be approached with organized discipline. He is not a prima donna, distracted by the whims and extravagances of an often superficial business. His first consideration is his customer and the practical needs they have, rather than the advancement or hype of his own name and talent. This could be one of the reasons why, outside the fashion business, Barnett is one of fashion's best kept secrets.

Barnett first produced a collection under his own label when he left the design group Quorum in 1976. His clothing was distributed by Lawrie Lewis, who went on to found Blenheim Dresswell in 1979. Along with designers like Hardy Amies, Jasper Conran, David Hicks, and Jean Muir, Barnett became known for making clothes for the woman of elegance and style. He quickly established a reputation for very wearable, simple, and affordable clothes and was always one step ahead of other designers, not only in ideas but also in his work. He introduced oversized jackets and ankle-length skirts a year ahead of the catwalk and two years before the High Street had caught on to the look. He also introduced silk pajamas before Parisian designers had even considered them. In many ways, he seemed to be developing a new modern formula to shape 1980s fashion and style. "It had to be interesting, well cut, original, comfortable—and a good fit," he declared.

Barnett aims for a sparseness of design, achieved through a process of elimination. His work has been described as "wearable and very clean, with good lines and beautiful fabrics," by Sheila Bernstein, vice president of Fashion Merchandising at AMC (Women's Wear Daily, 1 March 1983). His 1984 collection was inspired by the "unorthodox approach to dressing" of literary heroines Vita Sackville-West and Djuna Barnes. Removing the frills, trims, and fuss he claims to hate, Barnett believes customers should add their own style to the clothes to complete a look or change it from day to day. He strongly adheres to perfection in cut, sometimes spending a week over one sleeve, resetting it over a hundred times according to his perception of how it should fit. "Of course nothing's ever perfect," he has declared, emphasizing how a designer should never be satisfied, as it breeds complacency.

Barnett regards himself as a professional freelance designer, a position he feels strongly suits his temperament. Apart from his own label collections, however, he has collaborated in several successful design liaisons during his career. During the 1970s, he was in partnership with designer Sheilagh Brown, trading as Barnett and Brown and designing their own collections. During the 1980s, he produced ready-to-wear collections for Jaeger and Norman Hartnell (with Victor Edelstein, Allan McClure, and Allan McRae) as well as his own label range for Reldan (where he joined the likes of Mondi, Jaegar, Frank Usher, and Windsmoor, and had his work sold at stores like House of Fraser, owned by the Al-Fayed family); he also worked variously as a lecturer in fashion schools. The early 1990s saw Barnett take a position as designer for the Marks & Spencer supplier Claremont.

Barnett claims not to mind that he has not become a household name in Britain, as have designers such as Bruce Oldfield and Jean Muir. He is, however, regarded within the industry as one of the best designers around. Although he admits things may have been different had he worked in America, his love of London and British culture is a major influence in his work and something he would have had to sacrifice had he gone abroad. His contributions go beyond clothing; Barnett is also a philanthropist at heart, contributing to the Fashion Aid Show in 1985 to help raise money for famine relief in Ethiopia. Barnett joined Zandra Rhodes, Katherine Hamnett, Jasper Conran, Bruce Oldfield, Rifat Ozbeck, Betty Jackson, Wendy Dagworthy, and Issey Miyake, among others. He also taught design at Central St. Martins College of Art & Design, where he numbered among his students Juan Carlos Antonio (John) Galliano, who would go on to his own success, selling his graduating collection, Les Incroyables, to the likes of Diana Ross, and would eventually design for Christian Dior.

Sheridan Barnett's ultimate contribution to fashion is the longevity his clothes have and his simplistic taste and style. He has remained a rare and constant favorite with customers and, amazingly, fashion editors, the people most likely to blow with the fashion wind. This reinforces his original aim for clothes that always look interesting and last for many years. "You can only achieve quality if you eliminate what is superfluous," he declared.

—Kevin Almond; updated by Daryl F. Mallett

BAROCCO, Rocco

Italian designer

Born: Naples, Italy, 26 March 1944; christened Rocco Muscariello. Education: Attended Accademia delle Belle Arti, Rome, 1962 (Fine Arts). Career: Sketch artist, De Barentzen, 1963–65; joined group to form atelier producing high-fashion collections under Barocco label (disbanded 1974); independent designer using Barocco label, from 1977; Rocco Barocco ready-to-wear line added, 1978; knitwear and children's lines introduced 1982; produces ready-to-wear, jeans, knitwear, scarves, leather goods, accessories, perfume, porcelain tiles, and linens. Exhibitions: Italian Fashion in Japan, Daimaru Museum, Osaka, 1983; Italian Fashion Design, Italian-American Museum, San Francisco, and Pacific Design Center, Los Angeles, 1987; La Sala Bianca, Palazzo Pitti, Florence, 1992, and the Louvre Museum, Paris, 1993. Awards: Senior Singer Company award, New York, 1969. Address: Piazza di Spagna 81, 00187 Rome, Italy. Websites: "Rocco Barocco," FirstView Collections Online, spring 2001; "Rocco Barocco," Moda Online, fall 2000/2001; "Rocco Barocco," Quitidiano.net, fall/winter 2001.

PUBLICATIONS

On BAROCCO:

Books

- Bottero, A., Nostra Signora la Moda, Milan, 1979.
- Giordani Aragno, B., 40 Years of Italian Fashion, Florence, 1983.
- Italian Fashion in Japan*, Osaka, 1983.
- Giacomoni, S., The Italian Look Reflected, Milan, 1984.
- McDowell, Colin, Directory of Twentieth Century Fashion, London, 1984.
- Bianchino, G., and A. Quintaralle, Fashion—From Fable to Design, Parma, Italy, 1989.
- La Sala Bianca*, Milan, 1992.
- Zito, Adele, Italian Fashion: The Protagonists, Italy, 1993.

* * *

"We are dressmakers," insisted Sheridan Barnett in an interview with journalist Sarah Mower for The Guardian (21 August 1986). "I think it's ludicrous that designers should be made into superstars when they're just out of college. Nobody's a true dress designer until they've worked in the industry at least three years." Barnett passionately believes in the value of training, practice, and apprenticeship to the designer. To Barnett, design is a practical, problem-solving exercise that should be approached with organized discipline. He is not a prima donna, distracted by the whims and extravagances of an often superficial business. His first consideration is his customer and the practical needs they have, rather than the advancement or hype of his own name and talent. This could be one of the reasons why, outside the fashion business, Barnett is one of fashion's best kept secrets.

Barnett first produced a collection under his own label when he left the design group Quorum in 1976. His clothing was distributed by Lawrie Lewis, who went on to found Blenheim Dresswell in 1979. Along with designers like Hardy Amies, Jasper Conran, David Hicks, and Jean Muir, Barnett became known for making clothes for the woman of elegance and style. He quickly established a reputation for very wearable, simple, and affordable clothes and was always one step ahead of other designers, not only in ideas but also in his work. He introduced oversized jackets and ankle-length skirts a year ahead of the catwalk and two years before the High Street had caught on to the look. He also introduced silk pajamas before Parisian designers had even considered them. In many ways, he seemed to be developing a new modern formula to shape 1980s fashion and style. "It had to be interesting, well cut, original, comfortable—and a good fit," he declared.

Barnett aims for a sparseness of design, achieved through a process of elimination. His work has been described as "wearable and very clean, with good lines and beautiful fabrics," by Sheila Bernstein, vice president of Fashion Merchandising at AMC (Women's Wear Daily, 1 March 1983). His 1984 collection was inspired by the "unorthodox approach to dressing" of literary heroines Vita Sackville-West and Djuna Barnes. Removing the frills, trims, and fuss he claims to hate, Barnett believes customers should add their own style to the clothes to complete a look or change it from day to day. He strongly adheres to perfection in cut, sometimes spending a week over one sleeve, resetting it over a hundred times according to his perception of how it should fit. "Of course nothing's ever perfect," he has declared, emphasizing how a designer should never be satisfied, as it breeds complacency.

Barnett regards himself as a professional freelance designer, a position he feels strongly suits his temperament. Apart from his own label collections, however, he has collaborated in several successful design liaisons during his career. During the 1970s, he was in partnership with designer Sheilagh Brown, trading as Barnett and Brown and designing their own collections. During the 1980s, he produced ready-to-wear collections for Jaeger and Norman Hartnell (with Victor Edelstein, Allan McClure, and Allan McRae) as well as his own label range for Reldan (where he joined the likes of Mondi, Jaegar, Frank Usher, and Windsmoor, and had his work sold at stores like House of Fraser, owned by the Al-Fayed family); he also worked variously as a lecturer in fashion schools. The early 1990s saw Barnett take a position as designer for the Marks & Spencer supplier Claremont.

Barnett claims not to mind that he has not become a household name in Britain, as have designers such as Bruce Oldfield and Jean Muir. He is, however, regarded within the industry as one of the best designers around. Although he admits things may have been different had he worked in America, his love of London and British culture is a major influence in his work and something he would have had to sacrifice had he gone abroad. His contributions go beyond clothing; Barnett is also a philanthropist at heart, contributing to the Fashion Aid Show in 1985 to help raise money for famine relief in Ethiopia. Barnett joined Zandra Rhodes, Katherine Hamnett, Jasper Conran, Bruce Oldfield, Rifat Ozbeck, Betty Jackson, Wendy Dagworthy, and Issey Miyake, among others. He also taught design at Central St. Martins College of Art & Design, where he numbered among his students Juan Carlos Antonio (John) Galliano, who would go on to his own success, selling his graduating collection, Les Incroyables, to the likes of Diana Ross, and would eventually design for Christian Dior.

Sheridan Barnett's ultimate contribution to fashion is the longevity his clothes have and his simplistic taste and style. He has remained a rare and constant favorite with customers and, amazingly, fashion editors, the people most likely to blow with the fashion wind. This reinforces his original aim for clothes that always look interesting and last for many years. "You can only achieve quality if you eliminate what is superfluous," he declared.

—Kevin Almond; updated by Daryl F. Mallett

BAROCCO, Rocco

Italian designer

Born: Naples, Italy, 26 March 1944; christened Rocco Muscariello. Education: Attended Accademia delle Belle Arti, Rome, 1962 (Fine Arts). Career: Sketch artist, De Barentzen, 1963–65; joined group to form atelier producing high-fashion collections under Barocco label (disbanded 1974); independent designer using Barocco label, from 1977; Rocco Barocco ready-to-wear line added, 1978; knitwear and children's lines introduced 1982; produces ready-to-wear, jeans, knitwear, scarves, leather goods, accessories, perfume, porcelain tiles, and linens. Exhibitions: Italian Fashion in Japan, Daimaru Museum, Osaka, 1983; Italian Fashion Design, Italian-American Museum, San Francisco, and Pacific Design Center, Los Angeles, 1987; La Sala Bianca, Palazzo Pitti, Florence, 1992, and the Louvre Museum, Paris, 1993. Awards: Senior Singer Company award, New York, 1969. Address: Piazza di Spagna 81, 00187 Rome, Italy. Websites: "Rocco Barocco," FirstView Collections Online, spring 2001; "Rocco Barocco," Moda Online, fall 2000/2001; "Rocco Barocco," Quitidiano.net, fall/winter 2001.

PUBLICATIONS

On BAROCCO:

Books

- Bottero, A., Nostra Signora la Moda, Milan, 1979.
- Giordani Aragno, B., 40 Years of Italian Fashion, Florence, 1983.
- Italian Fashion in Japan*, Osaka, 1983.
- Giacomoni, S., The Italian Look Reflected, Milan, 1984.
- McDowell, Colin, Directory of Twentieth Century Fashion, London, 1984.
- Bianchino, G., and A. Quintaralle, Fashion—From Fable to Design, Parma, Italy, 1989.
- La Sala Bianca*, Milan, 1992.
- Zito, Adele, Italian Fashion: The Protagonists, Italy, 1993.

Rocco Barocco, fall/winter 2001–02 collection: embroidered dress.
© AP/Wide World Photos.

Rocco Barocco, fall/winter 2001–02 collection: coat with satin trim and collar, and satin pants. © AP/Wide World Photos.

Articles

- Gargia, Massimo, "Barocco ou l'Amour des Passions Inutiles," in L'Officiel (Paris), September 1979.
- Melendez, R., "Best of Italy," in Women's Wear Daily, 26 August 1989.
- Lanza, S., "The A. W. Collections from Italy," in the Sunday Times (London), 2 September 1990.
- "Italy's Passion for Fashion," in Sunday Morning Post (South China), 1 December 1991.
- "La Botte Secrete de la Mode Romaine," in Paris Capitale, May 1994.
- "Burani Buys Two Leather Firms," in Women's Wear Daily, 6 November 2000.

*

I started my career very young and so it is natural that I should have a certain leaning towards the avant-garde. My first creations were challenges to the styles of the period and very courageous. Technique and experience combined with my taste for the daring in fashion have led to the birth of a clearly defined style that can be recognized in my often repetitive choice of colors: black, black/white and optical effects.

In [one] collection a floral leitmotif (a rose in particular) appears, inserted into spotted or striped designs (leopards, zebras, tigers). The rigorousness of my cut can be recognized in the jackets and cloaks which in their different inspirations (oriental, African, military) always reveal a search for perfect construction. I have a predilection for soft and sumptuous materials, for embroidery and for gold in particular. If we want to define the Rocco Barocco style we must use words like rigor, humor, audacity, and poetic imagination.

—Rocco Barocco

* * *

Rocco Barocco, or Rocco Muscariello as he was christened, is an Italian ready-to-wear designer who creates collections for men, women, and children in a variety of ranges from jeans and knitwear to evening wear. Born in Naples in 1944, he moved to Rome in order to follow his chosen career path. After apprenticeship and training at the city's leading ateliers, he eventually opened his own in the Piazza di Spagna in 1968. Success was immediate, and his popularity with the Roman jetset increased his fame throughout Europe. He was soon exporting clothes to France, the U.S., and Japan.

Rocco Barocco defines his style as being rigorous, humorous, impudent, and poetically imaginative. He has a taste for the daring and avant-garde in design and detailing, such as his bright red chiffon evening gowns with bold, asymmetrically draped necklines. He also enjoys working with embroidery and gold, in particular. A distinctive sequin and embroidered jacket from his spring/summer 1993 collection paid joint homage to the stars and stripes of the American flag and the daring circus performers from Elsa Schiaparelli's Circus Collection of the late 1930s. Barocco prefers to work in soft and sumptuous materials like paillettes and satins or cashmeres and crêpes. His favorite color combinations are black, black and white, or optical effects, combinations repeating themselves through numerous collections and which have helped define the Rocco Barocco style.

When he began designing, Barocco's intention was to challenge established silhouettes and shapes with a search for perfection in cut, construction, and symmetry. Examples of his cutting skills are displayed in his jackets and coats. His autumn/winter 1989 collection showed long, swinging, dove gray cashmere coats, perfect in balance and proportion and trimmed in fur. His fitted, shawl-collared jackets and suits hinted at masculine classics but exuded femininity in their curvaceous cut, proportion, and detailing. Barocco represents a unique Mediterranean flavor in contemporary fashion; he enjoys taking strong color and style combinations and mixing them in a diverse manner.

Barocco is also inspired by Hollywood, which he views as a fascinating land of unsettled heroes and heroines and a cornucopia of visual reference for high fashion. Hollywood movie stars and fashion in the movies have always been over the top—this undoubtedly contributes to Barocco's taste for the daring in fashion, exemplified in his newer, notorious swimwear-to-lingerie collection. The Rocco Barocco label is also found on ranges of leather goods, handbags, hosiery, jewelry, umbrellas, and shoes. His perfume and toiletry line, RoccoBarocco III, has had lasting success, and the designer branched out into designs for the home, including furniture, porcelain tiles, and refined ceramics. Barocco views his success as transitory, accompanied by inevitable changes. However, from an outsider's point of view, these changes only result in further expansion of the business, ultimately promoting the name of Rocco Barocco on a wider scale.

Probably best known outside Europe for his jeanswear and perfume lines, Barocco apparel ranges from shimmering fabrics such as silks and satins to houndstooth slacks paired with bright pink and lime green sweaters. In his fall 2000 women's collection, shown in Milan, Barocco reinterpreted styles of the 1950s with a postmodernist slant and a spirit of elegance, according to the website Moda Online. The reviewer compared the silhouettes in his spring/summer 2000 women's line to the creations of the French crystal company Lalique. In fall 2001, Barocco focused on a spiderweb theme, incorporating this design from nature into pants and tops that hugged the body yet remained free flowing.

Barocco's men's collection for fall/winter 2001 was described by Italian reviewers as typically British, a mix of the Rolling Stones and Prince William with a little Jimi Hendrix thrown in. Slacks were paired with long coats and no shirt, accessorized with long scarves, in a rock star-inspired style. The ever expanding Rocco Barocco collection includes licenses for leather goods, produced and distributed by the Italian firm Braccialini, and varied denim designs, manufactured and sold by Swinger International.

—Kevin Almond; updated by Karen Raugust

BARRIE, Scott

American designer

Born: Nelson Clyde Barr in Philadelphia, 16 January 1946. Education: Studied applied arts at Philadelphia Museum College of Art; fashion design at Mayer School of Fashion, New York, mid-1960s.

Career: Designer, Allen Cole boutique, New York, 1966–69; cofounder, Barrie Sport, Ltd., New York, 1969–82; menswear collection and Barrie Plus collections introduced, 1974; also designed dresses for S.E.L., mid-1980s; loungewear for Barad, furs for Barlan; moved to Milan, 1982; formed Scott Barrie Italy SrL, in partnership with Kinshido Company, Ltd., of Japan, 1983; designer, Milan D'Or division for Kinshido, 1983–91; designer, signature line for Kinshido, 1983–91; freelance designer, Krizia, Milan, 1986–88. Died: 8 June 1993 in Alessandria, Italy.

PUBLICATIONS

On BARRIE:

Books

Morris, Bernadine, and Barbara Walz, The Fashion Makers, New York, 1978.

Milbank, Caroline Rennolds, New York Fashion: The Evolution of American Style, New York, 1989.

Articles

White, Constance C. R., "Scott Barrie: Back and Renewed," in Women's Wear Daily (New York), 20 November 1989.

_____, "Scott Barrie Dies at 52; Made Mark on S.A. in 1970s," in Women's Wear Daily, 10 June 1993.

Schiro, Ann-Marie, "Scott Barrie is Dead; Designer, 52, Made Jersey Matte Dresses," in the New York Times, 11 June 1993.

"Fashion Designer Scott Barrie Dies," in Jet (Chicago), 28 June 1993.

* * *

Scott Barrie was one of a group of brassy and vibrant black designers and models to establish themselves on New York's Seventh Avenue in the late 1960s. Influenced by his godmother, who had designed and made clothes for sonorous and volatile jazz singers Dinah Washington and Sarah Vaughan, Barrie began designing in 1966. Although he graduated from the Philadelphia College of Art and the Mayer School in New York, his mother was not initially encouraging about his future in fashion designing for Seventh Avenue. "Blacks don't make it there," she warned her son—Barrie quickly proved her wrong.

Roman jetset increased his fame throughout Europe. He was soon exporting clothes to France, the U.S., and Japan.

Rocco Barocco defines his style as being rigorous, humorous, impudent, and poetically imaginative. He has a taste for the daring and avant-garde in design and detailing, such as his bright red chiffon evening gowns with bold, asymmetrically draped necklines. He also enjoys working with embroidery and gold, in particular. A distinctive sequin and embroidered jacket from his spring/summer 1993 collection paid joint homage to the stars and stripes of the American flag and the daring circus performers from Elsa Schiaparelli's Circus Collection of the late 1930s. Barocco prefers to work in soft and sumptuous materials like paillettes and satins or cashmeres and crêpes. His favorite color combinations are black, black and white, or optical effects, combinations repeating themselves through numerous collections and which have helped define the Rocco Barocco style.

When he began designing, Barocco's intention was to challenge established silhouettes and shapes with a search for perfection in cut, construction, and symmetry. Examples of his cutting skills are displayed in his jackets and coats. His autumn/winter 1989 collection showed long, swinging, dove gray cashmere coats, perfect in balance and proportion and trimmed in fur. His fitted, shawl-collared jackets and suits hinted at masculine classics but exuded femininity in their curvaceous cut, proportion, and detailing. Barocco represents a unique Mediterranean flavor in contemporary fashion; he enjoys taking strong color and style combinations and mixing them in a diverse manner.

Barocco is also inspired by Hollywood, which he views as a fascinating land of unsettled heroes and heroines and a cornucopia of visual reference for high fashion. Hollywood movie stars and fashion in the movies have always been over the top—this undoubtedly contributes to Barocco's taste for the daring in fashion, exemplified in his newer, notorious swimwear-to-lingerie collection. The Rocco Barocco label is also found on ranges of leather goods, handbags, hosiery, jewelry, umbrellas, and shoes. His perfume and toiletry line, RoccoBarocco III, has had lasting success, and the designer branched out into designs for the home, including furniture, porcelain tiles, and refined ceramics. Barocco views his success as transitory, accompanied by inevitable changes. However, from an outsider's point of view, these changes only result in further expansion of the business, ultimately promoting the name of Rocco Barocco on a wider scale.

Probably best known outside Europe for his jeanswear and perfume lines, Barocco apparel ranges from shimmering fabrics such as silks and satins to houndstooth slacks paired with bright pink and lime green sweaters. In his fall 2000 women's collection, shown in Milan, Barocco reinterpreted styles of the 1950s with a postmodernist slant and a spirit of elegance, according to the website Moda Online. The reviewer compared the silhouettes in his spring/summer 2000 women's line to the creations of the French crystal company Lalique. In fall 2001, Barocco focused on a spiderweb theme, incorporating this design from nature into pants and tops that hugged the body yet remained free flowing.

Barocco's men's collection for fall/winter 2001 was described by Italian reviewers as typically British, a mix of the Rolling Stones and Prince William with a little Jimi Hendrix thrown in. Slacks were paired with long coats and no shirt, accessorized with long scarves, in a rock star-inspired style. The ever expanding Rocco Barocco collection includes licenses for leather goods, produced and distributed by the Italian firm Braccialini, and varied denim designs, manufactured and sold by Swinger International.

—Kevin Almond; updated by Karen Raugust

BARRIE, Scott

American designer

Born: Nelson Clyde Barr in Philadelphia, 16 January 1946. Education: Studied applied arts at Philadelphia Museum College of Art; fashion design at Mayer School of Fashion, New York, mid-1960s.

Career: Designer, Allen Cole boutique, New York, 1966–69; cofounder, Barrie Sport, Ltd., New York, 1969–82; menswear collection and Barrie Plus collections introduced, 1974; also designed dresses for S.E.L., mid-1980s; loungewear for Barad, furs for Barlan; moved to Milan, 1982; formed Scott Barrie Italy SrL, in partnership with Kinshido Company, Ltd., of Japan, 1983; designer, Milan D'Or division for Kinshido, 1983–91; designer, signature line for Kinshido, 1983–91; freelance designer, Krizia, Milan, 1986–88. Died: 8 June 1993 in Alessandria, Italy.

PUBLICATIONS

On BARRIE:

Books

Morris, Bernadine, and Barbara Walz, The Fashion Makers, New York, 1978.

Milbank, Caroline Rennolds, New York Fashion: The Evolution of American Style, New York, 1989.

Articles

White, Constance C. R., "Scott Barrie: Back and Renewed," in Women's Wear Daily (New York), 20 November 1989.

_____, "Scott Barrie Dies at 52; Made Mark on S.A. in 1970s," in Women's Wear Daily, 10 June 1993.

Schiro, Ann-Marie, "Scott Barrie is Dead; Designer, 52, Made Jersey Matte Dresses," in the New York Times, 11 June 1993.

"Fashion Designer Scott Barrie Dies," in Jet (Chicago), 28 June 1993.

* * *

Scott Barrie was one of a group of brassy and vibrant black designers and models to establish themselves on New York's Seventh Avenue in the late 1960s. Influenced by his godmother, who had designed and made clothes for sonorous and volatile jazz singers Dinah Washington and Sarah Vaughan, Barrie began designing in 1966. Although he graduated from the Philadelphia College of Art and the Mayer School in New York, his mother was not initially encouraging about his future in fashion designing for Seventh Avenue. "Blacks don't make it there," she warned her son—Barrie quickly proved her wrong.

Describing himself in the 1970s as being midway between the crazy extremes of Zandra Rhodes and Herbert Kasper, Barrie quickly established himself as a designer of sexy, often outrageous clothes. His eveningwear was particularly noteworthy: skinny gowns sprinkled with pailettes and dangerously high splits, or jersey slips that slid tantalizingly over the figure.

He began making clothes in his New York apartment, with a makeshift cutting table and domestic sewing machine. His first orders were from small independent boutiques but success came when prestigious stores Henri Bendel and Bloomingdale's in New York placed orders for his sparse and revealing jersey dresses. By 1969 he had christened his company Barrie Sport and moved into spacious workrooms at 530 Seventh Avenue.

Barrie's forté was the sensuous use of jersey, cut in inventive and unexpected ways, from which he created elegant and often risqué eveningwear. Popular devotees of the Barrie were extravagantly beautiful model Naomi Sims, who always ordered her clothes in white, and Lee Traub, wife of Bloomingdale's then-president.

Barrie also designed ranges of loungewear, furs, and accessories and was involved in costume design, creating clothes for films and the Joffrey Ballet's production of Deuce Coupe.

The intermingling of culture and race on New York's Seventh Avenue in the 1960s brought a new sort of creative energy that challenged accepted standards. Barrie's models did not parade the catwalk with elegance; instead they boogied wildly and arrogantly, with a streetwise brashness. It was a testimony to the changing times that the clothes were accepted at the higher end of the ready-to-wear market.

Barrie enjoyed being a fashion designer, but acknowledged the hard work and competitive nature of the business. In the early 1980s he ceased designing under his own name, taking a position with the dress firm S.E.L. as a designer. For the later years of the decade and the beginning of the 1990s, Barrie designed for the Italian design house Krizia and for the Japanese firm Kinshido. In 1993 Barrie died of brain cancer in Alessandria, Italy, he was 52.

—Kevin Almond

BARTLETT, John

American designer

Born: Cincinnati, Ohio, 1963. Education: Harvard University, B.A. in Sociology, 1985; graduated from Fashion Institute of Technology, 1988. Career: Interned with Willi Smith, Bill Robinson, and Ronaldus Shamask; men's designer for Williwear, 1988–89; design director, Ronaldus Shamask, 1989–91; own menswear line sold at Barneys, Bergdorf Goodman, and Charivari, 1992; partnership with Genny Spa and premiere of womenswear, 1997; creative director, Byblos menswear and womenswear collections sold at Saks and Neiman Marcus, own label sold at Henri Bendel, 1998. Awards: Fashion Institute of Technology Bill Robinson award, 1988; Woolmark "Cutting Edge" award, 1992; Fashion Institute of Technology Alumni award, 1994; Council of Fashion Designers of America Perry Ellis award for New

John Bartlett, spring 2001 collection: silk chiffon wrap blouse over crêpe satin ruched trouser. © Reuters NewMedia Inc./CORBIS.

Fashion Talent, 1994; Council of Fashion Designers of America award, 1997. Address: 450 West 15th Street, New York, NY, 10011, USA.

PUBLICATIONS

On BARTLETT:

Books

Stegemeyer, Anne, Who's Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.

Articles

Spindler, Amy M., "Menswear Expands the Notion of Basics," in the New York Times, 3 August 1993.

Shaw, Daniel, "Rookie of the Year," in the New York Times, 5 December 1993.

Horyn, Cathy, "Crusoe for the Modern Man," in the Washington Post, 6 February 1994.

"Sharkskin Bites Bartlett," in the DNR (New York), 29 July 1994.

Describing himself in the 1970s as being midway between the crazy extremes of Zandra Rhodes and Herbert Kasper, Barrie quickly established himself as a designer of sexy, often outrageous clothes. His eveningwear was particularly noteworthy: skinny gowns sprinkled with pailettes and dangerously high splits, or jersey slips that slid tantalizingly over the figure.

He began making clothes in his New York apartment, with a makeshift cutting table and domestic sewing machine. His first orders were from small independent boutiques but success came when prestigious stores Henri Bendel and Bloomingdale's in New York placed orders for his sparse and revealing jersey dresses. By 1969 he had christened his company Barrie Sport and moved into spacious workrooms at 530 Seventh Avenue.

Barrie's forté was the sensuous use of jersey, cut in inventive and unexpected ways, from which he created elegant and often risqué eveningwear. Popular devotees of the Barrie were extravagantly beautiful model Naomi Sims, who always ordered her clothes in white, and Lee Traub, wife of Bloomingdale's then-president.

Barrie also designed ranges of loungewear, furs, and accessories and was involved in costume design, creating clothes for films and the Joffrey Ballet's production of Deuce Coupe.

The intermingling of culture and race on New York's Seventh Avenue in the 1960s brought a new sort of creative energy that challenged accepted standards. Barrie's models did not parade the catwalk with elegance; instead they boogied wildly and arrogantly, with a streetwise brashness. It was a testimony to the changing times that the clothes were accepted at the higher end of the ready-to-wear market.

Barrie enjoyed being a fashion designer, but acknowledged the hard work and competitive nature of the business. In the early 1980s he ceased designing under his own name, taking a position with the dress firm S.E.L. as a designer. For the later years of the decade and the beginning of the 1990s, Barrie designed for the Italian design house Krizia and for the Japanese firm Kinshido. In 1993 Barrie died of brain cancer in Alessandria, Italy, he was 52.

—Kevin Almond

BARTLETT, John

American designer

Born: Cincinnati, Ohio, 1963. Education: Harvard University, B.A. in Sociology, 1985; graduated from Fashion Institute of Technology, 1988. Career: Interned with Willi Smith, Bill Robinson, and Ronaldus Shamask; men's designer for Williwear, 1988–89; design director, Ronaldus Shamask, 1989–91; own menswear line sold at Barneys, Bergdorf Goodman, and Charivari, 1992; partnership with Genny Spa and premiere of womenswear, 1997; creative director, Byblos menswear and womenswear collections sold at Saks and Neiman Marcus, own label sold at Henri Bendel, 1998. Awards: Fashion Institute of Technology Bill Robinson award, 1988; Woolmark "Cutting Edge" award, 1992; Fashion Institute of Technology Alumni award, 1994; Council of Fashion Designers of America Perry Ellis award for New

John Bartlett, spring 2001 collection: silk chiffon wrap blouse over crêpe satin ruched trouser. © Reuters NewMedia Inc./CORBIS.

Fashion Talent, 1994; Council of Fashion Designers of America award, 1997. Address: 450 West 15th Street, New York, NY, 10011, USA.

PUBLICATIONS

On BARTLETT:

Books

Stegemeyer, Anne, Who's Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.

Articles

Spindler, Amy M., "Menswear Expands the Notion of Basics," in the New York Times, 3 August 1993.

Shaw, Daniel, "Rookie of the Year," in the New York Times, 5 December 1993.

Horyn, Cathy, "Crusoe for the Modern Man," in the Washington Post, 6 February 1994.

"Sharkskin Bites Bartlett," in the DNR (New York), 29 July 1994.

John Bartlett, spring 2001 collection: suede reverse kimono. © AP/Wide World Photos.

- Martin, Richard, "Style Is as Style Does: The 'Forest Gump' Look," in Mondo Uomo (Milan), November-December 1994.
- Ezersky, Lauren, "Bringing Up Bartlett," in Paper (New York), December 1994.
- DeCaro, Frank, "If You've Got It, Flaunt It," in Newsweek, 12 August 1996.
- , "Gender Bend: Hot Boys to Haute Girls," in Newsweek, 21 April 1997.
- Tien, Ellen and Patti O'Brien, "From the Hip," in Rolling Stone, 30 October 1997.
- Gliatto, Tom and Sue Miller, "Cincinnati Kid," in People, 8 December 1997.
- Luscombe, Belinda, "The Anti-Calvin is Here," in Time, 24 August 1998.
- Solomon, Andrew, "Balancing Act," in the New York Times Magazine, 21 March 1999.
- Orecklin, Michele and Stacy Perman, "What Will We Wear?" in Time, 21 February 2000.
- Bellafante, Ginia, "Men's Wear: Talking Revolution and Showing Suits," in the New York Times, 12 February 2001.
- "John Bartlett," at FashionLive website (www.fashionlive.com/itv/designers/bartlett), 19 March 2001

Bressler, Karen, "Interview with John Bartlett," at FashionWindow website (www.fashionwindow.com/fashionwire), 22 March 2001.

Mui, Nelson, "John Bartlett Fall 2001," at FashionWindow website (www.fashionwindow.com/fashion_designers/john_bartlett), 22 March 2001.

* * *

When asked "What Will We Wear?" in a February 2000 Time magazine article about the future of fashion design after the dawn of the new millennium, John Bartlett answered, "The future will reference the past, drawing on everything from the Napoleonic era to the 1950s." This eclectic style of new and old, haute design and simple street clothes, ethos and pathos, personifies Bartlett and his clothes.

Bartlett's fashion is driven by ideas—astute ideas—about men and about clothes. For example, his spring/summer 1994 collection was for a man, as Bartlett said to the New York Times' Amy Spindler, "day-dreaming about cashing in his Gucci loafers for a lean-to on Easter Island." Bartlett's volitional Robinson Crusoe would have assembled an elegant mix of tribal tattoos, gauze tunics, and rough silk-twine jackets. As Spindler noted, "It's an ambitious designer who will take on Jean-Jacques Rousseau, but Mr. Bartlett did it with fervor." Bartlett never lacks fervor: he is determined—with a missionary's zeal—to make clothing meaningful.

Bartlett is a designer of convictions and of compellingly suggestive and allusive menswear. His spring/summer 1995 collection demonstrated the designer's learned and connected awareness of culture. A runway show that began with clothing inspired by the 1994 summer movie Forrest Gump in its nerdish normalcy, in distinctive mint greens, continued into navy-and-white evocations out of Jean Genêt (Edmund White's biography had just been published), sharp shark-skin two-button suits, and tour de force cross-dressing. Bartlett is a reader, observer, assimilator of contemporary culture in the best sense, bringing his acute sensitivity into his design. His shapeless structures were being updated into piquant reinterpretations of earlier silhouettes with trousers either cigarette-thin or perfectly tubular and shown on models as high-water pants. The Daily News Record (29 July 1994) enthused about the 1995 collection, "In just four short seasons, this glamor-boy designer has established himself as the enfant terrible—the Gaultier, if you will—of American men's wear." If there is a fault to Bartlett's work, it is that he is the best and consummate stylist of his own clothing. Few menswear customers will actually carry off the clothing with the full styling and intellectual jolt Bartlett imparts. But, of course, one might say the same of the ever-influential and beguiling Gaultier. One could easily imagine Bartlett fully assuming the Gaultier role of polite provocateur, a function woefully absent from American fashion.

Bartlett's designing capacity exploded in 1997 with the premiere of his first womenswear collection. "Designing for men is about subtlety; but women want fantasy. And I don't want to follow someone else's lead," Bartlett told Newsweek writer Frank DeCaro in April 1997. This aptly-named "Butch-Femme" collection mixed men's tailoring and sexual femininity featuring fitted leather shirts, cashmere Shaker-knit sweaters and slender Chesterfield coats. Very few menswear designers have been as successful as Ralph Lauren or Giorgio Armani in the leap across gender lines, but Bartlett's entry into the womenswear industry received rave reviews and left women wanting more of his flattering fashions. "A star is born," applauded Allure magazine's Polly Allen Mellen.

"My clothes are not for the woman who's shy...She's very self-confident," Bartlett told People magazine in December 1997, after his spring 1998 line was introduced. Inspired by the alluring charm of 1950s film noir, this naughty line matched sling-tops with leather pencil skirts and taffeta police pants with crystal-studded muscle t-shirts. Subsequently self-confidence presided over his 1999 collection when both men and women models presented his first-ever unisex showing, which Andrew Solomon of the New York Times Magazine found "to indicate the coherence of [Bartlett's] vision. It's a balancing act, sexual though ungendered, and balancing is his greatest strength."

Balance, sexuality, and drama united into a spectacular exposition of his spring 2001 line. Framed by a tower of white-powdered, body-building, Adonis-like men, Bartlett's Japanese-inspired silks and chiffons sailed down the runway metaphorically tied together by a strand of rope. "There are chiffon dresses within the rope theme featuring twisted pieces of fabric and graphic rope prints," described Bartlett for the FashionWindow website in March 2000. "There were chiffon pieces with floaty kimono sleeves worn with strict, sexy leather pants, as well as matte jersey dresses which are perfect to travel with." When author Karen Bressler asked him of the future, Bartlett answered, "The most heralded collections are individualistic."

Bartlett's distinct eccentricity and individuality came full-circle when he returned to his roots for the fall 2001 show and displayed his militaristic men's collection with emotion and meaning. Visitors entered his showroom and viewed models lying lifeless on army cots and wearing long, sexy military coats and fatigue jackets. A tribute to the struggle and survival of World War II German soldier and artist Joseph Beuys, this presentation, according to Nelson Mui of the FashionWindow website, followed in "perfect lockstep with the military beat fashion has been following once again."

John Bartlett, more than any other American designer of menswear, examines the basic tenets of men's bodies and their identity in dress. His "become yourself" philosophy is inexhaustibly optimistic. His clothing is so idiosyncratically shrewd and seductive, one could wish many more would choose either to become themselves or, perhaps even better, to realize the ideal thinking men and women Bartlett creates.

—Richard Martin; updated by Jodi Essey-Stapleton

BARTON, Germain "Alix"

See GRÈS, Madame

BASTILLE, Franck Joseph

French designer

Born: circa 1964. Career: Known for whimsical designs and embroidered motifs; clothing sold at Galeries Lafayette, New York, among other places. Exhibitions: Fashion and Surrealism, New York, 1987. Address: 13 rue de la Roquette, 75011 Paris.

PUBLICATIONS

On BASTILLE:

Articles

"Bastille's Day," in Elle (New York), July 1989.
Petkanas, Christopher, "Nouvelle Chic," in Harper's Bazaar, December 1991.

* * *

Irreverent is the word for the designs of Franck Joseph Bastille. In the best tradition of Elsa Schiaparelli, whose whimsical and dreamlike designs shocked and delighted earlier fashion audiences, Bastille's witty collections launched him into the limelight as one of Paris' rising young stars. The presentation of his new ideas each season, often shown in an offbeat, trendy venue, invariably spurred fashion headlines, due in no small part to the ironic flourishes which have become his trademark.

Embroidered quotes from the animal kingdom have figured largely in Bastille's oeuvre. Lizards and lobsters, ants and rats, fish and cats—all have found their way onto his clothes. A thigh-high skirt might sport a creature snaking along the hem, or a plain vinyl shift may be stitched all over with a bright menagerie. Never one to be limited by convention, Bastille has been known to embroider frogs on a black vinyl coat and then upholster a chair with the same material.

Like his young Parisian peers he finds inspiration in a multitude of sources, sifting through a postmodern melange of ideas and adapting some directly, borrowing from others quite loosely. One fashion show had as its theme the permutations of water, from the beauty of the shimmering sea to the murky mystery of the subterranean underworld. Bastille showed a range of clever, bold clothes, including seaweed-hued frocks decorated with plastic fish, and his own kitschy interpretation of the sort of studded denim resort clothes worn on the Riviera. Other visual puns have included a black suit appliquéd with silver guns, and a simple shift dress with a cut-out heart over the chest. And he is not above the sly tongue-in-cheek gesture, as in his wedding gown embroidered all over with the word oui.

Like many young designers, Bastille has rummaged about in the past for ideas, and references to different style periods can be discerned in his clothes. He became identified with 1950s–60s trapeze shapes and princess cuts for a time, but has also toyed with the body-revealing, sexy clothing of the 1980s and the decade's preoccupation with physical fitness. A collection that included clingy little body suits, short shorts, wispy slips, and satin bustiers showed that his clothes were not for the conservative customer, nor for one of advancing age. Pieces such as these demonstrate that Bastille is designing for a young, daring, and fashion-forward buyer who considers clothing a form of provocative personal expression.

Bastille has been called "fearless, with a touch of elegance." He has been known to turn a simple suit into an arch statement with the use of riotous color, as in his peacock-feather printed suit. In addition to appliqués and cut-outs he has experimented with "out of context" fabrics, using slippery synthetics, shiny satins, and crushed velvets for daytime wear, home-furnishing fabrics for clothing designs, and vice versa. Bastille might cover a blazer with sequins or fashion a strappy shift out of black vinyl, making a bold statement about the allure of "bad taste" while erasing demarcations between clothes for different events or times of day.

"My clothes are not for the woman who's shy...She's very self-confident," Bartlett told People magazine in December 1997, after his spring 1998 line was introduced. Inspired by the alluring charm of 1950s film noir, this naughty line matched sling-tops with leather pencil skirts and taffeta police pants with crystal-studded muscle t-shirts. Subsequently self-confidence presided over his 1999 collection when both men and women models presented his first-ever unisex showing, which Andrew Solomon of the New York Times Magazine found "to indicate the coherence of [Bartlett's] vision. It's a balancing act, sexual though ungendered, and balancing is his greatest strength."

Balance, sexuality, and drama united into a spectacular exposition of his spring 2001 line. Framed by a tower of white-powdered, body-building, Adonis-like men, Bartlett's Japanese-inspired silks and chiffons sailed down the runway metaphorically tied together by a strand of rope. "There are chiffon dresses within the rope theme featuring twisted pieces of fabric and graphic rope prints," described Bartlett for the FashionWindow website in March 2000. "There were chiffon pieces with floaty kimono sleeves worn with strict, sexy leather pants, as well as matte jersey dresses which are perfect to travel with." When author Karen Bressler asked him of the future, Bartlett answered, "The most heralded collections are individualistic."

Bartlett's distinct eccentricity and individuality came full-circle when he returned to his roots for the fall 2001 show and displayed his militaristic men's collection with emotion and meaning. Visitors entered his showroom and viewed models lying lifeless on army cots and wearing long, sexy military coats and fatigue jackets. A tribute to the struggle and survival of World War II German soldier and artist Joseph Beuys, this presentation, according to Nelson Mui of the FashionWindow website, followed in "perfect lockstep with the military beat fashion has been following once again."

John Bartlett, more than any other American designer of menswear, examines the basic tenets of men's bodies and their identity in dress. His "become yourself" philosophy is inexhaustibly optimistic. His clothing is so idiosyncratically shrewd and seductive, one could wish many more would choose either to become themselves or, perhaps even better, to realize the ideal thinking men and women Bartlett creates.

—Richard Martin; updated by Jodi Essey-Stapleton

BARTON, Germain "Alix"

See GRÈS, Madame

BASTILLE, Franck Joseph

French designer

Born: circa 1964. Career: Known for whimsical designs and embroidered motifs; clothing sold at Galeries Lafayette, New York, among other places. Exhibitions: Fashion and Surrealism, New York, 1987. Address: 13 rue de la Roquette, 75011 Paris.

PUBLICATIONS

On BASTILLE:

Articles

"Bastille's Day," in Elle (New York), July 1989.
Petkanas, Christopher, "Nouvelle Chic," in Harper's Bazaar, December 1991.

* * *

Irreverent is the word for the designs of Franck Joseph Bastille. In the best tradition of Elsa Schiaparelli, whose whimsical and dreamlike designs shocked and delighted earlier fashion audiences, Bastille's witty collections launched him into the limelight as one of Paris' rising young stars. The presentation of his new ideas each season, often shown in an offbeat, trendy venue, invariably spurred fashion headlines, due in no small part to the ironic flourishes which have become his trademark.

Embroidered quotes from the animal kingdom have figured largely in Bastille's oeuvre. Lizards and lobsters, ants and rats, fish and cats—all have found their way onto his clothes. A thigh-high skirt might sport a creature snaking along the hem, or a plain vinyl shift may be stitched all over with a bright menagerie. Never one to be limited by convention, Bastille has been known to embroider frogs on a black vinyl coat and then upholster a chair with the same material.

Like his young Parisian peers he finds inspiration in a multitude of sources, sifting through a postmodern melange of ideas and adapting some directly, borrowing from others quite loosely. One fashion show had as its theme the permutations of water, from the beauty of the shimmering sea to the murky mystery of the subterranean underworld. Bastille showed a range of clever, bold clothes, including seaweed-hued frocks decorated with plastic fish, and his own kitschy interpretation of the sort of studded denim resort clothes worn on the Riviera. Other visual puns have included a black suit appliquéd with silver guns, and a simple shift dress with a cut-out heart over the chest. And he is not above the sly tongue-in-cheek gesture, as in his wedding gown embroidered all over with the word oui.

Like many young designers, Bastille has rummaged about in the past for ideas, and references to different style periods can be discerned in his clothes. He became identified with 1950s–60s trapeze shapes and princess cuts for a time, but has also toyed with the body-revealing, sexy clothing of the 1980s and the decade's preoccupation with physical fitness. A collection that included clingy little body suits, short shorts, wispy slips, and satin bustiers showed that his clothes were not for the conservative customer, nor for one of advancing age. Pieces such as these demonstrate that Bastille is designing for a young, daring, and fashion-forward buyer who considers clothing a form of provocative personal expression.

Bastille has been called "fearless, with a touch of elegance." He has been known to turn a simple suit into an arch statement with the use of riotous color, as in his peacock-feather printed suit. In addition to appliqués and cut-outs he has experimented with "out of context" fabrics, using slippery synthetics, shiny satins, and crushed velvets for daytime wear, home-furnishing fabrics for clothing designs, and vice versa. Bastille might cover a blazer with sequins or fashion a strappy shift out of black vinyl, making a bold statement about the allure of "bad taste" while erasing demarcations between clothes for different events or times of day.

Bastille has crafted separates out of multihued patchwork fabric comprised of satin, floral print, and sequined squares, giving literal form to the bricolage cultural trend so prevalent in the late-20th century. In short, the imaginative, playful Franck Joseph Bastille (whose name is borrowed from the famous French prison destroyed during the French Revolution) aims to startle and amuse with his designs, asserting that fashion does not have to be such serious business.

—Kathleen Paton

BEENE, Geoffrey

American designer

Born: Haynesville, Louisiana, 30 August 1927. Education: Studied medicine, Tulane University, New Orleans, 1943–46, University of Southern California, Los Angeles, 1946; studied fashion, Traphagen School, New York, 1947–48, Chambre Syndicale d'Haute Couture and Académie Julien, Paris, 1948. Career: Display assistant, I. Magnin, Los Angeles, 1946; apprentice tailor, Molyneux, 1948–50; assistant to Mildred O'Quinn, Samuel Winston, Harmay, and other New York fashion houses, 1950–51; assistant designer, Harmony ready-to-wear, New York, 1951–58; designer, Teal Traina, New York, 1958–62; founder/director, Geoffrey Beene Inc., beginning 1962; showed first collection, 1963; first menswear collection, 1970; introduced Beenebag sportswear collection, 1971; established Cofil SpA, 1976, to manufacture for Europe and the Far East; opened first boutique, New York, 1989; introduced home furnishings collection, 1993; designed costumes for ballet Diabelli, 1999. Fragrances include Gray Flannel, 1975; Bowling Green, 1987. Exhibitions: Geoffrey Beene: 25 Years of Discovery, Los Angeles, Western Reserve Historical Society, Cleveland, Ohio, National Academy of Design, New York, and Musashino Museum, Tokyo, all 1988; Geoffrey Beene Unbound, Fashion Institute of Technology, New York, 1994; Geoffrey Beene, Toledo Museum of Art, Toledo, Ohio, 1997; China International Clothing and Accessories Fair, Beijing, 1998; Zippers and Harnesses, New York, 1999. Awards: Coty American Fashion Critics award, 1964, 1966, 1968, 1974, 1975, 1977, 1981, 1982; National Cotton Council award, 1964, 1969; Neiman Marcus award, 1965; Ethel Traphagen award, New York, 1966; Council of Fashion Designers of America award, 1986, 1987, 1989, special award, 1988; CFDA Lifetime Achievement award, 1997; Dallas Historical Society Fashion Collectors Stanley award, 1998; Marymount University (WA) Designer of the Year award, 2000; Fashion Walk of Fame, New York, initial inductee, 2000; Dallas Market Center Fashion Excellence award, 2001. Address: 550 Seventh Avenue, New York, NY 10018, USA.

Design by Geoffrey Beene, 1965. © Bettmann/CORBIS.

PUBLICATIONS

On BEENE:

Books

- Morris, Bernadine, and Barbara Walz, The Fashion Makers, New York, 1978.
 Milbank, Caroline Rennolds, Couture: The Great Designers, New York, 1985.
 Diamonstein, Barbaralee, Fashion: The Inside Story, New York, 1985.
 Coleridge, Nicholas, The Fashion Conspiracy, London, 1988.
 National Academy of Design, New York, Geoffrey Beene: The First 25 Years [exhibition catalogue], Tokyo, 1988.
 Milbank, Caroline Rennolds, New York Fashion: The Evolution of American Style, New York, 1989.
 Martin, Richard, Beene: Thirty Years, New York, 1993.
 Fashion Institute of Technology, Geoffrey Beene Unbound [exhibition catalogue], New York, 1994.
 Cullerton, Brenda, Geoffrey Beene: The Anatomy of His Work, New York, 1995.
 Jacobs, Laura, Beauty and the Beene, a Modern Legend, New York, 1999.

Articles

- Bowles, J., "It's a Beene," in Vogue, January 1977.
 "Geoffrey Beene: Maître incontesté de la couture," in L'Officiel (Paris), September 1985.
 "Modern Attitude: The Essence of Geoffrey Beene," in Vogue, February 1986.
 Hyde, Nina, "Geoffrey Beene, Simply Elegant: The Designer and His Lifetime Devotion to Fabric," in the Washington Post, 19 April 1987.

Bastille has crafted separates out of multihued patchwork fabric comprised of satin, floral print, and sequined squares, giving literal form to the bricolage cultural trend so prevalent in the late-20th century. In short, the imaginative, playful Franck Joseph Bastille (whose name is borrowed from the famous French prison destroyed during the French Revolution) aims to startle and amuse with his designs, asserting that fashion does not have to be such serious business.

—Kathleen Paton

BEENE, Geoffrey

American designer

Born: Haynesville, Louisiana, 30 August 1927. Education: Studied medicine, Tulane University, New Orleans, 1943–46, University of Southern California, Los Angeles, 1946; studied fashion, Traphagen School, New York, 1947–48, Chambre Syndicale d'Haute Couture and Académie Julien, Paris, 1948. Career: Display assistant, I. Magnin, Los Angeles, 1946; apprentice tailor, Molyneux, 1948–50; assistant to Mildred O'Quinn, Samuel Winston, Harmay, and other New York fashion houses, 1950–51; assistant designer, Harmony ready-to-wear, New York, 1951–58; designer, Teal Traina, New York, 1958–62; founder/director, Geoffrey Beene Inc., beginning 1962; showed first collection, 1963; first menswear collection, 1970; introduced Beenebag sportswear collection, 1971; established Cofil SpA, 1976, to manufacture for Europe and the Far East; opened first boutique, New York, 1989; introduced home furnishings collection, 1993; designed costumes for ballet Diabelli, 1999. Fragrances include Gray Flannel, 1975; Bowling Green, 1987. Exhibitions: Geoffrey Beene: 25 Years of Discovery, Los Angeles, Western Reserve Historical Society, Cleveland, Ohio, National Academy of Design, New York, and Musashino Museum, Tokyo, all 1988; Geoffrey Beene Unbound, Fashion Institute of Technology, New York, 1994; Geoffrey Beene, Toledo Museum of Art, Toledo, Ohio, 1997; China International Clothing and Accessories Fair, Beijing, 1998; Zippers and Harnesses, New York, 1999. Awards: Coty American Fashion Critics award, 1964, 1966, 1968, 1974, 1975, 1977, 1981, 1982; National Cotton Council award, 1964, 1969; Neiman Marcus award, 1965; Ethel Traphagen award, New York, 1966; Council of Fashion Designers of America award, 1986, 1987, 1989, special award, 1988; CFDA Lifetime Achievement award, 1997; Dallas Historical Society Fashion Collectors Stanley award, 1998; Marymount University (WA) Designer of the Year award, 2000; Fashion Walk of Fame, New York, initial inductee, 2000; Dallas Market Center Fashion Excellence award, 2001. Address: 550 Seventh Avenue, New York, NY 10018, USA.

Design by Geoffrey Beene, 1965. © Bettmann/CORBIS.

PUBLICATIONS

On BEENE:

Books

- Morris, Bernadine, and Barbara Walz, The Fashion Makers, New York, 1978.
 Milbank, Caroline Rennolds, Couture: The Great Designers, New York, 1985.
 Diamonstein, Barbaralee, Fashion: The Inside Story, New York, 1985.
 Coleridge, Nicholas, The Fashion Conspiracy, London, 1988.
 National Academy of Design, New York, Geoffrey Beene: The First 25 Years [exhibition catalogue], Tokyo, 1988.
 Milbank, Caroline Rennolds, New York Fashion: The Evolution of American Style, New York, 1989.
 Martin, Richard, Beene: Thirty Years, New York, 1993.
 Fashion Institute of Technology, Geoffrey Beene Unbound [exhibition catalogue], New York, 1994.
 Cullerton, Brenda, Geoffrey Beene: The Anatomy of His Work, New York, 1995.
 Jacobs, Laura, Beauty and the Beene, a Modern Legend, New York, 1999.

Articles

- Bowles, J., "It's a Beene," in Vogue, January 1977.
 "Geoffrey Beene: Maître incontesté de la couture," in L'Officiel (Paris), September 1985.
 "Modern Attitude: The Essence of Geoffrey Beene," in Vogue, February 1986.
 Hyde, Nina, "Geoffrey Beene, Simply Elegant: The Designer and His Lifetime Devotion to Fabric," in the Washington Post, 19 April 1987.

Geoffrey Beene, fall 1999 collection. © AP/Wide World Photos.

- Bryant, Gay, "Living for Fashion," in Connoisseur (New York), May 1987.
- Monget, K., "Designer Profiles: 1988 Marks 25th Year in American Fashion for Geoffrey Beene," in New York Apparel News, May 1987.
- "The World of Geoffrey Beene," in Vogue, September 1987.
- "Vogue's Spy: Geoffrey Beene," in Vogue (London), October 1987.
- Morrisroe, Patricia, "American Beauty: The World of Geoffrey Beene," in New York Magazine, 30 May 1988.
- Buck, Joan Juliet, "The Eye of Geoffrey Beene," in Vogue, September 1988.
- Blane, Mark, "Mr. Beene: The First 25 Years," in Harper's Bazaar (New York), October 1988.
- Armstrong, Lisa, "The Thoroughly Modern Mr. Beene," in Vogue (London), April 1990.
- Betts, Katherine, "Showstopper," in Vogue, September 1991.
- Donovan, Carrie, "Geoffrey Beene," in the New York Times, 9 May 1993.
- Beard, Patricia, "Beene There, Done That," in Town & Country, July 1993.
- Hirst, Arlene, "Mr. Beene: America's New Homebody," in Metropolitan Home (New York), July/August 1993.
- Morris, Bernadine, "Beene: If Ever a Wiz There Was," in the New York Times, 5 November 1993.
- Livingstone, David, "Beene Unbound, Grace Regained," in the Globe and Mail (Toronto), 5 May 1994.
- Trittoléno, Martine, "L'Elégance Radicale," Vogue (Paris), June/July 1994.
- Beckett, Kathleen, "Runway Report—In-Kleined to Wow Fans: Geoffrey Beene," in the New York Post, 1 November 1994.
- Spindler, Amy M., "Beene: Innovative and, Yes, Intellectual," in the New York Times, 8 April 1995.
- Menkes, Suzy, "A Crisis in Confidence: Reinventing the American Dream," in the International Herald Tribune, 11 April 1995.
- Jacobs, Laura, "Beene There," in the New Republic, 20 November 1995.
- Gash, Barbara, "Geoffrey Beene Elevates Clothing to an Art Form," in the Detroit Free Press, 18 January 1998.
- Harris, Joyce Saenz, "A Cut Above," in the Dallas Morning News, 22 April 1998.
- Luther, Marylou, "Fashion Twain Geoffrey Beene Addresses East-West Link with China," in the Rocky Mountain News (Denver, CO), 24 December 1998.
- Donnally, Trish, "Anatomy of a Designer," in the San Francisco Chronicle, 8 June 1999.
- Blanchard, Tamsin, "Agenda Two: Mr. Beene," in the Observer (London), 13 June 1999.
- Wilson, Eric, "No More Runways for Beene," in Women's Wear Daily, 15 February 2000.
- _____, "Beene Walks Walk and Talks Some Talk," in Women's Wear Daily, 7 June 2000.
- Moss, Meredith, "Fabric is Key to Geoffrey Beene Designs," in the Dayton Daily News (Ohio), 8 July 2001.

* * *

"Among the fashion cognoscenti, [Geoffrey] Beene has long been acknowledged as an artist who chooses to work in cloth," reported Carrie Donovan in the New York Times in May 1993. "Every season his work astounds as he ingeniously shapes the most modern and wearable of clothes." For some, the designation of fashion as art is simply a way of saying "the best," and Geoffrey Beene is certainly one of the best designers of the 20th century and still around in the 21st century. His art resides in certain principles and preoccupations—reversibility, superbly clean cutting, and a fluidity of cloth to body in the manner of Vionnet; an origami-like three-dimensionality that approaches sculpture; a propensity for cubism, piecing the garment from regular forms in a new tangency and relationship one to another; and a modernist indulgence in the medium, relishing the textiles of both tradition and of advanced technology.

Such abiding elements of art in his work do not mitigate other elements. History may be seized, as in a remarkable Confederate dress inspired by the gray uniform of the Southern army in the American Civil War. Sensuous appreciation of the body is ever present in Beene's work (he initially went to medical school and always demonstrates his interest in the body and ergonomics). His lace dresses expose the body in underwear—defying gyres of inset lace, a tour de force of the body's exposure and of the security of the wearer in the dress's perfect and stable proportions. He shifts, conceals, and maneuvers the waist as no other designer has since Balenciaga.

Born in the South, Beene's personal style is of utmost charm, and his clothes betray his sense of good taste, though often with gentility's piquant notes. His 1967 long sequined football jersey was sportswear with a new goal in the evening and played with the anomaly of simple style with liquid elegance. Sweatshirt fabric and denim would be carried into eveningwear by Beene, upsetting convention. A brash gentility combined leather and lace; a charming wit provided for circus motifs. In particular, Beene loved the genteel improbity of stealing from menswear textiles (shirting fabrics and gray flannel) for women's clothing.

The designer has been careful to surprise, rather than shock, the viewer when dressing the female form. He attributes his respect for women to his Southern upbringing and aims for the sensuous rather than the sexy in his creations. Clothing from Beene is made for movement and never restricts or binds the wearer. He uses color well but sparingly and believed too much color overwhelmed the individual.

Beene had a profound affinity with his contemporary Southerner Jasper Johns, who practiced consummate good taste in art but with the startling possibilities of popular-culture appropriations, new dispositions to familiar elements, and a strong sense of modern cultural pastiche. Like Johns, Beene was fascinated by trompe l'oeil and played with illusion. Specific illusions of a tie and collar on a dress were the most obvious, but other wondrous tricks of illusion in clothing were found in three-dimensional patterns replicated in textile and vice versa. His bolero jackets so effectively complemented the simplicity of his dresses that jacket and dress became an indistinguishable ensemble. Even his preoccupation with double-faced fabrics and reversible abstract designs were sophisticated illusionism.

Optically, Beene demands both near-sightedness and far-sightedness. Even before his most fluid forms emerged in the 1970s and 1980s, he had been influenced by op art to create graphically striking apparel. His frequent use of black and white was a treatment that could be read across a room and acted as sign. But one can approach a Beene composition in black and white close up with the same scrutiny of a Frank Stella black painting: there is a fascination up close even more gratifying than the sign from afar. In Beene's case, texture is an important element, and the distant reading of graphic clarity became far more complex when disparate textures were mingled. Like reversibility, the near-far dialectic in Beene was provocative: utter simplicity from a distance became infinite technicality up close. Since the 1990s, Beene has often eschewed the catwalk showing of new collections, preferring to display garments on static dress forms, allowing viewers to examine the garment attentively and immediately, as one might appreciate painting or sculpture.

Contributing to the aura of Beene is his unapologetic individuality. He has never cared to please the critics or celebrities, preferring instead to dress the average person. Beene also dislikes runway shows; in 1993, he replaced his supermodels with dancers, highlighting the fluidity of his designs. In 2000 he announced he would no longer be presenting his clothing via runway shows but would instead look to presentation through film, television, or the Internet.

But despite, or perhaps in part because of Beene's eccentricities, he continues to draw acclaim from those in the fashion world who best know great design. He was one of only four living designers to be included in the initial induction of New York City's Fashion Center Walk of Fame (à la Hollywood's Walk of Fame) in 2000. His plaque reads, "A designer's designer, Geoffrey Beene is one of the most artistic and individual of fashion's creators. He is known for his surgically clean cutting and his fluid use of materials. His designs display a sensuous appreciation of the body and always permit movement. Beene blends masterful construction techniques with seemingly disparate elements, such as whimsically patterned fabrics. The end results are spirited garments, like his famous sequined football jersey evening gown."

Art, to describe Beene's clothing, is not vacuous or striving to compliment. Rather, art recognizes a process and suite of objectives inherent in the work. In a discipline of commercial fulfillment, Beene displays the artist's absolute primacy and self-confidence of design exploration.

—Richard Martin; updated by Carrie Snyder

BELLVILLE SASSOON- LORCAN MULLANY

British couture and ready-to-wear firm, Bellville Sassoon & Bellville Sassoon-Lorcan Mullany, respectively.

Founded: Belinda Bellville founded own company, 1953, joined by designer David Sassoon to form Bellville Sassoon, 1958; Bellville retired from company, 1983; Bellville Sassoon-Lorcan Mullany founded, 1987. David Sassoon born in London, 5 October 1932; attended Chelsea College of Art, 1954–56, and Royal College of Art, London, 1956–58; served in the Royal Air Force, 1950–53. Lorcan Mullany born 3 August 1953; trained at Grafton Academy, Dublin; worked for Bill Gibb, Hardy Amies, and Ronald Joyce in London before producing collection under his own name in 1983; joined Bellville Sassoon in 1987. Company History: Ready-to-wear collection sold in, among others, Saks Fifth Avenue, Bloomingdale's, and Henri Bendel, all in New York, and Harrods and Harvey Nichols, both in London; flagship store in Chelsea, London. Exhibitions: Fashion: An Anthology, Victoria & Albert Museum, London, 1971. Company Address: 18 Culford Gardens, London SW3 2ST, England.

PUBLICATIONS

On BELLVILLE SASSOON-LORCAN MULLANY:

Books

O'Hara, Georgina, The Encyclopedia of Fashion, New York, 1986.
The Cutting Edge: Fifty Years of Fashion, New York, n.d.

Articles

- Thomas, Jacqueline H., "Profile," in Vogue Pattern Book (New York & London), 1984.
Holder, Margaret, "That Sassoon Touch," in Royalty (London), 1989.
Griffiths, Sally, "Well-Dressed Surroundings," in House & Garden (London), 1991.
Polan, Brenda, "Vital Sassoon," in the Tatler (London), September 1992.
Watson, Ines, "Sassoon Assesses South African Talent," in the Dispatch Online, 13 November 1998.

*

I like clothes that flatter a woman and are sexy; if a woman feels good in the clothes I design, she looks good. I enjoy designing cocktail and eveningwear with my codesigners Lorcan Mullany and George Sharp. We work together as a team to produce ready-to-wear dresses, sometimes in a romantic mood, sometimes whimsical or sexy... I love colour and beautiful fabrics. Each season we try to do something different, but always with a distinct Bellville Sassoon-Lorcan Mullany handwriting, which our buyers always look for. Our collection is sold internationally and each country looks for a different fashion concept, so our collections are always varied, never sticking to one theme. I do not like to philosophize about clothes; they are, after all, only garments to be worn and discarded as the mood of fashion changes.

—David Sassoon

* * *

The company of Bellville Sassoon-Lorcan Mullany has been jointly run by David Sassoon (who owned the company and designed the couture), and Lorcan Mullany who joined in 1987 and was responsible for the ready-to-wear. Together they provide a very English version of glamorous occasion dressing and eveningwear, uncomplicated, clear, and immensely flattering clothes worn by society ladies and the international jet set, which included the late Princess of Wales, Ivana Trump, Shakira Caine, Dame Kiri Te Kanawa, and the Countess von Bismarck, to name but a few. The company has also been renowned for its romantic wedding dresses, designed to order, and the selection of designs available in the Vogue Pattern Book's designer section, which sell internationally.

"You have to find your own niche," declared David Sassoon to the Tatler in September 1992, when questioned about his approach to design. "You cannot be all things to all markets. My philosophy of fashion is that I like to make the kind of clothes that flatter. I am not interested in fashion for its own sake. If you make a woman feel good, she looks good automatically." On leaving the Royal College of Art fashion school in the late 1950s Sassoon was recruited as Belinda Bellville's design assistant. She recognized in him a designer who had a strong, distinctive signature and a simple approach that was romantic in style but dramatic and very feminine.

Together Bellville and Sassoon became business partners, naming the company Bellville et Cie, to capitalize on the prevalent conception that all smart clothes were French. From the start it attracted vast attention from press and buyers. "We gave our first show in my grandmother's house in Manchester Square and the next day there was a queue outside the shop, with Bentleys blocking the street," declared Belinda Bellville.

Sassoon identified the peak of his career as being the period between the late 1960s and 1970s when he believed the taste for high romanticism and fantasy clothes endorsed his style. The company was constantly featured in the pages of glossy magazines, sharing the stage with contemporaries such as Zandra Rhodes, Gina Fratini, and Bill Gibb. Sassoon regrets that the British fashion press often flippantly discarded designers as no longer newsworthy, comparing this with the American press who always acknowledged good design. Bill Blass and Oscar de la Renta, he declared, may no longer be in the forefront of fashion but the press still regards them as newsworthy.

In the 1970s emphasis on couture was dwindling and the company realized that in order to survive, the ready-to-wear line had to be built up. The decision proved correct as the firm's business grew immensely in America and was promoted with fashion shows across the U.S. and at trade fairs in London, Paris, New York, Munich, and Dusseldorf. Their agents had little problem building a strong and impressive clientèle.

Lorcan Mullany, who joined the company upon Bellville's retirement, had a strong background in occasion and eveningwear. He trained at the Grafton Academy in Dublin and before joining David Sassoon, worked for Bill Gibb, Ronald Joyce, and Hardy Amies. The label soon bore the joint name Bellville Sassoon-Lorcan Mullany, justifiably crediting all designers for the product. By the mid- and late 1990s the company's clothes represented the top end of British occasion dressing, from sumptuous ballgowns to flirty cocktail dresses. Frills, sinuous draping, streamlined side splits, and plunging backs evoked memories of Hollywood in its glamorous heyday. Tulle, encrusted embroideries, taffetas, duchesse satin, mink, and double silk crepes were characteristic of the luxurious fabrics used. Unlike some eveningwear, the clothes were never gaudy or overstated; their success was reliant on a streamlined sense of style.

In 1998, after more than 40 years in the design business, David Sassoon was selected as the secret "international judge" of J&B's Rare Designers award. Sassoon traveled to Johannesburg, South Africa, for the competition and enjoyed the experience. He told Ines Watson of the Dispatch Online (13 November 1998), "It's been an interesting experience because I arrived with no preconceived idea of the South African fashion industry." He did, however, see "two huge differences between European and South African design—the latter is more individualistic but the former has the advantage of the enormous resources of textiles on offer."

In the 21st century, Bellville Sassoon-Lorcan Mullany continues to clothe a discerning clientèle, creating an annual ready-to-wear collection sold to the best of stores worldwide, including Harrods, Harvey Nichols, Saks Fifth Avenue, and Nieman Marcus to name a few. Additionally, vintage designs remain popular Vogue patterns, available in sewing stores and at various international websites.

—Kevin Almond; updated by Owen James

BENETTON SPA

Italian sportswear firm

Founded: by Giuliana (1938—), Luciano (1935—), Gilberto (1941—), and Carlo (1943—) Benetton, in Treviso, in 1965 as Maglificio di Ponzano Veneto dei Fratelli Benetton. Company History: First Benetton outlet opened in Belluno, Italy, 1968; first shop outside Italy, in Paris, 1969; launched major European expansion campaign, from 1978; first U.S. store, New York, 1979; first Eastern European shop, Prague, 1985; went public in Milan, 1986; formed Benetton Sportsystem SpA, 1989; opened huge stores in Paris, London, Barcelona, Lisbon, Frankfurt, Vienna, Prague, and Sarajevo, 1994; opened 50 shops in China and factory in Egypt, 1995; opened London megastore and New York flagship, 1996; bought sports group from parent company, 1997; formed Benetton USA with Sears, 1998; introduced Playlife stores, 1998–99; dumped by Sears, 2000; concentrated expansion in U.S., 2001. Company Address: Via Chiesa Ponzano 24, 31050 Ponzano Veneto, Treviso, Italy. Company Website: www.benetton.com.

PUBLICATIONS

On BENETTON:

Books

- Baker, Caroline, Benetton Colour Style File, London, 1987.
 Belussi, Fiorenza, Benetton: Information Technology in Production & Distribution, Brighton, 1987.
 Aragno, Bonizza Giordani, Moda Italia: Creativity and Technology in the Italian Fashion System, Milan, 1988.
 Mantle, Jonathan, Benetton—The Family, the Business, and the Brand, New York, 1999.

Articles

- Bentley, Logan, "The Tightknit Benetton," in People, 15 October 1984.
 Lee, Andrea, "Being Everywhere: Luciano Benetton," in the New Yorker, 10 November 1986.
 Coleman, Alix, "A Colourful Career," in the Sunday Express Magazine (London), 20 September 1987.
 Fierman, Jaclyn, "Dominating an Economy, Family-Style: The Italians," in Fortune, 12 October 1987.
 Finnerty, Anne, "The Internationalisation of Benetton," in Textile Outlook International (London), November 1987.
 "Alessandro Benetton," in Interview, April 1988.
 Fuhrman, Peter, "Benetton Learns to Darn," in Forbes, 3 October 1988.
 Griggs, Barbara, "The Benetton Fratelli," in Vogue (London), October 1988.
 Tornier, François, "Les 25 ans de Benetton," in Elle (Paris), 1 October 1990.
 Baker, Lindsay, "Taking Advertising to Its Limits," in The Guardian (London), 22 July 1991.
 Kanner, Bernice, "Shock Value," in New York, 24 September 1992.
 Waxman, Sharon, "The True Colors of Luciano Benetton," in the Washington Post, 17 February 1993.
 Rossant, John, "The Faded Colors of Benetton," in Business Week, 10 April 1995.

- Forden, Sara Gay, "Luciano Benetton Sees a Rosy Future Despite Cloudy Days," in Women's Wear Daily, 20 April 1995.
- Levine, Joshua, "Even When You Fail, You Learn a Lot," in Forbes, 11 March 1996.
- Rossant, John, "A Cozy Deal at Benetton," in Business Week, 28 July 1997.
- Edelson, Sharon, "Benetton's U.N. Mission," in Women's Wear Daily, 3 April 1998.
- Sansoni, Silvia, "The Odd Couple," in Forbes, 19 October 1998.
- Seckler, Valerie, "Benetton's Global Game Plan," in Women's Wear Daily, 1 July 1999.
- Garfield, Bob, "The Colors of Exploitation: Benetton on Death Row," in Advertising Age, 10 January 2000.
- "Sears Drops Benetton," in Women's Wear Daily, 17 February 2000.
- Gallagher, Leigh, "About Face," in Forbes, 19 March 2001.
- Moin, David, "Megastore Buildup: Benetton's Game Plan for U.S. Recovery," in Women's Wear Daily, 20 March 2001.

* * *

In recent years the Benetton Group of Italy has become better known for controversial advertising campaigns than for the brightly-colored knitted sweaters with which the company was founded in 1965. As part of a well defined global strategy to make the Benetton name as well known as McDonald's or Coca-Cola, the sibling members of the Benetton family—Giuliana, Luciano, Gilberto, and Carlo Benetton—created a multibillion-lire business with an ever growing cadre of shops in 120 countries worldwide. The company is a leading producer and retailer of casual apparel and sports-related goods, as well as licensed accessories such as cosmetics, toys, swimwear, eyeglasses, watches, stationery, underwear, shoes, and household items.

Benetton collections are aimed at young people and children, but over the years have been adopted by consumers of all ages. United Colors of Benetton attempts to transcend gender, social class, and nationality by manufacturing knitwear that exemplifies a philosophy of life. This was explicitly reflected in longtime creative director Oliviero Toscani's 1983 advertising campaign "Benetton—All the Colors of the World." The campaign depicted groups of children representing all walks of life wearing colorful Benetton garments. Subsequent campaigns commented on political and social issues including religion, sex, terrorism, race, AIDS, and capital punishment, without depicting actual Benetton garments. A number of controversial campaigns were banned by advertising authorities, fueling unprecedented media coverage.

Similar in attitude to the California-based Esprit company, Benetton epitomizes the values of a generation of young, socially aware consumers. Garments are designed to be fun, casual with an easy-to-wear cut. Inspiration is often drawn from past sentiments but produced with a contemporary twist, like 1950s ski fashions in high-tech synthetic ice-pastel fabrics, 1960s tailored suits in herringbone, 1970s disco garments with sequins and leather combined. Other collections have been based on themes such as the Nordic for little girls, designed in new fabrics like fleece, and Riding Star, drawn from the world of horseback riding. In keeping with the company's cosmopolitan attitude, collections have also been drawn from Benetton family travels.

In the beginning, Benetton sweaters were hand-knit by Giuliana in bright colors which distinguished them from existing English-made wool sweaters. The first collection consisted of 18 pieces, the most popular item being a violet pullover made from cashmere, wool, and angora. Today's apparel, of course, is produced on a much grander scale, using high-tech manufacturing and innovative marketing strategies. Benetton is certainly one of the most progressive clothing manufacturers in the world; yet its rapid rise has not come without a price. Profits fell off sharply after a lower-price initiative backfired in 1994; the European recession forced the closure of nearly 600 stores; its cosmetics division produced dismal results; then came family squabbles, and court battles with a group of German retailers who refused to pay for merchandise after another of Benetton's controversial ad campaigns (eventually resolved in Benetton's favor).

By 1995 a seemingly wiser Benetton had toned down its often offensive ads, belatedly realizing the shockwaves cost the firm time and money in having to defend its position. Instead, the firm concentrated on making money and much of it came from the expansion of sister firm, Benetton Sportswear SpA, which unabashedly pursued its intention of becoming the world's largest sports equipment and accessory company. While Sportswear was busy acquiring Rollerblade, Nordica, Langert, Prince, and others, Benetton was fielding major losses in the U.S. market.

By the end of the century, Benetton had opened a factory in Egypt and built megastores in London, New York, San Francisco, Moscow, Riyadh, Berlin, Hong Kong, and elsewhere. In a slick move, Benetton purchased a majority stake in its sibling, Sportswear, effectively segueing into the sporting goods and activewear industry, then introduced and stocked a chain of sporty stores called Playlife. To bolster its U.S. presence, the firm formed a joint venture with Sears (Benetton USA) and saw that alliance collapse after another provocative ad campaign ("We, on Death Row") enraged everyone from consumers to politicians in 2000.

Benetton had finally gone too far with its "shockvertising"—not only did it lose the lucrative contract with Sears and part ways with creative director Toscani after 18 years, but was forced to issue a formal apology to the families of those murdered by its poster-boy Death Row inmates. Ironically, a newer, gentler Benetton arose in 2001, surprising everyone with its low-key ads similar to those made popular by Gap. Generally panned, Benetton, as usual, ignored its critics and set about doing what it did best—selling Benetton. With new stores planned for a multitude of high profile cities in the U.S., Carlo Tunioli, executive vice president for Benetton USA, promised a bit of the old-style advertising in the near future. "Benetton will always be loyal to its brand DNA, which means social statement," Tunioli explained to Women's Wear Daily (20 March 2001). "Benetton will keep working in that direction, but much will be focused on product. It may be controversial, but we're not going to be controversial in the way you used to see Benetton." Time will tell if that holds true.

—Teal Triggs and Sydonie Benét

BENTZ, John

See CATALINA SPORTSWEAR

BERTELLI, Patrizio

See PRADA

BET, Xüly

See KOUYATÉ, Lamine

BIAGIOTTI, Laura

Italian designer

Born: Rome, Italy, 4 August 1943. Education: Degree in archaeology, Rome University. Family: Married Gianni Cigna, 1992; children: Lavinia. Career: Worked in Biagiotti family ready-to-wear firm, Rome, 1962–65; freelance designer for Schuberth, Barocco, Cappucci, Heinz Riva, Licitro, and others, 1965–72; founder/designer, Laura Biagiotti Fashions, Rome, from 1972; took over MacPherson Knitwear, Pisa, 1974; established headquarters in Guidonia, 1980; introduced Rispeste collection, 1981; introduced Laurapiù collection, 1984; launched diffusion knitwear collection for Biagiotti Uomo, 1985; Biagiotti jeans collection debuted, 1986; Biagiotti Uomo collection, 1987; created perfumes Laura, 1982, Night, 1986, Roma, 1988, and Venezia, 1992; signed licensing agreement for Biagiotti shops in China, 1993; opened LB shop in Beijing, Bangkok, and Moscow, Laura Biagiotti, fall/winter 2001–02 collection: transparent chiffon top with leaf motif over satin pants. © AP/Wide World Photos.

1994; expanded cashmere collection in the Kremlin fashion show, 1995; fragrance Laura Biagiotti Roma released, 2001. Awards: Golden Lion award for achievement in linen, Venice, 1987; named Commendatore of the Italian Republic, 1987; Marco Polo award for high achievement in diffusing Italian style worldwide, 1993; Frenio Fragene for fashion achievements, 1994. Address: Biagiotti Export SpA, via Palombarese Km, 17.300, 00012 Guidonia, Rome, Italy.

PUBLICATIONS

On BIAGIOTTI:

Books

- Mulassano, Adriana, The Who's Who of Italian Fashion, Florence, 1979.
 Alfonsi, Maria-Vittoria, Leaders in Fashion: I Grandi Personaggi Della Moda, Bologna, 1983.
 "Laura Biagiotti," in Bonizza Giordani Aragno, ed., Moda Italia (Milan), 1988.
 Skellenger, Gillion, "Laura Biagiotti," in Contemporary Designers, London, 1990.
 Steele, Valerie, Women of Fashion, New York, 1991.
 Stegemeyer, Anne, Who's Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.

Articles

- Gorgia, Massimo, "Laura Biagiotti, Stylish et Italienne," in Vogue (Paris), August 1978.
 Petroff, Daniela, "Women Designers," in the International Herald Tribune, 3 October 1981.
 "Laura Biagiotti: Bianco per Tutte le Mode," in Vogue (Milan), October 1984.
 "The House of Biagiotti," in House & Garden, December 1986.
 "I Cashmere Ricamati di Laura Biagiotti," in Donna (Milan), October 1987.
 "Laura Biagiotti: I Piaceri Naturali," in Donna (Milan), February 1988.
 Menkes, Suzy, "Couture's Grand Ladies," in Illustrated London News, Spring 1990.
 Lender, Heidi, "Biagiotti's U.S. Invasion," in Women's Wear Daily, 12 February 1992.
 Costin, Glynis, "Laura Biagiotti's China Syndrome," in Women's Wear Daily, 21 May 1993.
 Cover story on Biagiotti, in Fashion Magazine, September 1994.
 Schiro, Anne-Marie, "Fashion: Russia, Women at Work and Elegance," in the New York Times, 8 March 1995.
 Barone, Amy B., "Fragrance Launch Fever," in Drug & Cosmetic Industry (New York), March 1997.
 Ball, Deborah, "In Fashion, Grasping English is as Relevant as Last Year's Handbag," in the Wall Street Journal, 17 October 2000.
 Davis, Don, "New Lines," in Global Cosmetic Industry (New York), May 2001.

* * *

Indisputably Italian, trained by her tailor mother to admire the couture of France but also witness to the quality of her mother's work and employed early on in Schuberth's elegant Italian ready-to-wear, Laura Biagiotti might seem the quintessential European. She is firmly devoted to fine materials, especially Italian, and has been called the Laura Biagiotti, fall/winter 2001–02 collection. © AP/Wide World Photos.

Queen of Cashmere. Close family ties reinforce the image, and Biagiotti's selection of Isabella d'Este as her ideal seemed to substantiate the nationalism of this designer's spirit. One of her fragrances is aptly named Venezia.

Looking at Biagiotti's clothes, however, one cannot help but think of America. Like Giorgio Armani, Biagiotti bespeaks Italian fashion but was redefining Italian fashion in the last quarter of the 20th century in a sense of sportswear, separates, menswear influences, and quality materials for the standardizing templates of clothing. Biagiotti tells the story that at the time of her first show in 1972, she had so few pieces that she showed one white jacket three times, once with a skirt for morning, once with a day dress, and finally with a shiny skirt for evening. "Unintentionally I had invented the use of only one item for morning to evening," she said.

If Biagiotti was, as she professes, initially inadvertent, her concept has become canny and global; her invention is necessarily as smart as it is coy. Her collections in the 1980s and 1990s sustained a sense of the marketably traditional, always freshened with insights and style inflections to become one of the most effective designers of the era.

Biagiotti's spring-summer 1990 collection, built around navy, red, and white (admittedly with other pieces as well but carefully constructed around the red, white, and blue core), not only anticipated

1993 merchandising of Carolyne Roehm but offered its clothes as wardrobe builders as well as dramatic outfits. Talking about her work to Valerie Steele for Women of Fashion: Twentieth-Century Designers (New York, 1991), Biagiotti said, "Elegance, taste, and creativity have belonged to the Italian tradition and character for centuries and I share this privilege with all other Italian designers."

Biagiotti has studied archaeology and is much engaged with the arts and architecture through generous support of archaeology and conservation. Yet again, her work is as much divorced from the historical past as one could imagine. It is as if she chose to restore the edifice (and she does live and work in what Gillian Skellenger, in Contemporary Designers, rightly calls the factory-castle of Marco Simone near Rome, a Romanesque-era edifice), but her decision is a gutted rehabilitation, putting everything new inside. There are no marks of historicism in her clothing, even in the fall-winter 1985–86 collection, when her monastics seem as much about Claire McCordell as about medievalism. Her abiding preference for white is symbolic, clean and notably modern in style, while her sensible knits address manifold uses for contemporary working women. As Skellenger noted, "Biagiotti reveals a mania for research," committed to new fabric study.

Biagiotti has spoken of her work as a personal projection, fit for a modern, self-confident, and business-aware woman. If she is considered the ideal client for her own clothing, her personal sensibility is toward simple almost reductive shape carried in luxury materials, an ethos sounding like three generations of American sportswear-to-evening designers. The women's clothing can be slightly flirtatious in the American mode, whereas her evening looks express her Roman sophistication, always with a reserve and sense of good taste. Biagiotti has come to represent decorum and fashion nuance unerring in its mainstream elegance, again a characterization she would share with Armani. What she does not share with Armani is his intense interest in menswear per se—while Biagiotti has designed menswear for many years, it seems even safer than her women's clothing and the epitome of conservative good taste.

Following the opening a Biagiotti boutique in Moscow, the Italian designer was invited to do a fashion show in the Kremlin. Featuring opera, ballet, and Biagiotti's fall collection, the 1995 show, not surprisingly, incorporated a taste of Russian elegance. Almost every piece of clothing—from evening dresses to pocket flaps—consisted of cashmere, thus reconfirming the designer's acclaimed title, Queen of Cashmere. In addition to cashmere, Biagiotti reintroduced beaded-flower, embroidered dresses in her Milan fashion show.

As 1997 neared and perfume launch activity began to slow, Italian perfumers released high-profile fragrances, including Biagiotti's Sotto Voce. Alone, the perfume did not, nor was it expected to, drive holiday sales. Even with the help of classics such as Tresor, Chanel No. 5, and Eau Sauvage, perfumes did not win over consumers' attention as they had in the past. With a new fragrance line, Laura Biagiotti Roma, launched in fall 2001, Biagiotti hoped to attract customers the perfume industry had not seen in years. As the fragrance is geared toward the younger generation, it was less expensive and more accommodating to a youthful market's budget. Laura Biagiotti Roma was available for both men and women, and had a seven-year licensing agreement with Singer International.

—Richard Martin; updated by Diana Idzelis

BIANCHINI-FÉRIER

French textile manufacturer

Founded: circa 1880 by Charles Bianchini and partners; changed name to Bianchini-Férier after partnership with Férier, around 1900. Company History: Signed Raoul Dufy, 1912; opened New York mill, 1921; teamed up with Vogue Patterns, 1949; merged with Tissage-Baumann, then acquired by Mayor-MDTA. Company Address: 4 rue Vaucanson, 69283 Lyon Cedex 01, France.

Publications:

On BIANCHINI-FÉRIER:

Books

- Crawford, M.D.C., The Ways of Fashion, New York, 1948.
 Musée de L'Impression sur Étoffes, Raoul Dufy [exhibition catalogue], Mulhouse, 1973.
 Musée Historique des Tissus, Les folles années de la soie [exhibition catalogue], Lyon, 1975.
 Arts Council of Great Britain, Raoul Dufy [exhibition catalogue], London, 1983.
 Galeria Marcel Bernheim, Raoul Dufy et la mode: ancienne collection, Bianchini-Férier [exhibition catalogue], Paris, 1985.
 Deslandres, Yvonne, and Dorothee Lianne, Paul Poiret: 1874–1944, London, 1987.
 Mackrell, Alice, Paul Poiret, New York, 1990.
 Schoesser, Mary, and Kathleen Dejardin, French Textiles from 1760 to the Present, London, 1991.

Articles

- Dufy, Raoul, "Les tissus imprimés," in Amour de L'Art, No. 1, 1920.
 Vallotaire, Michel, "New Textiles from France," in Studio, December 1928.
 "Bianchini-Férier ou la créative continue," in Vogue (Paris), November 1988.
 Weisman, Katherine, "Lyon Regaining Its Lost Cachet (Lyon, France, Silk Fabric Industry)," in Women's Wear Daily, 12 July 1994.
 D'Aulnay, Sophie, "SEHM—A World View of Diversity," in DNR, 22 January 1996.
 Maycumber, S. Gray, "European Rabrics to Preview This Week," in DNR, 15 January 2001.
 Gilbert, Daniela, "Preview: Staple Looks Rule Spring 2002," in Women's Wear Daily, 23 January 2001.

* * *

From its beginnings in the 1880s the House of Bianchini-Férier has been associated with the world's most luxurious silks. The Lyonnais firm first achieved widespread recognition for a collection of silk velvets and brocades shown at the Paris Exposition of 1889. A few years later Charles Bianchini and his partners opened a sales office in Paris. Offices in London, Geneva, Brussels, Montreal, Toronto, New York, Los Angeles, Chicago, and Buenos Aires quickly followed.

Working in close association with the leading couturiers of the day, Bianchini-Férier created fabrics which are considered standards today, but for which the company held the original copyright. Among them are charmeuse georgette, and the semisheer crêpe Romaine. Undoubtedly one of the best known collaborations between an artist and a manufacturer was between Raoul Dufy and Bianchini-Férier. Dufy first designed textiles for Paul Poiret in 1911. Failing to imitate his bold hand wood-blocked patterns, Bianchini went to the source and in 1912 signed Dufy to an exclusive contract, then renewed it annually until the late 1920s. For Bianchini, Dufy created brilliant florals in the palette of the Fauve painters. He designed geometrics using blocks of opposing colors—the design created equally by the object and by the negative space enclosing it—and he continued to execute the large scale block-prints originally produced for Poiret.

Poiret continued to use Dufy's designs for Bianchini in his collections; his summer 1920 collection employed Dufy's fabrics exclusively and Dufy himself sketched part of the collection for the May issue of the Gazette du Bon Ton. Theirs was surely one of the most significant collaborations between artist, couturier, and manufacturer of the period. While many establishments geared to the luxury market were forced to close or reorganize during the Depression, Bianchini not only survived but continued to experiment with new fibers and weave structures. Consequently, when silk became unobtainable during World War II, Bianchini had the technology in place to increase its production of rayon. And because the firm had opened a mill in Port Jervis, New York, back in 1921 to replicate patterns and textiles originating from Lyons, they did not wholly lose their overseas market during the war.

Within the industry, Bianchini was known especially for silk velvets and silk and metal brocades for haute couture. After the war the firm increased its efforts to reach the discerning home sewer who could provide an expanded market for their collections of silk and rayon prints. A 1949 collaboration with Vogue Patterns paired a collection of garments designed especially for Bianchini with a group of specific hand-screened prints. The March Vogue claimed these private edition prints were available in no more than 20 dress lengths each, to be distributed to select stores around the country. The advertising copy read "For the Woman Who Wants to Be Exclusive—A Couture Plan for Your Personal Dressmaking." The patterns allowed women who could not attend fashion shows to dress in high style like their wealthier counterparts.

For more than 100 years Bianchini-Férier set the standard for fine fabrics, used the world over. After its centennial, however, the firm faced dwindling sales and competition in the late 1980s and 1990s from Italian textile firms, as well as not having the kinds of fabrics appropriate for the growing ready-to-wear sportswear markets. Bianchini and other Lyonnais fabric producers were forced to adapt; not only did they have to create a wider range of fabrics but had to work with designers in developing their collections. Gone were most of old guard designers who knew instinctively what they wanted; a newer, younger group of designers had come to the fore often without the intimate knowledge of textiles their predecessors possessed.

Bianchini reached the 21st century having weathered the difficult years and adapted to the new standards for textiles. In 2000 the firm was showing acetate and rayon fabric mixes, as well as updating its famous silk with iridescent denim-twill in 2001. Hailed as the longest continuously-running mill in Europe, Bianchini is now renowned for much more than silk, though it has remained the silk manufacturer of choice, combining invention and artistry in equal measure.

—Whitney Blausen; updated by Sydonie Benét

BIKKEMBERGS, Dirk

Belgian designer

Born: Flammersheim, Germany, 3 January 1962. Education: Studied fashion at the Royal Academy of Arts, Antwerp. Military Service: Served with Royal Belgian Army, in Germany. Career: Freelance designer for Nero, Bassetti, Gruno and Chardin, Tiktiner, Gaffa, K, and Jaco Petti, 1982–87; launched Dirk Bikkembergs-Homme Co., with DB shoe line for men, 1985; introduced knitwear, 1986; first complete menswear collection, 1988; presented first womenswear line, Dirk Bikkembergs-Homme Pour La Femme, in Paris, 1993; moved to more luxe styling, 1998; participated in Mode 2001 Landed-Geland, Antwerp, 2001. Awards: For menswear collection, winter 1985–86, several Belgian fashion industry awards, including Golden Spindle. Address: Kidporp 21, 2000 Antwerp, Belgium.

Dirk Bikkembergs, spring/summer 1997 collection. © AP/Wide World Photos.

PUBLICATIONS

On BIKKEMBERGS:

Articles

- “Foreign Affairs—Antwerp,” in Blitz (London), February 1987.
- Mower, Sarah, “Six Romp,” in The Guardian (London), 12 February 1987.
- “Fashion,” in Interview (New York), July 1987.
- Ankone, Frans, “De Trots Van Vlaanderen,” in Avenue (Antwerp), September 1987.
- Tredre, Roger, “Belgians Go Branche,” in Fashion Weekly (London), 10 September 1987.
- Grauman, Brigid, “The Belgian Connection,” in Elle (London), October 1987.
- Lobrano, Alexander, “The Young Belgian,” in DNR (New York), October 1987.
- Fierce, Brad, “Il Menestrello Della Moda,” in Vanity (Milan), February 1988.
- “Nouvel Homme: Dirk Bikkembergs,” in Profession Textile (Paris), 24 June 1988.
- Grauman, Brigid, “Seam Stress,” in The Face (London), August 1988.
- Cocks, Jay, “A Look on the Wild Side: Two Young Designers Liven Up a Group Fashion Scene,” in Time, 16 January 1989.
- LaChapelle, David, “Dirk Bikkembergs,” in Interview (New York), October 1989.
- Rumbold, Judy, “Dirk Bikkembergs: Clean Cuts,” in Arena (London), November 1990.
- Valli, Jacopo, “The Antwerp Five,” in Donna (Milan), January 1991.
- Summers, Beth, “Obsession,” in i-D (London), February 1991.
- Tredre, Roger, “From Belgium but Far from Boring,” in the Independent (London), 2 July 1992.
- “Dirk Bikkembergs,” in L’Uomo Vogue (Milan), September 1992.
- Menkes, Suzy, “Cut, Color and Class: Male ‘Haute Couture’ Hits the High Cs,” in the International Herald Tribune, 30 January 1996.
- Daly, Steven, “Belgique: C’est Chic,” in Rolling Stone, 17 September 1998.
- Menkes, Suzy. “Chinese Dior Makes a Splash,” in the International Herald Tribune, 12 March 1997.
- _____, “At Dior, Galliano Fluffs It—Gorgeously,” in the International Herald Tribune, 15 October 1997.
- _____, “From Gucci, a Flash of Optimism,” in the International Herald Tribune, 2 July 1998.
- _____, “At Dior, a Victory for the People,” in the International Herald Tribune, 14 October 1998.
- “Dirk Bikkembergs,” available online at Fashion Live, www.fashionlive.com, 19 March 2001.
- Lowthorpe, Rebecca, “Big in Belgium: Fashion,” in the Independent on Sunday, 17 June 2001.
- Menkes, Suzy, “A New Season That’s Fit for Knits: Sweater Boys,” in the International Herald Tribune, 17 July 2001.

*

I design clothes for men and women that have a special, strong attitude; for a younger, future-minded generation for whom fashion

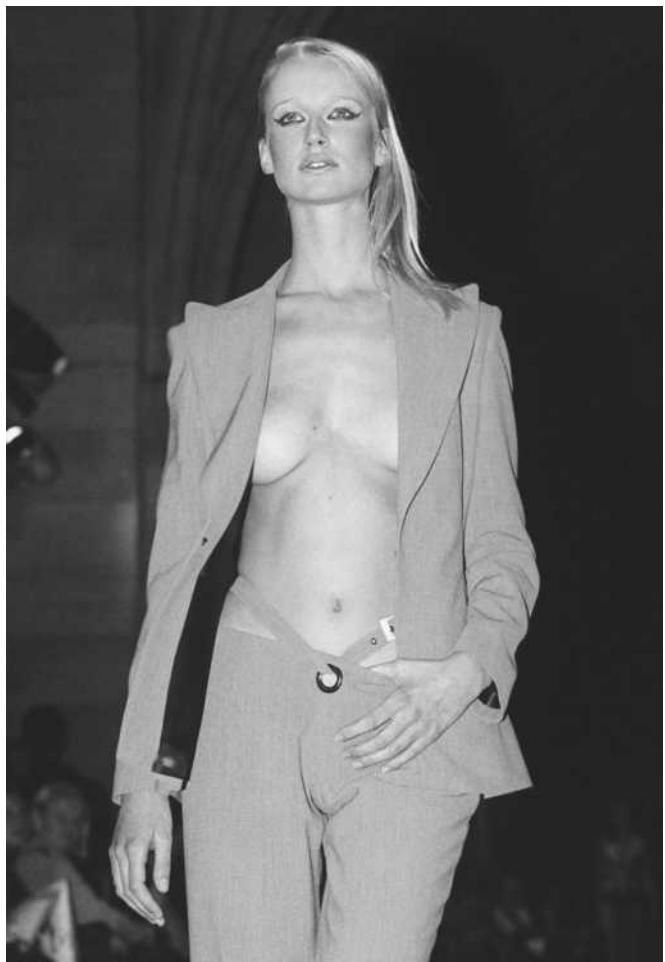

much more than silk, though it has remained the silk manufacturer of choice, combining invention and artistry in equal measure.

—Whitney Blausen; updated by Sydonie Benét

BIKKEMBERGS, Dirk

Belgian designer

Born: Flammersheim, Germany, 3 January 1962. Education: Studied fashion at the Royal Academy of Arts, Antwerp. Military Service: Served with Royal Belgian Army, in Germany. Career: Freelance designer for Nero, Bassetti, Gruno and Chardin, Tiktiner, Gaffa, K, and Jaco Petti, 1982–87; launched Dirk Bikkembergs-Homme Co., with DB shoe line for men, 1985; introduced knitwear, 1986; first complete menswear collection, 1988; presented first womenswear line, Dirk Bikkembergs-Homme Pour La Femme, in Paris, 1993; moved to more luxe styling, 1998; participated in Mode 2001 Landed-Geland, Antwerp, 2001. Awards: For menswear collection, winter 1985–86, several Belgian fashion industry awards, including Golden Spindle. Address: Kidorp 21, 2000 Antwerp, Belgium.

Dirk Bikkembergs, spring/summer 1997 collection. © AP/Wide World Photos.

PUBLICATIONS

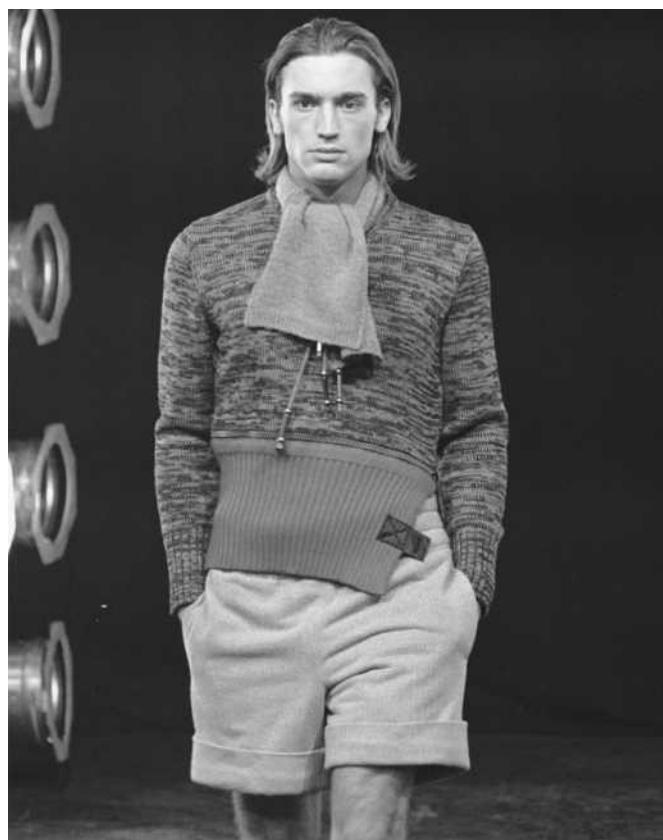

On BIKKEMBERGS:

Articles

- “Foreign Affairs—Antwerp,” in Blitz (London), February 1987.
- Mower, Sarah, “Six Romp,” in The Guardian (London), 12 February 1987.
- “Fashion,” in Interview (New York), July 1987.
- Ankone, Frans, “De Trots Van Vlaanderen,” in Avenue (Antwerp), September 1987.
- Tredre, Roger, “Belgians Go Branche,” in Fashion Weekly (London), 10 September 1987.
- Grauman, Brigid, “The Belgian Connection,” in Elle (London), October 1987.
- Lobrano, Alexander, “The Young Belgian,” in DNR (New York), October 1987.
- Fierce, Brad, “Il Menestrello Della Moda,” in Vanity (Milan), February 1988.
- “Nouvel Homme: Dirk Bikkembergs,” in Profession Textile (Paris), 24 June 1988.
- Grauman, Brigid, “Seam Stress,” in The Face (London), August 1988.
- Cocks, Jay, “A Look on the Wild Side: Two Young Designers Liven Up a Group Fashion Scene,” in Time, 16 January 1989.
- LaChapelle, David, “Dirk Bikkembergs,” in Interview (New York), October 1989.
- Rumbold, Judy, “Dirk Bikkembergs: Clean Cuts,” in Arena (London), November 1990.
- Valli, Jacopo, “The Antwerp Five,” in Donna (Milan), January 1991.
- Summers, Beth, “Obsession,” in i-D (London), February 1991.
- Tredre, Roger, “From Belgium but Far from Boring,” in the Independent (London), 2 July 1992.
- “Dirk Bikkembergs,” in L’Uomo Vogue (Milan), September 1992.
- Menkes, Suzy, “Cut, Color and Class: Male ‘Haute Couture’ Hits the High Cs,” in the International Herald Tribune, 30 January 1996.
- Daly, Steven, “Belgique: C’est Chic,” in Rolling Stone, 17 September 1998.
- Menkes, Suzy. “Chinese Dior Makes a Splash,” in the International Herald Tribune, 12 March 1997.
- _____, “At Dior, Galliano Fluffs It—Gorgeously,” in the International Herald Tribune, 15 October 1997.
- _____, “From Gucci, a Flash of Optimism,” in the International Herald Tribune, 2 July 1998.
- _____, “At Dior, a Victory for the People,” in the International Herald Tribune, 14 October 1998.
- “Dirk Bikkembergs,” available online at Fashion Live, www.fashionlive.com, 19 March 2001.
- Lowthorpe, Rebecca, “Big in Belgium: Fashion,” in the Independent on Sunday, 17 June 2001.
- Menkes, Suzy, “A New Season That’s Fit for Knits: Sweater Boys,” in the International Herald Tribune, 17 July 2001.

*

I design clothes for men and women that have a special, strong attitude; for a younger, future-minded generation for whom fashion

Dirk Bikkembergs, fall/winter 1996–97 collection: knitted sweater and wool shorts. © AP/Wide World Photos.

has become a way to express themselves; to give shelter and strength and the feeling of looking good; a generation that has risen above the question of fashion, sure about its quality and style and their own; celebrating life.

I design collections that give one whole strong look, a vision of life, men and women with items that are nonchalant and easy to mix, give freedom and don't restrict the wearer; but there are always special pieces that are stronger and more defined, marking a certain period of time and setting a sign.

My clothes are never retro. I hate the idea of looking back. I don't have any idols from the past. I do strongly believe in tomorrow and the future of the human race. To achieve this I devote a lot of attention to the cut and fabric that I use. Yes, I tend to think about my clothes as fashion and I'm not afraid of that, nor are my clients.

I design strong clothes for strong individuals rather than wrapping up pretentious nerds in sophisticated cashmere. Nothing is so boring as a "nice and neat" look. Life is just too good and too short for that.

—Dirk Bikkembergs

* * *

Dirk Bikkembergs is one of the so-called Group of Six designers who have dominated the Belgian fashion scene in the last two decades

in a country not previously known as a fashion mecca. Bikkembergs and several other graduates of the Royal Academy of the Arts at Antwerp—Ann Demuelemeester, Dries Van Noten, Dirk Van Saene, Walter Von Beirendonck, and Martin Margiela—have brought new attention to avant-garde fashion in Belgium. Deconstructionist in their designs, they have added such innovations as exposed seams, loose-fitting garments, and ragged edges.

Heavyweight fabrics and macho imagery quite literally dominate Bikkembergs' work. His best designs convey a solidity through their layering of leather and thick knitwear while still retaining the feeling of minimalist restraint that has come to be associated with Belgian fashion. Bikkembergs, although not the most prominent of the designers who formed the Belgian avant-garde of the later 1980s, is nonetheless a significant purveyor of their ideals. His clothing consists of dark and muted-toned separates that provide strong images of modern living, although his own work does not so frequently contain the deconstructed edge of his counterparts.

Bikkembergs first came to prominence with his treatment of footwear. A specialist in the field, he brought together the traditions of well-made, hard-wearing shoes made up for him by Flanders craftspeople with the late 1980s and early 1990s who epitomized the era's obsession with workwear. His designs were inspired by classic functional styles; he reworked the clearly defined shapes of 1930s' football boots, making them into neat, round-toed, lace-up urban footwear in 1987. In 1993, he tampered with the weighty infantryman's boot, stripping it of its utilitarian status when, with a deconstructivist flourish, he removed the eyelets that normally punctuated the boot and accommodated the distinctive high lacing. Instead, a hole was drilled into the sole through which the laces had to be threaded and then wrapped around the boot's leather upper to secure it to the foot. The style soon became de rigueur for both men and women in fashion circles, with copies being sold in High Street chains. Like all his other work, they were based on familiar designs that conveyed traditional notions of masculinity, conjuring up images of sporting and military heroics. Such ideals have also pervaded his menswear.

His carefully styled shows send muscle-bound models down the catwalk clad in the obligatory biker boots and black leather that become a staple of the late 20th-century male wardrobe. This machismo continued in his signature knitwear range. Heavy-ribbed V necks were worn with lightweight jogging bottoms or matching woolen leggings. His work may not show the more slim-line feminine notes that have been gradually breaking through the previously limited spectrum of menswear designs, but they still have influence. Bikkembergs helped widen the scope of knitwear with witty takes on classic Aran jumpers and cardigans and by using decorative detailing to add interest to simple designs: in 1992 with bright blue zips on either side of burnt orange sweaters, while back in 1987 by adding them to the high-necked jumpers popular at the time.

Although he works best with winter-weight fabrics, Bikkembergs still adds twists to his summer collections. In 1988, he produced collared linen waistcoats that could be layered over long-sleeved shirts or worn alone to give interest to plain suits. It was in the late 1980s that his designs were most attuned to the zeitgeist. He provided the overblown masculine imagery so popular then; this was encapsulated in his distinctive marketing, which demonstrated the same eye for detail. The catalogues produced for each collection show in grainy black and white his tough masculine ideals with his commandeering of popular stereotypes like the biker.

Despite this concentration on menswear, his work has extended to a womenswear range. In 1993, his first collection was warmly received, bringing together both his love of strong silhouettes and a deconstructed minimalism to provide a twist to basic shapes. The natural counterpart to his masculine lines, it carried through his use of sturdy footwear and accessories that had always been popular with women as well.

As part of the rise in status of Belgian fashion since in the later years of the 20th century, Bikkembergs' work appeals to the fashion cognoscenti. The overt masculinity of his designs is combined with a knowledge and exploitation of traditional styles to provide stark, modern imagery. If not as well known as contemporaries like Van Noten, he had still carved a niche for his work and heralded a fresh slant to his output with a divergence into womenswear.

In the late 1990s, Bikkembergs departed from his characteristic masculine style to enter the couture market with elegant tailored pantsuits. They still included his customary metallic effects, however, such as silver necktie knots and metal fox heads on fur boas. He also experimented with a lattice look, creating trellises of woven leather or knits, and he offered other knitwear with metallic accessories. His womenswear lines have included unadorned, tailored capes, long skirts, and reefer jackets.

In 1998 at a Milan fashion show, Bikkembergs returned to showy, strong masculine themes in such menswear pieces as form-hugging sweaters or coats with Velcro fastenings. In Paris, he stayed with virile themes and strong graphics. A typical outfit was a singlet with an asymmetrical scooped neckline and a torso crossed with compass twirls, with matching pants. He continued to produce knits with strong geometric patterns as well. Bikkembergs seemed to move more toward luxury at the end of the decade with couture items like a cashmere cat suit for men. His sportswear line has been compared to that of American designers, with items like hooded, zippered tops.

Bikkembergs and the other Group of Six designers participated in the Mode 2001 Landed-Geland, an important fashion festival in Antwerp that firmly established the city as cutting edge in the world of fashion. According to Rebecca Lowthorpe, writing in the Independent on Sunday, these designers offered looks that were "avant-garde, yet for the most part, eminently wearable," with "uncompromisingly hip visions."

—Rebecca Arnold; updated by Sally A. Myers

BLACK, Sandy

British knitwear designer

Born: Leeds, Yorkshire, England, 17 October 1951. Education: Educated in Leeds; B.S. (Honors), Mathematics, University College, London, 1973; M.A., Design Studies, Central St. Martins, London, 1994. Career: Freelance knitwear designer, 1973–79; designer/director, Sandy Black Original Knits Ltd., selling fashion knitwear collections worldwide, 1979–85; designed and published Sandy Black Knitting Patterns and Sandy Black Knitting Kits and Yarns, sold in prestigious stores in London, Japan, United States, Sweden, Germany, Australia, and Canada; introduced knitting kits for Woman magazine (London), 1983; started Sandy Black Studio Knitting Kits mail order business; freelance knitwear designer for, among others, Rowan, Jaeger, and BBC television, beginning in 1985; principal lecturer and course leader, University of Brighton, Sussex, England, from 1990. Exhibitions: Much Ado About Knitting, ICA, London, 1981; One-off Wearables, British Crafts Centre, London, 1982; the Knitwear Review British Crafts Centre, London, 1983; Knitting—A Common Art, Crafts Council Touring Exhibition, 1986; Fashion in the '80s, British Council touring exhibition, 1989; knitwear exhibition, Hove Museum, Sussex, 1990; Contemporary Knitwear, Pier Arts Centre, Orkney, 1994. Address: Flat 3, 15 Davigdor Road, Hove, East Sussex BN3 1QB, England.

PUBLICATIONS

By BLACK:

Books

The Numeracy Pack, with D. Cohen, London, 1984.
Sandy Black Original Knitting, London, 1988.

On BLACK:

Books

Sutton, Ann, British Craft Textiles, London, 1985.

Articles

- Phillips, Pearson, "The Hills are Alive With the Sound of Knitting," in the Telegraph Sunday Magazine, 7 September 1980.
- Lynam, Ruth, "Cast on a New Look," in the Telegraph Sunday Magazine, 7 September 1980.
- "An Individual Approach to Fashion," in Fashion & Craft, November 1980.
- Knitwear profile in Ons Volk (Belgium), 29 December 1981.
- Jeffs, Angela, "Exclusively Sandy Black," in Fashioncraft, February, 1984.
- Polan, Brenda, "Looping the Loop," in The Guardian Women, 19 July 1984.
- Sherrill Daily, Martha, "Sew, You Want to Learn to Knit?" in the Washington Post, 6 September 1987.
- Rumbold, Judy, "The Wonder of Creation," in The Guardian Style, 20 June 1988.
- Samuel, Kathryn, "Those Who Can—Teach," in the Daily Telegraph, 20 June 1994.

*

Although I learned to knit and crochet as a child, it was while at university studying math that my interest in knitting really developed,

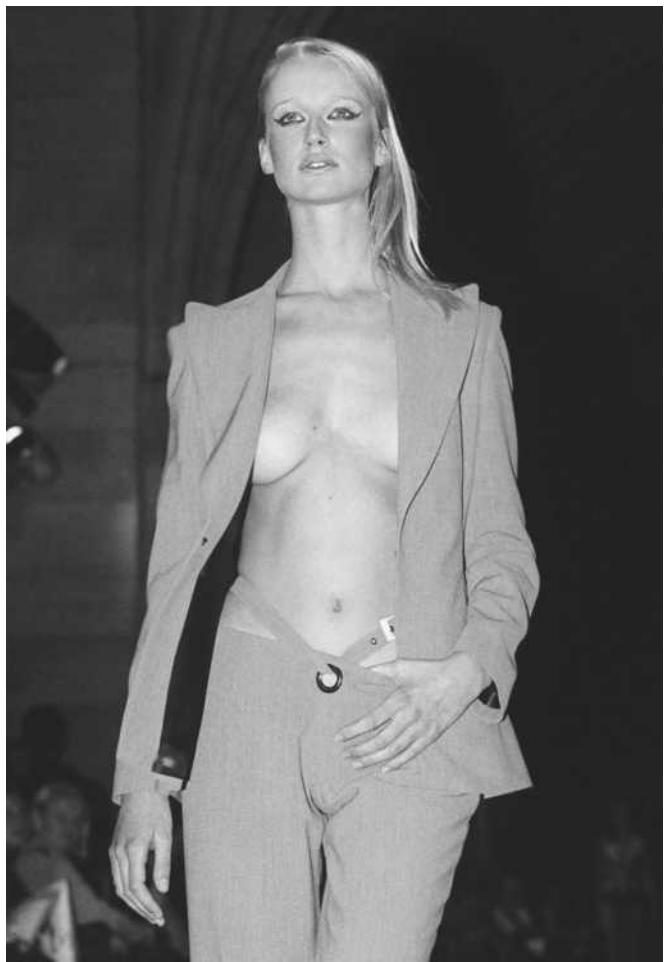

much more than silk, though it has remained the silk manufacturer of choice, combining invention and artistry in equal measure.

—Whitney Blausen; updated by Sydonie Benét

BIKKEMBERGS, Dirk

Belgian designer

Born: Flammersheim, Germany, 3 January 1962. Education: Studied fashion at the Royal Academy of Arts, Antwerp. Military Service: Served with Royal Belgian Army, in Germany. Career: Freelance designer for Nero, Bassetti, Gruno and Chardin, Tiktiner, Gaffa, K, and Jaco Petti, 1982–87; launched Dirk Bikkembergs-Homme Co., with DB shoe line for men, 1985; introduced knitwear, 1986; first complete menswear collection, 1988; presented first womenswear line, Dirk Bikkembergs-Homme Pour La Femme, in Paris, 1993; moved to more luxe styling, 1998; participated in Mode 2001 Landed-Geland, Antwerp, 2001. Awards: For menswear collection, winter 1985–86, several Belgian fashion industry awards, including Golden Spindle. Address: Kidporp 21, 2000 Antwerp, Belgium.

Dirk Bikkembergs, spring/summer 1997 collection. © AP/Wide World Photos.

PUBLICATIONS

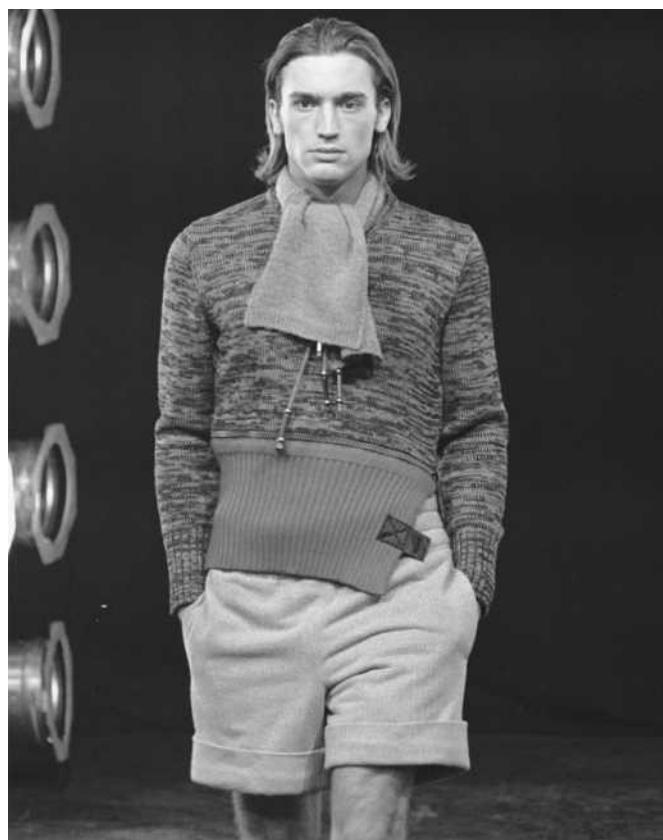

On BIKKEMBERGS:

Articles

- “Foreign Affairs—Antwerp,” in Blitz (London), February 1987.
- Mower, Sarah, “Six Romp,” in The Guardian (London), 12 February 1987.
- “Fashion,” in Interview (New York), July 1987.
- Ankone, Frans, “De Trots Van Vlaanderen,” in Avenue (Antwerp), September 1987.
- Tredre, Roger, “Belgians Go Branche,” in Fashion Weekly (London), 10 September 1987.
- Grauman, Brigid, “The Belgian Connection,” in Elle (London), October 1987.
- Lobrano, Alexander, “The Young Belgian,” in DNR (New York), October 1987.
- Fierce, Brad, “Il Menestrello Della Moda,” in Vanity (Milan), February 1988.
- “Nouvel Homme: Dirk Bikkembergs,” in Profession Textile (Paris), 24 June 1988.
- Grauman, Brigid, “Seam Stress,” in The Face (London), August 1988.
- Cocks, Jay, “A Look on the Wild Side: Two Young Designers Liven Up a Group Fashion Scene,” in Time, 16 January 1989.
- LaChapelle, David, “Dirk Bikkembergs,” in Interview (New York), October 1989.
- Rumbold, Judy, “Dirk Bikkembergs: Clean Cuts,” in Arena (London), November 1990.
- Valli, Jacopo, “The Antwerp Five,” in Donna (Milan), January 1991.
- Summers, Beth, “Obsession,” in i-D (London), February 1991.
- Tredre, Roger, “From Belgium but Far from Boring,” in the Independent (London), 2 July 1992.
- “Dirk Bikkembergs,” in L’Uomo Vogue (Milan), September 1992.
- Menkes, Suzy, “Cut, Color and Class: Male ‘Haute Couture’ Hits the High Cs,” in the International Herald Tribune, 30 January 1996.
- Daly, Steven, “Belgique: C’est Chic,” in Rolling Stone, 17 September 1998.
- Menkes, Suzy. “Chinese Dior Makes a Splash,” in the International Herald Tribune, 12 March 1997.
- _____, “At Dior, Galliano Fluffs It—Gorgeously,” in the International Herald Tribune, 15 October 1997.
- _____, “From Gucci, a Flash of Optimism,” in the International Herald Tribune, 2 July 1998.
- _____, “At Dior, a Victory for the People,” in the International Herald Tribune, 14 October 1998.
- “Dirk Bikkembergs,” available online at Fashion Live, www.fashionlive.com, 19 March 2001.
- Lowthorpe, Rebecca, “Big in Belgium: Fashion,” in the Independent on Sunday, 17 June 2001.
- Menkes, Suzy, “A New Season That’s Fit for Knits: Sweater Boys,” in the International Herald Tribune, 17 July 2001.

*

I design clothes for men and women that have a special, strong attitude; for a younger, future-minded generation for whom fashion

Dirk Bikkembergs, fall/winter 1996–97 collection: knitted sweater and wool shorts. © AP/Wide World Photos.

has become a way to express themselves; to give shelter and strength and the feeling of looking good; a generation that has risen above the question of fashion, sure about its quality and style and their own; celebrating life.

I design collections that give one whole strong look, a vision of life, men and women with items that are nonchalant and easy to mix, give freedom and don't restrict the wearer; but there are always special pieces that are stronger and more defined, marking a certain period of time and setting a sign.

My clothes are never retro. I hate the idea of looking back. I don't have any idols from the past. I do strongly believe in tomorrow and the future of the human race. To achieve this I devote a lot of attention to the cut and fabric that I use. Yes, I tend to think about my clothes as fashion and I'm not afraid of that, nor are my clients.

I design strong clothes for strong individuals rather than wrapping up pretentious nerds in sophisticated cashmere. Nothing is so boring as a "nice and neat" look. Life is just too good and too short for that.

—Dirk Bikkembergs

* * *

Dirk Bikkembergs is one of the so-called Group of Six designers who have dominated the Belgian fashion scene in the last two decades

in a country not previously known as a fashion mecca. Bikkembergs and several other graduates of the Royal Academy of the Arts at Antwerp—Ann Demuelemeester, Dries Van Noten, Dirk Van Saene, Walter Von Beirendonck, and Martin Margiela—have brought new attention to avant-garde fashion in Belgium. Deconstructionist in their designs, they have added such innovations as exposed seams, loose-fitting garments, and ragged edges.

Heavyweight fabrics and macho imagery quite literally dominate Bikkembergs' work. His best designs convey a solidity through their layering of leather and thick knitwear while still retaining the feeling of minimalist restraint that has come to be associated with Belgian fashion. Bikkembergs, although not the most prominent of the designers who formed the Belgian avant-garde of the later 1980s, is nonetheless a significant purveyor of their ideals. His clothing consists of dark and muted-toned separates that provide strong images of modern living, although his own work does not so frequently contain the deconstructed edge of his counterparts.

Bikkembergs first came to prominence with his treatment of footwear. A specialist in the field, he brought together the traditions of well-made, hard-wearing shoes made up for him by Flanders craftspeople with the late 1980s and early 1990s who epitomized the era's obsession with workwear. His designs were inspired by classic functional styles; he reworked the clearly defined shapes of 1930s' football boots, making them into neat, round-toed, lace-up urban footwear in 1987. In 1993, he tampered with the weighty infantryman's boot, stripping it of its utilitarian status when, with a deconstructivist flourish, he removed the eyelets that normally punctuated the boot and accommodated the distinctive high lacing. Instead, a hole was drilled into the sole through which the laces had to be threaded and then wrapped around the boot's leather upper to secure it to the foot. The style soon became de rigueur for both men and women in fashion circles, with copies being sold in High Street chains. Like all his other work, they were based on familiar designs that conveyed traditional notions of masculinity, conjuring up images of sporting and military heroics. Such ideals have also pervaded his menswear.

His carefully styled shows send muscle-bound models down the catwalk clad in the obligatory biker boots and black leather that become a staple of the late 20th-century male wardrobe. This machismo continued in his signature knitwear range. Heavy-ribbed V necks were worn with lightweight jogging bottoms or matching woolen leggings. His work may not show the more slim-line feminine notes that have been gradually breaking through the previously limited spectrum of menswear designs, but they still have influence. Bikkembergs helped widen the scope of knitwear with witty takes on classic Aran jumpers and cardigans and by using decorative detailing to add interest to simple designs: in 1992 with bright blue zips on either side of burnt orange sweaters, while back in 1987 by adding them to the high-necked jumpers popular at the time.

Although he works best with winter-weight fabrics, Bikkembergs still adds twists to his summer collections. In 1988, he produced collared linen waistcoats that could be layered over long-sleeved shirts or worn alone to give interest to plain suits. It was in the late 1980s that his designs were most attuned to the zeitgeist. He provided the overblown masculine imagery so popular then; this was encapsulated in his distinctive marketing, which demonstrated the same eye for detail. The catalogues produced for each collection show in grainy black and white his tough masculine ideals with his commandeering of popular stereotypes like the biker.

Despite this concentration on menswear, his work has extended to a womenswear range. In 1993, his first collection was warmly received, bringing together both his love of strong silhouettes and a deconstructed minimalism to provide a twist to basic shapes. The natural counterpart to his masculine lines, it carried through his use of sturdy footwear and accessories that had always been popular with women as well.

As part of the rise in status of Belgian fashion since in the later years of the 20th century, Bikkembergs' work appeals to the fashion cognoscenti. The overt masculinity of his designs is combined with a knowledge and exploitation of traditional styles to provide stark, modern imagery. If not as well known as contemporaries like Van Noten, he had still carved a niche for his work and heralded a fresh slant to his output with a divergence into womenswear.

In the late 1990s, Bikkembergs departed from his characteristic masculine style to enter the couture market with elegant tailored pantsuits. They still included his customary metallic effects, however, such as silver necktie knots and metal fox heads on fur boas. He also experimented with a lattice look, creating trellises of woven leather or knits, and he offered other knitwear with metallic accessories. His womenswear lines have included unadorned, tailored capes, long skirts, and reefer jackets.

In 1998 at a Milan fashion show, Bikkembergs returned to showy, strong masculine themes in such menswear pieces as form-hugging sweaters or coats with Velcro fastenings. In Paris, he stayed with virile themes and strong graphics. A typical outfit was a singlet with an asymmetrical scooped neckline and a torso crossed with compass twirls, with matching pants. He continued to produce knits with strong geometric patterns as well. Bikkembergs seemed to move more toward luxury at the end of the decade with couture items like a cashmere cat suit for men. His sportswear line has been compared to that of American designers, with items like hooded, zippered tops.

Bikkembergs and the other Group of Six designers participated in the Mode 2001 Landed-Geland, an important fashion festival in Antwerp that firmly established the city as cutting edge in the world of fashion. According to Rebecca Lowthorpe, writing in the Independent on Sunday, these designers offered looks that were "avant-garde, yet for the most part, eminently wearable," with "uncompromisingly hip visions."

—Rebecca Arnold; updated by Sally A. Myers

BLACK, Sandy

British knitwear designer

Born: Leeds, Yorkshire, England, 17 October 1951. Education: Educated in Leeds; B.S. (Honors), Mathematics, University College, London, 1973; M.A., Design Studies, Central St. Martins, London, 1994. Career: Freelance knitwear designer, 1973–79; designer/director, Sandy Black Original Knits Ltd., selling fashion knitwear collections worldwide, 1979–85; designed and published Sandy Black Knitting Patterns and Sandy Black Knitting Kits and Yarns, sold in prestigious stores in London, Japan, United States, Sweden, Germany, Australia, and Canada; introduced knitting kits for Woman magazine (London), 1983; started Sandy Black Studio Knitting Kits mail order business; freelance knitwear designer for, among others, Rowan, Jaeger, and BBC television, beginning in 1985; principal lecturer and course leader, University of Brighton, Sussex, England, from 1990. Exhibitions: Much Ado About Knitting, ICA, London, 1981; One-off Wearables, British Crafts Centre, London, 1982; the Knitwear Review British Crafts Centre, London, 1983; Knitting—A Common Art, Crafts Council Touring Exhibition, 1986; Fashion in the '80s, British Council touring exhibition, 1989; knitwear exhibition, Hove Museum, Sussex, 1990; Contemporary Knitwear, Pier Arts Centre, Orkney, 1994. Address: Flat 3, 15 Davigdor Road, Hove, East Sussex BN3 1QB, England.

PUBLICATIONS

By BLACK:

Books

The Numeracy Pack, with D. Cohen, London, 1984.
Sandy Black Original Knitting, London, 1988.

On BLACK:

Books

Sutton, Ann, British Craft Textiles, London, 1985.

Articles

- Phillips, Pearson, "The Hills are Alive With the Sound of Knitting," in the Telegraph Sunday Magazine, 7 September 1980.
- Lynam, Ruth, "Cast on a New Look," in the Telegraph Sunday Magazine, 7 September 1980.
- "An Individual Approach to Fashion," in Fashion & Craft, November 1980.
- Knitwear profile in Ons Volk (Belgium), 29 December 1981.
- Jeffs, Angela, "Exclusively Sandy Black," in Fashioncraft, February, 1984.
- Polan, Brenda, "Looping the Loop," in The Guardian Women, 19 July 1984.
- Sherrill Daily, Martha, "Sew, You Want to Learn to Knit?" in the Washington Post, 6 September 1987.
- Rumbold, Judy, "The Wonder of Creation," in The Guardian Style, 20 June 1988.
- Samuel, Kathryn, "Those Who Can—Teach," in the Daily Telegraph, 20 June 1994.

*

Although I learned to knit and crochet as a child, it was while at university studying math that my interest in knitting really developed, black and white his tough masculine ideals with his commandeering of popular stereotypes like the biker.

Despite this concentration on menswear, his work has extended to a womenswear range. In 1993, his first collection was warmly received, bringing together both his love of strong silhouettes and a deconstructed minimalism to provide a twist to basic shapes. The natural counterpart to his masculine lines, it carried through his use of sturdy footwear and accessories that had always been popular with women as well.

As part of the rise in status of Belgian fashion since in the later years of the 20th century, Bikkembergs' work appeals to the fashion cognoscenti. The overt masculinity of his designs is combined with a knowledge and exploitation of traditional styles to provide stark, modern imagery. If not as well known as contemporaries like Van Noten, he had still carved a niche for his work and heralded a fresh slant to his output with a divergence into womenswear.

In the late 1990s, Bikkembergs departed from his characteristic masculine style to enter the couture market with elegant tailored pantsuits. They still included his customary metallic effects, however, such as silver necktie knots and metal fox heads on fur boas. He also experimented with a lattice look, creating trellises of woven leather or knits, and he offered other knitwear with metallic accessories. His womenswear lines have included unadorned, tailored capes, long skirts, and reefer jackets.

In 1998 at a Milan fashion show, Bikkembergs returned to showy, strong masculine themes in such menswear pieces as form-hugging sweaters or coats with Velcro fastenings. In Paris, he stayed with virile themes and strong graphics. A typical outfit was a singlet with an asymmetrical scooped neckline and a torso crossed with compass twirls, with matching pants. He continued to produce knits with strong geometric patterns as well. Bikkembergs seemed to move more toward luxury at the end of the decade with couture items like a cashmere cat suit for men. His sportswear line has been compared to that of American designers, with items like hooded, zippered tops.

Bikkembergs and the other Group of Six designers participated in the Mode 2001 Landed-Geland, an important fashion festival in Antwerp that firmly established the city as cutting edge in the world of fashion. According to Rebecca Lowthorpe, writing in the Independent on Sunday, these designers offered looks that were "avant-garde, yet for the most part, eminently wearable," with "uncompromisingly hip visions."

—Rebecca Arnold; updated by Sally A. Myers

BLACK, Sandy

British knitwear designer

Born: Leeds, Yorkshire, England, 17 October 1951. Education: Educated in Leeds; B.S. (Honors), Mathematics, University College, London, 1973; M.A., Design Studies, Central St. Martins, London, 1994. Career: Freelance knitwear designer, 1973–79; designer/director, Sandy Black Original Knits Ltd., selling fashion knitwear collections worldwide, 1979–85; designed and published Sandy Black Knitting Patterns and Sandy Black Knitting Kits and Yarns, sold in prestigious stores in London, Japan, United States, Sweden, Germany, Australia, and Canada; introduced knitting kits for Woman magazine (London), 1983; started Sandy Black Studio Knitting Kits mail order business; freelance knitwear designer for, among others, Rowan, Jaeger, and BBC television, beginning in 1985; principal lecturer and course leader, University of Brighton, Sussex, England, from 1990. Exhibitions: Much Ado About Knitting, ICA, London, 1981; One-off Wearables, British Crafts Centre, London, 1982; the Knitwear Review British Crafts Centre, London, 1983; Knitting—A Common Art, Crafts Council Touring Exhibition, 1986; Fashion in the '80s, British Council touring exhibition, 1989; knitwear exhibition, Hove Museum, Sussex, 1990; Contemporary Knitwear, Pier Arts Centre, Orkney, 1994. Address: Flat 3, 15 Davigdor Road, Hove, East Sussex BN3 1QB, England.

PUBLICATIONS

By BLACK:

Books

The Numeracy Pack, with D. Cohen, London, 1984.
Sandy Black Original Knitting, London, 1988.

On BLACK:

Books

Sutton, Ann, British Craft Textiles, London, 1985.

Articles

- Phillips, Pearson, "The Hills are Alive With the Sound of Knitting," in the Telegraph Sunday Magazine, 7 September 1980.
- Lynam, Ruth, "Cast on a New Look," in the Telegraph Sunday Magazine, 7 September 1980.
- "An Individual Approach to Fashion," in Fashion & Craft, November 1980.
- Knitwear profile in Ons Volk (Belgium), 29 December 1981.
- Jeffs, Angela, "Exclusively Sandy Black," in Fashioncraft, February, 1984.
- Polan, Brenda, "Looping the Loop," in The Guardian Women, 19 July 1984.
- Sherrill Daily, Martha, "Sew, You Want to Learn to Knit?" in the Washington Post, 6 September 1987.
- Rumbold, Judy, "The Wonder of Creation," in The Guardian Style, 20 June 1988.
- Samuel, Kathryn, "Those Who Can—Teach," in the Daily Telegraph, 20 June 1994.

*

Although I learned to knit and crochet as a child, it was while at university studying math that my interest in knitting really developed,

and I started to design and make unusual and interesting clothes. At first, these were hand-knitted or crocheted, but I soon bought my first knitting machine, and by the time I finished my degree, I had decided to make knitting a full-time career, though I wasn't sure how. Being self-taught, I was not restricted by any boundaries and felt I could translate any idea into knitting by working out a logical way of doing it. This approach clearly owed something to my mathematical background, and for me, there was a natural relationship between the two. I often put many ideas and techniques together to create complex designs. I only became aware of their complexity when I had to train other people to knit them for me.

My work covers a wide range of designs, from casual sweaters to glamorous angora evening coats. Original Knitting shows some of this variety and gives an insight into the thinking behind the designs. One of the most important factors is the blending of color, shape, texture, and pattern to create each individual design, whether it's a bold geometric, a pretty floral, or an intricate stitch pattern.

Fashion buyers talk of designers' "handwriting" by which they identify their work. I have often thought that I must have several different signatures. I have always enjoyed working in a great variety of themes, colors, and yarns, inspired by anything which catches my eye or simply the pleasure of combining wonderful materials and textures. I like my designs to be nonrepetitive, and view the body as a canvas to be adorned with beautiful stitches and patterns, sometimes subtle, sometimes bold, but always with an underlying logic which combines color, texture, and form so completely that the result should appear totally natural.

Knitting continues to be, for me, the perfect blend of creative and technical skills, which my education seemed to want to separate. It used to be the poor relation of the textile crafts but has now grown to be properly recognized, and has a vital part to play in fashion. I know I shall continue to design as long as I can still be excited by a ball of yarn or inspired to develop a new stitch pattern from some unlikely detail I have seen—a mosaic shop front, a stone carving, or a wallpaper pattern, for example. I am equally happy designing for hand-knitting, machine knitting, or industrial production. One of the greatest attractions of knitting is the fact that the fabric is created from nothing but a length of yarn; everything is within the designer's control.

In my workshops and lecturing, I try to convey my own enthusiasm and enjoyment in creating fabrics, garment designs, and structures, and their realization in three dimensions around the body. I am particularly interested in the sculptural potential of knitting; a unique medium with endless possibilities.

—Sandy Black

* * *

Sandy Black helped lead the knitwear revolution of the 1970s. Out went the cozy image of old ladies making socks around the fire, in came fashion knitwear, and a craft was turned into an art. For Black, it was a logical development of a childhood love of old needlework shops where she bought 1940s knitting patterns, buttons, and yarns to knit and crochet. Using skills learned from her mother and grandmother, she produced traditional hand knits. Black received her B.S.

degree in Mathematics from University College in London. Having studied mathematics, knitting proved an ideal way of combining her creative and logical instincts.

Black was able to chart out pictorial knits and to originate the landscape sweaters that became so popular in the mid-1970s. A natural wit emerged. Leopard skin-look sweaters and a knitted armadillo wrap illustrated an appealing sense of humor. Patterned angora jackets, stunning to the eye and to the touch, showed the luxuriance hand-knitting could achieve. Designer knitwear had arrived, and Black's career as a freelance knitwear designer was launched. In 1979 she created her own company, Sandy Black Original Knits Ltd. Major international fashion retailers, including Browns and Harrods in London, Isetan in Tokyo, and Saks Fifth Avenue and Bloomingdale's in New York, bought Sandy Black Original Knits for their upscale stores.

But the quality and details of Black's designs put them beyond the purse of most shoppers, including the designer herself. To make her designs more widely available to the less affluent shopper, Black employed her math training to create her own knitting patterns. By using larger needles and straightforward instructions, she tried to make her patterns as accessible as possible. They were complex but not too difficult for the determined knitter; the results more than justified the effort involved. Black's hand knits were distinctive and unique, and Sandy Black Knitting Patterns were created for the world to enjoy.

Another breakthrough came in 1983, when she designed a knitting kit as an editorial offer for Woman magazine. Its success stimulated the Sandy Black Knitting Kits, which were retailed in Liberty, Harrods, and John Lewis in London, and in Sweden, Germany, and Canada. She controlled the whole process, creating the patterns, supervising the dyeing of the yarns, and designing the packaging. She also produced her own range of yarns. Each step meant she was able to have greater responsibility over the whole process, from the idea to the finished garment.

Black took the process one step further with the publication in 1988 of her first book of patterns, Sandy Black Original Knitting. The tome is an excellent testament to her originality and creativity and provides insight into her inspiration. Whatever the design, a bold geometric, a pretty floral, or something understated, the consistent factor is the blending of color, texture, and pattern to create an individual design. Variety is a mark of her creativity. By seeing "the body as a canvas to be decorated and adorned with beautiful patterns, sometimes subtle, sometimes bold," she extended the existing boundaries of knitwear.

Black had gone back to designing freelance for companies such as Rowan, Jaeger, and BBC Television, among many others in 1985. She also began lecturing and teaching more, serving as principal lecturer and course leader for the University of Brighton at Sussex, from 1990. Black has been able to convey her obvious enthusiasm to others. Television shows, international lecture tours, workshops, and consultancies have all helped to promote her ideas. She has become increasingly involved in instructing, which is an ideal, if exhausting, means of continuing what she started decades ago. In her workshops and as a lecturer to textile and fashion students, she teaches about the dual importance of design and technique. Experimentation is an important way of building ideas and encouraging originality. She gives others the confidence to follow her example, to break down boundaries, and to cast aside preconceptions. Sandy Black has helped to take knitting from the fireside into the artist's studio.

—Hazel Clark; updated by Daryl F. Mallett

BLAHNIK, Manolo

Spanish footwear designer

Born: Santa Cruz, Canary Islands, Spain, 27 November 1942. Education: Educated at home, University of Geneva, degree in literature, 1965; studied art in Paris, 1965–70. Career: Jeans buyer for Feathers Boutique, London, early 1970s; encouraged to design shoes by Diana Vreeland; first collections for Zapata Boutique, London, and for Ossie Clark, early 1970s; opened London shop, 1973, opened New York boutique, 1981; subsequent shops in Hong Kong, Tokyo; designed shoes for Anne Klein, 1994–95; opened five-story Manhattan headquarters for Blahnik USA, 1998; online boutique at NeimanMarcus.com, 2000; teamed with Estée Lauder to create nail lacquer for Golden Globes, 2001. Awards: Fashion Council of America award, 1988, 1991; British Fashion Council award, 1991; Balenciaga award, 1991; American Leather award, New York, 1991; Hispanic Institute Antonio Lopez award, Washington, D.C., 1991; Footwear News Designer of the Year, 1992; Stiletto award, Council of Fashion Designers of America, 1998; Named "Fifth Star" of HBO series Sex and the City, 2000; Designer of the Year, QVC/FFANY, 2001. Address: 49–51 Old Church St., London SW3, England.

PUBLICATIONS

On BLAHNIK:

Books

- Trasko, Mary, Heavenly Soles, New York, 1989.
 McDowell, Colin, Shoes, Fashion and Fantasy, London, 1989.
 Stegemeyer, Anne, Who's Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.
 Steele, Valerie, Shoes: A Lexicon of Style, New York, 1999.
 McDowell, Colin, Manolo Blahnik, New York, 2000.

Articles

- Lester, P., "Manolo Blahnik," in Interview, July 1974.
 Brampton, Sally, "Well-Heeled," in the Observer (London), 2 September 1984.
 Burnie, Joan, "Upon My Sole: Best Feet Forward," in You (London), 5 January 1986.
 Infantino, Vivian, "The Gift of Avant-Garde," in Footwear News, July 1987.

- Simpson, Helen, "Manolo Blahnik's London Lobby," in Vogue (London), August 1987.
 Campbell, Liza, "World at His Feet," in Vogue (London), September 1987.
 Picasso-Lopez, Paloma, "Manolo Blahnik," in Vogue (Paris), April 1988.
 Fallon, James, "Blahnik Keeps Moving," in Footwear News, February 1991.
 Roberts, Michael, "Manolo," in Interview, September 1991.
 "Feets of Brilliance," in Vogue, March 1992.
 Baber, Bonnie, "The Design Masters," in Footwear News, 17 April 1995.
 Kerwin, Jessica, "Manolo Contendre," in Women's Wear Daily, 13 March 1997.
 "Manolo Blahnik," in In Style, 8 May 1998.
 "High Heel Heaven," in the New Yorker, 20 March 2000.
 "Blahnik Walks Among His Faithful," in Women's Wear Daily, 23 October 2000.
 Keogh, Pamela Clarke, "The Greatest Shoes on Earth: Manolo Blahnik," in Town & Country, January 2001.
 "24-Karat Golden Globes," in Footwear News, 8 January 2001.

* * *

Established in the 1970s, Manolo Blahnik has become world famous. His beautiful shoes exude a level of craftsmanship rare in today's age of mass production, and he has a wonderful sense of line and silhouette. These talents, combined with the other footwear sense he displays and exploits, have ensured his rightful position as a true genius in his field, worthy of sharing the mantle worn by the other brilliant shoe designers of the 20th century, Yanturni, Vionnet, Perugia, Ferragamo, and the one he most admires—Roger Vivier.

Blahnik was born in 1942 in Santa Cruz, in the Canary Islands, to a Czech father and Spanish mother. This slightly exotic and romantic start to his life possibly determined the pattern his future was to assume. His awareness of shoes was an early memory. His mother, who had a fondness for satin and brocade fabrics, had her footwear made by Don Christino, the island's leading shoemaker. Blahnik inherited her love of the unconventional and remembers seeing a trunk containing shoes by Yanturni, the Russian designer and one-time curator of the Cluny Museum in Paris. The shoes, in brocades, silks, and antique lace, trimmed with buckles, were elegant and light, attributes Blahnik later sought to achieve in his own creations.

Blahnik studied law, literature, and Renaissance art in Europe before settling in London in 1970. His portfolio of theatrical designs was seen by the photographer Cecil Beaton and Diana Vreeland of American Vogue, who particularly admired his shoe designs and encouraged him to concentrate on this aspect of his work. His subsequent footwear collections were to prove how astute their instincts had been for this extraordinary talent.

The mood of the 1970s was lively, adventurous, and colorful. The advent of the miniskirt had focused attention on the legs and consequently on original interpretations of footwear. Creative thought produced new materials for footwear and a climate in which fresh ideas could flourish, and Blahnik dramatically interpreted these boundaries, and to cast aside preconceptions. Sandy Black has helped to take knitting from the fireside into the artist's studio.

—Hazel Clark; updated by Daryl F. Mallett

BLAHNIK, Manolo

Spanish footwear designer

Born: Santa Cruz, Canary Islands, Spain, 27 November 1942. Education: Educated at home, University of Geneva, degree in literature, 1965; studied art in Paris, 1965–70. Career: Jeans buyer for Feathers Boutique, London, early 1970s; encouraged to design shoes by Diana Vreeland; first collections for Zapata Boutique, London, and for Ossie Clark, early 1970s; opened London shop, 1973, opened New York boutique, 1981; subsequent shops in Hong Kong, Tokyo; designed shoes for Anne Klein, 1994–95; opened five-story Manhattan headquarters for Blahnik USA, 1998; online boutique at NeimanMarcus.com, 2000; teamed with Estée Lauder to create nail lacquer for Golden Globes, 2001. Awards: Fashion Council of America award, 1988, 1991; British Fashion Council award, 1991; Balenciaga award, 1991; American Leather award, New York, 1991; Hispanic Institute Antonio Lopez award, Washington, D.C., 1991; Footwear News Designer of the Year, 1992; Stiletto award, Council of Fashion Designers of America, 1998; Named "Fifth Star" of HBO series Sex and the City, 2000; Designer of the Year, QVC/FFANY, 2001. Address: 49–51 Old Church St., London SW3, England.

PUBLICATIONS

On BLAHNIK:

Books

- Trasko, Mary, Heavenly Soles, New York, 1989.
 McDowell, Colin, Shoes, Fashion and Fantasy, London, 1989.
 Stegemeyer, Anne, Who's Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.
 Steele, Valerie, Shoes: A Lexicon of Style, New York, 1999.
 McDowell, Colin, Manolo Blahnik, New York, 2000.

Articles

- Lester, P., "Manolo Blahnik," in Interview, July 1974.
 Brampton, Sally, "Well-Heeled," in the Observer (London), 2 September 1984.
 Burnie, Joan, "Upon My Sole: Best Feet Forward," in You (London), 5 January 1986.
 Infantino, Vivian, "The Gift of Avant-Garde," in Footwear News, July 1987.

- Simpson, Helen, "Manolo Blahnik's London Lobby," in Vogue (London), August 1987.
 Campbell, Liza, "World at His Feet," in Vogue (London), September 1987.
 Picasso-Lopez, Paloma, "Manolo Blahnik," in Vogue (Paris), April 1988.
 Fallon, James, "Blahnik Keeps Moving," in Footwear News, February 1991.
 Roberts, Michael, "Manolo," in Interview, September 1991.
 "Feets of Brilliance," in Vogue, March 1992.
 Baber, Bonnie, "The Design Masters," in Footwear News, 17 April 1995.
 Kerwin, Jessica, "Manolo Contendre," in Women's Wear Daily, 13 March 1997.
 "Manolo Blahnik," in In Style, 8 May 1998.
 "High Heel Heaven," in the New Yorker, 20 March 2000.
 "Blahnik Walks Among His Faithful," in Women's Wear Daily, 23 October 2000.
 Keogh, Pamela Clarke, "The Greatest Shoes on Earth: Manolo Blahnik," in Town & Country, January 2001.
 "24-Karat Golden Globes," in Footwear News, 8 January 2001.

* * *

Established in the 1970s, Manolo Blahnik has become world famous. His beautiful shoes exude a level of craftsmanship rare in today's age of mass production, and he has a wonderful sense of line and silhouette. These talents, combined with the other footwear sense he displays and exploits, have ensured his rightful position as a true genius in his field, worthy of sharing the mantle worn by the other brilliant shoe designers of the 20th century, Yanturni, Vionnet, Perugia, Ferragamo, and the one he most admires—Roger Vivier.

Blahnik was born in 1942 in Santa Cruz, in the Canary Islands, to a Czech father and Spanish mother. This slightly exotic and romantic start to his life possibly determined the pattern his future was to assume. His awareness of shoes was an early memory. His mother, who had a fondness for satin and brocade fabrics, had her footwear made by Don Christino, the island's leading shoemaker. Blahnik inherited her love of the unconventional and remembers seeing a trunk containing shoes by Yanturni, the Russian designer and one-time curator of the Cluny Museum in Paris. The shoes, in brocades, silks, and antique lace, trimmed with buckles, were elegant and light, attributes Blahnik later sought to achieve in his own creations.

Blahnik studied law, literature, and Renaissance art in Europe before settling in London in 1970. His portfolio of theatrical designs was seen by the photographer Cecil Beaton and Diana Vreeland of American Vogue, who particularly admired his shoe designs and encouraged him to concentrate on this aspect of his work. His subsequent footwear collections were to prove how astute their instincts had been for this extraordinary talent.

The mood of the 1970s was lively, adventurous, and colorful. The advent of the miniskirt had focused attention on the legs and consequently on original interpretations of footwear. Creative thought produced new materials for footwear and a climate in which fresh ideas could flourish, and Blahnik dramatically interpreted these trends. Flowers appeared at the ankles, and there were cutout shapes and appliqués. Purple was the "in" color; ankle boots, lace-ups with small, chunky heels in stacked leather or shiny veneer, crêpe soles and a new craze for "wet-look" leather, all appeared in his collections. Footwear was zany, feet were in fashion, and it required endless imagination to stay in front.

A display of Manolo Blahnik shoes, 2000. © AP/Wide World Photos.

Blahnik chose Zapata as the name of his first shop, opened in London in 1973. He now uses his own name, but from the beginning, his tiny, personalized salon was a mecca for devotees from all over the world. Blahnik has a deep understanding of contemporary trends and a genuine feeling for his clientèle and what they seek in a shoe. Constantly featured in the world's most prestigious fashion magazines, it is easy to see why his imagination and ability to translate fantasy into delectable and desirable foot coverings have won him such acclaim. His designs are always complementary to the feet; he believes fashion should be fun and his ebullient and energetic designs have always reflected this philosophy. He considers shape, material, and decoration with great care and combines handcraftsmanship with modern techniques. A master of materials, he handles leather, suede, velvets, silks, and the unconventional and unexpected with equal flair and panache, paying exact attention to detail and creating fine, elegant footwear with glamor and refinement. His shoes have a weightless quality, and a seemingly ethereal atmosphere often pervades his collections.

Many Blahnik styles are deliberately kept exclusive, with only small quantities produced, and his instantly recognized style remains constant, regardless of the fashion climate. Over the years, he has designed collections to enhance the work of, among others, Yves Saint Laurent, Emmanuel Ungaro, Calvin Klein, Perry Ellis, Bill Blass, Fiorucci, Zandra Rhodes, Jean Muir, Jasper Conran, and Rifat Ozbek. One of his most famous individual clients is fashion eccentric Anna Piaggi. She invariably selects a pair of Blahnik's shoes to complement the other unusual items in her wardrobe. The following is a typical description of her appearance: "Black velvet coat by Lanvin, circa 1925; t-shirt in cotton jersey by Missoni, circa 1975; Harem trousers made out of a silk kimono; grey suede shoes trimmed with mink by Blahnik; the jewel, a crystal iceberg with an orange bead by Fouquet."

Wherever they are featured, Blahnik's shoes are a copywriter's dream. Frequently executed in vivid colors, magenta, deep purple, bright scarlet, orange, emerald green, or saffron yellow, they retain a certain theatrical fantasy—"red mules with high, knotted vamps," or "jeweled satin shoes for the summer collection," or "ribbon-wrapped ankles for watered silk dancing shoes," or perhaps "the Siamese twin shoe"—completely original combinations of wit, sex, and allure. With their reference to history, they nevertheless remain entirely contemporary while catching the spirit of both.

Blahnik is a distinctive personality, much traveled, intelligent, and well educated, in demand for his opinions, wit, energy, and style. Like many true originators, he could probably have been a successful designer in another field. His distinctive sketches, for example, transmit a real feeling for his shoes and are used for his company publicity. They serve to underline how very individual his work is, and he clothes some of the world's best dressed feet; he produces shoes for all occasions. His creations are worn, and adored, by film stars, celebrities, socialites, and those who just love what he offers. He has an intrinsic feeling for the moment and a foresight into what will come next. His shoes are provocative and dashingly extroverted; almost—but not quite—too beautiful and desirable to be worn.

The exclusivity, handcraftsmanship, high style, and wild popularity of Blahnik's shoes have raised the Spanish-born, London-based cobbler to mythic proportions. The evolution of shoe design from protection to status took hundreds of years; yet the evolution of Blahnik design from status to icon took only decades. Even early in his career, the fashions—coats, dresses, and elaborate eveningwear—of his contemporaries in couture sought to complement the latest Blahnik creations and every fad.

By the close of the 20th century, Blahnik's taste appeared to rule the design world of the most fashionable women. Blahnik was honored with an extended profile in the New Yorker in 1998, where his shoes were described as objects not simply of desire but of worship. Cynthia Marcus, vice president of Neiman Marcus described to Women's Wear Daily an "annual pilgrimage" that Blahnik customers make to the Dallas store or to Beverly Hills or to White Plains when he visits each year. She explains that for Neiman Marcus, Blahnik shoes are an emblem: "The timing now is about sexy, beautiful shoes and luxury and if there's anything Manolo stands for it's all those things."

Blahnik himself agrees that the relationship between shoes and sex is so important it cannot be underestimated: "When you put [on heels], most women walk differently... It makes you immediately sexy." And sex sells. The "erotic" stilettos that exemplify Blahnik design—he is said to have invented "toe cleavage"—produce a taller, thinner leg line and a shapely calf, which every woman understands as profoundly attractive and every man finds irresistible. The cost of such a chic pair of shoes is very high, but does not prevent women around the world from acquiring them in dozens or hundreds. "Manolo Blahnik shoes are ubiquitous at all Hollywood events," explained Aerin Lauder, creative marketing director for Estée Lauder, who commissioned Blahnik to devise a 24-karat gold nail polish in a limited edition bottle in honor of the Golden Globe awards.

Blahnik's shoes are legendary, recognized everywhere, and capable of making even the most ordinary apparel into a spectacular fashion statement.

—Angela Pattison; updated by Kathleen Bonann Marshall

BLAIR, Alistair

British designer

Born: Scotland, 5 February 1956. Education: Graduated from St. Martin's School of Art, London, 1978. Career: Assistant to Marc Bohan, Dior, Paris, 1977; design assistant, Givenchy, Paris, 1978–80; assistant to Karl Lagerfeld, Chloé, Paris, 1980–83; designer, Karl Lagerfeld, New York, 1983–84; designer, Alistair Blair, 1985–89; freelance designer and design consultant to Jaeger, Balmain, Complice, Turnbull and Asser, beginning in 1989; knitwear designer, McGeorge, beginning in 1988; designer, Ivoire ready-to-wear collection, Balmain, Paris, 1990–91; designer, Ballantine, beginning in 1989; creative director, Balmain, Paris, 1991; design consultant, Cerruti, Paris, beginning in 1991; design consultant to Valentino, Rome, beginning in 1993. Address: 4 Belmont Court, Pembroke Mews, London W8 6ES, England.

PUBLICATIONS

On BLAIR:

Articles

Kellett, Caroline, "Cue: The Return of Alistair Blair," in Vogue (London), June 1986.

Irvine, Susan, "British Style, the Designer Star: Alistair Blair," in Vogue (London), February 1987.

"Solid Talent (British Too) Pendrix," in Connoisseur, February 1987. Hume, Marlon, "Backstage with Blair," in Fashion Weekly (London), 16 October 1987.

"Alistair Blair to Design for McGeorge," in Fashion Weekly, 29 October 1987.

Hillpot, Maureen, "Alistair Blair: Going for It!," in Taxi (New York), May 1988.

"Blair Quits Beleaguered Bertelsen as Hamnett Sues," in the Independent (London), 8 July 1988.

"Blair, with Backer, Plans Spring Relaunch," in Women's Wear Daily, 29 September 1988.

"Backing for Blair," in Options (London), December 1988.

modern techniques. A master of materials, he handles leather, suede, velvets, silks, and the unconventional and unexpected with equal flair and panache, paying exact attention to detail and creating fine, elegant footwear with glamor and refinement. His shoes have a weightless quality, and a seemingly ethereal atmosphere often pervades his collections.

Many Blahnik styles are deliberately kept exclusive, with only small quantities produced, and his instantly recognized style remains constant, regardless of the fashion climate. Over the years, he has designed collections to enhance the work of, among others, Yves Saint Laurent, Emmanuel Ungaro, Calvin Klein, Perry Ellis, Bill Blass, Fiorucci, Zandra Rhodes, Jean Muir, Jasper Conran, and Rifat Ozbek. One of his most famous individual clients is fashion eccentric Anna Piaggi. She invariably selects a pair of Blahnik's shoes to complement the other unusual items in her wardrobe. The following is a typical description of her appearance: "Black velvet coat by Lanvin, circa 1925; t-shirt in cotton jersey by Missoni, circa 1975; Harem trousers made out of a silk kimono; grey suede shoes trimmed with mink by Blahnik; the jewel, a crystal iceberg with an orange bead by Fouquet."

Wherever they are featured, Blahnik's shoes are a copywriter's dream. Frequently executed in vivid colors, magenta, deep purple, bright scarlet, orange, emerald green, or saffron yellow, they retain a certain theatrical fantasy—"red mules with high, knotted vamps," or "jeweled satin shoes for the summer collection," or "ribbon-wrapped ankles for watered silk dancing shoes," or perhaps "the Siamese twin shoe"—completely original combinations of wit, sex, and allure. With their reference to history, they nevertheless remain entirely contemporary while catching the spirit of both.

Blahnik is a distinctive personality, much traveled, intelligent, and well educated, in demand for his opinions, wit, energy, and style. Like many true originators, he could probably have been a successful designer in another field. His distinctive sketches, for example, transmit a real feeling for his shoes and are used for his company publicity. They serve to underline how very individual his work is, and he clothes some of the world's best dressed feet; he produces shoes for all occasions. His creations are worn, and adored, by film stars, celebrities, socialites, and those who just love what he offers. He has an intrinsic feeling for the moment and a foresight into what will come next. His shoes are provocative and dashing extroverted; almost—but not quite—too beautiful and desirable to be worn.

The exclusivity, handcraftsmanship, high style, and wild popularity of Blahnik's shoes have raised the Spanish-born, London-based cobbler to mythic proportions. The evolution of shoe design from protection to status took hundreds of years; yet the evolution of Blahnik design from status to icon took only decades. Even early in his career, the fashions—coats, dresses, and elaborate eveningwear—of his contemporaries in couture sought to complement the latest Blahnik creations and every fad.

By the close of the 20th century, Blahnik's taste appeared to rule the design world of the most fashionable women. Blahnik was honored with an extended profile in the New Yorker in 1998, where his shoes were described as objects not simply of desire but of worship. Cynthia Marcus, vice president of Neiman Marcus described to Women's Wear Daily an "annual pilgrimage" that Blahnik customers make to the Dallas store or to Beverly Hills or to White Plains when he visits each year. She explains that for Neiman Marcus, Blahnik shoes are an emblem: "The timing now is about sexy, beautiful shoes and luxury and if there's anything Manolo stands for it's all those things."

Blahnik himself agrees that the relationship between shoes and sex is so important it cannot be underestimated: "When you put [on heels], most women walk differently... It makes you immediately sexy." And sex sells. The "erotic" stilettos that exemplify Blahnik design—he is said to have invented "toe cleavage"—produce a taller, thinner leg line and a shapely calf, which every woman understands as profoundly attractive and every man finds irresistible. The cost of such a chic pair of shoes is very high, but does not prevent women around the world from acquiring them in dozens or hundreds. "Manolo Blahnik shoes are ubiquitous at all Hollywood events," explained Aerin Lauder, creative marketing director for Estée Lauder, who commissioned Blahnik to devise a 24-karat gold nail polish in a limited edition bottle in honor of the Golden Globe awards.

Blahnik's shoes are legendary, recognized everywhere, and capable of making even the most ordinary apparel into a spectacular fashion statement.

—Angela Pattison; updated by Kathleen Bonann Marshall

BLAIR, Alistair

British designer

Born: Scotland, 5 February 1956. Education: Graduated from St. Martin's School of Art, London, 1978. Career: Assistant to Marc Bohan, Dior, Paris, 1977; design assistant, Givenchy, Paris, 1978–80; assistant to Karl Lagerfeld, Chloé, Paris, 1980–83; designer, Karl Lagerfeld, New York, 1983–84; designer, Alistair Blair, 1985–89; freelance designer and design consultant to Jaeger, Balmain, Complice, Turnbull and Asser, beginning in 1989; knitwear designer, McGeorge, beginning in 1988; designer, Ivoire ready-to-wear collection, Balmain, Paris, 1990–91; designer, Ballantine, beginning in 1989; creative director, Balmain, Paris, 1991; design consultant, Cerruti, Paris, beginning in 1991; design consultant to Valentino, Rome, beginning in 1993. Address: 4 Belmont Court, Pembroke Mews, London W8 6ES, England.

PUBLICATIONS

On BLAIR:

Articles

Kellett, Caroline, "Cue: The Return of Alistair Blair," in Vogue (London), June 1986.

Irvine, Susan, "British Style, the Designer Star: Alistair Blair," in Vogue (London), February 1987.

"Solid Talent (British Too) Pendrix," in Connoisseur, February 1987. Hume, Marlon, "Backstage with Blair," in Fashion Weekly (London), 16 October 1987.

"Alistair Blair to Design for McGeorge," in Fashion Weekly, 29 October 1987.

Hillpot, Maureen, "Alistair Blair: Going for It!," in Taxi (New York), May 1988.

"Blair Quits Beleaguered Bertelsen as Hamnett Sues," in the Independent (London), 8 July 1988.

"Blair, with Backer, Plans Spring Relaunch," in Women's Wear Daily, 29 September 1988.

"Backing for Blair," in Options (London), December 1988.

Du Cann, Charlotte, "Return of the Pragmatic Professional," in the Independent, 18 March 1989.

* * *

When Alistair Blair showed his first collection in London in 1986, he was testing very tepid water. At that time, British designer fashion was recognized for its youth and eccentricity, fun and witty clothes, often unwearable and badly produced. Blair, complete with impeccable fashion credentials (a first class degree from St. Martin's School of Art in London, followed by training at Dior and Givenchy in Paris, then as design assistant to Karl Lagerfeld), seemed to pose little threat to this established reputation in terms of making a valid fashion statement. Blair, however, realized there was a gap in the British fashion market for continental couture at ready-to-wear prices, a gap that became the philosophy for his company.

This singular marketing notion met with immediate fashion applause at the first season's launch. "Blair has arrived as quite simply the most stylish designer in London," raved Fashion Weekly (16 October 1987). Things very quickly went from strength to strength; support came from top international stores such as Saks Fifth Avenue and Henri Bendel in New York, Harrods in London, and Seibu in Tokyo were quick to place orders. Possibly the greatest publicity came when the Duchess of York ordered her engagement outfit from him.

Blair's backer was Peder Bertelsen, the Danish oil millionaire. Blair, who was considering an offer to work for Royal couturier Norman Hartnell, was advised by a friend to discuss the move with Bertelsen. "Before I knew where I was he was suggesting that he would back me and I was agreeing," he was quoted as saying. Bertelsen was perhaps British fashion's most important asset in the mid-1980s. He injected a great deal of money into his creation of a fashion empire, buying several prestigious stores including Ungaro, Valentino, and Krizia, and backing John Galliano. In his analysis of British designer fashion he concluded that it fell into two categories—old and new money; old money was the Establishment, including the landowners; new money was in the city or in oil and each identified with its own dress designers. Blair was categorized as Bertelsen's designer for the Establishment.

There was certainly something chic yet traditional about Blair's clothes, even in his luxurious choice of fabrics: alpaca, cashmere and lambswool mixes, duchesse satin and satin backed crêpe, expensive soft suedes and kid leather, even sumptuous embroidery from the Royal embroiderer's Lock Ltd. Dog-tooth check wool coats, flannel jackets, and wool crêpe evening dresses in sharp, florid colors always incorporated a section in Blair's signature colors of orange and black.

Each collection evoked a grown-up sensuality, with obvious visual references to the soigné looks of French film stars like Michele Morgan or Catherine Deneuve, prompting Andrée Walmsley from Fortnum and Mason to enthuse, "He has a very French handwriting, which I adore." The catwalk shows enlivened British Fashion Weeks with their no-expense-spared glamor. A coterie of international models, from Linda Evangelista to Cindy Crawford, was flown in to promote the clothes as the paparazzi enthused that Paris had firmly established itself in London.

Even though Blair edited the collections with business-like alacrity, the Bertelsen empire was losing money. Bertelsen admitted to Business Magazine in December 1987 that he had lost a million on his first set of accounts. This nonaccumulation of profit eventually led to Bertelsen pulling out as Blair's backer. Even though Blair subsequently found alternative backing, it was not enough to keep the company afloat and it eventually folded. Despite the hype and publicity behind the name, this perhaps exemplifies a problem experienced by many British fashion companies—without the backing of huge textile conglomerates as happens in France, and the vast income earned from licensed goods such as perfume or cosmetics, sole clothing companies often struggle to survive.

As Blair has said, "It's a business. At the end of the day you have to make money for a lot of other people as well." Fortunately for Alistair Blair, his designing was a much respected commodity and led him to design consultancies with a host of firms, including Jaeger, Pierre Balmain, and Complice.

—Kevin Almond

BLASS, Bill

American designer

Born: William Ralph Blass in Fort Wayne, Indiana, 22 June 1922. Education: Attended Fort Wayne High School, 1936–39; studied fashion design, Parsons School of Design, 1939. Military Service: Served as a sergeant in the U.S. Army, 1941–44. Career: Sketch artist, David Crystal Sportswear, New York, 1940–41; designer, Anna Miller and Company Ltd., New York, 1945; designer, 1959–70, and vice-president, 1961–70, Maurice Rentner Ltd., New York; purchased Rentner company, renamed Bill Blass Ltd., 1970; introduced Blassport sportswear division, 1972; introduced signature perfume, 1978; began licensing products, including menswear, womenswear, furs, swimwear, jeans, bed linens, shoes, perfumes, etc.; donated $10 million to New York Public Library, 1994; suffered mild stroke, 1998; farewell gala, 1999; business sold to Hareesh Harani and Michael Groveman, 1999; last collection, spring/summer 2000; Lars Nilsson named new Blass designer, 2001. Awards: Coty American Fashion Critics "Winnie" award, 1961, 1963, 1970, Menswear award, 1968, Hall of Fame award, 1970, and special citations, 1971, 1982, 1983; Gold Coast Fashion award, Chicago, 1965; National Cotton Council award, New York, 1966; Neiman Marcus award, Dallas, 1969; Print Council award, 1971; Martha award, New York, 1974; Ayres Look award, 1978; Gentlemen's Quarterly Manstyle award, New York, 1979; Cutty Sark Hall of Fame award, 1979; Honorary Doctorate, Rhode Island School of Design, 1977; Council of Fashion Designers of America award, 1986. Address: 550 Seventh Avenue, New York, NY 10018, USA.

PUBLICATIONS

On BLASS:

Books

Bender, Marilyn, The Beautiful People, New York, 1967.

Du Cann, Charlotte, "Return of the Pragmatic Professional," in the Independent, 18 March 1989.

* * *

When Alistair Blair showed his first collection in London in 1986, he was testing very tepid water. At that time, British designer fashion was recognized for its youth and eccentricity, fun and witty clothes, often unwearable and badly produced. Blair, complete with impeccable fashion credentials (a first class degree from St. Martin's School of Art in London, followed by training at Dior and Givenchy in Paris, then as design assistant to Karl Lagerfeld), seemed to pose little threat to this established reputation in terms of making a valid fashion statement. Blair, however, realized there was a gap in the British fashion market for continental couture at ready-to-wear prices, a gap that became the philosophy for his company.

This singular marketing notion met with immediate fashion applause at the first season's launch. "Blair has arrived as quite simply the most stylish designer in London," raved Fashion Weekly (16 October 1987). Things very quickly went from strength to strength; support came from top international stores such as Saks Fifth Avenue and Henri Bendel in New York, Harrods in London, and Seibu in Tokyo were quick to place orders. Possibly the greatest publicity came when the Duchess of York ordered her engagement outfit from him.

Blair's backer was Peder Bertelsen, the Danish oil millionaire. Blair, who was considering an offer to work for Royal couturier Norman Hartnell, was advised by a friend to discuss the move with Bertelsen. "Before I knew where I was he was suggesting that he would back me and I was agreeing," he was quoted as saying. Bertelsen was perhaps British fashion's most important asset in the mid-1980s. He injected a great deal of money into his creation of a fashion empire, buying several prestigious stores including Ungaro, Valentino, and Krizia, and backing John Galliano. In his analysis of British designer fashion he concluded that it fell into two categories—old and new money; old money was the Establishment, including the landowners; new money was in the city or in oil and each identified with its own dress designers. Blair was categorized as Bertelsen's designer for the Establishment.

There was certainly something chic yet traditional about Blair's clothes, even in his luxurious choice of fabrics: alpaca, cashmere and lambswool mixes, duchesse satin and satin backed crêpe, expensive soft suedes and kid leather, even sumptuous embroidery from the Royal embroiderer's Lock Ltd. Dog-tooth check wool coats, flannel jackets, and wool crêpe evening dresses in sharp, florid colors always incorporated a section in Blair's signature colors of orange and black.

Each collection evoked a grown-up sensuality, with obvious visual references to the soigné looks of French film stars like Michele Morgan or Catherine Deneuve, prompting Andrée Walmsley from Fortnum and Mason to enthuse, "He has a very French handwriting, which I adore." The catwalk shows enlivened British Fashion Weeks with their no-expense-spared glamor. A coterie of international models, from Linda Evangelista to Cindy Crawford, was flown in to promote the clothes as the paparazzi enthused that Paris had firmly established itself in London.

Even though Blair edited the collections with business-like alacrity, the Bertelsen empire was losing money. Bertelsen admitted to Business Magazine in December 1987 that he had lost a million on his first set of accounts. This nonaccumulation of profit eventually led to Bertelsen pulling out as Blair's backer. Even though Blair subsequently found alternative backing, it was not enough to keep the company afloat and it eventually folded. Despite the hype and publicity behind the name, this perhaps exemplifies a problem experienced by many British fashion companies—without the backing of huge textile conglomerates as happens in France, and the vast income earned from licensed goods such as perfume or cosmetics, sole clothing companies often struggle to survive.

As Blair has said, "It's a business. At the end of the day you have to make money for a lot of other people as well." Fortunately for Alistair Blair, his designing was a much respected commodity and led him to design consultancies with a host of firms, including Jaeger, Pierre Balmain, and Complice.

—Kevin Almond

BLASS, Bill

American designer

Born: William Ralph Blass in Fort Wayne, Indiana, 22 June 1922. Education: Attended Fort Wayne High School, 1936–39; studied fashion design, Parsons School of Design, 1939. Military Service: Served as a sergeant in the U.S. Army, 1941–44. Career: Sketch artist, David Crystal Sportswear, New York, 1940–41; designer, Anna Miller and Company Ltd., New York, 1945; designer, 1959–70, and vice-president, 1961–70, Maurice Rentner Ltd., New York; purchased Rentner company, renamed Bill Blass Ltd., 1970; introduced Blassport sportswear division, 1972; introduced signature perfume, 1978; began licensing products, including menswear, womenswear, furs, swimwear, jeans, bed linens, shoes, perfumes, etc.; donated $10 million to New York Public Library, 1994; suffered mild stroke, 1998; farewell gala, 1999; business sold to Hareesh Harani and Michael Groveman, 1999; last collection, spring/summer 2000; Lars Nilsson named new Blass designer, 2001. Awards: Coty American Fashion Critics "Winnie" award, 1961, 1963, 1970, Menswear award, 1968, Hall of Fame award, 1970, and special citations, 1971, 1982, 1983; Gold Coast Fashion award, Chicago, 1965; National Cotton Council award, New York, 1966; Neiman Marcus award, Dallas, 1969; Print Council award, 1971; Martha award, New York, 1974; Ayres Look award, 1978; Gentlemen's Quarterly Manstyle award, New York, 1979; Cutty Sark Hall of Fame award, 1979; Honorary Doctorate, Rhode Island School of Design, 1977; Council of Fashion Designers of America award, 1986. Address: 550 Seventh Avenue, New York, NY 10018, USA.

PUBLICATIONS

On BLASS:

Books

Bender, Marilyn, The Beautiful People, New York, 1967.

Bill Blass, fall 1998 collection. © Fashion Syndicate Press.

Morris, Bernadine, and Barbara Walz, The Fashion Makers, New York, 1978.
 Diamonstein, Barbaralee, Fashion: The Inside Story, New York, 1985.
 Milbank, Caroline Rennolds, Couture: The Great Designers, New York, 1985.
 Perschitz, Lois, ed., W: The Designing Life, New York, 1987.
 Coleridge, Nicholas, The Fashion Conspiracy, London, 1988.
 Milbank, Caroline Rennolds, New York Fashion: The Evolution of American Style, New York, 1989.
 Daria, Irene, The Fashion Cycle: A Behind-the-Scenes Look at a Year with Bill Blass, Liz Claiborne, Donna Karan, Arnold Scaasi, and Adrienne Vittadini, New York, 1990.
 Stegemeyer, Anne, Who's Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.
American Decades, Gale Research CD-ROM, 1998.
 Lagasse, Paul, ed., The Columbia Encyclopedia, 6th edition, Farmington Hills, MI, 2000.

Articles

“Dialogue with Bill Blass,” in Interior Design, June 1973.

- “Bill Blass: Real American Class,” in American Fabrics and Fashions (New York), Fall 1974.
 “A Different Glamor at Bill Blass,” in Vogue, September 1985.
 Prisant, Carol, “Top Blass,” in World of Interiors (London), October 1990.
 Morris, Bernadine, “With Blass, Spontaneity Has Returned to Style,” in the New York Times, 30 March 1993.
 Orlean, Susan, “King of the Road,” in the New Yorker, 20 December 1993.
 Schiro, Anne-Marie, “Tasteful Comes in Many Colors,” in the New York Times, 4 November 1994.
 DeCaro, Frank, “Hairy Situations and Hula Baloos: Bill Blass,” in New York Newsday, 4 November 1994.
 Beckett, Kathleen, “Runway Report: My One and Only Hue: Bill Blass,” in the New York Post, 4 November 1994.
 “New York: Bill Blass,” in Women's Wear Daily, 4 November 1994.
 Schiro, Anne-Marie, “Chic and Quality from Bill Blass,” in the New York Times, 7 April 1995.
 “New York: Bill Blass,” in Women's Wear Daily, 7 April 1995.
 Geran, Monica, “Bill Blass Revisited,” in Interior Design, May 1996.
 Schiro, Anne-Marie, “Two Vanishing Breeds (Fashion Designers Bill Blass, Oscar de la Renta),” in the New York Times, 1 November 1996.
 Geran, Monica, “Cut From the Same Cloth,” in Interior Design, April 1997.
 Interview, “Home at Blass,” in In Style, March 1998.
 Schiro, Anne-Marie, “Blass as Blass, Even Damp,” in the Wall Street Journal, 22 December 1998.
 “Simple But Not Too Sweet is Bill Blass for Spring,” online at CNN.com, 1 March 1999.
 Gandee, Charles, “The 1950s: Designer Bill Blass Remembers the Years of Cocktails, Café Society, and Cool American Chic,” in Vogue, November 1999.
 “Bill Blass Ltd. Sold to Haresh Tharani, Largest Licensee & Michael Groveman, Blass' CFO,” in Business Wire, 8 November 1999.
 “SOLD! Bill Blass Empire Goes to CFO, Licensee,” in Apparel Industry Magazine, December 1999.
 “Blass Bids Farewell with Signature Collection,” online at CNN.com, 8 December 1999.
 Wilson, Eric, “Slowik Said to Get Blass Design Job,” in Women's Wear Daily, 27 January 2000.
 “The Blass Menagerie,” in Women's Wear Daily, 11 February 2000.
 Hayt, Elizabeth, “A Blass Evening, Elegant and Understated,” in the New York Times, 20 February 2000.
 Wilson, Eric, “Bill Blass Receives a Retrospective,” in Women's Wear Daily, 16 May 2000.
 Cannon, Michael, “Parties,” Town & Country, June 2000.
 Bellafante, Ginia, “Those Who Defy, and Those Who Don't,” in the New York Times, 22 September 2000.
 “Braillard Denies Blass Move,” in Women's Wear Daily, 2 February 2001.
 “New York: A Delicate Balance,” in Women's Wear Daily, 16 February 2001.
 “Bill Blass,” in Biography Resource Center, online at www.galenet.gale.com, 17 July 2001.

* * *

“Like most people who seem to be most typically New York, Bill Blass comes from Indiana,” wrote native Midwesterner Eleanor

Bill Blass, fall 1998 collection. © Fashion Syndicate Press.

Lambert in an early press release for Blass when he worked at Maurice Rentner. Blass reigns as an American classic, the man who abidingly exemplifies high style because his work plays on the sharp edge of glamor but never falls into the abyss of indecency. Likewise, it defines sophisticated style because it has elements of the naive and the crude in impeccable balance. Blass is the perfect example of fashion's deconstructivist internal oppositions of real, hyper-glamor, and style synthesis.

Although Blass believes in eliminating the superfluous and stressing the essentials of clothing, he is no Yankee skinflint or reductive modernist and aims to beguile and flatter, adding perhaps a flyaway panel, not necessary for structure, that would never appeal to a Halston or a Zoran. He aims to create a fanciful chic, a sense of glamor and luxury. It may be that these desires are fashion's game, but it is undeniable that Blass is the expert player. Everything he does is suffused with style, and he creates evening gowns that would stagger Scarlett O'Hara. His shimmering Matisse collection, embroidered in India, transformed the wearer into a conveyor of masterpiece paintings.

Blass has always been an indisputable enchanter, a man who loves being with the ladies he dresses. Correspondingly, they love being with him, but the relationship is not merely indicative of the elevation of fashion designer from dressmaker to social presence. Blass learns from his clients and, in learning, addresses their needs and wishes. In designing separates, he describes what he likes with a certain top, admits that one of his clients prefers to wear it otherwise and acknowledges it looks better as she wears it.

There are essential leitmotifs in Blass' work. Recalling Mainbocher, he invents from the sweater and brings insights of daywear into the most elegant nighttime presentations. Blass imports menswear practicality and fabrics to womenswear. His evening gowns are dreamlike in their self-conscious extravagance and flattery to the wearer. He can evoke Schiaparelli in the concise elegance of a simulated wood embroidered jacket; but there is also something definably Blass about the garment. In a very old-fashioned way, he celebrates life without the cynicism of other designers. He can be audacious in mixing pattern and texture, though generally with the subtlety of his preferred palette of muted color. Texture is equally important—a red wool cardigan resonant to a red silk dress or the complement of gray flannel trousers to fractured, shimmering surfaces for day and evening. Layering is essential to Blass: whether it is a cardigan teamed with a blouse or sweater or gauzy one-sleeve wraps for evening, Blass flourishes in layers.

Blass evolved into a superb licensing genius and dean of American fashion designers. His is an intensely pictorial imagination, one that conjures up the most romantic possibilities of fashion. He maintains an ideal of glamor and personal aura, redolent of socialites and stars of screen and stage. Yet though there is little in Blass' work that is truly unique to him and not practiced by any other designer, one would never mistake a Blass for a Mainbocher or a Schiaparelli nor for any of his contemporaries.

In December 1998 the legendary designer suffered a mild stroke in Houston, Texas, at age 76. His last showing was the spring-summer collection of 2000. He appeared at a grand farewell, hosted by Manhattan society to honor his lengthy career in design, in fall 1999. From middle-class beginnings as the son of a dressmaker and hardware dealer, he had dressed the likes of Nancy Reagan, Barbara Bush, Nancy Kissinger, Candice Bergen, Barbara Walters, and the fashionable elite.

Of Blass' retirement party, Patrick McCarthy, chairperson of Women's Wear Daily, noted, "There are not many standing ovations in fashion. Bill just gave a little wave, barely perceptible, but it was a wave good-bye." On 5 November 1999, he signed over his $700 million design and licensing complex to Haresh T. Harani, chairperson of the Resource Club Ltd., the Blass licensing agency, and Michael Groveman, CFO of the Blass empire.

Retired to a historic 22-acre estate and colonial home in New Preston, Connecticut, a month after selling his fashion house, Blass has kept one foot in Manhattan at his in-town Sutton Place apartment. Of his departure from sketch pads and runways he declared, "I thought the end of the year, beginning of the new century, was the perfect time. After all, I'd been doing it for 60 years... God knows you're not immortal."

—Richard Martin; updated by Mary Ellen Snodgrass

BLUMARINE

Italian fashion design company

Founded: in Carpi, Italy, in 1977, by Anna Molinari, chief designer and artistic director, with husband Gianpaolo Tarabini. Company

Bill Blass, fall 1998 collection. © Fashion Syndicate Press.

Lambert in an early press release for Blass when he worked at Maurice Rentner. Blass reigns as an American classic, the man who abidingly exemplifies high style because his work plays on the sharp edge of glamor but never falls into the abyss of indecency. Likewise, it defines sophisticated style because it has elements of the naive and the crude in impeccable balance. Blass is the perfect example of fashion's deconstructivist internal oppositions of real, hyper-glamor, and style synthesis.

Although Blass believes in eliminating the superfluous and stressing the essentials of clothing, he is no Yankee skinflint or reductive modernist and aims to beguile and flatter, adding perhaps a flyaway panel, not necessary for structure, that would never appeal to a Halston or a Zoran. He aims to create a fanciful chic, a sense of glamor and luxury. It may be that these desires are fashion's game, but it is undeniable that Blass is the expert player. Everything he does is suffused with style, and he creates evening gowns that would stagger Scarlett O'Hara. His shimmering Matisse collection, embroidered in India, transformed the wearer into a conveyor of masterpiece paintings.

Blass has always been an indisputable enchanter, a man who loves being with the ladies he dresses. Correspondingly, they love being with him, but the relationship is not merely indicative of the elevation of fashion designer from dressmaker to social presence. Blass learns from his clients and, in learning, addresses their needs and wishes. In designing separates, he describes what he likes with a certain top, admits that one of his clients prefers to wear it otherwise and acknowledges it looks better as she wears it.

There are essential leitmotifs in Blass' work. Recalling Mainbocher, he invents from the sweater and brings insights of daywear into the most elegant nighttime presentations. Blass imports menswear practicality and fabrics to womenswear. His evening gowns are dreamlike in their self-conscious extravagance and flattery to the wearer. He can evoke Schiaparelli in the concise elegance of a simulated wood embroidered jacket; but there is also something definably Blass about the garment. In a very old-fashioned way, he celebrates life without the cynicism of other designers. He can be audacious in mixing pattern and texture, though generally with the subtlety of his preferred palette of muted color. Texture is equally important—a red wool cardigan resonant to a red silk dress or the complement of gray flannel trousers to fractured, shimmering surfaces for day and evening. Layering is essential to Blass: whether it is a cardigan teamed with a blouse or sweater or gauzy one-sleeve wraps for evening, Blass flourishes in layers.

Blass evolved into a superb licensing genius and dean of American fashion designers. His is an intensely pictorial imagination, one that conjures up the most romantic possibilities of fashion. He maintains an ideal of glamor and personal aura, redolent of socialites and stars of screen and stage. Yet though there is little in Blass' work that is truly unique to him and not practiced by any other designer, one would never mistake a Blass for a Mainbocher or a Schiaparelli nor for any of his contemporaries.

In December 1998 the legendary designer suffered a mild stroke in Houston, Texas, at age 76. His last showing was the spring-summer collection of 2000. He appeared at a grand farewell, hosted by Manhattan society to honor his lengthy career in design, in fall 1999. From middle-class beginnings as the son of a dressmaker and hardware dealer, he had dressed the likes of Nancy Reagan, Barbara Bush, Nancy Kissinger, Candice Bergen, Barbara Walters, and the fashionable elite.

Of Blass' retirement party, Patrick McCarthy, chairperson of Women's Wear Daily, noted, "There are not many standing ovations in fashion. Bill just gave a little wave, barely perceptible, but it was a wave good-bye." On 5 November 1999, he signed over his $700 million design and licensing complex to Haresh T. Harani, chairperson of the Resource Club Ltd., the Blass licensing agency, and Michael Groveman, CFO of the Blass empire.

Retired to a historic 22-acre estate and colonial home in New Preston, Connecticut, a month after selling his fashion house, Blass has kept one foot in Manhattan at his in-town Sutton Place apartment. Of his departure from sketch pads and runways he declared, "I thought the end of the year, beginning of the new century, was the perfect time. After all, I'd been doing it for 60 years... God knows you're not immortal."

—Richard Martin; updated by Mary Ellen Snodgrass

BLUMARINE

Italian fashion design company

Founded: in Carpi, Italy, in 1977, by Anna Molinari, chief designer and artistic director, with husband Gianpaolo Tarabini. Company

Blumarine, fall/winter 2001–02 collection: chiffon ensemble with a fur hat. © AP/Wide World Photos.

History: First catwalk show in Milan, 1981; Anna Molinari line presented twice a year in Milano Collezioni shows, from 1986; added two lines, Blumarine Folies and Miss Blumarine, 1987; Blumarine licensing deals for perfume, glasses, leather goods, swimwear, jewelry, and home furnishings, 1987; opened flagship store in Via Spiga, Milan, 1990. Awards: Best Designer of the Year, Modit Milan, 1980; Griffi d'Oro award, Imola, Italy, 1981; Rotary Club Gold award, 1991; Lions Club Carpione d'Oro award, 1992. Company Address: Via Don Milani, 6–47814, Bellaria, Italy.

PUBLICATIONS

On BLUMARINE:

Books

Gastel, M., Designers, Milan, 1994.
The Best in Catalogue Design, London, 1994.

Articles

Pardo, D., "Modelle d'Italia," in L'Espresso (Rome), January 1993.
 Mari, L., "Helmut Newton 1993," in Vogue (Milan), March 1993.
 Staples, K., "Italy's Newest Line," in Mademoiselle, March 1993.
 Cavaglione, P., "Il Mio Profeta," in Amica, August 1993.

Szlezinger, T., "Stilisti e Designer," in Vogue Sposa (Milan), March 1994.

Gagliardo, P., "Vogue Erfolg," in Vogue (Munich), August 1994.
 "Fashion Notebook 1: Copy Cats," in Observer Magazine, 15 June 1997.

"Rosella at the Helm," in Women's Wear Daily, 1 January 1998.

"Tales of Milano," in Women's Wear Daily, 3 March 1998.

"Material Science," in Leather, 1 June 1998.

"Milan: Fall/Winter Collections," in the San Francisco Chronicle, 2 March 1999.

Givhan, Robin, "Fear and Clothing Triumph in Milan," in the Washington Post, 29 September 1999.

Wilson, Jennifer, "Shop Appeal," in the Los Angeles Magazine, March 2000.

Edwards, Pamela, "Runway Report," in Essence, April 2000.

"Pikenz Evolves Fashion Classic," in Duty-Free News International, 1 June 2000.

"Milan Fashion Shows Start Upbeat," from Reuters, 9 September 2000.

"From Ralph Lauren to Chanel—Crystals Line the Runways," from the PR Newswire, 18 September 2000.

Menkes, Suzy, "A Few Vivacious Voices Hit the High Notes in Milan," in the International Herald Tribune, 7 October 2000.

"Designers Lose Their Common Tongue," in the Irish Times, 10 October 2000.

"Fling with the Wild Frontier," in the Washington Post, 9 March 2001.

"Fashion: Frock 'n' Roll Prom Queens Get a Dressing Down," in the Independent (London), 19 May 2001.

"Anna Molinari," available online at www.modaonline.it, 17 July 2001.

"Blumarine," online at FirstView, www.firstview.com, 17 July 2001.

"Blumarine," online at Elle online, www.Elle.com, 17 July 2001.

"La Semana del Moda en Milán," online at www.el-mundo.es, 17 July 2001.

"Personal Profile: Blumarine," online at Virtual Runway, www.virtualrunway.com, 17 July 2001.

*

The stylistic concept of Anna Molinari is very simple: fantasy, passion, curiosity, fascination, and romanticism. It's easy to describe the typical Blumarine woman: one has only to look to Anna Molinari, her intelligence, vivacity, creativity, femininity and passion: a vibration between angel and femme fatale. Helmut Newton, one of the world's greatest fashion photographers, has perceived this essence and, guided by the modernity of Anna Molinari, has created a new concept of feminine power.

—Blumarine

* * *

Blumarine collections are designed by the company's founder and owner, Anna Molinari. Based in Carpi in Italy, collections are shown seasonally, twice a year in Milan. Since its 1977 inception, the company has built up a steady international following that includes recent openings in the United Kingdom and the United States.

Blumarine collections are young, fun, and throwaway. Kitsch and naughty, sexy yet prudish, the clothes always represent an appealing ambiguity. A Blumarine promotional piece, for example, gives a peek-a-boo glimpse at a little girl plundering her elder sister's wardrobe and emerging half innocent, half saucy, into the sophisticated world. There is also a hard-edged defiance about the clothes, designed by a woman who combines her intelligence with the feminine powers of seduction.

Blumarine, spring/summer 2002 ready-to-wear collection. © AFP/CORBIS.

Fashion photographer Helmut Newton has created a strong image for Blumarine since he began styling and photographing the company's promotional material. Whether it's set in the seedy world of a back street hotel, complete with tacky 1970s decor, or on the shores of a trashy Mediterranean seaside resort, there are always strong sexual connotations in the imagery. Clothes are styled with revealing accessories—suspender belts, the spiked patent stilettos of the dominatrix, or dog collars as chokers. The poses of the models, particularly Nadja Auerman, who resembles an early 1980s Debbie Harry, tantalize. The images, Molinari's and Newton's, are always provocative.

Molinari likes to emphasize the female figure, which is often achieved by exaggerated feminine styles. Very popular is her tutu miniskirt, which features a tiny cinched waist that suddenly explodes into a full bell skirt, and layer upon layer of net and lace petticoats. The line also featured delicate black lace baby doll dresses cut dangerously short, laced bustiers, short, striped milkmaid dresses, tiny cardigans, and figure-hugging sweaters, always worn in a way to reveal a lacy bra top or satin-trimmed slip.

Popular fabrics have included lace, brocade, chiffon, and fake fur either as a trim or made into a figure-hugging jacket. Accessories are important—bo-peep caps worn with schoolgirl pigtails, large feather boas, or top hats. Ruffles often reoccur in collections, on shirts or as flounced cuffs and necklines. Color mixes are always refreshing and unexpected: ice blues mixed with burgundy, peach, and cream, or chocolate brown mixed with sky blue and tangerine; dominating, though, is black, always sexy and suggestive.

Blumarine has also explored many directional fashion themes in collections. For spring/summer 1995, Molinari exploited the most accurate depiction of that season's "disco diva" look, with short, pleated-on-the-knee pencil skirts in sherbet satin, combined with fitted jackets, good-time hot pants, and kitsch-print Lurex t-shirts. Other collections exploit what Anna Molinari believes to be the dual personality in every woman: coyness combined with passion, or the little girl combined with the temptress. The company has steadily increased its influence and is now recognized as one of the more directional, risk-taking fashion labels in the world, with showrooms in Milan, New York, and Paris, and a steadily increasing coterie of boutiques in Hong Kong, Milan, and London.

The company's courtship of the moneyed, under-30 buyer brought a sharp turnaround in both style and taste. The arrival of Molinari and Tarabini's daughter Rosella into the design studio in 1998 splashed an obviously youthful élan over the Blumarine high-fashion severity. Long past its days in knitwear, Blumarine's theatrical reds, purples, torrid pinks, and turquoises teamed with cigarette skirts in satin, leather, and crocodile and body-hugging suits collared in mink and topped with fox stoles and full-length fur. In March 1998, Molinari presented satin and pointelle slip dresses, fur-collar velvet coats, and sweater sets for fall, a nostalgic return to the sweater girls of the 1950s and 1960s with a touch of the flapper. For dress-up, she stressed beaded evening wear for a head-turning party entrance.

In her second season, designing daughter Rosella toned down her ebullience with less exhibitionism, more control of her gala florals, sequined slip dresses, tailored pantsuits, and polka dot organza with ruffled hems and poufy sleeves. Balancing a mother's boldness with mother-knobs-best, Molinari designs drew West Coast fans to Heaven 27, Sofia Coppola's Los Angeles boutique which debuted in 1999. In consecutive spring showings, Blumarine kept up the pressure with flirty flair and a sprinkling of Rosella's heart prints, a come-hither for the youngest fashion follower.

New lines bolstered the house image for tarty chic with embroidered and jeweled mules for 2000. Fall/winter 2000 also sought past glow and sparkle with black frocks from the 1980s and dress-up attire in beads and sequins, embroidery, ethereal lace, and silks with daring slit skirts, scalloped hems, chiffon blouses, and touches of Swarovski crystal mesh, a motif that continued into 2001.

—Kevin Almond; updated by Mary Ellen Snodgrass

BODYMAP

British design team

Founded: in 1982 by Stevie Stewart and David Holah. Stewart born in London, 1958; studied at Barnet College. Holah born in London, 1958; studied at North Oxfordshire College of Art. Both studied fashion at Middlesex Polytechnic, 1979–82; graduation collection purchased by Browns, London. Company History: Company expanded in 1985 to include Bodymap men's and women's collection, B-Basic junior line, Bodymap Red Label, and Bodymap swimwear; designed costumes for Michael Clark's No Fire Escape in Hell ballet, 1986; fell on hard times and closed, late 1980s. Awards: Martini Young Fashion award, 1983; Bath Museum of Costume Dress of the Year award, 1984.

PUBLICATIONS

By BODYMAP:

Articles

Stewart, Stevie, "Mapping the Future: Talking 'Bout My Generation," in Fashion '86, London 1985.

On BODYMAP:

Books

McDermott, Catherine, Street Style: British Design in the 1980s, London 1987.

Coleridge, Nicholas, The Fashion Conspiracy, London 1988.

Evans, Caroline, and Minna Thornton, Women and Fashion: A New Look, London 1989.

Articles

Warner, Marina, "Counter-Couture," in Connoisseur (London), May 1984.

"Bodymap: British BCBG Version B.D.," in Elle (London), September 1984.

Jones, Mark, "Followers of Fashion," in Creative Review (London), December 1984.

Cleave, Maureen, "Leading Them a Dance," in the Observer (London), 18 May 1986.

Mower, Sarah, "Off the Map," in The Guardian (London), 5 June 1986.

Jeal, Nicola, "Bodymap," in the Observer, 12 June 1986.

Tredre, Roger, "Body Style," in Fashion Weekly (London), 28 September 1989.

Elliot, Tom, and Robin Duff, "Rise and Fall," in Blitz (London), November 1989.

McRobbie, Angela, "Falling Off the Catwalk," in New Statesman & Society, 7 June 1996.

Fallon, James, "Shop Spawns Shopgirl Tops," in Women's Wear Daily, 25 November 1998.

Birns, Amanda, et al., "What's Hot...Shopgirl Hooks Up with Playboy," in Women's Wear Daily, 19 June 2000.

* * *

"Barbie Takes a Trip," or "Querelle Meets Olive Oil," or even "The Cat in the Hat Takes a Rumble with the Techno Fish," are just some of the bizarre titles of Bodymap collections. The company, a male-female partnership between Middlesex Polytechnic graduates David Holah and Stevie Stewart, was one of the brightest design teams to emerge during the 1980s. By the middle of the decade London was being promoted by the media as a trendy hothouse of bright young things. Bodymap was regarded as being amongst the brightest of all, turning the Establishment upside-down with wild, young, and unconventional clothes. Fashion editors were clamoring for more, declaring Bodymap to be the hottest fashion label of the decade.

Founded in 1982, the name of the company was inspired by Italian artist Enrico Job, who took over a thousand photographs of every part of his anatomy, then collaged them together, creating a two-dimensional version of a three-dimensional object—in other words, a body map. A similar philosophy was adapted in Stewart and Holah's approach to pattern making and garment construction. Prints, knits, silhouettes, and shapes were restructured and reinvented to map the body. Stretch clothes had holes in unexpected places, so the emphasis was transferred from one place to another. Pieces of flesh were amalgamated with pieces of fabric in an effort to explore new areas of the body, previously considered unflattering.

Awarded the Individual Clothes Show prize as the "Most Exciting and Innovative Young Designers of 1983," Bodymap clothes were always for the young, avant-garde, and daring. Working predominantly in black, white, and cream, a familiar theme involved the layering of prints and textures on top of one another, to create an obviously youthful élan over the Blumarine high-fashion severity. Long past its days in knitwear, Blumarine's theatrical reds, purples, torrid pinks, and turquoises teamed with cigarette skirts in satin, leather, and crocodile and body-hugging suits collared in mink and topped with fox stoles and full-length fur. In March 1998, Molinari presented satin and pointelle slip dresses, fur-collar velvet coats, and sweater sets for fall, a nostalgic return to the sweater girls of the 1950s and 1960s with a touch of the flapper. For dress-up, she stressed beaded evening wear for a head-turning party entrance.

In her second season, designing daughter Rosella toned down her ebullience with less exhibitionism, more control of her gala florals, sequined slip dresses, tailored pantsuits, and polka dot organza with ruffled hems and poufy sleeves. Balancing a mother's boldness with mother-knobs-best, Molinari designs drew West Coast fans to Heaven 27, Sofia Coppola's Los Angeles boutique which debuted in 1999. In consecutive spring showings, Blumarine kept up the pressure with flirty flair and a sprinkling of Rosella's heart prints, a come-hither for the youngest fashion follower.

New lines bolstered the house image for tarty chic with embroidered and jeweled mules for 2000. Fall/winter 2000 also sought past glow and sparkle with black frocks from the 1980s and dress-up attire in beads and sequins, embroidery, ethereal lace, and silks with daring slit skirts, scalloped hems, chiffon blouses, and touches of Swarovski crystal mesh, a motif that continued into 2001.

—Kevin Almond; updated by Mary Ellen Snodgrass

BODYMAP

British design team

Founded: in 1982 by Stevie Stewart and David Holah. Stewart born in London, 1958; studied at Barnet College. Holah born in London, 1958; studied at North Oxfordshire College of Art. Both studied fashion at Middlesex Polytechnic, 1979–82; graduation collection purchased by Browns, London. Company History: Company expanded in 1985 to include Bodymap men's and women's collection, B-Basic junior line, Bodymap Red Label, and Bodymap swimwear; designed costumes for Michael Clark's No Fire Escape in Hell ballet, 1986; fell on hard times and closed, late 1980s. Awards: Martini Young Fashion award, 1983; Bath Museum of Costume Dress of the Year award, 1984.

PUBLICATIONS

By BODYMAP:

Articles

Stewart, Stevie, "Mapping the Future: Talking 'Bout My Generation," in Fashion '86, London 1985.

On BODYMAP:

Books

McDermott, Catherine, Street Style: British Design in the 1980s, London 1987.

Coleridge, Nicholas, The Fashion Conspiracy, London 1988.

Evans, Caroline, and Minna Thornton, Women and Fashion: A New Look, London 1989.

Articles

Warner, Marina, "Counter-Couture," in Connoisseur (London), May 1984.

"Bodymap: British BCBG Version B.D.," in Elle (London), September 1984.

Jones, Mark, "Followers of Fashion," in Creative Review (London), December 1984.

Cleave, Maureen, "Leading Them a Dance," in the Observer (London), 18 May 1986.

Mower, Sarah, "Off the Map," in The Guardian (London), 5 June 1986.

Jeal, Nicola, "Bodymap," in the Observer, 12 June 1986.

Tredre, Roger, "Body Style," in Fashion Weekly (London), 28 September 1989.

Elliot, Tom, and Robin Duff, "Rise and Fall," in Blitz (London), November 1989.

McRobbie, Angela, "Falling Off the Catwalk," in New Statesman & Society, 7 June 1996.

Fallon, James, "Shop Spawns Shopgirl Tops," in Women's Wear Daily, 25 November 1998.

Birns, Amanda, et al., "What's Hot...Shopgirl Hooks Up with Playboy," in Women's Wear Daily, 19 June 2000.

* * *

"Barbie Takes a Trip," or "Querelle Meets Olive Oil," or even "The Cat in the Hat Takes a Rumble with the Techno Fish," are just some of the bizarre titles of Bodymap collections. The company, a male-female partnership between Middlesex Polytechnic graduates David Holah and Stevie Stewart, was one of the brightest design teams to emerge during the 1980s. By the middle of the decade London was being promoted by the media as a trendy hothouse of bright young things. Bodymap was regarded as being amongst the brightest of all, turning the Establishment upside-down with wild, young, and unconventional clothes. Fashion editors were clamoring for more, declaring Bodymap to be the hottest fashion label of the decade.

Founded in 1982, the name of the company was inspired by Italian artist Enrico Job, who took over a thousand photographs of every part of his anatomy, then collaged them together, creating a two-dimensional version of a three-dimensional object—in other words, a body map. A similar philosophy was adapted in Stewart and Holah's approach to pattern making and garment construction. Prints, knits, silhouettes, and shapes were restructured and reinvented to map the body. Stretch clothes had holes in unexpected places, so the emphasis was transferred from one place to another. Pieces of flesh were amalgamated with pieces of fabric in an effort to explore new areas of the body, previously considered unflattering.

Awarded the Individual Clothes Show prize as the "Most Exciting and Innovative Young Designers of 1983," Bodymap clothes were always for the young, avant-garde, and daring. Working predominantly in black, white, and cream, a familiar theme involved the layering of prints and textures on top of one another, to create an unstructured look, redefining traditional body shapes, overemphasizing shapeliness or shapelessness so both the overweight and underweight, plain or beautiful, could wear and be comfortable in an outfit.

Bodymap described itself in the 1980s as being a young company employing other young people to mix creativity with commerce. They worked very closely with textile designer Hilde Smith, who created many Bodymap prints and helped bridge gaps between fashion and textile design. Film and videographer John Maybury was responsible for Bodymap's outrageous fashion show videos, featuring dancer Michael Clark, singers Boy George and Helen Terry, and performance artist Leigh Bowery. Photographer David LaChappelle was responsible for many of the visual stills used in magazines.

While still at Middlesex Polytechnic, Bodymap recognized the importance of moving in a circle of talented, creative people. Holah and Stewart were part of the young 1980s generation attracting worldwide attention for London as a vibrant center for creative energy and ideas, not only in fashion but music, painting, video, and dance. Unfortunately for Bodymap, the end of the 1980s proved the end of the road of the once-hipster design house. Tough times and tougher competition brought the firm down, at a time when smaller British fashion design companies failed more often than not.

After Bodymap's demise, Stevie Stewart consulted for several companies then went on to design a new line of chic tops called Shopgirl for Max Kyrie and Pippa Brooks, owner of the Shop boutique on Brewer Street in London. The new collection debuted in 1998, alongside a Shopgirl jewelry line. By 2000 the Stewart-designed Shopgirl line was sold not only at Shop but at Harvey Nichols and Bloomingdale's in New York City. The Shopgirl collection expanded to include cardigans and lingerie, then teamed up with Playboy International to put the famous bunny logo on its hip leisurewear. Shop owners Brooks and Kyrie were in talks with Babycham in 2001 to put the popular fawn logo on Shopgirl threads and jewelry.

—Kevin Almond; updated by Nelly Rhodes

BOGNER, Willy, (Jr.)

German sportswear designer

Born: Munich, 23 January 1942, son of Maria and Willy Bogner Sr. Family: Married Sonia Ribeiro, 1973. Career: Willy Bogner GmbH established by Willy Sr., 1936; company began outfitting West German ski teams, from 1936; mother Maria designed revolutionary ski pants, dubbed "Bogners," 1948; skied in Olympics, 1960 and 1964; took over family business, 1970s; U.S. subsidiary, Bogner of America, formed, 1976; began opening stores in U.S., 1985; launched fragrance, Bogner Man and bath and body lines; began extensive licensing program for leather accessories, eyewear, jeans, socks, shoes, gloves, jewelry, and bikewear, from 1990s; new licensing agreement with Cosmopolitan Cosmetics, 1999; also performed ski stunts in Bond films and others; then filmmaker with over two dozen films to his credit. Address: Willy Bogner GmbH & Co. KG, Postfach 80–02–80 Sankt-Veit Strasse 4, 8000 Munich 80, Germany.

PUBLICATIONS

On BOGNER:

Books

Lambert, Eleanor, World of Fashion: People, Places, Resources, New York & London, 1976.

Articles

Conant, Jennet, "Flash on the Slopes: Designer-Director Bogner Heats Up the Ski Scene," in Newsweek, 23 December 1985.

"Big Bucks Bogner," in Forbes, 13 January 1986.

Brooks, Hollis, "Designing Skiers," in Skiing, October 1994.

Feitelberg, Rosemary, "Jump-Starting Bogner Shop," in Women's Wear Daily, 26 October 1995.

"Cosmopolitan Continues Product Offensive (License Agreement with Willy Bogner)," in Soap Perfumery & Cosmetics, May 1999.

Drier, Melissa, "Bogner Licensing Plan: $80 Million in Three Years," in Women's Wear Daily, 22 November 2000.

* * *

The Bogner ski and sportswear company has been run by the Bogner family since its founding by Willy Bogner Sr. in 1936. Bogner Sr. was called the "Dior of ski fashion" while his wife Maria was considered the "Coco Chanel of sports fashion." Both Bogner Sr. and Bogner Jr.'s status as producers of the most stylish skiwear available is practically unrivaled, and the company bearing their name is just as well known for the unparalleled fit and quality workmanship of its activewear. The successful combination of design, cut, and technically-advanced fabrics has earned the Bogner company loyal customers throughout Europe, Asia, and North America.

The Bogner name has stood for innovation in the skiwear field since the introduction of Maria's stretch trousers design in 1948. The trousers were immediately popular owing to their feminine look, as compared to previous women's skiwear which was decidedly masculine and unflattering. Devotees of the new "Bogners," as they were known at the time, included internationally recognized women such as Marilyn Monroe and Ingrid Bergman. The Bogner company also pioneered the development of the one-piece ski suit and the use of stretch fabrics. Their first one-piece racing suits were worn by the 1960 West German Olympic ski team; the team was subsequently outfitted and sponsored by the Bogner company for decades.

Willy Bogner Jr. joined the company in the early 1970s and continued the tradition of design innovation. The U.S. subsidiary, Bogner of America, was formed in 1976 and over the next three decades the variety of Bogner products grew to include cross-country skiwear, tennis and golf ensembles, swimwear, general sportswear, the Fire & Ice snowboarding line for younger enthusiasts, and an ever-growing range of accessories. In the middle and late 1990s, Bogner went on a licensing spree to spearhead expansion. While the Bogner name had already appeared on sports-related accessories available in its stores, licensing agreements brought Bogner products from shoes, boots, and socks, to bath and body products, jeans, gloves, and jewelry to worldwide markets.

unstructured look, redefining traditional body shapes, overemphasizing shapeliness or shapelessness so both the overweight and underweight, plain or beautiful, could wear and be comfortable in an outfit.

Bodymap described itself in the 1980s as being a young company employing other young people to mix creativity with commerce. They worked very closely with textile designer Hilde Smith, who created many Bodymap prints and helped bridge gaps between fashion and textile design. Film and videographer John Maybury was responsible for Bodymap's outrageous fashion show videos, featuring dancer Michael Clark, singers Boy George and Helen Terry, and performance artist Leigh Bowery. Photographer David LaChappelle was responsible for many of the visual stills used in magazines.

While still at Middlesex Polytechnic, Bodymap recognized the importance of moving in a circle of talented, creative people. Holah and Stewart were part of the young 1980s generation attracting worldwide attention for London as a vibrant center for creative energy and ideas, not only in fashion but music, painting, video, and dance. Unfortunately for Bodymap, the end of the 1980s proved the end of the road of the once-hipster design house. Tough times and tougher competition brought the firm down, at a time when smaller British fashion design companies failed more often than not.

After Bodymap's demise, Stevie Stewart consulted for several companies then went on to design a new line of chic tops called Shopgirl for Max Kyrie and Pippa Brooks, owner of the Shop boutique on Brewer Street in London. The new collection debuted in 1998, alongside a Shopgirl jewelry line. By 2000 the Stewart-designed Shopgirl line was sold not only at Shop but at Harvey Nichols and Bloomingdale's in New York City. The Shopgirl collection expanded to include cardigans and lingerie, then teamed up with Playboy International to put the famous bunny logo on its hip leisurewear. Shop owners Brooks and Kyrie were in talks with Babycham in 2001 to put the popular fawn logo on Shopgirl threads and jewelry.

—Kevin Almond; updated by Nelly Rhodes

BOGNER, Willy, (Jr.)

German sportswear designer

Born: Munich, 23 January 1942, son of Maria and Willy Bogner Sr. Family: Married Sonia Ribeiro, 1973. Career: Willy Bogner GmbH established by Willy Sr., 1936; company began outfitting West German ski teams, from 1936; mother Maria designed revolutionary ski pants, dubbed "Bogners," 1948; skied in Olympics, 1960 and 1964; took over family business, 1970s; U.S. subsidiary, Bogner of America, formed, 1976; began opening stores in U.S., 1985; launched fragrance, Bogner Man and bath and body lines; began extensive licensing program for leather accessories, eyewear, jeans, socks, shoes, gloves, jewelry, and bikewear, from 1990s; new licensing agreement with Cosmopolitan Cosmetics, 1999; also performed ski stunts in Bond films and others; then filmmaker with over two dozen films to his credit. Address: Willy Bogner GmbH & Co. KG, Postfach 80–02–80 Sankt-Veit Strasse 4, 8000 Munich 80, Germany.

PUBLICATIONS

On BOGNER:

Books

Lambert, Eleanor, World of Fashion: People, Places, Resources, New York & London, 1976.

Articles

Conant, Jennet, "Flash on the Slopes: Designer-Director Bogner Heats Up the Ski Scene," in Newsweek, 23 December 1985.

"Big Bucks Bogner," in Forbes, 13 January 1986.

Brooks, Hollis, "Designing Skiers," in Skiing, October 1994.

Feitelberg, Rosemary, "Jump-Starting Bogner Shop," in Women's Wear Daily, 26 October 1995.

"Cosmopolitan Continues Product Offensive (License Agreement with Willy Bogner)," in Soap Perfumery & Cosmetics, May 1999.

Drier, Melissa, "Bogner Licensing Plan: $80 Million in Three Years," in Women's Wear Daily, 22 November 2000.

* * *

The Bogner ski and sportswear company has been run by the Bogner family since its founding by Willy Bogner Sr. in 1936. Bogner Sr. was called the "Dior of ski fashion" while his wife Maria was considered the "Coco Chanel of sports fashion." Both Bogner Sr. and Bogner Jr.'s status as producers of the most stylish skiwear available is practically unrivaled, and the company bearing their name is just as well known for the unparalleled fit and quality workmanship of its activewear. The successful combination of design, cut, and technically-advanced fabrics has earned the Bogner company loyal customers throughout Europe, Asia, and North America.

The Bogner name has stood for innovation in the skiwear field since the introduction of Maria's stretch trousers design in 1948. The trousers were immediately popular owing to their feminine look, as compared to previous women's skiwear which was decidedly masculine and unflattering. Devotees of the new "Bogners," as they were known at the time, included internationally recognized women such as Marilyn Monroe and Ingrid Bergman. The Bogner company also pioneered the development of the one-piece ski suit and the use of stretch fabrics. Their first one-piece racing suits were worn by the 1960 West German Olympic ski team; the team was subsequently outfitted and sponsored by the Bogner company for decades.

Willy Bogner Jr. joined the company in the early 1970s and continued the tradition of design innovation. The U.S. subsidiary, Bogner of America, was formed in 1976 and over the next three decades the variety of Bogner products grew to include cross-country skiwear, tennis and golf ensembles, swimwear, general sportswear, the Fire & Ice snowboarding line for younger enthusiasts, and an ever-growing range of accessories. In the middle and late 1990s, Bogner went on a licensing spree to spearhead expansion. While the Bogner name had already appeared on sports-related accessories available in its stores, licensing agreements brought Bogner products from shoes, boots, and socks, to bath and body products, jeans, gloves, and jewelry to worldwide markets.

Although the company had expanded into varied lines of sports- and actionwear, its skiwear remained the foremost vehicle for creative expression by its design team, headed by Willy Bogner Jr. His high energy personality encompassed multiple interests, from his own skiing career as a member of the West German Olympic ski team in 1960 and 1964, to films (the ski chase scenes from four James Bond films were filmed under his direction). Bogner's energy and skills have been evident in the creative motifs decorating his skiwear. Some collections have included Egyptian designs with detachable feathers; exotic embossed designs and turban-like headgear; suits with music-playing apparatus; and younger-themed combinations of contrasting designs for the Fire & Ice line debuted in the early 1990s.

In the middle and later 1990s, Bogner incorporated snowboarding garb (considered by some as merely "street fashion" on the slopes) into the vocabulary of mainstream ski fashion. Bogner Jr.'s wife Sonia joined the design team to help inspire and create a more classic and feminine part of the collection bearing her name. Her styles were for the more subdued and sophisticated female customer, with such design details as cashmere linings and fur trims.

Despite the often outrageous decorative themes, the purpose of Bogner activewear has never been forgotten. A fabric may be printed to look like a silk brocade or embroidered with an intricate design, but it is still wind- and water-resistant. It is this attention to the practical needs of the wearer, coupled with a desire for style, that has kept Bogner an enduring leader in the world of activewear. Bogner élan is to the slopes what haute couture is to fashion.

—Melinda L. Watt; updated by Nelly Rhodes

Marc Bohan, designed for the house of Christian Dior's spring 1964 collection: gold-embroidered tulle gown. © Bettmann/CORBIS.

BOHAN, Marc

French designer

Born: Marc Roger Maurice Louis Bohan in Paris, 22 August 1926. Education: Studied at the Lycée Lakanal, Sceaux, 1940–44. Family: Married Dominique Gaborit in 1950 (died, 1962); married Huguette Rinjonneau (died); daughter: Marie-Anne. Career: Assistant designer in Paris to Robert Piguet, 1945–49, and to Molyneux, 1949–51; designer, Madeleine de Rauch, Paris, 1952; briefly opened own Paris salon, produced one collection, 1953; head designer for couture, Maison Patou, Paris, 1954–58; designer, Dior, London, 1958–60; head designer and art director, Dior, Paris, 1960–89; fashion director, Norman Hartnell, London, 1990–92. Awards: Sports Illustrated Designer of the Year award, 1963; Schiffli Lace and Embroidery Institute award, 1963; named Chevalier de la Legion d'Honneur, 1979; Ordre de Saint Charles, Monaco.

PUBLICATIONS

On BOHAN:

Books

Stegemeyer, Anne, Who's Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.

Articles

- Devlin, Polly, "The Perfectionists," in Vogue (London), September 1974.
- Kellett, Caroline, "A Celebrated Stylist: Marc Bohan Commemorates 25 Years at Christian Dior," in Vogue (London), June 1983.
- Verdier, Rosy, "Marc Bohan: j'aime vivre dans l'ambre," in L'Officiel (Paris), August 1986.
- "A Dior Original," in the Observer Magazine (London), 29 March 1987.
- McColl, Pat, "Bohan: The Power Behind Dior," in Harper's Bazaar (New York), September 1987.
- Michals, Debra, "Bohan Speaks Out: 27 Years of Fashion," in Women's Wear Daily, 12 November 1987.
- "Bye-bye Bohan," in Time (New York), 22 May 1989.
- Mulvagh, Jane, "Hartnell's New Marc," in Illustrated London News, No. 1098, 1990.
- Wheeler, Karen, "Marc Bohan: New Heart to Hartnell," in DR: The Fashion Business (London), 7 July 1990.
- Friedman, Arthur, "Hartnell's Silverman: Building on Bohan," in Women's Wear Daily, 18 September 1990.
- Reed, Paula, "New Look for the Royals," in the Sunday Times Magazine (London), 27 January 1991.

Although the company had expanded into varied lines of sports- and actionwear, its skiwear remained the foremost vehicle for creative expression by its design team, headed by Willy Bogner Jr. His high energy personality encompassed multiple interests, from his own skiing career as a member of the West German Olympic ski team in 1960 and 1964, to films (the ski chase scenes from four James Bond films were filmed under his direction). Bogner's energy and skills have been evident in the creative motifs decorating his skiwear. Some collections have included Egyptian designs with detachable feathers; exotic embossed designs and turban-like headgear; suits with music-playing apparatus; and younger-themed combinations of contrasting designs for the Fire & Ice line debuted in the early 1990s.

In the middle and later 1990s, Bogner incorporated snowboarding garb (considered by some as merely "street fashion" on the slopes) into the vocabulary of mainstream ski fashion. Bogner Jr.'s wife Sonia joined the design team to help inspire and create a more classic and feminine part of the collection bearing her name. Her styles were for the more subdued and sophisticated female customer, with such design details as cashmere linings and fur trims.

Despite the often outrageous decorative themes, the purpose of Bogner activewear has never been forgotten. A fabric may be printed to look like a silk brocade or embroidered with an intricate design, but it is still wind- and water-resistant. It is this attention to the practical needs of the wearer, coupled with a desire for style, that has kept Bogner an enduring leader in the world of activewear. Bogner élan is to the slopes what haute couture is to fashion.

—Melinda L. Watt; updated by Nelly Rhodes

Marc Bohan, designed for the house of Christian Dior's spring 1964 collection: gold-embroidered tulle gown. © Bettmann/CORBIS.

BOHAN, Marc

French designer

Born: Marc Roger Maurice Louis Bohan in Paris, 22 August 1926. Education: Studied at the Lycée Lakanal, Sceaux, 1940–44. Family: Married Dominique Gaborit in 1950 (died, 1962); married Huguette Rinjonneau (died); daughter: Marie-Anne. Career: Assistant designer in Paris to Robert Piguet, 1945–49, and to Molyneux, 1949–51; designer, Madeleine de Rauch, Paris, 1952; briefly opened own Paris salon, produced one collection, 1953; head designer for couture, Maison Patou, Paris, 1954–58; designer, Dior, London, 1958–60; head designer and art director, Dior, Paris, 1960–89; fashion director, Norman Hartnell, London, 1990–92. Awards: Sports Illustrated Designer of the Year award, 1963; Schiffli Lace and Embroidery Institute award, 1963; named Chevalier de la Legion d'Honneur, 1979; Ordre de Saint Charles, Monaco.

PUBLICATIONS

On BOHAN:

Books

Stegemeyer, Anne, Who's Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.

Articles

- Devlin, Polly, "The Perfectionists," in Vogue (London), September 1974.
- Kellett, Caroline, "A Celebrated Stylist: Marc Bohan Commemorates 25 Years at Christian Dior," in Vogue (London), June 1983.
- Verdier, Rosy, "Marc Bohan: j'aime vivre dans l'ambre," in L'Officiel (Paris), August 1986.
- "A Dior Original," in the Observer Magazine (London), 29 March 1987.
- McColl, Pat, "Bohan: The Power Behind Dior," in Harper's Bazaar (New York), September 1987.
- Michals, Debra, "Bohan Speaks Out: 27 Years of Fashion," in Women's Wear Daily, 12 November 1987.
- "Bye-bye Bohan," in Time (New York), 22 May 1989.
- Mulvagh, Jane, "Hartnell's New Marc," in Illustrated London News, No. 1098, 1990.
- Wheeler, Karen, "Marc Bohan: New Heart to Hartnell," in DR: The Fashion Business (London), 7 July 1990.
- Friedman, Arthur, "Hartnell's Silverman: Building on Bohan," in Women's Wear Daily, 18 September 1990.
- Reed, Paula, "New Look for the Royals," in the Sunday Times Magazine (London), 27 January 1991.

- Miller, Jeffrey, "House of Hartnell," in Interview (New York), January 1991.
- Armstrong, Lisa, "Making His Marc," in Vogue (London), February 1991.
- Grice, Elizabeth, "Designing for the Young at Hartnell," in the Sunday Express Magazine (London), 17 February 1991.
- Smith, Liz, "Hartnell Goes High Street," in The Times (London), 21 January 1992.
- Fallon, James, "Bohan Talks with Hartnell on Early End to His Career," in Women's Wear Daily, 16 September 1992.
- Aillard, Charlotte, "Consolidating Households in Burgundy," in Architectural Digest, October 1994.

* * *

"N'oubliez pas la femme," Marc Bohan's much quoted comment in Vogue magazine in 1963, is the tenet which underscored all his work. It brought him success throughout his lengthy couture career, his design always based on the adult female form and a recognition of his customers' needs rather than an overriding desire to shock and provoke headlines in his name. From his early days at Molyneux he learned a sense of practicality, as well as an appreciation of the flattering potential of luxurious fabrics and good fit. His perfectionist zeal and attention to detail, and especially in the 1960s and 1970s at Christian Dior, a good fashion sense, were always at the foundations of his reputation.

It was at Dior that Bohan's talents were established, winning him international acclaim. He enabled the house to remain at the forefront of fashion while still producing wearable, elegant clothes. To achieve this end, Bohan combined innovation with repeated classic shapes and styles, reworked to express the current mood. In 1961 Dior included some of the briefest skirts of the couture collections, but the neat black-and-white tweed fabric of these little suits enabled Bohan to please the established clientele, as well as attracting new customers with wit and modernity. His suiting always showed the most directional styles and cut, which others soon followed.

This ability to ease normally cautious clients towards new, more radical styles by carefully balancing all the elements of a design was seen again in his 1966 collection, when he showed the by then de rigueur mini with longer coats, promoting a shift in hemlines gradually rather than dictating a change. It was this desire to coax and flatter which distinguished his couture work. His sensitivity to the needs of women prevented him from trying to mold them into ever-altering silhouettes, or forget their desire to look grown up and elegant even when fashion promoted girlish styles in the 1960s. His use of decoration was equally discreet; he preferred the demure wit of pussycat bows on simple silk blouses and shirtwaist dresses or naturalistic floral prints to add interest to his creations, rather than any overblown gestures that might render the garments less easy to wear, making the client self-conscious.

Bohan was unafraid to tell his customers what was most flattering for them and they appreciated his honesty; his rich and famous client list remained faithful even when he switched from one house to the next. His eveningwear, with his clever suiting styles, was his greatest strength—with an understated sense of style allowing the luxurious fabrics and subtle detailing to shine through the simple forms he preferred.

In his work for Dior and his later creations for Norman Hartnell, Bohan's love of simplicity was continually evident. At the former he presented stark modernist shapes, like the angular ivory silk evening tunic and matching cigarette trousers (1965), with rich red floral design creeping over its surface. At Hartnell he again excelled at reviving the spirits of an established couture name. He developed his pared-down style to fulfill the house's design brief, attracting a younger audience with his first collection, combining flirtatious shaping with classic styles. In 1991 he showed the sophisticated chic of black sheath dresses with diamanté buttons next to witty fuchsia silk scoop-necked dresses with short, very full skirts—harking back to the bubble dresses that had reinvigorated his work for Dior in the late 1970s. Again he provided choice for his customers and commercial designs which were well received by the press.

Marc Bohan, designed for the house of Christian Dior's 1965 collection: gazar cocktail dress with an embroidered underskirt.
© Bettmann/CORBIS.

Bohan's time at Hartnell was brief, curtailed by the recession of the early 1990s, which caused a decline of interest in couture and precipitated the demise of several smaller houses. His sense of elegance, however, remained undiminished. In an October 1994 interview and pictorial featuring his newly-renovated, 18th-century country home in Burgundy, France, for Architectural Digest, Bohan declared, "For me, elegance is a yardstick, [it is] the art of knowing how much free rein one can allow one's imagination without overstepping the boundaries of classicism." If his suits were the most innovative area of his work, he balanced their fashionable cut with well-constructed feminine separates and striking eveningwear, which had the lasting appeal characteristic of all elegant design.

—Rebecca Arnold; updated by Jodi Essey-Stapleton

BRIGANCE, Tom

American designer

Born: Thomas Franklin Brigance in Waco, Texas, 4 February 1913. Education: Attended Waco Junior College; studied in New York at the Parsons School of Design, 1931–34, and the National Academy of Art; studied in Paris at the Sorbonne and at the Academie de la Grande Chaumière, Paris. Military Service: Served in the U.S. Air Corps Intelligence Service, South Pacific, 1941–44, decorated for bravery. Career: Worked in Europe as a freelance fashion designer, designed in London for Jaeger and for Simpson's of Piccadilly, late 1930s; designer, Lord & Taylor, New York, 1939–41 and 1944–49; opened own firm, 1949; also designed in New York for Frank Gallant, and freelanced for Fonde, Sportsmarket, and designed swimwear for Sinclair and Gabar, Water Clothes, 1950s; retired, late 1970s. Awards: Coty American Fashion Critics award, 1953; International Silk citation, 1954; National Cotton award, 1955; Internazionale delle Arti award, Italy, 1956. Died: 14 October 1990, in New York City.

PUBLICATIONS

On BRIGANCE:

Books

New York and Hollywood Fashion: Costume Designs from the Brooklyn Museum Collection, New York, 1986.

Milbank, Caroline Rennolds, New York Fashion: The Evolution of American Style, New York, 1989.

Stegemeyer, Anne, Who's Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.

Articles

Sheppard, Eugenia, "What's Coming Next?" in the Herald Tribune, 28 October 1947.

"Designer Brigance Speaks to a Mill," in American Fabrics and Fashions (New York), No. 25, 1953.

Schiro, Anne-Marie, "Thomas F. Brigance Dies at 70: Designed Sophisticated Swimwear," in the New York Times, 18 October 1990.

* * *

Eleanor Lambert's 1951 press release for Tom Brigance quotes the young designer: "Good American clothes should be able to go anywhere. They should not be designed with a single town or section in mind. They should be appropriate for the American woman's mode of living, expressive of her individual personality, and suitable for the climate she lives in." Brigance spoke and designed with the plain common sense of Will Rogers and the utmost simplicity of the American ethos. No one could more readily have epitomized the Main Street ideal of an American fashion designer than Brigance. From Waco, Texas, slim, dark, and charming, Brigance became a recognized designer in 1939, while still in his twenties, as part of Dorothy Shaver's campaign to create American designer identities at Lord & Taylor.

His first success was in active sportswear and beachwear. In an advertisement in Vogue (15 May 1939), Lord & Taylor boasted of its new American hero, "When you come to the World's Fair be sure to visit our Beach Shop on the fifth floor, home of creations by Brigance, one of our own designers, whose ideas enchant even the blasé Riviera." Anne-Marie Schiro reported in Brigance's obituary in the New York Times (18 October 1990) that the Duchess of Windsor bought half a dozen outfits from his first beachwear collection in 1939, a formidable endorsement for any young designer. Brigance remained a designer at Lord & Taylor until 1949. Although he later designed a full spectrum of clothing, including eveningwear, his forte through his retirement in the late 1970s was sportswear, especially playsuits, beach- and swimwear. At Brigance's death in 1990 Schiro reported: "He retired in the late 1970s after a two-year stint with Gabar whose owner, Gabriel Colasante, said this week that a Brigance-designed skirted swimsuit is still one of his company's bestselling styles. Colasante decreed that regardless of the print, the Brigance-designed suits still sell consistently."

Brigance was at his best when at his most simple. His employer Lord & Taylor boasted of Brigance in a 1947 advertising in the Herald Tribune: "His suits and coats have the distinctively American lines that inspire individuality with accessories." Like Claire McCardell, Brigance used fabric ties and sashes to shape waists and create form; his coats and suits were uniformly unadorned, but inflected with relatively large buttons in interesting placement.

By the late 1940s, he was acknowledging the New Look, not in its extreme forms, but in a modified version in which the skirt or peplum flared with pockets, adding practicality to the gesture of the wider skirt. His play clothes were his most imaginative, suggesting the spectrum of leisure from beach pajamas through halter tops and playsuits with shorts and skirts. For summer, his preference was generally for colorful cottons, often with dots. His swimwear pre-saged the American idiom of dressing in warm climates in clothes as suitable for the street as for the beach and swimming.

Distinctively, Brigance enjoyed pattern mixes more than most of his contemporaries. Today his surprising combinations of florals, geometrics, and exotics are strikingly bold and seem more advanced as textile fusions than others of his generation. While his ideological interest was reductive, his style was always to supply plenty of material and ample coverage. He kept a loyal, even aging, clientèle because he flattered the body with informal exposure that was never scanty, even in swimwear and playsuits. One could be unfailingly modest and self-assured in Brigance. His design sensibility for minimalism was also aided by his interest in fabric technology—his nylon swimsuit of 1960 exploited the fast-drying material. In 1955 he was the only man among seven American designers, including Anne Fogarty, Pauline Trigère, and Claire McCardell, to style interiors for Chrysler Corporation cars.

Eugenia Sheppard, writing in the Herald Tribune in October 1947, claimed that Brigance had Aristotle's phrase "nothing is permanent but change" set over the mirror in his design workroom at Lord & Taylor. Change for Brigance was ever modest; sportswear was also a credo, believing in the practical aspects of clothing. Less adventurous than McCardell or Cashin, Brigance (along with John Weitz) anticipated the emergence of great male designers in the 1970s and 1980s era of American sportswear. Like them, he was his own best salesperson and a kind of native hero, the man who not only dressed the well-constructed feminine separates and striking eveningwear, which had the lasting appeal characteristic of all elegant design.

—Rebecca Arnold; updated by Jodi Essey-Stapleton

BRIGANCE, Tom

American designer

Born: Thomas Franklin Brigance in Waco, Texas, 4 February 1913. Education: Attended Waco Junior College; studied in New York at the Parsons School of Design, 1931–34, and the National Academy of Art; studied in Paris at the Sorbonne and at the Academie de la Grande Chaumière, Paris. Military Service: Served in the U.S. Air Corps Intelligence Service, South Pacific, 1941–44, decorated for bravery. Career: Worked in Europe as a freelance fashion designer, designed in London for Jaeger and for Simpson's of Piccadilly, late 1930s; designer, Lord & Taylor, New York, 1939–41 and 1944–49; opened own firm, 1949; also designed in New York for Frank Gallant, and freelanced for Fonde, Sportsmarket, and designed swimwear for Sinclair and Gabar, Water Clothes, 1950s; retired, late 1970s. Awards: Coty American Fashion Critics award, 1953; International Silk citation, 1954; National Cotton award, 1955; Internazionale delle Arti award, Italy, 1956. Died: 14 October 1990, in New York City.

PUBLICATIONS

On BRIGANCE:

Books

New York and Hollywood Fashion: Costume Designs from the Brooklyn Museum Collection, New York, 1986.

Milbank, Caroline Rennolds, New York Fashion: The Evolution of American Style, New York, 1989.

Stegemeyer, Anne, Who's Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.

Articles

Sheppard, Eugenia, "What's Coming Next?" in the Herald Tribune, 28 October 1947.

"Designer Brigance Speaks to a Mill," in American Fabrics and Fashions (New York), No. 25, 1953.

Schiro, Anne-Marie, "Thomas F. Brigance Dies at 70: Designed Sophisticated Swimwear," in the New York Times, 18 October 1990.

* * *

Eleanor Lambert's 1951 press release for Tom Brigance quotes the young designer: "Good American clothes should be able to go anywhere. They should not be designed with a single town or section in mind. They should be appropriate for the American woman's mode of living, expressive of her individual personality, and suitable for the climate she lives in." Brigance spoke and designed with the plain common sense of Will Rogers and the utmost simplicity of the American ethos. No one could more readily have epitomized the Main Street ideal of an American fashion designer than Brigance. From Waco, Texas, slim, dark, and charming, Brigance became a recognized designer in 1939, while still in his twenties, as part of Dorothy Shaver's campaign to create American designer identities at Lord & Taylor.

His first success was in active sportswear and beachwear. In an advertisement in Vogue (15 May 1939), Lord & Taylor boasted of its new American hero, "When you come to the World's Fair be sure to visit our Beach Shop on the fifth floor, home of creations by Brigance, one of our own designers, whose ideas enchant even the blasé Riviera." Anne-Marie Schiro reported in Brigance's obituary in the New York Times (18 October 1990) that the Duchess of Windsor bought half a dozen outfits from his first beachwear collection in 1939, a formidable endorsement for any young designer. Brigance remained a designer at Lord & Taylor until 1949. Although he later designed a full spectrum of clothing, including eveningwear, his forte through his retirement in the late 1970s was sportswear, especially playsuits, beach- and swimwear. At Brigance's death in 1990 Schiro reported: "He retired in the late 1970s after a two-year stint with Gabar whose owner, Gabriel Colasante, said this week that a Brigance-designed skirted swimsuit is still one of his company's bestselling styles. Colasante decreed that regardless of the print, the Brigance-designed suits still sell consistently."

Brigance was at his best when at his most simple. His employer Lord & Taylor boasted of Brigance in a 1947 advertising in the Herald Tribune: "His suits and coats have the distinctively American lines that inspire individuality with accessories." Like Claire McCardell, Brigance used fabric ties and sashes to shape waists and create form; his coats and suits were uniformly unadorned, but inflected with relatively large buttons in interesting placement.

By the late 1940s, he was acknowledging the New Look, not in its extreme forms, but in a modified version in which the skirt or peplum flared with pockets, adding practicality to the gesture of the wider skirt. His play clothes were his most imaginative, suggesting the spectrum of leisure from beach pajamas through halter tops and playsuits with shorts and skirts. For summer, his preference was generally for colorful cottons, often with dots. His swimwear pre-saged the American idiom of dressing in warm climates in clothes as suitable for the street as for the beach and swimming.

Distinctively, Brigance enjoyed pattern mixes more than most of his contemporaries. Today his surprising combinations of florals, geometrics, and exotics are strikingly bold and seem more advanced as textile fusions than others of his generation. While his ideological interest was reductive, his style was always to supply plenty of material and ample coverage. He kept a loyal, even aging, clientèle because he flattered the body with informal exposure that was never scanty, even in swimwear and playsuits. One could be unfailingly modest and self-assured in Brigance. His design sensibility for minimalism was also aided by his interest in fabric technology—his nylon swimsuit of 1960 exploited the fast-drying material. In 1955 he was the only man among seven American designers, including Anne Fogarty, Pauline Trigère, and Claire McCardell, to style interiors for Chrysler Corporation cars.

Eugenia Sheppard, writing in the Herald Tribune in October 1947, claimed that Brigance had Aristotle's phrase "nothing is permanent but change" set over the mirror in his design workroom at Lord & Taylor. Change for Brigance was ever modest; sportswear was also a credo, believing in the practical aspects of clothing. Less adventurous than McCardell or Cashin, Brigance (along with John Weitz) anticipated the emergence of great male designers in the 1970s and 1980s era of American sportswear. Like them, he was his own best salesperson and a kind of native hero, the man who not only dressed the American ideal woman of suburban chic, but also the man for whom she dressed. His 1949 dinner separates in pleated jersey exemplify Brigance's contribution to design: a quintessentially American look—informal, sporty, innovative, open, and yet demure.

—Richard Martin

BRIONI

Italian fashion house

Founded: by tailor Nazareno Fonticoli and entrepreneur Gaetano Savini in via Barberini, Rome, in 1945. Company History: First men's tailored clothing show, Palazzo Pitti, Florence, 1952; launched accessory line, 1952; first men's runway show in New York, 1954; first show in Britain, 1959; manufacturing company, Brioni Roman Style, launched in Penne, Italy, with 45 workers, 1960; neckwear collection launched, 1979; Penne factory established tailoring school, 1980; first American freestanding Brioni store opened, Park Avenue, New York, 1982; company acquired Burini of Bergamo, 1991, and controlling interest in Sforza of Bologna, leather creator, 1994; ready-to-wear line, Brioni Roman Style, produced in Penne, Italy; first sportswear-only freestanding store opened, Aspen (CO), 2000. Awards: Esquire (New York) award for valued contribution to menswear, 1959; International Fashion Council award, 1962. Company Address: via Barberini 79–81, Rome, Italy. Company Website: www.brioni.com.

PUBLICATIONS

On BRIONI:

Books

Schoeffler, O. E., and William Gale, Esquire's Encyclopedia of 20th Century Men's Fashion, New York, 1973.
Chenoune, Farid, Brioni, New York, 1998.

Articles

Gellers, Stan, "Brioni Goes Beyond Its Sartorial Suits," in Daily News Record (DNR), 21 May 1997.
_____, "Brioni to Open First Free-Standing Sportswear Store," in DNR, 10 April 2000.
Courtney Colavita, "Brioni's Luxuriant Express on Global Track," DNR, 1 January 2001.

* * *

Brioni was the definitive Roman tailoring establishment of the "Continental look" of the 1950s. The silhouette was immediately identifiable, with its pitched shoulders, tapered waist, and narrow hips and trousers, suggesting the architectural purity and astringency of the postwar Italian aesthetic. Brioni's sensitive tailoring was also one of the first postwar softenings of men's tailored clothing, bringing immediate pliability in slim silhouette and delicate drapery. The fabrics advocated by Fonticoli and Savini were borrowed from womenswear for a beautiful hand and lush suppleness which also brought color to the sober traditions of men's tailoring.

American film stars such as Clark Gable, Henry Fonda, John Wayne, Kirk Douglas, and others had suits custom-made by Brioni—these avatars of masculinity were important in introducing American men in particular to the comfort of Brioni's image and business: the American tendency to men of big frame and naïve awkwardness was superbly civilized by the sophistication of Brioni tailoring. Moreover, American masculinity's embrace of the lean Italian style created an alliance powerful enough to serve as an alternative to Savile Row, softening the structure of the suit and allowing the heretical interventions of style and fashion to come into men's tailored clothing. Brioni is said to be the first men's tailor to employ raw silks and rich brocades in men's tailoring and these innovations in men's tailoring may seem less than radical today, but in the 1950s Brioni was a thorough innovator in the stolid world of tailoring.

The slim modesty of the Brioni "continental" silhouette encouraged the experimental play of textiles, and the suit's clean modernism allowed for color as eye-opening as color-field paintings. Even today, Brioni tailoring is among the most tactile and luxurious in the world. One line of suits, known as Vaticano, employs the dense but silky fabrics traditionally used for priests' robes. Brioni and Sorelle Fontana often showed together in fashion shows, so pronounced was the affinity between the most extravagant style of Roman fashion for women and Brioni's ideal tailoring for men. Brioni suits have had the discernible difference of labor and quality, from handmade buttonholes to the composition of a suit as a perfect harmonics of proportion. Production of a Brioni suit required 10 hours of handsewing, 18 hours of fine craftsmanship, 42 pressing stages, and 186 manufacturing phases.

After a difficult period in the early 1990s when the company did not have a clear brand or retail strategy and essentially marketed one product, Brioni is back on track, with revenues increasing fivefold over the 1990s. It has opened stores throughout the world and expects a total of 35 in upscale locations by 2005, all featuring VIP rooms for the customized suits that remain at the company's core. Brioni's Aspen store, opened in 2000, is its first sportswear-only unit; the Milan flagship offers only the most exclusive collections, at a price 15-percent above the company's other outlets.

Brioni expanded outside tailored suits, introducing not only high-end sportswear for men under the Brioni Sport label, but women's clothing as well. The women's line, initially designed by Fabio Piras and introduced in 2000, featured the same classic styling and attention to fabric and detail as the men's line, but with a softer, more feminine silhouette.

Accessories and sportswear, formerly a minimal part of Brioni's business, accounted for 40 percent of turnover in the new century. The company's sportswear line includes tailored sportscoats, cashmere and wool sweaters, and unconstructed silk and leather jackets. As in the 1950s, the company enhanced its visibility by associating movie stars with its clothing, including Pierce Brosnan in the James Bond films and Richard Gere in Dr. T and the Women in 2000.

Although Brioni has diversified into other product categories, it continues to maintain its focus on customers it calls "luxuriants," defined as those apparel-buyers who are able to interpret and appreciate luxury. The company employed this strategy to become a $100-million international brand, with the U.S. representing its most important market, accounting for 35 percent of export sales. (American tourists are estimated to account for 45 percent of sales in Europe as well.)

American ideal woman of suburban chic, but also the man for whom she dressed. His 1949 dinner separates in pleated jersey exemplify Brigance's contribution to design: a quintessentially American look—informal, sporty, innovative, open, and yet demure.

—Richard Martin

BRIONI

Italian fashion house

Founded: by tailor Nazareno Fonticoli and entrepreneur Gaetano Savini in via Barberini, Rome, in 1945. Company History: First men's tailored clothing show, Palazzo Pitti, Florence, 1952; launched accessory line, 1952; first men's runway show in New York, 1954; first show in Britain, 1959; manufacturing company, Brioni Roman Style, launched in Penne, Italy, with 45 workers, 1960; neckwear collection launched, 1979; Penne factory established tailoring school, 1980; first American freestanding Brioni store opened, Park Avenue, New York, 1982; company acquired Burini of Bergamo, 1991, and controlling interest in Sforza of Bologna, leather creator, 1994; ready-to-wear line, Brioni Roman Style, produced in Penne, Italy; first sportswear-only freestanding store opened, Aspen (CO), 2000. Awards: Esquire (New York) award for valued contribution to menswear, 1959; International Fashion Council award, 1962. Company Address: via Barberini 79–81, Rome, Italy. Company Website: www.brioni.com.

PUBLICATIONS

On BRIONI:

Books

Schoeffler, O. E., and William Gale, Esquire's Encyclopedia of 20th Century Men's Fashion, New York, 1973.
Chenoune, Farid, Brioni, New York, 1998.

Articles

Gellers, Stan, "Brioni Goes Beyond Its Sartorial Suits," in Daily News Record (DNR), 21 May 1997.
_____, "Brioni to Open First Free-Standing Sportswear Store," in DNR, 10 April 2000.
Courtney Colavita, "Brioni's Luxuriant Express on Global Track," DNR, 1 January 2001.

* * *

Brioni was the definitive Roman tailoring establishment of the "Continental look" of the 1950s. The silhouette was immediately identifiable, with its pitched shoulders, tapered waist, and narrow hips and trousers, suggesting the architectural purity and astringency of the postwar Italian aesthetic. Brioni's sensitive tailoring was also one of the first postwar softenings of men's tailored clothing, bringing immediate pliability in slim silhouette and delicate drapery. The fabrics advocated by Fonticoli and Savini were borrowed from womenswear for a beautiful hand and lush suppleness which also brought color to the sober traditions of men's tailoring.

American film stars such as Clark Gable, Henry Fonda, John Wayne, Kirk Douglas, and others had suits custom-made by Brioni—these avatars of masculinity were important in introducing American men in particular to the comfort of Brioni's image and business: the American tendency to men of big frame and naïve awkwardness was superbly civilized by the sophistication of Brioni tailoring. Moreover, American masculinity's embrace of the lean Italian style created an alliance powerful enough to serve as an alternative to Savile Row, softening the structure of the suit and allowing the heretical interventions of style and fashion to come into men's tailored clothing. Brioni is said to be the first men's tailor to employ raw silks and rich brocades in men's tailoring and these innovations in men's tailoring may seem less than radical today, but in the 1950s Brioni was a thorough innovator in the stolid world of tailoring.

The slim modesty of the Brioni "continental" silhouette encouraged the experimental play of textiles, and the suit's clean modernism allowed for color as eye-opening as color-field paintings. Even today, Brioni tailoring is among the most tactile and luxurious in the world. One line of suits, known as Vaticano, employs the dense but silky fabrics traditionally used for priests' robes. Brioni and Sorelle Fontana often showed together in fashion shows, so pronounced was the affinity between the most extravagant style of Roman fashion for women and Brioni's ideal tailoring for men. Brioni suits have had the discernible difference of labor and quality, from handmade buttonholes to the composition of a suit as a perfect harmonics of proportion. Production of a Brioni suit required 10 hours of handsewing, 18 hours of fine craftsmanship, 42 pressing stages, and 186 manufacturing phases.

After a difficult period in the early 1990s when the company did not have a clear brand or retail strategy and essentially marketed one product, Brioni is back on track, with revenues increasing fivefold over the 1990s. It has opened stores throughout the world and expects a total of 35 in upscale locations by 2005, all featuring VIP rooms for the customized suits that remain at the company's core. Brioni's Aspen store, opened in 2000, is its first sportswear-only unit; the Milan flagship offers only the most exclusive collections, at a price 15-percent above the company's other outlets.

Brioni expanded outside tailored suits, introducing not only high-end sportswear for men under the Brioni Sport label, but women's clothing as well. The women's line, initially designed by Fabio Piras and introduced in 2000, featured the same classic styling and attention to fabric and detail as the men's line, but with a softer, more feminine silhouette.

Accessories and sportswear, formerly a minimal part of Brioni's business, accounted for 40 percent of turnover in the new century. The company's sportswear line includes tailored sportscoats, cashmere and wool sweaters, and unconstructed silk and leather jackets. As in the 1950s, the company enhanced its visibility by associating movie stars with its clothing, including Pierce Brosnan in the James Bond films and Richard Gere in Dr. T and the Women in 2000.

Although Brioni has diversified into other product categories, it continues to maintain its focus on customers it calls "luxuriants," defined as those apparel-buyers who are able to interpret and appreciate luxury. The company employed this strategy to become a $100-million international brand, with the U.S. representing its most important market, accounting for 35 percent of export sales. (American tourists are estimated to account for 45 percent of sales in Europe as well.)

As part of Brioni's commitment to quality and detail, the company continues to eschew licensing and manufacture all of its products in-house, except shoes, which are made in Italy by small workshops. And, despite all of its recent diversification, tailored suits remain Brioni's focus. As one executive emphasized in the Daily News Record, "A man wears a suit."

—Richard Martin; updated by Karen Raugust

BROOKS, Donald

American designer

Born: New York City, 10 January 1928. Education: Studied art, Syracuse University, New York, 1947–49, fashion design and illustration, Parsons School of Design, New York, 1949–50. Career: Designed for a series of New York ready-to-wear firms, circa 1950–56; designer for Darbury, 1956; partner/designer, Hedges of New York, 1957–59; designer, own label for Townley Frocks, 1958–64; designer, custom apparel, Henri Bendel department store, 1961; owner/designer, Donald Brooks, Inc., 1964–73; designed sweaters for Jane Irwill, 1965; shoes for Newton Elkin, 1966; furs for Coopchik-Forrest, Inc., 1967; furs for Bonwit Teller department store, 1969; robes and sleepwear for Maidenform, shoes for Palizzio; launched Boutique Donald Brooks line, 1969; designed drapery fabrics and bedlinens for Burlington, 1971; DB II line introduced, about 1980; Donald Brooks ready-to-wear, 1986; consultant for fabric and color design, Ann Taylor stores, from 1990; joined Tony awards nominating committee; also designed for theater, film, television, as well as custom clothing, from 1961. Awards: Coty American Fashion Critics award, 1958, 1962, 1967, 1974; National Cotton award, 1962; New York Drama Critics award, 1963; Parsons Medal for Distinguished Achievement, 1974; Emmy award, 1982. Address: c/o Parson's School of Design, 66 Fifth Avenue, New York NY 10011, U.S.A.

PUBLICATIONS

On BROOKS:

Books

- Maeder, Edward, et al., Hollywood and History: Costume Design in Film, New York, 1987.
- Owen, Bobbie, Costume Designers on Broadway: Designers and Their Credits 1915–1985, Westport, Connecticut, 1987.
- Milbank, Caroline Rennolds, New York Fashion: The Evolution of American Style, New York, 1989.
- Leese, Elizabeth, Costume Design in the Movies, New York, 1991.
- Stegemeyer, Anne, Who's Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.

Articles

- "Designers Who are Making News," in American Fashions & Fabrics (New York), No. 37, 1956.
- Morris, Bernadine, "A Return to Fashion Staged with Flair by Donald Brooks," in the New York Times, 14 May 1986.
- "Parsons Students Strut Their Stuff," in Women's Wear Daily, 4 May 1998.

McBride, Murdoch, "Gotham Gothics Nurture Nightmares on and Off Broadway," in Back Stage, 30 October 1998.

Wilson, Eric, "The Sixties—Seizing the Moment, a Band of American Upstarts Lays the Groundwork for a New World Order," in Women's Wear Daily, 13 June 2000.

* * *

Staying power characterized Donald Brooks every bit as much as the simply cut, easy fitting dresses in distinctive fabrics for which he is best known. A summer job in the advertising and display department at Lord & Taylor led him into ready-to-wear, first as a sketch artist and subsequently as designer for a series of undistinguished manufacturers. After a stint as designer at Darbury and Hedges of New York, where his work was admired by the fashion press, Brooks moved to Townley Frocks as successor to Claire McCardell. There, Brooks was given his own label as well as the chance to develop his own prize-winning printed fabrics.

By the mid-1960s, Brooks was one of the few American designers to have financial control of his own business. From that base he diversified along the usual lines, designing sweaters, shoes, swimsuits, furnishing fabrics, and other items under a multitude of licensing agreements. At the same time he built a secure base for his custom-made clothes that stood him in good stead throughout the recession years of the 1970s and 1980s. Brooks also developed a parallel career, interpreting the contemporary scene for television, film, and the theater, beginning in 1961. His many stage credits include the musical No Strings, which earned him a New York Drama Critics award in 1963, and a nomination for the Antoinette Perry, or Tony award. For his film design Brooks has received four Oscar nominations. The parallel careers often supported one another, as when Brooks' clothes for the film Star, set in the 1920s and 1930s, provided the direction for his 1968 ready-to-wear collection.

Brooks' clothes were known for their clean lines, often surprising colors, and for their distinctive fabrics, most of which he himself designed. There is a boldness about a Brooks design that makes an impact and makes his contemporary dresses for the stage particularly successful. The Parsons Medal for Distinguished Achievement has been awarded less than half a dozen times in almost as many decades. Brooks received it in 1974, to join a roster that singled out Adrian, Norman Norell, and Claire McCardell as especially noteworthy American designers.

In the 1990s Brooks enjoyed a myriad of activities related to the many facets of fashion design. He had returned to the theatre as one of the annual Tony awards nominating committee; mentored students at the Parsons School of Design, and participated in the annual Parsons Fashion Critics awards; and designed for the Theater for the New City's Annual Village Halloween Costume Ball.

—Whitney Blausen

BROOKS BROTHERS

American clothier

Established: in New York as Brooks Clothing Company by Henry Sands Brooks, 1818; renamed Brooks Brothers, 1854. Company History: First American firm to market such staples as the button-down collar shirt and polo coat; has also sold womenswear from

As part of Brioni's commitment to quality and detail, the company continues to eschew licensing and manufacture all of its products in-house, except shoes, which are made in Italy by small workshops. And, despite all of its recent diversification, tailored suits remain Brioni's focus. As one executive emphasized in the Daily News Record, "A man wears a suit."

—Richard Martin; updated by Karen Raugust

BROOKS, Donald

American designer

Born: New York City, 10 January 1928. Education: Studied art, Syracuse University, New York, 1947–49, fashion design and illustration, Parsons School of Design, New York, 1949–50. Career: Designed for a series of New York ready-to-wear firms, circa 1950–56; designer for Darbury, 1956; partner/designer, Hedges of New York, 1957–59; designer, own label for Townley Frocks, 1958–64; designer, custom apparel, Henri Bendel department store, 1961; owner/designer, Donald Brooks, Inc., 1964–73; designed sweaters for Jane Irwill, 1965; shoes for Newton Elkin, 1966; furs for Coopchik-Forrest, Inc., 1967; furs for Bonwit Teller department store, 1969; robes and sleepwear for Maidenform, shoes for Palizzio; launched Boutique Donald Brooks line, 1969; designed drapery fabrics and bedlinens for Burlington, 1971; DB II line introduced, about 1980; Donald Brooks ready-to-wear, 1986; consultant for fabric and color design, Ann Taylor stores, from 1990; joined Tony awards nominating committee; also designed for theater, film, television, as well as custom clothing, from 1961. Awards: Coty American Fashion Critics award, 1958, 1962, 1967, 1974; National Cotton award, 1962; New York Drama Critics award, 1963; Parsons Medal for Distinguished Achievement, 1974; Emmy award, 1982. Address: c/o Parson's School of Design, 66 Fifth Avenue, New York NY 10011, U.S.A.

PUBLICATIONS

On BROOKS:

Books

- Maeder, Edward, et al., Hollywood and History: Costume Design in Film, New York, 1987.
 Owen, Bobbie, Costume Designers on Broadway: Designers and Their Credits 1915–1985, Westport, Connecticut, 1987.
 Milbank, Caroline Rennolds, New York Fashion: The Evolution of American Style, New York, 1989.
 Leese, Elizabeth, Costume Design in the Movies, New York, 1991.
 Stegemeyer, Anne, Who's Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.

Articles

- "Designers Who are Making News," in American Fashions & Fabrics (New York), No. 37, 1956.
 Morris, Bernadine, "A Return to Fashion Staged with Flair by Donald Brooks," in the New York Times, 14 May 1986.
 "Parsons Students Strut Their Stuff," in Women's Wear Daily, 4 May 1998.

- McBride, Murdoch, "Gotham Gothics Nurture Nightmares on and Off Broadway," in Back Stage, 30 October 1998.
 Wilson, Eric, "The Sixties—Seizing the Moment, a Band of American Upstarts Lays the Groundwork for a New World Order," in Women's Wear Daily, 13 June 2000.

* * *

Staying power characterized Donald Brooks every bit as much as the simply cut, easy fitting dresses in distinctive fabrics for which he is best known. A summer job in the advertising and display department at Lord & Taylor led him into ready-to-wear, first as a sketch artist and subsequently as designer for a series of undistinguished manufacturers. After a stint as designer at Darbury and Hedges of New York, where his work was admired by the fashion press, Brooks moved to Townley Frocks as successor to Claire McCardell. There, Brooks was given his own label as well as the chance to develop his own prize-winning printed fabrics.

By the mid-1960s, Brooks was one of the few American designers to have financial control of his own business. From that base he diversified along the usual lines, designing sweaters, shoes, swimsuits, furnishing fabrics, and other items under a multitude of licensing agreements. At the same time he built a secure base for his custom-made clothes that stood him in good stead throughout the recession years of the 1970s and 1980s. Brooks also developed a parallel career, interpreting the contemporary scene for television, film, and the theater, beginning in 1961. His many stage credits include the musical No Strings, which earned him a New York Drama Critics award in 1963, and a nomination for the Antoinette Perry, or Tony award. For his film design Brooks has received four Oscar nominations. The parallel careers often supported one another, as when Brooks' clothes for the film Star, set in the 1920s and 1930s, provided the direction for his 1968 ready-to-wear collection.

Brooks' clothes were known for their clean lines, often surprising colors, and for their distinctive fabrics, most of which he himself designed. There is a boldness about a Brooks design that makes an impact and makes his contemporary dresses for the stage particularly successful. The Parsons Medal for Distinguished Achievement has been awarded less than half a dozen times in almost as many decades. Brooks received it in 1974, to join a roster that singled out Adrian, Norman Norell, and Claire McCardell as especially noteworthy American designers.

In the 1990s Brooks enjoyed a myriad of activities related to the many facets of fashion design. He had returned to the theatre as one of the annual Tony awards nominating committee; mentored students at the Parsons School of Design, and participated in the annual Parsons Fashion Critics awards; and designed for the Theater for the New City's Annual Village Halloween Costume Ball.

—Whitney Blausen

BROOKS BROTHERS

American clothier

Established: in New York as Brooks Clothing Company by Henry Sands Brooks, 1818; renamed Brooks Brothers, 1854. Company History: First American firm to market such staples as the button-down collar shirt and polo coat; has also sold womenswear from

As part of Brioni's commitment to quality and detail, the company continues to eschew licensing and manufacture all of its products in-house, except shoes, which are made in Italy by small workshops. And, despite all of its recent diversification, tailored suits remain Brioni's focus. As one executive emphasized in the Daily News Record, "A man wears a suit."

—Richard Martin; updated by Karen Raugust

BROOKS, Donald

American designer

Born: New York City, 10 January 1928. Education: Studied art, Syracuse University, New York, 1947–49, fashion design and illustration, Parsons School of Design, New York, 1949–50. Career: Designed for a series of New York ready-to-wear firms, circa 1950–56; designer for Darbury, 1956; partner/designer, Hedges of New York, 1957–59; designer, own label for Townley Frocks, 1958–64; designer, custom apparel, Henri Bendel department store, 1961; owner/designer, Donald Brooks, Inc., 1964–73; designed sweaters for Jane Irwill, 1965; shoes for Newton Elkin, 1966; furs for Coopchik-Forrest, Inc., 1967; furs for Bonwit Teller department store, 1969; robes and sleepwear for Maidenform, shoes for Palizzio; launched Boutique Donald Brooks line, 1969; designed drapery fabrics and bedlinens for Burlington, 1971; DB II line introduced, about 1980; Donald Brooks ready-to-wear, 1986; consultant for fabric and color design, Ann Taylor stores, from 1990; joined Tony awards nominating committee; also designed for theater, film, television, as well as custom clothing, from 1961. Awards: Coty American Fashion Critics award, 1958, 1962, 1967, 1974; National Cotton award, 1962; New York Drama Critics award, 1963; Parsons Medal for Distinguished Achievement, 1974; Emmy award, 1982. Address: c/o Parson's School of Design, 66 Fifth Avenue, New York NY 10011, U.S.A.

PUBLICATIONS

On BROOKS:

Books

- Maeder, Edward, et al., Hollywood and History: Costume Design in Film, New York, 1987.
 Owen, Bobbie, Costume Designers on Broadway: Designers and Their Credits 1915–1985, Westport, Connecticut, 1987.
 Milbank, Caroline Rennolds, New York Fashion: The Evolution of American Style, New York, 1989.
 Leese, Elizabeth, Costume Design in the Movies, New York, 1991.
 Stegemeyer, Anne, Who's Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.

Articles

- "Designers Who are Making News," in American Fashions & Fabrics (New York), No. 37, 1956.
 Morris, Bernadine, "A Return to Fashion Staged with Flair by Donald Brooks," in the New York Times, 14 May 1986.
 "Parsons Students Strut Their Stuff," in Women's Wear Daily, 4 May 1998.

- McBride, Murdoch, "Gotham Gothics Nurture Nightmares on and Off Broadway," in Back Stage, 30 October 1998.
 Wilson, Eric, "The Sixties—Seizing the Moment, a Band of American Upstarts Lays the Groundwork for a New World Order," in Women's Wear Daily, 13 June 2000.

* * *

Staying power characterized Donald Brooks every bit as much as the simply cut, easy fitting dresses in distinctive fabrics for which he is best known. A summer job in the advertising and display department at Lord & Taylor led him into ready-to-wear, first as a sketch artist and subsequently as designer for a series of undistinguished manufacturers. After a stint as designer at Darbury and Hedges of New York, where his work was admired by the fashion press, Brooks moved to Townley Frocks as successor to Claire McCardell. There, Brooks was given his own label as well as the chance to develop his own prize-winning printed fabrics.

By the mid-1960s, Brooks was one of the few American designers to have financial control of his own business. From that base he diversified along the usual lines, designing sweaters, shoes, swimsuits, furnishing fabrics, and other items under a multitude of licensing agreements. At the same time he built a secure base for his custom-made clothes that stood him in good stead throughout the recession years of the 1970s and 1980s. Brooks also developed a parallel career, interpreting the contemporary scene for television, film, and the theater, beginning in 1961. His many stage credits include the musical No Strings, which earned him a New York Drama Critics award in 1963, and a nomination for the Antoinette Perry, or Tony award. For his film design Brooks has received four Oscar nominations. The parallel careers often supported one another, as when Brooks' clothes for the film Star, set in the 1920s and 1930s, provided the direction for his 1968 ready-to-wear collection.

Brooks' clothes were known for their clean lines, often surprising colors, and for their distinctive fabrics, most of which he himself designed. There is a boldness about a Brooks design that makes an impact and makes his contemporary dresses for the stage particularly successful. The Parsons Medal for Distinguished Achievement has been awarded less than half a dozen times in almost as many decades. Brooks received it in 1974, to join a roster that singled out Adrian, Norman Norell, and Claire McCardell as especially noteworthy American designers.

In the 1990s Brooks enjoyed a myriad of activities related to the many facets of fashion design. He had returned to the theatre as one of the annual Tony awards nominating committee; mentored students at the Parsons School of Design, and participated in the annual Parsons Fashion Critics awards; and designed for the Theater for the New City's Annual Village Halloween Costume Ball.

—Whitney Blausen

BROOKS BROTHERS

American clothier

Established: in New York as Brooks Clothing Company by Henry Sands Brooks, 1818; renamed Brooks Brothers, 1854. Company History: First American firm to market such staples as the button-down collar shirt and polo coat; has also sold womenswear from 1940s; opened womenswear department in own New York store, 1976; sold to Marks & Spencer, Plc. by the Campeau Corporation, 1988; expanded into textiles, 1994; opened third New York City store, 1995; revitalized image with new design director, 1996; began work on new flagship store in New York, 1998 (opened, 1999); sustained damage to New York stores during World Trade Center terrorist attack, 2001; sold to Alliance SA, December 2001. Company Address: 346 Madison Avenue, New York, NY 10017, U.S.A. Company Website: www.brooksbrothers.com.

PUBLICATIONS

By BROOKS BROTHERS:

Books

- The Development of Male Apparel*, New York, 1901.
Big Game and Little Game: A Brief Survey of the Hunting Fields of the World, New York, 1914.
International Trophies, New York, 1914.
A Catalogue of Clothing and Many Other Things for Men and Boys, New York, 1915.
Brooks Brothers Centenary, New York, 1918.
Brooks' Miscellany & Gentlemen's Intelligencer [several volume set], New York, 1926.
A Chronicle Recording 125 Years...of Brooks Brothers Business, New York, 1943.
Christmas 1988, Our 170th Year—Gift Selections for Men and Boys, New York, 1988.

On BROOKS BROTHERS:

Books

- Roscho, Bernard, The Rag Race, New York, 1963.
Fucini, Joseph, and Suzy Fucini, Entrepreneurs, Boston, 1965.
Boyer, G. Bruce, Elegance, New York, 1985.
Milbank, Caroline Rennolds, New York Fashion: The Evolution of American Style, New York, 1989.

Articles

- Millstein, Gilbert, "The Suits on the Brooks Brothers Men," in the New York Times Magazine, 15 August 1976.
Attanasio, Paul, "Summer of Size 42," in Esquire, June 1986.
"Taking Over an American Tradition," in Management Today, May 1988.
Graham, Judith, "Brooks Bros. Spiffs Up Its Image," in Advertising Age, 30 October 1989.
Barron, James, "Pleats? Cardigan Cuddling? Brooks Brothers Unbuttons," in the New York Times, 11 November 1989.
Barmash, Isadore, "Brooks Brothers Stays the Course," in the New York Times, 23 November 1990.
Better, Nancy Marx, "Unbuttoning Brooks Brothers," in M Inc., March 1991.
Palmieri, Jean E., "When Brooks Put Fashion on the Front," in DNR, 11 March 1991.
Guzman, "He Ain't Stuffy, He's Brooks Brothers," in Esquire, September 1991.
Palmieri, Jean E., "An American Icon Celebrated a Milestone; Brooks Brothers Still Spry at 175," in DNR, 31 May 1993.

Plimpton, George, "Under the Golden Fleece," in American Heritage, November 1993.

"Brooks Bros. Goes into the Textile Biz," in DNR, 13 October 1994.

Palmieri, Jean E., "Brooks Brothers Finds Its Colorful Past," in DNR, 15 July 1996.

Fallon, James, "Brooks Bros. Plans Opening of 24 Stores," in Women's Wear Daily, 24 February 1999.

Palmieri, Jean E., "Brooks Brothers: The Inside Story," in DNR, 25 June 2001.

Edgecliffe-Johnson, Andrew, "Buyers Line Up for Brooks Brothers," in the Financial Times, 30 June 2001.

Curan, Catherine, "Downtown Retailers Rocked But Unbowed—Brooks Brothers...Hopes to Press on in Area," in Crain's New York Business, 17 September 2001.

Anderson, Katie, "Marks & Spencer Postpones Brooks Sale," in the Daily Deal, 18 September 2001.

* * *

Brooks Brothers is one of the oldest clothiers in America; a company with a distinctive image of quiet good taste. Henry Sands Brooks first opened the store under his own name in 1818. His sons Henry, Daniel, John, Elisha, and Edward, officially changed the name to Brooks Brothers in 1854.

Since the beginning, Brooks Brothers has been innovative. When Henry Sr. first opened his doors in New York, he offered ready-to-wear clothing for sailors who were in port for short periods of time and who had no time to have their clothing custom tailored. Henry Sr. also offered or custom-tailored clothing for the gentry, professionals, and the well-to-do. For more than 100 years Brooks made military uniforms, including those for Civil War Generals Lee, Sheridan, Grant, and Custer. George Bush was one of the many U.S. presidents who wore Brooks Brothers clothes, while President Abraham Lincoln was wearing a Brooks' frock coat the night he was shot.

Brooks Brothers introduced many new styles to men's fashion. The firm adapted the button-down collar from shirts the English wore playing polo; introduced the so-called sack suit, which had as little padding as possible and became a staple of businessmen's wardrobes with its understated design. In 1890 they introduced madras clothing, in 1904 Shetland wool sweaters, in 1910 the camel hair polo coat, in 1930 the lightweight summer suit, and in 1953 came the wash-and-wear shirt. Mainstays in the Brooks line have included the foulard tie, khakis, and the navy blazer. These are all part of the so-called Ivy League styles associated with the Ivy League schools of America. People who wear Brooks Brothers clothes are generally not concerned with fashion, but with stylish good looks. Lawrence Wortzel summed up the look in Forbes, by saying "if Brooks dressed you, no one would laugh."

The Brooks image is so distinctive American authors have used it in their work: Mary McCarthy wrote a short story called, "Man in the Brooks Brothers Suit." F. Scott Fitzgerald dressed his characters in Brooks clothes, just as they were worn by John O'Hara's good guys.

While Brooks has always been a clothier for men and boys, surreptitiously women also bought their clothes for themselves, often resorting to purchasing their goods in the boys' department for sizing. They, too, wanted good quality and exceptional design. Brooks Brothers did provide clothing for women as early as the mid-1940s, introducing Shetland wool sweaters. In 1949 Vogue magazine showed a model wearing a pink Brooks Brothers button-down collar shirt. It was not until 1976, however, that Brooks officially opened a small women's department at the back of their store in New York.

Known throughout the world, Brooks Brothers was bought by the English firm of Marks & Spencer, with stores in Tokyo as well as throughout the United States. No matter where the label is found, the style is Brooks Brothers, and no adjustments are made for regional or national differences. In a New York Times article, Lawrence Van Gelder called Brooks Brothers a "bastion of sartorial conservatism." It would be easy to classify Brooks as stodgy, old-fashioned, and showing little concern for fashion, but this would be erroneous. Brooks Brothers clothes were not revolutionary when it comes to design, but evolutionary. While not at the forefront of fashion, Brooks' style has quietly maintained a classic style evolving to meet the needs of the times. In the 1918 centenary, Brooks Brothers advised that one "be not the first by whom the new is tried, nor yet the last to lay the old aside."

At the dawn of its second century, Brooks remained a steadfast leader in beautifully tailored, conservative style—though the firm made a few concessions to keep abreast of the times. With the advent of casual dressing in the corporate world, Brooks Brothers reluctantly relaxed some of its clothing to reflect the growing workplace trend. Additionally, new stand-alone womenswear stores were planned for the next several years, as were more traditional Brooks Brothers shops in the U.S. and worldwide. Yet a downturn in the menswear market and falling sales took their toll, and rumors swirled for two years before the firm's parent announced its intention to sell the retailer. Among the high profile contenders was Tommy Hilfiger Corp., Polo Ralph Lauren, Men's Warehouse, Claudio Del Vecchio, May Department Stores, and Dickson North America.

Plans by Marks & Spencer to sell the company were abruptly put on hold in fall 2001. Retailing and dealmaking were stopped cold by the devastation in New York City on 11 September 2001. A newly-renovated store at Liberty Plaza, near the World Trade Center, was destroyed by debris when terrorists leveled the center, while another in the area was used as makeshift morgue. In December of that year, Marks & Spencer found its buyer, Alliance SA, and Brooks Brothers was sold.

—Nancy House; updated by Nelly Rhodes

BRUCE, Liza

American designer working in London

Born: New York City, 21 September 1954. Family: Married Nicholas Barker (divorced); married Nicholas Alvis-Vega. Career: Designed high-end bathing suits, from 1982; began designing ready-to-wear, 1988; launched outerwear designs, 1989. Address: 37 Warble Way, London W3, England.

PUBLICATIONS

On BRUCE:

Books

Stegemeyer, Anne, Who's Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.

Articles

- Polan, Brenda, "So Long as the Octopus Giggles," in The Guardian (London), 6 June 1985.
- "Designs Do Swimmingly," in Chicago Tribune, 4 December 1985.
- "Creative Collaborators," in Harper's Bazaar, June 1989.
- Starzinger, Page Hill, "Out of the Water, Onto the Street" in Vogue, June 1990.
- Jeal, Nicola, "Truly, Madly, Modern," in Elle (London), May 1993.
- Baker, Lindsay, "A Room of My Own," in The Observer (London), 10 June 1993.
- Spindler, Amy M., "Color It with Silver and Spice," in the New York Times, 4 November 1993.
- D'Innocenzio, Anne, "Bruce's New Moves," Women's Wear Daily, 4 May 1995.
- Fallon, James, "Liza With a Z," Women's Wear Daily, 26 February 1998.
- Aldersley-Williams, Hugh, "The Swimsuit Issue: Liza Bruce Opens Swimsuit Store," in the New Statesman, 27 February 1998.
- D'Innocenzio, Anne, "Liza Bruce Opens Soho Store," in Women's Wear Daily, 10 February 2000.

* * *

Lean, pared-down shapes, devoid of decoration or unnecessary seams, dominate Liza Bruce's work. Shaped with Lycra, her clothes cling to the body. She has removed tight clothing from its conventional daring context and defined notion of simple stretch garments as the basis for the modern wardrobe in the mid-1980s. Her designs are founded on the flattering silhouette they produce, emphasizing shape while narrowing the frame.

Her background in swimwear design, which continues in her collections, has given her a confidence in working with the female form. Although at first her stretch luster crêpe leggings made some women feel too self-conscious and underdressed, they became the ultimate example of 1980s innovation and were soon a staple in the fashion world, taken up by the 1984 revival interest in synthetics.

Minimalist shape was one of the early examples of her highly recognizable style. She has built on the garments that supplement her streamlined swimwear range, originally modeled on bodybuilder Lisa Lyons, who embodied the toned strength of Bruce's design. Her swimsuits and closely related bodices produce the characteristic smooth line that pervades her work, some in stark black and white with scooped-out necklines (in 1989), others more delicate and decorative. In 1992, soft peach bodies were sprinkled with self-colored beads across the breast area.

Bruce's detailing maintains the aerodynamic line of her clothes while adding definition and interest to their usual matte simplicity. In 1992 she also produced columnlike sheath dresses and skirts that clung to the ankle like a second skin, punctuated by beads at regular intervals down their sides, which were quickly copied throughout London. The subtle sophistication of such tubular styles avoided the pervasive retro fashion of the year; indeed, Bruce's work, based as it is on easy-to-wear, timeless separates, pays only lip service to current trends. In 1990 this took the form of catsuits made of a black crêpe and Lycra-mix with fake fur collars, and her 1993 collection nodded toward deconstructionist styles, with shrunken mohair jumpers, crumpled silk shifts, and narrow coats with external seams. It was perhaps was not until 1976, however, that Brooks officially opened a small women's department at the back of their store in New York.

Known throughout the world, Brooks Brothers was bought by the English firm of Marks & Spencer, with stores in Tokyo as well as throughout the United States. No matter where the label is found, the style is Brooks Brothers, and no adjustments are made for regional or national differences. In a New York Times article, Lawrence Van Gelder called Brooks Brothers a "bastion of sartorial conservatism." It would be easy to classify Brooks as stodgy, old-fashioned, and showing little concern for fashion, but this would be erroneous. Brooks Brothers clothes were not revolutionary when it comes to design, but evolutionary. While not at the forefront of fashion, Brooks' style has quietly maintained a classic style evolving to meet the needs of the times. In the 1918 centenary, Brooks Brothers advised that one "be not the first by whom the new is tried, nor yet the last to lay the old aside."

At the dawn of its second century, Brooks remained a steadfast leader in beautifully tailored, conservative style—though the firm made a few concessions to keep abreast of the times. With the advent of casual dressing in the corporate world, Brooks Brothers reluctantly relaxed some of its clothing to reflect the growing workplace trend. Additionally, new stand-alone womenswear stores were planned for the next several years, as were more traditional Brooks Brothers shops in the U.S. and worldwide. Yet a downturn in the menswear market and falling sales took their toll, and rumors swirled for two years before the firm's parent announced its intention to sell the retailer. Among the high profile contenders was Tommy Hilfiger Corp., Polo Ralph Lauren, Men's Warehouse, Claudio Del Vecchio, May Department Stores, and Dickson North America.

Plans by Marks & Spencer to sell the company were abruptly put on hold in fall 2001. Retailing and dealmaking were stopped cold by the devastation in New York City on 11 September 2001. A newly-renovated store at Liberty Plaza, near the World Trade Center, was destroyed by debris when terrorists leveled the center, while another in the area was used as makeshift morgue. In December of that year, Marks & Spencer found its buyer, Alliance SA, and Brooks Brothers was sold.

—Nancy House; updated by Nelly Rhodes

BRUCE, Liza

American designer working in London

Born: New York City, 21 September 1954. Family: Married Nicholas Barker (divorced); married Nicholas Alvis-Vega. Career: Designed high-end bathing suits, from 1982; began designing ready-to-wear, 1988; launched outerwear designs, 1989. Address: 37 Warble Way, London W3, England.

PUBLICATIONS

On BRUCE:

Books

Stegemeyer, Anne, Who's Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.

Articles

- Polan, Brenda, "So Long as the Octopus Giggles," in The Guardian (London), 6 June 1985.
- "Designs Do Swimmingly," in Chicago Tribune, 4 December 1985.
- "Creative Collaborators," in Harper's Bazaar, June 1989.
- Starzinger, Page Hill, "Out of the Water, Onto the Street" in Vogue, June 1990.
- Jeal, Nicola, "Truly, Madly, Modern," in Elle (London), May 1993.
- Baker, Lindsay, "A Room of My Own," in The Observer (London), 10 June 1993.
- Spindler, Amy M., "Color It with Silver and Spice," in the New York Times, 4 November 1993.
- D'Innocenzio, Anne, "Bruce's New Moves," Women's Wear Daily, 4 May 1995.
- Fallon, James, "Liza With a Z," Women's Wear Daily, 26 February 1998.
- Aldersley-Williams, Hugh, "The Swimsuit Issue: Liza Bruce Opens Swimsuit Store," in the New Statesman, 27 February 1998.
- D'Innocenzio, Anne, "Liza Bruce Opens Soho Store," in Women's Wear Daily, 10 February 2000.

* * *

Lean, pared-down shapes, devoid of decoration or unnecessary seams, dominate Liza Bruce's work. Shaped with Lycra, her clothes cling to the body. She has removed tight clothing from its conventional daring context and defined notion of simple stretch garments as the basis for the modern wardrobe in the mid-1980s. Her designs are founded on the flattering silhouette they produce, emphasizing shape while narrowing the frame.

Her background in swimwear design, which continues in her collections, has given her a confidence in working with the female form. Although at first her stretch luster crêpe leggings made some women feel too self-conscious and underdressed, they became the ultimate example of 1980s innovation and were soon a staple in the fashion world, taken up by the 1984 revival interest in synthetics.

Minimalist shape was one of the early examples of her highly recognizable style. She has built on the garments that supplement her streamlined swimwear range, originally modeled on bodybuilder Lisa Lyons, who embodied the toned strength of Bruce's design. Her swimsuits and closely related bodices produce the characteristic smooth line that pervades her work, some in stark black and white with scooped-out necklines (in 1989), others more delicate and decorative. In 1992, soft peach bodies were sprinkled with self-colored beads across the breast area.

Bruce's detailing maintains the aerodynamic line of her clothes while adding definition and interest to their usual matte simplicity. In 1992 she also produced columnlike sheath dresses and skirts that clung to the ankle like a second skin, punctuated by beads at regular intervals down their sides, which were quickly copied throughout London. The subtle sophistication of such tubular styles avoided the pervasive retro fashion of the year; indeed, Bruce's work, based as it is on easy-to-wear, timeless separates, pays only lip service to current trends. In 1990 this took the form of catsuits made of a black crêpe and Lycra-mix with fake fur collars, and her 1993 collection nodded toward deconstructionist styles, with shrunken mohair jumpers, crumpled silk shifts, and narrow coats with external seams. It was perhaps inevitable that her work incorporated such touches as her outerwear range, begun back in 1989, and further expanded.

Bruce's signature is most strongly stamped on the lean, sculptured stretchwear she consistently produces. It presents an ideal of modernity in its streamlined design, confident shape, and essential minimalism. She was able to build on these basic garments as her confidence as a designer of outerwear grew, enabling her to incorporate contemporary fashion preoccupations into more tailored pieces which complement and expand upon the postmodernist tenets of her style. Her popularity in the fashion world has been firmly established and her appeal to confident, independent women—who appreciate simple yet sexy clothes bereft of unnecessary detail—continues to grow.

During the mid-1990s, Bruce expanded her product line in the U.S. while maintaining her large showroom and studio in London. She opened a large showroom in New York offering more affordable swimwear and activewear, and introduced a fragrance. Bruce wanted to have a home base in the U.S. to better serve her American clients, who include Barneys, Marks & Spencer, Charivari, and Saks Fifth Avenue. Yet in 1996 Bruce went into a voluntary liquidation of her wholesale business due to several financial factors, including a long copyright dispute with Marks & Spencer and the bankruptcy of her biggest account, Barneys New York. After a few years of regrouping, Bruce opened a small retail shop in London, selling to only a few selective American clients such as Bergdorf Goodman, Neiman Marcus, Saks Fifth Avenue, and Harvey Nichols. Her new business once again features her popular swimwear, lingerie, and sportswear, and she planned to add jewelry and footwear.

The new London retail business was successful, and in 1999 Bruce returned to the U.S. and opened a store on Melrose Avenue in Los Angeles. The following year she opened a small, 350-square-foot shop in Manhattan's Soho district. Of the new shop, Bruce told Women's Wear Daily, "It has a closet-like effect. I'm into how clothes interact with the interior."

Bruce's new approach of opening smaller, more intimate stores appeals to her desire to veer away from commercialism. Her new sportswear collections feature the same wearable and functional fabrics as she has used for her swimwear—modern fabrics that travel well. She has added Velcro closures to her clingy and stretchy pieces, and on some of her pieces she has haphazardly sewn in a label that reads, "Luscious Bitch."

—Rebecca Arnold; updated by Christine Miner Minderovic

BRUNO MAGLI

Italian footwear and accessories firm

Founded: in 1936 by designer Bruno Magli and siblings Marino and Maria; Company History: Moved out of basement and into factory, 1947; opened first retail store, 1967; U.S. operations formed by Rolf Grueterich, mid-1970s; began franchising retail locations, 1980s; gained notoriety and increased sales during the O.J. Simpson trial, 1996; Magli by Monica launched, designed by Bruno's granddaughter, Monica, 2000; controlling share purchased by investment firm Opera, 2001. Company Address: Via Larga 33, 40138 Bologna, Italy. Company Website: www.brunomagli.it.

PUBLICATIONS

On BRUNO MAGLI:

Articles

- Schiro, Anne-Marie, "New Paths for Bruno Magli," in the New York Times, 11 August 1992.
- Newman, Jill, "Bruno Magli Goes for It All," in WWD, 21 August 1992.
- Ilari, Alessandra, "A Bruno Magli Comeback in the Cards?" in Footwear News, 1 August 1994.
- Zargoni, Luisa, "Decorating Rita," in Footwear News, 7 August 1995.
- Corwin, Miles, "Brush With Infamy Makes Products Shine," in the Los Angeles Times, 8 April 1997.
- Schneider-Levy, Barbara, "Burgeoning Bruno," in Footwear News, 2 August 1999.
- DeMartini, Marilyn, "Modern Appeal," in Footwear News, 8 May 2000.
- Lenetz, Dana, "Opera Out to Build Bruno Magli into Powerhouse," in Footwear News, 3 September 2001.

* * *

Italian manufacturer Bruno Magli is known for its high-end, well-crafted, classically styled shoes. Launched as a women's footwear manufacturer in 1936, the company expanded into men's shoes and later into accessories and select apparel. By the 21st century it was an $83-million manufacturer and retailer of shoes, leather and fabric accessories, and leather clothing.

Designer Bruno Magli, son of a cobbler, founded the company along with his sister, Maria, who sewed the uppers, and brother, Marino, who was responsible for the soles. The firm grew quickly and, over the next six decades or so became a huge industrial concern in Italy, always remaining (until 2001) under family control. In 1947, the firm moved out of the family basement into its first factory, expanding into men's shoes during the same decade.

In 1967 the company opened its first retail store (it moved into franchising as a means of expanding its retail operations in the 1980s) and two years later, in 1969, moved to a larger, more modern factory, which it continues to occupy today. Despite the use of the latest in modern technology, much of the craftsmanship in Bruno Magli footwear continues to be done by hand; 30 people touch each shoe during the course of its manufacture.

In the early 1990s the company began to take a new direction in its women's business both in Italy and abroad, branching out from its classic styles such as slingbacks and pumps (which remained an important part of the line) into zebra stripes and polka dot sandals and boots. At the same time, the firm expanded into apparel and accessories in denim, leather, and animal prints. Many of these changes were credited to Rolf Grueterich, who had handled the men's shoe business in the U.S. for 14 years and had recently taken over the women's side in America as well. As women's footwear was trending toward the contemporary during this period, the men's styles were taking a turn back to the classic.

Company sales in U.S. skyrocketed in 1996, thanks to the Bruno Magli brand's role in the O.J. Simpson murder trial, in which its shoes took center stage as evidence. The increased brand recognition, albeit with a certain amount of infamy, caused U.S. sales to rise by 50 percent in early 1997, after a rise of 35 percent in 1996, both attributed inevitable that her work incorporated such touches as her outerwear range, begun back in 1989, and further expanded.

Bruce's signature is most strongly stamped on the lean, sculptured stretchwear she consistently produces. It presents an ideal of modernity in its streamlined design, confident shape, and essential minimalism. She was able to build on these basic garments as her confidence as a designer of outerwear grew, enabling her to incorporate contemporary fashion preoccupations into more tailored pieces which complement and expand upon the postmodernist tenets of her style. Her popularity in the fashion world has been firmly established and her appeal to confident, independent women—who appreciate simple yet sexy clothes bereft of unnecessary detail—continues to grow.

During the mid-1990s, Bruce expanded her product line in the U.S. while maintaining her large showroom and studio in London. She opened a large showroom in New York offering more affordable swimwear and activewear, and introduced a fragrance. Bruce wanted to have a home base in the U.S. to better serve her American clients, who include Barneys, Marks & Spencer, Charivari, and Saks Fifth Avenue. Yet in 1996 Bruce went into a voluntary liquidation of her wholesale business due to several financial factors, including a long copyright dispute with Marks & Spencer and the bankruptcy of her biggest account, Barneys New York. After a few years of regrouping, Bruce opened a small retail shop in London, selling to only a few selective American clients such as Bergdorf Goodman, Neiman Marcus, Saks Fifth Avenue, and Harvey Nichols. Her new business once again features her popular swimwear, lingerie, and sportswear, and she planned to add jewelry and footwear.

The new London retail business was successful, and in 1999 Bruce returned to the U.S. and opened a store on Melrose Avenue in Los Angeles. The following year she opened a small, 350-square-foot shop in Manhattan's Soho district. Of the new shop, Bruce told Women's Wear Daily, "It has a closet-like effect. I'm into how clothes interact with the interior."

Bruce's new approach of opening smaller, more intimate stores appeals to her desire to veer away from commercialism. Her new sportswear collections feature the same wearable and functional fabrics as she has used for her swimwear—modern fabrics that travel well. She has added Velcro closures to her clingy and stretchy pieces, and on some of her pieces she has haphazardly sewn in a label that reads, "Luscious Bitch."

—Rebecca Arnold; updated by Christine Miner Minderovic

BRUNO MAGLI

Italian footwear and accessories firm

Founded: in 1936 by designer Bruno Magli and siblings Marino and Maria; Company History: Moved out of basement and into factory, 1947; opened first retail store, 1967; U.S. operations formed by Rolf Grueterich, mid-1970s; began franchising retail locations, 1980s; gained notoriety and increased sales during the O.J. Simpson trial, 1996; Magli by Monica launched, designed by Bruno's granddaughter, Monica, 2000; controlling share purchased by investment firm Opera, 2001. Company Address: Via Larga 33, 40138 Bologna, Italy. Company Website: www.brunomagli.it.

PUBLICATIONS

On BRUNO MAGLI:

Articles

- Schiro, Anne-Marie, "New Paths for Bruno Magli," in the New York Times, 11 August 1992.
- Newman, Jill, "Bruno Magli Goes for It All," in WWD, 21 August 1992.
- Ilari, Alessandra, "A Bruno Magli Comeback in the Cards?" in Footwear News, 1 August 1994.
- Zargoni, Luisa, "Decorating Rita," in Footwear News, 7 August 1995.
- Corwin, Miles, "Brush With Infamy Makes Products Shine," in the Los Angeles Times, 8 April 1997.
- Schneider-Levy, Barbara, "Burgeoning Bruno," in Footwear News, 2 August 1999.
- DeMartini, Marilyn, "Modern Appeal," in Footwear News, 8 May 2000.
- Lenetz, Dana, "Opera Out to Build Bruno Magli into Powerhouse," in Footwear News, 3 September 2001.

* * *

Italian manufacturer Bruno Magli is known for its high-end, well-crafted, classically styled shoes. Launched as a women's footwear manufacturer in 1936, the company expanded into men's shoes and later into accessories and select apparel. By the 21st century it was an $83-million manufacturer and retailer of shoes, leather and fabric accessories, and leather clothing.

Designer Bruno Magli, son of a cobbler, founded the company along with his sister, Maria, who sewed the uppers, and brother, Marino, who was responsible for the soles. The firm grew quickly and, over the next six decades or so became a huge industrial concern in Italy, always remaining (until 2001) under family control. In 1947, the firm moved out of the family basement into its first factory, expanding into men's shoes during the same decade.

In 1967 the company opened its first retail store (it moved into franchising as a means of expanding its retail operations in the 1980s) and two years later, in 1969, moved to a larger, more modern factory, which it continues to occupy today. Despite the use of the latest in modern technology, much of the craftsmanship in Bruno Magli footwear continues to be done by hand; 30 people touch each shoe during the course of its manufacture.

In the early 1990s the company began to take a new direction in its women's business both in Italy and abroad, branching out from its classic styles such as slingbacks and pumps (which remained an important part of the line) into zebra stripes and polka dot sandals and boots. At the same time, the firm expanded into apparel and accessories in denim, leather, and animal prints. Many of these changes were credited to Rolf Grueterich, who had handled the men's shoe business in the U.S. for 14 years and had recently taken over the women's side in America as well. As women's footwear was trending toward the contemporary during this period, the men's styles were taking a turn back to the classic.

Company sales in U.S. skyrocketed in 1996, thanks to the Bruno Magli brand's role in the O.J. Simpson murder trial, in which its shoes took center stage as evidence. The increased brand recognition, albeit with a certain amount of infamy, caused U.S. sales to rise by 50 percent in early 1997, after a rise of 35 percent in 1996, both attributed to the Simpson connection. Although the company welcomed the added sales, it discontinued the Lorenzo model, of which Simpson reportedly owned a pair and referred to them during the trial as "ugly-ass shoes," despite the fact he was seen wearing them in many photos.

Starting in the mid-1990s and continuing through the early 2000s, Bruno Magli began to update its image, under the direction of Rita Magli. Stores and shoe designs were updated for a consistent global look. Previously, designs had been tailored to each country, and retail outlets placed more focus on the product and less on store décor. Since 2000, Bruno Magli concentrated on its worldwide image, with new store designs, advertising, styles, materials and colors. Bruno Magli U.S. president Peter Grueterich (Rolf's son) told Footwear News (8 May 2000) the company was "making a transition from classic to modern."

The goal was to create an entire collection for men and women that was fashion forward yet maintained the quality always associated with the company. One facet of the firm's new direction was to hire Bruno Magli's granddaughter, Monica, to design a label called Magli by Monica, which was targeted to a more youthful market than for which it had historically aimed. Bruno Magli also added high-end custom footwear for men and its first men's sportswear line. The apparel mirrored its three men's footwear tiers, Platinum, Modern, and Sport.

In 2001, the Luxembourg-based investment fund Opera, half owned by Bulgari, acquired a controlling interest in Bruno Magli, representing the first time the founding family lost majority ownership. The firm planned to use the cash to expand its international presence; as part of the deal, Bruno Magli and Opera also acquired Bruno Magli's U.S. operations which managed many franchising and licensing agreements. At the time of the acquisition, Bruno Magli had 60 stores around the world, five of which were wholly-owned, and generated the vast majority of its sales from outside Italy.

Bruno Magli manufactures more than a million pairs of shoes and 60,000 handbags (always coordinated with the footwear) per year. From the beginning, the firm's shoes were purchased by many celebrities; current customers range from Hillary Clinton to Queen Elizabeth II of England. The company retains its dedication to quality—its designs are sometimes likened to architecture—and boasts several products on display at New York's Museum of Modern Art.

—Karen Raugust

Burberry, spring 2001 collection. © AP/Wide World Photos/Fashion Wire Daily.

and expanded, 2001; public offering of shares planned, 2002. Exhibitions: Victoria and Albert Museum, London, 1989. Company Address:

29–53 Chatham Place, Hackney, London E9 6LP, England.

Company Website: www.gusplc.co.uk/burberry/html.

PUBLICATIONS

By BURBERRYS:

Books

Burberrys: An Elementary History of a Great Tradition, London.
The Story of the Trenchcoat, London, 1993.

On BURBERRYS:

Books

Garrulus, Coracias, ed., Open Spaces, London.
Coatts, Margot, The Burberry Story [exhibition catalogue], London, 1989.

BURBERRY

British clothiers

Founded: in 1856. Originally a draper's shop in Basingstoke, Hampshire, founded by Thomas Burberry (1835–1926), and specializing in waterproof overcoats. Company History: Opened London store in the Haymarket, 1891; trenchcoat introduced, 1901; Burberry established as a trademark, 1909; women's clothing lines added, and Paris branch opened, 1910; bought by Great Universal Stores, 1955; New York branch opened, 1978; toiletries line introduced, 1981; fragrances introduced, 1991; Christy Turlington ads make plaid trench chic again, 1993; Anne Marie Bravo hired as chief executive, 1997; Roberto Menichetti hired as head designer, 1998; Menichetti departs, replaced by Christopher Bailey, 2001; New York store refurbished to the Simpson connection. Although the company welcomed the added sales, it discontinued the Lorenzo model, of which Simpson reportedly owned a pair and referred to them during the trial as "ugly-ass shoes," despite the fact he was seen wearing them in many photos.

Starting in the mid-1990s and continuing through the early 2000s, Bruno Magli began to update its image, under the direction of Rita Magli. Stores and shoe designs were updated for a consistent global look. Previously, designs had been tailored to each country, and retail outlets placed more focus on the product and less on store décor. Since 2000, Bruno Magli concentrated on its worldwide image, with new store designs, advertising, styles, materials and colors. Bruno Magli U.S. president Peter Grueterich (Rolf's son) told Footwear News (8 May 2000) the company was "making a transition from classic to modern."

The goal was to create an entire collection for men and women that was fashion forward yet maintained the quality always associated with the company. One facet of the firm's new direction was to hire Bruno Magli's granddaughter, Monica, to design a label called Magli by Monica, which was targeted to a more youthful market than for which it had historically aimed. Bruno Magli also added high-end custom footwear for men and its first men's sportswear line. The apparel mirrored its three men's footwear tiers, Platinum, Modern, and Sport.

In 2001, the Luxembourg-based investment fund Opera, half owned by Bulgari, acquired a controlling interest in Bruno Magli, representing the first time the founding family lost majority ownership. The firm planned to use the cash to expand its international presence; as part of the deal, Bruno Magli and Opera also acquired Bruno Magli's U.S. operations which managed many franchising and licensing agreements. At the time of the acquisition, Bruno Magli had 60 stores around the world, five of which were wholly-owned, and generated the vast majority of its sales from outside Italy.

Bruno Magli manufactures more than a million pairs of shoes and 60,000 handbags (always coordinated with the footwear) per year. From the beginning, the firm's shoes were purchased by many celebrities; current customers range from Hillary Clinton to Queen Elizabeth II of England. The company retains its dedication to quality—its designs are sometimes likened to architecture—and boasts several products on display at New York's Museum of Modern Art.

—Karen Raugust

Burberry, spring 2001 collection. © AP/Wide World Photos/Fashion Wire Daily.

and expanded, 2001; public offering of shares planned, 2002. Exhibitions: Victoria and Albert Museum, London, 1989. Company Address: 29–53 Chatham Place, Hackney, London E9 6LP, England. Company Website: www.gusplc.co.uk/burberry/html.

PUBLICATIONS

By BURBERRYS:

Books

Burberrys: An Elementary History of a Great Tradition, London.
The Story of the Trenchcoat, London, 1993.

On BURBERRYS:

Books

Garrulus, Coracias, ed., Open Spaces, London.
Coatts, Margot, The Burberry Story [exhibition catalogue], London, 1989.

BURBERRY

British clothiers

Founded: in 1856. Originally a draper's shop in Basingstoke, Hampshire, founded by Thomas Burberry (1835–1926), and specializing in waterproof overcoats. Company History: Opened London store in the Haymarket, 1891; trenchcoat introduced, 1901; Burberry established as a trademark, 1909; women's clothing lines added, and Paris branch opened, 1910; bought by Great Universal Stores, 1955; New York branch opened, 1978; toiletries line introduced, 1981; fragrances introduced, 1991; Christy Turlington ads make plaid trench chic again, 1993; Anne Marie Bravo hired as chief executive, 1997; Roberto Menichetti hired as head designer, 1998; Menichetti departs, replaced by Christopher Bailey, 2001; New York store refurbished

Articles

- Brady, James, "Going Back to the Trenches," in the New York Post, 10 October 1978.
- Morris, Bernadine, "Coat Maker Marks 125 Years in the Rain," in the New York Times, 21 January 1981.
- Gleizes, Serge, "Burberry's Story," in L'Officiel (Paris), October 1986.
- Britton, Noelle, "Burberry Brightens Its Image," in Marketing, 11 February 1988.
- Kanner, Bernice, "Scents of Accomplishment," in New York, 18 March 1991.
- White, Constance C.R., "Excitement at Burberry," in the New York Times, 31 December 1996.
- Goldstein, Lauren, "Dressing Up an Old Brand," in Fortune, 9 November 1998.
- Schiavo, Anne-Marie, "Burberry Modernizes and Reinvents Itself," in the New York Times, 5 January 1999.
- Menkes, Suzy, "Durable Chic: A Century of the Trench," in the International Herald Tribune, 4 April 2000.
- Heller, Richard, "A British Gucci," in Forbes, 3 April 2000.
- Profile, "Stretching the Plaid: Face Value," in the Economist, 3 February 2001.
- Voyle, Susanna, "Burberry Nets Gucci Designer," in the Financial Times, 4 May 2001.
- Kapner, Suzanne, "Suddenly Less Plaid is More for Burberry's Chief," in the New York Times, 24 June 2001.

* * *

Burberry was founded by Thomas Burberry (1835–1926), the inventor of the Burberry waterproof coat. The origin of the term "Burberry" to describe the famous waterproof garments is thought to have derived from the fact that Edward VII was in the habit of commanding, "Give me my Burberry," although Burberry himself had christened his invention "Gabardine."

The original shooting and fishing garments were produced in response to the perceived need for the ideal waterproof—one that would withstand wind and rain to a reasonable degree and yet allow air to reach the body. From Thomas Burberry's original drapery shop in Basingstoke, Hampshire, in 1856 to the opening of its prestigious premises in London's Haymarket in 1891, Burberry has employed what the trade journal Men's Wear of June 1904 termed "splendid advertising media" to promote their clothing. Some of the earliest advertising read, "T. Burberry's Gabardine—for India and the Colonies is the most suitable of materials. It resists hot and cold winds, rain or thorns, and forms a splendid top garment for the coldest climates."

Endorsement was given at the beginning of the century by both Roald Amundsen, on his expedition to the South Pole, who wrote from Hobart on 18 March 1912: "Heartiest thanks. Burberry overalls were made extensive use of during the sledge journey to the Pole and proved real good friends indeed," and Captain Scott, whose Burberry gabardine tent used on his sledge journey "Furthest South" was exhibited at the Bruton Galleries in that same year. Burberry also produced menswear and womenswear for motoring from the earliest appearance of the motor car, or as their illustrated catalogues put it, "Burberry adapts itself to the exigencies of travel in either closed or open cars...and at the same time satisfies every ideal of good taste and distinction."

Burberry, spring 2001 collection. © AP/Wide World Photos/Fashion Wire Daily.

The turn-of-the-century appeal to the ideal of "taste and distinction" always proved a potent force in the appeal of Burberry designs. The traditional Burberry Check and the New House Checks are protected as part of the UK trademark registration and are now used in a wide range of Burberry designs, from the traditional use as a lining for weathercoats to men's, women's, and children's outerwear, a range of accessories and luggage, toiletries, and several collections of Swiss-made watches featuring the Burberry Check and the trademark Prorsum Horse.

In the 1980s such distinctive goods satisfied the desire for label clothes in their appeal to young consumers as well as to traditional buyers both in Britain and abroad. In the 1990s the diversity of goods designed by Burberry, from a countrywide home shopping and visiting tailor service in Great Britain, to an internationally available range of Fine Foods proved the efficacy of the Burberry tradition. The company's power as an international household name signifying an instantly identifiable traditional Englishness is attested by the fact that "Burberry" and the logo of the equestrian knight in armor are registered trademarks.

Near the end of the 20th century, Rose Marie Bravo, who was credited with the turnaround of Saks Fifth Avenue, was brought in to revitalize the company and its image. With Asia, its biggest market, rocked by economic woes and flooding the market with grey goods, Bravo set about rebuilding the Burberry brand in the UK and Europe, and to control licensing by selling only to select luxury retailers. She also hired Italian-American Roberto Menichetti as her new head designer in 1998, who quickly made Burberry's Prorsum brand fashion's hottest ticket for women. Then, with the recognizable Burberry plaid on everything in sight, from swimwear and baby clothes to shoes and dog accessories, Bravo scaled back to avoid overexposure, cleverly hiding the trademarked pattern in a wide range of nonplaid garments.

Burberry took a hit when designer Menichetti left the company. Replaced with the virtually unknown Christopher Bailey from Gucci in 2001, Bravo hoped Bailey could bring a cohesive style to all of the Burberry clothing, though he would be responsible only for the Prorsum line.

Parent company Great Universal Stores was planning a public offering of Burberrys shares sometime in 2002, and continued an aggressive expansion to increase its presence in France, Italy, and the United States. In the U.S., which accounted for only a fifth of the retailer's worldwide sales, several new Burberry stores were slated to open in smaller upscale malls while the New York City flagship store on East 57th Street underwent extensive renovation and expansion. Burberrys also planned to open its first store in Beverly Hills.

With the Burberry name once again firmly entrenched as a fashion must-have, the 145-year old company has proven that its plaid will never go out of style. Looking back at her odyssey of pulling Burberry back from the brink of extinction, Bravo told Forbes in April 2000, "Coming in, I had studied Hermès and Gucci and other great brands, and it struck me that even during the periods when they had dipped a bit, they never lost the essence of whatever made those brands sing." With Bravo on board, Burberry has once again hit a high note.

—Doreen Ehrlich; updated by Owen James

BURROWS, Stephen

American designer

Born: Newark, New Jersey, 15 September 1943. Education: Philadelphia Museum College of Art, 1961–62; fashion design, Fashion Institute of Technology, New York, 1964–66. Career: Designer, Weber Originals, New York, 1966–67; supplier to Allen & Cole, circa 1967–68; manager (with Roz Rubenstein), O Boutique, 1968–69; owner, Stephen Burrows' World Boutique, Henri Bendel store, New York, 1970–73; founder/director, Burrows, Inc., New York, 1973–76; designer, Henri Bendel, 1977–82, 1993; returned to ready-to-wear design, 1989, and to custom design, 1990; designed knitwear line for Tony Lambert Company, 1991. Exhibitions: Versailles Palace, 1973. Awards: Coty American Fashion Critics special award (lingerie), 1974; "Winnie," 1977; Council of American Fashion Critics award, 1975; Knitted Textile Association Crystal Ball award, 1975.

PUBLICATIONS

On BURROWS:

Books

Morris, Bernadine, and Barbara Walz, The Fashion Makers, New York, 1978.

Milbank, Caroline Rennolds, New York Fashion: The Evolution of American Style, New York, 1989.

Stegemeyer, Anne, Who's Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.

Articles

Morris, Bernadine, "The Look of Fashions for the Seventies—In Colors that Can Dazzle," in the New York Times, 12 August 1970.

Fulman, Ricki, "Designer Has Last Laugh on His Critics," in the New York Daily News, 4 October 1971.

Klensch, Elsa, "Burrows: I Am Growing More," in Women's Wear Daily, 6 April 1972.

Carter, M. R., "The Story of Stephen Burrows," in Mademoiselle, March 1975.

Butler, J., "Burrows is Back—with a Little Help from His Friends," in the New York Times Magazine, 5 June 1977.

Talley, Andre Leon, "Black Designers Surviving in Style," in Ebony, November 1980.

Hunter, Norman L., "The Drama of Femininity for Evening and Cocktail," in Ebony, March 1981.

Schiros, Anne-Marie, "Stephen Burrows, Sportswear Designer," in the New York Times, 3 September 1989.

Morris, Bernadine, "Color and Curves from Burrows," in the New York Times, 9 January 1990.

_____, "The Rebirth of New York Couture," in the New York Times, 1 May 1990.

_____, "The Return of an American Original," in the New York Times, 10 August 1993.

"Black Designers," in Jet, 17 May 1999.

* * *

Phoenix and firebird of the New York fashion world, Stephen Burrows is one of the most audacious and auspicious talents in contemporary fashion. "Pure genius," said Roz Rubenstein Johnson of Burrows in a telephone interview in 2001. As Bernadine Morris said of Burrows, he is "incapable of making banal clothes." When creating custom-made clothes in the 1990s, Burrows insisted he would make only one dress of a kind. He told Morris, "Why not? I have plenty of ideas—I don't have to repeat myself."

There were relatively few African American designers at all in 1970 and certainly none who had achieved any kind of stature. Pauline Trigère was one of the first to begin using dark-skinned models, which set the fashion world abuzz with shock. Then came Ann Lowe and Burrows, the first African Americans to achieve stature as designers. Today, there are numerous African American designers, ranging from Bonga Bhengu and Bongiwe Walaza to Heather Jones and Patrick Robinson.

Burrows worked as a designer for Weber Originals in New York and supplied feathered vests he made to Allen & Cole in the mid-1960s before becoming the co-manager, with Rubenstein, of James Valkus' boutique in New York, called O, in 1968. When the boutique closed in 1969, Burrows was given his own boutique in the Henri Bendel department store by its president, Geraldine Stutz. Rubenstein, meanwhile, was hired to be the jewelry buyer there and eventually went on to found her own public relations company in California, with clients such as John Paul Mitchell Systems in her portfolio.

With the 1970 launch of Stephen Burrows' World Boutique within the Henri Bendel store, Burrows was catapulted into the limelight, being recognized for his remarkable color block, fluid, flirting with rocked by economic woes and flooding the market with grey goods, Bravo set about rebuilding the Burberry brand in the UK and Europe, and to control licensing by selling only to select luxury retailers. She also hired Italian-American Roberto Menichetti as her new head designer in 1998, who quickly made Burberry's Prorsum brand fashion's hottest ticket for women. Then, with the recognizable Burberry plaid on everything in sight, from swimwear and baby clothes to shoes and dog accessories, Bravo scaled back to avoid overexposure, cleverly hiding the trademarked pattern in a wide range of nonplaid garments.

Burberry took a hit when designer Menichetti left the company. Replaced with the virtually unknown Christopher Bailey from Gucci in 2001, Bravo hoped Bailey could bring a cohesive style to all of the Burberry clothing, though he would be responsible only for the Prorsum line.

Parent company Great Universal Stores was planning a public offering of Burberrys shares sometime in 2002, and continued an aggressive expansion to increase its presence in France, Italy, and the United States. In the U.S., which accounted for only a fifth of the retailer's worldwide sales, several new Burberry stores were slated to open in smaller upscale malls while the New York City flagship store on East 57th Street underwent extensive renovation and expansion. Burberrys also planned to open its first store in Beverly Hills.

With the Burberry name once again firmly entrenched as a fashion must-have, the 145-year old company has proven that its plaid will never go out of style. Looking back at her odyssey of pulling Burberry back from the brink of extinction, Bravo told Forbes in April 2000, "Coming in, I had studied Hermès and Gucci and other great brands, and it struck me that even during the periods when they had dipped a bit, they never lost the essence of whatever made those brands sing." With Bravo on board, Burberry has once again hit a high note.

—Doreen Ehrlich; updated by Owen James

BURROWS, Stephen

American designer

Born: Newark, New Jersey, 15 September 1943. Education: Philadelphia Museum College of Art, 1961–62; fashion design, Fashion Institute of Technology, New York, 1964–66. Career: Designer, Weber Originals, New York, 1966–67; supplier to Allen & Cole, circa 1967–68; manager (with Roz Rubenstein), O Boutique, 1968–69; owner, Stephen Burrows' World Boutique, Henri Bendel store, New York, 1970–73; founder/director, Burrows, Inc., New York, 1973–76; designer, Henri Bendel, 1977–82, 1993; returned to ready-to-wear design, 1989, and to custom design, 1990; designed knitwear line for Tony Lambert Company, 1991. Exhibitions: Versailles Palace, 1973. Awards: Coty American Fashion Critics special award (lingerie), 1974; "Winnie," 1977; Council of American Fashion Critics award, 1975; Knitted Textile Association Crystal Ball award, 1975.

PUBLICATIONS

On BURROWS:

Books

Morris, Bernadine, and Barbara Walz, The Fashion Makers, New York, 1978.

Milbank, Caroline Rennolds, New York Fashion: The Evolution of American Style, New York, 1989.

Stegemeyer, Anne, Who's Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.

Articles

Morris, Bernadine, "The Look of Fashions for the Seventies—In Colors that Can Dazzle," in the New York Times, 12 August 1970.

Fulman, Ricki, "Designer Has Last Laugh on His Critics," in the New York Daily News, 4 October 1971.

Klensch, Elsa, "Burrows: I Am Growing More," in Women's Wear Daily, 6 April 1972.

Carter, M. R., "The Story of Stephen Burrows," in Mademoiselle, March 1975.

Butler, J., "Burrows is Back—with a Little Help from His Friends," in the New York Times Magazine, 5 June 1977.

Talley, Andre Leon, "Black Designers Surviving in Style," in Ebony, November 1980.

Hunter, Norman L., "The Drama of Femininity for Evening and Cocktail," in Ebony, March 1981.

Schiros, Anne-Marie, "Stephen Burrows, Sportswear Designer," in the New York Times, 3 September 1989.

Morris, Bernadine, "Color and Curves from Burrows," in the New York Times, 9 January 1990.

_____, "The Rebirth of New York Couture," in the New York Times, 1 May 1990.

_____, "The Return of an American Original," in the New York Times, 10 August 1993.

"Black Designers," in Jet, 17 May 1999.

* * *

Phoenix and firebird of the New York fashion world, Stephen Burrows is one of the most audacious and auspicious talents in contemporary fashion. "Pure genius," said Roz Rubenstein Johnson of Burrows in a telephone interview in 2001. As Bernadine Morris said of Burrows, he is "incapable of making banal clothes." When creating custom-made clothes in the 1990s, Burrows insisted he would make only one dress of a kind. He told Morris, "Why not? I have plenty of ideas—I don't have to repeat myself."

There were relatively few African American designers at all in 1970 and certainly none who had achieved any kind of stature. Pauline Trigère was one of the first to begin using dark-skinned models, which set the fashion world abuzz with shock. Then came Ann Lowe and Burrows, the first African Americans to achieve stature as designers. Today, there are numerous African American designers, ranging from Bonga Bhengu and Bongiwe Walaza to Heather Jones and Patrick Robinson.

Burrows worked as a designer for Weber Originals in New York and supplied feathered vests he made to Allen & Cole in the mid-1960s before becoming the co-manager, with Rubenstein, of James Valkus' boutique in New York, called O, in 1968. When the boutique closed in 1969, Burrows was given his own boutique in the Henri Bendel department store by its president, Geraldine Stutz. Rubenstein, meanwhile, was hired to be the jewelry buyer there and eventually went on to found her own public relations company in California, with clients such as John Paul Mitchell Systems in her portfolio.

With the 1970 launch of Stephen Burrows' World Boutique within the Henri Bendel store, Burrows was catapulted into the limelight, being recognized for his remarkable color block, fluid, flirting with the nonfinito, sexy separates that typified the assertive woman of the 1970s. Spectacularly successful during that decade, Burrows has enjoyed alternating periods of triumph and quiescence in the subsequent years, with forays into sportswear in the early 1990s, custom-made clothing in the 1980s, and evening wear in 1993, again for Henri Bendel. He has come and gone and come again in the public gaze, partly for business reasons, but his design sensibility has been consistent. He sees bold color fields and tests color dissonance to achieve remarkable new harmony. His great mentor, Geraldine Stutz, erstwhile president of Bendel's, commented that he "stretches a rainbow over the body." But Burrows' rainbow has never sought a Peter Max popularity; his rainbow is extraordinary and unexpected, juxtaposing the strongest colors.

Serviceable separates have always been a large part of Burrows' look. Even his flirtatious dresses of the 1970s, often with his characteristic lettuce edging, seem to be parts when broken by color blocks and zones. As a result, his clothing always seems unaffected and young in the tradition of American sportswear. Clinging jersey, curving lines, and offsetting of easy drape by tight cling make Burrows' clothing both comfortable and very sexy. Of his 1990 collections, the designer himself said, "The dresses are sexy. Women should have an escort when they wear them."

Like Giorgio di Sant'Angelo and, to a lesser degree, Halston, Burrows was the quintessential fashion expression of the 1970s in a disestablishment sensibility, young nonchalance, and unfailing insistence on looking beautiful. Native American themes (also explored by Sant'Angelo in 1969 and 1970), bold color fields in jersey with exposed seams as edges, and the unfinished appearance of puckered lettuce edging seemed almost careless in 1969 and 1970 when invented by Burrows, but they can also be recognized as hallmarks of a truthful, youthful culture demanding no deceit in dress and a return to basics. If Burrows never yielded the sensuality of the body, he again prefigured the last quarter of the century as the body becomes the inevitable discourse of a society freed of Victorianism only at its end. His honesty in technique is an "infra-apparel" trait, betokening a strong feeling for clothing's process, not merely a superficial result. Ricki Fulman, of the New York Daily News suggested that "you've got to have a sense of humor to understand Stephen Burrows' clothes."

If the clothing offers an immediacy and vivacity, Burrows himself and the recognition received in his twenties were a comparable phenomenon. Emerging from among the Bendel's designers in 1969, Burrows was a world-class Coty award-winning talent in the early to mid-1970s and was one of the five designers selected to represent American fashion in the epochal showing at Versailles in November 1973.

Although Burrows may have offered fresh ideas in palette and color combination, he was also sustaining a sportswear idea. Even his laced cords and snaps have affinity with Claire McCordell's germinal work. Many designers after Burrows have looked to African American, African, and Latin styles for inspiration and especially to the sexy zest he found there for his designs. Elsa Klensch argued that the name "Stephen Burrows' World" was more than a store sign. "It is his own world—a philosophy, a lifestyle, an environment," one composed of astute street observation, a lively sense of contemporary living and its impatience with rules and convention, and of a nonverbal self-communication through clothing. As much as Halston and Sant'Angelo, Burrows was the avatar of new styles accorded to a cultural transfiguration in the 1970s. Perhaps he so personified the early 1970s that his later erratic career was inevitable: we have sacrificed our fullest appreciation of him to another sexy lady he dressed, Clio.

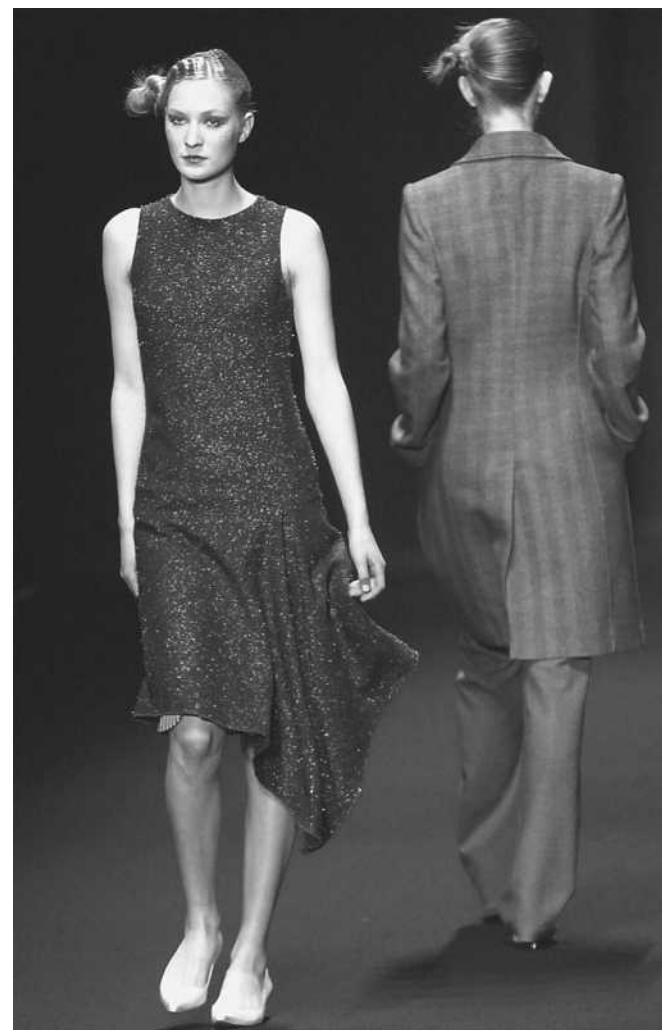

Burrows did design work for Tony Lambert Company in 1991 and Bendel in 1993, but with the departure of Stutz from Bendel's (she went on to work for Gump's in San Francisco), his visibility faded. His designer clothing, however, is considered collectible and can still be found for sale at such places as Keni Valenti Retro-Couture in New York. He currently resides in New York, and as Rubenstein said, "Whenever he has a pencil in his hand, he is always drawing," so there may be more innovations forthcoming from this fashion mogul.

—Richard Martin; updated by Daryl F. Mallett

BYBLOS

Italian fashion house

Founded: in 1973 as a division of Genny SpA. Company History: Independent company formed, circa 1983; designers have included Versace and Guy Paulin; principal designers, since 1981, Alan Cleaver and Keith Varty; collections include Byblos Uomo, 1983, Byblos USA, and Options Donna, 1985, Vis à Vis Byblos, 1986, and the nonfinito, sexy separates that typified the assertive woman of the 1970s. Spectacularly successful during that decade, Burrows has enjoyed alternating periods of triumph and quiescence in the subsequent years, with forays into sportswear in the early 1990s, custom-made clothing in the 1980s, and evening wear in 1993, again for Henri Bendel. He has come and gone and come again in the public gaze, partly for business reasons, but his design sensibility has been consistent. He sees bold color fields and tests color dissonance to achieve remarkable new harmony. His great mentor, Geraldine Stutz, erstwhile president of Bendel's, commented that he "stretches a rainbow over the body." But Burrows' rainbow has never sought a Peter Max popularity; his rainbow is extraordinary and unexpected, juxtaposing the strongest colors.

Byblos, fall/winter 2001–02 collection. © AP/Wide World Photos.

Serviceable separates have always been a large part of Burrows' look. Even his flirtatious dresses of the 1970s, often with his characteristic lettuce edging, seem to be parts when broken by color blocks and zones. As a result, his clothing always seems unaffected and young in the tradition of American sportswear. Clinging jersey, curving lines, and offsetting of easy drape by tight cling make Burrows' clothing both comfortable and very sexy. Of his 1990 collections, the designer himself said, "The dresses are sexy. Women should have an escort when they wear them."

Like Giorgio di Sant'Angelo and, to a lesser degree, Halston, Burrows was the quintessential fashion expression of the 1970s in a disestablishment sensibility, young nonchalance, and unfailing insistence on looking beautiful. Native American themes (also explored by Sant'Angelo in 1969 and 1970), bold color fields in jersey with exposed seams as edges, and the unfinished appearance of puckered lettuce edging seemed almost careless in 1969 and 1970 when invented by Burrows, but they can also be recognized as hallmarks of a truthful, youthful culture demanding no deceit in dress and a return to basics. If Burrows never yielded the sensuality of the body, he again prefigured the last quarter of the century as the body becomes the inevitable discourse of a society freed of Victorianism only at its end. His honesty in technique is an "infra-apparel" trait, betokening a strong feeling for clothing's process, not merely a superficial result. Ricki Fulman, of the New York Daily News suggested that "you've got to have a sense of humor to understand Stephen Burrows' clothes."

If the clothing offers an immediacy and vivacity, Burrows himself and the recognition received in his twenties were a comparable phenomenon. Emerging from among the Bendel's designers in 1969, Burrows was a world-class Coty award-winning talent in the early to mid-1970s and was one of the five designers selected to represent American fashion in the epochal showing at Versailles in November 1973.

Although Burrows may have offered fresh ideas in palette and color combination, he was also sustaining a sportswear idea. Even his laced cords and snaps have affinity with Claire McCordell's germinal work. Many designers after Burrows have looked to African American, African, and Latin styles for inspiration and especially to the sexy zest he found there for his designs. Elsa Klensch argued that the name "Stephen Burrows' World" was more than a store sign. "It is his own world—a philosophy, a lifestyle, an environment," one composed of astute street observation, a lively sense of contemporary living and its impatience with rules and convention, and of a nonverbal self-communication through clothing. As much as Halston and Sant'Angelo, Burrows was the avatar of new styles accorded to a cultural transfiguration in the 1970s. Perhaps he so personified the early 1970s that his later erratic career was inevitable: we have sacrificed our fullest appreciation of him to another sexy lady he dressed, Clio.

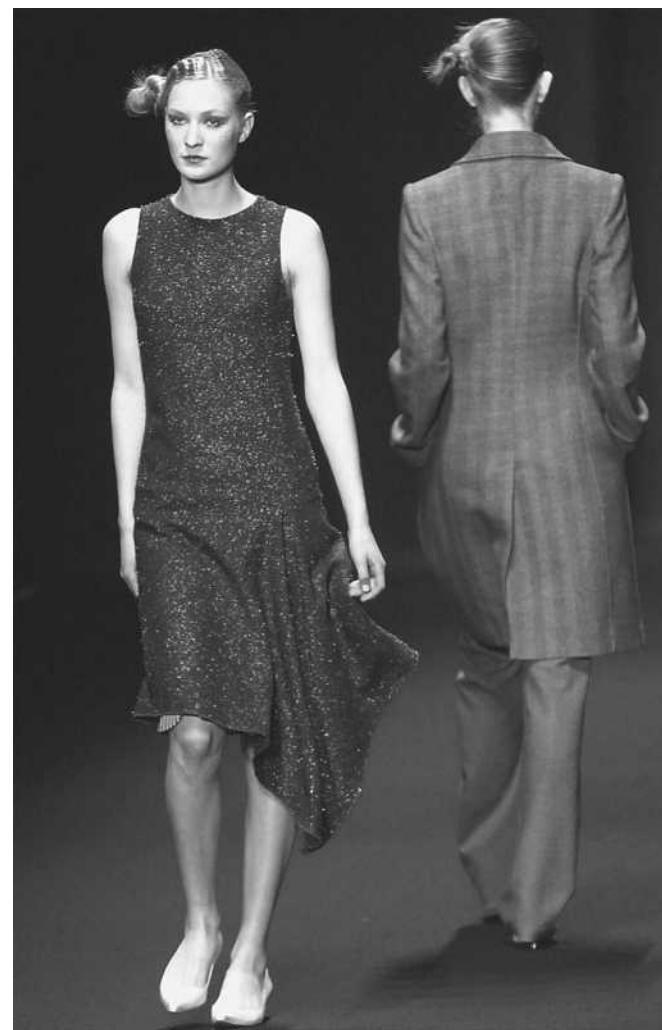

Burrows did design work for Tony Lambert Company in 1991 and Bendel in 1993, but with the departure of Stutz from Bendel's (she went on to work for Gump's in San Francisco), his visibility faded. His designer clothing, however, is considered collectible and can still be found for sale at such places as Keni Valenti Retro-Couture in New York. He currently resides in New York, and as Rubenstein said, "Whenever he has a pencil in his hand, he is always drawing," so there may be more innovations forthcoming from this fashion mogul.

—Richard Martin; updated by Daryl F. Mallett

BYBLOS

Italian fashion house

Founded: in 1973 as a division of Genny SpA. Company History: Independent company formed, circa 1983; designers have included Versace and Guy Paulin; principal designers, since 1981, Alan Cleaver and Keith Varty; collections include Byblos Uomo, 1983, Byblos USA, and Options Donna, 1985, Vis à Vis Byblos, 1986, and Byblos, fall/winter 2001–02 collection. © AP/Wide World Photos.

Options Uomo, 1988; Cleaver and Varty dismissed, 1996; Richard Tyler debuts first collection for Byblos, 1997; Tyler and Byblos end relationship, Richard Barlett takes over as creative director, 1998; Barlett leaves Byblos, 2000; Martine Sitbon hired as women's creative director and Sandy Dalal as men's creative director, 2001. Company Address: Via Maggini 126, 60127 Ancona, Italy.

PUBLICATIONS

On BYBLOS:

Articles

- Buckley, Richard, "Byblos: The Boys' Own Story," in DNR: The Magazine (New York), January 1985.
- Haynes, Kevin, "Leave It to Byblos," in Women's Wear Daily, 5 June 1985.
- Elms, Robert, "Italian Fashion: The British Connection," in the Sunday Express Magazine (London), 9 February 1986.
- Frey, Nadine, "Varty and Cleaver: Revitalizing Byblos," in Women's Wear Daily, 28 April 1987.
- Harris, Lara, "La Sera di Byblos," in Donna (Milan), October 1987.
- Phillips, Kathy, "Men of the Cloth," in You, magazine of the Mail on Sunday (London), 8 November 1987.
- Lomas, Jane, "Byblos Brits," in the Observer (London), 24 April 1988.
- Cook, Cathy, "Boys Just Wanna Have Fun," in Taxi (New York), March 1989.
- Racht, Tione, "Der Byblos Stil," in Vogue (Munich), March 1989.
- Lobrano, Alexander, "Both Sides of Byblos," in DNR, 19 June 1989.
- Ozzard, Janet, "Byblos Boys Out After 15 Years, as Milan Firm Appoints Richard Tyler," in Women's Wear Daily, 12 November 1996.
- Conti, Samantha, "Behind the Purge at Byblos," in DNR, 4 December 1996.
- Forden, Sara Gay, "Cleaver and Varty Seeking Compensation From Byblos," in Women's Wear Daily, 31 July 1997.
- Conti, Samantha, and Miles Socha, "Bartlett Already Sketching for Byblos," in Women's Wear Daily, 9 April 1998.
- Ilari, Alessandra, "Bartlett Paring Down His Steamy Side for Byblos Collection," in DNR, 26 June 1998.
- Ozzard, Janet, "Bartlett, Byblos Part Company," in Women's Wear Daily, 21 March 2000.
- Dodd, Annmarie, et al., "Bartlett to Take Front Row Seat at Byblos," in DNR, 26 June 2000.
- "Byblos Appoints Martine Sitbon as Women's Creative Director," in Women's Wear Daily, 19 March 2001.
- Brown, Wendell, "Byblos Names Sandy Dalal Creative Director," in DNR, 21 March 2001.

* * *

Byblos takes its name from a hotel in St. Tropez, France. Since its inception in 1973, it has been a kind of international grand hotel of design, starting with a group of stylists, then engaging the Milanese Gianni Versace as designer from 1975 to 1976, then Frenchman Guy Paulin, and finally Keith Varty from the Royal College of Art in Byblos, autumn/winter 2000–01 ready-to-wear collection: dress with embroidered black pearls. © AFP/CORBIS.

London via a period in Paris at Dorothee Bis with Alan Cleaver. Varty and Cleaver became the personification of Byblos objectives: a young line, international, with panache, and a carefree, optimistic nonchalance. In the 1980s, the market-acute colorful palettes and relaxed resort-influenced informality of Cleaver and Varty for Byblos became a young lingua franca in fashion for the twenty-something and thirty-something generations.

What Varty and Cleaver lacked was any sense of the sinister or cynical: they were intent upon making clothes that were fun and exuberant. Varty described their design challenge to Women's Wear Daily in 1987: "Our product has to be salable, in the right fabrics with this young image and it's got to be fresh every season." The crux of the Cleaver-Varty achievement was color—they brought Matisse colors to clothing, captured aubergines and gingers with a grocer's discrimination and knew the earth colors of every part of the globe with a geologist's imagination. The Daily News Record (11 January 1989) rightly described the menswear: "Gold at the end of the rainbow. If anyone can make color successfully commercial, it's Keith Varty and Alan Cleaver for Byblos." They were to contemporary fashion what David Hockney is to contemporary art: British travel, observation, effervescence, and childlike delight in the world's bright colors.

Travel and exoticism was an important theme in Cleaver and Varty's work, reflecting their vacationing in Marrakech, Hawaii, and the South Pacific; a recurring spirit of the American West (especially in their menswear); old-Havana machismo; and their love of tropical colors and refreshing prints inspired by Southeast Asia and South America. In 1987 resort collections, the voyage was specific, with big skirts featuring postcards from the Bahamas and maps of islands. Fiesta brights were almost invariably featured in the spring and resort collections, with options for khaki, chocolates, mud, and tobacco brown. If the spring 1987 collections seemed like the British in India, their colonialism was mellowed by supple shapes, fluid lines, and khaki silk poplin. In 1988, the trek was to Russia in a savagely romantic display of fake fur, folkloric embroidery and motifs, and grand silhouettes that Women's Wear Daily (29 February 1988) called "Anna Karenina comes to Milan."

It seemed unlikely that the sun would ever set on these two brilliant adventurers who had done so much to establish the Byblos style. Yet Byblos experienced turmoil and turnover beginning in the mid-1990s and in 1996 Varty and Cleaver were dismissed after 15 years with the company. Sales had been in decline, and the two were accused of a lack of innovation; while the remainder of the fashion industry was moving on to more sophisticated, elegant creations, they continued with the fun, colorful fashions they had been known for since the early 1980s.

Varty and Cleaver's replacement was Richard Tyler, who debuted his first Byblos collection in Milan for fall 1997. Tyler's emphasis on simplicity in his designs, along with his popularity in the U.S., where Byblos generated 10 percent of its sales at the time were two of the factors that encouraged Byblos' parent company, Genny, to hire him. Tyler, who continued to design his own label concurrently with his work for Byblos, lasted only a year and a half with the house, being replaced by John Bartlett in 1998.

Bartlett, whose first collection was for spring/summer 1999, recognized the need to stay true what he characterized as the Byblos tradition of "young, light, colorful, and thematic" clothing (Women's Wear Daily, 9 April 1998), while moving forward to embrace current design trends. Color was something the brand had gotten away from under Tyler's oversight, when minimal and monochromatic were the rule of the day. Bartlett set out "to reinvigorate and revitalize the Byblos brand without completely changing it beyond recognition," as he told Women's Wear Daily. At the same time, Bartlett had to tone down the sexiness typical of his own line, in a bow to Byblos' commercial direction.

Bartlett's short reign lasted just over a year, when he stepped down after completing the fall 2000 collections. (Byblos and Barlett simultaneously discontinued a licensing deal that had allowed Byblos to manufacture and distribute Bartlett's signature line.) Bartlett stayed on as a consultant on fashion trends for two seasons but did no hands-on designing at Byblos. An in-house design team took over, garnering lukewarm reviews for the homogeneity of their early collections. As Women's Wear Daily pointed out in October 2000, Bartlett had creative highs and lows during his tenure, but his signature style always showed through. The subsequent line, on the other hand, "lacked the singular focus that would distinguish it from a sea of others."

In March 2001, Byblos announced two new creative directors, Martine Sitbon for women and Sandy Dalal for men. Paris-based Sitbon was recognized for her use of graphic prints and according to Women's Wear Daily, "a style that blends rock 'n' roll with romance." The 24-year-old Milan-based Dalal, who planned to continue his own signature collection in addition to his work for Byblos, told DNR (21 March 2001) that he looked forward "to reinterpreting the essence of the roots from which Byblos began: playful, sexy, colorful clothes." Debut collections were expected from the designers for spring 2002.

—Richard Martin; updated by Karen Raugust

C

CACHAREL, Jean

French designer

Born: Jean Louis Henri Bousquet in Nîmes, 30 March 1932. Education: Studied at École Technique, Nîmes, 1951–54. Family: Married Dominique Sarrut, 1956; children: Guillaume, Jessica. Career: Cutter/stylist, Jean Jourdan, Paris, 1955–57; founder/director, Société Jean Cacharel, women's ready-to-wear, from 1964; children's line added, early 1970s; introduced perfume and jeans lines, 1978; cosmetics range introduced, 1991; menswear debuted, 1994; elected mayor of Nîmes; convicted on multiple corruption charges while serving as mayor, 1995–96; Cacharel headquarters moved from Nîmes to Paris, 1999; Clements Ribeiro design team signed to produce womenswear, 2000; accessories line launched, 2000; opened first "blue" décor store, Marseilles, 2001; fragrances (licensed to L'Oréal) include: Anaïs Anaïs, 1978; Cacharel pour Homme, 1981; Loulou, 1987; Eden, 1994; Loulou Blue, 1995; Eau d'Eden, 1996; Noa, 1998; Nemo, 1999. Awards: Export Trade Oscar, Paris, 1969; FiFi "Star of the Year" award for both Best New Fragrance and Best Fragrance Launch (for Noa), 1998. Address: 3 Rue du Colisée, 30931 Nîmes, France. Website: www.cacharel.com.

PUBLICATIONS

On CACHAREL:

Books

Lynam, Ruth, Paris Fashion: The Great Designers and Their Creations, London, 1972.

Articles

Manser, José, "Cacharel's Rag Trade Riches," in Design (London), October 1969.

Raper, Sarah, "Cacharel to Sell Temptation with Eden," in Women's Wear Daily, 7 January 1994.

Aktar, Alev, "Loulou Blue Looks to Youth to Color Sales," in Women's Wear Daily, 10 March 1995.

Lewis, Madeleine, "Profiles of Jean Cacharel, Gerard Pasquier and Zannier," in Textile Outlook International, May 1995.

Cooney-Curran, Joyceann, "Noa's Mystique: With a Message and Vision in Hand, Noa Takes on the U.S. Fragrance Market," in Global Cosmetics Industry, April 2000.

Weisman, Katherine, and James Fallon, "Clements Ribeiro to Do Cacharel Line," in Women's Wear Daily, 18 May 2000.

Murphy, Robert, "Catching Up with the New Cacharel," in Women's Wear Daily, 9 August 2000.

Deeny, Godfrey, "Cacharel Cashes in on Couture," available online at Fashion Windows, www.fashionwindows.com, 10 March 2001.

Murphy, Robert, "Cacharel's New Blue Horizon," in Women's Wear Daily, 15 May 2001.

Nelson, Karin, "Cacharel: Colorful & Spirited," available online at Fashion Windows, www.fashionwindows.com, 6 October 2001.

* * *

Jean Cacharel became an established designer name in the mid-1960s when his fitted, printed, and striped shirts for women became fashion "must haves"—so much so that by the end of the decade French women went into stores not asking for a shirt, but for a

Jean Cacharel, fall 2001 collection. © AP/Wide World Photos/
Fashion Wire Daily.

Jean Cacharel in ca. 1980–97. © Frédéric Huijbregts/CORBIS.

“Cacharel.” The designer had finally done for women what others had not—created a shirt that was flattering, comfortable and easy to wear.

Cacharel, Jean Bousquet, came to Paris from Nîmes in the mid-1950s, where he had apprenticed in men’s tailoring. Adopting the name of Cacharel, which was taken from the Camargue’s native wild duck, he moved into womenswear as a designer/cutter for Jean Jourdan in Paris. At the time womenswear was dominated by Parisian haute couture and mass market took a dim second place. Cacharel was one of the first designers to foresee a fashion future beyond the old-monied clientèle and catered to an emerging nouvelle riche and fashion-conscious mass market. The strong emergence of youth culture in the 1950s and 1960s strengthened his vision.

Cacharel opened his own business at the end of the 1950s and employed Emmanuelle Khanh as a stylist and designer. Together they created a company image that was very French, young, and sporty in fresh matching separates that were colorful, pretty and wearable. Success was sealed in 1965 when Cacharel began working with Liberty of London. He rescaled and recolored traditional floral prints so they became softer and more flattering. Prints previously scorned as frumpy and homely were transformed by Cacharel’s cut and taste into snappy, feminine, wearable clothes. Liberty of London subsequently stocked and sold the Cacharel label for decades.

Further developments at Cacharel included moves into licensing and distribution agreements. Cacharel’s sister-in-law, Corinne Grandval, joined the firm and helped introduce a successful mini couture line for children, which was widely copied and adapted in the industry. Cacharel’s children, Guillaume and Jessica, also joined the family business in the 1990s. Yet by the turn of the century, the Cacharel name needed a boost. Though it still represented stylish ready-to-wear for women in France and throughout Europe and Latin America, the name was recognizable only in fragrances in the United States. Setting out to crack the American market and spruce up its image, Cacharel decided to launch new versions of two of its earlier fragrances.

Cacharel’s Loulou and Eden came out in 1987 and 1994 respectively; their younger, hipper counterparts, Loulou Blue and Eau d’Eden debuted in 1995 and 1996. The introductions, however, came at difficult time for the company, as its namesake was on trial for misdeeds while the mayor of Nîmes, where the business was based. Subsequently convicted, Jean Cacharel was fined and sentenced to a year in jail, followed by a year of probation. Cacharel, the business, continued during its founder’s confinement. In 1998 came the launch of Noa, an exciting fragrance and body products line symbolizing female empowerment and spiritual harmony. Its mate, the first Cacharel men’s fragrance in almost two decades, Nemo, came out the following year.

The complementary scents, like all of Cacharel’s later fragrances, were directed at a youthful crowd complete with flashy packaging and aggressive advertising campaigns. Boldly going against the unisex fragrance trend, Cacharel’s distinctly male and female scents were a welcome hit in the U.S., which had proven resistant to earlier Cacharel fragrances (with the exception of Anaïs Anaïs which had been an enduring success). While Noa brought the Cacharel name to the forefront of the fragrance industry, with mega sales worldwide, Cacharel’s womenswear was bolstered with arrival of the Clements Ribeiro design team in 2000. Husband-and-wife team Suzanne Clements and Inacio Ribeiro’s ready-to-wear collections in 2000 and 2001 were warmly received. While the duo continued to design under their own label as well as at Cacharel, Clements commented to Women’s Wear Daily in August 2000, “Now we can be more whimsical and extreme with Clements Ribeiro. Cacharel, on the other hand, is more grounded in reality. It is more simple and has pieces, like suits, that we wouldn’t do for our own line, but that are important for Cacharel because it is a full collection with an economic reality.”

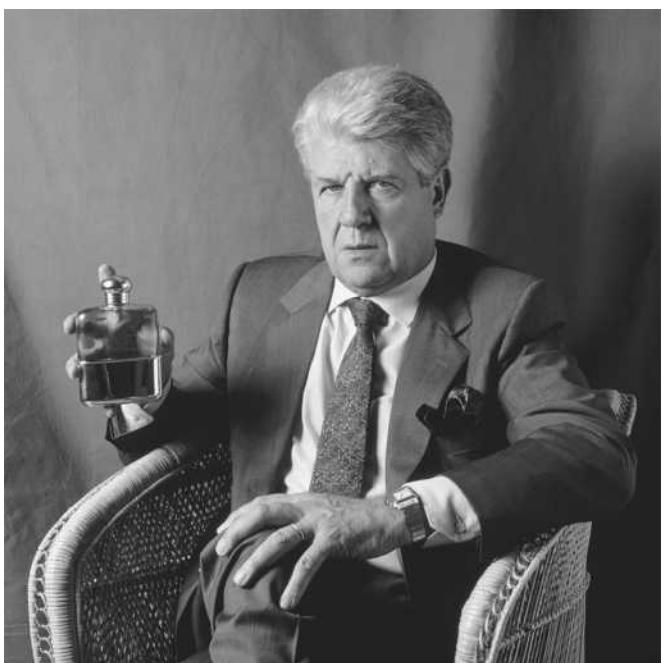

Under the artistic direction of Clements and Ribeiro, the 40-year-old house of Cacharel was in good hands. The company’s founder, Jean Cacharel said, “Clements and Ribeiro have tapped into the true Cacharel spirit. The line is about creative pieces that can be easily mixed and matched—all at an affordable price.” In addition to reinvigorating its ready-to-wear and other clothing collections, Cacharel introduced matching accessories and opened a new store in Marseilles in 2001. The new décor, almost completely outfitted in various shades of blue, was another step in redefining Cacharel worldwide, with the remainder of firm’s shops slated for renovation in 2001 and 2002.

—Kevin Almond; updated by Owen James

CALUGI E GIANNELLI

Italian design house

Founded: in Florence, 1982, by Mauro Calugi (born 1941) and Danilo Giannelli (1957–1987). Company History: Incorporated, 1984; renamed Danilo Giannelli, SpA, circa 1987; principal designer, Mauro Calugi. Exhibitions: Pitti Immagine Uoma, Fortezza da Basso, Florence, 1985; A Dress Beyond Fashion, Palazzo Fortuny, Venice, 1991. Awards: Ecco L’Italia (New York), 1985. Company Address: Via Catalani 28—Zona Industriale Bassa, 50050 Cerreto Guidi, Florence, Italy.

Jean Cacharel in ca. 1980–97. © Frédéric Huijbregts/CORBIS.

“Cacharel.” The designer had finally done for women what others had not—created a shirt that was flattering, comfortable and easy to wear.

Cacharel, Jean Bousquet, came to Paris from Nîmes in the mid-1950s, where he had apprenticed in men’s tailoring. Adopting the name of Cacharel, which was taken from the Camargue’s native wild duck, he moved into womenswear as a designer/cutter for Jean Jourdan in Paris. At the time womenswear was dominated by Parisian haute couture and mass market took a dim second place. Cacharel was one of the first designers to foresee a fashion future beyond the old-monied clientèle and catered to an emerging nouvelle riche and fashion-conscious mass market. The strong emergence of youth culture in the 1950s and 1960s strengthened his vision.

Cacharel opened his own business at the end of the 1950s and employed Emmanuelle Khanh as a stylist and designer. Together they created a company image that was very French, young, and sporty in fresh matching separates that were colorful, pretty and wearable. Success was sealed in 1965 when Cacharel began working with Liberty of London. He rescaled and recolored traditional floral prints so they became softer and more flattering. Prints previously scorned as frumpy and homely were transformed by Cacharel’s cut and taste into snappy, feminine, wearable clothes. Liberty of London subsequently stocked and sold the Cacharel label for decades.

Further developments at Cacharel included moves into licensing and distribution agreements. Cacharel’s sister-in-law, Corinne Grandval, joined the firm and helped introduce a successful mini couture line for children, which was widely copied and adapted in the industry. Cacharel’s children, Guillaume and Jessica, also joined the family business in the 1990s. Yet by the turn of the century, the Cacharel name needed a boost. Though it still represented stylish ready-to-wear for women in France and throughout Europe and Latin America, the name was recognizable only in fragrances in the United States. Setting out to crack the American market and spruce up its image, Cacharel decided to launch new versions of two of its earlier fragrances.

Cacharel’s Loulou and Eden came out in 1987 and 1994 respectively; their younger, hipper counterparts, Loulou Blue and Eau d’Eden debuted in 1995 and 1996. The introductions, however, came at difficult time for the company, as its namesake was on trial for misdeeds while the mayor of Nîmes, where the business was based. Subsequently convicted, Jean Cacharel was fined and sentenced to a year in jail, followed by a year of probation. Cacharel, the business, continued during its founder’s confinement. In 1998 came the launch of Noa, an exciting fragrance and body products line symbolizing female empowerment and spiritual harmony. Its mate, the first Cacharel men’s fragrance in almost two decades, Nemo, came out the following year.

The complementary scents, like all of Cacharel’s later fragrances, were directed at a youthful crowd complete with flashy packaging and aggressive advertising campaigns. Boldly going against the unisex fragrance trend, Cacharel’s distinctly male and female scents were a welcome hit in the U.S., which had proven resistant to earlier Cacharel fragrances (with the exception of Anaïs Anaïs which had been an enduring success). While Noa brought the Cacharel name to the forefront of the fragrance industry, with mega sales worldwide, Cacharel’s womenswear was bolstered with arrival of the Clements Ribeiro design team in 2000. Husband-and-wife team Suzanne Clements and Inacio Ribeiro’s ready-to-wear collections in 2000 and 2001 were warmly received. While the duo continued to design under their own label as well as at Cacharel, Clements commented to Women’s Wear Daily in August 2000, “Now we can be more whimsical and extreme with Clements Ribeiro. Cacharel, on the other hand, is more grounded in reality. It is more simple and has pieces, like suits, that we wouldn’t do for our own line, but that are important for Cacharel because it is a full collection with an economic reality.”

Under the artistic direction of Clements and Ribeiro, the 40-year-old house of Cacharel was in good hands. The company’s founder, Jean Cacharel said, “Clements and Ribeiro have tapped into the true Cacharel spirit. The line is about creative pieces that can be easily mixed and matched—all at an affordable price.” In addition to reinvigorating its ready-to-wear and other clothing collections, Cacharel introduced matching accessories and opened a new store in Marseilles in 2001. The new décor, almost completely outfitted in various shades of blue, was another step in redefining Cacharel worldwide, with the remainder of firm’s shops slated for renovation in 2001 and 2002.

—Kevin Almond; updated by Owen James

CALUGI E GIANNELLI

Italian design house

Founded: in Florence, 1982, by Mauro Calugi (born 1941) and Danilo Giannelli (1957–1987). Company History: Incorporated, 1984; renamed Danilo Giannelli, SpA, circa 1987; principal designer, Mauro Calugi. Exhibitions: Pitti Immagine Uoma, Fortezza da Basso, Florence, 1985; A Dress Beyond Fashion, Palazzo Fortuny, Venice, 1991. Awards: Ecco L’Italia (New York), 1985. Company Address: Via Catalani 28—Zona Industriale Bassa, 50050 Cerreto Guidi, Florence, Italy.

PUBLICATIONSOn CALUGI E GIANNELLI:*Articles

Macchia, Susanna, "Calugi e Giannelli—Look Lunare All'insegna della Comodità," available online at Moda Online, www.modaonline.it, November 2001.

* * *

Since beginning in 1982, Calugi e Giannelli has invented and reinvented clothing—menswear in particular—as if it were conceptual art. Arguably, Calugi e Giannelli clothing is an advanced art of the idea, often conveying avant-garde principles, frequently invoking and investing language and word play, and always bringing an edge to clothing. Formal properties matter, especially as they are developed from the properties of fabrics and fabric technology, most notably stretch, but the essence of a Calugi e Giannelli garment is its idea, or what 1993 press materials described as "ironic temperament, a strong core and decisive taste."

As playful as the Milanese Franco Moschino and as avant-gardist at the Parisian Jean-Paul Gaultier, Calugi e Giannelli's erudite conceptualism is accompanied by an equally strong sense of sensuality. Transparency applied to textiles and the body becomes a tour de force of ideas, but it also serves as a grand tour of erogenous zones. Pop Art is remembered, especially in the spring/summer 1991 collection, but when labels end up on tight swimwear and biker shorts, the equation of sex and consumption is only heightened. Both the Church and masculinity are special targets of Calugi e Giannelli satire and wit. A leitmotif of the collections is an interest in clerical dress subverted to secular clothing, with crosses and vestment details appearing again and again with schoolboy irreverence. Studded leather jackets are an over-the-top machismo that can only be interpreted as tongue-in-cheek. Calugi e Giannelli's work is always winning and not subject to the tiresome jokes of some sportswear—it is a fashion animated by fresh ideas and interpretive energy.

Learned and yet fun referencing to both dollar signs and the hammer and sickle (spring/summer 1989), Arab motifs and script (spring/summer 1991), mocking motifs of ecclesiastical hats (fall/winter 1988–89), Tahiti and tattoos (spring/summer 1993), and tough biker leathers (fall/winter 1993–94) establish clothing as a widely referential, all-encompassing art. Singularly characteristic of the design's sartorial surrealism is the fall/winter 1988–89 anamorphic jacket with two lapels in which the exterior and interior, jacket and waistcoat, shell and marrow are purposely confused with resulting asymmetry and winsome disorder. A spring/summer 1988 double-collared shirt plays with the same uncertainties of the doppelganger. Art-like in its proposition, knowledgeable in its deliberate discords (snakeskin and lace together in spring/summer 1989), supremely sexy in its orientation, Calugi e Giannelli clothing sets a distinctive style in menswear.

While partner Danilo Giannelli died in 1987, the sensibility continued by Mauro Calugi was seamless with the design duo's original objectives. Clothing is subject to aesthetic consideration. The fall/winter 1988–89 collection included a series of jackets with barbed wire motifs, introducing faux barbed wire at the shoulders or around the waist. In the seeming disparity of soft clothing and the fictive brutalism of barbed wire, Calugi e Giannelli displayed characteristic wit and irrepressible irony. In the same season, the "Violent Angels" leather jacket set metal plates with letters in continuous reading on a leather jacket: its diction is the continuous language of computer input; its effect is to put language onto the supposedly inarticulate form of the leather jacket. By such paradox, Calugi e Giannelli offers contradiction and incongruity about clothing, but also with an ideal of harmony and reconciliation. Even the language of the "Violent Angels" title, suggests the combination of the ferocious and the chaste.

Despite heady artistic purpose, Calugi e Giannelli clothing is well made and is never wearable art or craft. The interest in the basic templates of clothing arises in part from the preference in silhouettes for standard types, perfectly executed, and the knits and performance sportswear have the integrity of quality clothing. Detailing of embroidered suits, knit jackets with representational scenes, and sweaters with a range of illustration and image are consummately made; the lace t-shirts and jackets, and the tailored clothing with sudden apertures, have been copied in expensive and inferior versions, but the Calugi e Giannelli originals are beautifully made. The spring/summer 1988 block cutouts with sheer panels are a body peek-a-boo inflected with the design language of Piet Mondrian or Mark Rothko.

Menswear is the forum for Calugi e Giannelli ideas, though womenswear has also been produced. In the later 1990s the firm produced collections harking back to the 1970s with long woolen coats, funky midriff-baring tees, mohair or black acetate shirts, and long jackets. The style was at once derivative and new, mod and hip yet only for a particularly daring male. Perhaps menswear's accustomed reserve from fashion controversy and aggressive aesthetics lends itself to Calugi e Giannelli's definitive work. Mauro Calugi's insistence that fashion is an art of compelling dissent and dissonance is a significant social and personal statement.

—Richard Martin

CAPELLINO, Ally

See ALLY CAPELLINO

CAPUCCI, Roberto

Italian designer

Born: Rome, 2 December 1930. Education: Attended Liceo Artistico and Accademia di Belle Arti, Rome, 1947–50. Career: Assisted designer Emilio Schuberth before opening first studio, Via Sistina, in Rome, 1950; opened Paris studio, rue Cambon, 1962–68; launched first fragrance, for men, Capucci, 1965; returned to Rome and opened Via Gregoriana studio, 1968; designed costumes for Pasolini's film Teorema, 1970; first fragrance for women, Yendi de Capucci, 1974; designed costumes for opera Norma, 1976, in Verona; designed occasional fashion collections, from 1982; second women's fragrance, Capucci de Capucci, 1987. Exhibitions: Variété de la Mode 1786–1986, Münchener Stadtmuseum, Munich, July 1986; 60 Years of Italian Cultural Life, Columbia University, New York and Palazzo Venezia, Rome, 1986–87; Fashion and Surrealism, Victoria & Albert Museum, London, 1988; Roberto Capucci: Art in Fashion—Volume, Colour and Method, Palazzo Strozzi, Florence and Stadtmuseum, Munich, 1990 and at the Palazzo delle Esposizioni in Rome, late 1990s; Roben wie Rüstungen, Kunsthistorisches Museum, Vienna, 1997.

PUBLICATIONSOn CALUGI E GIANNELLI:*Articles

Macchia, Susanna, "Calugi e Giannelli—Look Lunare All'insegna della Comodità," available online at Moda Online, www.modaonline.it, November 2001.

* * *

Since beginning in 1982, Calugi e Giannelli has invented and reinvented clothing—menswear in particular—as if it were conceptual art. Arguably, Calugi e Giannelli clothing is an advanced art of the idea, often conveying avant-garde principles, frequently invoking and investing language and word play, and always bringing an edge to clothing. Formal properties matter, especially as they are developed from the properties of fabrics and fabric technology, most notably stretch, but the essence of a Calugi e Giannelli garment is its idea, or what 1993 press materials described as "ironic temperament, a strong core and decisive taste."

As playful as the Milanese Franco Moschino and as avant-gardist at the Parisian Jean-Paul Gaultier, Calugi e Giannelli's erudite conceptualism is accompanied by an equally strong sense of sensuality. Transparency applied to textiles and the body becomes a tour de force of ideas, but it also serves as a grand tour of erogenous zones. Pop Art is remembered, especially in the spring/summer 1991 collection, but when labels end up on tight swimwear and biker shorts, the equation of sex and consumption is only heightened. Both the Church and masculinity are special targets of Calugi e Giannelli satire and wit. A leitmotif of the collections is an interest in clerical dress subverted to secular clothing, with crosses and vestment details appearing again and again with schoolboy irreverence. Studded leather jackets are an over-the-top machismo that can only be interpreted as tongue-in-cheek. Calugi e Giannelli's work is always winning and not subject to the tiresome jokes of some sportswear—it is a fashion animated by fresh ideas and interpretive energy.

Learned and yet fun referencing to both dollar signs and the hammer and sickle (spring/summer 1989), Arab motifs and script (spring/summer 1991), mocking motifs of ecclesiastical hats (fall/winter 1988–89), Tahiti and tattoos (spring/summer 1993), and tough biker leathers (fall/winter 1993–94) establish clothing as a widely referential, all-encompassing art. Singularly characteristic of the design's sartorial surrealism is the fall/winter 1988–89 anamorphic jacket with two lapels in which the exterior and interior, jacket and waistcoat, shell and marrow are purposely confused with resulting asymmetry and winsome disorder. A spring/summer 1988 double-collared shirt plays with the same uncertainties of the doppelganger. Art-like in its proposition, knowledgeable in its deliberate discords (snakeskin and lace together in spring/summer 1989), supremely sexy in its orientation, Calugi e Giannelli clothing sets a distinctive style in menswear.

While partner Danilo Giannelli died in 1987, the sensibility continued by Mauro Calugi was seamless with the design duo's original objectives. Clothing is subject to aesthetic consideration. The fall/winter 1988–89 collection included a series of jackets with barbed wire motifs, introducing faux barbed wire at the shoulders or around the waist. In the seeming disparity of soft clothing and the fictive brutalism of barbed wire, Calugi e Giannelli displayed characteristic wit and irrepressible irony. In the same season, the "Violent Angels" leather jacket set metal plates with letters in continuous reading on a leather jacket: its diction is the continuous language of computer input; its effect is to put language onto the supposedly inarticulate form of the leather jacket. By such paradox, Calugi e Giannelli offers contradiction and incongruity about clothing, but also with an ideal of harmony and reconciliation. Even the language of the "Violent Angels" title, suggests the combination of the ferocious and the chaste.

Despite heady artistic purpose, Calugi e Giannelli clothing is well made and is never wearable art or craft. The interest in the basic templates of clothing arises in part from the preference in silhouettes for standard types, perfectly executed, and the knits and performance sportswear have the integrity of quality clothing. Detailing of embroidered suits, knit jackets with representational scenes, and sweaters with a range of illustration and image are consummately made; the lace t-shirts and jackets, and the tailored clothing with sudden apertures, have been copied in expensive and inferior versions, but the Calugi e Giannelli originals are beautifully made. The spring/summer 1988 block cutouts with sheer panels are a body peek-a-boo inflected with the design language of Piet Mondrian or Mark Rothko.

Menswear is the forum for Calugi e Giannelli ideas, though womenswear has also been produced. In the later 1990s the firm produced collections harking back to the 1970s with long woolen coats, funky midriff-baring tees, mohair or black acetate shirts, and long jackets. The style was at once derivative and new, mod and hip yet only for a particularly daring male. Perhaps menswear's accustomed reserve from fashion controversy and aggressive aesthetics lends itself to Calugi e Giannelli's definitive work. Mauro Calugi's insistence that fashion is an art of compelling dissent and dissonance is a significant social and personal statement.

—Richard Martin

CAPELLINO, Ally

See ALLY CAPELLINO

CAPUCCI, Roberto

Italian designer

Born: Rome, 2 December 1930. Education: Attended Liceo Artistico and Accademia di Belle Arti, Rome, 1947–50. Career: Assisted designer Emilio Schuberth before opening first studio, Via Sistina, in Rome, 1950; opened Paris studio, rue Cambon, 1962–68; launched first fragrance, for men, Capucci, 1965; returned to Rome and opened Via Gregoriana studio, 1968; designed costumes for Pasolini's film Teorema, 1970; first fragrance for women, Yendi de Capucci, 1974; designed costumes for opera Norma, 1976, in Verona; designed occasional fashion collections, from 1982; second women's fragrance, Capucci de Capucci, 1987. Exhibitions: Variété de la Mode 1786–1986, Münchener Stadtmuseum, Munich, July 1986; 60 Years of Italian Cultural Life, Columbia University, New York and Palazzo Venezia, Rome, 1986–87; Fashion and Surrealism, Victoria & Albert Museum, London, 1988; Roberto Capucci: Art in Fashion—Volume, Colour and Method, Palazzo Strozzi, Florence and Stadtmuseum, Munich, 1990 and at the Palazzo delle Esposizioni in Rome, late 1990s; Roben wie Rüstungen, Kunsthistorisches Museum, Vienna, 1997.

Design by Roberto Capucci, ca. 1980–97. © Massimo Listri/CORBIS.

1991; La Biennale di Venezia, Centenary 1895–1995, Venice, 1995; In difesa della bellezza, Palazzo della Pilotta, Parma, 1996; L'elogio della bellezza—Roberto Capucci alla Galleria di Palazzo Colonna, Rome, 2000. Awards: Medaglione d'Oro, Venice, 1956; Filene's Fashion Oscar, Boston, 1958; honoured by the Austrian Minister of Culture 1990. Address: Via Gregoriana 56, Rome, Italy.

PUBLICATIONS

By CAPUCCI:

Books

Roberto Capucci: L'arte nella moda—colore, volume, metodo [exhibition catalogue], Fabbri Editore, 1990.

Roberto Capucci: Roben wie Rüstungen [exhibition catalogue], Vienna, 1991.

Roberto Capucci: Testo Italiano = Texte Français = English Text, with Patrick Mauriès and Massimo Listri, Milan, 1993.

Roberto Capucci: I percorsi della creatività [exhibition catalogue], with Massimo Ferretti, Rome, 1994.

Roberto Capucci al Teatro Farnese [exhibition catalogue], with Lucia Fornari Schianchi, Rome, 1996.

L'elogio della bellezza—Roberto Capucci alla Galleria di Palazzo Colonna [exhibition catalogue], Rome, 2000.

On CAPUCCI:

Books

Lambert, Eleanor, World of Fashion: People, Places, Resources, New York & London, 1976.

Alfonsi, Maria-Vittoria, Leaders in Fashion: i grandi personaggi della moda, Bologna, 1983.

Relang, Regina, 30 anni di moda, Milan, 1983.

Milbank, Caroline Rennolds, Couture: The Great Designers, New York, 1985.

Buiazzi, Graziella, La moda italiana, Milan, 1987.

Stegemeyer, Anne, Who's Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.

Bauzano, Gianluca, Roberto Capucci: Timeless Creativity, Milan & London, 2001.

Articles

Pivano, Fernanda, "Roma alta moda: Roberto Capucci," in Vogue (Milan), September 1985.

"Roberto Capucci: Sontuose magie di un grande alchimista," in Vogue (Milan), March 1987.

Hume, Marion, "In Love with the Frill of It All," in the Sunday Times (London), 14 January 1990.

Gastell, Minnie, "A Solitary Artist," in Donna (Milan), March 1990.

Battaglia, Paolo, "Lo scenario per gli abiti scultura," in Abitare con Arte (Italy), May 1990.

Mölter, Veit, "Die Kunst der Mode," in Parnassus (Germany), July/August 1990.

Bertelli, B., "Quando la moda è arte," in F.M.R. (Italy), September 1990.

Celant, Germano, and Massimo Listri, "Roberto Capucci," in Interview (New York), September 1990.

Vergani, Guido, "Il sofà delle muse," in Il Venerdì di Repubblica (Rome), September 1990.

Hilderbrandt, Heike, "Florenze: Art and Fashion," in Contemporanea (Vienna), November 1990.

Plener, Doris, "Roben wie Rüstungen für Große Festlichkeiten," in Die Presse (Vienna), November 1990.

Kruntorad, Paul, "Drei Wiener Schausstücke Zur Gegenwart Von Harnischen," in Der Standard (Vienna), December 1990.

Morteo, Enrico, "Il lusso come ricerca," in Domus (Milan), February 1991.

Celant, Roberto, "Capucci," in Interview, September 1991.

Wagner, Steven, "A Cut Above [Capucci]," in Town & Country, July 1994.

"Fashion Scoops," in Women's Wear Daily, 11 July 2001.

*

I first became curious about fashion as a child, when I observed, with a critical eye, the clothes worn by the women of my family. My talent for design and love of colour led me to art school, the Accademia delle Belle Arti, where I came into contact with art in its many forms.

Nature is my mentor. In my garden, quietly watching with a childlike sense of fantasy, has helped to instill in me a sense of balance and a constant search for perfection, proportion, harmony, and colour. This has given me the strength to avoid being influenced by fashion trends. Following my belief has enabled me to be true to myself, but this has meant renunciation. If my work lacks a commercial aspect, it is due not only to my desire for truth. For me, creating is a great experience and, while I would not have refused to diversify in my designs, the moment is not yet right.

Eveningwear by Roberto Capucci, modeled on the Spanish Steps in Rome during the “Donna sotto le stelle” (“Women Under the Stars”) fashion gala, 1999. © AP/Wide World Photos.

In this field, it is difficult to strike the right balance. To attempt a compromise between the will of the designer and that of the manufacturer inevitably leads to disappointment. On one side, industry takes a commercial stance; on the other the designer has an idealized view of fashion. Creating a design away from the reality of a woman, the dress has no form, it is merely a symbol.

In my continuing quest for beauty and purity, I concentrate initially on the basic form. During this phase I do not want to be influenced by outside factors, and I think in black and white. Next comes colour, in all its intensity, blending with the pencil lines and producing the effect that I am looking for—faithful to my concept and to the women I am addressing. Only today is my work understood and accepted.

Because it is a work of luxury, it may be enjoyed by a few, but by those few who have a sense for luxury rather than the desire for ostentation and opulence. Luxury does not necessarily mean money. One can, perhaps, say that luxury is an art, like painting or sculpture, with its own scheme. To be inspired by art does not mean to imitate it, nor to establish a recognizable connection with it, but almost to fall in love with it. This is the feeling of culture for clothes and fashion which, as I said before, is sadly lacking today. I am confident, nevertheless, that everyone wants to follow their own style rather than to conform.

—Roberto Capucci

* * *

One of Italy’s most gifted and imaginative couturiers, Roberto Capucci has a select following of women who appreciate his architectural creations, and have the grand occasions on which to wear them. Having a Capucci wedding dress has long been the goal of fashionable brides looking for a special sense of shape and style. Capucci is an uncommon couturier who shows infrequently, and produces only a few extraordinary designs for his clients.

The retrospective held at the Palazzo Strozzi in Florence in 1990 highlighted the variety of his genius and the sources of his art. The elegance of the 1950s shaped his concept of haute couture as an art form, and he has rigorously practiced it in this tradition. He has approached design as a form of architecture, building structures the body can inhabit, and has rejected the arbitrary dictates of what might be momentarily fashionable. Instead he deals with elements of design such as line, color, texture, and volume in a more abstract sense but always as they relate to the human body.

Capucci's sense of line can be found in the geometric planes imposed upon the body and apparent both in his sketches and the finished garments. The sketches show strong relationships with the work of the Italian Futurists, and some of his work has also been considered surrealistic. His second major source of inspiration draws from natural forms, where curvilinear volumes might refer to floral shapes while the linear, planar qualities might refer to crystalline structures. There can be no question of his mastery of the use of textiles. Crisp, lustrous silks are pleated and manipulated into moving, fluted sculptural forms; wools are cut and inlaid like mosaics. The care with which he works his materials into his humanly habitable structures ensures that they are wearable and the finished garments are true to his original concepts. Many of the textiles are a combination of silk and wool, in fabrics with the weight and resilience needed to execute his complex volumes.

Capucci's sensitivity to color, or its absence, is equally impressive. In the black and white costumes, where the linear qualities are dominant, the absence of color is used for emphasis. One series of white silk crêpe dresses from 1980 had mask-like human faces sculpted into the structure of the sleeves, pockets, or bodice front. In combination, the use of black and white served to make the spatial relationships even more effective. Instances of Capucci's dramatic use of color are usually found in his evening dresses of pleated silk taffeta. The brilliant colors, often juxtaposed in close harmonies, give added dimension to the linear effects.

The strength of Capucci's personality and his determination to remain true to his chosen art are obvious in his designs. His interest in seeking a variety of forums in which to display his work, like the many exhibitions featuring his creations, demonstrates a creative approach to establishing a context for his work. Many such opportunities have arisen in the 1990s, like his participation in the Venice at La Biennale di Venezia Centenary celebration in 1995, where Capucci was an honored guest alongside a few of his treasures. The designer surprised many in 2001, however, when it was announced he had secured financial backing and would present a new collection in Paris later in the year. A renaissance for the Italian house of Capucci was on the horizon, and the designer's devoted clients awaited his newest works of art.

—Jean Druesedow; updated by Sydonie Benét

CARDIN, Pierre

French designer

Born: Son of French parents, born in San Andrea da Barbara, Italy, 2 July 1922. Education: Studied architecture, Saint-Etienne, France.

Pierre Cardin, fall/winter 1968 collection. © AP/Wide World Photos.

Military: Served in the Red Cross, World War II. Career: Worked as a bookkeeper and tailor's cutter, Vichy, 1936–40; Apprentice, Manby men's tailor, Vichy, 1939; design assistant, working for the Madame Paquin and Elsa Schiaparelli fashion houses, Paris, 1945–46; head of workrooms, Christian Dior fashion house, Paris, 1946–50, began costume designing for films, from 1946; helping to design "New Look" in 1947; founder/director and chief designer, Pierre Cardin fashion house, Paris, from 1950, presented first collection, 1951; opened up market in Japan, 1958; first ready-to-wear collection introduced, 1959; marketed own fabric, Cardine, 1968; children's collection introduced, 1969; created Espace Cardin, 1970; special Atlanta showing, pre-Olympic Games, 1996; launched Orphee, 1998; new cultural center named for Cardin, Saint-Ouen, France, 2000; decided to sell and sought buyer for firm. Exhibitions: Pierre Cardin: Past, Present and Future, Victoria & Albert Museum, London, October–January 1990–91. Awards: Sunday Times International Fashion award (London), 1963; Dé d'Or award, 1977, 1979, 1982; named Chevalier de la Légion d'Honneur, 1983; Fashion Oscar, Paris, 1985; Foundation for Garment and Apparel Advancement award, Tokyo, 1988; named Grand Officer, Order of Merit, Italy, 1988; named Honorary Ambassador to UNESCO, 1991. Address: 82 rue Faubourg Saint-Honoré, 75008 Paris, France. Website: www.pierrecardin.com.

The retrospective held at the Palazzo Strozzi in Florence in 1990 highlighted the variety of his genius and the sources of his art. The elegance of the 1950s shaped his concept of haute couture as an art form, and he has rigorously practiced it in this tradition. He has approached design as a form of architecture, building structures the body can inhabit, and has rejected the arbitrary dictates of what might be momentarily fashionable. Instead he deals with elements of design such as line, color, texture, and volume in a more abstract sense but always as they relate to the human body.

Capucci's sense of line can be found in the geometric planes imposed upon the body and apparent both in his sketches and the finished garments. The sketches show strong relationships with the work of the Italian Futurists, and some of his work has also been considered surrealistic. His second major source of inspiration draws from natural forms, where curvilinear volumes might refer to floral shapes while the linear, planar qualities might refer to crystalline structures. There can be no question of his mastery of the use of textiles. Crisp, lustrous silks are pleated and manipulated into moving, fluted sculptural forms; wools are cut and inlaid like mosaics. The care with which he works his materials into his humanly habitable structures ensures that they are wearable and the finished garments are true to his original concepts. Many of the textiles are a combination of silk and wool, in fabrics with the weight and resilience needed to execute his complex volumes.

Capucci's sensitivity to color, or its absence, is equally impressive. In the black and white costumes, where the linear qualities are dominant, the absence of color is used for emphasis. One series of white silk crêpe dresses from 1980 had mask-like human faces sculpted into the structure of the sleeves, pockets, or bodice front. In combination, the use of black and white served to make the spatial relationships even more effective. Instances of Capucci's dramatic use of color are usually found in his evening dresses of pleated silk taffeta. The brilliant colors, often juxtaposed in close harmonies, give added dimension to the linear effects.

The strength of Capucci's personality and his determination to remain true to his chosen art are obvious in his designs. His interest in seeking a variety of forums in which to display his work, like the many exhibitions featuring his creations, demonstrates a creative approach to establishing a context for his work. Many such opportunities have arisen in the 1990s, like his participation in the Venice at La Biennale di Venezia Centenary celebration in 1995, where Capucci was an honored guest alongside a few of his treasures. The designer surprised many in 2001, however, when it was announced he had secured financial backing and would present a new collection in Paris later in the year. A renaissance for the Italian house of Capucci was on the horizon, and the designer's devoted clients awaited his newest works of art.

—Jean Druesedow; updated by Sydonie Benét

CARDIN, Pierre

French designer

Born: Son of French parents, born in San Andrea da Barbara, Italy, 2 July 1922. Education: Studied architecture, Saint-Etienne, France.

Pierre Cardin, fall/winter 1968 collection. © AP/Wide World Photos.

Military: Served in the Red Cross, World War II. Career: Worked as a bookkeeper and tailor's cutter, Vichy, 1936–40; Apprentice, Manby men's tailor, Vichy, 1939; design assistant, working for the Madame Paquin and Elsa Schiaparelli fashion houses, Paris, 1945–46; head of workrooms, Christian Dior fashion house, Paris, 1946–50, began costume designing for films, from 1946; helping to design "New Look" in 1947; founder/director and chief designer, Pierre Cardin fashion house, Paris, from 1950, presented first collection, 1951; opened up market in Japan, 1958; first ready-to-wear collection introduced, 1959; marketed own fabric, Cardine, 1968; children's collection introduced, 1969; created Espace Cardin, 1970; special Atlanta showing, pre-Olympic Games, 1996; launched Orphee, 1998; new cultural center named for Cardin, Saint-Ouen, France, 2000; decided to sell and sought buyer for firm. Exhibitions: Pierre Cardin: Past, Present and Future, Victoria & Albert Museum, London, October–January 1990–91. Awards: Sunday Times International Fashion award (London), 1963; Dé d'Or award, 1977, 1979, 1982; named Chevalier de la Légion d'Honneur, 1983; Fashion Oscar, Paris, 1985; Foundation for Garment and Apparel Advancement award, Tokyo, 1988; named Grand Officer, Order of Merit, Italy, 1988; named Honorary Ambassador to UNESCO, 1991. Address: 82 rue Faubourg Saint-Honoré, 75008 Paris, France. Website: www.pierrecardin.com.

Pierre Cardin, spring 1968 collection: sculpted silver necklace with a $60,000 diamond built into the halter top of a crêpe evening gown.
© AP/Wide World Photos.

PUBLICATIONS

On CARDIN:

Books

- Picken, Mary Brooks, and Dora L. Miller, Dressmakers of France, New York, 1956.
- Bender, Marylin, The Beautiful People, New York, 1967.
- Lyman, Ruth, ed., Couture: An Illustrated History of the Great Paris Designers and Their Creations, New York, 1972.
- Carter, Ernestine, Magic Names of Fashion, London, 1980.
- Pierre Cardin* [exhibition catalogue], Tokyo, 1982.
- Milbank, Caroline Rennolds, Couture: The Great Designers, New York, 1985.
- Guillen, Pierre-Yves, and Jacqueline Claude, The Golden Thimble: French Haute Couture, Paris, 1990.
- Mendes, Valerie, Pierre Cardin: Past, Present, Future, London, 1990, 1991.
- Morais, Richard, Pierre Cardin: The Man Who Became a Label, London, 1991.

Articles

- Parinaud, A., "Cardin Interviewed," in Arts (Paris), 11 September 1981.
- Corbett, Patricia, "All About Cardin," in Connoisseur (London), January 1986.
- Beurdley, Laurence, "Pierre Cardin fête ses quarante ans de création," in L'Officiel (Paris), May 1990.
- Milbank, Caroline Rennolds, "Pierre Cardin," in Vogue, September 1990.
- Watt, Judith, "The World According to Pierre Cardin," in The Guardian (London), 24 September 1990.
- Etherington-Smith, Meredith, "Pierre Pressure," in Correspondent Magazine (London), 30 September 1990.
- Bowles, Hamish, "Pierre the Great," in Harpers & Queen (London), October 1990.
- McDowell, Colin, "The Pierre Show," in the Daily Telegraph (London), 6 October 1990.
- Rambali, Paul, "Pierre Cardin," in Arena (London), November 1990.
- Niland, Seta, "Cardin Seeks to Widen Profile," in Fashion Weekly (London), 6 June 1991.
- Pogoda, Dianne M., "Cardin Collection: Coming to America," in Women's Wear Daily, 24 March 1992.
- "Pierre Cardin Shows Collection in Atlanta," in Women's Wear Daily, 16 July 1996.
- Raper, Sarah, "Cardin Looks to Future of Firm," in Women's Wear Daily, 17 March 1999.
- Menkes, Suzy, "Fifty Years a Futurist," in the International Herald Tribune, 18 April 2000.
- "Pierre Cardin Denies Reports (to Split Up Business)," in Women's Wear Daily, 5 December 2000.

* * *

The shrewd entrepreneurial skills displayed by Pierre Cardin throughout his career have made him one of the world's wealthiest fashion designers and a household name. A global phenomenon, he was the first designer to open up markets in Japan in 1958, China in 1978, and more recently Russia and Romania, applying the Cardin name to hundreds of products, from ties and alarm clocks to linens and frying pans.

Cardin was the first designer to understand the potential of the business of fashion. His move into ready-to-wear in 1959 scandalized the Chambre Syndicale, the monitoring body of haute couture in Paris, and he was expelled from its ranks for what was essentially an attempt to make designer clothes more accessible, and also displaying an astute sense of where the real money to be made in fashion lay.

From his earliest work for the House of Dior up to the 1950s, Cardin displayed an interest in the sculptural qualities of cut and construction that are still his trademarks in the 1990s and into the 2000s. Cardin produces garments of a hard-edged minimalism, backed up by exquisite tailoring he manipulates to produce sparse, geometric garments offset by collars and bizarre accessories (such as the vinyl torso decoration he introduced in 1968). His designs resist the rounded curves of the traditional female body, aided by his use of materials such as heavyweight wool and jersey rib, creating clothing that stands away from the body thereby produces its own structural outline. From the balloon dress of 1959 that delineated the body only at the pull of a drawstring at the hem, through the geometrically blocked shifts of the 1960s to his series of hooped dresses in the 1980s, Cardin obliquely describes the underlying form of the body, creating planes that intersect with, yet somehow remain disconnected from, the body itself.

Pierre Cardin, spring 2000 collection. © AFP/CORBIS.

Cardin's embrace of science and technology, together with the notion of progress was expressed in his 1964 Space Age Collection, which featured white knitted catsuits, tabards worn over leggings, tubular dresses, and his growing interest in manmade fibres. He created his own fabric, Cardine, in 1968, a bonded, uncrushable fiber incorporating raised geometric patterns.

Cardin's curiously asexual designs for women in the 1960s remained so even when making direct reference to the breast by the use of cones, outlines, cutouts, and molding. Similarly, the exposure of the legs afforded by his minis was desexed by the models wearing thick opaque or patterned tights and thigh-high boots. Experiments with the application of paper cutout techniques to fabric with which Cardin was preoccupied in the 1960s were replaced in the 1970s by more fluid materials such as single angora jersey and the techniques of sunray and accordion pleating. A spiraling rather than geometric line began to be more noticeable and Cardin became renowned for his frothy evening dresses of layered, printed chiffon while continuing his experimentation with a series of unusual sleevehead designs.

Cardin was the first postwar designer to challenge London's Savile Row in the production of menswear. The high buttoned collarless jackets worn by the Beatles became de rigueur for the fashionable man in the 1960s and provided a relaxed yet elegant look when combined with a turtleneck sweater. Cardin, by paring away collars and relinquishing pockets, broke with tradition to create a new look for men realizing that the male suit, once a bastion of tradition, could be high fashion too.

Although merchandising and licensing his name may have overshadowed his influence as a fashion designer in recent years, Cardin's inventiveness and technical flair have often been underestimated. In a speech to American College students in Atlanta in July 1996, he said, "I may design everything from chairs to chocolate, but fashion is still my first love. You may do something classic, something beautiful, but that is just good taste. True talent has a bit of shock element to it; I did black body stockings 30 years ago, and everyone thought they were ugly. Now, they have become classic."

Nearing the end of the year 2000, Cardin sought a buyer for his fashion empire. He rejected overtures from French luxury giant LVMH, as well as the Gucci Group, holding out for someone he believed would not only maintain the brand's integrity but would protect his many longtime employees. "I'm not getting any younger," he told Women's Wear Daily (5 December 2000). "I don't have any heirs and I want to assure my company will continue to exist in the future. I don't need to sell; I still get up and work every day. But if I want to insure my employees' job security, I have to start planning for the future."

—Caroline Cox; updated by Sydonie Benét

CARNEGIE, Hattie

American designer

Born: Henrietta Kanengeiser in Vienna, 1889. Family: Married third husband, John Zanft, in 1928. Career: Left school at age 11 and moved with parents to New York, 1900; established as Carnegie-Ladies Hatter, 1909; opened custom dressmaking salon, 1918; offered Paris models after first buying trip to Europe, 1919; opened East 49th Street building to sell own label, imports, and millinery, 1925; added ready-to-wear, 1928; Hattie Carnegie Originals carried in stores throughout the U.S. by 1934; custom salon closed, 1965. Awards: Neiman Marcus award, 1939; Coty American Fashion Critics award, 1948. Died: 22 February 1956, in New York.

PUBLICATIONS

On CARNEGIE:

Books

Epstein, Beryl Williams, Fashion is Our Business, Philadelphia and New York, 1945.

Pierre Cardin, spring 2000 collection. © AFP/CORBIS.

that stands away from the body thereby produces its own structural outline. From the balloon dress of 1959 that delineated the body only at the pull of a drawstring at the hem, through the geometrically blocked shifts of the 1960s to his series of hooped dresses in the 1980s, Cardin obliquely describes the underlying form of the body, creating planes that intersect with, yet somehow remain disconnected from, the body itself.

Cardin's embrace of science and technology, together with the notion of progress was expressed in his 1964 Space Age Collection, which featured white knitted catsuits, tabards worn over leggings, tubular dresses, and his growing interest in manmade fibres. He created his own fabric, Cardine, in 1968, a bonded, uncrushable fiber incorporating raised geometric patterns.

Cardin's curiously asexual designs for women in the 1960s remained so even when making direct reference to the breast by the use of cones, outlines, cutouts, and molding. Similarly, the exposure of the legs afforded by his minis was desexed by the models wearing thick opaque or patterned tights and thigh-high boots. Experiments with the application of paper cutout techniques to fabric with which Cardin was preoccupied in the 1960s were replaced in the 1970s by more fluid materials such as single angora jersey and the techniques of sunray and accordion pleating. A spiraling rather than geometric line began to be more noticeable and Cardin became renowned for his frothy evening dresses of layered, printed chiffon while continuing his experimentation with a series of unusual sleevehead designs.

Cardin was the first postwar designer to challenge London's Savile Row in the production of menswear. The high buttoned collarless jackets worn by the Beatles became de rigueur for the fashionable man in the 1960s and provided a relaxed yet elegant look when combined with a turtleneck sweater. Cardin, by paring away collars and relinquishing pockets, broke with tradition to create a new look for men realizing that the male suit, once a bastion of tradition, could be high fashion too.

Although merchandising and licensing his name may have overshadowed his influence as a fashion designer in recent years, Cardin's inventiveness and technical flair have often been underestimated. In a speech to American College students in Atlanta in July 1996, he said, "I may design everything from chairs to chocolate, but fashion is still my first love. You may do something classic, something beautiful, but that is just good taste. True talent has a bit of shock element to it; I did black body stockings 30 years ago, and everyone thought they were ugly. Now, they have become classic."

Nearing the end of the year 2000, Cardin sought a buyer for his fashion empire. He rejected overtures from French luxury giant LVMH, as well as the Gucci Group, holding out for someone he believed would not only maintain the brand's integrity but would protect his many longtime employees. "I'm not getting any younger," he told Women's Wear Daily (5 December 2000). "I don't have any heirs and I want to assure my company will continue to exist in the future. I don't need to sell; I still get up and work every day. But if I want to insure my employees' job security, I have to start planning for the future."

—Caroline Cox; updated by Sydonie Benét

CARNEGIE, Hattie

American designer

Born: Henrietta Kanengeiser in Vienna, 1889. Family: Married third husband, John Zanft, in 1928. Career: Left school at age 11 and moved with parents to New York, 1900; established as Carnegie-Ladies Hatter, 1909; opened custom dressmaking salon, 1918; offered Paris models after first buying trip to Europe, 1919; opened East 49th Street building to sell own label, imports, and millinery, 1925; added ready-to-wear, 1928; Hattie Carnegie Originals carried in stores throughout the U.S. by 1934; custom salon closed, 1965. Awards: Neiman Marcus award, 1939; Coty American Fashion Critics award, 1948. Died: 22 February 1956, in New York.

PUBLICATIONS

On CARNEGIE:

Books

Epstein, Beryl Williams, Fashion is Our Business, Philadelphia and New York, 1945.

Design by Hattie Carnegie: sequined dinner ensemble. © AP/Wide World Photos/Fashion Wire Daily.

New York and Hollywood Fashion: Costume Designs from the Brooklyn Museum Collection, New York, 1986.

Milbank, Caroline Reynolds, New York Fashion: The Evolution of American Style, New York, 1989.

Steele, Valerie, Women of Fashion: Twentieth Century Design, New York, 1991.

Stegemeyer, Anne, Who's Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.

Articles

"Luxury, Inc.," in Vogue (New York), 15 April 1928.

"Profiles: Luxury, Inc.," in the New Yorker, 31 March 1934.

"Hattie Carnegie," in Current Biography (New York), October 1942.

Bauer, Hambla, "Hot Fashions by Hattie," in Collier's (Philadelphia), 16 April 1949.

"Hattie Carnegie" (obituary), in the New York Times, 23 February 1956.

* * *

For decades Hattie Carnegie's personal taste and fashion sense influenced the styles worn by countless American women. Whether they bought her imported Paris models, the custom designs, the ready-to-wear collections, or the mass market copies of her work, women welcomed Carnegie's discreet good taste as a guarantee of sophistication and propriety. Carnegie's business ability and fashion acumen enabled her to build a small millinery shop into a wholesale and retail clothing and accessory empire and made her name synonymous with American high fashion for almost half a century.

Carnegie's place in fashion history was assured not because of her own designs, but because of her talent for choosing or refining the designs of others. Between the World Wars, the list of couturiers whose models she imported included Lanvin, Vionnet, Molyneux, and Mainbocher—classic stylists—but also select creations for Chanel and Patou, Schiaparelli, and Charles James. In fact, Carnegie claimed in an April 1949 Collier's article to have had a three-year unauthorized exclusive on selling Vionnet models in the early 1920s, a few years before Vionnet started selling "to the trade."

The Custom Salon was generally considered to be the heart of the Hattie Carnegie operation, since it was with made-to-order fashion that Carnegie began. The focus of her business was to interpret European style for American consumers, but the sense of dress she chose to champion was not contained in the minutiae of design. It was instead an approach to fashion that emphasized consummate polish in every outfit. Norman Norell, who was with Carnegie from 1928 to 1940 (primarily as a ready-to-wear designer), remarked in American Fashion (New York, 1975) that he often worked from models that Miss Carnegie had brought back from Paris. He could legitimately claim, however, that he had imprinted his own signature on his designs for the firm, and it is often possible to make an informed attribution of Hattie Carnegie styles to her other designers. Certainly one gown featured in a 1939 magazine layout is recognizably the work of Claire McCordell, who spent two years with the firm. Others who worked for Carnegie were Emmett Joyce, Travis Banton, Pauline Trigère, Jean Louis, James Galanos, and Gustave Tassell.

Carnegie was already established as a taste-maker by the time she added the ready-to-wear division to her company in the 1920s. "Vogue points from Hattie Carnegie" contained her style tips and forecasts for Vogue readers. At the Hattie Carnegie salon, a customer could accessorize her day and evening ensembles with furs, hats, handbags, gloves, lingerie, jewelry, and even cosmetics and perfume—everything, in fact—but shoes.

The Carnegie customer, whatever her age, seems to have been neither girlish nor matronly, but possessed of a certain decorousness. Even the casual clothing in the Spectator Sportswear and Jeunes Filles ready-to-wear departments was elegant rather than playful. The Carnegie Suit, usually an ensemble with dressmaker details in luxury fabrics, traditionally opened her seasonal showings. She often stressed the importance of black as a wardrobe basic, both for day and evening, but was also famous for a shade known as "Carnegie blue." Perhaps Carnegie's preference for 18th-century furnishings in her home relates to the devotion to formality so clearly expressed in her business.

During World War II Carnegie was an impressive bearer of the standard of the haute couture. French style leadership was unavailable, and designs from her custom salon took pride of place in fashion magazines and on the stage, as in the original production of State of the Union by Lindsay and Crouse. Carnegie's leadership was also important to other fashion industries. She had always used fabrics from the best American textile companies, and continued to patronize specialty firms such as Hafner Associates and Onondaga Silks, which were not immersed in war work. She also used fabrics designed and hand-printed by Brook Cadwallader, and continued to do so after French materials again became available. Only after Carnegie's death did the company claim to use exclusively imported fabrics.

Design by Hattie Carnegie: sequined-studded rayon and cotton net dress and cape. © AP/Wide World Photos/Fashion Wire Daily.

Hattie Carnegie died in 1956; the fashion empire she had built survived into the 1970s, but in 1965 the custom salon was closed and the company concentrated on wholesale businesses. The informal youth culture of the 1960s and 1970s was ill-suited to the type of clothing and client that had made Hattie Carnegie's reputation. The strength of her personal identification with the company made it difficult for it to succeed without her, and it quickly lost ground to the younger designers who emerged in the 1960s.

—Madelyn Shaw

CARPENTIER, Suzie

See MAD CARPENTIER

CARVEN

French fashion house

Founded: Established by Mme. Carven Mallet in Paris, 1945;

Company History: Launched Carven Scarves and Carven Junior lines, 1955; introduced Kinglenes and Kisslenes sweater collections, 1956; neckwear collection, 1957; swimwear, 1965; furs, 1966; jewelry, Ma Fille children's line, and blouse collection, 1968; opened Monsieur Carven boutique, Paris, 1985; also designed uniforms for Air India, SAS, Aerolineas Argentinas, and Air France; merged divisions in reorganization, 1995; hired Angelo Tarlazzi as artistic director, 1995; purchased by French perfume company Daniel Harlant, 1998; Edward Achour named artistic director and designer, 1998. Fragrances include Ma Griffe, 1948, Robe d'un Soir, 1948, Chasse Gardée, 1950, Vetiver, 1957, Vert et Blanc, 1958, Madame, 1980, Guirlandes, 1982, Carven Homme, 1990, and Variations, 2001.

Exhibitions: The Grog-Carven Collection, consisting of cabinetry, Dutch and Flemish paintings, and other artwork collected by Madame Carven and her late husband, René Grog, on permanent display at the specialty firms such as Hafner Associates and Onondaga Silks, which were not immersed in war work. She also used fabrics designed and hand-printed by Brook Cadwallader, and continued to do so after French materials again became available. Only after Carnegie's death did the company claim to use exclusively imported fabrics.

Design by Hattie Carnegie: sequined-studded rayon and cotton net dress and cape. © AP/Wide World Photos/Fashion Wire Daily.

Hattie Carnegie died in 1956; the fashion empire she had built survived into the 1970s, but in 1965 the custom salon was closed and the company concentrated on wholesale businesses. The informal youth culture of the 1960s and 1970s was ill-suited to the type of clothing and client that had made Hattie Carnegie's reputation. The strength of her personal identification with the company made it difficult for it to succeed without her, and it quickly lost ground to the younger designers who emerged in the 1960s.

—Madelyn Shaw

CARPENTIER, Suzie

See MAD CARPENTIER

CARVEN

French fashion house

Founded: Established by Mme. Carven Mallet in Paris, 1945;

Company History: Launched Carven Scarves and Carven Junior lines, 1955; introduced Kinglenes and Kisslenes sweater collections, 1956; neckwear collection, 1957; swimwear, 1965; furs, 1966; jewelry, Ma Fille children's line, and blouse collection, 1968; opened Monsieur Carven boutique, Paris, 1985; also designed uniforms for Air India, SAS, Aerolineas Argentinas, and Air France; merged divisions in reorganization, 1995; hired Angelo Tarlazzi as artistic director, 1995; purchased by French perfume company Daniel Harlant, 1998; Edward Achour named artistic director and designer, 1998. Fragrances include Ma Griffe, 1948, Robe d'un Soir, 1948, Chasse Gardée, 1950, Vetiver, 1957, Vert et Blanc, 1958, Madame, 1980, Guirlandes, 1982, Carven Homme, 1990, and Variations, 2001.

Exhibitions: The Grog-Carven Collection, consisting of cabinetry, Dutch and Flemish paintings, and other artwork collected by Madame Carven and her late husband, René Grog, on permanent display at the Madame Carven in ca. 1989–99. © Photo B.D.V./CORBIS.

Louvre, since 1981; Retrospective, Paris, 1986. Awards: Chevalier de la Légion d'Honneur, 1964, Grande Medaille des Arts et Lettres, 1978; French Officer of the Legion of Honor to Madame Carven, 1996. Company Address: 6 rond-point des Champs-Elysées, 75008 Paris, France. Company Website: www.carven.fr.

PUBLICATIONS

On CARVEN:

Books

- Perkins, Alice K., Paris Couturiers and Milliners, New York, 1949.
 Bertin, Celia, Paris à la Mode, London, 1956.
 Picken, Mary Brooks, Dressmakers of France, New York, 1959.
 Black, J. Anderson, et al., A History of Fashion, London, 1980.
 Guillen, Pierre-Yves, and Jacqueline Claude, The Golden Thimble: French Haute Couture, Paris, 1990.
 Stegemeyer, Anne, Who's Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.

Articles

- "Carven Stages RTW Comeback with a Collection for Spring," in WWD, 7 August 1989.

Aillaud, Charlotte, "Madame Carven: Eighteenth Century Splendor in Her Avenue Foch House," in Architectural Digest, September 1989.

"French Fashion Designer Honored," in the Detroit News, 28 June 1997.

"Top Notes: Harlant Buys Carven," in WWD, 17 July 1998.

Costello, Brid, "Carven Updates Image with Scent," in WWD, 15 December 2000.

"Carefree on the Riviera," available online at La Mode Française, www.lamodefrancaise.tm.fr, 2001.

* * *

In 1949 when Jacqueline François sang of "Les robes de chez Carven" in her immortal song "Mademoiselle de Paris," the clothes of Madame Carven embodied all the charm, gaiety, and beauty of the city of Paris and its fabled women in the magical period after the war. The 1950s are seen as the golden age of the haute couture in Paris, and Carven is regarded as having been one of its primary practitioners. She is still designing, and although Carven's vast array of licensed products, from perfume to golfwear, have been distributed throughout the world, her name is not immediately recognized in America. Perhaps this is because she has never sought to shock or create trends or to follow the whims of fashion.

The single conceptual basis for Carven's work has always been to create beautiful clothes for all women, but in particular women of petite size: "I felt that I was small, and the contemporary taste for tall mannequins combined with my own admiration for Hollywood stars ended up giving me a complex. At the age of 25 I was a coquette. France was learning to dance again after the war and I wanted to be slinky. This desire to be attractive inspired a few reflections. First I noticed that I wasn't the only petite woman I knew, and that the grand couturiers weren't very interested in us. But I had a feeling for proportion and volume. All that remained for me to do was to create, with the help of friends who were scarcely taller than I was, dresses that would allow us to be ourselves. I'd found an opening where there was no competition and a moment when Paris was overflowing with happiness."

Carven's designs from the late 1940s through the early 1960s, while conforming to the prevailing stylistic tendencies of the period, are distinguished by the delicate decorative detail that flatters the wearer without overwhelming her. Trims at collar and cuff are frequently executed in all variations of white lace and embroidery. Occasionally, coolly plain white linen collar and cuffs assert the propriety of the wearer while enhancing an image of chic self-assurance. White on white is a recurring theme in Carven's designs, as evident in an evening dress of 1950 in which an embroidery of white fleurs de Mai completely covers a white bustier and asymmetrical long skirt, supported by a white halter and pleated underskirt. A bouffant-skirted afternoon dress with a closely fitted top from 1954 is executed in white linen subtly embroidered with white flowers, almost as if the dress were created from a fine tablecloth. Another recurring design motif is the use of fabrics and embroideries which shade from light to dark, subtly enhancing the wearer's figure and stature.

Carven was one of the first designers to promote her clothes in foreign countries, presenting her collections in Brazil, Mexico, Egypt, Turkey, and Iran. These travels greatly influenced her designs. After a trip to Egypt, she introduced a tightly-gathered type of drapery to her evening designs mimicking ancient Egyptian gowns—a 1952 design shows a bodice of sinuous gathers closely outlining the body in white jersey that, under beaded fringe at the hip reminiscent of a belly dancer's jeweled belt, breaks loose into a long flowing skirt. Another dress of 1952 is covered with an all-over design of Aztec-inspired motifs. An entire collection in 1959 was inspired by the beauties of Spain, as seen in paintings by Velazquez.

Today the Carven label can be found throughout the world as a result of extensive distribution of licensed products and especially Carven's perfume Ma Griffe, in its familiar white and green packaging. Madame Carven always includes a signature white and green dress in her collections, which, to this day, stand for a tasteful style of charm and beauty that complements the wearer no matter her proportions.

The late 1990s were a period of change for the House of Carven. In 1995 the company was reorganized, with the perfume, couture and accessories divisions merged and Angelo Tarlazzi taking over as artistic director of couture. three years later, in 1998, the Daniel Harlant Group, a French perfume firm, acquired Carven, whose financial performance was marred by a large amount of debt. Although Harlant was thought to be mainly interested in Carven's fragrance line, it focused on the house's couture activities as well, hiring Edward Achour as artistic director the same year it purchased the company. The Harlant Group also expanded Carven's licensing activity, signing a large ready-to-wear partner almost immediately. Carven is operate independently from the Harlant Group's other businesses.

Achour has emphasized the house's reputation for luxury, utilizing fabrics such as organza, lambskin, and silk to create sumptuous collections. As the website La Mode Française described it, his summer 2000 collection featured everything from sequined bikinis to a long skirt, complete with train, paired with a bra top. The collection's color palette was typically broad, focusing on Mediterranean shades from periwinkle to coral and every soft pastel shade in between.

Carven has attempted to reverse its somewhat conservative image in the fragrance category, the area for which the company is probably best known on a global basis, especially in North America. Company executives told Women's Wear Daily in December 2000 that the perfume division hoped to emulate the changes that had occurred since Achour had taken over in couture. His creations appeal to a younger consumer than Carven has historically attracted. The fragrance division began to reposition itself in the late 1990s, introducing the men's fragrance Carven Homme to target male consumers in their 30s, an unfilled niche for the house. A new women's scent, Variations, launched in 2001, was aimed at the same age bracket among females.

In terms of marketing, Carven has long supported its image by sponsoring events appealing to its upscale clientèle, including book fairs, horse races, and sailing and golf competitions. It continues this tradition today and also gives back to the fashion industry by offering grants to assist young designers just getting started.

Even without the active participation of Madame Carven since the mid-1990s, Carven maintains its haute couture image around the world. This profile is not only furthered by its seasonal collections but, perhaps even more, by a wide range of licensed luxury products, including leather goods, fragrances, jewelry, watches, pens, cognac and champagne, carpets, porcelain, furniture, corporate gifts, and uniforms. All told, more than 60 licensees market Carven branded products worldwide.

—Alan E. Rosenberg; updated by Karen Raugust

CASAGRANDE, Adele

See FENDI

CASELY-HAYFORD, Joe

British designer

Born: Ghana, 24 May 1956. Education: Trained at Tailor and Cutter Academy, London, 1974–75, St. Martin's School of Art, 1975–79, graduated 1979; studied history of art at the Institute of Contemporary Arts, London, 1979–80. Family: Married Maria Casely-Hayford, 1 August 1980. Career: Worked on Saville Row, pre-1974; designed stage outfits for rock groups and stars, including Mica Paris, Tori Amos, Neneh Cherry, Liam Gallagher, Suede, Lou Reed, and U2, from 1984; created own company, Joe Casely-Hayford Fashion, 1984; designs appeared in Derek Jarman's film Edward II, 1991;

Joe Casely-Hayford, fall/winter 2001 "Supertramp" collection.
© Reuters NewMedia Inc./CORBIS.

shows a bodice of sinuous gathers closely outlining the body in white jersey that, under beaded fringe at the hip reminiscent of a belly dancer's jeweled belt, breaks loose into a long flowing skirt. Another dress of 1952 is covered with an all-over design of Aztec-inspired motifs. An entire collection in 1959 was inspired by the beauties of Spain, as seen in paintings by Velazquez.

Today the Carven label can be found throughout the world as a result of extensive distribution of licensed products and especially Carven's perfume Ma Griffe, in its familiar white and green packaging. Madame Carven always includes a signature white and green dress in her collections, which, to this day, stand for a tasteful style of charm and beauty that complements the wearer no matter her proportions.

The late 1990s were a period of change for the House of Carven. In 1995 the company was reorganized, with the perfume, couture and accessories divisions merged and Angelo Tarlazzi taking over as artistic director of couture. three years later, in 1998, the Daniel Harlant Group, a French perfume firm, acquired Carven, whose financial performance was marred by a large amount of debt. Although Harlant was thought to be mainly interested in Carven's fragrance line, it focused on the house's couture activities as well, hiring Edward Achour as artistic director the same year it purchased the company. The Harlant Group also expanded Carven's licensing activity, signing a large ready-to-wear partner almost immediately. Carven is operate independently from the Harlant Group's other businesses.

Achour has emphasized the house's reputation for luxury, utilizing fabrics such as organza, lambskin, and silk to create sumptuous collections. As the website La Mode Française described it, his summer 2000 collection featured everything from sequined bikinis to a long skirt, complete with train, paired with a bra top. The collection's color palette was typically broad, focusing on Mediterranean shades from periwinkle to coral and every soft pastel shade in between.

Carven has attempted to reverse its somewhat conservative image in the fragrance category, the area for which the company is probably best known on a global basis, especially in North America. Company executives told Women's Wear Daily in December 2000 that the perfume division hoped to emulate the changes that had occurred since Achour had taken over in couture. His creations appeal to a younger consumer than Carven has historically attracted. The fragrance division began to reposition itself in the late 1990s, introducing the men's fragrance Carven Homme to target male consumers in their 30s, an unfilled niche for the house. A new women's scent, Variations, launched in 2001, was aimed at the same age bracket among females.

In terms of marketing, Carven has long supported its image by sponsoring events appealing to its upscale clientèle, including book fairs, horse races, and sailing and golf competitions. It continues this tradition today and also gives back to the fashion industry by offering grants to assist young designers just getting started.

Even without the active participation of Madame Carven since the mid-1990s, Carven maintains its haute couture image around the world. This profile is not only furthered by its seasonal collections but, perhaps even more, by a wide range of licensed luxury products, including leather goods, fragrances, jewelry, watches, pens, cognac and champagne, carpets, porcelain, furniture, corporate gifts, and uniforms. All told, more than 60 licensees market Carven branded products worldwide.

—Alan E. Rosenberg; updated by Karen Raugust

CASAGRANDE, Adele

See FENDI

CASELY-HAYFORD, Joe

British designer

Born: Ghana, 24 May 1956. Education: Trained at Tailor and Cutter Academy, London, 1974–75, St. Martin's School of Art, 1975–79, graduated 1979; studied history of art at the Institute of Contemporary Arts, London, 1979–80. Family: Married Maria Casely-Hayford, 1 August 1980. Career: Worked on Saville Row, pre-1974; designed stage outfits for rock groups and stars, including Mica Paris, Tori Amos, Neneh Cherry, Liam Gallagher, Suede, Lou Reed, and U2, from 1984; created own company, Joe Casely-Hayford Fashion, 1984; designs appeared in Derek Jarman's film Edward II, 1991; designed hosiery range for Sock Shop chain, London, 1991; commissioned to design clothes for ballet Very, by Jonathan Burrows, 1992; established diffusion line, Hayford, 1992; flagship boutique opened, London, 1993; freelance designer, Panchetti label, Italy, and Joseph and Top Shop chain, Britain. Exhibitions: Street Style, Victoria and Albert Museum, London, November 1994–February 1995. Address: 128 Shoreditch High Street, London E1 6JE England.

Joe Casely-Hayford, fall/winter 2001 "Supertramp" collection.
© Reuters NewMedia Inc./CORBIS.

PUBLICATIONS

By CASELY-HAYFORD:

Articles

- “Bovril Babes,” in Face (London), June 1992.
- “Year Review of Fashion,” in i-D (London), January 1993.
- “Fashion,” in Face (London), December 1993.
- “Urban Nomad,” in i-D (London), The Urgent Issue.
- “A Question of Culture,” in i-D (London), The Strength Issue.

Joe Casely-Hayford, fall/winter 2001 “Supertramp” collection.
© Reuters NewMedia Inc./CORBIS.

On CASELY-HAYFORD:

Books

- Tulloch, Carol, “Rebel Without a Pause: Black Street Style and Black Designers,” in Juliet Ash and Elizabeth Wilson (eds.), Chic Thrills, A Fashion Reader, Berkeley, CA, 1993.
- De La Haye, Amy, editor, The Cutting Edge: 50 Years of British Fashion, 1947–1997, New York, 1997.

Articles

- “New Talent,” in Harpers & Queens, September 1985.
- “Da Londra, Moda Come Provocazione: Eclectics,” in L’Uomo Vogue (Milan), December 1985.
- McCooey, Meriel, “East Side Story,” in the Sunday Times Magazine (London), 27 April 1986.
- DuCann, Charlotte, “Independent Style: Young British Design,” in Vogue (London), November 1986.
- “Shooting Stars,” in Women’s Journal (London), February 1988.
- Bain, Sally, “The New Order of Nights,” in Elle (London), December 1988.
- Profile of Joe Casely-Hayford, in Details, February 1989.
- Profile of Joe Casely-Hayford, in the Observer, 12 March 1989.
- Hochswender, Woody, “Fashion Iconoclasts Rediscover Subtleties,” in the New York Times, 2–3 April 1989.
- Samuel, Kathryn, “Designer of the Year,” in the Sunday Telegraph, 15 October 1989.
- Griggs, Barbara, “The Italian Connection,” in Vogue, May 1990.
- “Joe Casely-Hayford,” in Clothes Show (London), March 1991.
- Rodgers, Toni, “Double Vision,” in Elle (London), March 1991.
- Clarke, Adrian, “Black Panther,” in Fashion Weekly (London), 14 March 1991.
- Profile of Joe Casely-Hayford, in the Guardian, 22 April 1991.
- “Five Cut Loose (and Ties Will Not Be Worn),” in the Independent (London), 22 August 1991.
- Profile of Joe Casely-Hayford, in the Glasgow Herald, 9 October 1991.
- “Fashion Warriors Set Sights on Impact,” in the Independent (London), 17 February 1992.
- “Joe Casely’s Costume Karma,” in the Weekly Journal (London), 23 May 1992.
- Plewka, Karl, “Spotlighting Joe Casely-Hayford,” in Interview, January 1993.
- Profile on Joe Casely-Hayford, in Collezioni, January/February 1993.
- Tredre, Roger, “In the Black-White-Rock-Fashion World,” in the Independent Weekend (London), 13 February 1993.
- Schacknat, Karin, “Joe Casely-Hayford: Pure Vormals Ultieme Doel,” in Kunsten de! (Arnhem), May 1993.
- Rawlinson, Richard, “Top Shop Signs Up Joe Casely-Hayford,” in Fashion Weekly (London), 22 July 1993.
- Alford, Lucinda, “Hey, Joe!” in the Observer Review (London), 22 August 1993.
- Profile of Joe Casely-Hayford, in the Manchester Evening News, October 1993.
- Scott, Alexander, “Platform, Rusty New Ideas,” in Ticket (London), June 1994.
- Sims, Josh, “Cape Crusaders,” in the Guardian (London), 3 November 2000.

* * *

The traditional design tenets of quality fabric, attention to detail, and excellent cut underpin all of Joe Casely-Hayford's work. This is not to deny the surprise of his designs, which often have unusual details of decoration or spicy color combinations to enliven them. His clothes are for the discerning customer who wants styles to retain their appeal for more than one season. The clothes are always very contemporary in feel, though rarely following fashion fads. Although he returns to his skillful pleating and cutting of traditional wool fabrics for classic suits each season, his influences are wide ranging. He can just as stylishly redefine 1970s wide collar coats as create American Indian-style soft leather jackets.

His menswear is perhaps his perennial tour de force. Always interesting and innovative, his collections are a combination of highly desirable good quality with witty detailing. His clean-cut wool suits are given a stylish twist through pleating or cut-out lapels with curling velvet inserts, making them more individual. His designs may reveal a certain amount of anarchic license in their cut, but he is never cultish or unwearable, carefully balancing the elements in his work with his original vision to make clothes with a long life span. Even his more experimental garments, like the all-in-one suit he created in the late 1980s that looked like a two-piece from the front but had a battle-dress back, still have a beauty in their fit and the refined finish that distinguishes all his work.

Casely-Hayford, like Stephen Burrows and Ozwald Boateng, was one of the few early black designers to attain prominence in the international fashion world, and he passes his knowledge along to the next generation; one of his protégés is Walé Adeyemi. Having arrived on the wave of the exciting new art school-trained British designers that included John Richmond and John Galliano, he has also remained dedicated to increasing Britain's fashion standing on the international market. To that end, he is active in teaching future designers, lending his time and expertise to programs like the Marymount London Fashion Program, which teaches students and gives them the opportunity to intern with working designers and get hands-on experience.

Although he is part of the 5th Circle, set up in August 1991 to showcase the menswear of five homegrown designers, he is equally committed to his womenswear collection. It has the same strength of cut and clarity of design, often initiating ideas that are later taken up by others. Examples are the bra tops of his early shows that were later to flood the market; the hot-colored patchwork suede wide collar jackets, long coats, and hot pants he used that heralded the 1970s revival of the early 1990s; and the beehive hairdos he brought back in his fall 2001 show.

His clothes for women have a sexy feel, with sculpted leather waistcoats and neatly fitted suits alongside funky knitwear and simple yet sophisticated dresses, each with the usual Casely-Hayford twist marking out their design. His designs are complemented by the seasonal addition of interesting and unusual footwear created for Shelly's, the London shoe chain.

Beginning in about 1984, Casely-Hayford entered the music world, dressing such stars as Tori Amos, Black Uhuru, Neneh Cherry, The Clash, Liam Gallagher, Glamma Kid, Lynden David Hall, Mica Paris, Lou Reed, Suede, and U2 (including their two-year world tour in 1991–93), and enjoying a popularity rivaled only by Gianni and Donatella Versace. He also served as a costume designer on Derek Jarman's film Edward II (1991).

Casely-Hayford has quietly built a niche for himself in British fashion as a master of cut, and his work has also just as quietly gained an international following, especially in Japan, where his work is very popular. His clothes have the appeal of longevity while at the same time maintaining style and well-balanced beauty through the combination of each element of design, providing carefully thought-out garments that flatter the wearer with their witty detail and consistently good fit.

He has remained very active, showing collections regularly from 1998 to 2001, not only in London but from Paris to Milan and from Rome to New York. His collections in 2000–01 featured an eclectic riot of colors and fabrics, from orange and green to white and black, from solid to tie-dye, from leather to tweed, from tulle to suede, from fake fur to wool. Described alternately as conservative, cutting edge, bold, and subliminal, Casely-Hayford's designs, while remaining experimental, are still very wearable.

—Rebecca Arnold; updated by Daryl F. Mallett

CASHIN, Bonnie

American designer

Born: Oakland, California, 1915. Education: Studied at the Art Students League, New York, and also in Paris. Family: Briefly married to Robert Sterner. Career: Costume designer, Roxy Theater, New York, 1934–37; designer, Adler and Adler sportswear, New Bonnie Cashin, 1962 collection: suede and wool coat with a jersey dress. © Bettmann/CORBIS.

* * *

The traditional design tenets of quality fabric, attention to detail, and excellent cut underpin all of Joe Casely-Hayford's work. This is not to deny the surprise of his designs, which often have unusual details of decoration or spicy color combinations to enliven them. His clothes are for the discerning customer who wants styles to retain their appeal for more than one season. The clothes are always very contemporary in feel, though rarely following fashion fads. Although he returns to his skillful pleating and cutting of traditional wool fabrics for classic suits each season, his influences are wide ranging. He can just as stylishly redefine 1970s wide collar coats as create American Indian-style soft leather jackets.

His menswear is perhaps his perennial tour de force. Always interesting and innovative, his collections are a combination of highly desirable good quality with witty detailing. His clean-cut wool suits are given a stylish twist through pleating or cut-out lapels with curling velvet inserts, making them more individual. His designs may reveal a certain amount of anarchic license in their cut, but he is never cultish or unwearable, carefully balancing the elements in his work with his original vision to make clothes with a long life span. Even his more experimental garments, like the all-in-one suit he created in the late 1980s that looked like a two-piece from the front but had a battle-dress back, still have a beauty in their fit and the refined finish that distinguishes all his work.

Casely-Hayford, like Stephen Burrows and Ozwald Boateng, was one of the few early black designers to attain prominence in the international fashion world, and he passes his knowledge along to the next generation; one of his protégés is Walé Adeyemi. Having arrived on the wave of the exciting new art school-trained British designers that included John Richmond and John Galliano, he has also remained dedicated to increasing Britain's fashion standing on the international market. To that end, he is active in teaching future designers, lending his time and expertise to programs like the Marymount London Fashion Program, which teaches students and gives them the opportunity to intern with working designers and get hands-on experience.

Although he is part of the 5th Circle, set up in August 1991 to showcase the menswear of five homegrown designers, he is equally committed to his womenswear collection. It has the same strength of cut and clarity of design, often initiating ideas that are later taken up by others. Examples are the bra tops of his early shows that were later to flood the market; the hot-colored patchwork suede wide collar jackets, long coats, and hot pants he used that heralded the 1970s revival of the early 1990s; and the beehive hairdos he brought back in his fall 2001 show.

His clothes for women have a sexy feel, with sculpted leather waistcoats and neatly fitted suits alongside funky knitwear and simple yet sophisticated dresses, each with the usual Casely-Hayford twist marking out their design. His designs are complemented by the seasonal addition of interesting and unusual footwear created for Shelly's, the London shoe chain.

Beginning in about 1984, Casely-Hayford entered the music world, dressing such stars as Tori Amos, Black Uhuru, Neneh Cherry, The Clash, Liam Gallagher, Glamma Kid, Lynden David Hall, Mica Paris, Lou Reed, Suede, and U2 (including their two-year world tour in 1991–93), and enjoying a popularity rivaled only by Gianni and Donatella Versace. He also served as a costume designer on Derek Jarman's film Edward II (1991).

Casely-Hayford has quietly built a niche for himself in British fashion as a master of cut, and his work has also just as quietly gained an international following, especially in Japan, where his work is very popular. His clothes have the appeal of longevity while at the same time maintaining style and well-balanced beauty through the combination of each element of design, providing carefully thought-out garments that flatter the wearer with their witty detail and consistently good fit.

He has remained very active, showing collections regularly from 1998 to 2001, not only in London but from Paris to Milan and from Rome to New York. His collections in 2000–01 featured an eclectic riot of colors and fabrics, from orange and green to white and black, from solid to tie-dye, from leather to tweed, from tulle to suede, from fake fur to wool. Described alternately as conservative, cutting edge, bold, and subliminal, Casely-Hayford's designs, while remaining experimental, are still very wearable.

—Rebecca Arnold; updated by Daryl F. Mallett

CASHIN, Bonnie

American designer

Born: Oakland, California, 1915. Education: Studied at the Art Students League, New York, and also in Paris. Family: Briefly married to Robert Sterner. Career: Costume designer, Roxy Theater, New York, 1934–37; designer, Adler and Adler sportswear, New

Bonnie Cashin, 1962 collection: suede and wool coat with a jersey dress. © Bettmann/CORBIS.

York, 1937–43 and 1949–52; costume designer, Twentieth Century Fox, Los Angeles, California, 1943–49; designer, Bonnie Cashin Designs (with partner Phillip Sills), New York, 1953–77; established The Knittery, 1972; founder, Innovative Design Fund, circa 1981. Exhibitions: Brooklyn Museum (retrospective), 1962; Metropolitan Museum of Art, 1997; Fashion Institute of Technology (retrospective, “Bonnie Cashin, Practical Dreamer”), September 2000. Awards: Neiman Marcus award, Dallas, Texas, 1950; Coty American Fashion Critics award, New York, 1950, 1960, 1961, 1968, 1972; Sporting Look award, 1958; Philadelphia Museum College of Art citation, 1959; Woolknit Associates Design award, 1959, 1961; Lighthouse award, 1961; Sports Illustrated award, 1963; Detroit Business Association, national award, 1963; the Sunday Times International Fashion award, London, 1964; Leather Industries American Handbag Designer award, 1968, 1976; Kaufmann Fashion award, Pittsburgh, 1968; Creator citation, Saks Fifth Avenue, 1969; Mary Mount College Golden Needle award, 1970; Hall of Fame, 1972; I. Magnin’s Great American award, 1974; American Fashion award for furs, 1975; Drexel University citation, Philadelphia, 1976; inducted to Fashion Walk of Fame, Seventh Avenue, New York, 2001. Died: 3 February 2000.

PUBLICATIONS

On CASHIN:

Books

- Levin, Phyllis Lee, The Wheels of Fashion, Garden City, New York, 1965.
 Carter, Ernestine, The Changing World of Fashion: 1900 to the Present, London, 1977.
 Milbank, Caroline R., Couture: The Great Designers, New York, 1985.
New York and Hollywood Fashion: Costume Designs from the Brooklyn Museum Collection, New York, 1986.
 Maeder, Edward, et al., Hollywood and History: Costume Design in Film, New York, 1987.
 Milbank, Caroline R., New York Style: The Evolution of Fashion, New York, 1989.
 Leese, Elizabeth, Costume Design in the Movies, New York, 1991.
 Steele, Valerie, Women of Fashion, New York, 1991.
 Stegemeyer, Anne, Who’s Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.

Articles

- “Bonnie Cashin: Trail Blazer in Fashion,” in American Fabrics (New York) 1956.
 Reily, Robert, “Bonnie Cashin Retrospective,” in American Fabrics and Fashions (New York), No. 60, 1963.
 “Bonnie Cashin,” in Current Biography (New York), May 1970.
 “Round Table: Bonnie Cashin,” in American Fabrics and Fashions (Columbia, South Carolina), No. 133, 1985.
 Elliott, Mary C. “Bonnie Cashin: Design for Living,” in Threads (Newtown, Connecticut), Oct./Nov. 1990.
 Weir, June, “Natural History,” in Mirabella (New York), January 1995.
 Wilson, Eric and Janet Ozzard, “Designer Bonnie Cashin Dead at 84,” in Women’s Wear Daily, 7 February 2000.
 Obituary, in the Economist, 12 February 2000.
 Scully, James, “Cashin’ In,” in Harper’s Bazaar, July 2000.

- Wilson, Eric, “Bonnie Cashin’s Inspiration,” in Women’s Wear Daily, 18 September 2000.
 Spindler, Amy M., “Design for Living,” in the New York Times Magazine, 7 January 2001.

* * *

An awareness of the body in motion informs Bonnie Cashin’s design style. Her earliest efforts were created for dancers: as a California high school student, Cashin costumed the local ballet troupe, Franchon & Marco. After graduating from high school, she became the company’s costume designer and later, with the encouragement of the troupe’s manager, moved to New York to study dance and take classes at the Art Students’ League. Soon after moving, Cashin began making costumes for the Roxy Theater, which during the 1930s was a major competitor to Radio City Music Hall’s Rockettes. An article in Variety described Cashin as the “youngest designer to hit Broadway.” During her tenure as house costumer with the famed Roxy Theater, which she considered her “formal schooling in design,” she designed three sets of costumes a week for the Roxy’s chorus of 24 dancing showgirls. With minimal budgets, Cashin used her ingenuity, a little paint, and knowledge learned from her mother, a custom dressmaker, to transform inexpensive fabrics into striking costumes that looked equally graceful in motion or in repose. Whether for stage or street, Cashin’s work has always been styled for the active woman on the move, who prefers an easy, individual look with a minimum of fuss. The May 1970 issue of Current Biography quoted her as saying, “All I want is to speak simply in my designing; I don’t want the gilt and the glamor.”

A 1937 production number, in which the Roxy dancers emerged smartly dressed from between the pages of a fashion magazine, sent Cashin in a new direction. Louis Adler, co-owner of the sportswear firm Adler and Adler, saw Cashin’s designs and recognized her potential importance to the fashion industry. Wary of the garment district’s regimentation, Cashin initially played it safe. She stayed on in the familiar collegial world of the theater and freelanced for Adler. In 1938 Cashin left the theater to work for Adler, quickly earning a name in the ready-to-wear fashion circles. When the U.S. entered World War II, Cashin was appointed to a committee to design uniforms for the women in the armed forces. Her designs for the mass-produced uniforms were practical—they were protective, comfortable, and allowed for freedom of movement. The uniforms were made from long-lasting fabrics such as canvas and leather, featuring large pockets, toggle fastenings, and industrial-size zippers. Eventually she signed with the firm and designed for about 12 years before and after World War II.

After a brief marriage to art director Robert Sterner, and having become frustrated with the Seventh Avenue fashion scene, Cashin returned to California where she exercised her talents in a completely new arena—the motion picture industry. Cashin began working for Twentieth Century Fox in 1943, where she designed wardrobes for more than 60 films including such classics Laura, Anna and the King of Siam and A Tree Grows in Brooklyn. In 1949 Cashin returned to New York and began designing again for Adler and Adler, and the following year won both the Neiman Marcus award and the first of five Coty awards for a prototype of her signature Noh coat, an unlined, sleeved or sleeveless T-shaped coat with deeply cut armholes to wear singly, in combination, or under a poncho or cape. Despite this success, Cashin sensed she would never achieve her creative best working under contract in the profit-oriented canyons of Seventh Avenue. She began designing on a freelance basis in 1953, creating Bonnie Cashin Designs from her studio, which was located across from the Metropolitan Museum of Art. Unusual for the time, she worked on a royalty basis, creating complete coordinated wardrobes—accessories, knits, capes and coats, dresses, and separates—to be combined in layers to suit the climate or the event.

On a trip to Japan during the early 1950s, the practical aspects of the kimono, a garment consisting of a variable number of layers, was described to Cashin. In terms of the ever-changing weather, the kimono was especially appropriate for cooler temperatures or what the Japanese described as a “nine-layer day.” Upon her return to New York, Cashin “introduced” the concept of layering garments into Western fashion. Of course, people around the world had been dressing in layers to accommodate the climate for centuries, but as an obituary in the Economist explained, “Fashion writers are ever grateful for something that looks new, and for a while layering was praised as the big new idea.”

As Cashin had so aptly explained to one reporter, “fashion evolved from need.” Cashin’s unusual ideas were welcomed and she typically worked years ahead of the market, pioneering clothing concepts which today seem part of fashion’s essential vocabulary. In the 1950s when most women’s clothing was concerned with structure, the Cashin silhouette was based on the rectangle or the square and called for a minimum of darting and seaming. Cashin showed layered dressing long before the concept became a universal option; she brought canvas boots and raincoats out of the show ring and into the street in 1952 and she introduced jumpsuits as early as 1956.

Signature pieces included her Noh coats, funnel-necked sweaters whose neck doubles as a hood, classic ponchos, and such innovations as a bicycle sweater with roomy back pockets. Other Cashin hallmarks were her use of toggle closures, leather piping, and pairing various fabrics such as tweeds with tartan plaid or suede. Other notable Cashin “icons” were her leather coats and jackets made by leather manufacturer Phillip Sills. Cashin introduced handbags into her collections as far back as the 1930s, and in the early 1960s designed bags for Coach. She also created rainwear designs for Modelia and gloves for Crescendoe-Superb.

Very likely because of her early work in the theater, both color and especially texture played a starring role in Cashin’s designs. An organza Noh coat could be trimmed with linen and shown over a sweater dress of cashmere. A jersey sheath could be paired with an apron-wrap skirt cut from a boisterous tweed. Her palette was both subtle and controlled—earth tones, sparked with vivid accents. Cashin has been recognized as one of the few women fashion designers who made an impact on American fashion during a time when Parisian designers were dominant on the runway.

For several decades Cashin created a myriad of fashion items and has been identified as a pioneer of American sportswear design. In 1978 New York Times fashion writer Bernadine Morris called Cashin “an American fashion institution.” She was recognized with some two dozen awards, was a featured designer for one of Lord & Taylor’s “American Design Rooms,” and influenced fashion industry giants. Cashin professed a “profound distaste” for the fashion industry and retired in the mid-1980s. She died in February 2000 at the age of 84. Several months after her death, a retrospective of her work, entitled “Bonnie Cashin, Practical Dreamer,” was organized at New York’s Fashion Institute of Technology. The retrospective featured Cashin’s most identifiable creations along with several personal artifacts from her apartment; where she was among the first to move her work space and living space into the United Nations Plaza during the 1960s. Even before her death, many of her fashion items came to attention of collectors and in 1997 some of her clothes were exhibited at Metropolitan Museum of Art in New York City. According to the exhibit catalogue, Cashin’s designs reflected “democracy’s magnitude and the consequence of independent and intrepid women.”

Bonnie Cashin worked to her own brief, designing for women who were smart, active, self-aware, and, like herself, of independent mind.

—Whitney Blausen; updated by Christine Miner Minderovic

CASSINI, Oleg

American designer

Born: Oleg Loiewski in Paris of Russian parents, 11 April 1913. Raised in Florence; adopted mother’s family name, Cassini, 1937. Immigrated to the U.S., 1936, naturalized, 1942. Education: Attended working under contract in the profit-oriented canyons of Seventh Avenue. She began designing on a freelance basis in 1953, creating Bonnie Cashin Designs from her studio, which was located across from the Metropolitan Museum of Art. Unusual for the time, she worked on a royalty basis, creating complete coordinated wardrobes—accessories, knits, capes and coats, dresses, and separates—to be combined in layers to suit the climate or the event.

Oleg Cassini, 1958 couture collection of the New York Dress Institute: crêpe sheath cocktail dress with a deep V decolletage in chiffon over chiffon. © Bettmann/CORBIS.

On a trip to Japan during the early 1950s, the practical aspects of the kimono, a garment consisting of a variable number of layers, was described to Cashin. In terms of the ever-changing weather, the kimono was especially appropriate for cooler temperatures or what the Japanese described as a “nine-layer day.” Upon her return to New York, Cashin “introduced” the concept of layering garments into Western fashion. Of course, people around the world had been dressing in layers to accommodate the climate for centuries, but as an obituary in the Economist explained, “Fashion writers are ever grateful for something that looks new, and for a while layering was praised as the big new idea.”

As Cashin had so aptly explained to one reporter, “fashion evolved from need.” Cashin’s unusual ideas were welcomed and she typically worked years ahead of the market, pioneering clothing concepts which today seem part of fashion’s essential vocabulary. In the 1950s when most women’s clothing was concerned with structure, the Cashin silhouette was based on the rectangle or the square and called for a minimum of darting and seaming. Cashin showed layered dressing long before the concept became a universal option; she brought canvas boots and raincoats out of the show ring and into the street in 1952 and she introduced jumpsuits as early as 1956.

Signature pieces included her Noh coats, funnel-necked sweaters whose neck doubles as a hood, classic ponchos, and such innovations as a bicycle sweater with roomy back pockets. Other Cashin hallmarks were her use of toggle closures, leather piping, and pairing various fabrics such as tweeds with tartan plaid or suede. Other notable Cashin “icons” were her leather coats and jackets made by leather manufacturer Phillip Sills. Cashin introduced handbags into her collections as far back as the 1930s, and in the early 1960s designed bags for Coach. She also created rainwear designs for Modelia and gloves for Crescendoe-Superb.

Very likely because of her early work in the theater, both color and especially texture played a starring role in Cashin’s designs. An organza Noh coat could be trimmed with linen and shown over a sweater dress of cashmere. A jersey sheath could be paired with an apron-wrap skirt cut from a boisterous tweed. Her palette was both subtle and controlled—earth tones, sparked with vivid accents. Cashin has been recognized as one of the few women fashion designers who made an impact on American fashion during a time when Parisian designers were dominant on the runway.

For several decades Cashin created a myriad of fashion items and has been identified as a pioneer of American sportswear design. In 1978 New York Times fashion writer Bernadine Morris called Cashin “an American fashion institution.” She was recognized with some two dozen awards, was a featured designer for one of Lord & Taylor’s “American Design Rooms,” and influenced fashion industry giants. Cashin professed a “profound distaste” for the fashion industry and retired in the mid-1980s. She died in February 2000 at the age of 84. Several months after her death, a retrospective of her work, entitled “Bonnie Cashin, Practical Dreamer,” was organized at New York’s Fashion Institute of Technology. The retrospective featured Cashin’s most identifiable creations along with several personal artifacts from her apartment; where she was among the first to move her work space and living space into the United Nations Plaza during the 1960s. Even before her death, many of her fashion items came to attention of collectors and in 1997 some of her clothes were exhibited at Metropolitan Museum of Art in New York City. According to the exhibit catalogue, Cashin’s designs reflected “democracy’s magnitude and the consequence of independent and intrepid women.”

Bonnie Cashin worked to her own brief, designing for women who were smart, active, self-aware, and, like herself, of independent mind.

—Whitney Blausen; updated by Christine Miner Minderovic

CASSINI, Oleg

American designer

Born: Oleg Loiewski in Paris of Russian parents, 11 April 1913. Raised in Florence; adopted mother’s family name, Cassini, 1937. Immigrated to the U.S., 1936, naturalized, 1942. Education: Attended

Oleg Cassini, 1958 couture collection of the New York Dress Institute: crêpe sheath cocktail dress with a deep V decolletage in chiffon over chiffon. © Bettmann/CORBIS.

English Catholic School, Florence; studied at Accademia delle Belle Arti, Florence, 1931–34; political science, University of Florence, 1932–34. Military Service: Served five years with U.S. Army Cavalry during World War II. Family: Married Merry Fahrney, 1938 (divorced); married actress Gene Tierney, 1941 (divorced, 1952); daughters: Daria, Christina. Career: After working in his mother's Maison de Couture in Florence, opened his own Maison de Couture, Rome; sketch artist, Patou, Paris, 1935; design assistant to couturier Jo Copeland, New York, 1936; designer, William Bass, 1937, and James Rotherberg Inc., New York, 1938–39; New York salon, Oleg Inc., established, 1937–39; owner of Cassini fashion studio, New York, 1939–40; designer, Paramount Pictures, Los Angeles, 1939–42; designer under contract with Twentieth Century Fox, Los Angeles, 1940; owner, Cassini Dardick fashion firm, New York, 1947–50; established Oleg Cassini Inc., New York, 1950; appointed official designer to U.S. First Lady Jacqueline Kennedy, early 1960s; established ready-to-wear business, Milan, 1963; returned to New York, designed tennis clothes for Munsingwear and swimwear for Waterclothes under own label, 1974; introduced new fragrance line, Cassini, 1990; inked deal with Cascade International to develop specialty stores, 1991; launched fake fur collection, 1999. Exhibitions: Jacqueline Kennedy: The White House Years (featuring many of Cassini's designs), 2001. Awards: Numerous awards, including five first prizes, Mostra della Moda, Turin, 1934; Honorary Doctor of Fine Arts, International College of Fine Arts, Miami, 1989; American Society of Perfumers Living Legend award, 2001.

PUBLICATIONS

By CASSINI:

Books

- Pay the Price*, New York, 1983.
In My Own Fashion, New York, 1987, 1990.
One Thousand Days of Magic, New York, 1995.

On CASSINI:

Books

- Bender, Marylin, The Beautiful People, New York, 1967.
Milbank, Caroline Rennolds, New York Fashion: The Evolution of American Style, New York, 1989.
Leese, Elizabeth, Costume Design in the Movies, New York, 1991.

Articles

- “Oleg Cassini,” in Current Biography, July 1961.
“Oleg Cassini, un couturier collectionneur de femmes,” in Elle (Paris), 25 October 1987.
Tedeschi, Mark, “Cassini’s Career—Straight Out of a Hemingway Novel,” in Footwear News, 17 December 1990.
Buck, Geneviève, “You’re Not Excused if You Sniff at the Idea of Mixing Fragrances and Fashion,” in the Chicago Tribune, 19 December 1990.
“Cassini to Design for Cascade,” in the South Florida Business Journal, 17 June 1991.
“Oleg Cassini Comes to Town,” in Clothes Show (London), December 1991.

Oleg Cassini with his wife, actress Gene Tierney, who is modeling one of his designs, 1941. © Bettmann/CORBIS.

- “The Charm of First Lady’s Man Oleg Cassini Shines On,” in Vogue (London), December 1991.
Witchell, Alex, “A Lifetime’s Pursuit of Glamour, Grandeur and Women’s Trust,” in the New York Times, 16 November 1995.
“Oleg Cassini Bailout Plan Falls Through,” in Women’s Wear Daily, 22 July 1997.
Maxwell, Alison, “Oleg Cassini Launches Fake-Fur Line,” in Women’s Wear Daily, 9 November 1999.
Horyn, Cathy, “Fashion’s Gadfly Tangos With A Legend,” in the New York Times, 15 April 2001.

* * *

Oleg Cassini has had an extremely varied, glamorous, and exotic career but is perhaps best known for the personal style and clothing he developed when official designer for First Lady Jacqueline Kennedy in 1961. He worked closely with Mrs. Kennedy, a personal friend, and together they created many widely copied garments that became American fashion classics and firmly established Kennedy as a style leader.

The First Lady frequently wore a fawn wool two-piece outfit, a dress and a waist-length semifitted jacket or coat with a removable round neck collar of Russian sable, often topped by the famous pillbox hats created by Halston. Another popular outfit was a high-necked silk ottoman empire-line evening gown that gently flared in an A-line to the floor. Jacqueline Kennedy's vast public exposure proved a huge boost for Cassini's profile and brought worldwide attention to American fashion in general.

Cassini was born a count and was brought up by Italian/Russian parents in Florence, where his mother ran an exclusive dress shop. He began his career in 1934 by making small one-off designs sold through his mother's shop. He moved to New York in 1936 and worked for several Seventh Avenue manufacturers before joining Twentieth-Century Fox in Hollywood as a costume designer in 1940. He worked for several major film studios and created glamorous clothes for many film stars—eventually marrying one, Gene Tierney—against studio wishes.

In 1950 the designer opened Oleg Cassini Inc., his ready-to-wear dress firm in New York, with $100,000-worth of backing. Femininity quickly became the keyword in describing his work; he produced dresses made from soft, romantic fabrics like lace, taffeta, and chiffon. He popularized ladylike fashion innovations, such as the A-line, the smart little white-collared dress, the sheath, the knitted suit, and dresses with minute waistlines. Military details such as brass buttons and braid were also popular features. In the 1960s the Cassini look evolved to incorporate ease and simplicity. The straight, lined cocktail and evening dresses popularized by Jackie Kennedy were customer favorites, as were his plain, boxy jacket suits.

Retiring from his ready-to-wear and couture business in 1963, Cassini's next venture was a ready-to-wear business in partnership with his brother Igor. He presented a menswear collection for the first time, breaking tradition by introducing color to shirts that had always been white, and teaming them with traditional three-piece suits.

An author of several books, beginning with his autobiography In My Own Fashion back in 1987, Cassini published One Thousand Days of Magic in 1995 about his experiences dressing Jackie Kennedy during her White House years. The 217-page book sold well and Cassini toured the country making appearances in its behalf. Yet he was still equally active in fashion; in 1997 Cassini and an investment group prepared to acquire He-Ro Group Ltd., producer of the designer's Black Tie eveningwear collections. The new company was to be renamed Oleg Cassini Group International, but the deal fell through after the sudden death of a He-Ro chairman, William J. Carone. He-Ro was then bought and merged with Nah Nah Collections to form the Nahdree Group, and subsequently cut ties with Cassini.

The veteran designer bounced back in 1999 with a fake-fur collection, launched at a fundraiser for the Humane Society of America. Working with Monterey Fashions to produce the 100-piece faux fur line, Cassini commented to Women's Wear Daily in November 1999, "You won't be able to distinguish between the real and man-made."

At the turn of the century, Cassini was entering his 90s and still a man about town. He ran an extensive empire, exporting to over 20 countries through an ever expanding number of licensing agreements. The company produced womenwear, menswear, children's clothing, and innumerable accessories including ties, luggage, cosmetics, shoes, umbrellas, and fragrances.

In 2001, six years after the publication of Cassini's One Thousand Days of Magic and 40 years after he began designing for Jackie Kennedy, the Metropolitan Museum of Art mounted an exhibition called "Jacqueline Kennedy: The White House Years." The exhibit featured many of the designer's famed creations for the First Lady, and brought the Cassini name to the forefront of the industry once more.

—Kevin Almond; updated by Nelly Rhodes

CASTELBAJAC, Jean-Charles de

French designer

Born: Of French parents in Casablanca, Morocco, 28 November 1949. Education: Attended Catholic boarding schools in France, 1955–66; studied law, Faculté de Droit, Limoges, 1966–77. Family: Married Katherine Lee Chambers, 1979; children: Guillaume, Louis. Career: Founder and designer, with his mother Jeanne-Blanche de Castelbac, of Ko & Co., ready-to-wear fashion company, Limoges, beginning in 1968; freelanced for Pierre d'Alby, Max Mara, Jesus Jeans, Etam, Gadgling, Julie Latour, Fusano, Amaraggi, Carel Shoes, round neck collar of Russian sable, often topped by the famous pillbox hats created by Halston. Another popular outfit was a high-necked silk ottoman empire-line evening gown that gently flared in an A-line to the floor. Jacqueline Kennedy's vast public exposure proved a huge boost for Cassini's profile and brought worldwide attention to American fashion in general.

Jean-Charles de Castelbac, fall/winter 2001 collection. © AP/Wide World Photos.

Cassini was born a count and was brought up by Italian/Russian parents in Florence, where his mother ran an exclusive dress shop. He began his career in 1934 by making small one-off designs sold through his mother's shop. He moved to New York in 1936 and worked for several Seventh Avenue manufacturers before joining Twentieth-Century Fox in Hollywood as a costume designer in 1940. He worked for several major film studios and created glamorous clothes for many film stars—eventually marrying one, Gene Tierney—against studio wishes.

In 1950 the designer opened Oleg Cassini Inc., his ready-to-wear dress firm in New York, with $100,000-worth of backing. Femininity quickly became the keyword in describing his work; he produced dresses made from soft, romantic fabrics like lace, taffeta, and chiffon. He popularized ladylike fashion innovations, such as the A-line, the smart little white-collared dress, the sheath, the knitted suit, and dresses with minute waistlines. Military details such as brass buttons and braid were also popular features. In the 1960s the Cassini look evolved to incorporate ease and simplicity. The straight, lined cocktail and evening dresses popularized by Jackie Kennedy were customer favorites, as were his plain, boxy jacket suits.

Retiring from his ready-to-wear and couture business in 1963, Cassini's next venture was a ready-to-wear business in partnership with his brother Igor. He presented a menswear collection for the first time, breaking tradition by introducing color to shirts that had always been white, and teaming them with traditional three-piece suits.

An author of several books, beginning with his autobiography In My Own Fashion back in 1987, Cassini published One Thousand Days of Magic in 1995 about his experiences dressing Jackie Kennedy during her White House years. The 217-page book sold well and Cassini toured the country making appearances in its behalf. Yet he was still equally active in fashion; in 1997 Cassini and an investment group prepared to acquire He-Ro Group Ltd., producer of the designer's Black Tie eveningwear collections. The new company was to be renamed Oleg Cassini Group International, but the deal fell through after the sudden death of a He-Ro chairman, William J. Carone. He-Ro was then bought and merged with Nah Nah Collections to form the Nahdree Group, and subsequently cut ties with Cassini.

The veteran designer bounced back in 1999 with a fake-fur collection, launched at a fundraiser for the Humane Society of America. Working with Monterey Fashions to produce the 100-piece faux fur line, Cassini commented to Women's Wear Daily in November 1999, "You won't be able to distinguish between the real and man-made."

At the turn of the century, Cassini was entering his 90s and still a man about town. He ran an extensive empire, exporting to over 20 countries through an ever expanding number of licensing agreements. The company produced womenwear, menswear, children's clothing, and innumerable accessories including ties, luggage, cosmetics, shoes, umbrellas, and fragrances.

In 2001, six years after the publication of Cassini's One Thousand Days of Magic and 40 years after he began designing for Jackie Kennedy, the Metropolitan Museum of Art mounted an exhibition called "Jacqueline Kennedy: The White House Years." The exhibit featured many of the designer's famed creations for the First Lady, and brought the Cassini name to the forefront of the industry once more.

—Kevin Almond; updated by Nelly Rhodes

CASTELBAJAC, Jean-Charles de

French designer

Born: Of French parents in Casablanca, Morocco, 28 November 1949. Education: Attended Catholic boarding schools in France, 1955–66; studied law, Faculté de Droit, Limoges, 1966–77. Family: Married Katherine Lee Chambers, 1979; children: Guillaume, Louis. Career: Founder and designer, with his mother Jeanne-Blanche de Castelbac, of Ko & Co., ready-to-wear fashion company, Limoges, beginning in 1968; freelanced for Pierre d'Alby, Max Mara, Jesus Jeans, Etam, Gadgling, Julie Latour, Fusano, Amaraggi, Carel Shoes,

Jean-Charles de Castelbac, fall/winter 2001 collection. © AP/Wide World Photos.

Ellesse, Hilton, Levi Strauss, and Reynaud, beginning in 1968; director, Jean-Charles de Castelbajac label, Paris, 1970, and Société Jean-Charles de Castelbajac SARL, Paris, 1978; established boutiques in Paris, New York, and Tokyo, 1975–76; also designed for film and music, including Elton John, Talking Heads, and Rod Stewart, from 1976; interior and furniture designs, from 1979; member, Didier Grumbach's Les Créateurs group of designers, Paris, 1974–77; designer for Courrèges, 1994–96; created outfits for the Pope and priests at World Youth Days, 1997; revamped label, 1998; introduced fragrance line with Parfums Lolita Lempicka, 2001. Exhibitions: Centre Georges Pompidou, Paris, 1978; Forum Design, Linz, Austria, 1980; Laforet Museum, Belgium, 1984. Collections: Musée du Costume, Paris; Fashion Institute of Technology, New York. Address: 15 rue Cassette, 75006 Paris, France.

PUBLICATIONS

By CASTELBAJAC:

Books

J.C. de Castelbajac, 1993.

On CASTELBAJAC:

Books

- Carter, Ernestine, The Changing World of Fashion, London, 1977.
Who's Who in Fashion, Karl Strute and Theodor Doelken, ed., Zurich, 1982.
Delpais, Delbourg, Le Chic et la Mode, Paris, 1982.
McDowell, Colin, McDowell's Directory of Twentieth Century Fashion, London, 1984.
O'Hara, Georgina, The Encyclopaedia of Fashion from 1940 to the 1980s, London, 1986.
Stegemeyer, Anne, Who's Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.

Articles

- "Un styliste bourré d'idées: Jean-Charles de Castelbajac," in Gap (Paris), October 1975.
"Jean-Charles de Castelbajac: French Revolutionary," in GQ (New York), April 1981.
Barrett, Amy, "Pope's Choice for Paris Vestments Doesn't Have Everyone's Blessing," in the Wall Street Journal, 19 August 1997.
Castro, Peter and Cathy Nolan, "Man of the Cloth," in People, 25 August 1997.
Ozzard, Janet, "Castelbajac Signs Deal for Perfume," in Women's Wear Daily, 3 February 1999.
"Short Circuits: Baccarat Falls in Love," in Duty-Free News International, 1 December 1999.
"Leopicka Enters Fresh Territory," in Duty-Free News International, 1 December 2000.

* * *

If color produces optimism, then Jean-Charles de Castelbajac is the most optimistic designer in existence. Void of lux rhinestones or glitz, his collection features color to luxuriate the world. The designer, who has been deemed "the space age Bonnie Cashin," not only clothes people in color but creates an environmental lifestyle, with everything from sofas to crystal to carpets.

Castelbajac is a man of passions—for form and function, for color, for comfort and protection—and therein lies the basis of this humanistic designer. Castelbajac began his obsession by cutting his first garment out of a blanket from boarding school. Because the material already existed, he was left to play only with the form. Many times each year he returns to this first gesture, cutting the cloth, so he remains close to its essence and function.

Having been titled Marquis, Castelbajac has erected the first monument to celebrate the living in Paris: 150,000 names of young people are inscribed on a steel totem pole to support Castelbajac's project to give inspiration and a sense of worth to generations used to growing up with war memorials celebrating the dead. Despite his interest in youth, he has always been involved with heroes and heritage, but he has never been archaic in his designs. Castelbajac is a man of the future, but he does not make futuristic clothing; his designs fulfill the need for practical and unassuming fashion of maximum quality. While favoring natural textures and fibers, Castelbajac creates designs that are innovative but respectful of the classics; he has been called a modern traditionalist.

Castelbajac's fondness for architecture is apparent in the harmonious, finely-drawn shapes that flow through every collection. He has a great affinity with painters, with whom he spends much time to strengthen his creative impulses. Having a strong revulsion to prints on garments, he humorously solved the predicament by using large scale motifs of Tom and Jerry, or phrases from Nerval or Barbey d'Aurevilly inscribed on silk, for very simply shaped dresses. At other times his garments are filled with angels, medieval and heraldic motifs, or childlike inscriptions drawn with the skill of an artistic adult but with the imagination of a child.

In 1994 when Castelbajac began designing the collections of André Courrèges, the futuristic designer of 1960s, Castelbajac managed to successfully to rejuvenate the original spirit of Courrèges clothes. Castelbajac had a somewhat similar style to Courrèges, but he added courageous touches along with his trademark sense of humor. Castelbajac worked with the house about two years, after which he went out on his own again. At this time in the mid- to late 1990s, however, minimalist fashions were in vogue, and Castelbajac's eccentric, fun-loving designs did not find as much acceptance.

In a surprise choice, Castelbajac was selected as the official designer for the 1997 Catholic celebration World Youth Days, held in Paris, for which he created the Pope's vestments and the apparel for the 5,000 priests at the event, as well as souvenirs such as t-shirts and baseball caps that helped subsidize attendees from poorer countries. Although his selection was controversial, Castelbajac pointed out that much of the inspiration for his designs had always come from the liturgical shapes and stained-glass window colors familiar from his Catholic upbringing. His design for the papal robe was inspired by the story of Noah's Ark.

Castelbajac revamped his label significantly in 1998, collaborating with young designers—including for his noted "Painting Dresses"—and opening several concept stores. He has also continued to expand into a variety of categories, notably home furnishings, where he has refreshed classic furnishings styles, such as the Chesterfield sofa, but with his own colorful flair. He has lent his name to a line of brightly colored paints, manufactured by Castorama, as well as porcelains, linens, carpets, light fixtures, and other home-related objects. His ideal for the home is warm and cozy but still luxurious.

Jean-Charles de Castelbajac and two of his designs following the presentation of his fall/winter 2001–02 collection. © AP/Wide World Photos.

Castelbajac's product lines, best-known in his home country, include his signature designer sportswear and jeanswear, as well as women's and men's deluxe ready-to-wear and accessories including bags, umbrellas, glasses, ties, and jewelry. He introduced a line of fragrances with Parfums Lolita Lempicka in 2001; an earlier line with another company dating from the early 1980s had been discontinued. Outside the world of products, Castelbajac has dipped into broadcast design, creating vignettes for the cable television network Muzzik.

Castelbajac's spring/summer 2001 collection was typical of his style. Using materials such as varnished leather, embroidered jersey, and camouflage, his clothes featured Op Art, depictions of action figures, huge comic book-style characters and words such as YAOOW! and KLINK! His traditional bright colors—evidenced in creations such as Day-Glo green and orange skirts of tulle—were accented with touches including brooches in the shape of marijuana leaves and giant fabric pins. His sense of fun and color were on display, as they are in all of his endeavors.

The inscription of Cervantes in Castelbajac's 1993 self-titled book reads: "Always hold the hand of the child you once were." His clothing and his art are identifiable by his manner of being true to himself; by being profoundly human and knowing something is not simply style.

—Andrea Arsenault; updated by Karen Raugust

CATALINA SPORTSWEAR

American swimwear and sportswear firm

Founded: in 1907 by John C. Bentz as Bentz Knitting Mills, manufacturing underwear and sweaters; renamed Pacific Knitting Mills (1912), Catalina Knitting Mills (1928), and Catalina, from 1955. Company History: knitted swimwear introduced, 1912; sponsor, Miss America pageant until 1951 dispute; originated and sponsored additional pageants, including Miss USA, Miss Teen USA, and Miss Universe, 1950s; company purchased by Kayser-Roth apparel

Jean-Charles de Castelbajac and two of his designs following the presentation of his fall/winter 2001–02 collection. © AP/Wide World Photos.

Castelbajac's product lines, best-known in his home country, include his signature designer sportswear and jeanswear, as well as women's and men's deluxe ready-to-wear and accessories including bags, umbrellas, glasses, ties, and jewelry. He introduced a line of fragrances with Parfums Lolita Lempicka in 2001; an earlier line with another company dating from the early 1980s had been discontinued. Outside the world of products, Castelbajac has dipped into broadcast design, creating vignettes for the cable television network Muzzik.

Castelbajac's spring/summer 2001 collection was typical of his style. Using materials such as varnished leather, embroidered jersey, and camouflage, his clothes featured Op Art, depictions of action figures, huge comic book-style characters and words such as YAOOW! and KLINK! His traditional bright colors—evidenced in creations such as Day-Glo green and orange skirts of tulle—were accented with touches including brooches in the shape of marijuana leaves and giant fabric pins. His sense of fun and color were on display, as they are in all of his endeavors.

The inscription of Cervantes in Castelbajac's 1993 self-titled book reads: "Always hold the hand of the child you once were." His clothing and his art are identifiable by his manner of being true to himself; by being profoundly human and knowing something is not simply style.

—Andrea Arsenault; updated by Karen Raugust

CATALINA SPORTSWEAR

American swimwear and sportswear firm

Founded: in 1907 by John C. Bentz as Bentz Knitting Mills, manufacturing underwear and sweaters; renamed Pacific Knitting Mills (1912), Catalina Knitting Mills (1928), and Catalina, from 1955. Company History: knitted swimwear introduced, 1912; sponsor, Miss America pageant until 1951 dispute; originated and sponsored additional pageants, including Miss USA, Miss Teen USA, and Miss Universe, 1950s; company purchased by Kayser-Roth apparel division of Gulf & Western Company, 1975; bankruptcy, 1993; acquired by Authentic Fitness, 1997; combined with Cole of California to become Catalina Cole. Awards: Los Angeles Chamber of Commerce Golden 44 award, 1979.

PUBLICATIONS

On CATALINA:

Books

Lençek, Lina, and Gideon Bosker, Making Waves: Swimsuits and the Undressing of America, San Francisco, 1989.

Koda, Harold, and Richard Martin, Splash! A History of Swimwear, New York, 1990.

Articles

Ross, Adele, "Catalina: A Giant Need Not Be Inflexible," in California Apparel News (Los Angeles), 1 October 1976.

"Catalina," in Apparel Industry Magazine (Atlanta, Georgia), December 1984.

Shaffer, Gina, "Catalina Charts New Course," in Man, January 1985.

"Bathing Beauties at One Time," Chicago Tribune, 18 February 1987.

Horton, Cleveland, "Russians Get Taste of U.S. Sun, Fun (Catalina Swimwear TV Ad Airing in the Former Soviet Union)," Advertising Age, 13 July 1992.

Ryan, Thomas J., "Authentic Fitness Net Gains 52.7-Percent" in WWD, 27 January 1995.

D'Innocenzio, Anne, "Swimwear Dives, Hopes to Surface," in WWD, 10 August 1995.

Conklin, Mike, "Miss America Timeline," Chicago Tribune, 27 October 2000.

* * *

Catalina Sportswear evolved from an obscure California knitting mill into a world-leading swimwear manufacturer, reigning from the 1930s through the early 1990s. The U.S. and Eastern Europe experienced a physical fitness and sports craze in the 1920s and 1930s. Catalina, along with Jantzen in Oregon, shrewdly and stylishly propelled West Coast fashion into prominence as they filled the growing need for active outdoor clothes, especially swimwear.

The early wool knit suits, patterned after a simple one-piece style introduced to the U.S. by Australian swim star Annette Kellerman, allowed women new freedom in the water. They also challenged and broke down the Edwardian modesty codes. In the 1920s, Catalina produced increasingly baring and fashionable as well as functional swimwear, notably, the boldly striped Chicken Suit, men's Speed Suit, and Ribstitch "S" suits.

Catalina incorporated new fabrics into its products as fast as technology developed them. When Lastex, the rubber-cored thread, appeared in the 1930s, Catalina advertised the LA or "Lastex Appeal" in men's swim trunks. Lastex and Spandex, and Vyrene Spandex in the 1960s, would provide the elasticity and shaping power under and in combination with knits, cotton, velour, Celanese Rayon, DuPont Antron, nylon, and Lycra fabrics.

Particularly in the 1930s and 1940s the company had a symbiotic relationship with Hollywood. Warner Bros. costume designer Orry Kelly and film color consultant and makeup man Perc Westmore designed for Catalina. Starlets and stars like Ginger Rogers, Joan Crawford, Ronald Reagan, and Marilyn Monroe were photographed in Catalina sportswear for advertising and publicity purposes. Such shots boosted the stars, the California mystique, pool and beach business, and Catalina sales. Catalina's influence was also intertwined with the myth and icon of the Miss America Beauty Pageant. When the company sponsored the contest in the 1940s, contestants wore essentially off-the-rack Catalina suits, except that pageant suits had the flying fish logo on both hips instead of one. Catalina dropped sponsorship of Miss America after 1951 winner Yolande Betbeze refused to wear a Catalina suit for the traditional swimsuit tour; the company then went on to found the Miss USA, Miss Teen USA, and Miss Universe pageants and cosponsored them for decades. Since 1960 television beamed contestants wearing Catalina styles with gold embroidered flying fish to worldwide audiences. Catalina's participation in these fashion and body-conscious fixtures in American culture exemplifies an underlying modus operandi to design suits that allowed women and men to show off their bodies in a fashionable, abbreviated, yet socially acceptable garment.

In its long history, Catalina experienced bursts of innovative flair and attracted high profile design talent: swimwear designer Elizabeth Stewart went on to found her own company, while Lee Hogan Cass specially commissioned patterns in European-inspired browns and innovative citrus batiks that delighted consumers. Jacquard knit suits and casual wear in bright colors were a hit in Italy, and bikini-clad Europeans sought the maker of an innovative Grecian pleated suit seen on the Riviera.

Fashion editors of the better magazines paid close attention to Gustave Tassell's swimwear and coverups. After the boned and corseted 1950s suits, his natural styles without bra cups were a hit with the New York cognoscenti, including Diana Vreeland, as were the soft cup designs by Edith Stenbeck. Frank Smith, who went on to head Evan Picone for Saks Fifth Avenue, had designed women's sportswear for Catalina, just as John Norman, later with Vogue and Butterick patterns, designed menswear. Menswear tended toward the country club look, at times showing influences of Pierre Cardin. The Sweethearts in Swimsuits line in the 1950s offered his and hers matching swimsuits and accessories.

Catalina successfully expanded its lines to appeal to the widest possible audience, offering knits, menswear, children's, Catalina Jr., sporting gear, and classic and trendy styles. The company had a knack of producing well-made mainstream fashions which sold in high volume and allowed average buyers to feel stylish and comfortable.

In recent decades many lines were conservative versions of revealing trendmakers. At times they went head-to-head with the competition, countering Body Glove's slick neons with Underwets while the slimming Contour Suit was the answer to Jantzen's Five-Pounds Under line. Considering its ability to adapt, especially through changes in ownership, perhaps its logo should have been the chameleon, rather than a fish.

Catalina went into bankruptcy in 1993 and languished for several years. It was purchased by Authentic Fitness, a subsidiary of the Warnaco companies in 1997 and paired with another legendary West Coast swimwear producer, Cole of California. The new unit was renamed Catalina Cole, and was highly successful as a part of Authentic Fitness' swimwear division, which also included the Anne Cole Collection and Speedo.

Catalina was and continues to be a keystone of the California swim and sportswear industry, with worldwide influence. It began as an early 20th-century swimwear pioneer and has remained an important player in the American fashion industry as Catalina Cole. The company's fashions significantly contributed to women's athletic liberation and the propagation of the Hollywood and California looks as well as molding and perpetuating beauty pageant culture.

—Debra Regan Cleveland; updated by Nelly Rhodes

CAUMONT, Jean Baptiste

French designer working in Italy

Born: Pau, France, 24 October 1932. Education: Studied fine arts in Paris. Career: Design assistant, Balmain, Paris, and freelance illustrator, Vogue, Femina, Album du Figaro, and Marie-Claire, late 1950s; textile consultant, Legler; design consultant La Rinascente stores, Italy; designer/coordinator, Apem, 1960–63; design consultancies in Italy and France, including Christian Dior boutique, and others; moved to Milan, 1963; designed for Rosier, 1963–66; designed own ready-to-wear with own label, from 1965, and for Confezioni Amica, Treviso; first show in Milan, then New York, in 1966; Caumont SrL founded with Paolo Russo in Treviso, Italy, 1968; knitwear line for men, then women, introduced, 1968–69; men's ready-to-wear collection, Monsieur Caumont introduced, 1970; signed contract with Gruppo Finanziario Tessile (GFT), producing exclusive menswear line for Canada and U.S., 1986; boutiques opened in Milan, Tokyo, and New York; introduced Jib fragrance line. Awards: Oscar from Rome fashion school; Oscar from Store Palacio de Ierro, Mexico. Address: Corso Venezia 44, 20121 Milan, Italy.

PUBLICATIONS

On CAUMONT:

Books

Mulassano, Adriana, The Who's Who of Italian Fashion, Florence, 1979.

Khronak, Lucille, Fashion 2001, New York, 1982.

Articles

de la Falaise, Maxime, "Right for the Moment: Jean Baptiste Caumont," in Interview, January 1980.

Moor, Jonathan, "Caumont: Classic Renegade," in DNR: The Magazine, 28 January 1980.

"Champion a l'étranger," in Madame Figaro (Paris), No. 12471.

Scio, Marie Louise, "Four Stars to Caumont and Missoni," in the International Daily News, 12 June 1990.

* * *

Throughout his long career, Jean Baptiste Caumont never wavered from his original vision: classic, sophisticated ready-to-wear clothing and accessories for men and women. Beginning with his first women's collection in 1966, Caumont consistently delivered stylish, refined sportswear, knits, leather, and evening clothes aimed at the well-bred customer who wanted a look of elegance and ease devoid of affectation.

A Frenchman originally from the Basque country, Caumont based his operations in Italy. He was one of the original group of designers (Walter Albini, Cadette, Krizia, Missoni, and Ken Scott) who broke with the Italian fashion industry in Florence and brought Milan into the limelight. His first foray into womenswear was quickly followed by men's knits and then a complete menswear collection. As his reputation as a tastemaker grew, his business continued to expand, including luggage, handbags, shoes, jewelry, and other goods. But Caumont continued to adhere strictly to his notion of line, form, craftsmanship, and control, creating clothing and accessories using rich fabrics, elegance of cut and richness of color, never sacrificing quality to mass production no matter how fast his fortunes grew.

Caumont often looked to the past for inspiration for his classic styles. He was particularly drawn to the styles worn by the wealthy during the early 20th century, clothes that might have been worn on Grand Tour holidays or at exclusive resorts. But these references were used only to conjure a mood—never for slavish revival. Some design sources, for example, were the glamor of luxury travel on the Orient Express, the prim uniforms of English schoolgirls, and the natty men's silk smoking jacket. But instead of degenerating into clichés, in Caumont's capable hands these sources were translated into great sweeping fur and leather coats, classy traditional sportswear separates, and oversized quilted evening coats for women.

In keeping with his taste for clothes that suggest patrician nonchalance, Caumont's trench coats, suits, blazers, and other sporty looks for men and women were frequently fashioned of richly-textured tweeds, houndstooth, and glen plaids. His daytime looks often featured layering, using wools and cashmere for pullovers and sweaterjackets for colder weather, linen and silk for summer/resort wear. For evening he favored unabashed luxury, with soft silks and crêpe de chine. Whatever the occasion, the telling Caumont signature was understatement—his clothes signaled their high quality with quiet restraint.

Caumont's devotion to subdued luxury also resulted in the use of a relatively pared-down palette. Early collections were nearly monochromatic, with black, gray, and white punctuated very occasionally by a dash of red. Otherwise, he has shown a predilection for earth tones, marrying various camels, beiges, and tans to create subtly harmonious variations on a theme. It was only after many seasons that he began to experiment with brighter hues, tropical tones, and bolder prints, as fashion dictates in the 1970s began to loosen the notion of proper palettes for men and women.

Caumont placed much more emphasis on style than fashion. "Fashion is a thing of the moment," he had remarked, "Fashion is a gimmick. Who can afford to pay for a gimmick?" During the 1980s his design philosophy paid off, as the trend toward elegance and glamor placed Caumont yet again at the forefront. His menswear—combining his hybrid talent for Italian tailoring, French lines, and English coloring—was especially well-received as being fresh, comfortable, and eminently wearable. The Caumont look, a worldly and sophisticated one, was considered at once timeless and yet essentially Milanese, embodying the urbane chic for which the Italian center of fashion became known.

Caumont designed for himself and others of his kind: well-traveled, well-heeled clients who believed in a refined and understated way of life. Not a true fashion innovator, he nonetheless found his niche as a designer—clothes spoke of elegance, gentility, and propriety, and never went out of style.

—Kathleen Paton

early 20th-century swimwear pioneer and has remained an important player in the American fashion industry as Catalina Cole. The company's fashions significantly contributed to women's athletic liberation and the propagation of the Hollywood and California looks as well as molding and perpetuating beauty pageant culture.

—Debra Regan Cleveland; updated by Nelly Rhodes

CAUMONT, Jean Baptiste

French designer working in Italy

Born: Pau, France, 24 October 1932. Education: Studied fine arts in Paris. Career: Design assistant, Balmain, Paris, and freelance illustrator, Vogue, Femina, Album du Figaro, and Marie-Claire, late 1950s; textile consultant, Legler; design consultant La Rinascente stores, Italy; designer/coordinator, Apem, 1960–63; design consultancies in Italy and France, including Christian Dior boutique, and others; moved to Milan, 1963; designed for Rosier, 1963–66; designed own ready-to-wear with own label, from 1965, and for Confezioni Amica, Treviso; first show in Milan, then New York, in 1966; Caumont SrL founded with Paolo Russo in Treviso, Italy, 1968; knitwear line for men, then women, introduced, 1968–69; men's ready-to-wear collection, Monsieur Caumont introduced, 1970; signed contract with Gruppo Finanziario Tessile (GFT), producing exclusive menswear line for Canada and U.S., 1986; boutiques opened in Milan, Tokyo, and New York; introduced Jib fragrance line. Awards: Oscar from Rome fashion school; Oscar from Store Palacio de Ierro, Mexico. Address: Corso Venezia 44, 20121 Milan, Italy.

PUBLICATIONS

On CAUMONT:

Books

Mulassano, Adriana, The Who's Who of Italian Fashion, Florence, 1979.

Khronak, Lucille, Fashion 2001, New York, 1982.

Articles

de la Falaise, Maxime, "Right for the Moment: Jean Baptiste Caumont," in Interview, January 1980.

Moor, Jonathan, "Caumont: Classic Renegade," in DNR: The Magazine, 28 January 1980.

"Champion a l'étranger," in Madame Figaro (Paris), No. 12471.

Scio, Marie Louise, "Four Stars to Caumont and Missoni," in the International Daily News, 12 June 1990.

* * *

Throughout his long career, Jean Baptiste Caumont never wavered from his original vision: classic, sophisticated ready-to-wear clothing and accessories for men and women. Beginning with his first women's collection in 1966, Caumont consistently delivered stylish, refined sportswear, knits, leather, and evening clothes aimed at the well-bred customer who wanted a look of elegance and ease devoid of affectation.

A Frenchman originally from the Basque country, Caumont based his operations in Italy. He was one of the original group of designers (Walter Albini, Cadette, Krizia, Missoni, and Ken Scott) who broke with the Italian fashion industry in Florence and brought Milan into the limelight. His first foray into womenswear was quickly followed by men's knits and then a complete menswear collection. As his reputation as a tastemaker grew, his business continued to expand, including luggage, handbags, shoes, jewelry, and other goods. But Caumont continued to adhere strictly to his notion of line, form, craftsmanship, and control, creating clothing and accessories using rich fabrics, elegance of cut and richness of color, never sacrificing quality to mass production no matter how fast his fortunes grew.

Caumont often looked to the past for inspiration for his classic styles. He was particularly drawn to the styles worn by the wealthy during the early 20th century, clothes that might have been worn on Grand Tour holidays or at exclusive resorts. But these references were used only to conjure a mood—never for slavish revival. Some design sources, for example, were the glamor of luxury travel on the Orient Express, the prim uniforms of English schoolgirls, and the natty men's silk smoking jacket. But instead of degenerating into clichés, in Caumont's capable hands these sources were translated into great sweeping fur and leather coats, classy traditional sportswear separates, and oversized quilted evening coats for women.

In keeping with his taste for clothes that suggest patrician nonchalance, Caumont's trench coats, suits, blazers, and other sporty looks for men and women were frequently fashioned of richly-textured tweeds, houndstooth, and glen plaids. His daytime looks often featured layering, using wools and cashmere for pullovers and sweaterjackets for colder weather, linen and silk for summer/resort wear. For evening he favored unabashed luxury, with soft silks and crêpe de chine. Whatever the occasion, the telling Caumont signature was understatement—his clothes signaled their high quality with quiet restraint.

Caumont's devotion to subdued luxury also resulted in the use of a relatively pared-down palette. Early collections were nearly monochromatic, with black, gray, and white punctuated very occasionally by a dash of red. Otherwise, he has shown a predilection for earth tones, marrying various camels, beiges, and tans to create subtly harmonious variations on a theme. It was only after many seasons that he began to experiment with brighter hues, tropical tones, and bolder prints, as fashion dictates in the 1970s began to loosen the notion of proper palettes for men and women.

Caumont placed much more emphasis on style than fashion. "Fashion is a thing of the moment," he had remarked, "Fashion is a gimmick. Who can afford to pay for a gimmick?" During the 1980s his design philosophy paid off, as the trend toward elegance and glamor placed Caumont yet again at the forefront. His menswear—combining his hybrid talent for Italian tailoring, French lines, and English coloring—was especially well-received as being fresh, comfortable, and eminently wearable. The Caumont look, a worldly and sophisticated one, was considered at once timeless and yet essentially Milanese, embodying the urbane chic for which the Italian center of fashion became known.

Caumont designed for himself and others of his kind: well-traveled, well-heeled clients who believed in a refined and understated way of life. Not a true fashion innovator, he nonetheless found his niche as a designer—clothes spoke of elegance, gentility, and propriety, and never went out of style.

—Kathleen Paton

CERRUTI, Nino

Italian designer

Born: Biella, Italy, 1930. Career: General manager, family textile firm (founded 1881), Fratelli Cerruti (Cerruti Brothers), Biella, Italy, from 1950; introduced Hitman men's ready-to-wear line, 1957; introduced knitwear line, 1963; first menswear collection presented in Paris, opened Cerruti 1881 boutique, Paris, and launched unisex clothing line, 1967; added women's ready-to-wear, 1976; helped create fashion revolution on Miami Vice television show, 1980s; designed costumes for some 150 films, including The Witches of Eastwick (1987), Philadelphia (1993), and Pretty Woman (1990); appeared in Cannes Man (1996); sells controlling interest of company to Italian company Fin.part, 2000; Fin.part buys remaining interest and forces Cerruti out, 2001. Fragrances include Nino Cerruti Pour Homme (1978), Cerruti Fair Play (1984), Nino Cerruti Pour Femme (1987), and 1881 (1988). Awards: Bath Museum of Costume Dress of the Year award, England, 1978; Cutty Sark award, 1982, 1988; Pitti Uomo award, Italy, 1986. Address: 3 Place de la Madeleine, 75008 Paris, France. Website: www.cerruti.net.

PUBLICATIONS

On CERRUTI:

Books

Mulassano, Adriana, The Who's Who of Italian Fashion, Florence, 1979.

Articles

Crome, Erica, "Nino Cerruti: Designers of Influence No. 2," in Vogue (London), December 1978.

Nino Cerruti in ca. 1980–97. © Frédéric Huijbregts/CORBIS.

Hicks, Sheila, and Barbara Grib, "Nino Cerruti," in American Fabrics and Fashions (New York), 1982.

Boyer, G. Bruce, "The Return of the Double-Breasted Suit," in Town and Country, March 1983.

Menkes, Suzy, "King of the Supple Suit," in the Times (London), 11 November 1986.

"Buon Anniversario," in Profession Textile, 18 September 1987.

"Nino Cerruti Refined," in Esquire, September 1987.

Watt, Judith, "By Design," in For Him (London), Autumn 1989.

Tredre, Roger, "Nino, the Wardrobe Master," in the Independent (London), 9 August 1990.

"Biella," Supplement to L'Uomo Vogue (Milan), November 1990.

Fiedelholtz, Sara, "Escada Sees Good Year for Cerruti Collection," in Women's Wear Daily, 13 May 1993.

Morche, Pascal, "Eleganze der Hoflichkeit," in Manner Vogue (Wesseling, Germany), August 1993.

Aillaud, Charlotte, and Simon Upton, "Nino Cerruti: Tailoring an Italian Villa in Biella," in Architectural Digest, October 1994.

White, Constance C.R., "Hollywood Style, From Classic to Kitsch," in the New York Times, 18 October 1995.

Horyn, Cathy, "Cerruti's Soft Sell; Christine Ganeaux: Name Recognition; For Rhinestone Cowgirls and Boys," in the New York Times, 6 April 1999.

Interview with Giorgio Armani, in Le Figaro, January 2000.

Rubenstein, Hal, "The Look of Cerruti," in InStyle, 1 February 2000.

Menkes, Suzy, "Nino Cerruti Discreetly Exits the Fashion Stage," in the International Herald Tribune, 27 June 2001.

* * *

Nino Cerruti's life could be the most dramatic narrative of the post-World War II Italian renaissance. L'Uomo Vogue declared in November 1990: "Nino Cerruti, a name synonymous with modern restraint. Industrialist-designer, one of the founding fathers of Italian fashion." In 1950, at the young age of 20, Cerruti assumed control of his family's textile mills in Biella, Italy. He transformed the staid business that had been significant for generations in the textile-producing region of Biella. Cerruti saw the quiet revolutionary possibility of a vertical operation, a kind other Italian textiles companies would later pursue with astounding success, following Cerruti's model. His sensibility was for fashion rather than for the traditionalism of textiles manufacturing, and his fashion sense leaned to the streamlined, near-industrial tailoring design applied to richly textured fabrics.

Cerruti's first men's ready-to-wear line, Hitman, considered a revolution in menswear at the time, was launched in 1957, and he showed unisex clothing in 1967. He also opened his first Cerruti 1881 boutique in Paris on the Rue Royale, off the Place de la Madeleine, in 1967, in order to be closer to the fashion capital of the world. (Boutiques were later opened in London, Milan, Tokyo, Munich, and New York.) Lanificio Cerruti, however, the fabric production division of his enterprises, remained in Biella. Along the way, Cerruti taught young talent: Giorgio Armani began his career designing menswear for Cerruti in the 1960s; Narciso Rodriguez and Peter Speliopoulos both crossed over the threshold of Cerruti's company as well.

His icons were distinguished dates and places; tradition abides in the stable factors of 1881 and Cerruti's elective association with Paris. Adriana Mulassano, writing in The Who's Who of Italian Fashion, (1979) noted that Cerruti was once known as "the madman of fashion" but considered the designer as a kind of vanguard genius: "Among those working for him (and perhaps even outside) there might be those who still think he's crazy. Perhaps it is the fate of the avant-garde, of those who know that the mind guides the hand, to be perennially misunderstood." It was Mulassano, however, who at times misunderstood Cerruti—he was always the businessman-designer, not the raw-talent creative, and he actively displayed the tempered intelligence of vertical operations and commercial acumen.

Cerruti, reflecting in September 1987, explained to Esquire: "I like to describe my operation as a modern version of the handcraft bodegas of centuries ago. It is important to know each link in the chain. I consider myself still very close to the theory of industrial design: using modern technology to reach the market. It's a very modern challenge: the continuous harmonization between the rational or scientific world and the emotional or artistic world." His involvement in fragrances and advertising was not out of unremitting creativity but out of the controlling perspicacity of business. The raging revolutionary of the 1950s and 1960s mellowed into the judicious businessperson of the 1980s and 1990s and his model was fully copied by others, both in menswear and in women's clothing.

The Cerruti fall-winter 1993–94 menswear collections were shown in Paris with none of the histrionics of some menswear presentations. He kept to his simple principle in his tailored clothing: "A man should look important when he wears a suit," allowing for the unconstricted jackets of the period but rendering them with sufficient solidity to avoid being too limp for the office. He showed the prevailing elongated three-button single-breasted look of Giorgio Armani and others. One can always tell, however, that Cerruti was a man of cloth: his menswear fabrics were textural, in pebbled and oatmeal grains, and so luxurious in their handling.

Cerruti also experimented with dandies and even designed Jack Nicholson's costumes in the movie The Witches of Eastwick (1987), as well as those for Julia Roberts and Richard Gere in Pretty Woman (1990) and Tom Hanks and Denzel Washington in Philadelphia (1993). Cerruti himself even appeared in a cameo role in the film Canines Man (1996). In addition, he used actors as models for his work; but anyone can experiment.

Nonetheless, Cerruti made his mark with the restraint of his clothes. His principal effort in menswear took advantage of the thriving operations he commanded from mills to clothing to advertising and promotion and related products. Mulassano did recognize Nino Cerruti as an enlightened businessman; and there was Cerruti's own 1987 statement in Esquire, "I think that innovation and fancy are essential to daily life. But my clothes are designed to be real. It's easy to indulge in decadence in fashion, but I don't think that's meaningful. The world has been full of enough of that."

Commenting to In Style magazine in 2000, as both a designer and a business professional, Cerruti said, "What I see today is a desire from the public for more than clothes to wear on the beach or at nightclubs. Men and women have a daily life, and they want us to help them take care of it. It is wonderful that women no longer need to use clothes to establish their place at work...and men are starting to understand the concept of wardrobe. So there is no reason any longer to deny one's personality [at] work. Besides, work should be where you experience some of the most interesting moments of your life. Not necessarily the most amusing, but certainly moments of interest. Is there a more appropriate place to dress with self-respect?"

If Cerruti exemplified postwar Italy, perhaps in his judiciousness, cautious good taste, or reversion to his own basic values, he further exemplified Everyman. He foresaw menswear's future in L'Uomo Vogue in 1990, "as a fashion that will be more refined and yet at the same time more everyday..." and had become the consummate businessman. He commanded an empire of numerous boutiques, franchise stores, some 1,500 vendors carrying Cerruti products, textile mills, and a holding company (Final Gastaldi Group) to control it all. And just as many of the independent fashion houses fell under the spell of globalization in the middle and late 1990s, Cerruti, too, decided to sell a controlling interest in his firm to Italian industrial group Fin.part in 2000.

In 2001 Fin.part took over the remainder of Cerruti's business and forced the 71-year-old designer out. At his spring-summer 2002 showing in Milan, Cerruti took his final bow before a standing crowd, taking leave of the family business created more than 120 years before. As Cerruti embraced the two young designers hired to take his place, he assured the International Herald Tribune's Suzy Menkes he was not retiring, but already researching a "new project" involving the family-owned textile company.

—Richard Martin; updated by Daryl F. Mallett

CESARANI, Sal

American designer

Born: 25 September 1939 in New York. Education: Studied design at the Fashion Institute of Technology, New York, 1959–61. Family: Married Nancy Cesarani, 1961; children: Lisa, Christopher. Career: Junior designer, Bobby Brooks, New York, 1961–63; fashion display coordinator, Paul Stuart menswear store, New York, 1964–69; merchandising director, Polo by Ralph Lauren, 1970–72; designed menswear and sportswear for Thomas Co. Inc., in Japan; Cesarani shops opened in Japanese retailers Matsuya, Seer, and Tobu, 1972; designer, Country Britches, New York, 1973–75; designer, Stanley Blacker, New York, 1975–76; formed Cesarani Ltd., New York, 1976; women's collection introduced, 1977; company closed then reorganized as Cesarani division for Jaymar Ruby; formed licensing agreements with Hartmarx, 1987–88, Corbin, 1989, Britches of Georgetowne, 1991, and Japan Toray Diplomode; launched leather bag collection for Ace Luggage, 1992; created eyeglass collection for Nanamua Co., 1992; designer/president, Cesarani and SJC Concepts Inc., from 1993; introduced childrenswear collection for Matsuta Co., 1993; designed menswear collection for Thomas Co. Inc., 1994; created men's clothing collection through Panther, a division of Marubeni; teacher/critic, Fashion Institute of Technology. Exhibitions: Institute of the Metropolitan Museum of Art, 1995. Awards: Special Coty award for Menswear, 1974, 1975; Coty award for menswear, 1976; Fashion Group award of Boston, 1977; Coty Return award, 1982. Member: Advisory Board of the Fashion Crafts Educational Commission of the High School of Fashion Industries; founding member, New York Advisory Board of the Shannon Rodgers and Jerry Silverman School of Fashion Design and Merchandising, Kent State University, Ohio. Address: 201 East 79th Street, New York, NY, 10021, USA. Website: www.cesarani.com.

of fashion" but considered the designer as a kind of vanguard genius: "Among those working for him (and perhaps even outside) there might be those who still think he's crazy. Perhaps it is the fate of the avant-garde, of those who know that the mind guides the hand, to be perennially misunderstood." It was Mulassano, however, who at times misunderstood Cerruti—he was always the businessman-designer, not the raw-talent creative, and he actively displayed the tempered intelligence of vertical operations and commercial acumen.

Cerruti, reflecting in September 1987, explained to Esquire: "I like to describe my operation as a modern version of the handcraft bodegas of centuries ago. It is important to know each link in the chain. I consider myself still very close to the theory of industrial design: using modern technology to reach the market. It's a very modern challenge: the continuous harmonization between the rational or scientific world and the emotional or artistic world." His involvement in fragrances and advertising was not out of unremitting creativity but out of the controlling perspicacity of business. The raging revolutionary of the 1950s and 1960s mellowed into the judicious businessperson of the 1980s and 1990s and his model was fully copied by others, both in menswear and in women's clothing.

The Cerruti fall-winter 1993–94 menswear collections were shown in Paris with none of the histrionics of some menswear presentations. He kept to his simple principle in his tailored clothing: "A man should look important when he wears a suit," allowing for the unconstricted jackets of the period but rendering them with sufficient solidity to avoid being too limp for the office. He showed the prevailing elongated three-button single-breasted look of Giorgio Armani and others. One can always tell, however, that Cerruti was a man of cloth: his menswear fabrics were textural, in pebbled and oatmeal grains, and so luxurious in their handling.

Cerruti also experimented with dandies and even designed Jack Nicholson's costumes in the movie The Witches of Eastwick (1987), as well as those for Julia Roberts and Richard Gere in Pretty Woman (1990) and Tom Hanks and Denzel Washington in Philadelphia (1993). Cerruti himself even appeared in a cameo role in the film Canines Man (1996). In addition, he used actors as models for his work; but anyone can experiment.

Nonetheless, Cerruti made his mark with the restraint of his clothes. His principal effort in menswear took advantage of the thriving operations he commanded from mills to clothing to advertising and promotion and related products. Mulassano did recognize Nino Cerruti as an enlightened businessman; and there was Cerruti's own 1987 statement in Esquire, "I think that innovation and fancy are essential to daily life. But my clothes are designed to be real. It's easy to indulge in decadence in fashion, but I don't think that's meaningful. The world has been full of enough of that."

Commenting to In Style magazine in 2000, as both a designer and a business professional, Cerruti said, "What I see today is a desire from the public for more than clothes to wear on the beach or at nightclubs. Men and women have a daily life, and they want us to help them take care of it. It is wonderful that women no longer need to use clothes to establish their place at work...and men are starting to understand the concept of wardrobe. So there is no reason any longer to deny one's personality [at] work. Besides, work should be where you experience some of the most interesting moments of your life. Not necessarily the most amusing, but certainly moments of interest. Is there a more appropriate place to dress with self-respect?"

If Cerruti exemplified postwar Italy, perhaps in his judiciousness, cautious good taste, or reversion to his own basic values, he further exemplified Everyman. He foresaw menswear's future in L'Uomo Vogue in 1990, "as a fashion that will be more refined and yet at the same time more everyday..." and had become the consummate businessman. He commanded an empire of numerous boutiques, franchise stores, some 1,500 vendors carrying Cerruti products, textile mills, and a holding company (Final Gastaldi Group) to control it all. And just as many of the independent fashion houses fell under the spell of globalization in the middle and late 1990s, Cerruti, too, decided to sell a controlling interest in his firm to Italian industrial group Fin.part in 2000.

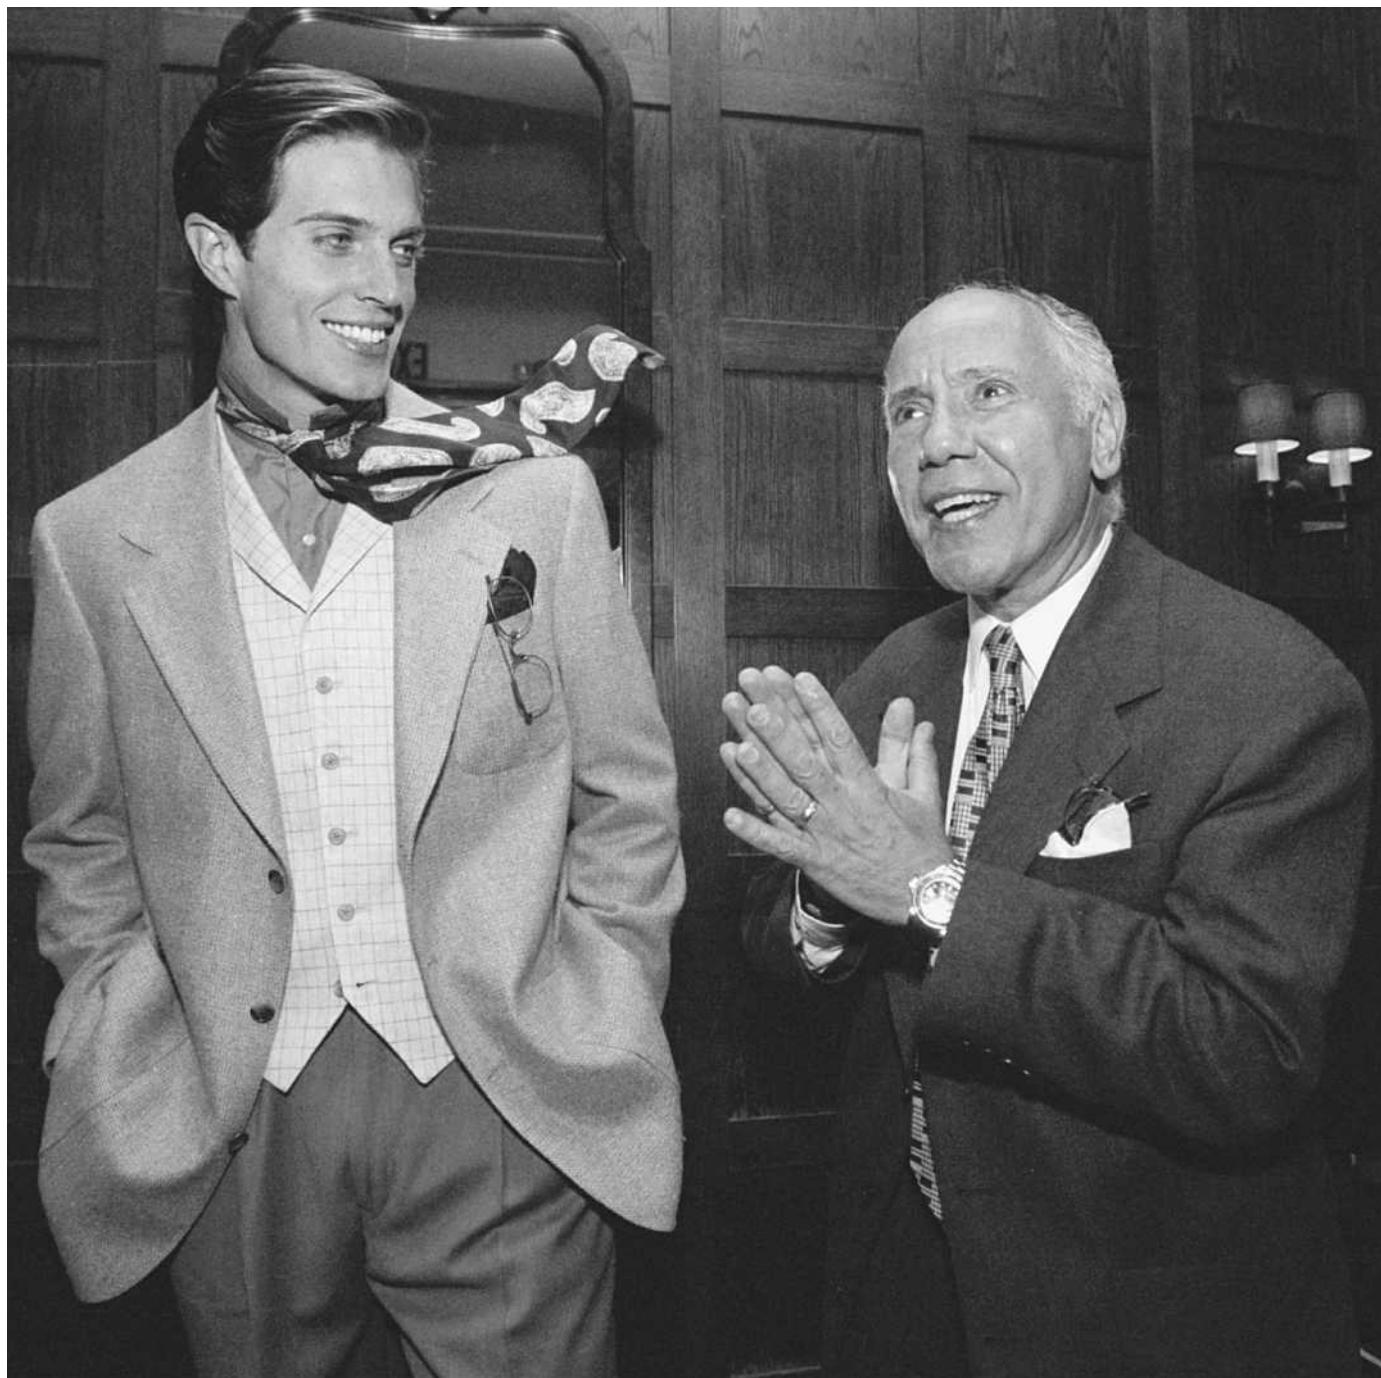

In 2001 Fin.part took over the remainder of Cerruti's business and forced the 71-year-old designer out. At his spring-summer 2002 showing in Milan, Cerruti took his final bow before a standing crowd, taking leave of the family business created more than 120 years before. As Cerruti embraced the two young designers hired to take his place, he assured the International Herald Tribune's Suzy Menkes he was not retiring, but already researching a "new project" involving the family-owned textile company.

—Richard Martin; updated by Daryl F. Mallett

CESARANI, Sal

American designer

Born: 25 September 1939 in New York. Education: Studied design at the Fashion Institute of Technology, New York, 1959–61. Family: Married Nancy Cesarani, 1961; children: Lisa, Christopher. Career: Junior designer, Bobby Brooks, New York, 1961–63; fashion display coordinator, Paul Stuart menswear store, New York, 1964–69; merchandising director, Polo by Ralph Lauren, 1970–72; designed menswear and sportswear for Thomas Co. Inc., in Japan; Cesarani shops opened in Japanese retailers Matsuya, Seer, and Tobu, 1972; designer, Country Britches, New York, 1973–75; designer, Stanley Blacker, New York, 1975–76; formed Cesarani Ltd., New York, 1976; women's collection introduced, 1977; company closed then reorganized as Cesarani division for Jaymar Ruby; formed licensing agreements with Hartmarx, 1987–88, Corbin, 1989, Britches of Georgetowne, 1991, and Japan Toray Diplomode; launched leather bag collection for Ace Luggage, 1992; created eyeglass collection for Nanamua Co., 1992; designer/president, Cesarani and SJC Concepts Inc., from 1993; introduced childrenswear collection for Matsuta Co., 1993; designed menswear collection for Thomas Co. Inc., 1994; created men's clothing collection through Panther, a division of Marubeni; teacher/critic, Fashion Institute of Technology. Exhibitions: Institute of the Metropolitan Museum of Art, 1995. Awards: Special Coty award for Menswear, 1974, 1975; Coty award for menswear, 1976; Fashion Group award of Boston, 1977; Coty Return award, 1982. Member: Advisory Board of the Fashion Crafts Educational Commission of the High School of Fashion Industries; founding member, New York Advisory Board of the Shannon Rodgers and Jerry Silverman School of Fashion Design and Merchandising, Kent State University, Ohio. Address: 201 East 79th Street, New York, NY, 10021, USA. Website: www.cesarani.com.

Sal Cesarani with one of his designs from his spring 1996 collection: basket weave sports coat, tattersall Cooper vest, twill pants, silk tie, and chambray shirt. © AP/Wide World Photos.

PUBLICATIONS

On CESARANI:

Books

Stegemeyer, Anne, Who's Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.

Articles

- Guerin, Ann, "Spotlight on Sal Cesarani," in Playbill, November 1977.
"Sal Cesarani: Tradition Missing," in GQ (New York), January 1982.
Staetter, Suzanne, "Cesarani Collection is Just for Certain Women," in the Houston Chronicle (Texas), 12 December 1984.
Lane, Dotty, "Cesarani Designs for the International Man," in Record-Courier, 20 August 1993.

- Boies, Elaine, "Clothes for the Well-Dressed Man," in Staten Island Advance, 3 June 1994.
- Socha, Miles, "New York's Dean of Good Taste, Sal Cesarnai, is Applying his Spruce Esthetic to a New Range of Sportswear," in Daily News Record (DNR), 14 August 1996.
- Goldstein, Lauren, "Redaelli Aims to Take Cesarnai to the Majors," in DNR, 27 October 1997.
- "Give Him a Hand," in DNR, 16 February 1998.

* * *

To the earthbound, Sal Cesarnai's menswear might be traditional or even historic. For the dreamer, the wanderer, or the imaginer, Cesarnai's evocative and romantic apparel epitomizes and condenses the perfect past. Like a Cindy Sherman portrait, Cesarnai's work is seldom a precise equivalent, but gains its power from suggestive resemblance and its ultimate inability to be classified into the past, so powerful are its connections and so focused is its originality. Extracting a nonchalance from American style between the wars and an élan from English aristocracy in its palmier days, Cesarnai possesses the power to transport one into a Merchant-Ivory film or to the reverie of Golden Age Hollywood. Were Cesarnai merely offering history and a wardrobe inventory that is of grandfathers and imagined heroes, we would be respectful, but not captivated. Cesarnai's renderings enhance historic designs with subtle change.

Cesarnai refuted the 20th-century predisposition to believe menswear was mundane. Rather, he gave sentimental spirit to the classic templates of the century's menswear. Having worked both as a designer for Polo/Ralph Lauren and Stanley Blacker, and for a while as a menswear coordinator at Paul Stuart, Cesarnai has consistently emphasized styling and the adventuresome ensemble of clothing. Sportswear and tailored clothing, tennis separates, classic tuxedos with the debonair slouches of the 1930s and 1940s, and the looser cuts and drape of Hollywood chic evoking Gary Cooper and Cary Grant characterize Cesarnai's style. True, not every man realizes the harmony of proportions of C.S. Bull or Hurrell heroes, but each Cesarnai client is capable of some aspiration to such pictorial grace.

When he relaunched a tailored clothing line in 1993, Cesarnai's Trans-Atlantic collection was not only Anglo-American, but as suggestive as a crossing on the Normandie. Redolent of the 1930s and 1940s, the collection employed separate vests with lapels, pattern mixes of herringbones, glen plaids, and other standard elements for the cool look of the era's styles. What is exceptional about Cesarnai is his sense of the fashion composition and modification: the slight eccentricity of a peak lapel on a single-breasted jacket or tartan blazer paired with evening separates evokes memories, but also jostles them, making the clothing fresh again.

Key to Cesarnai's sensibility, in addition to his Paul Stuart fashion styling, was his work as a design assistant to Ralph Lauren. If Lauren condenses nostalgia into an impacted sentiment more perfect than any real world that has ever existed, Cesarnai creates a fictive, movie-star desire, the fantasy of men's clothing and nonchalant style. Like Lauren, his is a study in composition, offering some perfectly regular components as well as a few that suggest special flourish.

As a designer, Cesarnai has displayed a unique gift for understanding the market: in the 1990s, both his ties and his later tailored clothing came at the right moment for a renewed classicism. The more understated ties then were composed into imaginative ensemble dressing with the grand patterns of vests, mixed slacks, and jackets. "I perceive," said the designer, "each piece of the collection as a component of man's personal style, to be worn and combined according to his own needs." Cesarnai invents menswear that is never tedious and his penchant for vintage perfection and superb collection editing is akin to Ralph Lauren's, though Cesarnai tends to greater fullness and drape as well as a greater informality and more congenial prices.

Cesarnai's extensive knowledge of fabric and cut are at the heart of his devotion to expert craftsmanship. In 1997 Cesarnai welcomed a partnership with Italian clothing manufacturer Redaelli. American-sold Cesarnai clothing, formalwear, outerwear, and neckwear collections are now produced in Milan. In addition to designing clothing, Cesarnai's astute sense of fashion trends makes him a sought-after special consultant for major fashion color forecasting companies and special projects, which even included designing ceremonial uniforms for the 1980 Winter Olympics.

"My passion is design," Cesarnai has explained, to take "a vision, a dream, a fleeting image of the American spirit...and creating something real from it." The integrity of his creations reflect his unerring focus on versatility, elegance, and craftsmanship. Cesarnai has continued to be heralded for his imaginative twists on classic styling. In his 1998 collection, he brought together a chestnut glen-plaid vested suit with a burnt-orange plaid cotton shirt and a foulard silk tie. His innovative combinations of pattern and color play together in his own collections but also open new possibilities in any man's existing wardrobe. The elegance in styling evident in clothes bearing the Cesarnai label lends them the versatility to be important pieces in an evolving wardrobe for years.

—Richard Martin; updated by Janette Goff Dixon

CHALAYAN, Hussein

British designer

Born: Huseyin Caglayan in Nicosia, Cyprus, 1970. Education: Highgate School, London; St. Martin's School of Art, London, 1989–93. Career: Launched own company, Cartesia Ltd., in 1994; designer, Autograph at Marks & Spencer; designer, TSE Cashmere, New York, 1994–2001; designer, Topshop, London; company liquidated, 2000; relaunched own label under his name in 2001. Collections: Senior year collection, St. Martin's School of Design, displayed at Browns, London. Awards: Absolut Vodka's London Fashion Week award, 1995; Designer of the Year, British Fashion Awards, 1999, 2000; British Designer of the Year, 1999, 2000.

PUBLICATIONS

On CHALAYAN:

Articles

- White, Constance C. R., "Hussein Chalayan's High-Wire Act," in the New York Times, 21 April 1998.
- _____, "Taking the Fad Out of Fashion," in the New York Times, 4 November 1998.
- Goldstein, Lauren, "The Fashion Games: These Seven Up-and-Coming Designers are the Ones to Watch...," in Time International, 9 October 2000.
- Craik, Laura, "The Designer Who Dared Not Do Sexy," in the Evening Standard (London), 10 January 2001.

- Boies, Elaine, "Clothes for the Well-Dressed Man," in Staten Island Advance, 3 June 1994.
- Socha, Miles, "New York's Dean of Good Taste, Sal Cesarnai, is Applying his Spruce Esthetic to a New Range of Sportswear," in Daily News Record (DNR), 14 August 1996.
- Goldstein, Lauren, "Redaelli Aims to Take Cesarnai to the Majors," in DNR, 27 October 1997.
- "Give Him a Hand," in DNR, 16 February 1998.

* * *

To the earthbound, Sal Cesarnai's menswear might be traditional or even historic. For the dreamer, the wanderer, or the imaginer, Cesarnai's evocative and romantic apparel epitomizes and condenses the perfect past. Like a Cindy Sherman portrait, Cesarnai's work is seldom a precise equivalent, but gains its power from suggestive resemblance and its ultimate inability to be classified into the past, so powerful are its connections and so focused is its originality. Extracting a nonchalance from American style between the wars and an élan from English aristocracy in its palmier days, Cesarnai possesses the power to transport one into a Merchant-Ivory film or to the reverie of Golden Age Hollywood. Were Cesarnai merely offering history and a wardrobe inventory that is of grandfathers and imagined heroes, we would be respectful, but not captivated. Cesarnai's renderings enhance historic designs with subtle change.

Cesarnai refuted the 20th-century predisposition to believe menswear was mundane. Rather, he gave sentimental spirit to the classic templates of the century's menswear. Having worked both as a designer for Polo/Ralph Lauren and Stanley Blacker, and for a while as a menswear coordinator at Paul Stuart, Cesarnai has consistently emphasized styling and the adventuresome ensemble of clothing. Sportswear and tailored clothing, tennis separates, classic tuxedos with the debonair slouches of the 1930s and 1940s, and the looser cuts and drape of Hollywood chic evoking Gary Cooper and Cary Grant characterize Cesarnai's style. True, not every man realizes the harmony of proportions of C.S. Bull or Hurrell heroes, but each Cesarnai client is capable of some aspiration to such pictorial grace.

When he relaunched a tailored clothing line in 1993, Cesarnai's Trans-Atlantic collection was not only Anglo-American, but as suggestive as a crossing on the Normandie. Redolent of the 1930s and 1940s, the collection employed separate vests with lapels, pattern mixes of herringbones, glen plaids, and other standard elements for the cool look of the era's styles. What is exceptional about Cesarnai is his sense of the fashion composition and modification: the slight eccentricity of a peak lapel on a single-breasted jacket or tartan blazer paired with evening separates evokes memories, but also jostles them, making the clothing fresh again.

Key to Cesarnai's sensibility, in addition to his Paul Stuart fashion styling, was his work as a design assistant to Ralph Lauren. If Lauren condenses nostalgia into an impacted sentiment more perfect than any real world that has ever existed, Cesarnai creates a fictive, movie-star desire, the fantasy of men's clothing and nonchalant style. Like Lauren, his is a study in composition, offering some perfectly regular components as well as a few that suggest special flourish.

As a designer, Cesarnai has displayed a unique gift for understanding the market: in the 1990s, both his ties and his later tailored clothing came at the right moment for a renewed classicism. The more understated ties then were composed into imaginative ensemble dressing with the grand patterns of vests, mixed slacks, and jackets. "I perceive," said the designer, "each piece of the collection as a component of man's personal style, to be worn and combined according to his own needs." Cesarnai invents menswear that is never tedious and his penchant for vintage perfection and superb collection editing is akin to Ralph Lauren's, though Cesarnai tends to greater fullness and drape as well as a greater informality and more congenial prices.

Cesarnai's extensive knowledge of fabric and cut are at the heart of his devotion to expert craftsmanship. In 1997 Cesarnai welcomed a partnership with Italian clothing manufacturer Redaelli. American-sold Cesarnai clothing, formalwear, outerwear, and neckwear collections are now produced in Milan. In addition to designing clothing, Cesarnai's astute sense of fashion trends makes him a sought-after special consultant for major fashion color forecasting companies and special projects, which even included designing ceremonial uniforms for the 1980 Winter Olympics.

"My passion is design," Cesarnai has explained, to take "a vision, a dream, a fleeting image of the American spirit...and creating something real from it." The integrity of his creations reflect his unerring focus on versatility, elegance, and craftsmanship. Cesarnai has continued to be heralded for his imaginative twists on classic styling. In his 1998 collection, he brought together a chestnut glen-plaid vested suit with a burnt-orange plaid cotton shirt and a foulard silk tie. His innovative combinations of pattern and color play together in his own collections but also open new possibilities in any man's existing wardrobe. The elegance in styling evident in clothes bearing the Cesarnai label lends them the versatility to be important pieces in an evolving wardrobe for years.

—Richard Martin; updated by Janette Goff Dixon

CHALAYAN, Hussein

British designer

Born: Huseyin Caglayan in Nicosia, Cyprus, 1970. Education: Highgate School, London; St. Martin's School of Art, London, 1989–93. Career: Launched own company, Cartesia Ltd., in 1994; designer, Autograph at Marks & Spencer; designer, TSE Cashmere, New York, 1994–2001; designer, Topshop, London; company liquidated, 2000; relaunched own label under his name in 2001. Collections: Senior year collection, St. Martin's School of Design, displayed at Browns, London. Awards: Absolut Vodka's London Fashion Week award, 1995; Designer of the Year, British Fashion Awards, 1999, 2000; British Designer of the Year, 1999, 2000.

PUBLICATIONS

On CHALAYAN:

Articles

- White, Constance C. R., "Hussein Chalayan's High-Wire Act," in the New York Times, 21 April 1998.
- _____, "Taking the Fad Out of Fashion," in the New York Times, 4 November 1998.
- Goldstein, Lauren, "The Fashion Games: These Seven Up-and-Coming Designers are the Ones to Watch...," in Time International, 9 October 2000.
- Craik, Laura, "The Designer Who Dared Not Do Sexy," in the Evening Standard (London), 10 January 2001.

Hussein Chalayan, winter 2000 collection: demonstration of how a table becomes a skirt. © AP/Wide World Photos.

Menkes, Suzy, "Hussein Chalayan Maps His Journey," in the International Herald Tribune, 13 March 2001.

Alexander, Hilary, "Chalayan Returns," in the Daily Telegraph (London), 15 March 2001.

Armstrong, Lisa, "A Clever Comeback," in the Times (London), 26 March 2001.

* * *

Among those fashion designers considered intellectual or avant garde, Hussein Chalayan has the distinction of having been dubbed both a genius and the mad professor of British fashion. A thoughtful designer of collections with purity of vision, integrity, and wearability, he is often counted in company with designers like Rei Kawakubo and Martin Margiela.

Chalayan's collections consistently challenge familiar notions of fashion while still succeeding in being elegant and beautiful. His work is inspired by the interfaces of technology, science, culture, and the human body. His more conceptual designs are often sculptural, with pieces like the aeroplane dress, molded of glass fiber with a remote-control panel, a tiered wooden skirt doubling as a table, and dresses of sugar-spun glass making their appearances in various shows. While in school, one of his professors suggested he switch to sculpture. If he had, the fashion world would have lost a unique voice whose work blurs the line between art and style with evocative and sometimes brilliant results.

Shortly after graduating, Chalayan started his own line, also doing collections for TSE of New York, Autograph at Marks & Spencer in London, and a line for Topshop of London. Although his clothes are available at high-end venues like Browns, Harvey Nichols, Harrods, and Liberty, he has worked in cross-media, designing an installation for London's Millennium Dome, doing collaborations with a variety of other artists and designers, and having his more sculptural designs exhibited in art galleries. He is reticent of the fashion scene and is not given to courting celebrity power.

A designer of ideas, Chalayan is also a designer of clothes to be worn. Though some critics judge his work as too eccentric and heady for actual people to wear, an examination of any given Chalayan collection belies this sentiment. Although several high-concept pieces will usually anchor one of his collections, they are accompanied by finely cut, deceptively simple, eminently wearable garments. This kind of commerciality with pure vision at its heart is not a common commodity in any field of design, including fashion; consequently, Chalayan's praises have been much sung by the press, his work well respected by other designers. As one fashion journalist put it, "Watching a Chalayan show is like listening to Mozart. It is moving and magical, always with a hidden meaning, which to detractors sound pretentious." A theme common to all of Chalayan's collections is the body itself, in relation to various aspects of the world we live in from space, religion, and cultural mores to technology and war.

His fall 2000 collection, which included the table skirt, was inspired by the designer's thinking on the wartime impermanence that finds homes raided and families forced to flee or be killed. At the end of the show, the living room set on the catwalk stage was turned into dresses and suitcases, and off the models went, with their homes on their backs. Also included in this collection were finely tailored coats with unexpected draping, highlighted in white piping, creating a sense of volume, depth, and luxury, as well as elegant dresses in lush colors, and full, layered skirts and tops, exposing a hidden layer of ruffles at cutouts in the hem—all extremely wearable garments. In another collection, underlining the constraints imposed on women by the Muslim religion, Chalayan created chadors of varying lengths and sent the models out wearing nothing beneath them, drawing attention, inescapably, to the fact that beneath the delimitations of the garment there are living, breathing women. Indeed, Chalayan's models almost always wear low- or flat-heeled shoes, and there is a decided emphasis on grace and dignity over the overt sexuality of high-heeled couture in his designs.

A unique and elegant futurism achieved through complex cutting and a clean architecturalism are the hallmarks of Chalayan's collections. One spring collection offered splashes of sweet color in crisp, off-the-shoulder dresses and deceptively simple frocks with multiple gathers. Another delivered these features in starker shades with smock dresses of fine pleats, pieces made up of pleats within pleats, mesh overlays, and sharply tailored jackets. Other innovations and contributions that Chalayan's idea-driven design have produced include unrippable paper clothes, suits with illuminated flight-path patterns, long knitted dresses with built-in walking sticks, pleated "concertina" dresses, cone and cube headdresses, designs based on experiments, flight paths, abstractions of meteorological charts, and a host of exquisite, minimal, subtly draped works.

Hussein Chalayan, winter 2000 collection: skirt which transformed from a table. © AFP/CORBIS.

At the end of 2000, due to some mishaps with manufacturers and despite rising profits, Chalayan took his company into voluntary liquidation. The collection he designed in the interim between liquidation and the relaunch of his new label were described as "hugely desirable" and "timeless." The collection came from Chalayan's meditations on journeys and maps. Shirttails emerge briefly from under a skirt's hips, a white cotton shirt turns into a dress, meteor-streaked inserts distinguish tailored coats—all part of the designer's idea that "there's a progression that carries over from one piece to another." Taking the conceptualization further, into the consideration of personal journeys of identity, Chalayan addresses the subject of cultural assimilation with clothes like wool jackets inset with fragments of denim and leather.

Speaking about this "map reading" collection, the designer sums up the dichotomy that marks his collections, that fashion is both intellectual and relevant, "I'm fascinated by the idea of cultural assimilation, the way people transform their identities and how other people see that as a threat. Actually, in some ways, that's irrelevant. You don't need to know any of that stuff to wear these clothes. All you need to know is how to enjoy them."

—Jessica Reisman

CHAMPION PRODUCTS INC.

American sportswear manufacturer

Founded: as Knickerbocker Knitting Company by Abe and Bill Fainbloom, in 1919. Company History: Named changed to Champion Knitting Mills, Inc.; introduced reversible t-shirts for Navy training, 1940s; introduced the Jogbra, 1977; acquired by Sara Lee Corporation; official outfitter for U.S. Olympic basketball team, 1992; official sponsor and apparel licensee of WNBA, 1996; launched children's roller hockey line, 1997; debuted collection of backpacks and sports bags, 1999; introduced Fiberzone and Double Dry Bodywear lines, 2000; signed on as exclusive outfitter of the XFL, 2000; launched Tactel line of activewear and Champion Silver line, 2001. Company Address: 1000 E. Hanes Mill Road, Winston Salem, NC 27105, U.S.A. Company Websites: www.championusa.com; www.championjogbra.com.

PUBLICATIONS

ON CHAMPION

ARTICLES

- Arlen, Jeffrey, "Champion Brands Overseas Markets," in DNR, 18 April 1985.
 Murray, Kathy, "Thanks for the Advice," in Forbes, 2 May 1988.
 Robb, Gregory A., "Champion Products Accepts Bid," in the New York Times, 14 February 1989.
 Berger, Warren, "Champion Starts to Show Its True Colors Off the Field," in Adweek's Marketing Week, 23 April 1990.
 Sterne, Hilary, "Honest Sweats: Champion's Cotton Shirts are the Real McCoy," in Gentlemen's Quarterly, May 1992.
 Leibowitz, David S., "Two Cases Where Quality Will Out," in Financial World, 23 June 1992.
 Phalon, Richard, "Walking Billboards," in Forbes, 7 December 1992.
 Grish, Kristina, "Champion, Starter Test Mainstream Appeal in Youth Roller Hockey Apparel," in Sporting Goods Business, September 1997.
 "Vendors Lead Charge with Women's Causes," in Sporting Goods Business, 15 October 1998.
 Feitelberg, Rosemary, "Hoop Apparel: Not a Slam Dunk Yet," in WWD, 14 January 1999.
 Grish, Kristina, "Sport Labels Have Accessory Additions in the Bag for Fall," in Sporting Goods Business, 8 March 1999.
 Bronson, Cory, "The XFL Will Champion Its Uniforms at Retail This Fall," in Sporting Goods Business, 11 October 2000.
 Cassidy, Hilary, "Champion Gives Retailers Online Hot Market Resource," in Sporting Goods Business, 10 November 2000.
 "Champion Takes Seamless Approach to Active Apparel," in Sporting Goods Business, 19 January 2001.
 Griffin, Tara, "Champion Silver Debuts," in Sporting Goods Business, 14 May 2001.

* * *

Champion Products Inc. has always catered to the customer who wants ease of movement from activewear. The company was formed

Hussein Chalayan, winter 2000 collection: skirt which transformed from a table. © AFP/CORBIS.

At the end of 2000, due to some mishaps with manufacturers and despite rising profits, Chalayan took his company into voluntary liquidation. The collection he designed in the interim between liquidation and the relaunch of his new label were described as "hugely desirable" and "timeless." The collection came from Chalayan's meditations on journeys and maps. Shirttails emerge briefly from under a skirt's hips, a white cotton shirt turns into a dress, meteor-streaked inserts distinguish tailored coats—all part of the designer's idea that "there's a progression that carries over from one piece to another." Taking the conceptualization further, into the consideration of personal journeys of identity, Chalayan addresses the subject of cultural assimilation with clothes like wool jackets inset with fragments of denim and leather.

Speaking about this "map reading" collection, the designer sums up the dichotomy that marks his collections, that fashion is both intellectual and relevant, "I'm fascinated by the idea of cultural assimilation, the way people transform their identities and how other people see that as a threat. Actually, in some ways, that's irrelevant. You don't need to know any of that stuff to wear these clothes. All you need to know is how to enjoy them."

—Jessica Reisman

CHAMPION PRODUCTS INC.

American sportswear manufacturer

Founded: as Knickerbocker Knitting Company by Abe and Bill Fainbloom, in 1919. Company History: Named changed to Champion Knitting Mills, Inc.; introduced reversible t-shirts for Navy training, 1940s; introduced the Jogbra, 1977; acquired by Sara Lee Corporation; official outfitter for U.S. Olympic basketball team, 1992; official sponsor and apparel licensee of WNBA, 1996; launched children's roller hockey line, 1997; debuted collection of backpacks and sports bags, 1999; introduced Fiberzone and Double Dry Bodywear lines, 2000; signed on as exclusive outfitter of the XFL, 2000; launched Tactel line of activewear and Champion Silver line, 2001. Company Address: 1000 E. Hanes Mill Road, Winston Salem, NC 27105, U.S.A. Company Websites: www.championusa.com; www.championjogbra.com.

PUBLICATIONS

ON CHAMPION

ARTICLES

- Arlen, Jeffrey, "Champion Brands Overseas Markets," in DNR, 18 April 1985.
 Murray, Kathy, "Thanks for the Advice," in Forbes, 2 May 1988.
 Robb, Gregory A., "Champion Products Accepts Bid," in the New York Times, 14 February 1989.
 Berger, Warren, "Champion Starts to Show Its True Colors Off the Field," in Adweek's Marketing Week, 23 April 1990.
 Sterne, Hilary, "Honest Sweats: Champion's Cotton Shirts are the Real McCoy," in Gentlemen's Quarterly, May 1992.
 Leibowitz, David S., "Two Cases Where Quality Will Out," in Financial World, 23 June 1992.
 Phalon, Richard, "Walking Billboards," in Forbes, 7 December 1992.
 Grish, Kristina, "Champion, Starter Test Mainstream Appeal in Youth Roller Hockey Apparel," in Sporting Goods Business, September 1997.
 "Vendors Lead Charge with Women's Causes," in Sporting Goods Business, 15 October 1998.
 Feitelberg, Rosemary, "Hoop Apparel: Not a Slam Dunk Yet," in WWD, 14 January 1999.
 Grish, Kristina, "Sport Labels Have Accessory Additions in the Bag for Fall," in Sporting Goods Business, 8 March 1999.
 Bronson, Cory, "The XFL Will Champion Its Uniforms at Retail This Fall," in Sporting Goods Business, 11 October 2000.
 Cassidy, Hilary, "Champion Gives Retailers Online Hot Market Resource," in Sporting Goods Business, 10 November 2000.
 "Champion Takes Seamless Approach to Active Apparel," in Sporting Goods Business, 19 January 2001.
 Griffin, Tara, "Champion Silver Debuts," in Sporting Goods Business, 14 May 2001.

* * *

Champion Products Inc. has always catered to the customer who wants ease of movement from activewear. The company was formed in 1919 by brothers Abe and Bill Fainbloom, as the Knickerbocker Knitting Company to produce sturdy sweaters. The company pioneered a heavy-duty cotton, which it patented as Reverse-Weave, and manufactured sweatshirts primarily for athletes. Champion sweatshirts were only the earliest of several industry innovations—including the first cotton football jerseys, the first hooded sweatshirts (originally worn on the sidelines during games), the first reversible t-shirts (for the Navy during World War II), the first breathable mesh shirts and shorts, the first lined nylon-shell jackets, and the first comfortable, supportive jogging bra for women. This sports bra, which evolved into the Jogbra, was originally designed by two women joggers who sewed men's athletic supporters together to wear while running. The patented Jogbra went on sale in 1977 and has been a bestseller ever since.

Eight decades after its founding, Champion has diversified into all facets of the activewear market, supplying sweats, uniforms, and an ever-expanding line of women's workout apparel. Serious athletes are often the most loyal fans of Champion products, yet its myriad of products suits both active and casual lifestyles. Staples such as Champion jerseys and sweatshirts have been supplied to hundreds of intercollegiate and high school-level athletic programs to use as both practice and competition uniforms. Champion has long been an official outfitter to many professional sports teams, predominantly in football and basketball. Even the U.S. Olympic basketball team named Champion its official supplier for practice and game uniforms in 1992—the ultimate compliment to be worn by some of the world's top athletes.

Champion's sportswear has been unparalleled for its durability and the longevity of its garments. For the rough and tumble world of professional sports, Champion more than held its own against the harsh conditions of long practices and games. "Vintage" Champion sweatshirts and trousers, time-worn with holes or frayed edges, frequently seemed as dear to consumers as new ones.

Over the years Champion has allied itself with nonprofit groups, and in 1998 joined the National Alliance of Breast Cancer Organizations (NABCO) to raise awareness of breast cancer. The company's commitment was twofold: first by placing NABCO's logo and a pink ribbon on all WNBA apparel, and secondly, donating a portion of licensed sales to NABCO. Yet by the end of the year, however, many activewear manufacturers were worried about sales—or lack thereof—in basketball apparel since the American Basketball League had folded, the WNBA's popularity waxed and waned, and the sport's top competitor, Michael Jordan, had retired. To pick up the slack Champion and other outfitters turned to accessories, creating extensive lines of backpacks and athletic bags customized for virtually every sport.

In 2000 Champion was put on the selling block by parent company Sara Lee Corporation, who was in the midst of a reorganization. Though Champion was securing the rights to provide apparel for several NFL teams, it had also signed on as the official outfitter of the XFL. In the XFL deal, Champion agreed to supply official uniforms and practicewear for the league's eight teams, as well as replica jerseys for retailers. Yet by 2001 the XFL had folded and Champion lost a lucrative contract.

To bolster its bottomline, Champion introduced a new Jogbra line called Champion Silver. The Silver collection was manufactured with Static-X, a new yarn comprised of silver-coated threads woven into the fabric, which inhibited the growth of bacteria and helped control odor. The new line consisted of sports bras, tanks, tops, and shorts made with the Static-X yarn. Next came women's seamless apparel made from Tactel, a technology-advanced nylon with superior wicking, comfort, and support.

In the 21st century, Champion remained the outfitter of choice for many collegiate and professional teams. With almost a dozen NBA teams, seven collegiate teams, and a number of sponsored events (Sail Boston 2000, the YMCA World's Largest Run), Champion's name is firmly emblazoned in activewear history. From its traditional sweatshirts and mesh jerseys, from socks and hats to watches and eyewear, athletes the world over have sought out Champion's reliable, comfortable apparel. Champion products continue live up to their name.

—Lisa Marsh and Nelly Rhodes

CHANEL, Gabrielle "Coco"

French fashion designer

Born: Saumur, France, 19 August 1883. Education: At convent orphanage, Aubazine, 1895–1900; convent school, Moulins, 1900–02.

Career: Clerk, Au Sans Pareil hosiery shop, Moulins, 1902–04; café-concert singer, using nickname "Coco," in Moulins and Vichy, 1905–08; lived with Etienne Balsan, Château de Royalieu and in Paris, 1908–09; stage costume designer, 1912–37, established millinery and women's fashion house with sponsorship of Arthur "Boy" Cappel, in Paris, 1913, later on rue Cambon, Paris, 1928; established fashion shops in Deauville, 1913, Biarritz, 1916; fragrance, No. 5, marketed from 1921; film costume designer, 1931–62; headquarters closed during World War II; exiled to Lausanne for affair with Nazi officer, 1945–53; rue Cambon headquarters reopened and first post-war showing, 1954; Broadway musical Coco, starring Katherine Hepburn debuted on Broadway, 1969; company continued after Chanel's death, 1971; ready-to-wear introduced, 1977; Karl Lagerfeld brought in as designer for couture, 1983; Lagerfeld took over ready-to-wear, 1984; gun manufacturer Holland & Holland acquired, 1996; French beachwear company Eres purchased, 1997; one licensing agreement with Luxxotica for eyewear. Other fragrances include No. 22, 1921, Cuir de Russie, 1924, No. 19, 1970, and from the House of Chanel, Cristalle, 1974, Coco, 1984, Egoïste for men, 1990, Allure, 1996, and Allure Homme, 1998; launch of Precision skincare line, 1999; introduced line of his-and-hers watches, 2000. Exhibitions: Les Grands Couturiers Parisiens 1910–1939, Musée du Costume, Paris, 1965; Fashion: An Anthology, Victoria & Albert Museum, London, 1971; The Twenties & Thirties, Metropolitan Museum of Art, New York, 1977; Folies de dentelles: Balenciaga, Cardin, Chanel, Dior...Exposition du 24 juin au octobre 2000, Musée des Beaux-Arts et de la dentelle, 2000. Awards: Neiman Marcus award, Dallas, 1957; Sunday Times International Fashion award, London, 1963. Died: 10 January 1971, in Paris. Company Address: 29–31 rue Cambon, 75001 Paris, France. Company Website: www.chanel.com.

in 1919 by brothers Abe and Bill Fainbloom, as the Knickerbocker Knitting Company to produce sturdy sweaters. The company pioneered a heavy-duty cotton, which it patented as Reverse-Weave, and manufactured sweatshirts primarily for athletes. Champion sweatshirts were only the earliest of several industry innovations—including the first cotton football jerseys, the first hooded sweatshirts (originally worn on the sidelines during games), the first reversible t-shirts (for the Navy during World War II), the first breathable mesh shirts and shorts, the first lined nylon-shell jackets, and the first comfortable, supportive jogging bra for women. This sports bra, which evolved into the Jogbra, was originally designed by two women joggers who sewed men's athletic supporters together to wear while running. The patented Jogbra went on sale in 1977 and has been a bestseller ever since.

Eight decades after its founding, Champion has diversified into all facets of the activewear market, supplying sweats, uniforms, and an ever-expanding line of women's workout apparel. Serious athletes are often the most loyal fans of Champion products, yet its myriad of products suits both active and casual lifestyles. Staples such as Champion jerseys and sweatshirts have been supplied to hundreds of intercollegiate and high school-level athletic programs to use as both practice and competition uniforms. Champion has long been an official outfitter to many professional sports teams, predominantly in football and basketball. Even the U.S. Olympic basketball team named Champion its official supplier for practice and game uniforms in 1992—the ultimate compliment to be worn by some of the world's top athletes.

Champion's sportswear has been unparalleled for its durability and the longevity of its garments. For the rough and tumble world of professional sports, Champion more than held its own against the harsh conditions of long practices and games. "Vintage" Champion sweatshirts and trousers, time-worn with holes or frayed edges, frequently seemed as dear to consumers as new ones.

Over the years Champion has allied itself with nonprofit groups, and in 1998 joined the National Alliance of Breast Cancer Organizations (NABCO) to raise awareness of breast cancer. The company's commitment was twofold: first by placing NABCO's logo and a pink ribbon on all WNBA apparel, and secondly, donating a portion of licensed sales to NABCO. Yet by the end of the year, however, many activewear manufacturers were worried about sales—or lack thereof—in basketball apparel since the American Basketball League had folded, the WNBA's popularity waxed and waned, and the sport's top competitor, Michael Jordan, had retired. To pick up the slack Champion and other outfitters turned to accessories, creating extensive lines of backpacks and athletic bags customized for virtually every sport.

In 2000 Champion was put on the selling block by parent company Sara Lee Corporation, who was in the midst of a reorganization. Though Champion was securing the rights to provide apparel for several NFL teams, it had also signed on as the official outfitter of the XFL. In the XFL deal, Champion agreed to supply official uniforms and practicewear for the league's eight teams, as well as replica jerseys for retailers. Yet by 2001 the XFL had folded and Champion lost a lucrative contract.

To bolster its bottomline, Champion introduced a new Jogbra line called Champion Silver. The Silver collection was manufactured with Static-X, a new yarn comprised of silver-coated threads woven into the fabric, which inhibited the growth of bacteria and helped control odor. The new line consisted of sports bras, tanks, tops, and shorts made with the Static-X yarn. Next came women's seamless apparel made from Tactel, a technology-advanced nylon with superior wicking, comfort, and support.

In the 21st century, Champion remained the outfitter of choice for many collegiate and professional teams. With almost a dozen NBA teams, seven collegiate teams, and a number of sponsored events (Sail Boston 2000, the YMCA World's Largest Run), Champion's name is firmly emblazoned in activewear history. From its traditional sweatshirts and mesh jerseys, from socks and hats to watches and eyewear, athletes the world over have sought out Champion's reliable, comfortable apparel. Champion products continue live up to their name.

—Lisa Marsh and Nelly Rhodes

CHANEL, Gabrielle "Coco"

French fashion designer

Born: Saumur, France, 19 August 1883. Education: At convent orphanage, Aubazine, 1895–1900; convent school, Moulins, 1900–02.

Career: Clerk, Au Sans Pareil hosiery shop, Moulins, 1902–04; café-concert singer, using nickname "Coco," in Moulins and Vichy, 1905–08; lived with Etienne Balsan, Château de Royalieu and in Paris, 1908–09; stage costume designer, 1912–37, established millinery and women's fashion house with sponsorship of Arthur "Boy" Cappel, in Paris, 1913, later on rue Cambon, Paris, 1928; established fashion shops in Deauville, 1913, Biarritz, 1916; fragrance, No. 5, marketed from 1921; film costume designer, 1931–62; headquarters closed during World War II; exiled to Lausanne for affair with Nazi officer, 1945–53; rue Cambon headquarters reopened and first post-war showing, 1954; Broadway musical Coco, starring Katherine Hepburn debuted on Broadway, 1969; company continued after Chanel's death, 1971; ready-to-wear introduced, 1977; Karl Lagerfeld brought in as designer for couture, 1983; Lagerfeld took over ready-to-wear, 1984; gun manufacturer Holland & Holland acquired, 1996; French beachwear company Eres purchased, 1997; one licensing agreement with Luxxotica for eyewear. Other fragrances include No. 22, 1921, Cuir de Russie, 1924, No. 19, 1970, and from the House of Chanel, Cristalle, 1974, Coco, 1984, Egoïste for men, 1990, Allure, 1996, and Allure Homme, 1998; launch of Precision skincare line, 1999; introduced line of his-and-hers watches, 2000. Exhibitions: Les Grands Couturiers Parisiens 1910–1939, Musée du Costume, Paris, 1965; Fashion: An Anthology, Victoria & Albert Museum, London, 1971; The Twenties & Thirties, Metropolitan Museum of Art, New York, 1977; Folies de dentelles: Balenciaga, Cardin, Chanel, Dior...Exposition du 24 juin au octobre 2000, Musée des Beaux-Arts et de la dentelle, 2000. Awards: Neiman Marcus award, Dallas, 1957; Sunday Times International Fashion award, London, 1963. Died: 10 January 1971, in Paris. Company Address: 29–31 rue Cambon, 75001 Paris, France. Company Website: www.chanel.com.

Marlene Dietrich modeling a masculine-styled pant suit designed by Coco Chanel, 1933. © AP/Wide World Photos.

PUBLICATIONS

On CHANEL:

Books

- Crawford, M.D.C., The Ways of Fashion, New York, 1948.
 Baillen, Claude, Chanel solitaire, Paris, 1971, and London, 1973.
 Haedrich, Michael, Coco Chanel secrète, Paris, 1971; published as Coco Chanel: Her Life, Her Secrets, Boston, 1972.
 Galante, Pierre, Les années Chanel, Paris, 1972; published as Madoiselle Chanel, Chicago, 1973.

- Charles-Roux, Edmonde, L'irrégulière, ou mon itinéraire Chanel, Paris, 1974; published as Chanel, Her Life, Her World, New York, 1975, London, 1976.
 Morand, Paul, L'allure de Chanel, Paris, 1976, 1996.
 Charles-Roux, Edmonde, Chanel and Her World, Paris, 1979, London, 1981.
 Delay, Claude, Chanel solitaire, Paris, 1983.
 The Polytechnic, Coco Chanel, Brighton, 1984.
 Milbank, Caroline Rennolds, Couture: The Great Designers, New York, 1985.
 Haedrich, Marcel, Coco Chanel, Paris, 1987.
 Leymarie, Jean, Chanel, New York, 1987.
 Charles-Roux, Edmonde, Chanel, London, 1989.
 Kennett, Frances, Coco: The Life and Loves of Gabrielle Chanel, London, 1989.
 Grumbach, Lilian, Chanel m'a dit, Paris, 1990.
 Madsen, Axel, Chanel: A Woman of Her Own, New York, 1990.
 Guillen, Pierre-Yves, and Jacqueline Claude, The Golden Thimble: French Haute Couture, Paris, 1990.
 Steele, Valerie, Women of Fashion: Twentieth-Century Designers, New York, 1991.
 Mackrell, Alice, Coco Chanel, New York, 1992.
 Ash, Juliet, and Elizabeth Wilson, eds., Chic Thrills: A Fashion Reader, Berkeley, California, 1993.
 Lagerfeld, Karl, Chanel, Paris, 1995.
 Baudot, François, Chanel, New York, 1996.
 Musée des Beaux-Arts et de la dentelle, Folies de dentelles: Balenciaga, Cardin, Chanel, Dior..., [exhibition catalogue], Alençon, 2000.

Articles

- “Gabrielle Chanel,” [obituary] in the Times (London), 12 January 1971.
 “Chanel No. 1,” in Time, 25 January 1971.
 Shaeffer, Claire, “The Comfortable Side of Couture,” in Threads (Newtown, Connecticut), June/July 1989.
 Kazanjian, Dodie, “Chanel Suit,” in Vogue, August 1990.
 Fedii, Daniela, “Coco la ribelle,” in Elle (Milan), November 1990.
 Steele, Valerie, “Chanel in Context,” in Juliet Ash and Elizabeth Wilson, eds., Chic Thrills, A Fashion Reader, Berkeley, California 1993.
 Collins, Amy Fine, “Haute Coco,” in Vanity Fair (New York), June 1994.
 Menkes, Suzy, “Strong Chanel Holds Up Couture’s Falling Walls,” in the International Herald Tribune, 21 March 1995.
 Spindler, Amy M., “Lagerfeld Tones Down the Look at Chanel,” in the New York Times, 21 March 1995.
 “Chanel: The Naughty Professor,” in Women’s Wear Daily, 21 March 1995.
 Sakamaki, Sachiko, “Chanel Surfing in Tokyo; Japan is Nuts About the French Brand Name,” in the Far Eastern Economic Review, 11 January 1996.
 Menkes, Suzy, “Magnificent Chanel Defines the Season,” in the International Herald Tribune, 4 March 2000.
 ———, “Class and Classics at Chanel,” in the International Herald Tribune, 24 January 2001.
 ———, “Chanel Goes to the Head of the Class,” in the International Herald Tribune, 11 July 2001.

Coco Chanel in New York. © Underwood & Underwood/CORBIS.

* * *

A woman of ambition and determination, Gabrielle Chanel, nicknamed "Coco," rose from humble beginnings and an unhappy childhood to become one of the 20th century's most prominent couturiers, prevailing for nearly half a century. In contrast to the opulent elegance of the belle époque, Chanel's designs were based on simplicity and elegance. She introduced relaxed dressing, expressing the aspirations of the day's woman, replacing impractical clothing with functional styling.

Chanel's early years tended to be vague in detail, being full of inaccuracies and contradictions, due to her deliberate concealment of her deprived childhood. It is generally accepted that Chanel gained some dressmaking and millinery experience prior to working in a hat shop in Deauville, France. Using her skills as a milliner she opened shops in Paris, Deauville, and Biarritz with the financial assistance of a backer. Chanel was an astute businesswoman and skillful publicist, quickly expanding her work to include skirts, jerseys in stockinette jersey, and accessories.

Recognized as the designer of the 1920s, Chanel initiated an era of casual dressing, appropriate to the occasion, for relaxed outdoor clothing created to be worn in comfort and without constricting corsets, liberating women with loosely fitting garments. Her style was of uncluttered simplicity, incorporating practical details.

In 1916 Chanel introduced jersey, a soft elasticated knit previously only used for undergarments, as the new fashion fabric. Wool jersey produced softer, lighter clothing with uncluttered fluid lines. She made simple jersey dresses in navy and grey, cut to flatter the figure rather than to emphasize and distort the natural body shape. The demand for her new nonconformist designs by the wealthy was so great and the use of jersey so successful Chanel extended her range, creating her own jersey fabric designs, which were manufactured by Rodier.

Highly original in her concept of design, Chanel ceaselessly borrowed ideas from the male wardrobe, combining masculine tailoring with women's clothing. Her suits were precise but remain untailored, with flowing lines, retaining considerable individuality and simple elegance. Riding breeches, wide-legged trousers, blazers, and sweaters were all taken and adapted. A major force in introducing and establishing common sense and understated simplicity into womenswear, Chanel's coordination of the cardigan, worn with a classic straight skirt, became a standard combination of wearable separates.

Chanel produced her cardigans in tweed and jersey fabrics, initiating the perennially popular "Chanel suit," which usually consisted of two or three pieces: a cardigan-style jacket, weighted with her trademark gilt chain stitched around the inside hem, a simple easy-to-wear skirt, worn with a blouse (with blouse fabric coordinated with the jacket lining). Her work offered comfort and streamlined simplicity, creating clothes for the modern woman, whom she epitomized herself. The key to her design philosophy was construction, producing traditional classics outliving each season's new fashion trends and apparel. While other designers presented new looks for each new season, Chanel adapted the refined detailing and style lines.

Her colors were predominantly grey, navy, and beige, incorporating highlights of a richer and broader palette. Chanel introduced the ever popular "little black dress," created for daywear, eveningwear, and cocktail dressing which became a firm fixture in the fashion world during her tenure, and is still popular today.

Attentive to detail, adding to day and eveningwear, Chanel established a reputation for extensive uses of costume jewelry, with innovative combinations of real and imitation gems, crystal clusters, strings of pearls, and ornate jewelled cuff links, adding brilliant contrast to the stark simplicity of her designs. The successful development of Chanel No. 5 perfume in 1922 assisted in the financing of her couture empire during difficult years. An interesting aspect of Chanel's career was the reopening of her couture house, which was closed during World War II. After 15 years in exile for having an affair with Nazi officer Hans Gunther von Dincklage, Chanel relaunched her work in 1954 at the age of 71, reintroducing the Chanel suit, which formed the basis for many of her collections and become a hallmark. The look adopted shorter skirts and braid trimmed cardigan jackets.

Despite her work and individual style, Chanel craved personal and financial independence, and was ruthless in her search for success. She was unique in revolutionizing the fashion industry with dress reform and in promoting the emancipation of women. Her influence touched many American and European designers, who have continued to reinforce her concept of uncomplicated classics. Once such designer is Karl Lagerfeld who took over designing the Chanel couture line in 1983 and its ready-to-wear collections the following year. He is widely credited with bringing Chanel back to the forefront of fashion, by taking original Chanel designs and tweaking them to appeal to younger customers.

Throughout the 1990s and into the 2000s Lagerfeld kept the Chanel name alive and well. His collections receive high praise, season after season, and he is among the last of the great old-school designers. As Suzy Menkes of the International Herald Tribune so aptly put it in March 2000, "Lagerfeld will soon be the last of the fashion Mohicans, the tribe that came center stage in ready-to-wear in the 1960s but were schooled in the old couture ways of rigorous cut, perfect execution, invention in detail.... Who in the next generation can ever fill his seven-league boots?" Who indeed?

—Carol Mary Brown; updated by Sydonie Bénet

CHARLES, Caroline

British designer

Born: Cairo, Egypt, c. 1943. Education: Attended boarding school in Harrogate, England; studied fashion at the Art School in Swindon. Career: Worked for couturier Michael Sherrard, and for Mary Quant, Knightsbridge; assisted fashion photographer Tony Rawlinson; returned to Mary Quant; established own business, 1963; moved to Beauchamp Place, 1966; designed for a number of celebrities and musicians, 1960s; designed for British royalty, beginning in the 1980s; opened new store on Bond Street, London, 1990s. Address: 9, St. Johns Wood High Street, London NW8 7N6 England.

PUBLICATIONS

On CHARLES:

Articles

- "Designs for the Princess of Wales," in the Times, 3 November 1981.
- Brampton, Sally, "Showing the Rest of the World," in The Observer, 20 March 1983.
- Kendall, Ena, "Caroline Charles: A Room of My Own," in The Observer Magazine, 16 August 1987.
- Lomas, Jane, "Staying Power," in The Observer, 16 August 1987.
- Samuel, Kathryn, "A Feel for the Fabric of the Times," in the Daily Telegraph, 16 May 1988.
- Coleman, Alix, "Breaking New Ground," in Sunday Express Magazine, 22 October 1989.
- Haggard, Claire, "The House that Caroline Built," in Fashion Weekly (London), 9 November 1989.
- _____, "Setting the Style," in Country Life (London), 18 January 1990.
- Nesbit, Jenny, "A Perfect Fit," in the Sunday Times Magazine, 14 October 1990.
- Bridgstock, Graham, "Me and My Health," in the Evening Standard (London), 19 July 1994.
- Tyrrell, Rebecca, in the Tattler (London), November 1994.
- Johnson, Sarah, "WestPoint Acquires Foothold in Europe," in HFN, 3 February 1997.
- Morris, Belinda, "Fashion: Uphill, Down Dale and Upmarket," in the Financial Times of London, 14 June 1997.
- Klensch, Else, "Deep Color, Easy Outlines Mark New Caroline Charles Collection," at CNN Online, 3 August 1998.

* * *

Caroline Charles has described herself "as a child of the 1960s" and certainly she could be said to have been in the right place at the right time. Born to an army family in Cairo, Charles was sent to a boarding school in Harrogate, England, where she claims to have "picked up a survival kit for life." She studied fashion at the Art School in Swindon, after which she worked for couturier Michael Sherrard and for Mary Quant at her Shop Bazaar in Knightsbridge. She then assisted fashion photographer Tony Rawlinson before returning to Mary Quant.

In 1963 she set out on her own and moved to Beauchamp Place in 1966. From there her business boomed, and with sound and sensible strategies she expanded from London to the rest of Europe, Japan, and America. She built an empire that takes in more than 40 top store accounts and licenses for wedding dresses, hosiery, bed linens, underwear, and menswear.

Armed with talent and ambition—"I do have tremendous drive," she has said—Charles admits to having in the early days a woeful lack of business acumen, a trait she was to acquire very quickly as the momentum of the "swinging" 1960s launched her onto the fashion scene. In 1965 she was jetting around the world and the subject of headlines in the U.S. as Americans loved her fresh, "kinder, London ladylike-look," and at the tender age of 22 she was feted by trend-hungry New York audiences.

During these years she created Ringo Starr's wedding outfit, dressed Petula Clark, Madame George Pompidou, Barbra Streisand, Lulu, Marianne Faithfull, and Mick Jagger. "The 1960s were totally celebrity-driven," she said. "There was this mood and we got great press. The editors loved the mini-star designer who dressed the major-star pop singer." With singular inspiration she transformed a lace bedspread into a long empire-line dress and sold it to Cilla Black. When Cilla's record "Anyone Who Had a Heart" became a hit, the dress became a bestseller. Charles took this in stride and became one of London's "swinging set."

Quite a celebrity in her own right, she was a regular guest on Juke Box Jury, the popular "Teen Scene" program; was interviewed on the Tonight Show by Johnny Carson; was a guest writer for the teen press; and modeled her own trendy designs. She was one of a myriad of talented young designers in the 1960s who made the clothes she and her friends wanted, full of youthful energy and gaiety, invention and individuality. People seemed to want everyday clothing for the streets of London, Paris, or anywhere in Europe, a trend that turned out to be well marketed and exploited by the new young designers.

Charles is treated with reverence in the fashion industry as someone who "got it right." She is a business-like technician, straightforward, and in love with her craft. "I enjoy what I do now more than I ever have. Every day I do precisely what I want and I am not so anxious now." Despite more than 35 successful years in the industry, she admits to an irrational fear that she will not be able to design clothes.

After such an auspicious start in the 1960s, she reflects that the 1970s were "a terrible time for fashion." But the 1980s saw her in full swing again, attiring the newly married Prince of Wales in a tartan suit for the Braemar games and an oatmeal wraparound dressing-gown coat for a walkabout in Wales. She became one of the exclusive breed of "Royal Designers." The exuberance of the swinging 1960s had given way to a more classic, sensible look. Charles has an eye for lavish fabrics combined with easy wearability. Hers are beautifully-made clothes with simple accessories; she hopes her clients would wear them to the supermarket.

season, and he is among the last of the great old-school designers. As Suzy Menkes of the International Herald Tribune so aptly put it in March 2000, "Lagerfeld will soon be the last of the fashion Mohicans, the tribe that came center stage in ready-to-wear in the 1960s but were schooled in the old couture ways of rigorous cut, perfect execution, invention in detail.... Who in the next generation can ever fill his seven-league boots?" Who indeed?

—Carol Mary Brown; updated by Sydonie Bénet

CHARLES, Caroline

British designer

Born: Cairo, Egypt, c. 1943. Education: Attended boarding school in Harrogate, England; studied fashion at the Art School in Swindon. Career: Worked for couturier Michael Sherrard, and for Mary Quant, Knightsbridge; assisted fashion photographer Tony Rawlinson; returned to Mary Quant; established own business, 1963; moved to Beauchamp Place, 1966; designed for a number of celebrities and musicians, 1960s; designed for British royalty, beginning in the 1980s; opened new store on Bond Street, London, 1990s. Address: 9, St. Johns Wood High Street, London NW8 7N6 England.

PUBLICATIONS

On CHARLES:

Articles

- "Designs for the Princess of Wales," in the Times, 3 November 1981.
- Brampton, Sally, "Showing the Rest of the World," in The Observer, 20 March 1983.
- Kendall, Ena, "Caroline Charles: A Room of My Own," in The Observer Magazine, 16 August 1987.
- Lomas, Jane, "Staying Power," in The Observer, 16 August 1987.
- Samuel, Kathryn, "A Feel for the Fabric of the Times," in the Daily Telegraph, 16 May 1988.
- Coleman, Alix, "Breaking New Ground," in Sunday Express Magazine, 22 October 1989.
- Haggard, Claire, "The House that Caroline Built," in Fashion Weekly (London), 9 November 1989.
- _____, "Setting the Style," in Country Life (London), 18 January 1990.
- Nesbit, Jenny, "A Perfect Fit," in the Sunday Times Magazine, 14 October 1990.
- Bridgstock, Graham, "Me and My Health," in the Evening Standard (London), 19 July 1994.
- Tyrrell, Rebecca, in the Tattler (London), November 1994.
- Johnson, Sarah, "WestPoint Acquires Foothold in Europe," in HFN, 3 February 1997.
- Morris, Belinda, "Fashion: Uphill, Down Dale and Upmarket," in the Financial Times of London, 14 June 1997.
- Klensch, Else, "Deep Color, Easy Outlines Mark New Caroline Charles Collection," at CNN Online, 3 August 1998.

* * *

Caroline Charles has described herself "as a child of the 1960s" and certainly she could be said to have been in the right place at the right time. Born to an army family in Cairo, Charles was sent to a boarding school in Harrogate, England, where she claims to have "picked up a survival kit for life." She studied fashion at the Art School in Swindon, after which she worked for couturier Michael Sherrard and for Mary Quant at her Shop Bazaar in Knightsbridge. She then assisted fashion photographer Tony Rawlinson before returning to Mary Quant.

In 1963 she set out on her own and moved to Beauchamp Place in 1966. From there her business boomed, and with sound and sensible strategies she expanded from London to the rest of Europe, Japan, and America. She built an empire that takes in more than 40 top store accounts and licenses for wedding dresses, hosiery, bed linens, underwear, and menswear.

Armed with talent and ambition—"I do have tremendous drive," she has said—Charles admits to having in the early days a woeful lack of business acumen, a trait she was to acquire very quickly as the momentum of the "swinging" 1960s launched her onto the fashion scene. In 1965 she was jetting around the world and the subject of headlines in the U.S. as Americans loved her fresh, "kinder, London ladylike-look," and at the tender age of 22 she was feted by trend-hungry New York audiences.

During these years she created Ringo Starr's wedding outfit, dressed Petula Clark, Madame George Pompidou, Barbra Streisand, Lulu, Marianne Faithfull, and Mick Jagger. "The 1960s were totally celebrity-driven," she said. "There was this mood and we got great press. The editors loved the mini-star designer who dressed the major-star pop singer." With singular inspiration she transformed a lace bedspread into a long empire-line dress and sold it to Cilla Black. When Cilla's record "Anyone Who Had a Heart" became a hit, the dress became a bestseller. Charles took this in stride and became one of London's "swinging set."

Quite a celebrity in her own right, she was a regular guest on Juke Box Jury, the popular "Teen Scene" program; was interviewed on the Tonight Show by Johnny Carson; was a guest writer for the teen press; and modeled her own trendy designs. She was one of a myriad of talented young designers in the 1960s who made the clothes she and her friends wanted, full of youthful energy and gaiety, invention and individuality. People seemed to want everyday clothing for the streets of London, Paris, or anywhere in Europe, a trend that turned out to be well marketed and exploited by the new young designers.

Charles is treated with reverence in the fashion industry as someone who "got it right." She is a business-like technician, straightforward, and in love with her craft. "I enjoy what I do now more than I ever have. Every day I do precisely what I want and I am not so anxious now." Despite more than 35 successful years in the industry, she admits to an irrational fear that she will not be able to design clothes.

After such an auspicious start in the 1960s, she reflects that the 1970s were "a terrible time for fashion." But the 1980s saw her in full swing again, attiring the newly married Prince of Wales in a tartan suit for the Braemar games and an oatmeal wraparound dressing-gown coat for a walkabout in Wales. She became one of the exclusive breed of "Royal Designers." The exuberance of the swinging 1960s had given way to a more classic, sensible look. Charles has an eye for lavish fabrics combined with easy wearability. Hers are beautifully-made clothes with simple accessories; she hopes her clients would wear them to the supermarket.

Caroline Charles, spring 1996 collection. © AP/Wide World Photos.

Her many illustrious clients, Lady Lloyd Webber and Dame Diana Rigg among them, have attested to the beguiling quality of her fabrics: perennial velvets, rich wool paisleys and elegant brocades, and, in the 1990s, black leather mixed with flippy lace skirts (a slightly vampy departure for the designer) toned down into wearable sexy party clothes. The 1990s have seen yet another phase of extremely successful, well-thought-out business expansions. A new flagship shop in Bond Street, and with it an entirely new Bond Street customer, opened up a whole new market for Charles.

Charles is that rare commodity who has survived the vicissitudes of the fashion industry while retaining her own personal signature. She continues to create practical clothing that can be worn by working men and women. Her style is considered quintessentially British, which explains why she was a favorite of the late Diana, Princess of Wales, yet her clothing is available for everyday, albeit somewhat upscale, British consumers as well. She sells through retail outlets, including her own stores, as well as the mail-order catalogue Kingshill's, for which she was one of three initial designers.

In the late 1990s, Charles expanded into accessories and home furnishings. Her high-end home collection includes manufacturers such as PJ Flower, which was acquired by WestPoint Stevens in 1997, extending Charles' international distribution. (The designer shows her apparel in Asian cities including Tokyo and Bangkok, as well as in New York.) Elsa Klensch of CNN described Charles' 1998 fall/winter collection as being a mix of deep jewel-like colors and neutrals, accented by spots of bright hues. The colors, which Klensch described as olives, umbers, ambers, golds and plums, were inspired by the painters Rosetti and Klimt.

The slouchy, comfortable line typified Charles' use of soft fabrics and her rejection of too much tailoring and padding. Throughout her more than three-decade career, this British designer's focus has been on clothes that are easy to wear.

—Elian McCready; updated by Karen Raugust

Chloé, spring/summer 2002 ready-to-wear collection designed by Phoebe Philo. © Reuters NewMedia Inc./CORBIS.

CHLOÉ

French deluxe ready-to-wear house

Founded: by Jacques Lenoir and Gaby Aghion, in 1952; Company History: Acquired by Dunhill Holdings, Plc., 1985, and by Vendome, 1993; Karl Lagerfeld, designer, 1965–83, and again from 1992–97; Martine Sitbon, designer, 1987–91; Stella McCartney, designer, 1997–2001; Phoebe Philo, hired as designer, 2001. Fragrances include Narcisse, 1992. Company Address: 54–56 rue du Faubourg St. Honoré, 75008 Paris, France.

PUBLICATIONS

On CHLOÉ:

Articles

Gross, Michael, "Paris Originals: Chloé in the Afternoon," in New York, 15 May 1989.

Friedman, Arthur, "Chloé Reshapes Its Identity," in WWD, 2 January 1991.

White, Constance C.R., "Chloe's New Chief Designer," in the New York Times, 15 April 1997.

Mower, Sarah, "Chloe's Girl," in Harper's Bazaar, June 1997.

McCartney, Stella, "My Chloé Diary," in Harper's Bazaar, January 1998.

"She Grooves; Will She Go? The Hottest Item at Chloe is Designer Stella McCartney," in Newsweek, 18 October 1999.

Singer, Sally, "Chloé's Choice," in Vogue, August 2001.

* * *

Style, modernity, and a strong sense of femininity have been the key elements of Chloé since its inception. Maintaining a quiet confidence among the Parisian ready-to-wear houses, Chloé has relied on the abilities of various already-established designers to produce fresh and vibrant clothing which reflected and, in the high points of its history under Martine Sitbon, Karl Lagerfeld, and upstart Stella McCartney defined the zeitgeist of Chloé élan.

Riding the wave of prêt-à-porter companies set to challenge couture in the 1950s, Chloé was keen from the start to produce wearable clothes conveying the immediacy of modernism in clear, strong styles. The house's identity has remained true to the design tenets of its early days, producing simple garments made from fluid fabrics. These promote a sense of elegant movement, enlivened by the

Her many illustrious clients, Lady Lloyd Webber and Dame Diana Rigg among them, have attested to the beguiling quality of her fabrics: perennial velvets, rich wool paisleys and elegant brocades, and, in the 1990s, black leather mixed with flippy lace skirts (a slightly vampy departure for the designer) toned down into wearable sexy party clothes. The 1990s have seen yet another phase of extremely successful, well-thought-out business expansions. A new flagship shop in Bond Street, and with it an entirely new Bond Street customer, opened up a whole new market for Charles.

Charles is that rare commodity who has survived the vicissitudes of the fashion industry while retaining her own personal signature. She continues to create practical clothing that can be worn by working men and women. Her style is considered quintessentially British, which explains why she was a favorite of the late Diana, Princess of Wales, yet her clothing is available for everyday, albeit somewhat upscale, British consumers as well. She sells through retail outlets, including her own stores, as well as the mail-order catalogue Kingshill's, for which she was one of three initial designers.

In the late 1990s, Charles expanded into accessories and home furnishings. Her high-end home collection includes manufacturers such as PJ Flower, which was acquired by WestPoint Stevens in 1997, extending Charles' international distribution. (The designer shows her apparel in Asian cities including Tokyo and Bangkok, as well as in New York.) Elsa Klensch of CNN described Charles' 1998 fall/winter collection as being a mix of deep jewel-like colors and neutrals, accented by spots of bright hues. The colors, which Klensch described as olives, umbers, ambers, golds and plums, were inspired by the painters Rosetti and Klimt.

The slouchy, comfortable line typified Charles' use of soft fabrics and her rejection of too much tailoring and padding. Throughout her more than three-decade career, this British designer's focus has been on clothes that are easy to wear.

—Elian McCready; updated by Karen Raugust

Chloé, spring/summer 2002 ready-to-wear collection designed by Phoebe Philo. © Reuters NewMedia Inc./CORBIS.

CHLOÉ

French deluxe ready-to-wear house

Founded: by Jacques Lenoir and Gaby Aghion, in 1952; Company History: Acquired by Dunhill Holdings, Plc., 1985, and by Vendome, 1993; Karl Lagerfeld, designer, 1965–83, and again from 1992–97; Martine Sitbon, designer, 1987–91; Stella McCartney, designer, 1997–2001; Phoebe Philo, hired as designer, 2001. Fragrances include Narcisse, 1992. Company Address: 54–56 rue du Faubourg St. Honoré, 75008 Paris, France.

PUBLICATIONS

On CHLOÉ:

Articles

- Gross, Michael, "Paris Originals: Chloé in the Afternoon," in New York, 15 May 1989.
- Friedman, Arthur, "Chloé Reshapes Its Identity," in WWD, 2 January 1991.
- White, Constance C.R., "Chloe's New Chief Designer," in the New York Times, 15 April 1997.
- Mower, Sarah, "Chloe's Girl," in Harper's Bazaar, June 1997.

McCartney, Stella, "My Chloé Diary," in Harper's Bazaar, January 1998.

"She Grooves; Will She Go? The Hottest Item at Chloe is Designer Stella McCartney," in Newsweek, 18 October 1999.

Singer, Sally, "Chloé's Choice," in Vogue, August 2001.

* * *

Style, modernity, and a strong sense of femininity have been the key elements of Chloé since its inception. Maintaining a quiet confidence among the Parisian ready-to-wear houses, Chloé has relied on the abilities of various already-established designers to produce fresh and vibrant clothing which reflected and, in the high points of its history under Martine Sitbon, Karl Lagerfeld, and upstart Stella McCartney defined the zeitgeist of Chloé élan.

Riding the wave of prêt-à-porter companies set to challenge couture in the 1950s, Chloé was keen from the start to produce wearable clothes conveying the immediacy of modernism in clear, strong styles. The house's identity has remained true to the design tenets of its early days, producing simple garments made from fluid fabrics. These promote a sense of elegant movement, enlivened by the artistic sense of color distinguishing French fashion; a constant feature at Chloé, despite the varied nationalities of its designers.

Chloé, spring/summer 2001 ready-to-wear collection designed by Stella McCartney. © Reuters NewMedia Inc./CORBIS.

Chloé and its peers provided a lively, frequently directional alternative to haute couture, whose dictatorial status had diminished. The company was able to headhunt inspirational designers with the talent to translate the Chloé design image into clothing which would remain distinct to the label, while consistently evolving to embrace contemporary styles. In the 1960s this meant keeping pace with the youth-orientated look in London, with clothes imbued with a futuristic vitality. In 1966 this sense of freedom through technology was assimilated by Jeanne Do into a slim, straight-falling Empire line dress in stark white decorated with metallic geometric shapes. This modern armor as eveningwear was a major fashion trend, picking up on the science fiction trend of the time. The dress also pinpointed the introduction that year of maxi skirts, reinforcing Chloé's place at the cutting edge of fashion.

Chloé's reliance on different names to pursue the design house's viability has given a chameleon-like adaptability to its contemporary fashion, calling upon such catalytic freelancers as Karl Lagerfeld who worked on and off for some 23 years. From the late 1960s until his departure in 1997, the Chloé name became synonymous with Lagerfeld. The house style remained pared-down sheath dresses, hovering around the figure, adorned with minimal decoration, which distilled the late 1960s fashion directive. Under his guidance, the label moved with ease into the pluralistic 1970s, absorbing and refining the myriad of reference points with which fashion toyed. Lagerfeld's strongly conceived and modernistic designs throughout his tenure never compromised the supple femininity for which Chloé was renowned. After Lagerfeld's exit to take over Chanel in the early 1980s, Chloé languished until Martine Sitbon was chosen to reinject a sense of originality and verve in 1987.

Sitbon embodied facets of Chloé's style which had been established in the 1960s—uncluttered designs drawing on popular culture, with distinct themes for each collection, translated into classic shapes for women confident of their own identity. Sitbon toned down the more overtly 1970s rock-influenced styles of her own named line to produce masculine tailored suits. These were softened by a dandyish swing to their cut and by delicately coloured silk chiffon blouses which blossomed into curving frilled collars. She defined Chloé's look during the 1980s and in the early 1990s, rounding the edges of the decade's often over-extravagant silhouette with well placed decoration and rich fabrics.

Sitbon left the label in 1991, and a desire to remain at the forefront of design prompted the return of Lagerfeld in 1992. He then captured the mood for unstructured easy-to-wear styles with his fluid slip dresses—harking back to the heights of his Chloé collections of the 1970s—and tapped the nostalgia for the flower child look upon which they drew. Lagerfeld adorned the faded print slips with flair, throwing long strings of beads around the models' necks and silk blooms in their hair. Although the initial reaction was uncertain, Chloé had judged the fashion moment for change well, and Lagerfeld once again fit comfortably into the house's mold.

When Lagerfeld bid adieu again in 1997, upstart Stella McCartney took the reins and reinvigorated Chloé, as well as its sales. Though many believed her girlish, feminine designs would attract only younger women, her Chloé collections proved more sensual and sophisticated than anticipated, and crossed age barriers. Chloé's hipper image led to the opening of a new Manhattan boutique at the turn of the century, yet the house's new muse was lured away by Gucci in early 2001. McCartney left Chloé to create her own global label, and her longtime assistant, Phoebe Philo was hired as her replacement.

Chloé's place in history has already been assured by the house's ability to allow designers to flourish under its auspices. Lagerfeld, Sitbon, and McCartney all proffered their ideals of femininity and sophistication in designs for Chloé, keeping the house contemporary while still maintaining its classic style.

—Rebecca Arnold; updated by Owen James

CHOO, Jimmy

Malaysian couture shoe designer

Born: Penang, Malaysia. Education: Entered Cordwainer's Technical College, London, 1980. Career: Began designing shoes in artistic sense of color distinguishing French fashion; a constant feature at Chloé, despite the varied nationalities of its designers.

Chloé, spring/summer 2001 ready-to-wear collection designed by Stella McCartney. © Reuters NewMedia Inc./CORBIS.

Chloé and its peers provided a lively, frequently directional alternative to haute couture, whose dictatorial status had diminished. The company was able to headhunt inspirational designers with the talent to translate the Chloé design image into clothing which would remain distinct to the label, while consistently evolving to embrace contemporary styles. In the 1960s this meant keeping pace with the youth-orientated look in London, with clothes imbued with a futuristic vitality. In 1966 this sense of freedom through technology was assimilated by Jeanne Do into a slim, straight-falling Empire line dress in stark white decorated with metallic geometric shapes. This modern armor as eveningwear was a major fashion trend, picking up on the science fiction trend of the time. The dress also pinpointed the introduction that year of maxi skirts, reinforcing Chloé's place at the cutting edge of fashion.

Chloé's reliance on different names to pursue the design house's viability has given a chameleon-like adaptability to its contemporary fashion, calling upon such catalytic freelancers as Karl Lagerfeld who worked on and off for some 23 years. From the late 1960s until his departure in 1997, the Chloé name became synonymous with Lagerfeld. The house style remained pared-down sheath dresses, hovering around the figure, adorned with minimal decoration, which distilled the late 1960s fashion directive. Under his guidance, the label moved with ease into the pluralistic 1970s, absorbing and refining the myriad of reference points with which fashion toyed. Lagerfeld's strongly conceived and modernistic designs throughout his tenure never compromised the supple femininity for which Chloé was renowned. After Lagerfeld's exit to take over Chanel in the early 1980s, Chloé languished until Martine Sitbon was chosen to reinject a sense of originality and verve in 1987.

Sitbon embodied facets of Chloé's style which had been established in the 1960s—uncluttered designs drawing on popular culture, with distinct themes for each collection, translated into classic shapes for women confident of their own identity. Sitbon toned down the more overtly 1970s rock-influenced styles of her own named line to produce masculine tailored suits. These were softened by a dandyish swing to their cut and by delicately coloured silk chiffon blouses which blossomed into curving frilled collars. She defined Chloé's look during the 1980s and in the early 1990s, rounding the edges of the decade's often over-extravagant silhouette with well placed decoration and rich fabrics.

Sitbon left the label in 1991, and a desire to remain at the forefront of design prompted the return of Lagerfeld in 1992. He then captured the mood for unstructured easy-to-wear styles with his fluid slip dresses—harking back to the heights of his Chloé collections of the 1970s—and tapped the nostalgia for the flower child look upon which they drew. Lagerfeld adorned the faded print slips with flair, throwing long strings of beads around the models' necks and silk blooms in their hair. Although the initial reaction was uncertain, Chloé had judged the fashion moment for change well, and Lagerfeld once again fit comfortably into the house's mold.

When Lagerfeld bid adieu again in 1997, upstart Stella McCartney took the reins and reinvigorated Chloé, as well as its sales. Though many believed her girlish, feminine designs would attract only younger women, her Chloé collections proved more sensual and sophisticated than anticipated, and crossed age barriers. Chloé's hipper image led to the opening of a new Manhattan boutique at the turn of the century, yet the house's new muse was lured away by Gucci in early 2001. McCartney left Chloé to create her own global label, and her longtime assistant, Phoebe Philo was hired as her replacement.

Chloé's place in history has already been assured by the house's ability to allow designers to flourish under its auspices. Lagerfeld, Sitbon, and McCartney all proffered their ideals of femininity and sophistication in designs for Chloé, keeping the house contemporary while still maintaining its classic style.

—Rebecca Arnold; updated by Owen James

CHOO, Jimmy

Malaysian couture shoe designer

Born: Penang, Malaysia. Education: Entered Cordwainer's Technical College, London, 1980. Career: Began designing shoes in Jimmy Choo, fall 2001 collection. © AP/Wide World Photos/Fashion Wire Daily.

London, 1984; established custom shoe business, 1988; debuted wholesale shoe line and opened London boutique and showroom, 1996; niece Sandra Choi named creative director; established Jimmy Choo USA; opened New York and Beverly Hills stores, 1998; opened in Las Vegas shop, 1999; scouted further U.S. locations and Asia for additional stores, from 2000; opened new London store, 2001. Exhibitions: Fashion in Motion, Victoria & Albert Museum, London, 1999. Awards: British Accessory Designer of the Year, 1999. Address: 6 Pont Street, London, England, SW1 X9EL. Website: www.jimmychoo.com.

PUBLICATIONS

On CHOO:

Books

- O'Keefe, Linda, Shoes, New York, 1996.
Steele, Valerie, The Fashion Book, London, 1998.
_____, Shoes: A Lexicon of Style, New York, 1999.

Articles

- Gurevitch, Ruth, "Choo's New Shoes," in Footwear News, 5 August 1996.
Anniss, Elisa, "Designing Superstars," in Footwear News, 26 May 1997.

Hesson, Wendy, "Jimmy Choo Struts Across the Pond," in WWD, 16 January 1998.

"Choo Prepares for U.S. Olympic Tower Store," in Footwear News, 2 November 1998.

Ginsberg, Merle, "The Red Carpetbaggers," in WWD, 22 March 1999.

"Choo's Shoes," in the New Straits Times, 7 June 1999.

Parrott, Stuart, "The Girl From Uncle," in Asia, Inc., August 1999.

Fallon, James, "Liberty Bets on Women's," in WWD, 22 September 1999.

Edelson, Sharon, et al., "Excess Evolution," in WWD, 11 February 2000.

De Courtney, Romy, "The Big Preen," in WWD, 27 March 2000.

Conway, Susan, "High Heal Factor is Feng Shui in Choo's New Shoes," in The Guardian, 14 September 2000.

Miller, Samantha, "Shoes? Choos! Jimmy Choo Footwear Designer Sandra Choi...," in People Weekly, 20 November 2000.

Seckler, Valerie, "Give 'Em Shell," in W, December 2000.

_____, "Alter Egos," in W, January 2001.

_____, "Last Look," in Vogue, January 2001.

Medina, Marcy, "New Best Friends," in WWD, 8 January 2001.

Seckler, Valerie, "Oscar Scoops," in WWD, 26 February 2001.

Greenberg, Julie, and Leonard McCants, "Concerns Aside, Fall Gets Going," in WWD, 27 February 2001.

Seckler, Valerie, "Net-a-Porter Adds Jimmy Choo," in WWD, 28 March 2001.

Jimmy Choo, fall 2001 collection. © AP/Wide World Photos/
Fashion Wire Daily.

McAlister, Maggie, "Fit for a Queen...," in Footwear News, 2 July 2001.

* * *

Had Jimmy Choo been a resident of Oz, Dorothy's slippers would likely have sported genuine rubies. No stranger to extravagance, Choo is legendary for elegant, imaginative shoes. The sandals he fabricated for a Vogue photo shoot displayed 30-carat diamonds and carried a price tag of $1 million, and Cate Blanchett's 1999 Academy Awards footwear featured diamond ankle straps and cost a mere $110,000.

Jimmy Choo is actually two distinct enterprises. Choo heads the exclusive couture company that produces only three or four handmade pairs of shoes per day. His customer list reads like a Who's Who of actresses, royalty, and the rich and famous. Wealthy feet from all over the world have found their way to this master craftsman. The late Princess Diana owned more than 30 pairs of his shoes, and the beauty and elegance of his footwear are believed to have helped create Diana's sexier image.

Born to a shoemaking family on the Malaysian island of Penang, Choo made his first pair of shoes at age 11. He attended Cordwainer's Technical College in London and is considered one of London's leading shoe designers. His excellence earned him the title of British Accessory Designer of the Year in 1999. Choo favors crystalline colors, aqua, fuchsia, and bright orange and applies them to luxury fabrics like silk satin and shantung. Python and fish skin are some of his favorite materials because of the way they accept dye, and mink and feathers grace some of his styles. He has used a wide variety of stones, from Swarovski crystals to natural crystals for their healing power. His stiletto heels have been described as "dainty and deadly." Choo's philosophy is that shoes can be both beautiful and comfortable, and his devotees prove the point by their nearly fanatical devotion to his footwear.

Fashion stylist Tamara Yeardye Mellon of British Vogue approached Choo about starting a ready-to-wear business, having realized the tremendous potential for mass-market high-end footwear. The company opened in 1996 on Oxford Street in London with Choo lending his name and becoming a silent partner while Mellon served as managing director. Choo's 26-year-old niece, Sandra Choi, joined the firm as creative director. Choi was raised in Hong Kong and spent a year at St. Martin's Art School while living and working with her uncle. The demands of his custom work were such that she chose the business over formal education and left school to devote all her energy to the new company. Choi has achieved tremendous success in her own right and a strong following that includes everyone from Madonna to the Bush twins.

Though not custom-made, the Jimmy Choo line is all fabricated in Italy with an eye toward top quality. The collections are shown twice a year to coincide with the designer fashion shows in Paris, Milan, London, and New York. The company also offers men's shoes, handbags, and small leather goods. Choo has freestanding stores in London, New York, Las Vegas, and Beverly Hills and is carried in luxury retailers such as Neiman Marcus, Liberty of London, Bergdorf Goodman, and Harrods. It has become one of the largest off-the-shelf luxury shoe companies in the world, with prices running from $300 to $1,600 per pair. In a very short length of time, Choo is selling almost as many pairs of shoes as his major competitor, 30-year-old Manolo Blahnik.

—Christina Lindholm

CLAIBORNE, Liz

American designer

Born: Elizabeth Claiborne in Brussels, Belgium, 31 March 1929, to American parents from New Orleans; moved to New Orleans, 1939.

Education: Studied art at Fine Arts School and Painters Studio, Belgium, 1947, and at the Nice Academy, 1948; self-taught in design.

Family: Married Ben Schultz, 1950 (divorced); married Arthur Ortenberg, 1957; children: Alexander.

Career: Sketch artist and model, Tina Leser, 1950; design assistant, Omar Kiam for Ben Reig, New York; designer, Youth Guild division of Jonathan Logan, 1960–76; founder/partner with Art Ortenberg, Liz Claiborne Inc., 1976; went public, 1981; introduced petite sportswear line, 1981; formed dress division, 1982; introduced shoes, 1983; purchased

Jimmy Choo, fall 2001 collection. © AP/Wide World Photos/
Fashion Wire Daily.

McAlister, Maggie, "Fit for a Queen...," in Footwear News, 2 July 2001.

* * *

Had Jimmy Choo been a resident of Oz, Dorothy's slippers would likely have sported genuine rubies. No stranger to extravagance, Choo is legendary for elegant, imaginative shoes. The sandals he fabricated for a Vogue photo shoot displayed 30-carat diamonds and carried a price tag of $1 million, and Cate Blanchett's 1999 Academy Awards footwear featured diamond ankle straps and cost a mere $110,000.

Jimmy Choo is actually two distinct enterprises. Choo heads the exclusive couture company that produces only three or four handmade pairs of shoes per day. His customer list reads like a Who's Who of actresses, royalty, and the rich and famous. Wealthy feet from all over the world have found their way to this master craftsman. The late Princess Diana owned more than 30 pairs of his shoes, and the beauty and elegance of his footwear are believed to have helped create Diana's sexier image.

Born to a shoemaking family on the Malaysian island of Penang, Choo made his first pair of shoes at age 11. He attended Cordwainer's Technical College in London and is considered one of London's leading shoe designers. His excellence earned him the title of British Accessory Designer of the Year in 1999. Choo favors crystalline colors, aqua, fuchsia, and bright orange and applies them to luxury fabrics like silk satin and shantung. Python and fish skin are some of his favorite materials because of the way they accept dye, and mink and feathers grace some of his styles. He has used a wide variety of stones, from Swarovski crystals to natural crystals for their healing power. His stiletto heels have been described as "dainty and deadly." Choo's philosophy is that shoes can be both beautiful and comfortable, and his devotees prove the point by their nearly fanatical devotion to his footwear.

Fashion stylist Tamara Yeardye Mellon of British Vogue approached Choo about starting a ready-to-wear business, having realized the tremendous potential for mass-market high-end footwear. The company opened in 1996 on Oxford Street in London with Choo lending his name and becoming a silent partner while Mellon served as managing director. Choo's 26-year-old niece, Sandra Choi, joined the firm as creative director. Choi was raised in Hong Kong and spent a year at St. Martin's Art School while living and working with her uncle. The demands of his custom work were such that she chose the business over formal education and left school to devote all her energy to the new company. Choi has achieved tremendous success in her own right and a strong following that includes everyone from Madonna to the Bush twins.

Though not custom-made, the Jimmy Choo line is all fabricated in Italy with an eye toward top quality. The collections are shown twice a year to coincide with the designer fashion shows in Paris, Milan, London, and New York. The company also offers men's shoes, handbags, and small leather goods. Choo has freestanding stores in London, New York, Las Vegas, and Beverly Hills and is carried in luxury retailers such as Neiman Marcus, Liberty of London, Bergdorf Goodman, and Harrods. It has become one of the largest off-the-shelf luxury shoe companies in the world, with prices running from $300 to $1,600 per pair. In a very short length of time, Choo is selling almost as many pairs of shoes as his major competitor, 30-year-old Manolo Blahnik.

—Christina Lindholm

CLAIBORNE, Liz

American designer

Born: Elizabeth Claiborne in Brussels, Belgium, 31 March 1929, to American parents from New Orleans; moved to New Orleans, 1939.

Education: Studied art at Fine Arts School and Painters Studio, Belgium, 1947, and at the Nice Academy, 1948; self-taught in design.

Family: Married Ben Schultz, 1950 (divorced); married Arthur Ortenberg, 1957; children: Alexander.

Career: Sketch artist and model, Tina Leser, 1950; design assistant, Omar Kiam for Ben Reig, New York; designer, Youth Guild division of Jonathan Logan, 1960–76; founder/partner with Art Ortenberg, Liz Claiborne Inc., 1976; went public, 1981; introduced petite sportswear line, 1981; formed dress division, 1982; introduced shoes, 1983; purchased

Liz Claiborne in 2000, at the Council of Fashion Designers of America awards. © AP/Wide World Photos.

Kaiser-Roth Corporation, 1985; introduced Lizwear label featuring jeans, 1985; introduced men's sportswear, Clairborne, 1985; inaugurated Dana Buchman and Claiborne Furnishings, 1987-88; introduced larger-size line, Elizabeth, 1988; launched First Issue, 1988, formed Liz & Co. knitwear division, 1989; Claiborne and Ortenberg retire, 1989; Elizabeth Dresses introduced, 1990, Sports Shoes and Suits, 1991, Sport Specific Activewear and Liz Sport Eyewear, 1992; purchased Russ and Crazy Horse labels from Russ Toggs, 1992; closed First Issue stores, 1995; launched swimwear label with Sirena Apparel Group, 1996; signed licensing deal with Candie's, 1998; acquired Laundry, and stakes in Segrets, Lucky Brand Dungarees, and Kenneth Cole, 1999; bought Monet Group, 2000; initiated children's clothing lines, 2000; fragrances include Liz Claiborne, 1986; Claiborne, 1989; Vivid, 1994; Curve, 1996; Liszport and Claiborne Sport, 1997; Lucky You, 2000; Mambo, 2001. Awards: Winner, Harper's Bazaar Jacques Heim national design contest, 1949; Hecht & Company Young Designer award, Washington, D.C., 1967; Woolknit Association award, 1973; Entrepreneurial Woman of the Year, 1980; Council of Fashion Designers of America award, 1985; award from Barnard College, 1991; High School of Fashion Industries award, 1990; award from Marymount Manhattan College, 1989; the Council of Fashion Designers Humanitarian award, 2000. Address: 1441 Broadway, New York, NY 10018, USA.

Website: www.lizclaiborne.com.

PUBLICATIONS

On CLAIBORNE:

Books

- Milbank, Caroline Rennolds, New York Fashion: The Evolution of American Style, New York, 1989.
Daria, Irene, The Fashion Cycle, New York, 1990.
Stegemeyer, Anne, Who's Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.
Le Dortz, Laurent, and Béatrice Deboscher, Stratégies des Leaders Américains de la Mode: Calvin Klein, Donna Karan, Liz Claiborne, Polo Ralph Lauren, et Tommy Hilfiger, Paris, 2000.

Articles

- Klensch, Elsa, "Dressing America: The Success of Liz Claiborne," in Vogue, August 1986.
Stan, Adele-Marie, "Four Designing Women," in Ms., November 1986.
Sellers, Patricia, "The Rag Trade's Reluctant Revolutionary: Liz Claiborne," in Fortune, 5 January 1987.
Gannes, Stuart, "American's Fastest-Growing Companies," in Fortune, 23 May 1988.
Morris, Michele, "The Wizard of the Working Woman's Wardrobe," in Working Woman, June 1988.
Deveny, Kathleen, "Can Ms. Fashion Bounce Back?" in Business Week, 16 January 1989.
Graham, Judith, "Claiborne Opens Its Own Sites," in Advertising Age, 5 June 1989.
Armstrong, Lisa, "Working Woman's Ally," in Vogue (London), February 1991.
Hass, Nancy, "Like a Rock," in Financial World, 4 February 1992.
Agins, Teri, "Liz Claiborne Seems to Be Losing Its Invincible Armor," in the Wall Street Journal, July 1993.
Larson, Soren, "Claiborne to Try the Sporting Life," in Women's Wear Daily, 14 March 1997.
"Liz Claiborne Inc.," in Industry Week, 17 August 1998.
D'Innocenzo, Anne, and Zimmermann, Kim, "Liz Claiborne Gets Virtual," in Women's Wear Daily, 12 February 1999.
Mazzaraco, Margaret, "Liz Claiborne: Some Thoughts About the Future, Before Her Name Became an Empire," in Women's Wear Daily, 13 September 1999.
Agins Teri, "Claiborne Patches Together an Empire," in the Wall Street Journal, 2 February 2000.
Wilson, Eric, "Liz's Wildlife Lessons," in Women's Wear Daily, 14 June 2000.
Monget Monget, "Launching Liz Sleepwear," in Women's Wear Daily, 14 August 2000.

* * *

In 1976, after a 25-year career as a designer, Liz Claiborne founded her own company to provide innovative designs for professional women. By 1988 Liz Claiborne Inc. was competently filling the needs of the rapidly expanding women's workforce and its owner was among those profiled in Working Woman magazine's June 1988 series "Women Who Have Changed the World."

Claiborne preferred to view herself as one of her own down-to-earth clients, whom she called "the Liz Lady," one of the working women who had rapidly come to comprise nearly half of the U.S. workforce. Her original concept was, as she explained in a Vogue interview in August 1986, "to dress the women who didn't have to wear suits—the teachers, the doctors, the women working in Southern California and Florida, the women in the fashion industry itself."

In 1980 Claiborne's innovative designs were so successful she became the first woman in the U.S. fashion industry to be named Entrepreneurial Woman of the Year, and in the following year her firm went public, prospering financially to such a degree it was described by Merrill Lynch as "a case history of success." The phenomenal growth of Liz Claiborne Inc. was spurred on by diversification from the two original basic lines—active sportswear and a slightly dressier collection—to include a dress division in 1982 and a unit for shoes in 1983. In 1985 the company acquired the Kaiser-Roth Corporation, which had been a licensee producing accessories, including handbags, scarves, belts, and hats.

Also in 1985, a collection of men's sportswear, Clairborne, was introduced, and 1986 saw the launch of a perfume Liz Claiborne, described by its eponymous designer to Vogue in August 1986 as appealing "to a woman's idealistic version of herself.... She's active, whatever her age. It's the same feeling we try to give in the clothes."

Since Claiborne's resignation from her company in 1989, the company has pursued various strategies to offer a wide range of fashion apparel, accessories, and fragrances for men and women. The basic strategy was to meet consumer needs and wants on all levels by pursuing a multibrand, multichannel diversification. Under the leadership of Paul R. Charron, chairman and CEO, the company grew into a fashion empire including 22 owned and licensed brands available at 22,000 different retail locations throughout the world.

The company's brands can be found throughout the world at upscale, mainstream, promotional, and chain department stores and mass merchandisers. A customer can purchase a suit by the brand Dana Buchman at an upscale department store such as Saks Fifth Avenue or a sweater by Russ available only at Wal-Mart stores. In 2000, Target Stores successfully sold women's apparel under the Niki Taylor name. It will be renamed Meg Allen and available to Target exclusively in 2001. Classifications include upscale brands, middle line, urban, hip, and the budget brand, offering a wide range of prices in varied retail outlets.

Liz Claiborne Inc. was actively testing e-commerce through to of its brands, luckybrandjeans.com and elisabeth.com. The sites proved moderately successful as of 2001 and the company also had its corporate website at www.lizclaiborne.com. Another area of growth was accessories, with a presence in the costume jewelry segment, under the Liz Claiborne name. In addition, the company had acquired the trademarks of the Monet Group in 2000, which enhanced its accessories line and increased market share.

Liz Claiborne also continued to expand internationally. Its first retail outlet on London's Regent Street was opened in 2000 to celebrate the 10th anniversary of the company's presence in Europe. Future growth leaned toward Europe and Canada but company executives were eyeing Latin America, especially Mexico, where sales had been strong.

Claiborne herself has been buying back shares of the company recently, and she and her husband run the Liz Claiborne and Arthur Ortenburg Foundation. They spend their time in St. Barts or Montana, active in environmental and social issues. Claiborne does not wear the clothes bearing her name; she claims she would rather wear DKNY or

Ralph Lauren casual clothes than her namesake brand, which itself had fallen on hard times in the past few years and moved only when markdowned. More recently, the trendy Kenneth Cole label produced by the company proved quite successful in taking business from the Liz Claiborne label. CEO Charron commented to the Wall Street Journal in February 2000, "It is better to steal market share from yourself than to sit back and let somebody else do it."

In the 21st century Liz Claiborne Inc. was the number-one retailer of clothes and accessories for career women in the United States. As such the company was firmly committed to furthering its brand recognition and making its many products available to consumers wherever they chose to shop.

—Doreen Ehrlich; updated by Donna W. Reamy

CLARK, Ossie

British designer

Born: Raymond Clark in Oswaldtwistle, Lancashire, 2 June 1942.

Education: Studied fashion design, Manchester College of Art,

Ali MacGraw in an Ossie Clark-designed ensemble, 1969. © Hulton-Deutsch Collection/CORBIS.

Claiborne preferred to view herself as one of her own down-to-earth clients, whom she called "the Liz Lady," one of the working women who had rapidly come to comprise nearly half of the U.S. workforce. Her original concept was, as she explained in a Vogue interview in August 1986, "to dress the women who didn't have to wear suits—the teachers, the doctors, the women working in Southern California and Florida, the women in the fashion industry itself."

In 1980 Claiborne's innovative designs were so successful she became the first woman in the U.S. fashion industry to be named Entrepreneurial Woman of the Year, and in the following year her firm went public, prospering financially to such a degree it was described by Merrill Lynch as "a case history of success." The phenomenal growth of Liz Claiborne Inc. was spurred on by diversification from the two original basic lines—active sportswear and a slightly dressier collection—to include a dress division in 1982 and a unit for shoes in 1983. In 1985 the company acquired the Kaiser-Roth Corporation, which had been a licensee producing accessories, including handbags, scarves, belts, and hats.

Also in 1985, a collection of men's sportswear, Clairborne, was introduced, and 1986 saw the launch of a perfume Liz Claiborne, described by its eponymous designer to Vogue in August 1986 as appealing "to a woman's idealistic version of herself.... She's active, whatever her age. It's the same feeling we try to give in the clothes."

Since Claiborne's resignation from her company in 1989, the company has pursued various strategies to offer a wide range of fashion apparel, accessories, and fragrances for men and women. The basic strategy was to meet consumer needs and wants on all levels by pursuing a multibrand, multichannel diversification. Under the leadership of Paul R. Charron, chairman and CEO, the company grew into a fashion empire including 22 owned and licensed brands available at 22,000 different retail locations throughout the world.

The company's brands can be found throughout the world at upscale, mainstream, promotional, and chain department stores and mass merchandisers. A customer can purchase a suit by the brand Dana Buchman at an upscale department store such as Saks Fifth Avenue or a sweater by Russ available only at Wal-Mart stores. In 2000, Target Stores successfully sold women's apparel under the Niki Taylor name. It will be renamed Meg Allen and available to Target exclusively in 2001. Classifications include upscale brands, middle line, urban, hip, and the budget brand, offering a wide range of prices in varied retail outlets.

Liz Claiborne Inc. was actively testing e-commerce through to of its brands, luckybrandjeans.com and elisabeth.com. The sites proved moderately successful as of 2001 and the company also had its corporate website at www.lizclaiborne.com. Another area of growth was accessories, with a presence in the costume jewelry segment, under the Liz Claiborne name. In addition, the company had acquired the trademarks of the Monet Group in 2000, which enhanced its accessories line and increased market share.

Liz Claiborne also continued to expand internationally. Its first retail outlet on London's Regent Street was opened in 2000 to celebrate the 10th anniversary of the company's presence in Europe. Future growth leaned toward Europe and Canada but company executives were eyeing Latin America, especially Mexico, where sales had been strong.

Claiborne herself has been buying back shares of the company recently, and she and her husband run the Liz Claiborne and Arthur Ortenburg Foundation. They spend their time in St. Barts or Montana, active in environmental and social issues. Claiborne does not wear the clothes bearing her name; she claims she would rather wear DKNY or

Ralph Lauren casual clothes than her namesake brand, which itself had fallen on hard times in the past few years and moved only when markdowned. More recently, the trendy Kenneth Cole label produced by the company proved quite successful in taking business from the Liz Claiborne label. CEO Charron commented to the Wall Street Journal in February 2000, "It is better to steal market share from yourself than to sit back and let somebody else do it."

In the 21st century Liz Claiborne Inc. was the number-one retailer of clothes and accessories for career women in the United States. As such the company was firmly committed to furthering its brand recognition and making its many products available to consumers wherever they chose to shop.

—Doreen Ehrlich; updated by Donna W. Reamy

CLARK, Ossie

British designer

Born: Raymond Clark in Oswaldtwistle, Lancashire, 2 June 1942.

Education: Studied fashion design, Manchester College of Art,

Ali MacGraw in an Ossie Clark-designed ensemble, 1969. © Hulton-Deutsch Collection/CORBIS.

1957–61, and Royal College of Art, 1961–65. Family: Married Celia Birtwell, 1969 (divorced); children: Albert. Career: Freelance designer, selling to Quorum, London, and Henri Bendel, New York, 1964–74, and to Mendes, French ready-to-wear firm; designer, Quorum, 1965–74; designer, Radley, 1968 and 1983; business closed, 1981; business reorganized, 1983; signed contract with Evocative boutique for made-to-measure clothes, 1987; murdered, 1996; diaries published, 1999; homage by Decades retro shop, 2000. Exhibitions: Warrington, Cheshire, gallery and museum showing, 1999. Awards: Bath Museum of Costume Dress of the Year award, 1969. Died: 6 August 1996, of stab wounds.

PUBLICATIONS

On CLARK:

Books

Lambert, Eleanor, World of Fashion: People, Places, Resources, New York & London, 1976.

Howell, Georgina, Sultans of Style: 30 Years of Fashion and Passion 1960–1990, London, 1990.

Design by Ossie Clark, 1970. © Hulton-Deutsch Collection/CORBIS.

Mulvagh, Jane, Vivienne Westwood: An Unfashionable Life, New York, 1999.

Rous, Lary Henrietta, ed., The Ossie Clark Diaries, London, 1999.

Articles

Peters, Pauline, "Ossie and Alice in Wonderland," in the Sunday Times Magazine (London), 11 January 1970.

Roberts, Michael, "Michael Roberts Talks to Ossie Clark," in the Sunday Times (London), 16 November 1975.

"Ossie Clark Designs," in the Times (London), 27 January 1976.

"Ossie Clark Special," in Ritz (London), No. 5, 1977.

"Ossie Clark Goes Out of Business," in the Times (London), 5 February 1981.

"Peace in Our Time: Summer of Love Revisited," in Elle (London), June 1987.

Howell, Georgina, "The Dressmaker," in the Sunday Times Magazine (London), 12 July 1987.

Flanagan, Kathryn Flett, "Darling I've Seen It All Before," in the Observer, 15 August 1996.

Thomas, Robert, "Ossie Clark...British Designer Defined Mood," [obituary] in the New York Times, 12 August 1996.

Bowles, Hamish, "Ossie Clark: 1942–1996," in Vogue, November 1996.

Bachrach, Judy, "Hooked on Glamor," in Vanity Fair, December 1996.

Leadbeater, Charles, "And This Was 1996," in the New Statesman, 20 December 1996.

Rouse, Antony, "The Other Clark Diaries," in the Spectator, 28 November 1998.

Young, Elizabeth, "Vivienne Westwood: An Unfashionable Life," in the New Statesman, 1 January 1999.

_____, "The Ossie Clark Diaries," in the New Statesman, 1 January 1999.

Frankel, Susannah, "Warrington Celebrates Ossie Clark, the Designer Who Dressed the Sixties," in the Independent (London), 30 October 1999.

Arbatter, Lisa, "News," in In Style, 1 February 2000.

Thomas, Dana, "Ossified," in the New York Times Magazine, 20 February 2000.

Lycett, Andrew, "Something Sensational," in the New Statesman, 11 December 2000.

"Ossie Clark," [profile], available online at Decades Inc., www.decadesinc.com, 17 July 2001.

"Ossie Clark," [profile], available online at The Fashion Page, www.ukfirst.com, 17 July 2001.

"Ossie Clark," [profile], available online at Fashion Avenue, www.geocities.com, 17 July 2001.

* * *

Ossie Clark, described as the King of King's Road, rose to prominence as a fashion designer during the swinging 1960s. Trained at the Manchester College of Art, then at the Royal College of Art, London, he graduated at a time when London was entering a period of international prominence for its designs for the youth market. In a pre-Green era, variety and the ability to produce a fast turnover of styles were desirable qualities in a designer. Clark provided a great variety of images for both daywear and eveningwear.

From 1966 Clark was designing for Quorum, a London-based wholesale and boutique business, in partnership with Alice Pollock. His wife, Celia Birtwell, also an RCA graduate, provided many of the pattern designs for the printed textiles used by Clark. He designed both daywear and eveningwear, often using sensuous fabrics such as satin, chiffon, crêpe, and clinging jersey. Although, since he was so versatile and prolific, it is hard to characterize his style, he was probably best known for clinging crêpe and jersey dresses with plunging necklines, figure-hugging waists, and swirling skirts, but he was equally capable of producing close-fitting crisp linen suits. Innovations in terms of cut included suits with elbow-length tight-fitting sleeves over full long-sleeved blouses. In the late 1960s, he used exotic materials such as snakeskin, feathers, and metallic prints.

Clark launched his menswear line in 1968, which reflected the period's more relaxed attitude to male dressing. Examples from his first menswear collection included a pink crêpe shirt with a fall of ruffles at the front, diminishing in size and edged in white silk braid. His clothes for Quorum were in the medium-to-expensive price range, comparing with other contemporary designers such as Zandra Rhodes and Jean Muir. Quorum produced garments for direct sale as well as more specialized outfits to order. The company sold through its own retail outlets, through department stores such as the Way In section of the Harrods chain, and through individual boutiques such as Image in Bath. Clark's clothes were sold in America and Europe, being stocked in Italy by Fiorucci. His clientèle in the 1960s and 1970s read like a catalogue of the trendy rich and famous and included Marianne Faithful, Mick and Bianca Jagger, Twiggy, Marie Helvin, Cathy McGowan, and Goldie Hawn. In 1972 Mick Jagger owned no less than 10 Clark jumpsuits. Jagger wore a blue sequined stretch velour jumpsuit that unzipped down the front for his performance at Madison Square Garden in 1972. Clark's clothes were regularly featured in the fashion press, and fashion editors reputedly fought for tickets for his shows in the early 1970s.

From 1970, Quorum was two-thirds funded by Rady Fashions and Textiles, which provided the business premises. Alice Pollock dealt with day-to-day practicalities such as organizing staff, buying cloth, and having it dyed. From 1977 Clark had his own company using the design label Ossie Clark Ltd. However, in 1981, Clark's company succumbed to the economic recession, despite having been taken over in 1980 by MAK Industries, which wished to gain control of the Ossie Clark label and attempted unsuccessfully to open an American branch. Ossie Clark Ltd. went into voluntary liquidation in 1981, and Clark was declared bankrupt in 1983. Clark lasted longer than most designers who began in the late 1960s youth boom, which was a tribute to the enduring quality of his design stamina and the range and flexibility of his ideas.

Bankruptcy, however, was not the end of Clark's fashion career. He taught at the Royal College of Art and designed evening dresses for Radley Fashions, and in 1986 he launched a lingerie company in partnership with Gina Fratini, trading under the name Rustle. He made use of his skills in employing the bias cut to produce clinging lingerie in silk satin with lace trimmings and insertions.

In 1987, Evocative, the newly opened Grosvenor Street boutique, ordered one-off made-to-measure dresses from Clark for individual clients, with ball dresses retailing for £3,000. Despite his still evident international fame, in 1987 Clark was reduced to living by a barter system, such as making a hat for dancer Wayne Sleep, who in exchange paid for Clark's sewing machine to be mended—an enterprising solution all too many young designers may identify with.

Clark died in his Notting Hill apartment on 6 August 1996 of stab wounds inflicted by his lover, Diego Cogolato. He left photos and a meager journal of his well-connected life and art, which Lady Henrietta Rous edited in 1999. Reviewer Andrew Lycett dismissed the text as "meanderings." In a less judgemental double review for the New Statesman of a Vivienne Westwood biography and of Clark's diaries, Elizabeth Young summarized: "Ossie Clark's name evokes a familiar pantheon of imagery-prettiness and privilege, spun-sugar rebellion, Mick 'n' Bianca, Twiggy and Bailey, white butterflies, Moroccan lamps, dim rooms swagged and draped with ethnic tassels and fabrics, a fog of incense, rose-coloured spectacles and those early cocksure, thundering chords of the Beatles-Stones-Who soundtrack."

After riding out the turmoil from drug problems, bankruptcy, and depression with noticeable grace, Clark received a posthumous renown honoring the chiffon, snakeskin, and op-art funware with which he decked the Beatles, Ali McGraw, Elizabeth Taylor, Faye Dunaway, and Sharon Tate. The town of Warrington, Cheshire, where Clark's family resides, celebrated his talent with a 1999 museum and art gallery showing. Late 20th-century postpunk collectors Sandra Bullock and Nicole Kidman were among those who snapped up Clark's crêpes and gauzes. In February 2000, Decades, a source of vintage chic in Los Angeles, featured a retro honorarium of 100 Clark originals. Shop owner Cameron Silver stated, "I hope to be the one to put Ossie back on the map."

—Linda Coleing; updated by Mary Ellen Snodgrass

CLEAVER, Alan

See BYBLOS

CLERGERIE, Robert

French footwear designer

Born: 18 July 1934, in Paris, France. Education: École Supérieure de Commerce, Paris. Career: Manager, then designer, Xavier Danaud, of the Charles Jourdan factory, 1970s; purchased men's shoe company, Fenestrier, 1978; designed the first Robert Clergerie women's shoe line, 1981; established Clerma Company, for the opening of the first Robert Clergerie store, 1981; Lyon, Toulouse, and Paris Place des Victoires stores opened, 1982; J. Fenestrier men's store in Paris opened, 1983; franchise opened in Tokyo, 1986; New York store opened, 1987; Madrid and Brussels stores opened, 1988; London store opened, 1989; represented by 17 stores in France, six abroad, and three licensees in Japan, 1992; opened Los Angeles store, 1994; centenary of the firm, 1995; Clergerie sells majority of his shares, 1996; New York store transferred to Madison Avenue, 1996. Awards: Footwear News Designer of the Year, 1987, 1990.

were desirable qualities in a designer. Clark provided a great variety of images for both daywear and eveningwear.

From 1966 Clark was designing for Quorum, a London-based wholesale and boutique business, in partnership with Alice Pollock. His wife, Celia Birtwell, also an RCA graduate, provided many of the pattern designs for the printed textiles used by Clark. He designed both daywear and eveningwear, often using sensuous fabrics such as satin, chiffon, crêpe, and clinging jersey. Although, since he was so versatile and prolific, it is hard to characterize his style, he was probably best known for clinging crêpe and jersey dresses with plunging necklines, figure-hugging waists, and swirling skirts, but he was equally capable of producing close-fitting crisp linen suits. Innovations in terms of cut included suits with elbow-length tight-fitting sleeves over full long-sleeved blouses. In the late 1960s, he used exotic materials such as snakeskin, feathers, and metallic prints.

Clark launched his menswear line in 1968, which reflected the period's more relaxed attitude to male dressing. Examples from his first menswear collection included a pink crêpe shirt with a fall of ruffles at the front, diminishing in size and edged in white silk braid. His clothes for Quorum were in the medium-to-expensive price range, comparing with other contemporary designers such as Zandra Rhodes and Jean Muir. Quorum produced garments for direct sale as well as more specialized outfits to order. The company sold through its own retail outlets, through department stores such as the Way In section of the Harrods chain, and through individual boutiques such as Image in Bath. Clark's clothes were sold in America and Europe, being stocked in Italy by Fiorucci. His clientèle in the 1960s and 1970s read like a catalogue of the trendy rich and famous and included Marianne Faithful, Mick and Bianca Jagger, Twiggy, Marie Helvin, Cathy McGowan, and Goldie Hawn. In 1972 Mick Jagger owned no less than 10 Clark jumpsuits. Jagger wore a blue sequined stretch velour jumpsuit that unzipped down the front for his performance at Madison Square Garden in 1972. Clark's clothes were regularly featured in the fashion press, and fashion editors reputedly fought for tickets for his shows in the early 1970s.

From 1970, Quorum was two-thirds funded by Rady Fashions and Textiles, which provided the business premises. Alice Pollock dealt with day-to-day practicalities such as organizing staff, buying cloth, and having it dyed. From 1977 Clark had his own company using the design label Ossie Clark Ltd. However, in 1981, Clark's company succumbed to the economic recession, despite having been taken over in 1980 by MAK Industries, which wished to gain control of the Ossie Clark label and attempted unsuccessfully to open an American branch. Ossie Clark Ltd. went into voluntary liquidation in 1981, and Clark was declared bankrupt in 1983. Clark lasted longer than most designers who began in the late 1960s youth boom, which was a tribute to the enduring quality of his design stamina and the range and flexibility of his ideas.

Bankruptcy, however, was not the end of Clark's fashion career. He taught at the Royal College of Art and designed evening dresses for Radley Fashions, and in 1986 he launched a lingerie company in partnership with Gina Fratini, trading under the name Rustle. He made use of his skills in employing the bias cut to produce clinging lingerie in silk satin with lace trimmings and insertions.

In 1987, Evocative, the newly opened Grosvenor Street boutique, ordered one-off made-to-measure dresses from Clark for individual clients, with ball dresses retailing for £3,000. Despite his still evident international fame, in 1987 Clark was reduced to living by a barter system, such as making a hat for dancer Wayne Sleep, who in exchange paid for Clark's sewing machine to be mended—an enterprising solution all too many young designers may identify with.

Clark died in his Notting Hill apartment on 6 August 1996 of stab wounds inflicted by his lover, Diego Cogolato. He left photos and a meager journal of his well-connected life and art, which Lady Henrietta Rous edited in 1999. Reviewer Andrew Lycett dismissed the text as "meanderings." In a less judgemental double review for the New Statesman of a Vivienne Westwood biography and of Clark's diaries, Elizabeth Young summarized: "Ossie Clark's name evokes a familiar pantheon of imagery-prettiness and privilege, spun-sugar rebellion, Mick 'n' Bianca, Twiggy and Bailey, white butterflies, Moroccan lamps, dim rooms swagged and draped with ethnic tassels and fabrics, a fog of incense, rose-coloured spectacles and those early cocksure, thundering chords of the Beatles-Stones-Who soundtrack."

After riding out the turmoil from drug problems, bankruptcy, and depression with noticeable grace, Clark received a posthumous renown honoring the chiffon, snakeskin, and op-art funware with which he decked the Beatles, Ali McGraw, Elizabeth Taylor, Faye Dunaway, and Sharon Tate. The town of Warrington, Cheshire, where Clark's family resides, celebrated his talent with a 1999 museum and art gallery showing. Late 20th-century postpunk collectors Sandra Bullock and Nicole Kidman were among those who snapped up Clark's crêpes and gauzes. In February 2000, Decades, a source of vintage chic in Los Angeles, featured a retro honorarium of 100 Clark originals. Shop owner Cameron Silver stated, "I hope to be the one to put Ossie back on the map."

—Linda Coleing; updated by Mary Ellen Snodgrass

CLEAVER, Alan

See BYBLOS

CLERGERIE, Robert

French footwear designer

Born: 18 July 1934, in Paris, France. Education: École Supérieure de Commerce, Paris. Career: Manager, then designer, Xavier Danaud, of the Charles Jourdan factory, 1970s; purchased men's shoe company, Fenestrier, 1978; designed the first Robert Clergerie women's shoe line, 1981; established Clerma Company, for the opening of the first Robert Clergerie store, 1981; Lyon, Toulouse, and Paris Place des Victoires stores opened, 1982; J. Fenestrier men's store in Paris opened, 1983; franchise opened in Tokyo, 1986; New York store opened, 1987; Madrid and Brussels stores opened, 1988; London store opened, 1989; represented by 17 stores in France, six abroad, and three licensees in Japan, 1992; opened Los Angeles store, 1994; centenary of the firm, 1995; Clergerie sells majority of his shares, 1996; New York store transferred to Madison Avenue, 1996. Awards: Footwear News Designer of the Year, 1987, 1990.

PUBLICATIONSOn CLERGERIE:*Books

Stegemeyer, Anne, Who's Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.

Articles

"Bandals Galore," in Newsweek, 21 May 1984.

Infantino, Vivian, "Clergerie Hears the Pitter Patter of Sandals for the Winter Season," in Footwear News, 23 May 1994.

Baber, Bonnie, et al., "The Design Masters," in Footwear News, 17 April 1995.

"Clergerie, Furla Launch Units on Mad Avenue," in WWD, 18 June 1996.

"Clergerie Takes Madison," in Footwear News, 25 November 1996.

Weisman, Katherine, "The Romans Empire," in Footwear News, 1 September 1997.

* * *

Robert Clergerie's shoes exhibit a sense of style and class equivalent to the artistic impression of a painter's sculpture. But for Clergerie, shoes are not made solely for fashion; shoes are made for walking. While paying close attention to technique and detail, his designs stress purpose and comfort. The grace and practicality of Clergerie's shoes have led him to be named the "functionalist" of shoe fashion. With respect to practicality, many men and women are drawn to Clergerie's shoes because he successfully designs stunning, functional shoes that can be worn in today's career-oriented society.

Clergerie uses a three-part design criteria when introducing a new line: first, each proposed item needs to be within the scope of the manufacturer's expertise; second, as a designer Clergerie must have the right idea at the right time—anticipating what his customers want, a year in advance; and third, he has to be the only designer creating within a particular area, to offer his clientèle unique, beautiful items. Clergerie believes his simplistic design technique is the only way to success and excellence in shoemaking. He has said that the stronger the idea, the simpler the design, and therefore, the less need for ornamentation. Clergerie's designs are not complicated with adornments, but are simple and chic. This has made him one of the most influential shoe designers of his time, and his designs have had a marked influence in the fashion arena.

In 1981, for example, Clergerie debuted his line with lace-up oxfords, a man's shoe made for a woman that has since become an essential item to wardrobes. He also designed the raffia sandal in 1992 and the parallelogram heel in 1984. Since then, cobblers have imitated the parallelogram heel and call it the Clergerie heel. In 1994, to be unconventional, he designed sandals for the winter season because, as he stated, he had a "feeling for sandals in the winter." To accommodate the cold weather, the sandals were designed to be worn with big, thick socks. Clergerie went on to design the horn-shaped heel in 1989 and his metal heel in 1993, which was the inspiration for the spike heel.

Clergerie is inspired by the world; it is where he receives his originality and the innovation of his designs. As he lives his life, he takes on the world and engulfs all aspects of it. He pays close attention to the details, such as architecture, food, and the breeze felt from a motorcycle ride. He encompasses all of life's joys and arranges them into his designs, giving Clergerie shoes their stylish beauty, individuality, and simplicity.

—Kimbally A. Medeiros

COLE, Kenneth

American designer

Born: 23 March 1954 in Brooklyn, New York. Education: Emory University, 1976. Family: Married Maria Cuomo in 1987; three children. Career: President, CEO, and designer for Kenneth Cole

Kenneth Cole, fall 2001 collection: twill denim lapel suit and satin shirt. © AFP/CORBIS.

PUBLICATIONSOn CLERGERIE:*Books

Stegemeyer, Anne, Who's Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.

Articles

"Bandals Galore," in Newsweek, 21 May 1984.

Infantino, Vivian, "Clergerie Hears the Pitter Patter of Sandals for the Winter Season," in Footwear News, 23 May 1994.

Baber, Bonnie, et al., "The Design Masters," in Footwear News, 17 April 1995.

"Clergerie, Furla Launch Units on Mad Avenue," in WWD, 18 June 1996.

"Clergerie Takes Madison," in Footwear News, 25 November 1996.

Weisman, Katherine, "The Romans Empire," in Footwear News, 1 September 1997.

* * *

Robert Clergerie's shoes exhibit a sense of style and class equivalent to the artistic impression of a painter's sculpture. But for Clergerie, shoes are not made solely for fashion; shoes are made for walking. While paying close attention to technique and detail, his designs stress purpose and comfort. The grace and practicality of Clergerie's shoes have led him to be named the "functionalist" of shoe fashion. With respect to practicality, many men and women are drawn to Clergerie's shoes because he successfully designs stunning, functional shoes that can be worn in today's career-oriented society.

Clergerie uses a three-part design criteria when introducing a new line: first, each proposed item needs to be within the scope of the manufacturer's expertise; second, as a designer Clergerie must have the right idea at the right time—anticipating what his customers want, a year in advance; and third, he has to be the only designer creating within a particular area, to offer his clientèle unique, beautiful items. Clergerie believes his simplistic design technique is the only way to success and excellence in shoemaking. He has said that the stronger the idea, the simpler the design, and therefore, the less need for ornamentation. Clergerie's designs are not complicated with adornments, but are simple and chic. This has made him one of the most influential shoe designers of his time, and his designs have had a marked influence in the fashion arena.

In 1981, for example, Clergerie debuted his line with lace-up oxfords, a man's shoe made for a woman that has since become an essential item to wardrobes. He also designed the raffia sandal in 1992 and the parallelogram heel in 1984. Since then, cobblers have imitated the parallelogram heel and call it the Clergerie heel. In 1994, to be unconventional, he designed sandals for the winter season because, as he stated, he had a "feeling for sandals in the winter." To accommodate the cold weather, the sandals were designed to be worn with big, thick socks. Clergerie went on to design the horn-shaped heel in 1989 and his metal heel in 1993, which was the inspiration for the spike heel.

Clergerie is inspired by the world; it is where he receives his originality and the innovation of his designs. As he lives his life, he takes on the world and engulfs all aspects of it. He pays close attention to the details, such as architecture, food, and the breeze felt from a motorcycle ride. He encompasses all of life's joys and arranges them into his designs, giving Clergerie shoes their stylish beauty, individuality, and simplicity.

—Kimbally A. Medeiros

COLE, Kenneth

American designer

Born: 23 March 1954 in Brooklyn, New York. Education: Emory University, 1976. Family: Married Maria Cuomo in 1987; three children. Career: President, CEO, and designer for Kenneth Cole

Kenneth Cole, fall 2001 collection: twill denim lapel suit and satin shirt. © AFP/CORBIS.

Productions, Inc., since 1982. Awards: Creative Coalition Spotlight award; Devine Design's Humanitarian of the Year, 1996; CFDA's award for Humanitarian Excellence, 1996; Mothers' Voices Extraordinary Voice award; Council of Foundations Humanitarian Leadership award, 1996; Footwear News Person of the Year, 1996; FFANY's Fashion Medal of Honor award, 1997; Amnesty International Media Spotlight award, 1998; T. Kenyon Holly award, 2000. Address: 152 West 57th Street, New York, NY 10019, USA. Websites: www.kennethcole.com; www.reactiononline.com.

PUBLICATIONS

On COLE:

Articles

- Critchell, Samantha, "Designer Combines Style, Activism," in Associated Press Online, 21 July 1999.
- Gonzalez, Isabel, "In Style: For Kenneth Cole, Fashion, Activism Are Driving Forces," in Atlanta Journal and Constitution, 3 October 1999.
- D'Innocenzo, Anne, "In the Zone," WWD, 22 March 2000.

Kenneth Cole, fall 2001 collection: napa leather shirt, pinstripe skirt, wide suede belt, and wrap choke collar. © AP/Wide World Photos.

- Cunningham, Thomas, "Kenneth Cole: Firing on All Cylinders," WWD, 17 April 2000.
- Sturrock, Staci, "Direct from Grand Central Casting: Kenneth Cole Mixes Politics and Pleasure With His Fresh Inaugural Collection," in Palm Beach Post, 21 September 2000.
- Cole, Patrick, "Kenneth Cole Dives Into 'Shark Tank,'" in Newsday, 31 October 2000.

*

I design products you can wear today and tomorrow from season to season. You want to look modern without being too edgy, and you always want value. I mean, you can buy a pair of shoes for a dollar, but if you never wear them you've paid too much.

—Kenneth Cole

* * *

To be aware is more important than what you wear.

—Kenneth Cole advertising tagline.

Kenneth Cole launched Kenneth Cole Productions with a trailer full of his women's shoe designs parked on Sixth Avenue during a 1982 shoe show. Eschewing the anonymity of being one among thousands in a room at the Hilton and unable to afford the grand midtown Manhattan showrooms preferred by the large companies, Cole changed his company's name from Kenneth Cole, Inc. to Kenneth Cole Productions, Inc. in order to obtain a film production permit (the only kind the city of New York would give) to park the truck. The name of the film listed on the permit was Birth of a Shoe Company. Within two and a half days, he and his crew sold 40,000 pairs of shoes. The Kenneth Cole name soon became synonymous with modishly hip urban footwear, followed by accessories. In 1998 Cole took on menswear, in which his collections quickly made a mark; he then debuted his first womenswear collection in a show at New York's Grand Central Station in 2000.

The term "hip-classic" has often been applied in describing Cole's designs. In both men's and women's collections, he utilizes a preponderance of leather and suede, along with silk shantung, cashmeres, wools, cottons, and synthetic fabric blends to create styles that manage to be both elegant and relaxed. Cole designs, in his own words, fashion for the "contemporary person who wants to have a sense of identity and personality, but also doesn't want to be the focal point of the crowd because of what he or she is wearing." His designs do not push the boundaries of comfort and wearability but court classic lines with imaginative twists and modern edges. In seeking a balancing point between fashionable élan and practical functionality, Cole's style blurs the lines between everyday casual and dresswear.

Cole's menswear collections have included everything from denim, quilted vests, and shirt jackets to narrow three- and four-button suits and techno-inspired outerwear in black with vivid linings. Black leather is generally in abundance for everything from streamlined coats to zippered vests to shirts worn under tailored pinstriped suits. Cole also uses a lot of metallic glazed or embossed leather. For women, collections range in these same areas, with a touch of whimsy in patchwork suedes in lime and tan, tie-dyed hot pants, hip-slung long pants, more metallics, and antiqued leathers. His colors tend toward the urban: black on black, navy, olive, gunmetal gray, bronze, though with his entry into womenswear the palette expanded to include fresher and more vivid hues. His Fall 2001 collection, described as "his most sophisticated and luxe collection to date," joined menswear and womenswear into a harmonious whole on the runway.

A defining aspect of all of Cole's work has always been an active implementation of his social conscience through advertising campaigns, show themes, sales incentives, benefits, and a general dedication to consciousness-raising. His advertising campaigns typically feature taglines, such as "...sixty-two percent of society believes preferences other than their own are wrong. So much for seeing eye to eye," or "For every dollar a man makes, a woman earns seventy-six cents. Change please," and "The family gun stands a greater chance of killing you than a stranger." Cole writes much of this ad copy himself and grappling with such issues, he has stressed, is not just an advertising gimmick for the company but very much a part of its identity. Other examples of this commitment have been shows requiring attendees to donate a pair of shoes for the homeless, a traveling warehouse sale to benefit AIDS research, and sales incentives in the form of discounts in return for a donation of shoes or clothing. Preceding his shows have been films encouraging voting or talking about prejudice with, instead of the usual gifts found at fashions shows on attendees' seats, pamphlets or books underlining and informing on the issue in question.

As Cole says, "I'm trying to add value to the process of shopping. I'm trying to make what we do more relevant than it normally would be, because at the end of the day, I make shoes and pants, so sometimes it's hard to get totally motivated. You make what you do part of something bigger than it is. Then what you do becomes important and you can justify the compromises we all make." As well as being socially progressive, Cole is technologically forward, one of the first to engage in live webcasts of his runway shows. The live webcast of his Fall 2000 menswear show was designed to raise awareness about homelessness and benefit HELP USA.

Kenneth Cole Productions now oversees a retail empire spanning the U.S., with additional stores in Amsterdam, Hong Kong, Singapore, and Taiwan. Near the end of 2000, Cole opened an 18,000-square-foot flagship store on Fifth Avenue in New York at the entrance to Rockefeller Center. In addition to shoes, accessories, and men's and women's collections, the designer has ventured into jewelry, perfume, and a number of other licensing ventures. Future plans include expansion into children's clothing and home décor. It seems likely that both Cole's approach to style as a practical component of everyday life and his commitment to humanitarian causes will remain constant no matter how many areas of fashion and design he chooses to explore.

—Jessica Reisman

COLE HAAN

American footwear design house

Founded: in Chicago by Trafton Cole and Eddie Haan, 1928.
Company History: Cole Haan sold to group of partners headed by George Denney, 1975; launched retail division, 1982; sold to Nike for $80 million, 1988; repositioned under Modern Artisan theme, late 1990s; redesigned retail stores, 2000; signed license with G-III for apparel, 2000; licensed Air technology from Nike for Cole Haan shoes, 2000. Company Address: 1 Cole Haan Drive, Yarmouth, ME 04096, USA. Company Website: www.colehaan.com.

PUBLICATIONS

On COLE HAAN:

Articles

- "Alone by Design," in Forbes, 20 May 1996.
- "Cole Haan Cuts Staff by 74, Prez Taylor Steps Down," in Footwear News, 6 April 1998.
- Mullins, David Philip, "Stoking the Cole," in Footwear News, 8 November 1999.
- "Cole Haan Licenses Apparel," in Footwear News, 21 February 2000.
- LoRusso, Maryann, "New Cole Haan Lifestyle Line Injected with Nike Technology," in Footwear News, 6 March 2000.
- Mui, Nelson, "Comfort is in the Air at Cole Haan," in DNR, 6 March 2000.
- Brumback, Nancy, "Cole Haan Redesigns Flagship Stores in Line with the Brand's Updated Look," in Footwear News, 2 October 2000.

* * *

Cole Haan was formed in Chicago in 1928 by Trafton Cole and Eddie Haan, who built the company on a reputation of quality, craftsmanship, style, and service. Cole Haan—which began life as a men's footwear brand but expanded into women's and children's products as well—has sought to maintain this spirit throughout its more than 70-year history.

Cole Haan was sold to a group of partners headed by George Denney in 1975. These executives built upon the foundation established by Cole and Haan over the following decade, transforming the label into one of the leading U.S. footwear brands. They launched a retail division in 1982, which comprised 42 stores worldwide and cumulative annual sales of nearly $70 million by 1996.

Sports giant Nike purchased Cole Haan for $80 million in 1988, a move that represented Nike's first foray outside the athletic shoe business. Cole Haan's management—though based at the firm's international headquarters in Yarmouth, Maine, and its design headquarters in New York City—has continued to operate largely autonomously since the merger.

Many of Cole Haan's competitors have relied on licensed designer labels to increase their sales, but the company has preferred to focus on building its own brand. It has expanded the Cole Haan name into pumps, flats, sandals, and other casual and formal styles, and has since segued into leather accessories such as handbags, briefcases, belts, and wallets and into compatible products such as hosiery. During the mid-1990s Cole Haan worked to extend its presence internationally, especially in Europe. The company introduced a collection of driving shoes targeted at European customers in 1996; this style had long been one of Cole Haan's bestsellers on the Continent, but the relaunch made the line more fashion forward, with new colors, longer-lasting materials, and softer leathers. At the same time, as reported in Footwear News, Cole Haan introduced fashion leather and suede versions of its Anaconda chukka boots specifically for Europe. The company sold its European products through more than 300 retail doors in Italy alone.

The late 1990s represented a rough period for Cole Haan. Sales were lower than expected, which led to layoffs and the departure of though with his entry into womenswear the palette expanded to include fresher and more vivid hues. His Fall 2001 collection, described as "his most sophisticated and luxe collection to date," joined menswear and womenswear into a harmonious whole on the runway.

A defining aspect of all of Cole's work has always been an active implementation of his social conscience through advertising campaigns, show themes, sales incentives, benefits, and a general dedication to consciousness-raising. His advertising campaigns typically feature taglines, such as "...sixty-two percent of society believes preferences other than their own are wrong. So much for seeing eye to eye," or "For every dollar a man makes, a woman earns seventy-six cents. Change please," and "The family gun stands a greater chance of killing you than a stranger." Cole writes much of this ad copy himself and grappling with such issues, he has stressed, is not just an advertising gimmick for the company but very much a part of its identity. Other examples of this commitment have been shows requiring attendees to donate a pair of shoes for the homeless, a traveling warehouse sale to benefit AIDS research, and sales incentives in the form of discounts in return for a donation of shoes or clothing. Preceding his shows have been films encouraging voting or talking about prejudice with, instead of the usual gifts found at fashions shows on attendees' seats, pamphlets or books underlining and informing on the issue in question.

As Cole says, "I'm trying to add value to the process of shopping. I'm trying to make what we do more relevant than it normally would be, because at the end of the day, I make shoes and pants, so sometimes it's hard to get totally motivated. You make what you do part of something bigger than it is. Then what you do becomes important and you can justify the compromises we all make." As well as being socially progressive, Cole is technologically forward, one of the first to engage in live webcasts of his runway shows. The live webcast of his Fall 2000 menswear show was designed to raise awareness about homelessness and benefit HELP USA.

Kenneth Cole Productions now oversees a retail empire spanning the U.S., with additional stores in Amsterdam, Hong Kong, Singapore, and Taiwan. Near the end of 2000, Cole opened an 18,000-square-foot flagship store on Fifth Avenue in New York at the entrance to Rockefeller Center. In addition to shoes, accessories, and men's and women's collections, the designer has ventured into jewelry, perfume, and a number of other licensing ventures. Future plans include expansion into children's clothing and home décor. It seems likely that both Cole's approach to style as a practical component of everyday life and his commitment to humanitarian causes will remain constant no matter how many areas of fashion and design he chooses to explore.

—Jessica Reisman

COLE HAAN

American footwear design house

Founded: in Chicago by Trafton Cole and Eddie Haan, 1928.
Company History: Cole Haan sold to group of partners headed by George Denney, 1975; launched retail division, 1982; sold to Nike for $80 million, 1988; repositioned under Modern Artisan theme, late 1990s; redesigned retail stores, 2000; signed license with G-III for apparel, 2000; licensed Air technology from Nike for Cole Haan shoes, 2000. Company Address: 1 Cole Haan Drive, Yarmouth, ME 04096, USA. Company Website: www.colehaan.com.

PUBLICATIONS

On COLE HAAN:

Articles

- "Alone by Design," in Forbes, 20 May 1996.
- "Cole Haan Cuts Staff by 74, Prez Taylor Steps Down," in Footwear News, 6 April 1998.
- Mullins, David Philip, "Stoking the Cole," in Footwear News, 8 November 1999.
- "Cole Haan Licenses Apparel," in Footwear News, 21 February 2000.
- LoRusso, Maryann, "New Cole Haan Lifestyle Line Injected with Nike Technology," in Footwear News, 6 March 2000.
- Mui, Nelson, "Comfort is in the Air at Cole Haan," in DNR, 6 March 2000.
- Brumback, Nancy, "Cole Haan Redesigns Flagship Stores in Line with the Brand's Updated Look," in Footwear News, 2 October 2000.

* * *

Cole Haan was formed in Chicago in 1928 by Trafton Cole and Eddie Haan, who built the company on a reputation of quality, craftsmanship, style, and service. Cole Haan—which began life as a men's footwear brand but expanded into women's and children's products as well—has sought to maintain this spirit throughout its more than 70-year history.

Cole Haan was sold to a group of partners headed by George Denney in 1975. These executives built upon the foundation established by Cole and Haan over the following decade, transforming the label into one of the leading U.S. footwear brands. They launched a retail division in 1982, which comprised 42 stores worldwide and cumulative annual sales of nearly $70 million by 1996.

Sports giant Nike purchased Cole Haan for $80 million in 1988, a move that represented Nike's first foray outside the athletic shoe business. Cole Haan's management—though based at the firm's international headquarters in Yarmouth, Maine, and its design headquarters in New York City—has continued to operate largely autonomously since the merger.

Many of Cole Haan's competitors have relied on licensed designer labels to increase their sales, but the company has preferred to focus on building its own brand. It has expanded the Cole Haan name into pumps, flats, sandals, and other casual and formal styles, and has since segued into leather accessories such as handbags, briefcases, belts, and wallets and into compatible products such as hosiery. During the mid-1990s Cole Haan worked to extend its presence internationally, especially in Europe. The company introduced a collection of driving shoes targeted at European customers in 1996; this style had long been one of Cole Haan's bestsellers on the Continent, but the relaunch made the line more fashion forward, with new colors, longer-lasting materials, and softer leathers. At the same time, as reported in Footwear News, Cole Haan introduced fashion leather and suede versions of its Anaconda chukka boots specifically for Europe. The company sold its European products through more than 300 retail doors in Italy alone.

The late 1990s represented a rough period for Cole Haan. Sales were lower than expected, which led to layoffs and the departure of the company president. Nike, too, was having financial and marketing problems at the same time, but Cole Haan's troubles were thought to be unrelated to those of its parent. Starting in 1998, several Nike executives began moving to the Cole Haan unit to help revitalize the brand. The next year Nike repositioned the Cole Haan label, introducing new footwear items with more modern styling while continuing to emphasize the high quality upon which the company was founded. The new positioning was referred to as "Modern Artisan" and supported by a lifestyle advertising campaign.

At the time of the repositioning, the company estimated that 60 to 80 percent of each year's product lines would be new styles, with the remainder comprised of carryovers of classic styles. The added items were intended to appeal to more market segments within the company's core target of affluent 30- to 50-year-olds. Cole Haan differentiated itself from its competitors by dividing its line into several unique lifestyle collections, each appealing to different customers and as well as different aspects of the customers' lives. Groupings have included Country, City, Studio, Resort, Evening, Home, and Bregano.

Cole Haan translated its new Modern Artisan positioning to stores starting in 2000, redesigning two prototypes, in Chicago and Boston, to be followed by others later in the year. Store designs reflected the company's new gray-green and red logo and afforded an opportunity to bring together all the Cole Haan-branded products under one lifestyle image. (The Chicago store is located next to the parent company's flagship Niketown outlet.) Additionally, Cole Haan also announced its intention to add more stores within its retail division.

At the front of each redesigned store, a new product line, Cole Haan with Nike Air Technology, was featured. This line formed the focal point of Nike's new Modern Artisan strategy, which included comfort among its primary attributes. Cole Haan licensed Nike's Air technology—made famous in its athletic footwear line endorsed by Michael Jordan—for use in several shoe stylings. The patented Air cushioning is integrated into the sole, with small windows on the bottom of each Cole Haan shoe show the technology at work.

Upon launch, Cole Haan executives explained that they expected this new line to ultimately account for 15 percent of the division's volume, which stood at $200 million in 2000. By devoting 25-percent of the Cole Haan advertising budget to the Air-branded products, the company intended to emphasize the technology itself rather than the Nike brand, though both companies' logos appear on the bottom of the shoes. Cole Haan also planned to eventually expand into other products, such as travel accessories, featuring Air technology. The company also expanded by granting its first license to an outside company, extending its brand further into the apparel category. G-III Apparel Group announced it would make leather and fabric outerwear, as well as other clothing under the Cole Haan label, to be sold in Cole Haan stores and at other retailers (mostly upscale department stores) carrying Cole Haan footwear.

Although the new Nike Air technology represents the "modern" in Cole Haan's positioning, the company continues to stress the quality and craftsmanship suggested by the word "artisan." Company literature points out that a single craftsman is responsible for each pair of shoes, overseeing its progress from beginning to end with said craftsman putting the pair of completed shoes into the Cole Haan box himself or herself. This personal touch, combined with technological and stylistic innovation, is what Modern Artisan means to Cole Haan.

—Karen Raugust

COLEMAN, Nick

British designer

Born: circa 1960. Education: Graduated from St. Martin's School of Art, London, mid-1980s. Family: Married Lucy Coleman. Career: Produced such collections as Kimota Returns; operated London night clubs, including Solaris; cofounder/owner, with Lucy Coleman, of Body Control Pilates, from 1997. Addresses: 202 New North Road, London N1 7BJ England; 66 Neal Street, London WC2H 9TA England.

PUBLICATIONS

On COLEMAN:

Articles

- Buckley, Richard, "UK Designer Exhibition Has Promise," in DNR, 4 September 1986.
- Flett, Kathryn, "Patsy Looks Perfect," in the Sunday Times Magazine (London), 12 April 1987.
- "British Designers to Give AIDS Research Benefit," in Daily News Record, 14 September 1987.
- Lobrano, Alexander, "British Designers Salvage a 'Lost Season' at SEHM," in Daily News Record, 14 September 1987.
- "London Now," in Women's Wear Daily, 12 October 1987.
- "Model Interiors," in the Sunday Express Magazine (London), 25 October 1987.
- "Shooting Stars," in Women's Journal (London), February 1988.
- Hume, Marion, "The Italian Connection," in the Sunday Times (London), 14 May 1989.
- Rosenblum, Anne, "Kashiyama Will Distribute Todd Oldham Women's Line," in Women's Wear Daily, 17 May 1989.
- Fallon, James, "Galliano to Show Fall-Winter Line in Paris, March 14," in Women's Wear Daily, 2 February 1990.
- Collen, Matthew, "Nick Coleman," in i-D (London), April 1990.
- Carter, Charles, and Charlotte Du Cann, "Europe 1990: Designers to Watch," in Vogue, August 1990.
- Yusuf, Nilgin, "London Sport Deluxe," in Elle (New York), August 1990.
- "London Shows: Wacky is Out and Safe is In," in Women's Wear Daily, 15 October 1990.
- Rodgers, Toni, "Double Vision," in Elle (London), March 1991.
- Leitch, Brian D., "Tales of London," in Women's Wear Daily, 8 March 1993.
- d'Aulnay, Sophie, "The Top of the Tops," in DNR, 24 September 1993.
- Fallon, James, "Alternative-Fashion Devotees Turn to Neal Street," in Footwear News, 18 October 1993.
- Feitelberg, Rosemary, "Body Control to Hit U.S.," in Women's Wear Daily, 5 August 1999.
- "India: British Airways Introduces Onboard Exercises," in Hindu, 15 June 2001.

* * *

Nick Coleman's work has reflected the shift in mood that has taken fashion from the sleek tailoring and obvious luxury of the mid- to late 1980s into the more casual-based sports influence of the early 1990s.

the company president. Nike, too, was having financial and marketing problems at the same time, but Cole Haan's troubles were thought to be unrelated to those of its parent. Starting in 1998, several Nike executives began moving to the Cole Haan unit to help revitalize the brand. The next year Nike repositioned the Cole Haan label, introducing new footwear items with more modern styling while continuing to emphasize the high quality upon which the company was founded. The new positioning was referred to as "Modern Artisan" and supported by a lifestyle advertising campaign.

At the time of the repositioning, the company estimated that 60 to 80 percent of each year's product lines would be new styles, with the remainder comprised of carryovers of classic styles. The added items were intended to appeal to more market segments within the company's core target of affluent 30- to 50-year-olds. Cole Haan differentiated itself from its competitors by dividing its line into several unique lifestyle collections, each appealing to different customers and as well as different aspects of the customers' lives. Groupings have included Country, City, Studio, Resort, Evening, Home, and Bregano.

Cole Haan translated its new Modern Artisan positioning to stores starting in 2000, redesigning two prototypes, in Chicago and Boston, to be followed by others later in the year. Store designs reflected the company's new gray-green and red logo and afforded an opportunity to bring together all the Cole Haan-branded products under one lifestyle image. (The Chicago store is located next to the parent company's flagship Niketown outlet.) Additionally, Cole Haan also announced its intention to add more stores within its retail division.

At the front of each redesigned store, a new product line, Cole Haan with Nike Air Technology, was featured. This line formed the focal point of Nike's new Modern Artisan strategy, which included comfort among its primary attributes. Cole Haan licensed Nike's Air technology—made famous in its athletic footwear line endorsed by Michael Jordan—for use in several shoe stylings. The patented Air cushioning is integrated into the sole, with small windows on the bottom of each Cole Haan shoe show the technology at work.

Upon launch, Cole Haan executives explained that they expected this new line to ultimately account for 15 percent of the division's volume, which stood at $200 million in 2000. By devoting 25-percent of the Cole Haan advertising budget to the Air-branded products, the company intended to emphasize the technology itself rather than the Nike brand, though both companies' logos appear on the bottom of the shoes. Cole Haan also planned to eventually expand into other products, such as travel accessories, featuring Air technology. The company also expanded by granting its first license to an outside company, extending its brand further into the apparel category. G-III Apparel Group announced it would make leather and fabric outerwear, as well as other clothing under the Cole Haan label, to be sold in Cole Haan stores and at other retailers (mostly upscale department stores) carrying Cole Haan footwear.

Although the new Nike Air technology represents the "modern" in Cole Haan's positioning, the company continues to stress the quality and craftsmanship suggested by the word "artisan." Company literature points out that a single craftsman is responsible for each pair of shoes, overseeing its progress from beginning to end with said craftsman putting the pair of completed shoes into the Cole Haan box himself or herself. This personal touch, combined with technological and stylistic innovation, is what Modern Artisan means to Cole Haan.

—Karen Raugust

COLEMAN, Nick

British designer

Born: circa 1960. Education: Graduated from St. Martin's School of Art, London, mid-1980s. Family: Married Lucy Coleman. Career: Produced such collections as Kimota Returns; operated London night clubs, including Solaris; cofounder/owner, with Lucy Coleman, of Body Control Pilates, from 1997. Addresses: 202 New North Road, London N1 7BJ England; 66 Neal Street, London WC2H 9TA England.

PUBLICATIONS

On COLEMAN:

Articles

- Buckley, Richard, "UK Designer Exhibition Has Promise," in DNR, 4 September 1986.
- Flett, Kathryn, "Patsy Looks Perfect," in the Sunday Times Magazine (London), 12 April 1987.
- "British Designers to Give AIDS Research Benefit," in Daily News Record, 14 September 1987.
- Lobrano, Alexander, "British Designers Salvage a 'Lost Season' at SEHM," in Daily News Record, 14 September 1987.
- "London Now," in Women's Wear Daily, 12 October 1987.
- "Model Interiors," in the Sunday Express Magazine (London), 25 October 1987.
- "Shooting Stars," in Women's Journal (London), February 1988.
- Hume, Marion, "The Italian Connection," in the Sunday Times (London), 14 May 1989.
- Rosenblum, Anne, "Kashiyama Will Distribute Todd Oldham Women's Line," in Women's Wear Daily, 17 May 1989.
- Fallon, James, "Galliano to Show Fall-Winter Line in Paris, March 14," in Women's Wear Daily, 2 February 1990.
- Collen, Matthew, "Nick Coleman," in i-D (London), April 1990.
- Carter, Charles, and Charlotte Du Cann, "Europe 1990: Designers to Watch," in Vogue, August 1990.
- Yusuf, Nilgin, "London Sport Deluxe," in Elle (New York), August 1990.
- "London Shows: Wacky is Out and Safe is In," in Women's Wear Daily, 15 October 1990.
- Rodgers, Toni, "Double Vision," in Elle (London), March 1991.
- Leitch, Brian D., "Tales of London," in Women's Wear Daily, 8 March 1993.
- d'Aulnay, Sophie, "The Top of the Tops," in DNR, 24 September 1993.
- Fallon, James, "Alternative-Fashion Devotees Turn to Neal Street," in Footwear News, 18 October 1993.
- Feitelberg, Rosemary, "Body Control to Hit U.S.," in Women's Wear Daily, 5 August 1999.
- "India: British Airways Introduces Onboard Exercises," in Hindu, 15 June 2001.

* * *

Nick Coleman's work has reflected the shift in mood that has taken fashion from the sleek tailoring and obvious luxury of the mid- to late 1980s into the more casual-based sports influence of the early 1990s.

Among the rash of London-based talent heralding the designer boom, which included the likes of 31 Fevrier, Julien Anryon, Corinne Cobson, Claire Deve, Irie, Pascale Risbourg, and Zucca, Coleman produced consistently strong silhouettes for women. His earlier work had been based mainly on careful tailoring, dresses fitted to the body and then flared into little, full skirts, concentrating on charcoal and navy blue pinstripes for daywear and branching into warmer shades for sharply balanced modern evening designs.

In 1986 Coleman showed his Legion of the Lost collection at the First British Designer Menswear Trade Exhibition, a military and safari styled collection. A prime piece in this collection was described by Richard Buckley in the Daily News Record (4 September 1986) as "a long, body-conscious jacket featur[ing] a belted waist, military-style pockets, pockets at the chest for bullet storage and a double layered back with Y-cutout construction." In 1988, he showed a popular claret palazzo trouser all-in-one, which hugged the torso in gauzy georgette, with tucked silk forming a bustier section linked to the trousers by a strip of buttons that reached from the collar.

In the late 1980s Coleman clothes encapsulated the confidence and streamlined modernity that dominated fashion. His menswear was equally well adapted to the smart, tailored look that was aspired to, with, in 1986, black double-breasted trench coats and classic turn-up trousers. By the dawning of the 1990s, however, Coleman was immersed in the burgeoning rave scene with its more relaxed attitude to clothing. After taking a break from fashion to run his own nightclubs, his designs began to reflect the tribalism and body-conscious sports influence of the scene. The freer feel of young London clubbers led to the development of a more recognizable signature to his work.

The variations on the classic biker jackets he had designed in 1989, with fringing for sleeves and chain-trimmed bra tops, were obviously influenced by the music scene. Later versions were even teamed with punk-inspired tartans. These, however, were quickly surpassed by sexy, sporty, shaped separates that gave ease of movement and a recognizable image for the dance floor. Coleman's strong advertising campaigns followed this mood, with models daubed with body paint to represent the shield emblem adorning much of his diffusion range.

Coleman dressed ardent clubbers in the heavily padded puffa jackets that were obligatory at raves during the first two years of the decade, worn with his bodies, stretch skirts, and trousers with striped trim that referred to school sportswear in its detailing. Although it is this club wear that is most instantly recognizable, he continues to produce well-cut suiting (including, in the 1990s, velvet-collared slim-fitting Teddy Boy styles) for his main line, mixing classic shapes with more experimental elements. His involvement in the 5th Circle menswear collective underlines this dedication to innovative designs and the attention to detail echoed in his consistently strong leather and denim lines.

By 1989 Coleman had joined designers like Dolce & Gabbana, Bent Boys, Luciano Soprani, and Todd Oldham in being distributed by Onward Kashiyama. In 1997 he and his wife, Lucy, cofounded Body Control Pilates, a company manufacturing understated athletic-inspired apparel, featuring activewear as well as bags, blankets, slippers, robes, cosmetic bags, and pillows. The company brought in approximately $350,000 in its first few years.

Coleman's work has continued to fall under the influence of the London club scene, but his ability to produce interesting tailored designs widens his appeal and prevents his clothes from being too narrowly pigeon-holed. His popularity in London is based on his skill in producing clothing imbued with zeitgeist as well as more classic garments that prolong the longevity of his appeal.

—Rebecca Arnold; updated by Daryl F. Mallett

COLE OF CALIFORNIA

American swimwear company

Founded: Formed by Fred Cole from family knitwear firm in Los Angeles, 1923. Company History: Began collaborating with Hollywood costume designer Margit Fellegi, 1936; signed Esther Williams to represent the company, 1950; began producing swimwear from Christian Dior, 1955; purchased by Kayser-Roth, early 1960s; sold to the Wickes Company; launched Anne Cole Collection, 1982; signed licensing agreement with Adrienne Vittadini, 1983–93; company purchased by Taren Holdings, 1989; Juice junior line debuted, 1990; acquired by Authentic Fitness Corp., combined with Catalina to form Catalina Cole, 1993; Anne Cole introduced the "tankini," 1997; ultimate parent, Warnaco, filed for bankruptcy protection, 2001. Awards: Los Angeles Chamber of Commerce Golden 44 award, 1979. Company Address: Authentic Fitness, 6040 Bandini Boulevard, Los Angeles, CA 90040, U.S.A.

PUBLICATIONS

On COLE of CALIFORNIA:

Books

Lencek, Lena, and Gideon Bosker, Making Waves: Swimsuits and the Undressing of America, San Francisco, 1989.

Martin, Richard, and Harold Koda, Splash! A History of Swimwear, New York, 1990.

Articles

Sajbel, Maureen O., "Sea Notes: Anne Cole Takes the Plunge," in WWD, 28 July 1982.

Magiera, Marcy, "Swimwear Makers Aim for 'Older' Women," in Advertising Age, 21 April 1986.

Flint, Jerry, "Cover-Up: Cole of California," in Forbes, 2 May 1988.

Drizen, Ruth, "High Spirits at Cole," in Apparel Industry Magazine, (Atlanta, Georgia), August 1990.

D'Innocenzo, Anne, "Swimwear Dives, Hopes to Surface," in WWD, 10 August 1995.

Belgium, Deborah, "Swimming in a New Wave: Anne Cole," in Los Angeles Business Journal, 12 June 2000.

Robinson, Roxanne, and Rosemary Feitelberg, "Class of 75," in WWD, 10 August 2000.

* * *

The high-water mark of swimwear exposure was 1964: Rudi Gernreich showed a topless bathing suit that achieved awestruck attention, but sold very few copies. Then Sports Illustrated, the New York magazine, began its annual swimsuit edition. Cole of California, in the same year, produced the three-item "scandal suit" collection

Among the rash of London-based talent heralding the designer boom, which included the likes of 31 Fevrier, Julien Anryon, Corinne Cobson, Claire Deve, Irie, Pascale Risbourg, and Zucca, Coleman produced consistently strong silhouettes for women. His earlier work had been based mainly on careful tailoring, dresses fitted to the body and then flared into little, full skirts, concentrating on charcoal and navy blue pinstripes for daywear and branching into warmer shades for sharply balanced modern evening designs.

In 1986 Coleman showed his Legion of the Lost collection at the First British Designer Menswear Trade Exhibition, a military and safari styled collection. A prime piece in this collection was described by Richard Buckley in the Daily News Record (4 September 1986) as "a long, body-conscious jacket featur[ing] a belted waist, military-style pockets, pockets at the chest for bullet storage and a double layered back with Y-cutout construction." In 1988, he showed a popular claret palazzo trouser all-in-one, which hugged the torso in gauzy georgette, with tucked silk forming a bustier section linked to the trousers by a strip of buttons that reached from the collar.

In the late 1980s Coleman clothes encapsulated the confidence and streamlined modernity that dominated fashion. His menswear was equally well adapted to the smart, tailored look that was aspired to, with, in 1986, black double-breasted trench coats and classic turn-up trousers. By the dawning of the 1990s, however, Coleman was immersed in the burgeoning rave scene with its more relaxed attitude to clothing. After taking a break from fashion to run his own nightclubs, his designs began to reflect the tribalism and body-conscious sports influence of the scene. The freer feel of young London clubbers led to the development of a more recognizable signature to his work.

The variations on the classic biker jackets he had designed in 1989, with fringing for sleeves and chain-trimmed bra tops, were obviously influenced by the music scene. Later versions were even teamed with punk-inspired tartans. These, however, were quickly surpassed by sexy, sporty, shaped separates that gave ease of movement and a recognizable image for the dance floor. Coleman's strong advertising campaigns followed this mood, with models daubed with body paint to represent the shield emblem adorning much of his diffusion range.

Coleman dressed ardent clubbers in the heavily padded puffa jackets that were obligatory at raves during the first two years of the decade, worn with his bodies, stretch skirts, and trousers with striped trim that referred to school sportswear in its detailing. Although it is this club wear that is most instantly recognizable, he continues to produce well-cut suiting (including, in the 1990s, velvet-collared slim-fitting Teddy Boy styles) for his main line, mixing classic shapes with more experimental elements. His involvement in the 5th Circle menswear collective underlines this dedication to innovative designs and the attention to detail echoed in his consistently strong leather and denim lines.

By 1989 Coleman had joined designers like Dolce & Gabbana, Bent Boys, Luciano Soprani, and Todd Oldham in being distributed by Onward Kashiyama. In 1997 he and his wife, Lucy, cofounded Body Control Pilates, a company manufacturing understated athletic-inspired apparel, featuring activewear as well as bags, blankets, slippers, robes, cosmetic bags, and pillows. The company brought in approximately $350,000 in its first few years.

Coleman's work has continued to fall under the influence of the London club scene, but his ability to produce interesting tailored designs widens his appeal and prevents his clothes from being too narrowly pigeon-holed. His popularity in London is based on his skill in producing clothing imbued with zeitgeist as well as more classic garments that prolong the longevity of his appeal.

—Rebecca Arnold; updated by Daryl F. Mallett

COLE OF CALIFORNIA

American swimwear company

Founded: Formed by Fred Cole from family knitwear firm in Los Angeles, 1923. Company History: Began collaborating with Hollywood costume designer Margit Fellegi, 1936; signed Esther Williams to represent the company, 1950; began producing swimwear from Christian Dior, 1955; purchased by Kayser-Roth, early 1960s; sold to the Wickes Company; launched Anne Cole Collection, 1982; signed licensing agreement with Adrienne Vittadini, 1983–93; company purchased by Taren Holdings, 1989; Juice junior line debuted, 1990; acquired by Authentic Fitness Corp., combined with Catalina to form Catalina Cole, 1993; Anne Cole introduced the "tankini," 1997; ultimate parent, Warnaco, filed for bankruptcy protection, 2001. Awards: Los Angeles Chamber of Commerce Golden 44 award, 1979. Company Address: Authentic Fitness, 6040 Bandini Boulevard, Los Angeles, CA 90040, U.S.A.

PUBLICATIONS

On COLE of CALIFORNIA:

Books

Lencek, Lena, and Gideon Bosker, Making Waves: Swimsuits and the Undressing of America, San Francisco, 1989.

Martin, Richard, and Harold Koda, Splash! A History of Swimwear, New York, 1990.

Articles

Sajbel, Maureen O., "Sea Notes: Anne Cole Takes the Plunge," in WWD, 28 July 1982.

Magiera, Marcy, "Swimwear Makers Aim for 'Older' Women," in Advertising Age, 21 April 1986.

Flint, Jerry, "Cover-Up: Cole of California," in Forbes, 2 May 1988.

Drizen, Ruth, "High Spirits at Cole," in Apparel Industry Magazine, (Atlanta, Georgia), August 1990.

D'Innocenzo, Anne, "Swimwear Dives, Hopes to Surface," in WWD, 10 August 1995.

Belgium, Deborah, "Swimming in a New Wave: Anne Cole," in Los Angeles Business Journal, 12 June 2000.

Robinson, Roxanne, and Rosemary Feitelberg, "Class of 75," in WWD, 10 August 2000.

* * *

The high-water mark of swimwear exposure was 1964: Rudi Gernreich showed a topless bathing suit that achieved awestruck attention, but sold very few copies. Then Sports Illustrated, the New York magazine, began its annual swimsuit edition. Cole of California, in the same year, produced the three-item "scandal suit" collection that likewise plunged to new exposure with an astonishing commercial success, typifying the long tradition of Cole's being the most provocative—yet commercial—swimwear manufacturer in America.

Design by Cole of California, 1950. © Genevieve Naylor/CORBIS.

Ever since former silent film star Fred Cole had first hitched his company's wagon to the stars of Hollywood, Cole had been a trendsetter, P.T. Barnum style. Cole knew by unerring instinct, like his film producing confrères, how to be sensational and to sell to the American public without being overly salacious. As Lena Lencek and Gideon Bosker described in their book, Making Waves: Swimsuits and the Undressing of America, “Cut extremely conservatively by mid-1960s standards, the Scandal suits put everything under wraps, at least theoretically. In practice, however, the vast expanses of see-through netting turned their wearers into sizzling sex goddesses.”

If black mesh only made a plunging décolletage or midriff seem more radical and seductive in the tantalizing peekaboo of exposure or coverage, Cole encouraged the sensation in dramatic public events and publicity. Hence this American company was in the vanguard of what was already being described as a 1960s sexual revolution and seemed ready to bring all of its license to the beach. Fred Cole knew that going to the beach or pool was recreation, but that it was also a spectator sport.

Cole of California, 1950: nylon satin swimsuit. © Genevieve Naylor/CORBIS.

Cole had three brilliant ideas, put into action step by step: first, he transformed the family's prosaic knit underwear firm into a swimsuit business; second, he seized upon California and Hollywood to bring glamor to the swimwear industry and specifically to the imagery of Cole of California; and third, he knew sex appeal would be determined in the middle and late years of the 20th century by public relations and popular opinion. The health and dress-reform issues of knitwear paled beside the excitement Cole brought to the swimwear industry. His conjunction to Hollywood, working with the ingenious designer Margit Fellegi, who was to the Hollywood swimsuit what Edith Head was to every other Hollywood film garment. It was a cunningly American ideal—sexy without being smarmy, a pin-up excused by the sun-drenched healthy lifestyle of California and linked to another persuasive product, the movies.

In the trio of great American swimwear manufacturers, Cole went to Hollywood while Jantzen emphasized family fun and healthy sport, and Catalina became associated with beauty pageants. More than any other American company, Cole connected fashion and swimwear. Fred Cole reshaped the wool knit swimsuit to define the bust and waist and introduced a sunny California palette of colors. With the popularity of tans in the 1930s, Cole progressively sheared away the bulk of the traditional swimsuit to provide more and more exposure.

Fellegi, the Hollywood costumer, began working with Cole in 1936 and, immediately utilizing rubberized and stretch possibilities of new fibers that could surpass the old wool knits, brought a body-clinging science to the sex appeal that Cole desired. When rubber was restricted in World War II, Cole created the "swoon suit," a two-piece suit that laced up the sides of the trunk and tied for the bra, still an enduring pin-up. After the war, Cole and Fellegi pursued fashion and Hollywood glamor with New Look-inspired dressmaker swimsuits and profligate details of sequins, gold-lamé jersey, and water-resistant velvets.

In 1950 Cole signed film/swimming star Esther Williams to a merchandising-design contract that created and promoted the most popular and glamorous swimwear of its time. In 1955, with the phenomenal success of Esther Williams secured in her film aquacades and romances, Cole entered into agreement to produce swimwear for Christian Dior, thus bringing the most famous fashion name of the moment to swimwear design. Throughout the 1960s and 1970s Cole produced a variety of lines addressed to the increasingly segmented (principally by age and body type) swimwear market. In the early 1980s, Anne Cole, daughter of founder Fred, began designing her own line of swimsuits.

The Anne Cole Collection sustained the designer swimwear ideal; the swimsuits were beautiful, feminine, and quietly sensual. Anne Cole's sensibility was traditional elegance, and her swimsuits often recalled the 1930s beach scene as well the most elegant sportswear of Patou. Yet while Cole of California's swimwear lines thrived, the company itself endured a succession of corporate parents. Kayser-Roth was bought by Gulf & Western, then sold to the Wickes group of companies, which in turn sold the firm to Taren Holdings, Inc. In 1993, Cole of California, the Anne Cole Collection, and fellow swimwear producer Catalina were all rescued from bankruptcy and acquired by Authentic Fitness Corporation, a subsidiary of Warnaco.

The swimwear division of Authentic Fitness proved a snug fit for Cole of California, which was paired with Catalina to create the Catalina Cole unit. In addition to Catalina Cole and Anne Cole, Speedo and Oscar de la Renta made up the Authentic Fitness swimwear division. While many swimwear producers had poor results in 1995, Catalina Cole and Anne Cole both experienced record growth and profits. Two years later, Anne Cole introduced the "tankini," an instant hit and the must-have swimsuit of the season and beyond.

In the 21st century, almost 70 years after its formation, the Cole name has come to represent both Catalina Cole and Anne Cole. While each prospered under the ownership of Authentic Fitness, their future was once again in peril when ultimate parent Warnaco Group filed for bankruptcy protection in 2001. The quest, however, of Cole swimwear will not change—these suits were never merely for the water, but to not only be on the crest of the wave but to define and enhance bathing beauty.

—Richard Martin; updated by Nelly Rhodes

COLONNA di CESARO, Simonetta

See SIMONETTA

COMME DES GARÇONS

See KAWAKUBO, Rei

CONNOLLY, Sybil

Irish designer

Born: Sybil Veronica Connolly in Swansea, Ireland, 21 January 1921. Education: Sisters of Mercy Convent. Career: Apprentice dress designer, Bradley's, London, 1938–40; apprentice to Jack Clarke at Richard Alan, 1940–43; director, Richard Alan, 1943–57; Designer, Sybil Connolly, Inc., 1957–98; consultant and designer for Tiffany's, New York, 1984–98; author and editor, 1986–98. Awards: Britain's Woman of the Year, 1958. Died: 6 May 1998, in Dublin, Ireland.

PUBLICATIONS

By CONNOLLY:

Books

Editor, In An Irish Garden with Helen Dillon, New York, 1986.
 Editor, In An Irish House, New York, 1988.
Irish Hands: The Tradition of Beautiful Crafts, New York, 1994.

Lady Melissa and Lady Caroline Wyndham-Quinn modeling Sybil Connolly-designed evening gowns, 1954. © Norman Parkinson Limited/Fiona Cowan/CORBIS.

On CONNOLLY:

Books

Stegemeyer, Anne, Who's Who in Fashion, Second Edition, New York, 1980.
 ———, Who's Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.

Articles

Brenner, Douglas, "Eire Apparent," in House & Garden, September 1989.
 Collins, Amy Fine, "Tribute to the Fashion Style of Jacqueline Kennedy Onassis," in Harper's Bazaar, 1 August 1994.
 Greiner, Virginia, "Improving Old Skills and Finding New Ones," in the Washington Times, 19 March 1995.
 Bryant, Kathy, "A Pattern of Success," in the Los Angeles Times, 15 June 1996.
 "Sybil Connolly," in the Daily Telegraph, 9 May 1998.
 "Sybil Connolly," in the Economist, 16 May 1998.
 Smith, Liz, "Bring Back Madeline," in Newsday, 19 May 1998.
 "Obituary: Sybil Connolly," in the Independent, 26 May 1998.

*

There comes a moment in everyone's life as a designer when you have to decide whether you want to create the beautiful or the merely fashionable. Sadly, there can be a conflict between the two.

—Sybil Connolly

* * *

In the course of her career, Sybil Connolly gave Irish fashion a name and designed gowns for American lights such as Merle Oberon, Elizabeth Taylor, Fred Astaire, and Jacqueline Kennedy while she was First Lady, as well as for many of Britain's peers. Connolly began her fashion apprenticeship while in her teens, going to work for a London dressmaker to study dress design. Her most notable experience during her two-year tenure there was holding pins for Queen Mary's fittings at Buckingham Palace and noting the immense care being taken to design dresses that softened and complemented the dowager Queen's advanced age. Her apprenticeship at Bradley's was cut short by the outbreak of war, and she returned to Ireland. In 1940, she continued her apprenticeship at Richard Alan, which was at the time Dublin's premiere fashion house. At the age of 22, Connolly became director at Richard Alan and proceeded to build the store's couture department. In 1950 she designed a small collection that sold quite well, and her career as a designer began.

One of Connolly's early patrons was Lady Dunsany, and her first major show took place at Dunsany Castle in 1953. There, her designs came to the notice of members of the American fashion press, and the same year she took a collection to the United States. Her singular designs and handsome Irish fabrics were well received. Over the next few years, she was profiled in Time magazine, and her designs appeared in Vogue and Harper's Bazaar and on the cover of Life. She left Richard Alan and set up Sybil Connolly, Inc. in 1957 at her Merrion Square house in Dublin, and her clothes were soon carried at specialty boutiques across the United States.

Connolly's design philosophy was in keeping with that of Hubert de Givenchy, whose work was a source of inspiration for her.

Elegance without sacrificing comfort, the finest craftsmanship, and attention to detail were the hallmarks of her work. She felt that a dress should show a woman's curves, saying, "I must see movement in a dress. A woman's body is inside. It breathes. It moves." Her other major sources of inspiration were nature and the traditional fabrics and everyday clothing of the Irish. Working in Donegal tweeds, Eliot's poplin, Carrickmacross lace, bainin (a thin, handwoven wool) and Irish linen, she created collections based on the simple slim lines of riding habits, and utilized the hooded cloaks, scarlet flannel petticoats, crocheted blouses, and black Connemara shawls of Irish traditional dress. She also designed evening dresses with ruffled tops, a coming-out gown made entirely of men's linen handkerchiefs, and handkerchief linen nightgowns embroidered with flowers and hand-sewn with tiny tucks, which were a favorite of Jacqueline Kennedy's.

Throughout her career, Connolly sought out and utilized the traditional crafts and artistry of her native land: Donegal embroidery, handwoven lace, and iridescent Donegal tweeds. She commissioned the nuns of Clones Convent to make lace for her and found inspiration in the simple lines of a Carmelite nun's habit. Connolly brought echoes of Irish daily life into vogue among the best dressed of the rich and famous. Indeed, Connolly was herself often included on American best-dressed lists.

The invention of a unique linen fabric is considered one of Connolly's greatest achievements. Using nine yards of handkerchief linen backed by taffeta to make one yard of hand-pleated dress material, she created an uncreasable, uncrushable linen, which she then custom-dyed in rich colors and fitted into lovely ball gowns. The gowns were so resistant to the ravishments of time that they were an investment lasting generations, handed down from mother to daughter to granddaughter. Jacqueline Kennedy wore a skirt of Connolly's pleated linen when she was painted by Aaron Shickler for a portrait that hangs in the White House.

Throughout the 1950s and early 1960s, Connolly enjoyed popularity on both sides of the Atlantic. In the 1970s she continued to bring small collections to New York. She would show them at the Fifth Avenue apartment of a friend, gather orders for custom designs, and take them back to be made up in her Dublin workshops. But the trends of fashion in those years were not to her taste, and she had no interest in following them. She was known to comment that she couldn't understand why the young people of the time were so set on making themselves look "awful." The skirts were too short, the lines were not right, and trousers were "only for riding."

Like her great inspiration Givenchy, Connolly's sense of style found expression in a full range of mediums beyond couture. She was a designer of lifestyle, not just clothing. She wrote books on garden design and interior decor—specifically Irish gardens and Irish homes—and restored a 1789 cottage in Cahair, County Tipperary. Connolly also designed crystal, china, and pottery for Tiffany & Company (New York), as well as wall coverings, clocks, and fabrics.

—Jessica Reisman

CONRAN, Jasper

British designer

Born: London, 12 December 1959. Education: Attended Bryanston School, Dorset; studied at Parsons School of Design, New York,

Jasper Conran, fall 2001 collection: sequined evening dress. © AP/Wide World Photos.

Elegance without sacrificing comfort, the finest craftsmanship, and attention to detail were the hallmarks of her work. She felt that a dress should show a woman's curves, saying, "I must see movement in a dress. A woman's body is inside. It breathes. It moves." Her other major sources of inspiration were nature and the traditional fabrics and everyday clothing of the Irish. Working in Donegal tweeds, Eliot's poplin, Carrickmacross lace, bainin (a thin, handwoven wool) and Irish linen, she created collections based on the simple slim lines of riding habits, and utilized the hooded cloaks, scarlet flannel petticoats, crocheted blouses, and black Connemara shawls of Irish traditional dress. She also designed evening dresses with ruffled tops, a coming-out gown made entirely of men's linen handkerchiefs, and handkerchief linen nightgowns embroidered with flowers and hand-sewn with tiny tucks, which were a favorite of Jacqueline Kennedy's.

Throughout her career, Connolly sought out and utilized the traditional crafts and artistry of her native land: Donegal embroidery, handwoven lace, and iridescent Donegal tweeds. She commissioned the nuns of Clones Convent to make lace for her and found inspiration in the simple lines of a Carmelite nun's habit. Connolly brought echoes of Irish daily life into vogue among the best dressed of the rich and famous. Indeed, Connolly was herself often included on American best-dressed lists.

The invention of a unique linen fabric is considered one of Connolly's greatest achievements. Using nine yards of handkerchief linen backed by taffeta to make one yard of hand-pleated dress material, she created an uncreasable, uncrushable linen, which she then custom-dyed in rich colors and fitted into lovely ball gowns. The gowns were so resistant to the ravishments of time that they were an investment lasting generations, handed down from mother to daughter to granddaughter. Jacqueline Kennedy wore a skirt of Connolly's pleated linen when she was painted by Aaron Shickler for a portrait that hangs in the White House.

Throughout the 1950s and early 1960s, Connolly enjoyed popularity on both sides of the Atlantic. In the 1970s she continued to bring small collections to New York. She would show them at the Fifth Avenue apartment of a friend, gather orders for custom designs, and take them back to be made up in her Dublin workshops. But the trends of fashion in those years were not to her taste, and she had no interest in following them. She was known to comment that she couldn't understand why the young people of the time were so set on making themselves look "awful." The skirts were too short, the lines were not right, and trousers were "only for riding."

Like her great inspiration Givenchy, Connolly's sense of style found expression in a full range of mediums beyond couture. She was a designer of lifestyle, not just clothing. She wrote books on garden design and interior decor—specifically Irish gardens and Irish homes—and restored a 1789 cottage in Cahair, County Tipperary. Connolly also designed crystal, china, and pottery for Tiffany & Company (New York), as well as wall coverings, clocks, and fabrics.

—Jessica Reisman

CONRAN, Jasper

British designer

Born: London, 12 December 1959. Education: Attended Bryanston School, Dorset; studied at Parsons School of Design, New York,

Jasper Conran, fall 2001 collection: sequined evening dress. © AP/Wide World Photos.

1975–77. Family: Married Jeanne Spaziani. Career: Worked for Fiorucci, New York, 1977, then for ICI and Courtaulds, London; design consultant, Wallis Fashion Group, 1977; showed first womenswear collection, 1978; opened boutique, Beauchamp Place, London, 1986; showed menswear from 1988; has also designed for the theatre. Awards: Fil D'Or International Linen award, 1982, 1983; British Fashion Council Designer of the Year award, 1986; Fashion Group of America award, New York, 1987; Laurence Olivier award for Costume Designer of the Year, 1991. Address: 2 Berners Street, London W1P 4BA, England.

PUBLICATIONS

On CONRAN:

Books

- Coleridge, Nicholas, The Fashion Conspiracy, London, 1988.
 Stegemeyer, Anne, Who's Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.

Jasper Conran, fall 2001 collection. © AP/Wide World Photos.

Articles

- "Lookout: A Guide to the Up and Coming," in People, 8 March 1982.
 Search, Gay, "The Conran Clan: Jasper," in Women's Journal (London), April 1984.
 Kendall, Ena, "Jasper Conran: A Room of My Own," in The Observer (London), 22 September 1985.
 McDowell, Colin, "Jasper Conran," in The Guardian (London), 31 October 1985.
 Powell, Fiona Russell, "Jasper Conran," in Fashion '86 (London), 1985.
 Soames, Emma, "British Style: The Impact of the Designer Star," in Vogue (London), February 1987.
 Barron, Pattie, "24 Carat Jasper: Fashion's Brilliant Brat," in Cosmopolitan (London), April 1987.
 Young, Russell, "Jasper," in Blitz (London), April 1987.
 Nickson, Liz, "The Conrans: A Genuine Dynasty," in Time, 20 July 1987.
 Allott, Serena, "Jasper Conran in Search of Something Perfectly Simple," in the Sunday Telegraph Magazine (London), 20 September 1987.
 Menkes, Suzy, "Jasper and John," in The Independent (London), 9 October 1987.
 Sinclair, Paul, and Lesley Jane Nonkin, "Designer, Client: The Modern Equation," in Vogue (New York), November 1987.
 Nadelson, Regina, "Scion of the Times," in Metropolitan Home (New York), August 1988.
 "Bon Magique," in Elle (London), November 1988.
 "Jasper Conran Joins Bidermann Stable," in DNR, 10 August 1990.
 "Jasper Conran," in Fashion Weekly (London), 16 August 1990.
 Jeal, Nicola, "Conran's Comeback," in The Observer Magazine (London), 18 November 1990.
 "Conran: the Gamut," from London Fashion Week, at the Vogue website (www.vogue.co.uk), 2001.

* * *

Dubbed the "Calvin Klein of London," Jasper Conran creates menswear and womenswear collections that epitomize urbane, classic lines. As the British Fashion Council's Fashion Designer of the Year in 1986, Conran has balanced British imagination with international chic. His designs are inspired by early garments of Coco Chanel and the American look of Claire McCordell's monastic and "popover" dresses but the outcome reflecting modern sophistication, not retro style. He is known for updated, yet elegant, versions of traditional British tweed suits.

Conran attended Parsons School of Design in New York, and his first collection was produced for Henri Bendel in the United States. He returned to the UK and worked briefly for the British company, Wallis, as design consultant, producing its Special Label. He introduced his first independent womenswear collection in 1978 showing black cashmere trousers, and coats and jackets lined with cream satin. This established his hallmark use of expensive fabrics such as silk, cashmere, taffeta, and lines with classic cuts. Vogue writer Emma Soames observed that British fashion editors discovered Conran early, as the refined simplicity of his work contrasted sharply with other British designers of the time (for example Vivienne Westwood, Katherine Hamnett, and Rifat Ozbek). Main pieces from his collections changed very little from season to season, allowing many of his garments to be regarded as long-term wardrobe investments. For two years running, 1982 and 1983, Conran won the Fil D'Or International Linen award.

Color has been an important factor in the overall look of Conran's collections: i.e., the brightly colored cashmere jackets in cerise, orange, chrome yellow, and mint green, produced for the 1992 collection, and earlier eveningwear in fuchsia, cobalt, and kelly green organza highlighting the clean lines of each garment. Silk separates have since been designed in ice blue, cocoa, bright red, and sorbet tints. As his designs moved into the new millennium, Conran, who continues to be considered one of the most successful designers in the UK, toned down his color palette. His early 2001 womenswear collection featured baby blues, dusky pinks, white, beige, and black. Skinny tie-belts, diamond prints, and tube tops were reinvented, trousers were low-waisted, and A-line leather skirts and satin frocks were suggested for evening wear. His menswear collection was an updated version of the classic English gentleman look featuring double-breasted jackets, sleeveless pleated shirts, and pinstripes.

While in many collections Conran has produced undemanding and straightforward designs, he occasionally incorporated elements characteristic of what might be expected of British fashion fantasy—fur-trimmed suits and wedding dresses, trumpet-hem jersey skirts, bold plaid toppers over leather jacketed pantsuits, and brightly coloured chevron-patterned sweaters with white flannel pleated skirts. The 1950s nostalgia of Grace Kelly and Breakfast at Tiffany's inspired Conran to design enormous bell-shaped coats, boxy cropped jackets, and little flirtatious minis with stiff, standaway backs in white cotton poplin for his 1986 collection. The English seaside set the background for a 1920s classic approach with oversized three-quarter-length wool tailored jackets and palazzo pants in the early 1990s.

In 1988 Conran began his menswear line, maintaining the same classic designs as his women's collections. A black-and-white ticking stripe cotton jacket with matching high-buttoned waistcoat and tapered trousers depicted a quintessentially English style, while the importance of color was maintained in Conran's intense red suede blazer and waistcoat. Also in the late 1980s, Conran designed a less expensive, Jasper "J" Conran collection for the Debenhams department store and produced a collection of bridal wear for Caroline Castigliano.

Extending himself beyond the typical fashion scene, Conran organized the "Fashion Aid" charity evening for African famine relief in 1985 and ventured into costume design for Jean Anouith's ballet, The Rehearsal and subsequently to the theatre for a London revival of My Fair Lady, and David Brintley's Edward II, performed by the Birmingham Royal Ballet in 1997. His theatrical flair for color and defined style readily translated to the stage. In 1991 Conran received the Laurence Olivier award for Costume Designer of the Year. Conran also became very outspoken about governmental attempts to regulate the fashion industry; he went public with his personal battle with anorexia in an attempt to shed some light on the nature of this condition. He believes it is an oversimplification to assume that eating disorders are caused by subliminal messages from the fashion industry.

In 1990 Conran signed a ten-year licensing agreement with the Marchpole Group Plc, the UK subsidiary of Bidermanns S.A., to produce and market his men's clothing lines. Michael Reiney, managing director of Marchpole, described Conran (Bidermann's first British designer) as a "very talented guy who has not had the opportunity to expand himself to his fullest extent. We believe he has great potential." This arrangement would allow for Conran's menswear designs to penetrate the market in Continental Europe and the U.S., and to expand his men's collection to include coats and accessories. Conran would also be able to produce a more affordable line of menswear as well.

Conran's contribution to the British fashion scene is well recognized. He has a strong commercial sense positioning him solidly within the international arena, with clients who included Diana, the late Princess of Wales. The timeless quality of his classic designs has ensured him a place alongside Calvin Klein, Karl Lagerfeld, and Perry Ellis.

—Teal Triggs; updated by Christine Miner Minderovic

CORD, Barry Kieselstein

See KIESELSTEIN-CORD, Barry

CORNELIANI SPA

Italian menswear firm

Founded: in Mantova, Italy, 1930s. Company History: Modernized, 1958, by Caralberto (born 1931) and Claudio Corneliani (born 1921), Sergio Corneliani (born 1959) became chief designer; lines include Via Ardigo, Styled by Corneliani, Corneliani, Corneliani Trend, and Corneliani Sportswear; trademarks include Nino Danieli, Browngreen, and Full Time; producers and manufacturers, beginning in 1984, for Daniel Hechter, Erreuno, Karl Lagerfeld, Krizia Uomo, Trussardi, and Renoma; costume designers for various films, including Little Women; Caralberto Corneliani, president of Italy's fashion committee Comitato Moda, 1976 and president of Federtessile, Italian textile association, 1991; opened Milan flagship store, 1997; acquired Polo Ralph Lauren license for North America, 1998; expanded Polo distribution into Europe, 2000; signed license with Chinese company for manufacture and distribution of Corneliani-branded products in Asia, 2000; launched casual Trend line into U.S. market, 2001. Awards: Pitti Immagine prize, 1989; Caralberto Corneliani named Cavaliere del Lavoro, 1991. Company Address: Via M. Panizza 5, 46100 Mantova, Italy.

PUBLICATIONS

On CORNELIANI:

Books

Alfonsi, M., Figli d'Arte? No Grazie, Trento, 1989.

Articles

Lobrano, Alexander, "Still Growing Corneliani," in DNR: The Magazine (New York), 4 January 1988.

"Dietro la Griffe," in Vogue (Milan), February 1991.

"I Corneliani Dell'Abito Agli States," in L'Arena (Verona), 24 February 1991.

"Vestiremo All'Americana," in Il Mondo (Milan), 29 April 1991.

"Corneliani," in La Repubblica (Rome), 12 June 1991.

"Corneliani—Hartmarx il Patto Atlantico," in Harper's Bazaar (Milan), 8 July 1991.

years running, 1982 and 1983, Conran won the Fil D'Or International Linen award.

Color has been an important factor in the overall look of Conran's collections: i.e., the brightly colored cashmere jackets in cerise, orange, chrome yellow, and mint green, produced for the 1992 collection, and earlier eveningwear in fuchsia, cobalt, and kelly green organza highlighting the clean lines of each garment. Silk separates have since been designed in ice blue, cocoa, bright red, and sorbet tints. As his designs moved into the new millennium, Conran, who continues to be considered one of the most successful designers in the UK, toned down his color palette. His early 2001 womenswear collection featured baby blues, dusky pinks, white, beige, and black. Skinny tie-belts, diamond prints, and tube tops were reinvented, trousers were low-waisted, and A-line leather skirts and satin frocks were suggested for evening wear. His menswear collection was an updated version of the classic English gentleman look featuring double-breasted jackets, sleeveless pleated shirts, and pinstripes.

While in many collections Conran has produced undemanding and straightforward designs, he occasionally incorporated elements characteristic of what might be expected of British fashion fantasy—fur-trimmed suits and wedding dresses, trumpet-hem jersey skirts, bold plaid toppers over leather jacketed pantsuits, and brightly coloured chevron-patterned sweaters with white flannel pleated skirts. The 1950s nostalgia of Grace Kelly and Breakfast at Tiffany's inspired Conran to design enormous bell-shaped coats, boxy cropped jackets, and little flirtatious minis with stiff, standaway backs in white cotton poplin for his 1986 collection. The English seaside set the background for a 1920s classic approach with oversized three-quarter-length wool tailored jackets and palazzo pants in the early 1990s.

In 1988 Conran began his menswear line, maintaining the same classic designs as his women's collections. A black-and-white ticking stripe cotton jacket with matching high-buttoned waistcoat and tapered trousers depicted a quintessentially English style, while the importance of color was maintained in Conran's intense red suede blazer and waistcoat. Also in the late 1980s, Conran designed a less expensive, Jasper "J" Conran collection for the Debenhams department store and produced a collection of bridal wear for Caroline Castigliano.

Extending himself beyond the typical fashion scene, Conran organized the "Fashion Aid" charity evening for African famine relief in 1985 and ventured into costume design for Jean Anouith's ballet, The Rehearsal and subsequently to the theatre for a London revival of My Fair Lady, and David Brintley's Edward II, performed by the Birmingham Royal Ballet in 1997. His theatrical flair for color and defined style readily translated to the stage. In 1991 Conran received the Laurence Olivier award for Costume Designer of the Year. Conran also became very outspoken about governmental attempts to regulate the fashion industry; he went public with his personal battle with anorexia in an attempt to shed some light on the nature of this condition. He believes it is an oversimplification to assume that eating disorders are caused by subliminal messages from the fashion industry.

In 1990 Conran signed a ten-year licensing agreement with the Marchpole Group Plc, the UK subsidiary of Bidermanns S.A., to produce and market his men's clothing lines. Michael Reiney, managing director of Marchpole, described Conran (Bidermann's first British designer) as a "very talented guy who has not had the opportunity to expand himself to his fullest extent. We believe he has great potential." This arrangement would allow for Conran's menswear designs to penetrate the market in Continental Europe and the U.S., and to expand his men's collection to include coats and accessories. Conran would also be able to produce a more affordable line of menswear as well.

Conran's contribution to the British fashion scene is well recognized. He has a strong commercial sense positioning him solidly within the international arena, with clients who included Diana, the late Princess of Wales. The timeless quality of his classic designs has ensured him a place alongside Calvin Klein, Karl Lagerfeld, and Perry Ellis.

—Teal Triggs; updated by Christine Miner Minderovic

CORD, Barry Kieselstein

See KIESELSTEIN-CORD, Barry

CORNELIANI SPA

Italian menswear firm

Founded: in Mantova, Italy, 1930s. Company History: Modernized, 1958, by Caralberto (born 1931) and Claudio Corneliani (born 1921), Sergio Corneliani (born 1959) became chief designer; lines include Via Ardigo, Styled by Corneliani, Corneliani, Corneliani Trend, and Corneliani Sportswear; trademarks include Nino Danieli, Browngreen, and Full Time; producers and manufacturers, beginning in 1984, for Daniel Hechter, Erreuno, Karl Lagerfeld, Krizia Uomo, Trussardi, and Renoma; costume designers for various films, including Little Women; Caralberto Corneliani, president of Italy's fashion committee Comitato Moda, 1976 and president of Federtessile, Italian textile association, 1991; opened Milan flagship store, 1997; acquired Polo Ralph Lauren license for North America, 1998; expanded Polo distribution into Europe, 2000; signed license with Chinese company for manufacture and distribution of Corneliani-branded products in Asia, 2000; launched casual Trend line into U.S. market, 2001. Awards: Pitti Immagine prize, 1989; Caralberto Corneliani named Cavaliere del Lavoro, 1991. Company Address: Via M. Panizza 5, 46100 Mantova, Italy.

PUBLICATIONS

On CORNELIANI:

Books

Alfonsi, M., Figli d'Arte? No Grazie, Trento, 1989.

Articles

Lobrano, Alexander, "Still Growing Corneliani," in DNR: The Magazine (New York), 4 January 1988.

"Dietro la Griffe," in Vogue (Milan), February 1991.

"I Corneliani Dell'Abito Agli States," in L'Arena (Verona), 24 February 1991.

"Vestiremo All'Americana," in Il Mondo (Milan), 29 April 1991.

"Corneliani," in La Repubblica (Rome), 12 June 1991.

"Corneliani—Hartmarx il Patto Atlantico," in Harper's Bazaar (Milan), 8 July 1991.

- Gabbianio, M., "La Quinta di Corneliani," in La Repubblica, 6 March 1992.
- "I Segreti di Corneliani," in L'Arena (Verona), 13 March 1992.
- Perego, G., "Corneliani, 172 Miliardi di Vestiti," in Italia Oggi (Milan), 3 April 1992.
- Forden, Sarah Gay, "The Corneliani of Mantova: A Family, a Company, a Label," in DNR, 4 January 1993.
- Bagnoli, D., "Fratelli Corneliani, Nuova Organizzazione in Germania," in Textil-Wirtschaft, 3 March 1994.
- Conti, Samantha, "Corneliani Opens First Boutique in Milan," in DNR, 21 April 1997.
- Gellers, Stan, "Viva Italia! Corneliani Gets Polo Blue Label Clothing License," in DNR, 4 May 1998.
- _____, "Corneliani Set to Launch Its Polo Ralph Lauren Clothing," in DNR, 25 November 1998.
- Boye, Brian, "Technical Fabrics are the Talk of Cologne...," in DNR, 2 August 1999.
- Gellers, Stan, and Samantha Conti, "Corneliani: A Family Affair," in DNR, 12 June 2000.
- Deeny, Godfrey, "Milan: Seriously Elegant Corneliani," available online at Fashion Wire Daily, www.fashionavenue.com, 26 June 2001.

*

Corneliani: a designer label, a company, a family. An important blend which embodies the secret of the Corneliani success. The Corneliani company is run by the Corneliani family: quite different from the traditional stylist, and probably far superior, on today's scene.

Now that stylists work on an industrial level and the consumer is no longer prepared to accept something just because it carries a designer label, the winning card appears to be the entrepreneur stylist, capable of guaranteeing taste and creativity but first and foremost the quality of the product. This trend seems custom made for the Corneliani, since this has always been our philosophy, the thinking that has made our company what it is today. Corporation styling, indicated by everyone as the true future of Italian fashion, has been practiced successfully for years at Corneliani by the Corneliani.

Corneliani style interprets the Italian culture of fine clothing. Corneliani quality is the technological version of the great Italian tailoring tradition.

—Corneliani

* * *

Corneliani is a high-quality menswear design company based in Mantova, Italy. Seeking out the perfect balance between fashion content and classic style, the family company, now in its third generation, had its start in the tailoring business in the 1930s. By the late 1950s, the group had established itself as producers of fine men's clothing, a tradition it upholds today.

Corneliani constitutes a company, a family, and a designer label, a blend that seals their success. The group does not promote itself as an individual designer-led label but as "corporate styling." Opposed to the idea that the consumer only purchases clothes because they carry a designer label, Corneliani believes a group-led label guarantees not only creativity, taste, and style but also quality in the cut and manufacture of the product.

Elegance defines the look; styles tend to denote the relaxed, classic taste of Hollywood stars like Cary Grant or George Sanders. The customer is style-conscious, not necessarily fashion-conscious, and his clothes need to be dependable, functional, and highly durable yet also have a feeling of comfort and quality. Corneliani is also aware its customer can have moments of extravagance: a man can suddenly be taken with a striking detail, like an unusual color mix or an interesting fabric.

Corneliani develops most of its own fabrics from the initial selection of fibers, design, and color to the final approval of ideas from among hundreds of samples. Natural fibers predominate: linens, cottons, pure woolen tweeds and herringbones, wool crêpes, and wool venetians. Colors are simply and classically combined. Super-fine, madras checked jackets in navy, beige, and cream are teamed with a sky blue checked shirt, navy trousers, and distinctive navy, beige, and cream striped tie. Beige on beige is a recurrent effect—a crêpe beige suit with matching waistcoat is teamed with a brown checked tie and checked shirt. It's a tweedy English elegance, combined with slick Italian styling.

The company produces four main seasonal collections, all of which adhere to the style principle of relaxed classicism. The flagship collection is named Corneliani. Elegant and restrained, it is defined by the company as the point at which fashion and style meet. Corneliani Trend is a more fashion-oriented collection, designed for a customer who wants to follow fashion but retain a sense of good taste and intelligence. The Corneliani Sportswear collection is refined sportswear combining both comfort and function. Via Ardigo, Styled by Corneliani is a more upbeat, fashion-conscious sportswear line, easy to wear but adhering to the company's trademark respect for quality and elegance.

Corneliani produces a wide range of men's apparel, from jackets and trousers to car coats and overcoats. They rarely work to a design theme or make fashion trend statements; instead they produce an array of seasonal coordinates, within their four main seasonal collections, from which the customer can choose to put together his own look according to his own personal taste. The company's one aim and philosophy is to meet the clothing needs of contemporary, professional men who lead high-gear lives demanding a wardrobe to allow them comfort and freedom.

During the late 1990s and early 2000s, Corneliani focused on increasing its presence in territories outside Europe, particularly in the United States. It also has strived to broaden its customer base by adding more casual apparel to its traditional sartorial offerings. Two developments led Corneliani to launch its younger, more affordable Trend line and to move into sportswear. First, the rise of casual Fridays in both Europe and North America meant increased demand for casual and sporty clothing, an area where Corneliani had historically not been active. Second, a growing number of younger men—a market not actively targeted in the past by the company, whose primary customer was 45 to 60 years old in the U.S. and 10 years younger in Europe—desired fashionable suits priced below the top end of the market. Although Corneliani had been able, in the mid- to late 1990s, to expand in the U.S. by taking advantage of the popularity of Italian-made suits there, it recognized the need to expand further by targeting a wider range of customers.

The Trend brand, which was a success in Europe before being launched in the U.S. in 2001, consists of suits, sport coats, dress and sports shirts, neckwear, casual slacks, active sportswear, and outerwear. Executives reported to the Daily News Record (12 June 2000) that the line's canvas construction and technologically enhanced performance fabrics were expected to translate well into the U.S. market, whereas the lighter, sportier designs were a good fit with casual trends around the world.

As of 2000, Daily News Record reported the company sold its wares to stores in 45 countries. Its business in the U.S. had grown to encompass more than 10 upscale retail customers, including Saks Fifth Avenue and Nordstrom. Corneliani's market share in Italy remained strong and its presence was on the rise in countries such as Belgium and the Netherlands. Corneliani was also making inroads into Asia, signing a license with a Chinese company in 2000 to market its branded clothing throughout the region.

In addition to allowing Corneliani to enhance its revenues, the launch of Trend, as well as sportswear and men's furnishings, enabled the company to market its products as a collection rather than simply as a line of tailored suits (which accounted for two-thirds of the company's worldwide business in 2000). With the collection, Corneliani has been able to focus on expanding its retail presence, opening a flagship in Milan in 1997 and planning additional outlets in Paris, London, and New York.

Although casual and sporty styles are driving much of the company's growth, Corneliani is not ignoring the tailored suits on which it built its reputation. It introduced a new suit model in the late 1990s, Spencer, which had a more modern silhouette than the company's other suits but retained Corneliani's traditional concern with performance and luxurious fabrics. In addition to expanding its own brand, Corneliani has been focused on its licensed Ralph Lauren label. Corneliani acquired the rights for the U.S. market in 1998, at a time when many U.S. designers were looking to Italy for their men's licensees, and expanded into Europe in 2000. Corneliani produces and distributes Polo Ralph Lauren's blue-label products.

Although the Polo and Corneliani lines have distinct sensibilities and styles, the acquisition of the Polo license helped the Corneliani brand boost its status in the U.S. quickly, after more than a dozen years in the market with a relatively low profile. The company took advantage of this awareness to launch a print advertising campaign in the U.S. featuring trendsetting celebrities from politics, business and entertainment, and has continued to solidify its recognition among American consumers and retailers.

—Kevin Almond; updated by Karen Raugust

CORREGGIARI, Giorgio

Italian designer

Born: Pieve di Cento, Bologna, Italy, 5 September 1943. Education: Studied political science, University of Bologna. Career: Apprenticed in textile companies in Lyon, France, 1967, and in England and Germany; freelance designer with own boutique, Pam Pam, in Riccione, Italy, 1968; opened second boutique with brother Lamberto in Milan, 1969; designer for Fancy, New Delhi, 1972–73; designed UFO jeans for Gruppo Zanella, Italy, from 1974; designer for Daniel Hechter, Paris, 1975; formed Giorgio Correggiari SrL, 1975; designed Cadette collection, 1977; launched Giorgio Correggiari womenswear line, 1977; also in 1970s designed menswear for Herno, leatherwear for IGI of Perugia, Reporter line of menswear in USA, Cleo and Pat knitwear, furs for Pellegrini (1970–73), Trifurs (1976), and Bencini (until 1985); consultant to International Wool Secretariat, adviser to Cantoni on printed velvets, 1979; adviser to International Cotton

Institute, Brussels, Lana Gatto wool mill, and Tessitura e Filature di Tollegno, Italy; designer for Divi, 1986; produced line of leather coats for Robrik and young jackets and raincoats for Coral; designer for SAHZA House of Fashion, Valencia, Italy. Exhibitions: Museum of Modern Art, New York, 1976. Address: Via San Lorenzo 21 20020 Lazzate, MI, Italy.

PUBLICATIONS

On CORREGGIARI:

Books

McDowell, Colin, McDowell's Directory of Twentieth Century Fashion, London, 1984.
Italian Fashion, Milan, 1986.

Articles

Buckley, Richard, "Byblos Gets Kudos for Playful Men's," in DNR, 13 July 1984.
Profile in Donna (Milan), April 1986.
"City of the Arts and Science's Hemispheric, Last Night," available online at Valencia World, www.cacsa.com, February 2001.

*

Giorgio Correggiari can be regarded as an intellectual critic of top fashion designers. His philosophy is to offer customers a high degree of fashion at highly competitive prices without sacrificing quality. His design is simple, unsophisticated, but unquestionably fashionable and very avant-garde. He uses few accessories and avoids printed materials. He is not strong on color and prefers to bring out the color of the person.

—Giorgio Correggiari

* * *

Giorgio Correggiari is a spontaneous designer who loves his work. There is a constant feeling of improvisation about his designs, and he thrives on the unexpected and the irregular. This open-minded approach keeps him on his toes, ready to face the uncertainties of the fashion business, and maintains his interest, essential for a man who has declared he would stop designing the moment it ceased to amuse him.

Born into a wealthy textile family (his father owned a textile mill near Bologna, Italy), Correggiari went on to study political science at the University of Bologna. He was 20 years old when a fire completely destroyed the textile mill, decimating the family fortunes. Correggiari then took off to travel through Germany, England, and France. An eight-month stint in a Lyon mill revived his interest in textiles, and on returning to Italy he ventured into business on his own. He opened a boutique in Riccione, christened Pam Pam, which he decorated in papier maché. He filled it with his own avant-garde designs, called Follies, which were made by a group of local outworkers. This first shop was successful, but shortly after opening a second in Milan, the designer declared himself disillusioned with his profession and left to travel around India.

The lure of fashion proved irresistible, however, and Correggiari was soon back designing in Italy. A contract with the leather firm Zanella, in 1974, was an instant success. He created a collection of 12 performance fabrics were expected to translate well into the U.S. market, whereas the lighter, sportier designs were a good fit with casual trends around the world.

As of 2000, Daily News Record reported the company sold its wares to stores in 45 countries. Its business in the U.S. had grown to encompass more than 10 upscale retail customers, including Saks Fifth Avenue and Nordstrom. Corneliani's market share in Italy remained strong and its presence was on the rise in countries such as Belgium and the Netherlands. Corneliani was also making inroads into Asia, signing a license with a Chinese company in 2000 to market its branded clothing throughout the region.

In addition to allowing Corneliani to enhance its revenues, the launch of Trend, as well as sportswear and men's furnishings, enabled the company to market its products as a collection rather than simply as a line of tailored suits (which accounted for two-thirds of the company's worldwide business in 2000). With the collection, Corneliani has been able to focus on expanding its retail presence, opening a flagship in Milan in 1997 and planning additional outlets in Paris, London, and New York.

Although casual and sporty styles are driving much of the company's growth, Corneliani is not ignoring the tailored suits on which it built its reputation. It introduced a new suit model in the late 1990s, Spencer, which had a more modern silhouette than the company's other suits but retained Corneliani's traditional concern with performance and luxurious fabrics. In addition to expanding its own brand, Corneliani has been focused on its licensed Ralph Lauren label. Corneliani acquired the rights for the U.S. market in 1998, at a time when many U.S. designers were looking to Italy for their men's licensees, and expanded into Europe in 2000. Corneliani produces and distributes Polo Ralph Lauren's blue-label products.

Although the Polo and Corneliani lines have distinct sensibilities and styles, the acquisition of the Polo license helped the Corneliani brand boost its status in the U.S. quickly, after more than a dozen years in the market with a relatively low profile. The company took advantage of this awareness to launch a print advertising campaign in the U.S. featuring trendsetting celebrities from politics, business and entertainment, and has continued to solidify its recognition among American consumers and retailers.

—Kevin Almond; updated by Karen Raugust

CORREGGIARI, Giorgio

Italian designer

Born: Pieve di Cento, Bologna, Italy, 5 September 1943. Education: Studied political science, University of Bologna. Career: Apprenticed in textile companies in Lyon, France, 1967, and in England and Germany; freelance designer with own boutique, Pam Pam, in Riccione, Italy, 1968; opened second boutique with brother Lamberto in Milan, 1969; designer for Fancy, New Delhi, 1972–73; designed UFO jeans for Gruppo Zanella, Italy, from 1974; designer for Daniel Hechter, Paris, 1975; formed Giorgio Correggiari SrL, 1975; designed Cadette collection, 1977; launched Giorgio Correggiari womenswear line, 1977; also in 1970s designed menswear for Herno, leatherwear for IGI of Perugia, Reporter line of menswear in USA, Cleo and Pat knitwear, furs for Pellegrini (1970–73), Trifurs (1976), and Bencini (until 1985); consultant to International Wool Secretariat, adviser to Cantoni on printed velvets, 1979; adviser to International Cotton

Institute, Brussels, Lana Gatto wool mill, and Tessitura e Filature di Tollegno, Italy; designer for Divi, 1986; produced line of leather coats for Robrik and young jackets and raincoats for Coral; designer for SAHZA House of Fashion, Valencia, Italy. Exhibitions: Museum of Modern Art, New York, 1976. Address: Via San Lorenzo 21 20020 Lazzate, MI, Italy.

PUBLICATIONS

On CORREGGIARI:

Books

McDowell, Colin, McDowell's Directory of Twentieth Century Fashion, London, 1984.
Italian Fashion, Milan, 1986.

Articles

Buckley, Richard, "Byblos Gets Kudos for Playful Men's," in DNR, 13 July 1984.
Profile in Donna (Milan), April 1986.
"City of the Arts and Science's Hemispheric, Last Night," available online at Valencia World, www.cacsa.com, February 2001.

*

Giorgio Correggiari can be regarded as an intellectual critic of top fashion designers. His philosophy is to offer customers a high degree of fashion at highly competitive prices without sacrificing quality. His design is simple, unsophisticated, but unquestionably fashionable and very avant-garde. He uses few accessories and avoids printed materials. He is not strong on color and prefers to bring out the color of the person.

—Giorgio Correggiari

* * *

Giorgio Correggiari is a spontaneous designer who loves his work. There is a constant feeling of improvisation about his designs, and he thrives on the unexpected and the irregular. This open-minded approach keeps him on his toes, ready to face the uncertainties of the fashion business, and maintains his interest, essential for a man who has declared he would stop designing the moment it ceased to amuse him.

Born into a wealthy textile family (his father owned a textile mill near Bologna, Italy), Correggiari went on to study political science at the University of Bologna. He was 20 years old when a fire completely destroyed the textile mill, decimating the family fortunes. Correggiari then took off to travel through Germany, England, and France. An eight-month stint in a Lyon mill revived his interest in textiles, and on returning to Italy he ventured into business on his own. He opened a boutique in Riccione, christened Pam Pam, which he decorated in papier maché. He filled it with his own avant-garde designs, called Follies, which were made by a group of local outworkers. This first shop was successful, but shortly after opening a second in Milan, the designer declared himself disillusioned with his profession and left to travel around India.

The lure of fashion proved irresistible, however, and Correggiari was soon back designing in Italy. A contract with the leather firm Zanella, in 1974, was an instant success. He created a collection of 12 styles in leather and introduced a new style called UFO jeans. The success was justified, as the company took 1.5 billion lire in sales in the first season alone. At the same time, Correggiari was also commissioned to work for Daniel Hechter in Paris, designing menswear, womenswear, and childrenswear lines.

In 1976 he formed his own company, Giorgio Correggiari, to produce his own ready-to-wear collections. His frenzied, restless approach to his work rapidly made the company a success. His designs reflected his insatiable curiosity and thorough research into detail and themes. He has been known to pound the streets of Milan on foot trying to find someone who can replicate an original Liberty buckle, or stay up all night in his kitchen dyeing accessories to exactly the right shade to complement a collection. He also enjoys pillaging junk shops and second-hand stores for original buttons or old velvet fabrics that can be reproduced or incorporated into his designs.

The 1980s brought technically innovative clothing from Correggiari, including sweaters made of a cellulose yarn paper developed in Japan. He also created garments that could be stuffed into a suitcase but come out still looking fresh. The designer has not lost any steam since then: his work for spring 2001 included flattering black pantsuits for women with a high, angled neckline and knee-length wraparound dresses with wide collars and ties at the waist, harkening back to popular 1970s looks.

If one word could be used to describe Giorgio Correggiari it should be “prolific.” Establishing his own company did not contain him; he also designs a knitwear line called Cleo and Pat; a men’s line, Reporter; a leather collection for leather goods company IGI in Perugia; and a collection of velvets that returns him to his textile roots for Cantoni. In addition, he has ventured into licensing, designing belts, scarves, handbags, ties, and raincoats under his own label. The Parisian branch of the International Wool Secretariat also commissioned his services as a design consultant. Small wonder, therefore, that Correggiari declares a day has to be frenzied for him to feel alive.

—Kevin Almond; updated by Carrie Snyder

COSTA, Victor

American designer

Born: 17 December 1935, Houston, Texas, Education: Studied fashion design at Pratt Institute, Brooklyn, New York, University of Houston, and École d’Chambre Syndicale de la Haute Couture, Paris, 1954–58. Family: Married Terry Costa, 1958; children: Kevin, Adrienne. Career: Bridal designer for Murray Hamberger, New York, 1959–61; bridal designer, Pandora, 1962–65; joined Suzy Perette, and became known for “line for line” copies of European couture, 1965–73; partner, Anne Murray Company, Dallas, 1973; established Victor Costa, Inc., Dallas, Texas, 1975–85; established Victor Costa Bridal, Dallas, 1989; licensing agreement with Dior for American market, 1990; Victor Costa Boutique line, 1992; Romantica line for J.C. Penney, 1994–95; designer, A.S. Design Group, 1995–97; designer, eveningwear division of Nahdree Group, 1998–99; designer, Couture Fashions, maker of Rose Taft Couture, from 1999. Lives in Sherman, Connecticut and New York City. Awards: May Company American Design award, 1967; Stix, Baer & Fuller Golden Fashion award, 1975; Wild Basin award from the state of Texas, 1979, 1982; American Printed Fabrics Council Tommy award, 1983, 1984, 1988, 1989; Dallas Fashion award, 1980, 1987, 1991; University of Houston distinguished alumni award, 1990; Fashion Group of San Antonio, Night of Stars award, 1991; Northwood University’s Outstanding Business Leader, 1991.

PUBLICATIONS

On COSTA:

Books

Fairchild, John, Chic Savages, New York, 1989.

Milbank, Caroline Rennolds, New York Fashion: The Evolution of American Style, New York, 1989.

Articles

Primeau, M., “Victor Costa,” in the Dallas Morning News (Texas), 4 September 1983.

McCue, J., “Costa Lends Voice, Designs,” in the Cleveland Plain Dealer (Ohio), 10 September 1987.

Swartz, Mimi, “The Fantasy World of Victor Costa: Texas’ Most Famous Dress Designer Had a Dream: He Would Copy His Way to the Top,” in Texas Monthly, September 1987.

Foote, Jennifer, “King of the Copycats: Costa Cashes in on the Highest Form of Flattery,” in Newsweek, 4 April 1988.

Johnson, B., and L. Powell, “Copycat King Victor Costa Cuts the High Costa Designer Duds,” in People, 22 August 1988.

Cohen, R., “Hot Costa,” in the Baltimore Jewish Times (Maryland), Fall 1989.

Saenz, Harris J., “Victor Goes Legit,” in the Dallas Morning News, 23 May 1990.

Paul, M., “Victor Costa Threads History Through High Fashion,” in the Dallas Morning News, 25 March 1990.

Bischoff, R., “Victor(ious) Costa Calls the Shots,” in Trends, June 1990.

Charles, D., “Not Dior by Ferré, but Dior by Costa,” in the New York Times, 12 June 1990.

Haber, H., “Victor Costa on Life with Dior,” in Women’s Wear Daily: Best of Group III (New York), August 1990.

Williamson, Rusty, “Costa Files Chapter 7: Copycat Champ Shutters Operations,” in Women’s Wear Daily, 8 May 1995.

Wilson, Eric, “Costa Closes Nahdree Eveningwear,” in Women’s Wear Daily, 15 July 1999.

Haber, Holly, “Survivor: Victor Costa Knows How to Weather Hard Times,” in Women’s Wear Daily, 5 October 2000.

*

“The word ‘fashion’ would not exist if there were no copying,” Costa said in the Baltimore Jewish Times in the fall of 1989. “The mirroring of the highest standard has been the basis of our society from Day One. There’s a Rolls Royce, a Tiffany, a Beluga caviar—and there’s a customer who knows and wants what is considered the ultimate. It takes talent to look at the world and see what is in the wind

styles in leather and introduced a new style called UFO jeans. The success was justified, as the company took 1.5 billion lire in sales in the first season alone. At the same time, Correggiari was also commissioned to work for Daniel Hechter in Paris, designing menswear, womenswear, and childrenswear lines.

In 1976 he formed his own company, Giorgio Correggiari, to produce his own ready-to-wear collections. His frenzied, restless approach to his work rapidly made the company a success. His designs reflected his insatiable curiosity and thorough research into detail and themes. He has been known to pound the streets of Milan on foot trying to find someone who can replicate an original Liberty buckle, or stay up all night in his kitchen dyeing accessories to exactly the right shade to complement a collection. He also enjoys pillaging junk shops and second-hand stores for original buttons or old velvet fabrics that can be reproduced or incorporated into his designs.

The 1980s brought technically innovative clothing from Correggiari, including sweaters made of a cellulose yarn paper developed in Japan. He also created garments that could be stuffed into a suitcase but come out still looking fresh. The designer has not lost any steam since then: his work for spring 2001 included flattering black pantsuits for women with a high, angled neckline and knee-length wraparound dresses with wide collars and ties at the waist, harkening back to popular 1970s looks.

If one word could be used to describe Giorgio Correggiari it should be “prolific.” Establishing his own company did not contain him; he also designs a knitwear line called Cleo and Pat; a men’s line, Reporter; a leather collection for leather goods company IGI in Perugia; and a collection of velvets that returns him to his textile roots for Cantoni. In addition, he has ventured into licensing, designing belts, scarves, handbags, ties, and raincoats under his own label. The Parisian branch of the International Wool Secretariat also commissioned his services as a design consultant. Small wonder, therefore, that Correggiari declares a day has to be frenzied for him to feel alive.

—Kevin Almond; updated by Carrie Snyder

COSTA, Victor

American designer

Born: 17 December 1935, Houston, Texas, Education: Studied fashion design at Pratt Institute, Brooklyn, New York, University of Houston, and École d’Chambre Syndicale de la Haute Couture, Paris, 1954–58. Family: Married Terry Costa, 1958; children: Kevin, Adrienne. Career: Bridal designer for Murray Hamberger, New York, 1959–61; bridal designer, Pandora, 1962–65; joined Suzy Perette, and became known for “line for line” copies of European couture, 1965–73; partner, Anne Murray Company, Dallas, 1973; established Victor Costa, Inc., Dallas, Texas, 1975–85; established Victor Costa Bridal, Dallas, 1989; licensing agreement with Dior for American market, 1990; Victor Costa Boutique line, 1992; Romantica line for J.C. Penney, 1994–95; designer, A.S. Design Group, 1995–97; designer, eveningwear division of Nahdree Group, 1998–99; designer, Couture Fashions, maker of Rose Taft Couture, from 1999. Lives in Sherman, Connecticut and New York City. Awards: May Company American Design award, 1967; Stix, Baer & Fuller Golden Fashion award, 1975; Wild Basin award from the state of Texas, 1979, 1982; American Printed Fabrics Council Tommy award, 1983, 1984, 1988, 1989; Dallas Fashion award, 1980, 1987, 1991; University of Houston distinguished alumni award, 1990; Fashion Group of San Antonio, Night of Stars award, 1991; Northwood University’s Outstanding Business Leader, 1991.

PUBLICATIONS

On COSTA:

Books

Fairchild, John, Chic Savages, New York, 1989.

Milbank, Caroline Rennolds, New York Fashion: The Evolution of American Style, New York, 1989.

Articles

Primeau, M., “Victor Costa,” in the Dallas Morning News (Texas), 4 September 1983.

McCue, J., “Costa Lends Voice, Designs,” in the Cleveland Plain Dealer (Ohio), 10 September 1987.

Swartz, Mimi, “The Fantasy World of Victor Costa: Texas’ Most Famous Dress Designer Had a Dream: He Would Copy His Way to the Top,” in Texas Monthly, September 1987.

Foote, Jennifer, “King of the Copycats: Costa Cashes in on the Highest Form of Flattery,” in Newsweek, 4 April 1988.

Johnson, B., and L. Powell, “Copycat King Victor Costa Cuts the High Costa Designer Duds,” in People, 22 August 1988.

Cohen, R., “Hot Costa,” in the Baltimore Jewish Times (Maryland), Fall 1989.

Saenz, Harris J., “Victor Goes Legit,” in the Dallas Morning News, 23 May 1990.

Paul, M., “Victor Costa Threads History Through High Fashion,” in the Dallas Morning News, 25 March 1990.

Bischoff, R., “Victor(ious) Costa Calls the Shots,” in Trends, June 1990.

Charles, D., “Not Dior by Ferré, but Dior by Costa,” in the New York Times, 12 June 1990.

Haber, H., “Victor Costa on Life with Dior,” in Women’s Wear Daily: Best of Group III (New York), August 1990.

Williamson, Rusty, “Costa Files Chapter 7: Copycat Champ Shutters Operations,” in Women’s Wear Daily, 8 May 1995.

Wilson, Eric, “Costa Closes Nahdree Eveningwear,” in Women’s Wear Daily, 15 July 1999.

Haber, Holly, “Survivor: Victor Costa Knows How to Weather Hard Times,” in Women’s Wear Daily, 5 October 2000.

*

“The word ‘fashion’ would not exist if there were no copying,” Costa said in the Baltimore Jewish Times in the fall of 1989. “The mirroring of the highest standard has been the basis of our society from Day One. There’s a Rolls Royce, a Tiffany, a Beluga caviar—and there’s a customer who knows and wants what is considered the ultimate. It takes talent to look at the world and see what is in the wind for his customer so that she always looks pretty and feels provoked to buy."

I am in the business of dressing ladies when they are seen socially in the latest fashions [which] basically has to do with social sameness. A lady goes to the same places and sees the same faces so she needs changes in social attire. Whether she is a career woman, housewife, or executive, each day she may go about her daily duties while her clothing is a secondary concern. When she is seen socially, she thinks about what she will wear and that is where I come into play. Social dressing has evolved into a "pay and play" occasion. Private parties have merged with charity events and new outfits are required frequently.

I have some customers that I have been dressing for 30 years and now I'm dressing their daughters and their granddaughters. So there are three generations of Victor Costa customers out there—it keeps you young because the younger girls, the granddaughters, have made a whole return to tradition. In the 1990s, with the AIDS epidemic, a return to traditional values has put a new emphasis on the wedding and all of its attendant parties, teas, fêtes, and receptions.

Special occasion dresses have always been the hallmark of my business. My quest for what is new sends me around the world. It is a sense of pride and fulfilment that some of the most noted and important women in the world are wearing my clothes. But also a young girl of 13 may get a Victor Costa dress which will have name recognition and make her feel special. Women adore how they look in their Victor Costa dresses.

—Victor Costa

* * *

Victor Costa has always loved fashion. Known as the "King of the Copycats," his status in the design world is unique. Costa designed dresses for childhood friends in Houston and was entranced by Hollywood film stars and their glamor. He went on to study at the Pratt Institute, New York, and later spent a year at the École of the Chambre Syndicale de la Haute Couture in Paris. This early contact with the Paris fashion world as it existed in the days when Christian Dior reigned and before changes were ushered in by the 1960s, had a great impact on Costa. His feeling for dressing women is based on a 1950s sense of style and formality.

New York's Seventh Avenue fashion business was built on copying Paris designs. Buyers and designers alike would flock to Paris to buy a model to "knock-off" or reinterpret. Hattie Carnegie built a respectable business doing this and nurtured several important designers, among them Norman Norell. The years after World War II saw an escalation of Paris couture show photographs being published in newspapers, but with a significant lag time. When Costa returned from Paris to New York in 1959 he was immediately charged with copying the latest Paris designs. Costa, who had a photographic memory and a quick hand at sketching, was able to translate what he saw on the Paris runways into successful designs for the Suzy Perette company during the 1960s.

Costa has parlayed his early training into a multimillion-dollar business. He travels to Europe frequently to attend the haute couture, prêt-à-porter fashion shows, and Premier Vision fabrics. His ability to comprehend couture and ready-to-wear fashions is a complex and masterful talent. He is not content with only a quick sketch or photography but often goes so far as to purchase the original couture design to study the construction and fabric. He chooses many fabrics in Europe and the U.S., but prefers to do construction where he can oversee it, as he did with his Dallas-based company.

Costa is openly doing what others often attempt to mask. In a rapidly changing fashion world where shopping has become a recreational hobby, Costa has at times delivered merchandise to five different markets a year. All of these dresses are not replicas but may represent a distillation of the most current fashion trends. Costa translates the essence of these trends in his work. Designers' reactions to his imitations of their work vary from being flattered to being irritated by his intrusion into their diminishing market. The voluminous designs of Arnold Scaasi are a Costa favorite, as are the silhouettes in Christian Lacroix's work. During the controversial tuxedo-dress dispute in 1994 between Ralph Lauren and Yves Saint Laurent, Costa asserted that he, in fact, had designed the dress in 1990 as a copy of a look by Parisian designer Bernard Perris. Fashion runways are not the only source for Costa. Recognizing the increasing influence of movie and television stars, Costa is quick to turn dresses seen at the Academy Awards into eveningwear available to women of all ages for a fraction of the originals' price.

Business problems, including a lawsuit by a former employee and embezzlement by an officer in the company, forced Costa to close his Dallas-based company in 1995. He has, however, continued to offer his designs with the backing of several companies. He updated his line of suits and dresses offered in 2000 by including bare dresses and glitzy evening pants, some with embellished fabrics. His attention to clothing construction now takes him to China to work with beaders and embroidery artisans. Costa welcomes the admiration of new, younger patrons but remains devoted to the mature women he has served for so many years. There are loyal customers to whom he personally caters with the loving attention of a couture designer. Costa, whose client list reads like a "Who's Who" of society and entertainment personalities, seeks to make all women feel beautiful.

—Myra Walker; updated by Janette Goff Dixon

COSTELLOE, Paul

Irish designer

Born: Dublin, Ireland, 27 June 1945. Education: Studied at the École d'Chambre Syndicale de la Haute Couture, Paris, 1968–69.

Family: Married Anne Cooper, December 1981; children: Justin, Paul-Emmet, Gavin, Jessica, Robert, William, Nicholas. Career: Worked with Jacques Esterel, Paris, circa 1967, and for the Rinascente Group in Italy, 1970–73; moved to New York, worked on Seventh Avenue and for Anne Fogarty; moved back to Ireland, 1978; showed first collection, 1979; showed first men's collection 1981; introduced diffusion line, Dressage, 1989; launched Studio Line 1992; opened shop in Knightsbridge section of London, 2000; created uniforms for Sainsbury's supermarkets, 2000. Exhibitions: Featured in Victoria and Albert Museum's "50 Years of British Fashion" exhibit, 1997. Address: Main Road Moygashel, Dungannon, County Tyrone, BT71 7QR, Ireland; 7 Tunsgate Square, Guildford, Surrey, GU13QZ England.

for his customer so that she always looks pretty and feels provoked to buy."

I am in the business of dressing ladies when they are seen socially in the latest fashions [which] basically has to do with social sameness. A lady goes to the same places and sees the same faces so she needs changes in social attire. Whether she is a career woman, housewife, or executive, each day she may go about her daily duties while her clothing is a secondary concern. When she is seen socially, she thinks about what she will wear and that is where I come into play. Social dressing has evolved into a "pay and play" occasion. Private parties have merged with charity events and new outfits are required frequently.

I have some customers that I have been dressing for 30 years and now I'm dressing their daughters and their granddaughters. So there are three generations of Victor Costa customers out there—it keeps you young because the younger girls, the granddaughters, have made a whole return to tradition. In the 1990s, with the AIDS epidemic, a return to traditional values has put a new emphasis on the wedding and all of its attendant parties, teas, fêtes, and receptions.

Special occasion dresses have always been the hallmark of my business. My quest for what is new sends me around the world. It is a sense of pride and fulfilment that some of the most noted and important women in the world are wearing my clothes. But also a young girl of 13 may get a Victor Costa dress which will have name recognition and make her feel special. Women adore how they look in their Victor Costa dresses.

—Victor Costa

* * *

Victor Costa has always loved fashion. Known as the "King of the Copycats," his status in the design world is unique. Costa designed dresses for childhood friends in Houston and was entranced by Hollywood film stars and their glamor. He went on to study at the Pratt Institute, New York, and later spent a year at the École of the Chambre Syndicale de la Haute Couture in Paris. This early contact with the Paris fashion world as it existed in the days when Christian Dior reigned and before changes were ushered in by the 1960s, had a great impact on Costa. His feeling for dressing women is based on a 1950s sense of style and formality.

New York's Seventh Avenue fashion business was built on copying Paris designs. Buyers and designers alike would flock to Paris to buy a model to "knock-off" or reinterpret. Hattie Carnegie built a respectable business doing this and nurtured several important designers, among them Norman Norell. The years after World War II saw an escalation of Paris couture show photographs being published in newspapers, but with a significant lag time. When Costa returned from Paris to New York in 1959 he was immediately charged with copying the latest Paris designs. Costa, who had a photographic memory and a quick hand at sketching, was able to translate what he saw on the Paris runways into successful designs for the Suzy Perette company during the 1960s.

Costa has parlayed his early training into a multimillion-dollar business. He travels to Europe frequently to attend the haute couture, prêt-à-porter fashion shows, and Premier Vision fabrics. His ability to comprehend couture and ready-to-wear fashions is a complex and masterful talent. He is not content with only a quick sketch or photography but often goes so far as to purchase the original couture design to study the construction and fabric. He chooses many fabrics in Europe and the U.S., but prefers to do construction where he can oversee it, as he did with his Dallas-based company.

Costa is openly doing what others often attempt to mask. In a rapidly changing fashion world where shopping has become a recreational hobby, Costa has at times delivered merchandise to five different markets a year. All of these dresses are not replicas but may represent a distillation of the most current fashion trends. Costa translates the essence of these trends in his work. Designers' reactions to his imitations of their work vary from being flattered to being irritated by his intrusion into their diminishing market. The voluminous designs of Arnold Scaasi are a Costa favorite, as are the silhouettes in Christian Lacroix's work. During the controversial tuxedo-dress dispute in 1994 between Ralph Lauren and Yves Saint Laurent, Costa asserted that he, in fact, had designed the dress in 1990 as a copy of a look by Parisian designer Bernard Perris. Fashion runways are not the only source for Costa. Recognizing the increasing influence of movie and television stars, Costa is quick to turn dresses seen at the Academy Awards into eveningwear available to women of all ages for a fraction of the originals' price.

Business problems, including a lawsuit by a former employee and embezzlement by an officer in the company, forced Costa to close his Dallas-based company in 1995. He has, however, continued to offer his designs with the backing of several companies. He updated his line of suits and dresses offered in 2000 by including bare dresses and glitzy evening pants, some with embellished fabrics. His attention to clothing construction now takes him to China to work with beaders and embroidery artisans. Costa welcomes the admiration of new, younger patrons but remains devoted to the mature women he has served for so many years. There are loyal customers to whom he personally caters with the loving attention of a couture designer. Costa, whose client list reads like a "Who's Who" of society and entertainment personalities, seeks to make all women feel beautiful.

—Myra Walker; updated by Janette Goff Dixon

COSTELLOE, Paul

Irish designer

Born: Dublin, Ireland, 27 June 1945. Education: Studied at the École d'Chambre Syndicale de la Haute Couture, Paris, 1968–69.

Family: Married Anne Cooper, December 1981; children: Justin, Paul-Emmet, Gavin, Jessica, Robert, William, Nicholas. Career: Worked with Jacques Esterel, Paris, circa 1967, and for the Rinascente Group in Italy, 1970–73; moved to New York, worked on Seventh Avenue and for Anne Fogarty; moved back to Ireland, 1978; showed first collection, 1979; showed first men's collection 1981; introduced diffusion line, Dressage, 1989; launched Studio Line 1992; opened shop in Knightsbridge section of London, 2000; created uniforms for Sainsbury's supermarkets, 2000. Exhibitions: Featured in Victoria and Albert Museum's "50 Years of British Fashion" exhibit, 1997. Address: Main Road Moygashel, Dungannon, County Tyrone, BT71 7QR, Ireland; 7 Tunsgate Square, Guildford, Surrey, GU13QZ England.

Paul Costelloe, spring/summer 2000 ready-to-wear collection. © AFP/CORBIS.

PUBLICATIONS

On COSTELLOE:

Articles

- "Paul Costelloe: Designer Profile," in Vogue (London), November 1981.
- Buckley, Richard, "A Bit o'Costelloe," in DNR: The Magazine (New York), August 1984.
- Eastoe, Jane, "The Tall Guy," in Fashion Weekly (London), 3 August 1989.
- Jeal, Nicola, "A Profit in His Own Land," in The Observer Magazine (London), 17 September 1989.
- Burgess, Robert, "Man of the Cloth," in Country Living (New York), May 1991.
- McGowan, Cliodhna, "Oh Dear—Costelloe Gets Thumbs Down from Fashionable Galway Women," in the Galway Advertiser, 15 October 1997.
- Brannigan, Tim, "Habit and Costelloe," in the Irish Times, 7 November 1998.
- Fearon, Francesca, "London Doffs Hat at Irish Milliner's Show," in the Irish Times, 25 September 2000.

* * *

In its time, the fashion industry has been accused of being many things: flippant, bitchy, overly theatrical, or suffering from short-lived trends too wacky to sustain economic gain. Amid such hysteria and uncertainty, it is perhaps reassuring to find a designer like Paul Costelloe. Unpretentious and realistic, the Irish-born Costelloe is known as an ordinary man, level-headed, and calm. Attributing his drive, ambition, and success to his wife and family in Dublin, he has remained a popular figure in London fashion circles and is held in great affection by his employees.

Renowned for his use of natural fibers and fabrics, the best-quality wools and silks, and a particular bias toward traditional Irish linen, Costelloe clothes are one of the most subtle, understated, yet beautifully designed and manufactured collections available today. Acknowledging his love of Giorgio Armani's tailoring and the influence of Italian taste and style on the cut and flair of his collections, Costelloe always manages to fit an inspirational visit to Italy into his schedule before commencing the design of a new collection.

In general, three collections are produced each season under the Costelloe label, including the main line range (elegant, formal, and quietly sexy), the diffusion range called Dressage (country casual, timeless, and more suited to weekend dressing), and a third collection, the Studio Line, which was launched in 1992 and features what has been described as "investment tailoring," in neoclassic colors. The clothes are aimed at today's modern career woman who has a distinctive, quiet taste and understated sophistication.

Costelloe's spring-summer 1992 collection was an example of the designer at his peak. A series of sharp, sugary suits in pink, yellow, and green wool opened the collection. Teamed with short, flirty, polka dot skirts or blouses and oversize double crown hats, they were perfect for summer events like Ascot or garden parties. Ladylike check-cotton suits followed. Teamed with straw boaters and decorated with Costelloe's distinctive brass buttons, the look was demure and pristine, offset by soft kid gloves and gold jewelry. Like Armani, Costelloe loves beige, and this color, in various hues, features strongly in nearly all of his collections. For the Dressage spring-summer 1992 collection, long slim-line linen separates were shown teamed with an overscaled beige and cream lily print. The look was very Greta Scaachi in the film White Mischief, accessorized with round dark glasses and panama hats.

Paul Costelloe, spring 2000 collection: wrap top with a denim skirt.
© AP/Wide World Photos.

Before starting his own label, Costelloe had a varied and well-traveled fashion career. Born in Dublin, he was from an early age fascinated by women: the way they dressed, talked, and acted. This inspired him to pursue a career in fashion, and he enrolled at a local design college. He graduated in the early 1960s, and his sense of adventure directed him to Paris.

Armed with only a portfolio of design ideas, he followed the familiar route of knocking on fashion company doors, asking for work. The house of Jacques Esterel took him on, followed by work for an Italian manufacturer, then several positions in fashion houses on Seventh Avenue in New York. By this time, Costelloe had become experienced in fashion design, import, and export. Ever the opportunist entrepreneur, he realized he should use his talent and knowledge for his own benefit rather than someone else's, so he returned to Ireland to set up his own business.

He teamed up with Robert Eitel, a successful Irish businessman, to form the company Paul Costelloe and launched the first collection in 1979. The small fashion company has since grown into a multimillion-pound concern. Until recently, the collections were shown seasonally at the British Designer Show at Olympia in London, where Costelloe was always a popular figure. Yet following a trend established by several other London designers, he began showing at smaller, more distinctive venues.

Costelloe envisages the company expanding into other product areas and has ambitions to extend his love of cloth and color into the creation of a Paul Costelloe lifestyle. He wants to surround his customer with the subtle Costelloe touch, incorporating accessories and an interior collection for the home as well as a line of clothes for men and women. A keen member of the Chelsea Arts Club, where he stays in London, Costelloe retains his down-to-earth Irish charm and wit, as exemplified when he met Bruce Oldfield in Paris. Forgetting his name he quipped, good naturedly, "Ah, the King of Fashion."

Ireland's leading fashion designer, however, got himself into hot water in October 1997 for some comments in a British magazine suggesting Irish women were not fashion-forward. The comments were not taken lightly by female couture purchasers in Ireland, who were offended and said so in numerous follow-up articles in the Irish press. They went so far as to accuse his clothing of being well-tailored but uninspirational; to note that his apparel, made of natural fabrics such as linen, gets rumpled in the rainy Irish weather; and to call his women's suits drab and dowdy. Through it all, Costelloe maintained that his comments were misinterpreted.

The controversy did not impede Costelloe's success as a designer. He continued to find acclaim using natural materials such as lambswool, tweeds, and linens, and featuring low-key styling which melded both with his personality and with Irish tradition, as noted by Tim Brannigan in the Irish News. Brannigan explained that Costelloe considered clothing a frame and woman the picture within it; the frame should never take away from the picture. Although Costelloe sometimes introduces surprises into his collections, such as combining checks with floral prints in 1997, his designs remain elegant and unaffected by short-lived trends.

Costelloe was honored as one of the designers featured in the Victoria and Albert Museum's "50 Years of British Fashion" exhibit in 1997. In the mid- and late 1990s, he expanded outside of men's and women's apparel, designing cutlery for Newbridge, crystal for Cavan, earthenware for Wedgwood, and eyewear sold through the retailer Boots, all incorporating his well-known "fox" logo.

Costelloe's spring 2001 women's collection further solidified his long-established reputation for high-quality tailoring and classic designs. Following the theme of "A Parisian Afternoon," Costelloe drew on his experiences as a young designer in Paris to create a collection of European-styled, structured clothing featuring subdued colors and fur highlights, accessorized with scarves and hats.

Costelloe has long supported Irish charities, such as hosting an annual fashion show to support Northern Ireland Mother and Baby Appeal (NIMBA) in the late 1990s. He has heightened his profile within Europe by becoming a sponsor of a Formula One auto racing team. In addition, he designed 30 suites in the Star Court Hotel, the largest hotel convention center in Limerick, Ireland, and created uniforms of orange fleece, with baseball caps, for the floor staff of Sainsbury's supermarkets in Britain. In 2000, he opened a shop in the Knightsbridge section of London and hoped to break into the U.S. market in the near future.

Costelloe's London show in September 2000 expanded upon the designer's interest in cultures around the world. It featured white and navy dresses and peasant blouses, accessorized with white socks, brown brogues, and scarves, all in an homage to the film Pleasantville, set in the middle America of the 1950s. Francesca Fearon of the Irish Times, in a review, termed the collection "optimistic." Costelloe's collection the following season, typically, was very tailored, emulating the style of the Parisian house of Chanel.

—Kevin Almond; updated by Karen Raugust

COURRÈGES, André

French designer

Born: Pau, Pyrénées Atlantiques, 9 March 1923. Education: Studied engineering at École des Pont et Chaussées; studied fashion in Pau and Paris. Family: Married Jacqueline (Coqueline) Barrière, 1967; children: Marie. Career: Cutter, Cristobal Balenciaga, Paris, 1945–61; independent fashion designer, Paris, 1960–61; founded Courrèges fashion house, boulevard Kléber, Paris, 1961–65; first haute couture collection, 1965; business sold to l'Oréal, 1965; resumed designing, 1967, with Prototype custom line, Couture Future high priced ready-to-wear line introduced 1969; designed own boutiques, from 1970; first fragrance line Empreinte introduced, 1971; men's ready-to-wear line and men's fragrance introduced, 1973; introduced accessories, leather goods, watches, belts, furniture, luggage, windsurfing equipment and more, from 1979; Hyperbole lower priced ready-to-wear line, 1980; company purchased by Itokin, 1983; fragrances bought by Swiss Burrus Group, 1992; produced collection with Jean-Charles de Castelbajac, 1994–95; bought back perfume business, 1997. Awards: Couture award, London, 1964. Address: 40 rue François Premier, 75008 Paris, France.

PUBLICATIONS

By COURRÈGES:

Books

La robe: essai psychanalytique sur le vêtement, with Eugénie Lemoine-Luccioni, Paris, 1983.

On COURRÈGES:

Books

Halliday, Leonard, The Fashion Makers, London, 1966.
 Bender, Marylin, The Beautiful People, New York, 1967.
 Lynam, Ruth, Couture: An Illustrated History of the Great Paris Designers and Their Creations, Garden City, New York, 1972.
 Lambert, Eleanor, World of Fashion: People, Places, Resources, New York & London, 1976.
 Milbank, Caroline Rennolds, Couture: The Great Designers, New York, 1985.

Stegemeyer, Anne, Who's Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.

Guillaume, Valérie, Courrèges, Paris & London, 1998.

Articles

Wolfe, David, "Courrèges," in International Textiles (London), April 1990.

Schneider, Karen, "Up, Up and Hooray! Designer André Courrèges Celebrates 25 Years of Miniskirt Fame," in People, 9 July 1990.

Betts, Katherine, "Courrèges: Back to the Future," in Women's Wear Daily, 22 January 1991.

Schiro, Anne-Marie, "Sixties Revival is Official: Courrèges is Back," in the New York Times, 19 February 1991.

Drake, Laurie, "Courrèges and Balenciaga: Some of the Best Spring Fashion Bears the Signature—or the Spirit—of Two Great Designers," in Vogue, March 1991.

"Back on the Block: With 1960s Fashions Back in Vogue, André Courrèges is Decades Ahead of the Trend," in Chicago Tribune, 6 March 1991.

Horyn, Cathy, "Men of Metal and Mod," in the Washington Post, 14 March 1991.

"Courrèges," special supplement of L'Officiel (Paris), 1994.

André Courrèges, designed for Samuel Robert's 1964 collection: goatskin walking suit. © AP/Wide World Photos.

Knightsbridge section of London and hoped to break into the U.S. market in the near future.

Costelloe's London show in September 2000 expanded upon the designer's interest in cultures around the world. It featured white and navy dresses and peasant blouses, accessorized with white socks, brown brogues, and scarves, all in an homage to the film Pleasantville, set in the middle America of the 1950s. Francesca Fearon of the Irish Times, in a review, termed the collection "optimistic." Costelloe's collection the following season, typically, was very tailored, emulating the style of the Parisian house of Chanel.

—Kevin Almond; updated by Karen Raugust

COURRÈGES, André

French designer

Born: Pau, Pyrénées Atlantiques, 9 March 1923. Education: Studied engineering at École des Pont et Chaussées; studied fashion in Pau and Paris. Family: Married Jacqueline (Coqueline) Barrière, 1967; children: Marie. Career: Cutter, Cristobal Balenciaga, Paris, 1945–61; independent fashion designer, Paris, 1960–61; founded Courrèges fashion house, boulevard Kléber, Paris, 1961–65; first haute couture collection, 1965; business sold to l'Oréal, 1965; resumed designing, 1967, with Prototype custom line, Couture Future high priced ready-to-wear line introduced 1969; designed own boutiques, from 1970; first fragrance line Empreinte introduced, 1971; men's ready-to-wear line and men's fragrance introduced, 1973; introduced accessories, leather goods, watches, belts, furniture, luggage, windsurfing equipment and more, from 1979; Hyperbole lower priced ready-to-wear line, 1980; company purchased by Itokin, 1983; fragrances bought by Swiss Burrus Group, 1992; produced collection with Jean-Charles de Castelbajac, 1994–95; bought back perfume business, 1997. Awards: Couture award, London, 1964. Address: 40 rue François Premier, 75008 Paris, France.

PUBLICATIONS

By COURRÈGES:

Books

La robe: essai psychanalytique sur le vêtement, with Eugénie Lemoine-Luccioni, Paris, 1983.

On COURRÈGES:

Books

Halliday, Leonard, The Fashion Makers, London, 1966.
 Bender, Marylin, The Beautiful People, New York, 1967.
 Lynam, Ruth, Couture: An Illustrated History of the Great Paris Designers and Their Creations, Garden City, New York, 1972.
 Lambert, Eleanor, World of Fashion: People, Places, Resources, New York & London, 1976.
 Milbank, Caroline Rennolds, Couture: The Great Designers, New York, 1985.

Stegemeyer, Anne, Who's Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.

Guillaume, Valérie, Courrèges, Paris & London, 1998.

Articles

Wolfe, David, "Courrèges," in International Textiles (London), April 1990.

Schneider, Karen, "Up, Up and Hooray! Designer André Courrèges Celebrates 25 Years of Miniskirt Fame," in People, 9 July 1990.

Betts, Katherine, "Courrèges: Back to the Future," in Women's Wear Daily, 22 January 1991.

Schiro, Anne-Marie, "Sixties Revival is Official: Courrèges is Back," in the New York Times, 19 February 1991.

Drake, Laurie, "Courrèges and Balenciaga: Some of the Best Spring Fashion Bears the Signature—or the Spirit—of Two Great Designers," in Vogue, March 1991.

"Back on the Block: With 1960s Fashions Back in Vogue, André Courrèges is Decades Ahead of the Trend," in Chicago Tribune, 6 March 1991.

Horyn, Cathy, "Men of Metal and Mod," in the Washington Post, 14 March 1991.

"Courrèges," special supplement of L'Officiel (Paris), 1994.

André Courrèges, designed for Samuel Robert's 1964 collection: goatskin walking suit. © AP/Wide World Photos.

André Courrèges, fall 1968 collection: wool coat with leather inset band. © Bettmann/CORBIS.

White, Constance R., "Courrèges Encore," in the New York Times, 20 March 1995.

"Courrèges Buys Back Perfume," in the Wall Street Journal, 6 September 1996.

* * *

One of a generation of strikingly innovative designers working in Paris in the 1960s, André Courrèges was one of the first since Chanel to understand the potential in womenswear of using items from the male wardrobe. His goal became to provide the same simple range of garments for women, not by mere appropriation of male adornment, but inventing a totally new modernistic aesthetic.

Courrèges regarded the 1950s silhouette of a tightly boned and wasp-waisted mannequin, teetering on impossibly high stiletto heels, as completely alien to the needs of the modern woman of the 1960s, even though he had worked for Balenciaga for 11 years, from 1950 to 1961, as chief cutter. Courrèges subsequently left to set up his own business with his wife Coqueline. Their first collection, using tweeds and soft wools, had yet to shake off Balenciaga's influence.

Ultimately Courrèges saw the male wardrobe as more logical and practical than a woman's because of its unadorned and reductionist nature, resulting from its being pared down to the barest essentials over the passage of time. Yet he responded to the challenge as an engineer—one well-versed in functionalism and utilizing the skills he had learned and finely honed at Balenciaga—and with his own modernist tendencies conceived a new look of femininity entirely different from that of Balenciaga.

Cutting skills were used to free rather than contain the body, emphasized by short trapeze skirts for extra movement. By 1964 Courrèges was producing spare but not spirited ranges of clothing, such as his monochromatic pinafore dresses and suits with hemlines well above the knee, all in crisply tailored, squared-off shapes. Renouncing the stiletto as an item of clothing symbolizing women's subordination, Courrèges provided his models with flat-heeled white glacé boots and accessorized his honed-down clothes with extraordinary headgear such as futuristic helmets and strange baby bonnets.

Courrèges believed the foundation of successful design was in understanding function; correct form would automatically follow. Aesthetics was only the wrapping. The only decoration to be found on Courrèges clothes was either directly allied to its construction, as in the use of welt seaming, or was minor such as the small half belt on the back of his coats. One decorative device he reveled in and which was copied extensively within mass market fashion was his use of white daisies made out of every conceivable material such as sequins, lace, or used as patches.

It is still debated whether or not Courrèges invented the mini skirt, but he was indisputably responsible for making trousers and matching tunic tops de rigueur for every occasion, overturning the taboo of trouser wearing by women, creating versions slit at the seam to give an exaggerated elongation to the female body and emphasizing this clean streamlined look by using lean, well-muscled female models.

Courrèges displayed his love of construction in his use of chevron stitching, such as that used in 1965 at the hips of dresses and trousers, and his use of devices such as the bib yoke, keyhole neckline, and patch pocket. Hip yokes and welted seams with top stitching emphasized the lines of the garment, the stitching occasionally deployed in contrasting colors, such as orange on white, to exaggerate the details of assembly.

Courrèges collections were copied and disseminated worldwide, although the taut outline of the originals was lost when cheaper materials were used. Consequently he refused to stage shows for the press or retail buyers and would only sell to private clients, biding his time until he was ready to produce his own ready-to-wear collection, entitled Couture Future, in 1969. By this time, however, his hard-edged style had become dated in comparison with the hippie, ethnic style of the 1970s and his seminal structured A-line dresses with welt seams and square-cut coats on top seemed out of step with contemporary fashion.

By the early 1990s Courrèges was again designing successfully, spurred by a 1960s revival where his short trapeze dresses and metallic clothing were rediscovered by a new generation. He had his own boutique in Bloomingdale's New York flagship store, as well as in Bloomingdale's stores around the country. The Courrèges name was on everything from his well-known bodysuits and skirts to scooters, gourmet food, and home furnishings. Like fellow futuristic designer Paco Rabanne, Courrèges enjoyed this fashionable rebirth for several years, reveling in the limelight and a slew of new, younger clients. In 1992 Courrèges sold his fragrance division to the Swiss Burrus Group; five years later, still riding high and one of the few remaining independent designers in a time of mass consolidation (think LVMH), Courrèges was able to buy back his perfume business from Burrus for $7.5 million.

In the 21st century, the Courrèges name still carried clout—in and around in Paris and in New York. Dozens of shops ringed the globe, especially in Japan, where the Courrèges label was a favorite in department stores. Will the future be a bright and wonderful place for Courrèges fashion? As he explained to the Chicago Tribune in 1991, "It wasn't me who was ahead of my time, it was my time that was behind me." Has time caught up with André Courrèges? Only he knows for sure.

—Caroline Cox; updated by Sydonie Benét

COVERI, Enrico

Italian designer

Born: Prato, Italy, 26 February 1952. Education: Studied stage design, Accademia delle Belle Arti, Florence, 1971–74. Career: Freelance designer for Touché, Gentry, Tycos, Aquarius, Lux Sports, and Ilaria Knitwear, Milan, 1972–79; formed Enrico Coveri, SpA, 1978; formed Enrico Coveri France S.A.R.L., 1983; opened boutique in Milan, 1981, with subsequent shops in Genoa, Viareggio, Piacenza, Paris, Saint Tropez, Beirut, and New York; launched perfumes Paillettes, 1982, and Dollars, 1983; introduced home furnishing line, 1984. Exhibitions: Consequenze impreviste, Prato, 1982; Italian Re-Evolution, La Jolla Museum of Art, California, 1982. Awards: Uomo Europeo award, Rome, 1982; Fil d'Or award, Munich, 1982. Died: 6 December 1990, in Florence, Italy.

PUBLICATIONS

On COVERI:

Books

Mulassano, Adriana, The Who's Who of Italian Fashion, Florence, 1979.

Sartogo, Piero, ed., Italian Re-Evolution: Design in Italian Society in the 1980s (exhibition catalogue), La Jolla, California, 1982. The Power of Paris, video, New York, 1991.

Articles

Baldacci, Luisa, "Enrico Coveri: lo stilista del colore," in Arbiter (Milan), No. 2, 1982.

"Enrico Coveri illustra il segreto della sua moda," in La Nazione (Milan), 14 June 1983.

"Enrico Coveri: graffiti che corrono e ballano," in Vogue (Milan), January 1985.

"Parigi: spot su Enrico Coveri. Enorme o incollato, la moda degli opposti," in Vogue (Milan), February 1985.

"Enrico Coveri: nuovi schemi per il classico," in L'Uomo Vogue (Milan), July/August 1985.

business with his wife Coqueline. Their first collection, using tweeds and soft wools, had yet to shake off Balenciaga's influence.

Ultimately Courrèges saw the male wardrobe as more logical and practical than a woman's because of its unadorned and reductionist nature, resulting from its being pared down to the barest essentials over the passage of time. Yet he responded to the challenge as an engineer—one well-versed in functionalism and utilizing the skills he had learned and finely honed at Balenciaga—and with his own modernist tendencies conceived a new look of femininity entirely different from that of Balenciaga.

Cutting skills were used to free rather than contain the body, emphasized by short trapeze skirts for extra movement. By 1964 Courrèges was producing spare but not spirited ranges of clothing, such as his monochromatic pinafore dresses and suits with hemlines well above the knee, all in crisply tailored, squared-off shapes. Renouncing the stiletto as an item of clothing symbolizing women's subordination, Courrèges provided his models with flat-heeled white glacé boots and accessorized his honed-down clothes with extraordinary headgear such as futuristic helmets and strange baby bonnets.

Courrèges believed the foundation of successful design was in understanding function; correct form would automatically follow. Aesthetics was only the wrapping. The only decoration to be found on Courrèges clothes was either directly allied to its construction, as in the use of welt seaming, or was minor such as the small half belt on the back of his coats. One decorative device he reveled in and which was copied extensively within mass market fashion was his use of white daisies made out of every conceivable material such as sequins, lace, or used as patches.

It is still debated whether or not Courrèges invented the mini skirt, but he was indisputably responsible for making trousers and matching tunic tops de rigueur for every occasion, overturning the taboo of trouser wearing by women, creating versions slit at the seam to give an exaggerated elongation to the female body and emphasizing this clean streamlined look by using lean, well-muscled female models.

Courrèges displayed his love of construction in his use of chevron stitching, such as that used in 1965 at the hips of dresses and trousers, and his use of devices such as the bib yoke, keyhole neckline, and patch pocket. Hip yokes and welted seams with top stitching emphasized the lines of the garment, the stitching occasionally deployed in contrasting colors, such as orange on white, to exaggerate the details of assembly.

Courrèges collections were copied and disseminated worldwide, although the taut outline of the originals was lost when cheaper materials were used. Consequently he refused to stage shows for the press or retail buyers and would only sell to private clients, biding his time until he was ready to produce his own ready-to-wear collection, entitled Couture Future, in 1969. By this time, however, his hard-edged style had become dated in comparison with the hippie, ethnic style of the 1970s and his seminal structured A-line dresses with welt seams and square-cut coats on top seemed out of step with contemporary fashion.

By the early 1990s Courrèges was again designing successfully, spurred by a 1960s revival where his short trapeze dresses and metallic clothing were rediscovered by a new generation. He had his own boutique in Bloomingdale's New York flagship store, as well as in Bloomingdale's stores around the country. The Courrèges name was on everything from his well-known bodysuits and skirts to scooters, gourmet food, and home furnishings. Like fellow futuristic designer Paco Rabanne, Courrèges enjoyed this fashionable rebirth for several years, reveling in the limelight and a slew of new, younger clients. In 1992 Courrèges sold his fragrance division to the Swiss Burrus Group; five years later, still riding high and one of the few remaining independent designers in a time of mass consolidation (think LVMH), Courrèges was able to buy back his perfume business from Burrus for $7.5 million.

In the 21st century, the Courrèges name still carried clout—in and around in Paris and in New York. Dozens of shops ringed the globe, especially in Japan, where the Courrèges label was a favorite in department stores. Will the future be a bright and wonderful place for Courrèges fashion? As he explained to the Chicago Tribune in 1991, "It wasn't me who was ahead of my time, it was my time that was behind me." Has time caught up with André Courrèges? Only he knows for sure.

—Caroline Cox; updated by Sydonie Benét

COVERI, Enrico

Italian designer

Born: Prato, Italy, 26 February 1952. Education: Studied stage design, Accademia delle Belle Arti, Florence, 1971–74. Career: Freelance designer for Touché, Gentry, Tycos, Aquarius, Lux Sports, and Ilaria Knitwear, Milan, 1972–79; formed Enrico Coveri, SpA, 1978; formed Enrico Coveri France S.A.R.L., 1983; opened boutique in Milan, 1981, with subsequent shops in Genoa, Viareggio, Piacenza, Paris, Saint Tropez, Beirut, and New York; launched perfumes Paillettes, 1982, and Dollars, 1983; introduced home furnishing line, 1984. Exhibitions: Consequenze impreviste, Prato, 1982; Italian Re-Evolution, La Jolla Museum of Art, California, 1982. Awards: Uomo Europeo award, Rome, 1982; Fil d'Or award, Munich, 1982. Died: 6 December 1990, in Florence, Italy.

PUBLICATIONS

On COVERI:

Books

Mulassano, Adriana, The Who's Who of Italian Fashion, Florence, 1979.

Sartogo, Piero, ed., Italian Re-Evolution: Design in Italian Society in the 1980s (exhibition catalogue), La Jolla, California, 1982. The Power of Paris, video, New York, 1991.

Articles

Baldacci, Luisa, "Enrico Coveri: lo stilista del colore," in Arbiter (Milan), No. 2, 1982.

"Enrico Coveri illustra il segreto della sua moda," in La Nazione (Milan), 14 June 1983.

"Enrico Coveri: graffiti che corrono e ballano," in Vogue (Milan), January 1985.

"Parigi: spot su Enrico Coveri. Enorme o incollato, la moda degli opposti," in Vogue (Milan), February 1985.

"Enrico Coveri: nuovi schemi per il classico," in L'Uomo Vogue (Milan), July/August 1985.

Enrico Coveri, fall/winter 2001 collection: sequined sweater with a fur collar and gold-tone pants. © AP/Wide World Photos.

- Morera, Daniela, and Joe Dolce, "Enrico Coveri," in Interview (New York), February 1986.
 "Enrico Coveri: uno stile all'inglese," in Donna (Milan), July/August 1987.
 "Enrico Coveri: righe, quadri, forme base...," in Vogue (Milan), January 1988.
 Obituary, "Enrico Coveri Dies in Italy of Stroke," in Women's Wear Daily, 10 December 1990.
 Obituary, "Enrico Coveri, Italian Fashion Designer," in Chicago Tribune, 10 December 1990.

* * *

"You Young" is the name of one of the several seasonal Enrico Coveri collections. It is also perhaps the most succinct description for his bold, unpretentious, and fun-loving fashion: strong, vibrant colors and striking, witty designs that have always been clear and intelligible, with zany prints and knits often incorporating Pop Art designs and cartoon characters.

Enrico Coveri, spring/summer 2001 collection. © AP/Wide World Photos.

Enrico Coveri was born in Prato, near Florence, Italy and studied at the Accademia delle Belle Arti in the city. He began his career as a freelance designer, creating knitwear and sportswear lines for three collections, Touché, Gentry, and Tycos, making his mark by being one of the first designers to use soft pastel shades. After a brief move to Paris in 1978 to work for Espace Cardin, he returned to Italy and established his own namesake company. Each season the company produced a ready-to-wear women's line and several less expensive boutique collections for men, women, teenagers, and children, as well as a vast array of subsidiary Coveri accessory products such as shoes, bags, hats, scarves, and gloves.

Although he excelled at casual clothing, even his eveningwear exuded a young, sporty, wearable feel. Coveri enjoyed shocking and going out on a limb with design. "I love the unexpected to the point of traveling everywhere without set itineraries," he declared when, after three seasons pursuing his ultra casual look, he suddenly produced a collection of extremely feminine tight skirts and high heels. "That certainly shattered the common belief of Coveri only doing things for 16-year-olds," he recalled.

Asked for his design inspiration, he replied that he never really gave it any serious intellectual thought, preferring spontaneous incidents to spark ideas and feelings. His ideal woman, he declared, was as indistinct and volatile as he, living for the present and spurning retrospectives or fashion revivals. He studied the contemporary woman in the street, her attitude, her clothes, movements, and accessories.

Perhaps Coveri's strongest and most recurrent theme was in his use of paillettes or sequins. Each collection produced a new garment in the fabric, a bright red skin-tight all-in-one, for instance, or a full-length evening dress, or it promoted a new development in the fabric, such as stretch sequin or mixtures of matte and shine. Other favorite fabrics included Lycra and stretch satin, superfine linen, silk, and cotton poplin. The young, sporty Coveri woman's silhouette seemed to always fluctuate between cling or fluidity, with a recurrent ethnic theme interpreted in a fresh and contemporary way. This led journalist Hebe Dorsey to dub Coveri the "Italian Kenzo" in the Herald Tribune.

In a 1978 interview Coveri declared a disdain for the usual work methods of a fashion designer, adding that he hated to draw or do fittings. His approach was very immediate: ideas would come in torrents during long, sleepless nights and were sketched out rapidly the next day. Models were also dressed and styled at the last minute, the outcome on the catwalk being directed by his mood at the time. "I probably make and will continue to make dreadful mistakes," he explained. His mistakes, however, were obviously not serious enough to prevent his establishment as one of Italy's most famous and successful fashion names.

Although Enrico Coveri died of a stroke in 1990, at the age of 38, the business was continued by his family. Under the direction of his sister and a chosen design team, successive collections continued to evoke Coveri's acknowledged fashion legacy.

—Kevin Almond

COX, Patrick

Canadian footwear designer working in London

Born: Edmonton, Canada, 19 March 1963. Education: Studied at Cordwainers College, Hackney, London, 1983–85. Career: Established firm in London and designed collections for Bodymap, Vivienne Westwood, John Galliano, and others, from 1987; London shop opened, 1991; hired CEO from Hermès, 1995; ran controversial suicide-themed ad for footwear, 1999; introduced first signature fragrance, 2000. Awards: Accessory Designer of the Year, British Fashion awards, 1994 and 1995; British Marie Claire Accessory Designer of the Year, 1996; Fashion Medal of Honor by the Footwear Association of New York, 1996. Address: 30 Sloane Street, London SW1X 9NJ, England.

PUBLICATIONS

On COX:

Books

- McDowell, Colin, Shoes: Fashion and Fantasy, New York, 1989.
 Trasko, Mary, Heavenly Soles: Extraordinary Twentieth Century Shoes, New York, 1989.
 Bloch, Phillip, Elements of Style, New York, 1998.

Callan, Georgina O'Hara, Dictionary of Fashion and Fashion Designers New York, 1998.

Doe, Tamzin, Patrick Cox: Wit, Irony and Footwear, New York, 1998.

Articles

- "Shoe Shines," in Elle (London), March 1987.
 Rumbold, Judy, "The Last Shall Be First," in The Guardian (London), 21 September 1987.
 Thackara, John, "Put Your Foot in It," in The Observer Magazine (London), 22 November 1987.
 Lender, Heidi, "Foot Fetish: Patrick Cox's Wild and Woolly Shoes Have Come to Paris," in W, August 1989.
 "Best Foot Forward" in The Guardian (London), 10 June 1991.
 "Patrick Cox," in DR: The Fashion Business (London), 2 November 1991.
 "Shoe Shine Boy," in Toronto Life Fashion, December/January 1991–92.
 "Shoe King," in For Him (London), April 1992.
 "Taming of the Shoe," in The Evening Standard (London), 30 June 1992.
 "ASA Blasts Patrick Cox for Tasteless 'Suicide' Shoe Ad," Marketing Week, 11 March 1999.
 "Fall Fashion—Just One Word: Plastics," in the Wall Street Journal, 20 September 1999.
 Johnson, Jo, "Getting A Sure Footing in Foreign Markets," in Management Today, November 1999.
 "Getting High," in European Cosmetic Markets, September 2000.

* * *

"My early shoes stick in people's minds," Patrick Cox has said, "but things are getting more refined." Those who may remember him as the devoted nightclubber of the early 1980s might have been surprised to find him, a decade later, presiding over the salon atmosphere of his shoeshop-cum-antiques emporium in London. Patrick Cox grew up, but also went beyond the image of the shoemaker with "street credibility," designing for Vivienne Westwood, John Galliano, et al. He survived the designer decade of the 1980s and emerged in the early 1990s with his ability to wittily reinterpret traditional styling, still constantly in tune with contemporary fashion.

Cox's fascination with the British fashion scene brought him to London, rather than the obvious footwear design centers of Italy. He enrolled at Cordwainers College, Hackney, London to study, but soon found college life was less rewarding than meeting and making contacts within the London club world. His involvement with the music and fashion scene brought him the chance to design for Vivienne Westwood's first solo collection, whilst he was still at college. "I used to shop at Westwood's quite a lot and my flatmate David was her assistant," he recalled. "Six weeks before the show someone realized nothing had been done about shoes and David suggested that I could probably help.... My gold platform shoes with large knots went down a treat. Everyone noticed them—you couldn't miss them really—and my other commissions have followed from there."

was as indistinct and volatile as he, living for the present and spurning retrospectives or fashion revivals. He studied the contemporary woman in the street, her attitude, her clothes, movements, and accessories.

Perhaps Coveri's strongest and most recurrent theme was in his use of paillettes or sequins. Each collection produced a new garment in the fabric, a bright red skin-tight all-in-one, for instance, or a full-length evening dress, or it promoted a new development in the fabric, such as stretch sequin or mixtures of matte and shine. Other favorite fabrics included Lycra and stretch satin, superfine linen, silk, and cotton poplin. The young, sporty Coveri woman's silhouette seemed to always fluctuate between cling or fluidity, with a recurrent ethnic theme interpreted in a fresh and contemporary way. This led journalist Hebe Dorsey to dub Coveri the "Italian Kenzo" in the Herald Tribune.

In a 1978 interview Coveri declared a disdain for the usual work methods of a fashion designer, adding that he hated to draw or do fittings. His approach was very immediate: ideas would come in torrents during long, sleepless nights and were sketched out rapidly the next day. Models were also dressed and styled at the last minute, the outcome on the catwalk being directed by his mood at the time. "I probably make and will continue to make dreadful mistakes," he explained. His mistakes, however, were obviously not serious enough to prevent his establishment as one of Italy's most famous and successful fashion names.

Although Enrico Coveri died of a stroke in 1990, at the age of 38, the business was continued by his family. Under the direction of his sister and a chosen design team, successive collections continued to evoke Coveri's acknowledged fashion legacy.

—Kevin Almond

COX, Patrick

Canadian footwear designer working in London

Born: Edmonton, Canada, 19 March 1963. Education: Studied at Cordwainers College, Hackney, London, 1983–85. Career: Established firm in London and designed collections for Bodymap, Vivienne Westwood, John Galliano, and others, from 1987; London shop opened, 1991; hired CEO from Hermès, 1995; ran controversial suicide-themed ad for footwear, 1999; introduced first signature fragrance, 2000. Awards: Accessory Designer of the Year, British Fashion awards, 1994 and 1995; British Marie Claire Accessory Designer of the Year, 1996; Fashion Medal of Honor by the Footwear Association of New York, 1996. Address: 30 Sloane Street, London SW1X 9NJ, England.

PUBLICATIONS

On COX:

Books

- McDowell, Colin, Shoes: Fashion and Fantasy, New York, 1989.
 Trasko, Mary, Heavenly Soles: Extraordinary Twentieth Century Shoes, New York, 1989.
 Bloch, Phillip, Elements of Style, New York, 1998.

Callan, Georgina O'Hara, Dictionary of Fashion and Fashion Designers New York, 1998.

Doe, Tamzin, Patrick Cox: Wit, Irony and Footwear, New York, 1998.

Articles

- "Shoe Shines," in Elle (London), March 1987.
 Rumbold, Judy, "The Last Shall Be First," in The Guardian (London), 21 September 1987.
 Thackara, John, "Put Your Foot in It," in The Observer Magazine (London), 22 November 1987.
 Lender, Heidi, "Foot Fetish: Patrick Cox's Wild and Woolly Shoes Have Come to Paris," in W, August 1989.
 "Best Foot Forward" in The Guardian (London), 10 June 1991.
 "Patrick Cox," in DR: The Fashion Business (London), 2 November 1991.
 "Shoe Shine Boy," in Toronto Life Fashion, December/January 1991–92.
 "Shoe King," in For Him (London), April 1992.
 "Taming of the Shoe," in The Evening Standard (London), 30 June 1992.
 "ASA Blasts Patrick Cox for Tasteless 'Suicide' Shoe Ad," Marketing Week, 11 March 1999.
 "Fall Fashion—Just One Word: Plastics," in the Wall Street Journal, 20 September 1999.
 Johnson, Jo, "Getting A Sure Footing in Foreign Markets," in Management Today, November 1999.
 "Getting High," in European Cosmetic Markets, September 2000.

* * *

"My early shoes stick in people's minds," Patrick Cox has said, "but things are getting more refined." Those who may remember him as the devoted nightclubber of the early 1980s might have been surprised to find him, a decade later, presiding over the salon atmosphere of his shoeshop-cum-antiques emporium in London. Patrick Cox grew up, but also went beyond the image of the shoemaker with "street credibility," designing for Vivienne Westwood, John Galliano, et al. He survived the designer decade of the 1980s and emerged in the early 1990s with his ability to wittily reinterpret traditional styling, still constantly in tune with contemporary fashion.

Cox's fascination with the British fashion scene brought him to London, rather than the obvious footwear design centers of Italy. He enrolled at Cordwainers College, Hackney, London to study, but soon found college life was less rewarding than meeting and making contacts within the London club world. His involvement with the music and fashion scene brought him the chance to design for Vivienne Westwood's first solo collection, whilst he was still at college. "I used to shop at Westwood's quite a lot and my flatmate David was her assistant," he recalled. "Six weeks before the show someone realized nothing had been done about shoes and David suggested that I could probably help.... My gold platform shoes with large knots went down a treat. Everyone noticed them—you couldn't miss them really—and my other commissions have followed from there."

Indeed they did: in no time at all he was designing shoes to accompany the collections of the young English designers who were then flavor of the month on the international fashion circuit. Cox shod the feet to fit the willful perversities of Bodymap, the calculated eccentricity of John Galliano, and the ladies-who-lunch chic of Alistair Blair.

Cox went on to design his own label collections with such delightfully named styles as Chain Reaction, Rasta, and Crucifix Court. These were typical, hard-edged classic women's silhouettes given the Cox treatment—chain mesh, silk fringes and crucifixes suspended from the heels. Witty and amusing as these styles were, they had limited appeal and Cox would not have attained his current prominence had he not sought a larger audience.

The launch of his own London shop in 1991 gave Cox the opportunity to show his collections as a whole, displaying the brash alongside the sophisticated. His audience soon came from both the devotees of the off-the-wall fashion experimentation of King's Road and the classic chic of the Sloane Square debutante. Cleverly, his shop was geographically situated between the two.

Selling shoes alongside antiques was a novelty that appealed to the press and boosted Cox's profile. There was something delightful in the presentation of shoes balanced on the arms of Louis XVI gilt chairs or popping out of the drawers of beautiful old dressers. The shoes gained an aura of respectability; a sense of belonging to some tradition, which perfectly complemented Cox's reinterpretation of classic themes. No longer was there a typical Cox customer; they were the young and not so young. Cox took great delight when elderly ladies appreciated his more subtle styling; his women's shoes even rivaled those of Manolo Blahnik in their sophistication—a calculated move.

In contrast, the development his men's footwear was less obvious. Cox has always loved traditional English styling, and commented: "I believe that British men's shoes are the best in the world, so mine are just an evolution from those classic ideas." This evolution kept him close to the spirit of British footwear, if not to the colorways. He reproduced the weight and proportions of the styles whilst exaggerating the soles and fastenings.

Cox is the shoe designer who admits there is little you can do with shoes. The very nature of footwear imposes constraints upon the designer, where there are fewer problems for the clothing designer. Cox sees shoes as more architectural than clothes; a free standing form with an inside and out. Yet these restrictions do not stop him producing fresh contemporary styles which still work within the perceived framework of what a classic silhouette should be.

During the second half of the 1990s, Cox was at a crossroads. He had lost some of the cachet associated with his Wannabe brand, but did not, as a self-financed company, have the resources to step to the next level and compete with other luxury goods brands. His margins were low compared to other companies and he spent a high nine percent of sales on advertising. He continued to enhance his footwear line; in spring/summer 1997, for example, he added a jelly boot to his colorful jelly wedges and sandals. Meanwhile, he entered the apparel market, introducing a small clothing line for men and women in 1995. By fall 1999 his London runway show featured items such as $363 neoprene pants and a $295 black cotton-and-rubber-ribbed sweater. His entry into apparel has been credited with moving men's clothing away from the staid elegance associated with French designers to a funkier tailored look. The women's apparel is brightly colored with a fun, comfortable sensibility.

The designer also extended distribution in the mid- to late 1990s by opening stores and boutiques throughout Europe, North America, and Asia, including an 800-square-foot section at the Tokyo department store Isetan that carried his whole line of footwear, apparel, and accessories. He also opened a Tokyo office to work more closely with his Japanese licensees, as well as a New York showroom. The latter closed; many observers believe he moved into the U.S. market too quickly.

As of 1999 the designer's wholly owned business, Patrick Cox International, had annual turnover of £19 million ($30 million), earned not only from his flagship footwear line but from apparel, jewelry, bags, and ties. (The Wannabe loafer is not the trendsetter it was, but still accounted for about half of Cox's shoe sales in the late 1990s.) That same year, Cox was widely criticized for a two-page spread in the glossy men's magazine FHM, showing the feet of a man who appeared to have hung himself. Critics called the suicide-themed depiction "tasteless."

Cox announced his first fragrance line for men and women, "High," in partnership with Paris-based IFF in 2000. It debuted at the upscale British department store Harvey Nichols before being introduced into Asian markets. The scent typifies the Cox image: fun, addictive, and "of the moment."

—Chris Hill; updated by Karen Raugust

C.P. COMPANY

Italian design house

Based in the Emilia-Romagna region of Italy, C.P. Company produces menswear fashions designed principally by Massimo Osti; Company History: Introduced women's line, mid-1990s; U.S. subsidiary called C.P. Company Sportswear Inc.; purchased by the Rivettis and their Sportswear Company of Italy, 1993; Moreno Ferrari took over as designer from Osti, mid-1990s; closed New York flagship store, 1996; introduced fabrics containing metals such as copper and titanium, 1998; opened London flagship, 2000; launched Transformables, jackets that inflate into furniture, 2001. Exhibition: Uniform: Order and Disorder, P.S.1/Museum of Modern Art, Pitti Immagine, 2001. Company Address: Via Confine 2161, 41017 Ravarino, Italy.

PUBLICATIONS

On C.P. COMPANY:

Books

Rinaldi, Paolo, ed., monograph on Carlo Rivetti, Milan, 2001.

Articles

Bober, Joanna, "C.P. Company's City of Women," in WWD, 29 September 1994.

Indeed they did: in no time at all he was designing shoes to accompany the collections of the young English designers who were then flavor of the month on the international fashion circuit. Cox shod the feet to fit the willful perversities of Bodymap, the calculated eccentricity of John Galliano, and the ladies-who-lunch chic of Alistair Blair.

Cox went on to design his own label collections with such delightfully named styles as Chain Reaction, Rasta, and Crucifix Court. These were typical, hard-edged classic women's silhouettes given the Cox treatment—chain mesh, silk fringes and crucifixes suspended from the heels. Witty and amusing as these styles were, they had limited appeal and Cox would not have attained his current prominence had he not sought a larger audience.

The launch of his own London shop in 1991 gave Cox the opportunity to show his collections as a whole, displaying the brash alongside the sophisticated. His audience soon came from both the devotees of the off-the-wall fashion experimentation of King's Road and the classic chic of the Sloane Square debutante. Cleverly, his shop was geographically situated between the two.

Selling shoes alongside antiques was a novelty that appealed to the press and boosted Cox's profile. There was something delightful in the presentation of shoes balanced on the arms of Louis XVI gilt chairs or popping out of the drawers of beautiful old dressers. The shoes gained an aura of respectability; a sense of belonging to some tradition, which perfectly complemented Cox's reinterpretation of classic themes. No longer was there a typical Cox customer; they were the young and not so young. Cox took great delight when elderly ladies appreciated his more subtle styling; his women's shoes even rivaled those of Manolo Blahnik in their sophistication—a calculated move.

In contrast, the development his men's footwear was less obvious. Cox has always loved traditional English styling, and commented: "I believe that British men's shoes are the best in the world, so mine are just an evolution from those classic ideas." This evolution kept him close to the spirit of British footwear, if not to the colorways. He reproduced the weight and proportions of the styles whilst exaggerating the soles and fastenings.

Cox is the shoe designer who admits there is little you can do with shoes. The very nature of footwear imposes constraints upon the designer, where there are fewer problems for the clothing designer. Cox sees shoes as more architectural than clothes; a free standing form with an inside and out. Yet these restrictions do not stop him producing fresh contemporary styles which still work within the perceived framework of what a classic silhouette should be.

During the second half of the 1990s, Cox was at a crossroads. He had lost some of the cachet associated with his Wannabe brand, but did not, as a self-financed company, have the resources to step to the next level and compete with other luxury goods brands. His margins were low compared to other companies and he spent a high nine percent of sales on advertising. He continued to enhance his footwear line; in spring/summer 1997, for example, he added a jelly boot to his colorful jelly wedges and sandals. Meanwhile, he entered the apparel market, introducing a small clothing line for men and women in 1995. By fall 1999 his London runway show featured items such as $363 neoprene pants and a $295 black cotton-and-rubber-ribbed sweater. His entry into apparel has been credited with moving men's clothing away from the staid elegance associated with French designers to a funkier tailored look. The women's apparel is brightly colored with a fun, comfortable sensibility.

The designer also extended distribution in the mid- to late 1990s by opening stores and boutiques throughout Europe, North America, and Asia, including an 800-square-foot section at the Tokyo department store Isetan that carried his whole line of footwear, apparel, and accessories. He also opened a Tokyo office to work more closely with his Japanese licensees, as well as a New York showroom. The latter closed; many observers believe he moved into the U.S. market too quickly.

As of 1999 the designer's wholly owned business, Patrick Cox International, had annual turnover of £19 million ($30 million), earned not only from his flagship footwear line but from apparel, jewelry, bags, and ties. (The Wannabe loafer is not the trendsetter it was, but still accounted for about half of Cox's shoe sales in the late 1990s.) That same year, Cox was widely criticized for a two-page spread in the glossy men's magazine FHM, showing the feet of a man who appeared to have hung himself. Critics called the suicide-themed depiction "tasteless."

Cox announced his first fragrance line for men and women, "High," in partnership with Paris-based IFF in 2000. It debuted at the upscale British department store Harvey Nichols before being introduced into Asian markets. The scent typifies the Cox image: fun, addictive, and "of the moment."

—Chris Hill; updated by Karen Raugust

C.P. COMPANY

Italian design house

Based in the Emilia-Romagna region of Italy, C.P. Company produces menswear fashions designed principally by Massimo Osti; Company History: Introduced women's line, mid-1990s; U.S. subsidiary called C.P. Company Sportswear Inc.; purchased by the Rivettis and their Sportswear Company of Italy, 1993; Moreno Ferrari took over as designer from Osti, mid-1990s; closed New York flagship store, 1996; introduced fabrics containing metals such as copper and titanium, 1998; opened London flagship, 2000; launched Transformables, jackets that inflate into furniture, 2001. Exhibition: Uniform: Order and Disorder, P.S.1/Museum of Modern Art, Pitti Immagine, 2001. Company Address: Via Confine 2161, 41017 Ravarino, Italy.

PUBLICATIONS

On C.P. COMPANY:

Books

Rinaldi, Paolo, ed., monograph on Carlo Rivetti, Milan, 2001.

Articles

Bober, Joanna, "C.P. Company's City of Women," in WWD, 29 September 1994.

- Socha, Miles, "C.P. Company is Vacating Flatiron Location," in DNR, 22 August 1996.
- Lohrer, Robert, "C.P. Relaunches Sportswear with a Twist," in DNR, 2 February 1998.
- Fallon, James, "C.P. Company to Open Freestanding London Store," in DNR, 17 November 1999.
- Ilari, Allessandra, "Italian Manufacturers Adjusting Product to Suit American Tastes," in DNR, 3 January 2000.
- Smith, Claire, "Pret-a-Voyager: Novelty Travel Fashion," available online at Virgin.net, www.Virgin.net, 19 December 2000.

* * *

Massimo Osti, long synonymous with C.P. Company, represented what C.P. Company stood for. He chose to live and work in his native Bologna, Italy, a university town populated by a young, international set. C.P. Company's headquarters is situated in the Emilia-Romagna region of Italy, renowned for its cuisine and local produce. As such, it—and Massimo Osti—were far removed from the hustle and bustle of Milan.

While Italian fashion designers have a propensity for generating myths around their collections, Osti's approach was in stark contrast to this prevailing trend. Osti conjured up no myths and was proud of it. He fashioned his collection not only from an aesthetic point of view but, first and foremost, from a functional one. Osti stuck close to his roots, and lived an understated lifestyle. Unlike some of his better-known counterparts, he was never in the limelight. He did not hold fashion shows, and his catalogues highlighted only clothes, with no glamorous models or exotic locations and no fancy studio lighting.

Osti was against artifice in any form; he did not consider himself to be a true designer, simply occupied with mastering the technical challenge of his line—specifically, the fabrics and finishes. He showed a new line twice a year but never referred to his output as a collection; rather, they were "pieces." There was never any uniting theme or story in the C.P. Company line.

The designer's working uniform consisted of a navy C.P. silk shirt and a pair of navy Stone Island jeans, with perhaps a navy tie. Osti loved to sail and even had a soccer field on his property. Hence, as a sportsman, he understood the need for performance sportswear. All his woven fabrics for C.P. Company were garment-washed, and he started using this process long before it was the rage in the men's sportswear industry. He was also one of the first to use water-repellent coatings on his fabrics, a process now standard on outerwear.

What would otherwise be a delicate item—such as a burlap linen raincoat—would be coated with polyurethane to make it practically indestructible. An indigo denim shirt would be garment-bleached and enzyme-washed to have the feel of silk. Such was the essence of Osti's philosophy, if he were willing to articulate one: to take fine, even luxury fabrics, and to treat them in such a way that they could be worn nonchalantly—or to take common fabrics and give them a luxury finish.

C.P. Company has been the essence of casual elegance and rugged versatility. It is stylish, never trendy, ideal for the man with good taste, a modicum of style, and a love of the finer things in life. Men who wear C.P. Company are averse to displaying designer labels, preferring instead to appear well dressed in an unself-conscious way. They also have an intellectual bent and are not impressed with flashy things. In other words, C.P. Company's customers were very much like Osti, who chose the Flatiron Building as the location for the company's New York store not only because of its architectural and historical significance, but because it was slightly off the beaten path, setting C.P. Company apart from the pack.

For over 20 years, Osti did for men's sportswear what perhaps Balenciaga did for women's couture. He honed it almost to a science, becoming the standard against which many other sportswear firms measured themselves. There is a strong probability that any novelty in finishing or dyeing one may encounter in the men's market has been tested—and probably developed—first by Osti. He was as thorough as they come in the area of fabric research, having at his disposal an archive of tens of thousands of items of used clothing, what he referred to as his "inspirational muse," and the "conscience" of the past. He deeply respected the styles of the past and strove to perfect them for the future. Although his fabrics were novel, his silhouettes were consistently classic, with an appealing lived-in quality.

For many years, the C.P. Company label carried the slogan "Ideas from Massimo Osti," and that in itself spoke volumes about the pragmatic approach of the line's designer. Yet C.P. Company underwent major changes in both ownership and design leadership at the end of the 20th century. Both the company and its sister brand, Stone Island, formerly owned by the Italian apparel powerhouse GFT, were purchased in 1993 by Carlo and Christina Rivetti, who operated the brands through their Sportswear Company of Italy. By the mid-1990s, founder Massimo Osti had moved on to other endeavors, and the designer Moreno Ferrari was established in his place. Despite these changes, the C.P. Company brand retained its focus on technical innovation, especially in the development of new materials, and fashion designs followed the dictates of the fabric.

In the mid-1990s, the company publicized its plans for a broad retail expansion, spearheaded by its Flatiron district store in New York. Over the years, it honed its expectations, opening flagship stores only in its two leading markets, the UK (London) and Italy (Milan), along with a smaller store in St. Tropez, France. The brands were also featured in freestanding stores in countries such as Japan and Korea. The New York outlet was shuttered in 1996. Although C.P. Company has periodically talked of opening another store in New York, it had not yet come to pass as of 2001.

The firm's retail spaces feature both C.P. Company and Stone Island branded sportswear items for men as well as C.P.'s women's sportswear range. As of 2000, the company sold through a total of 420 retail doors worldwide, including Bloomingdale's and Barneys New York according to the Daily News Record in January 2000.

Ferrari became Osti's focus, emphasizing durability and utilitarianism over fashion fads. In his fall-winter 1998/1999 collection, he reinvigorated some of the characteristics that had helped boost the brand's sales in the 1980s, notably a series of blousons designed for wary urban consumers. As DNR described the line in February 1998, it included one item (called "Metropolis") with an antimog mask, computer, mobile phone, and pockets for documents; another ("Life") with a noiseproof headset; and a third ("Munch") with a personal safety alarm. The last was inspired by Edouard Munch's famous painting, The Scream.

The year 1998 also brought the introduction of fabrics composed of copper, steel, carbon, and titanium initially intended to give a futuristic slant to the garments. The Italian journal Interni noted in June 2001 that these materials also provided performance advantages and a distinctive look and feel (light-reflective, movement-highlighting, crumpled-casual vintage) making them an integral part of the collection today.

For the 2001 season, C.P. Company's reputation for innovation moved to the foreground with its Transformables line, consisting of inflatable items that change nearly instantaneously from wearable objects into furniture. Packaged with an air compressor that could be plugged into a car's lighter, the line included jackets that become armchairs, mattress-tent combinations, sleeping bags, hammocks, and inflatable seats, representing the ultimate in convenient and minimalist travel gear.

—Vicki Vasipoulos; updated by Karen Raugust

CRAHAY, Jules-François

French designer

Born: Liège, Belgium, 21 May 1917. Education: Studied fashion and art in Paris, 1934–35; worked in his mother's dressmaking salon, Liège, 1936–39; salesman, Jane Regny, Paris, circa 1939. Military Service: Performed military service, taken prisoner of war in Germany, 1940–44. Career: Opened own fashion house, Paris, 1951

Jules-François Crahay, designed for Nina Ricci's 1962 "Tomboy" collection. © Bettmann/CORBIS.

(closed); designer, Nina Ricci, Paris, 1952–63; joined Lanvin, Paris, 1963; head designer, 1964–84; formed ready-to-wear company, Japan, 1985. Awards: Neiman Marcus award, Dallas, 1962; Maison Blanche award, New Orleans, 1963; Dé d'Or award, 1984. Died: 5 January 1988, in Monte Carlo.

PUBLICATIONS

On CRAHAY:

Books

Stegemeyer, Anne, Who's Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.

Articles

"Le Dé d'Or à Jules-François Crahay: vingt ans de création," in L'Officiel (Paris), September 1984.

"Jules-François Crahay Dead at 70," in WWD, 7 January 1988.

Obituary, "Jules-François Crahay," in The Observer (London), 31 January 1988.

* * *

Jules-François Crahay made his name as a designer, not through the establishment of a label under his own name, but through his work for two of the more elegant Parisian haute couture houses, Nina Ricci and Lanvin. His polished, graceful eveningwear, young and unrestrained, was particularly sought out by many soignée French society ladies in the 1950s, 1960s, and 1970s.

Crahay is an interesting, well-known example of many designers who worked for fashion houses in virtual anonymity. It should be remembered that many couture and ready-to-wear fashion houses have been supported by a vast retinue of designers and assistant designers, whose talent and vision have elevated the established name of a house into the annals of fashion history.

Crahay was born in Liège, France, in 1917, to a dressmaker mother and industrialist father. After attending university and a fashion design school in Paris, from 1934 to 1935, he returned to Liège and a position in his mother's dressmaking business, remaining there until 1951 when he was offered a position as salesman at the house of Jane Regny in Paris.

In 1952 Nina Ricci employed Crahay as a dress designer. Initially, he assisted Ricci with the collections and reorganized and rejuvenated the workshops. He was eventually entrusted with the ready-to-wear and presented his first collection in 1959. The range proved a peak in Crahay's design career. It featured low plunging necklines that foresaw the gypsy styles of the early 1960s; it also highlighted Crahay's unique understanding of pattern cutting, cloth, and garment construction.

In October 1963 Crahay succeeded Antonio del Castillo as the designer at Lanvin in Paris. Jeanne Lanvin had created her Maison de Couture in 1889 and since then it had conveyed the prestige and traditional image of French elegance. Crahay did little to revolutionize this tradition; instead he emphasized and flattered it. His first collection for the house, spring/summer 1964, met with an enthusiastic response from both buyers and the international press, and verified his position as one of the top Parisian designers, though he did not work under his own name.

Crahay was one of the first designers to glamorize trousers for eveningwear. Elegant slacks, in sequined or pleated silk, proved that these materials also provided performance advantages and a distinctive look and feel (light-reflective, movement-highlighting, crumpled-casual vintage) making them an integral part of the collection today.

For the 2001 season, C.P. Company's reputation for innovation moved to the foreground with its Transformables line, consisting of inflatable items that change nearly instantaneously from wearable objects into furniture. Packaged with an air compressor that could be plugged into a car's lighter, the line included jackets that become armchairs, mattress-tent combinations, sleeping bags, hammocks, and inflatable seats, representing the ultimate in convenient and minimalist travel gear.

—Vicki Vasipoulos; updated by Karen Raugust

CRAHAY, Jules-François

French designer

Born: Liège, Belgium, 21 May 1917. Education: Studied fashion and art in Paris, 1934–35; worked in his mother's dressmaking salon, Liège, 1936–39; salesman, Jane Regny, Paris, circa 1939. Military Service: Performed military service, taken prisoner of war in Germany, 1940–44. Career: Opened own fashion house, Paris, 1951

Jules-François Crahay, designed for Nina Ricci's 1962 "Tomboy" collection. © Bettmann/CORBIS.

(closed); designer, Nina Ricci, Paris, 1952–63; joined Lanvin, Paris, 1963; head designer, 1964–84; formed ready-to-wear company, Japan, 1985. Awards: Neiman Marcus award, Dallas, 1962; Maison Blanche award, New Orleans, 1963; Dé d'Or award, 1984. Died: 5 January 1988, in Monte Carlo.

PUBLICATIONS

On CRAHAY:

Books

Stegemeyer, Anne, Who's Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.

Articles

"Le Dé d'Or à Jules-François Crahay: vingt ans de création," in L'Officiel (Paris), September 1984.

"Jules-François Crahay Dead at 70," in WWD, 7 January 1988.

Obituary, "Jules-François Crahay," in The Observer (London), 31 January 1988.

* * *

Jules-François Crahay made his name as a designer, not through the establishment of a label under his own name, but through his work for two of the more elegant Parisian haute couture houses, Nina Ricci and Lanvin. His polished, graceful eveningwear, young and unrestrained, was particularly sought out by many soignée French society ladies in the 1950s, 1960s, and 1970s.

Crahay is an interesting, well-known example of many designers who worked for fashion houses in virtual anonymity. It should be remembered that many couture and ready-to-wear fashion houses have been supported by a vast retinue of designers and assistant designers, whose talent and vision have elevated the established name of a house into the annals of fashion history.

Crahay was born in Liège, France, in 1917, to a dressmaker mother and industrialist father. After attending university and a fashion design school in Paris, from 1934 to 1935, he returned to Liège and a position in his mother's dressmaking business, remaining there until 1951 when he was offered a position as salesman at the house of Jane Regny in Paris.

In 1952 Nina Ricci employed Crahay as a dress designer. Initially, he assisted Ricci with the collections and reorganized and rejuvenated the workshops. He was eventually entrusted with the ready-to-wear and presented his first collection in 1959. The range proved a peak in Crahay's design career. It featured low plunging necklines that foresaw the gypsy styles of the early 1960s; it also highlighted Crahay's unique understanding of pattern cutting, cloth, and garment construction.

In October 1963 Crahay succeeded Antonio del Castillo as the designer at Lanvin in Paris. Jeanne Lanvin had created her Maison de Couture in 1889 and since then it had conveyed the prestige and traditional image of French elegance. Crahay did little to revolutionize this tradition; instead he emphasized and flattered it. His first collection for the house, spring/summer 1964, met with an enthusiastic response from both buyers and the international press, and verified his position as one of the top Parisian designers, though he did not work under his own name.

Crahay was one of the first designers to glamorize trousers for eveningwear. Elegant slacks, in sequined or pleated silk, proved bestsellers. He also innovated and reintroduced leg o' mutton sleeves in organdy, bejewelled leather gauchos, and alluring jumpsuits for evening. When it came to his studio work he established a reputation as a demanding taskmaster. He adhered to the best haute couture traditions, where nothing was left to chance and original, fine details were researched and executed with the greatest care. When asked about his work he replied simply, "Look at my dresses; they are what I have created and they are much more important than anything I can say."

Crahay's achievements have been recognized with several important fashion awards, including the Neiman Marcus award in 1962. In the early 1970s he succeeded in seeing his own name on a label, when Arkins of New York commissioned him to design a ready-to-wear collection for their department store. Jules-François Crahay died in January 1988, at the age of 70, in Monaco, Monte Carlo.

—Kevin Almond

CUMMINGS, Angela

American jewelry designer

Born: Klagenfurt, Austria, in 1944. Education: Art Academy, Perugia, Italy; Zeichenakademie, Hanau, West Germany. Family: Married Bruce Cummings, 1970. Career: Joined Tiffany & Co., 1967; designed first full jewelry collection under own name, 1975; started Angela Cummings, Inc., 1984; launched first branded in-store boutique, at Bergdorf Goodman, 1984; designed accents for Candie's shoes for charitable line, 1997; designed limited-edition compact for Estée Lauder exhibition, 2001. Address: 730 Fifth Avenue, New York, NY 10019 USA.

PUBLICATIONS

On CUMMINGS:

Books

- Stegemeyer, Anne, Who's Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.
 Loring, John, Tiffany Jewels, New York, 1999.
 Kirkham, Pat and Wendy Kaplan, Women Designers in the U.S.A., 1900–2000: Diversity and Difference, New Haven (CT), 2000.
 Loring, John, Magnificent Tiffany Silver, New York, 2001.

Articles

- Cunningham, Billy and Wendy Murphy, "A Rural Setting for Jewelry Designer Angela Cummings," in Architectural Digest, April 1982.
 Clurman, Shirley, "Look Out, Little Miss Muffet: Angela Cummings Jewelry May Have Designs on You," in People, 13 September 1982.
 Duka, John, "An Angela Cummings Shop," in the New York Times, 21 February 1984.
 Johnson, Sharon, "Breakfast At Tiffany's, Lunch at Bergdorf's," in Working Woman, May 1984.
 "Angela Cummings's Dishes are a Feast for the Eyes: A Jewelry Designer Who Creates Gems for the Table," in Chicago Tribune, 26 October 1986.

- Beard, Patricia, "Country Charm," in Harper's Bazaar, October 1990.
 "Jewelry Designers Do Candie's," in Women's Wear Daily, 29 September 1997.
 Klensch, Elsa, "Cummings' Jewelry Springs from Nature," on CNN Interactive, 11 December 1997.
 —, "Comfortable and Beautiful: Cummings' New Jewelry Combines Abstract Design, Soft Finishes," on CNN Interactive, 21 February 1999.
 Kampmann, Anne, "The Unique Style of Angela Cummings," online at LuxuryFinder.com, 2001.

* * *

Born in Klagenfurt, Austria, in 1944, Angela Cummings moved to the United States with her family at age three. She returned to Europe to study at the Art Academy in Perugia, Italy, and in 1967 earned degrees in goldsmithing and gemology from Zeichenakademie in Hanau, West Germany. Upon graduation at age 23, she moved to New York and immediately joined Tiffany & Company, where she remained until 1984. After creating her first full collection under her own name in 1975, she became one of a small group of well-known, innovative jewelry designers (along with Paloma Picasso, Jean Schlumberger, and Elsa Peretti) associated with Tiffany.

Several representative examples of Cummings' work for Tiffany were featured in a September 1982 People magazine article, including a $38,000 gold-and-diamond spiderweb necklace; $12,000 earrings made of gold and diamonds and shaped like elm leaves; $150-and-up brooches of 18-karat gold, inspired by seagulls; a $5,800 crocodile bracelet fashioned out of 18-karat gold; and a $1.5 million geometric emerald and diamond necklace. One of her bestselling jewelry pieces, a $3,875 petal necklace, was inspired when Cummings held a rose in her hand and accidentally crushed it when surprised by a ringing telephone. According to Working Woman magazine, her line was bringing in $10 million in revenues by 1982.

Cummings was known mainly for working in 18-karat gold as well as platinum and sterling silver, highlighted with exquisite gems. But she often mixed these materials with unconventional counterpoints such as wood. She experimented with classic jewelry-making techniques, such as inlaying precious metals into iron, a process known as damascene, and broke the rules of high-end jewelry early in her career by using lots of color.

The inspiration for Cummings' work is rooted in nature. She incorporates forms such as ginkgo leaves, spiderwebs, vines, shells, feathers, sea foam, dragonflies, and orchids into her jewelry. Cummings is known for her innovation, trompe l'oeil effects, intricate designs, attention to the surface of the metal, and her concern with the smallest of details. Her work has been praised by critics as well as loved by customers.

In 1984 Cummings left Tiffany to form her own business with her husband, Bruce Cummings, a former Tiffany gemologist whom she had married in 1970. One of the reasons Cummings decided to leave Tiffany was to have more control over her work. She wanted to expand into other categories such as tabletop accessories, leather goods, and flatware, and she hoped to expand her price range so her pieces would be more affordable. She opened her first boutique across the street from Tiffany at the upscale Bergdorf Goodman department store. The 500-square-foot space, a first for a jewelry designer at the Fifth Avenue retailer, was located in the middle of the first floor. Soon bestsellers. He also innovated and reintroduced leg o' mutton sleeves in organdy, bejewelled leather gauchos, and alluring jumpsuits for evening. When it came to his studio work he established a reputation as a demanding taskmaster. He adhered to the best haute couture traditions, where nothing was left to chance and original, fine details were researched and executed with the greatest care. When asked about his work he replied simply, "Look at my dresses; they are what I have created and they are much more important than anything I can say."

Crahay's achievements have been recognized with several important fashion awards, including the Neiman Marcus award in 1962. In the early 1970s he succeeded in seeing his own name on a label, when Arkins of New York commissioned him to design a ready-to-wear collection for their department store. Jules-François Crahay died in January 1988, at the age of 70, in Monaco, Monte Carlo.

—Kevin Almond

CUMMINGS, Angela

American jewelry designer

Born: Klagenfurt, Austria, in 1944. Education: Art Academy, Perugia, Italy; Zeichenakademie, Hanau, West Germany. Family: Married Bruce Cummings, 1970. Career: Joined Tiffany & Co., 1967; designed first full jewelry collection under own name, 1975; started Angela Cummings, Inc., 1984; launched first branded in-store boutique, at Bergdorf Goodman, 1984; designed accents for Candie's shoes for charitable line, 1997; designed limited-edition compact for Estée Lauder exhibition, 2001. Address: 730 Fifth Avenue, New York, NY 10019 USA.

PUBLICATIONS

On CUMMINGS:

Books

- Stegemeyer, Anne, Who's Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.
 Loring, John, Tiffany Jewels, New York, 1999.
 Kirkham, Pat and Wendy Kaplan, Women Designers in the U.S.A., 1900–2000: Diversity and Difference, New Haven (CT), 2000.
 Loring, John, Magnificent Tiffany Silver, New York, 2001.

Articles

- Cunningham, Billy and Wendy Murphy, "A Rural Setting for Jewelry Designer Angela Cummings," in Architectural Digest, April 1982.
 Clurman, Shirley, "Look Out, Little Miss Muffet: Angela Cummings Jewelry May Have Designs on You," in People, 13 September 1982.
 Duka, John, "An Angela Cummings Shop," in the New York Times, 21 February 1984.
 Johnson, Sharon, "Breakfast At Tiffany's, Lunch at Bergdorf's," in Working Woman, May 1984.
 "Angela Cummings's Dishes are a Feast for the Eyes: A Jewelry Designer Who Creates Gems for the Table," in Chicago Tribune, 26 October 1986.

- Beard, Patricia, "Country Charm," in Harper's Bazaar, October 1990.
 "Jewelry Designers Do Candie's," in Women's Wear Daily, 29 September 1997.
 Klensch, Elsa, "Cummings' Jewelry Springs from Nature," on CNN Interactive, 11 December 1997.
 —, "Comfortable and Beautiful: Cummings' New Jewelry Combines Abstract Design, Soft Finishes," on CNN Interactive, 21 February 1999.
 Kampmann, Anne, "The Unique Style of Angela Cummings," online at LuxuryFinder.com, 2001.

* * *

Born in Klagenfurt, Austria, in 1944, Angela Cummings moved to the United States with her family at age three. She returned to Europe to study at the Art Academy in Perugia, Italy, and in 1967 earned degrees in goldsmithing and gemology from Zeichenakademie in Hanau, West Germany. Upon graduation at age 23, she moved to New York and immediately joined Tiffany & Company, where she remained until 1984. After creating her first full collection under her own name in 1975, she became one of a small group of well-known, innovative jewelry designers (along with Paloma Picasso, Jean Schlumberger, and Elsa Peretti) associated with Tiffany.

Several representative examples of Cummings' work for Tiffany were featured in a September 1982 People magazine article, including a $38,000 gold-and-diamond spiderweb necklace; $12,000 earrings made of gold and diamonds and shaped like elm leaves; $150-and-up brooches of 18-karat gold, inspired by seagulls; a $5,800 crocodile bracelet fashioned out of 18-karat gold; and a $1.5 million geometric emerald and diamond necklace. One of her bestselling jewelry pieces, a $3,875 petal necklace, was inspired when Cummings held a rose in her hand and accidentally crushed it when surprised by a ringing telephone. According to Working Woman magazine, her line was bringing in $10 million in revenues by 1982.

Cummings was known mainly for working in 18-karat gold as well as platinum and sterling silver, highlighted with exquisite gems. But she often mixed these materials with unconventional counterpoints such as wood. She experimented with classic jewelry-making techniques, such as inlaying precious metals into iron, a process known as damascene, and broke the rules of high-end jewelry early in her career by using lots of color.

The inspiration for Cummings' work is rooted in nature. She incorporates forms such as ginkgo leaves, spiderwebs, vines, shells, feathers, sea foam, dragonflies, and orchids into her jewelry. Cummings is known for her innovation, trompe l'oeil effects, intricate designs, attention to the surface of the metal, and her concern with the smallest of details. Her work has been praised by critics as well as loved by customers.

In 1984 Cummings left Tiffany to form her own business with her husband, Bruce Cummings, a former Tiffany gemologist whom she had married in 1970. One of the reasons Cummings decided to leave Tiffany was to have more control over her work. She wanted to expand into other categories such as tabletop accessories, leather goods, and flatware, and she hoped to expand her price range so her pieces would be more affordable. She opened her first boutique across the street from Tiffany at the upscale Bergdorf Goodman department store. The 500-square-foot space, a first for a jewelry designer at the Fifth Avenue retailer, was located in the middle of the first floor. Soon

Cummings had other boutiques in stores such as Bloomingdale's and Macy's San Francisco.

Cummings' first collection as an independent included a great deal of silver—she had not been allowed to sign her silver works at Tiffany—as well her trademark gold. A February 1984 article in the New York Times about her new boutique detailed several of her new, unique pieces: a linked necklace made of gold with an etched woodgrain surface; a matching cuff and collar of inlaid black opals; an inlaid black opal necklace of gold, with links shaped like orchids; gold and burnished silver pieces inlaid with a zebra pattern of black jade; and a necklace of South Sea pearls with a 4.5-carat (total) diamond clasp. Although the collection included many of the high-end pieces for which Cummings had long been known (the top price was $117,000), there were also items as low as $30. In addition, she mirrored some of the same designs in different media to appeal to a broad range of customers. Thirty percent of the items were nonjewelry pieces, including tableware and leather goods; she has since moved into other categories such as watches. Cummings also established international operations in Japan and elsewhere.

In 1997 Candie's shoe company partnered with several jewelry designers to create a line of footwear to benefit the American Cancer Society. Cummings designed metal accessories for four styles of shoes in the line, each pair of which retailed for $180 to $350. Her simple accents for the slip-ons included a single, squared gold button at the top of the shoe.

Style and fashion guru Elsa Klensch of CNN has noted that many Cummings pieces during the late 1990s featured movement, such as through stems that twisted and curving leaves. One necklace called Breakers (1997) was composed of a series of waves going around the neck. The slightly asymmetrical quality of many of Cummings' pieces is not only eye-catching but extends this illusion of movement. Some of her creations have been influenced by Asian motifs, such as gold bracelets, earrings, and necklaces with a cloud-like shape incorporating jade into the design. Cummings often designs around a particularly beautiful stone, whether an emerald or a semiprecious stone such as tourmaline or peridot.

Cummings' 1999 collection was described by Klench as more abstract than her organic designs of the past, although they retained their sculptural quality. Cummings combined semiprecious and precious stones with metals, such as peridot with diamonds and gold. Her sense of color was demonstrated in a piece mixing mauve-, brown- and gold-colored black pearls with diamonds that were also slightly tinted in mauve and brown. Cummings' sense of texture was illustrated in the brushed finishes; she has said that to achieve more light in a piece, she would rather use additional diamonds than a highly polished metal.

In 2001 Cummings designed a limited-edition compact called Beautiful Blossom to house an Estée Lauder perfume called aptly titled Beautiful. The work debuted at Estée Lauder's Solid Perfume Compact Exhibit in Washington, D.C., after which it was sold at Bergdorf Goodman and Neiman Marcus.

Although Cummings continues to favor organic designs, she sometimes surprises by adding geometric pieces to her collections. Yet one goal remains constant: the finished piece has to be comfortable. The beauty of an Angela Cummings jewelry design is undisputed, but the comfort it provides to the wearer is always a top priority.

—Karen Raugust

D

DACHÉ, Lilly

American millinery designer

Born: Bègles, France, circa 1904; immigrated to New York, 1924. Education: Left school at 13. Family: Married Jean Després, 1931; children: Suzanne. Career: In Paris, apprenticed with Reboux, later worked for Maison Talbot and Georgette; designer, Darlington's (Philadelphia); millinery saleswoman, Macy's, 1924; saleswoman, The Bonnet Shop, New York, 1924; purchased shop from owner and established own millinery business, 1924; expanded and moved business in 1925, 1928; built Lilly Daché Building, East 56th Street, New York, 1937; added dresses and accessories, introduced fragrances, Drifting and Dashing, 1946; launched own clothing line, 1949; added coats, stockings, cosmetics, early 1950s; ready-to-wear millinery collections Mlle. Lilly and Dachettes introduced, early Lilly Daché, spring 1940 collection: polka-dotted foulard hat with quill. © Bettmann/CORBIS.

1950s; closed business, 1968. Awards: Neiman Marcus award, 1940; Coty American Fashion Critics award, 1943. Died: 31 December 1989, in Louvecienne, France.

PUBLICATIONS

By DACHÉ:

Books

Talking Through My Hats, New York & London, 1946.
Lilly Daché's Glamour Book, New York, 1956.

On DACHÉ:

Books

Morris, Bernadine, and Barbara Walz, The Fashion Makers, New York, 1978.

Milbank, Caroline Rennolds, New York Fashion: The Evolution of American Style, New York, 1989.

McDowell, Colin, Hats: Status, Style, Glamour, London, 1992.
Fashion for America! Designs in the Fashion Institute of Technology, New York, Haslemere, Surrey, 1992.

Stegemeyer, Anne, Who's Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.

Articles

"Lilly Daché," in Current Biography, July 1941.

"Lilly Daché," [obituary] in the New York Times, 2 January 1990.

"Lilly Daché," in Current Biography, March 1990.

* * *

Lilly Daché was the archetypal flamboyant immigrant beloved of Americans and so often taken to their hearts. In approved rags-to-riches fashion, she arrived in New York with a few dollars in her pocket ($13, henceforth her lucky number) in the heady days of the mid-1920s. Twenty years later, her name was as much a household word as any milliner's could be.

Daché's heyday coincided with a period in fashion history, the mid-1930s to the mid-1940s, during which one's hat—one always wore a hat—was often more important than one's frock. Great heights of chic and absurdity were achieved by the milliners of the day: tiny doll's hats perched over one eye, two-tone "Persian" turbans stuck with jewelled daggers, pom-poms of mink or marabout; Daché's hats were amongst the most outrageous of all. Her "complexion veil" was tinted green across the eyes, and blush-rose across the cheeks. For Beatrice Lillie, she made a "hands-across-the-sea" hat, with two clasped hands on the front, for the actress to wear both in England and America.

Lilly Daché, 1945 collection: shantung day dress. © Genevieve Naylor/CORBIS.

Daché's verve and skills attracted a high-profile clientèle of stage and film stars: Marlene Dietrich, Carole Lombard, Joan Crawford, Marion Davies, Gertrude Lawrence—all the big names. She worked with Travis Banton on Hollywood films, providing the hats to top his costumes, as many as 50 for one star for one movie. Often it was she who stuck Carmen Miranda's towering turbans with birds and fruit, and yet more birds and more fruit.

At her New York headquarters, Daché created a setting for herself which now seems the essence of kitsch glamor. Her circular salon was lined with mirrors; she had a silver fitting-room for celebrity brunettes, and a golden one for blondes. For wholesale buyers, she had another circular room padded with tufted pink satin, where she reigned from a leopard-skin divan wearing a leopard-skin jacket and leopard-skin slippers with bells (to warn her girls of her approach, a job later undertaken by her armful of jingling bangles).

Not an early riser, Daché conducted her morning's business from her bed, in the style of an 18th-century levée, dictating letters, buying supplies, designing, and interviewing employees while wrapped in a leopard-skin rug (she also had a robe made from the skins of more of these unfortunate cats, lined with shocking-pink felt). Occasionally business would be conducted from the reasonably modest depths of a neck-high bubble-bath. But Daché, like so many fashionable New Yorkers of her day, professed herself never so happy as when digging around in the garden of her upstate Colonial home.

Daché was one of the so-called “Big Three” New York milliners of her day, the others being John Fredericks and Sally Victor, and as such exerted a powerful influence on the American millinery trade, designing for wholesale manufacturers as well as for personal clients. Her designs sold worldwide and she embarked enthusiastically on promotional tours, accompanied by mountainous luggage and concomitant publicity.

At the height of her fame, Lilly Daché had shops in Chicago and Miami Beach, and employed 150 milliners at her flagship building off Park Avenue in New York City. Daché was a great self-publicist and epitomized the kind of woman to whom her smart American customers aspired. She was chic and flamboyant, and presented herself with self-assured bravado—“I like beautiful shoes in gay colors, with thick platforms and high heels. I like splashy jewellery that clinks when I walk, and I like my earrings big. I am...Lilly Daché, milliner de luxe.”

—Alan J. Flux

DAGWORTHY, Wendy

British designer

Born: Gravesend, Kent, England, 4 March 1950. Education: Northfleet Secondary School; studied at Medway College of Design, 1966–68, and at Hornsey College of Art (now Middlesex University), London, 1968–71; first-class honours. Family: Married Jonathan Prew in August 1973. Career: Designer, Radley, 1971–72; founder, designer, Wendy Dagworthy Ltd., 1972–88; joined London Designer Collections, 1975, director, 1982–90; lecturer in fashion from 1972, including Royal College of Art, London; course director on Fashion BA course at Central St Martin’s College of Art and Design, London, 1989; freelance designer and consultant, Laura Ashley, 1992; exhibitor at Victoria and Albert Museum, London; member of British Fashion Council management committee; speaker at the Fashion Conference, Lagos, Nigeria, 1992; design consultant for Betty Jackson, Liberty Retail Ltd., and Liberty International, 1996–present; Professor of Fashion, the Royal College of Art, London, 1998–present; speaker at many industry functions. Awards: Fil D’Or International Linen award, Monte Carlo, 1985. Address: 18 Melrose Terrace, London W6, England.

PUBLICATIONS

On DAGWORTHY:

Articles

- Polan, Brenda, “The Discreet Charms of a Dagworthy,” in The Guardian (London), 12 November 1981.
- “Influences: Wendy Dagworthy,” in Women’s Journal (London), April 1984.
- Polan, Brenda, “British Open,” in The Guardian (London), 21 March 1985.

_____, “Natural Leaders,” in The Guardian (London), 25 April 1986.

“Face to Face,” in Creative Review (London), June 1986.

“Dagworthy Goes Under,” in Fashion Weekly (London), 24 November 1988.

“The Learning Curve,” in Drapers Record, 29 May 1993.

Duffy, Martha, “On the Cutting Edge,” in Time, 11 November 1996.

Roux, Caroline, “How a Small London Art School Quietly Colonized the World,” in Metropolis (London), October 1999.

* * *

For nearly 20 years Wendy Dagworthy produced bright, easy, wearable separates and established herself as one of the most successful British designers in the wacky world of 1980s fashion. Her style was always distinctive and colourful, incorporating cheerful mixtures of fabrics, patterns, textures and an attention to fine detail; “You wear them, they don’t wear you,” was Dagworthy’s fashion philosophy.

She formed her company in 1972 after one year as a designer for the wholesale firm Radley and a year after graduating from the Hornsey College of Art fashion course, with a first-class honours degree. There was an immediate consumer demand for Dagworthy’s designs, and prestigious international stores soon placed orders. Italy, in particular, proved a lucrative outlet for her very English look and during the early 1980s she was exporting nearly half of her total output to that country.

Dagworthy loved to use vibrant colours and prints, embroidered Caribbean style batiks, mixed with stripes or swirling floral designs in fuchsia, scarlet, and orange. Favourite fabrics were mohairs, strongly textured woven wools, and wool barathea. Her most popular, signature garments were oversize wool coats, back buttoning smocks, circular skirts, and gathered skirts with boldly tied waists, teamed with easy cardigans or wide-cropped jackets. The menswear collections, introduced in the early 1980s adhered to the same lively, colourful themes and quickly emulated the success of the womenswear, being comfortable and easy to wear.

Dagworthy was always been a strong supporter of British fashion design. In 1975 she joined the London Designer Collections, a prestigious collaboration of British designers, supporting and promoting their industry, and became a director in 1982. She was active in British fashion education, both as a lecturer and assessor, participating in design competitions like the Royal Society of Arts awards and the British Fashion awards. She also appeared regularly as fashion consultant to television shows like The Clothes Show, Frocks on the Box, and Good Morning America.

Wendy Dagworthy Ltd. exhibited their seasonal collections at trade shows in London, Milan, New York, and Paris. Her international reputation strengthened each season and her work was recognized with several awards including the Fil d’Or International Linen award in 1985. The Victoria and Albert Museum in London even displays a Wendy Dagworthy outfit in their permanent costume collection.

Dagworthy closed her business in 1988 and in the following year became the course director for the BA fashion program at London’s Central St. Martin’s College of Art and Design, where she remained until 1998. During her tenure, she was instrumental in solidifying the reputation of one of the best-known and most brash fashion schools in the world. In 1998 she became the head professor of fashion at the Royal College of Art, the world’s sole postgraduate-only university leopard-skin rug (she also had a robe made from the skins of more of these unfortunate cats, lined with shocking-pink felt). Occasionally business would be conducted from the reasonably modest depths of a neck-high bubble-bath. But Daché, like so many fashionable New Yorkers of her day, professed herself never so happy as when digging around in the garden of her upstate Colonial home.

Daché was one of the so-called “Big Three” New York milliners of her day, the others being John Fredericks and Sally Victor, and as such exerted a powerful influence on the American millinery trade, designing for wholesale manufacturers as well as for personal clients. Her designs sold worldwide and she embarked enthusiastically on promotional tours, accompanied by mountainous luggage and concomitant publicity.

At the height of her fame, Lilly Daché had shops in Chicago and Miami Beach, and employed 150 milliners at her flagship building off Park Avenue in New York City. Daché was a great self-publicist and epitomized the kind of woman to whom her smart American customers aspired. She was chic and flamboyant, and presented herself with self-assured bravado—“I like beautiful shoes in gay colors, with thick platforms and high heels. I like splashy jewellery that clinks when I walk, and I like my earrings big. I am...Lilly Daché, milliner de luxe.”

—Alan J. Flux

DAGWORTHY, Wendy

British designer

Born: Gravesend, Kent, England, 4 March 1950. Education: Northfleet Secondary School; studied at Medway College of Design, 1966–68, and at Hornsey College of Art (now Middlesex University), London, 1968–71; first-class honours. Family: Married Jonathan Prew in August 1973. Career: Designer, Radley, 1971–72; founder, designer, Wendy Dagworthy Ltd., 1972–88; joined London Designer Collections, 1975, director, 1982–90; lecturer in fashion from 1972, including Royal College of Art, London; course director on Fashion BA course at Central St Martin’s College of Art and Design, London, 1989; freelance designer and consultant, Laura Ashley, 1992; exhibitor at Victoria and Albert Museum, London; member of British Fashion Council management committee; speaker at the Fashion Conference, Lagos, Nigeria, 1992; design consultant for Betty Jackson, Liberty Retail Ltd., and Liberty International, 1996–present; Professor of Fashion, the Royal College of Art, London, 1998–present; speaker at many industry functions. Awards: Fil D’Or International Linen award, Monte Carlo, 1985. Address: 18 Melrose Terrace, London W6, England.

PUBLICATIONS

On DAGWORTHY:

Articles

- Polan, Brenda, “The Discreet Charms of a Dagworthy,” in The Guardian (London), 12 November 1981.
- “Influences: Wendy Dagworthy,” in Women’s Journal (London), April 1984.
- Polan, Brenda, “British Open,” in The Guardian (London), 21 March 1985.

_____, “Natural Leaders,” in The Guardian (London), 25 April 1986.

“Face to Face,” in Creative Review (London), June 1986.

“Dagworthy Goes Under,” in Fashion Weekly (London), 24 November 1988.

“The Learning Curve,” in Drapers Record, 29 May 1993.

Duffy, Martha, “On the Cutting Edge,” in Time, 11 November 1996.

Roux, Caroline, “How a Small London Art School Quietly Colonized the World,” in Metropolis (London), October 1999.

* * *

For nearly 20 years Wendy Dagworthy produced bright, easy, wearable separates and established herself as one of the most successful British designers in the wacky world of 1980s fashion. Her style was always distinctive and colourful, incorporating cheerful mixtures of fabrics, patterns, textures and an attention to fine detail; “You wear them, they don’t wear you,” was Dagworthy’s fashion philosophy.

She formed her company in 1972 after one year as a designer for the wholesale firm Radley and a year after graduating from the Hornsey College of Art fashion course, with a first-class honours degree. There was an immediate consumer demand for Dagworthy’s designs, and prestigious international stores soon placed orders. Italy, in particular, proved a lucrative outlet for her very English look and during the early 1980s she was exporting nearly half of her total output to that country.

Dagworthy loved to use vibrant colours and prints, embroidered Caribbean style batiks, mixed with stripes or swirling floral designs in fuchsia, scarlet, and orange. Favourite fabrics were mohairs, strongly textured woven wools, and wool barathea. Her most popular, signature garments were oversize wool coats, back buttoning smocks, circular skirts, and gathered skirts with boldly tied waists, teamed with easy cardigans or wide-cropped jackets. The menswear collections, introduced in the early 1980s adhered to the same lively, colourful themes and quickly emulated the success of the womenswear, being comfortable and easy to wear.

Dagworthy was always been a strong supporter of British fashion design. In 1975 she joined the London Designer Collections, a prestigious collaboration of British designers, supporting and promoting their industry, and became a director in 1982. She was active in British fashion education, both as a lecturer and assessor, participating in design competitions like the Royal Society of Arts awards and the British Fashion awards. She also appeared regularly as fashion consultant to television shows like The Clothes Show, Frocks on the Box, and Good Morning America.

Wendy Dagworthy Ltd. exhibited their seasonal collections at trade shows in London, Milan, New York, and Paris. Her international reputation strengthened each season and her work was recognized with several awards including the Fil d’Or International Linen award in 1985. The Victoria and Albert Museum in London even displays a Wendy Dagworthy outfit in their permanent costume collection.

Dagworthy closed her business in 1988 and in the following year became the course director for the BA fashion program at London’s Central St. Martin’s College of Art and Design, where she remained until 1998. During her tenure, she was instrumental in solidifying the reputation of one of the best-known and most brash fashion schools in the world. In 1998 she became the head professor of fashion at the Royal College of Art, the world’s sole postgraduate-only university of art and design, where she has remained. Her impact on the fashion program was evident immediately; critics at the RCA's well-received fashion show in 1999 noted her influence.

—Kevin Almond; updated by Karen Raugust

DALLAS, Sarah

British knitwear designer

Born: Bristol, England, 1 August 1951. Education: Studied at Middlesex Polytechnic, 1971–74; Royal College of Art, London, 1974–76. Career: Designed and produced women's knitwear collections under the Sarah Davis label, 1976–88; introduced men's knitwear line, 1987; freelance design work, from 1980; began teaching and lecturing at various institutions; course leader, Royal College of Art, Fashion Knitwear, from 1990; Knitted Textiles, from 1992. Awards: British Design Council award, 1987.

PUBLICATIONS

On DALLAS:

Books

Menkes, Suzy, The Knitwear Revolution, 1983.

Sheard, Stephen, Rowan: Designer Collection Summer and Winter Knitting, 1987.

Sheard, S., The Rowan/Brother Designer Machine Knitting Book, 1987.

Articles

Chubb, Ann, "Knitting it Together with the Skipton Factor," in the Daily Telegraph, August 1982.

"Designer Knits for You," in Pins & Needles, Fall 1982.

"Sarah Dallas Knitwear Collection," in Design, February 1987.

Dodd, Celia, "Knit Wit in Bold Strokes," in Field, April 1987.

*

I feel quite passionately that knitwear should have an identity of its own and be an intrinsic part of fashion rather than an accessory to woven garments. This is something I have always striven to achieve with my own knitwear collections.

Knitwear is incredibly versatile, and is an ideal way of producing your own exclusive fabric, often engineered to suit each garment.... Nothing satisfies me more than to see someone of twenty and someone of sixty wearing the same garment but probably styled in quite a different way.

—Sarah Dallas

* * *

Sarah Dallas is a prominent knitwear designer who ran her own company and now works as a consultant and an educator. It was while studying for a degree in woven textiles that she first became fascinated by the more spontaneous results made possible by hand-knitting. At London's Royal College of Art she studied in the Textile School, but challenged established boundaries to create fashion knitwear.

After graduation, fashion knitwear designers were still quite rare and the knitwear boom was yet to come. Many companies were very conservative in their approach and in order to get her designs into production, Dallas had to set up on her own. Initially she produced knitwear exclusively for the London-based, upmarket fashion shop Bombacha, creating designs made by outworkers on domestic knitting machines. This led to her first independent coordinated fabric and knitwear collection. Building up a market was very time consuming, particularly as it meant shattering preconceptions of the role and potential of knitted garments. Increasing demand for her work led to the decision to move away from hand-knitting to full factory production. The change enabled Dallas to extend her range and output, but also affected the appearance of the fabrics and the finished garments; she did not favor the chunky, earthy look which characterized some hand knits. She was more concerned with creating interesting fabrics suitable for a classic fashion look. For her, fashion knitwear has always been about style.

Dallas' fabrics were usually produced using natural yarns; pure wool for winter and cotton for summer. She had yarns specially spun and dyed in England to match her own specifications and to provide an exact color palette. The basics were the classic neutrals, navy and black, but her talent was in enlivening them with current fashion tones. Black and white were combined in geometric patterns to create simple crew-necked sweaters highlighted by a bright colored handkerchief in a breast pocket—a detail which became a signature of her work.

The Dallas look consisted of bold classic shapes with a feel for current fashion. A concentration on detail and an accent on splashes of bright color characterized each collection. Her ranges sold at the middle and upper ends of the market, with a broad customer profile covering ages 20 to 60. This extensive range was due to the versatility of the look and the uncomplicated styling. Described as "New Classics," her designs won a British Design Council award in 1987.

Since she ceased to work under her own label, Dallas undertook freelance consultancy for British based companies and for those in other manufacturing centres such as Italy, Hong Kong, and China. She designed hand- and machine knit patterns for books and magazines. Much of her work was for Rowan Yarns, of Holmfirth, West Yorkshire, creating patterns for people to knit at home. Her emphasis was still on clean lines and interesting yarns; a minimalist approach concentrating on using every element, yarn, color, and shape to its fullest extent in each design.

Dallas became a course leader of the new M.A. course in Fashion Knitwear and Knitted Textiles at the Royal College of Art in the early 1990s. Her intention was to develop the potential of knitted fabrics and fashion, especially since the recession affected knitwear sales of art and design, where she has remained. Her impact on the fashion program was evident immediately; critics at the RCA's well-received fashion show in 1999 noted her influence.

—Kevin Almond; updated by Karen Raugust

DALLAS, Sarah

British knitwear designer

Born: Bristol, England, 1 August 1951. Education: Studied at Middlesex Polytechnic, 1971–74; Royal College of Art, London, 1974–76. Career: Designed and produced women's knitwear collections under the Sarah Davis label, 1976–88; introduced men's knitwear line, 1987; freelance design work, from 1980; began teaching and lecturing at various institutions; course leader, Royal College of Art, Fashion Knitwear, from 1990; Knitted Textiles, from 1992. Awards: British Design Council award, 1987.

PUBLICATIONS

On DALLAS:

Books

Menkes, Suzy, The Knitwear Revolution, 1983.

Sheard, Stephen, Rowan: Designer Collection Summer and Winter Knitting, 1987.

Sheard, S., The Rowan/Brother Designer Machine Knitting Book, 1987.

Articles

Chubb, Ann, "Knitting it Together with the Skipton Factor," in the Daily Telegraph, August 1982.

"Designer Knits for You," in Pins & Needles, Fall 1982.

"Sarah Dallas Knitwear Collection," in Design, February 1987.

Dodd, Celia, "Knit Wit in Bold Strokes," in Field, April 1987.

*

I feel quite passionately that knitwear should have an identity of its own and be an intrinsic part of fashion rather than an accessory to woven garments. This is something I have always striven to achieve with my own knitwear collections.

Knitwear is incredibly versatile, and is an ideal way of producing your own exclusive fabric, often engineered to suit each garment.... Nothing satisfies me more than to see someone of twenty and someone of sixty wearing the same garment but probably styled in quite a different way.

—Sarah Dallas

* * *

Sarah Dallas is a prominent knitwear designer who ran her own company and now works as a consultant and an educator. It was while studying for a degree in woven textiles that she first became fascinated by the more spontaneous results made possible by hand-knitting. At London's Royal College of Art she studied in the Textile School, but challenged established boundaries to create fashion knitwear.

After graduation, fashion knitwear designers were still quite rare and the knitwear boom was yet to come. Many companies were very conservative in their approach and in order to get her designs into production, Dallas had to set up on her own. Initially she produced knitwear exclusively for the London-based, upmarket fashion shop Bombacha, creating designs made by outworkers on domestic knitting machines. This led to her first independent coordinated fabric and knitwear collection. Building up a market was very time consuming, particularly as it meant shattering preconceptions of the role and potential of knitted garments. Increasing demand for her work led to the decision to move away from hand-knitting to full factory production. The change enabled Dallas to extend her range and output, but also affected the appearance of the fabrics and the finished garments; she did not favor the chunky, earthy look which characterized some hand knits. She was more concerned with creating interesting fabrics suitable for a classic fashion look. For her, fashion knitwear has always been about style.

Dallas' fabrics were usually produced using natural yarns; pure wool for winter and cotton for summer. She had yarns specially spun and dyed in England to match her own specifications and to provide an exact color palette. The basics were the classic neutrals, navy and black, but her talent was in enlivening them with current fashion tones. Black and white were combined in geometric patterns to create simple crew-necked sweaters highlighted by a bright colored handkerchief in a breast pocket—a detail which became a signature of her work.

The Dallas look consisted of bold classic shapes with a feel for current fashion. A concentration on detail and an accent on splashes of bright color characterized each collection. Her ranges sold at the middle and upper ends of the market, with a broad customer profile covering ages 20 to 60. This extensive range was due to the versatility of the look and the uncomplicated styling. Described as "New Classics," her designs won a British Design Council award in 1987.

Since she ceased to work under her own label, Dallas undertook freelance consultancy for British based companies and for those in other manufacturing centres such as Italy, Hong Kong, and China. She designed hand- and machine knit patterns for books and magazines. Much of her work was for Rowan Yarns, of Holmfirth, West Yorkshire, creating patterns for people to knit at home. Her emphasis was still on clean lines and interesting yarns; a minimalist approach concentrating on using every element, yarn, color, and shape to its fullest extent in each design.

Dallas became a course leader of the new M.A. course in Fashion Knitwear and Knitted Textiles at the Royal College of Art in the early 1990s. Her intention was to develop the potential of knitted fabrics and fashion, especially since the recession affected knitwear sales quite severely. The future, in Sarah Dallas' view, was in machine knitting and in the use of factory techniques. Hand-knitting became too expensive for a depressed market and machines were increasingly sophisticated. Dallas continued to influence the direction of fashion knitwear through her teaching and her consulting work; each enabled her to preserve high standards and to prepare the way for a revival in knitwear and knitted fabrics.

—Hazel Clark

DANSKIN

American dancewear, activewear, and hosiery manufacturer

Founded: in 1882 by Joel and Benson Goodman in New York City. Company History: Founded as a dry goods store; imported hosiery items introduced in 1923. Specialty dance items such as leotards and nylon tights offered in the 1950s; Danskin sold by Goodman family to International Playtex, Inc. (part of Esmark, Inc.), 1980; Esmark bought by Beatrice Companies, Inc., 1984; Beatrice bought by Kohlberg Kravis Roberts & Company for $6.2 billion, 1986; Beatrice sells Danskin and Pennaco Hosiery units (as Esmark Apparel, Inc.) to Eaglewood Partners, 1986; named changed back to Danskin, Inc.; Danskin goes public, 1992; SunAmerica, Inc. acquires a 33.7-percent stake in Danskin, 1996; stock delisted by NASDAQ, 1997; Packables and Zen Sport lines introduced, 1999; acquired licenses for Ellen Tracy and Evan Picone hosiery lines, 2000. Awards: Coty award, 1978. Company Address: 530 Seventh Avenue, New York, NY 10018, USA. Company Website: www.danskin.com.

PUBLICATIONS

On DANSKIN:

Books

McGill, Leonard, Disco Dressing, Englewood Cliffs, New Jersey, 1980.

Articles

de Ribere, Lisa, "Danskins Are For Dancers," in Dancemagazine, October 1983.
 Grieves, Robert T., "Stretching the Image," in Forbes, 18 April 1988.
 Moore, Lila, "Danskin Leaps Back from the Bunk," in Apparel Industry Magazine, January 1993.

* * *

After many years of financial struggle, it looks as if Danskin may have the opportunity to pull in more of the activewear market with its Packables and Zen Sport yoga lines, combined with newer designer name hosiery lines. Trying not to place all of its eggs in one basket, Danskin will need a strong consumer reaction to pull itself up to the barre and out of a financially troublesome slump.

Danskin began as a small dry goods store founded in 1882 by Joel and Benson Goodman in New York City. The store found a niche in the dance apparel market by selling imported European hosiery and tights to local dancers of the time. Seizing the opportunity this demand presented, the Goodmans began to manufacture items specifically targeted to dancers, and it was soon apparent the Goodman brothers' operation dominated the dance industry market in America. The Goodmans were the first to introduce knit tights, fishnet stockings, and leotards, standardizing the popular colors designated as "Ballet Pink" and "Theatrical Pink."

During the 19th century and into the 20th, Danskin governed the dancewear market in the U.S. but it wasn't until the 1950s that Danskin acquired its trademark name. At that time, nylon was first introduced into the manufacture of hosiery, calling more attention than ever to the wearer's skin. Hence the name Danskin, a simple combination of the words "dance" and "skin." In 1952 Danskin offered a waist-to-toe tight, made of a versatile two-way stretch nylon. Soon the Danskin name was synonymous with dancewear and became the favorite apparel for skaters and gymnasts as well.

By the last years of the 1950s and the early 1960s, Danskin's name and products had become more mainstream. The company made resourceful changes to its bodysuit line by adding snap closures for expedience and revising the overall look of the bodysuit to make it more appealingly stylish to the casual wearer. The company launched its first public advertising campaign in the fall of 1958, with huge success; Danskin's most profitable item was fast becoming the nylon waist-to-toe tight.

Peter Goodman, the grandson of the original Goodmans, kept the Danskin operation lucrative during the remainder of the 1960s and throughout the 1970s. With more and more leg showing in the fashion world, the fitness and disco craze, and swimwear taking on the look of the leotard, it was easy for Danskin to live up to its ads, stating that Danskins weren't just for dancers anymore. For marketability's sake, Danskin started hosting athletic events to try and boost sales of their products. Danskin supported everything from universal skills rating tests for gymnastics to the very popular triathlons of today. Coupled with advertising campaigns featuring popular athletic and Olympic personalities, sent scores of children to the balance beam and the ballet barre, and an equal number of adults to the workout room. Department stores began incorporating athletic wear and hosiery sections into their stores, and have since become commonplace markets for Danskin products.

Danskin lost its privately owned status when it was sold to International Playtex, Inc. in April 1980. Esmark, founded in 1972, was the parent company of International Playtex and was itself acquired four years later by Beatrice Companies, Inc. in 1984. Beatrice, however, was soon in financial turmoil and Danskin was put on the back burner. By 1985 Beatrice announced its intention to sell off all of its knitwear operations, including Danskin. In anticipation of this event, Beatrice paired Danskin with another Esmark apparel component, Pennaco Hosiery, to form Esmark Apparel, Inc. in February 1986. A few months later, Beatrice announced the successful sale of their knitwear division to the Eaglewood Partners investment group.

quite severely. The future, in Sarah Dallas' view, was in machine knitting and in the use of factory techniques. Hand-knitting became too expensive for a depressed market and machines were increasingly sophisticated. Dallas continued to influence the direction of fashion knitwear through her teaching and her consulting work; each enabled her to preserve high standards and to prepare the way for a revival in knitwear and knitted fabrics.

—Hazel Clark

DANSKIN

American dancewear, activewear, and hosiery manufacturer

Founded: in 1882 by Joel and Benson Goodman in New York City. Company History: Founded as a dry goods store; imported hosiery items introduced in 1923. Specialty dance items such as leotards and nylon tights offered in the 1950s; Danskin sold by Goodman family to International Playtex, Inc. (part of Esmark, Inc.), 1980; Esmark bought by Beatrice Companies, Inc., 1984; Beatrice bought by Kohlberg Kravis Roberts & Company for $6.2 billion, 1986; Beatrice sells Danskin and Pennaco Hosiery units (as Esmark Apparel, Inc.) to Eaglewood Partners, 1986; named changed back to Danskin, Inc.; Danskin goes public, 1992; SunAmerica, Inc. acquires a 33.7-percent stake in Danskin, 1996; stock delisted by NASDAQ, 1997; Packables and Zen Sport lines introduced, 1999; acquired licenses for Ellen Tracy and Evan Picone hosiery lines, 2000. Awards: Coty award, 1978. Company Address: 530 Seventh Avenue, New York, NY 10018, USA. Company Website: www.danskin.com.

PUBLICATIONS

On DANSKIN:

Books

McGill, Leonard, Disco Dressing, Englewood Cliffs, New Jersey, 1980.

Articles

de Ribere, Lisa, "Danskins Are For Dancers," in Dancemagazine, October 1983.
 Grieves, Robert T., "Stretching the Image," in Forbes, 18 April 1988.
 Moore, Lila, "Danskin Leaps Back from the Bunk," in Apparel Industry Magazine, January 1993.

* * *

After many years of financial struggle, it looks as if Danskin may have the opportunity to pull in more of the activewear market with its Packables and Zen Sport yoga lines, combined with newer designer name hosiery lines. Trying not to place all of its eggs in one basket, Danskin will need a strong consumer reaction to pull itself up to the barre and out of a financially troublesome slump.

Danskin began as a small dry goods store founded in 1882 by Joel and Benson Goodman in New York City. The store found a niche in the dance apparel market by selling imported European hosiery and tights to local dancers of the time. Seizing the opportunity this demand presented, the Goodmans began to manufacture items specifically targeted to dancers, and it was soon apparent the Goodman brothers' operation dominated the dance industry market in America. The Goodmans were the first to introduce knit tights, fishnet stockings, and leotards, standardizing the popular colors designated as "Ballet Pink" and "Theatrical Pink."

During the 19th century and into the 20th, Danskin governed the dancewear market in the U.S. but it wasn't until the 1950s that Danskin acquired its trademark name. At that time, nylon was first introduced into the manufacture of hosiery, calling more attention than ever to the wearer's skin. Hence the name Danskin, a simple combination of the words "dance" and "skin." In 1952 Danskin offered a waist-to-toe tight, made of a versatile two-way stretch nylon. Soon the Danskin name was synonymous with dancewear and became the favorite apparel for skaters and gymnasts as well.

By the last years of the 1950s and the early 1960s, Danskin's name and products had become more mainstream. The company made resourceful changes to its bodysuit line by adding snap closures for expedience and revising the overall look of the bodysuit to make it more appealingly stylish to the casual wearer. The company launched its first public advertising campaign in the fall of 1958, with huge success; Danskin's most profitable item was fast becoming the nylon waist-to-toe tight.

Peter Goodman, the grandson of the original Goodmans, kept the Danskin operation lucrative during the remainder of the 1960s and throughout the 1970s. With more and more leg showing in the fashion world, the fitness and disco craze, and swimwear taking on the look of the leotard, it was easy for Danskin to live up to its ads, stating that Danskins weren't just for dancers anymore. For marketability's sake, Danskin started hosting athletic events to try and boost sales of their products. Danskin supported everything from universal skills rating tests for gymnastics to the very popular triathlons of today. Coupled with advertising campaigns featuring popular athletic and Olympic personalities, sent scores of children to the balance beam and the ballet barre, and an equal number of adults to the workout room. Department stores began incorporating athletic wear and hosiery sections into their stores, and have since become commonplace markets for Danskin products.

Danskin lost its privately owned status when it was sold to International Playtex, Inc. in April 1980. Esmark, founded in 1972, was the parent company of International Playtex and was itself acquired four years later by Beatrice Companies, Inc. in 1984. Beatrice, however, was soon in financial turmoil and Danskin was put on the back burner. By 1985 Beatrice announced its intention to sell off all of its knitwear operations, including Danskin. In anticipation of this event, Beatrice paired Danskin with another Esmark apparel component, Pennaco Hosiery, to form Esmark Apparel, Inc. in February 1986. A few months later, Beatrice announced the successful sale of their knitwear division to the Eaglewood Partners investment group.

At the time of the sale, Esmark Apparel, Inc. (which included Danskin), maintained the greatest portion of the feminine exercise clothing business. In charge of Esmark was Byron A. Hero, who had grandiose plans for expanding the company. Hero's expansion banked on the names and reputations of Danskin and Pennaco Hosiery, and he was determined to infuse company proceeds into expanding operations and market infiltration. By the end of 1986, Esmark purchased Dance France Ltd. which was merged with Danskin's operations. With the aid of a huge ad campaign in 1987, Danskin unveiled its first line of plus-sized dancewear with Danskin-Plus, and promoted a line of short, tight-fitting dresses. Esmark's next move was the purchase of Repetto France, a specialty ballet shoe and tutu manufacturer, as well as the license to distribute Givenchy hosiery overseas. Business was profitable for a time, and Esmark Apparel changed its name back to Danskin in July 1992.

In order to raise capital for more expansion, the company went public with three million shares in 1992, to the tune of $13 a share. For the next couple years Danskin was able to turn a profit until the final quarter of 1994 when Hero took out a loan from SunAmerica, Inc. with the idea of broadening Danskin's athletic swimwear products. When plans fell apart, financial turmoil quickly followed. Hero stepped down from daily operations but retained the title of chairman, and was replaced by Howard D. Cooley, former president of International Jockey. When the SunAmerica loans came due and Danskin was unable to pay, SunAmerica took control of a 34-percent stake of the company and put it up for sale.

Incapacitated by overwhelming debt and several changes in leadership, Danskin finally fell under the control of an investment group led by Onyx Partners in 1997, which controlled about three-quarters of the company. In an effort to attract more consumers and boost sales in a declining hosiery market, Danskin acquired licenses for several top designer hosiery labels, including Ralph Lauren. Next the company initiated its "Packables" line in February of 1999, followed by the Zen Sport yoga line in August. By May 2000 Brandweek reported that Danskin had brought Barry Tartarkin aboard with a deal to license both the Ellen Tracy and Evan Picone hosiery lines. Despite questionable decisions and financial missteps, Danskin executives maintained hope that it wasn't too late for the dance and activewear pioneer.

—Sandra Schroeder

DAVIES, George

See NEXT PLC

de CASTELBAJAC, Jean-Charles

See CASTELBAJAC, Jean-Charles de

de GIVENCHY, Hubert

See GIVENCHY, Hubert de

de la RENTA, Oscar

Dominican designer working in New York

Born: Santo Domingo, Dominican Republic, 22 July 1932. Educational: Studied art, National School of Art, Santo Domingo, 1950–52; Academia de San Fernando, Madrid, 1953–55. Family: Married Françoise de Langlade, 1967 (died, 1983); married Annette Reed, 1989; children: Moises. Career: Staff designer under Balenciaga, Madrid, from 1949; assistant designer to Antonio Castillo, Lanvin-Castillo, Paris, 1961–63; designer, Elizabeth Arden couture and ready-to-wear, New York, 1963–65; partner/designer, Jane Derby Inc., New York, 1965–69; designer/chief executive, Oscar de la Renta Couture, Oscar de la Renta II, de la Renta Furs and Jewelry, Oscar de la Renta Ltd., from 1973; introduced signature perfume, 1977, followed by Ruffles, 1983, and Volupté, 1991; owner, de la Renta specialty shop, Santo Domingo, from 1968; designer, couture collection for Balmain, from 1992. Exhibitions: Versailles 1973: American Fashion on the World Stage, Metropolitan Museum of

Oscar de la Renta, fall 2001 collection: shearling coat, cashmere halter dress, and feather beaded boots. © AFP/CORBIS.

At the time of the sale, Esmark Apparel, Inc. (which included Danskin), maintained the greatest portion of the feminine exercise clothing business. In charge of Esmark was Byron A. Hero, who had grandiose plans for expanding the company. Hero's expansion banked on the names and reputations of Danskin and Pennaco Hosiery, and he was determined to infuse company proceeds into expanding operations and market infiltration. By the end of 1986, Esmark purchased Dance France Ltd. which was merged with Danskin's operations. With the aid of a huge ad campaign in 1987, Danskin unveiled its first line of plus-sized dancewear with Danskin-Plus, and promoted a line of short, tight-fitting dresses. Esmark's next move was the purchase of Repetto France, a specialty ballet shoe and tutu manufacturer, as well as the license to distribute Givenchy hosiery overseas. Business was profitable for a time, and Esmark Apparel changed its name back to Danskin in July 1992.

In order to raise capital for more expansion, the company went public with three million shares in 1992, to the tune of $13 a share. For the next couple years Danskin was able to turn a profit until the final quarter of 1994 when Hero took out a loan from SunAmerica, Inc. with the idea of broadening Danskin's athletic swimwear products. When plans fell apart, financial turmoil quickly followed. Hero stepped down from daily operations but retained the title of chairman, and was replaced by Howard D. Cooley, former president of International Jockey. When the SunAmerica loans came due and Danskin was unable to pay, SunAmerica took control of a 34-percent stake of the company and put it up for sale.

Incapacitated by overwhelming debt and several changes in leadership, Danskin finally fell under the control of an investment group led by Onyx Partners in 1997, which controlled about three-quarters of the company. In an effort to attract more consumers and boost sales in a declining hosiery market, Danskin acquired licenses for several top designer hosiery labels, including Ralph Lauren. Next the company initiated its "Packables" line in February of 1999, followed by the Zen Sport yoga line in August. By May 2000 Brandweek reported that Danskin had brought Barry Tartarkin aboard with a deal to license both the Ellen Tracy and Evan Picone hosiery lines. Despite questionable decisions and financial missteps, Danskin executives maintained hope that it wasn't too late for the dance and activewear pioneer.

—Sandra Schroeder

DAVIES, George

See NEXT PLC

de CASTELBAJAC, Jean-Charles

See CASTELBAJAC, Jean-Charles de

de GIVENCHY, Hubert

See GIVENCHY, Hubert de

de la RENTA, Oscar

Dominican designer working in New York

Born: Santo Domingo, Dominican Republic, 22 July 1932. Educational: Studied art, National School of Art, Santo Domingo, 1950–52; Academia de San Fernando, Madrid, 1953–55. Family: Married Françoise de Langlade, 1967 (died, 1983); married Annette Reed, 1989; children: Moises. Career: Staff designer under Balenciaga, Madrid, from 1949; assistant designer to Antonio Castillo, Lanvin-Castillo, Paris, 1961–63; designer, Elizabeth Arden couture and ready-to-wear, New York, 1963–65; partner/designer, Jane Derby Inc., New York, 1965–69; designer/chief executive, Oscar de la Renta Couture, Oscar de la Renta II, de la Renta Furs and Jewelry, Oscar de la Renta Ltd., from 1973; introduced signature perfume, 1977, followed by Ruffles, 1983, and Volupté, 1991; owner, de la Renta specialty shop, Santo Domingo, from 1968; designer, couture collection for Balmain, from 1992. Exhibitions: Versailles 1973: American Fashion on the World Stage, Metropolitan Museum of

Oscar de la Renta, fall 2001 collection: shearling coat, cashmere halter dress, and feather beaded boots. © AFP/CORBIS.

Art, 1993. Awards: Coty American Fashion Critics award, 1967, 1973; Coty Return award, 1968; Neiman Marcus award, 1968; Golden Tiberius award, 1969; American Printed Fabrics Council "Tommy" award, 1971; Caballero of the Order of Juan Pablo Duarte, and Gran Comandante of the Order of Cristobal Colón, Dominican Republic, 1972; Fragrance Foundation award, 1978. Address: 550 Seventh Avenue, New York, NY 10018, U.S.A. Website: www.oscardelarenta.com.

PUBLICATIONS

On de la RENTA:

Books

- Morris, Bernadine, and Barbara Walz, The Fashion Makers, New York, 1978.
 Diamonstein, Barbaralee, Fashion: The Inside Story, New York, 1985.
 Milbank, Caroline Rennolds, Couture: The Great Designers, New York, 1985.
 Perschitz, Lois, ed., W, The Designing Life, New York, 1987.
 Coleridge, Nicholas, The Fashion Conspiracy, London, 1988.

Oscar de la Renta, fall 2001 collection: feather and beaded slip dress. © AP/Wide World Photos.

Milbank, Caroline Rennolds, New York Fashion: The Evolution of American Style, New York, 1989.
 Martin, Richard, and Harold Koda, Orientalism: Visions of the East in Western Dress [exhibition catalogue], New York, 1994.
 Stegemeyer, Anne, Who's Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.
 Carrillo, Louis, Oscar de la Renta, Austin, Texas, 1996.

Articles

- Greenstein, S., "The Business of Being Oscar," in Vogue, May 1982.
 "Françoise de la Renta," [obituary], in Variety, 22 June 1983.
 Kornbluth, Jesse, "The Working Rich: The Real Slaves of New York," in New York, 24 November 1986.
 Bentley, Vicci, "King of Ruffles," in Woman's Journal (London), November 1987.
 Gross, Michael, "A Fitting with Oscar," in New York, 18 April 1988.
 Howell, Georgina, "Charmed Circles," in Vogue, September 1989.
 Hirshey, Gerri, "The Snooty Dame at the Block Party," in the New York Times Magazine, 24 October 1993.
 Schiro, Anne-Marie, "Tasteful Comes in Many Colors," in the New York Times, 4 November 1994.
 Beckett, Kathleen, "Runway Report: My One and Only Hue—Oscar de la Renta," in the New York Post, 4 November 1994.
 "New York: Oscar de la Renta," in WWD, 4 November 1994.
 "New York: Oscar de la Renta," in WWD, 7 April 1995.
 Brown, Jeanette, "From Looking Good to Doing Good," in Business Week, 9 November 1998.
 "The Look of Oscar de la Renta," in InStyle, 1 February 2001.
 Horyn, Cathy, "Creating a Fantasy Life Beyond the Seams," in the New York Times, 14 February 2001.
 Lockwood, Lisa, "Oscar's Evolutionary Theory," in WWD, 13 June 2001.
 "Oscar's Winners," in Town & Country, July 2001.
 "Casa de la Renta," in InStyle, 1 August 2001.
 "Fashion of the Times," in the New York Times, Autumn 2001.
 "Fall 2001 Ready to Wear," available online at Style.com, 28 October 2001.

* * *

Although he was born in the Dominican Republic and moved to New York at the age of 30, Oscar de la Renta has become a great ambassador for American fashion. His appointment as designer to the French couture house of Pierre Balmain in 1992 was a historic occasion—the first time an American designer had been commissioned by French haute couture. The choice in many ways reflected the growing eminence of New York as a fashion force and the international status of American designers.

As a designer, de la Renta has inspired many international trends. During the 1960s, his clothes were elaborate and witty parodies of experimental street fashion: jackets and coats of bandanna-printed denim, embroidered hot pants under silk minidresses, or caftans made out of silk chiffon and psychedelic silk saris. He was largely responsible for initiating the ethnic fashion of the 1970s with gypsy and Russian fashion themes incorporating fringed shawls, boleros, peasant blouses, and full skirts. In the 1990s de la Renta was popular for his romantic evening clothes, glamorous, elegant, and made from richly opulent fabrics such as brocade, transparent chiffon, fox fur, ermine, and embroidered faille.

Throughout his career, de la Renta has concentrated on simple shapes and silhouettes to create dramatic and flashy statements. He has an inherent feeling for women's femininity and established fashion classics, such as variations of his portrait dresses in taffeta, chiffon, or velvet with ruffled necklines or cuffs, or his ornate luncheon suits, embroidered in costume jewelry and gold. Since founding his own company in 1967 to produce luxury women's ready-to-wear, de la Renta expanded to create jewelry, household linens, menswear, and perfumes. These products are marketed and sold all over Europe, Asia, and South and North America.

The designer had a well-traveled international fashion pedigree before establishing his own label business. He studied art at the Academia de San Fernando in Madrid and began sketching for leading Spanish fashion houses, leading to a job at Balenciaga's Madrid couture house, Eisa. A move to Paris in 1961 brought him work as an assistant to Antonio De Castillo at Lanvin-Castillo. He moved with Castillo to New York in 1963 to design at Elizabeth Arden. Joining Jane Derby Inc. as a partner in 1965, he began operating as Oscar de la Renta Ltd. in 1973.

His first marriage to the late Françoise de la Langlade, editor-in-chief of French Vogue, in 1967 was an undoubted asset to de la Renta's business. Together they created soirées that were the equivalent of 18th-century salons. The environment enhanced the wearing of an Oscar de la Renta creation and provided valuable publicity, with frequent mentions in society columns. He has not forgotten his Dominican associations though and has been honored as its best-known native son and one of its most distinguished citizens with the Order de Merito de Juan Pablo Duarte. He also helped build a much needed school and daycare center in the republic for over 350 children.

Still designing in New York today, de la Renta continued to redefine American elegance with his famous womenswear line, Signature; the couture line, Studio; his ready-to-wear, and a range of sophisticated dresses and suits known as Miss. When in 2001 a signature line of accessories by de la Renta made its debut on the New York fashion scene, the designer was asked once again to describe the forces that influenced his design and sensibility. He told the New York Times "Fashion of the Times" column about the two places he lived as a child and young man, the Dominican Republic and Spain, and how they dramatically affected his work: "From my island side comes my love for the exotic, for color and light. From my Spanish side comes my love of gypsies and bullfighters," he said. And indeed, the new line of accessories—bags and shoes, boots and belts—repeats motifs familiar in de la Renta's earliest designs.

The drama and sexiness of high fashion is not ignored even in the simplest accessory. There is, after 36 years of design, a kind of rebirth for de la Renta in his accessories collection: "As clothes become more minimalist, you can tell who a woman really is by her accessories." And de la Renta's signature formula of casual, feminine, graceful, and comfortable yet elegant clothes prevails. If a design itself is very simple, then the materials used are luxurious. Utilitarian boots, for example, take on an entirely new status with heavy embroidery. If a particular design is complicated, then de la Renta edits the colors or the fabrics to produce a consistently wearable and classic line of clothing and accessories.

In 2001 de la Renta launched a fall collection for Balmain combining his love of the ethnic influence (Spanish-Russian) with hot colors and sleek sophisticated styling. Oscar de la Renta continues to be a major presence in the contemporary fashionable world.

—Kevin Almond; updated by Kathleen Bonann Marshall

DELL'OLIO, Louis

American fashion designer

Born: New York, 23 July 1948. Education: Graduated from Parsons School of Design, 1969. Career: Intern for Norman Norell, 1965; assistant at Teal Traina, 1969–71; designer for Originala's Giorgini

Louis Dell'Olio, fall 1999 fur collection. © Fashion Syndicate Press.

Russian fashion themes incorporating fringed shawls, boleros, peasant blouses, and full skirts. In the 1990s de la Renta was popular for his romantic evening clothes, glamorous, elegant, and made from richly opulent fabrics such as brocade, transparent chiffon, fox fur, ermine, and embroidered faille.

Throughout his career, de la Renta has concentrated on simple shapes and silhouettes to create dramatic and flashy statements. He has an inherent feeling for women's femininity and established fashion classics, such as variations of his portrait dresses in taffeta, chiffon, or velvet with ruffled necklines or cuffs, or his ornate luncheon suits, embroidered in costume jewelry and gold. Since founding his own company in 1967 to produce luxury women's ready-to-wear, de la Renta expanded to create jewelry, household linens, menswear, and perfumes. These products are marketed and sold all over Europe, Asia, and South and North America.

The designer had a well-traveled international fashion pedigree before establishing his own label business. He studied art at the Academia de San Fernando in Madrid and began sketching for leading Spanish fashion houses, leading to a job at Balenciaga's Madrid couture house, Eisa. A move to Paris in 1961 brought him work as an assistant to Antonio De Castillo at Lanvin-Castillo. He moved with Castillo to New York in 1963 to design at Elizabeth Arden. Joining Jane Derby Inc. as a partner in 1965, he began operating as Oscar de la Renta Ltd. in 1973.

His first marriage to the late Françoise de la Langlade, editor-in-chief of French Vogue, in 1967 was an undoubted asset to de la Renta's business. Together they created soirées that were the equivalent of 18th-century salons. The environment enhanced the wearing of an Oscar de la Renta creation and provided valuable publicity, with frequent mentions in society columns. He has not forgotten his Dominican associations though and has been honored as its best-known native son and one of its most distinguished citizens with the Order de Merito de Juan Pablo Duarte. He also helped build a much needed school and daycare center in the republic for over 350 children.

Still designing in New York today, de la Renta continued to redefine American elegance with his famous womenswear line, Signature; the couture line, Studio; his ready-to-wear, and a range of sophisticated dresses and suits known as Miss. When in 2001 a signature line of accessories by de la Renta made its debut on the New York fashion scene, the designer was asked once again to describe the forces that influenced his design and sensibility. He told the New York Times "Fashion of the Times" column about the two places he lived as a child and young man, the Dominican Republic and Spain, and how they dramatically affected his work: "From my island side comes my love for the exotic, for color and light. From my Spanish side comes my love of gypsies and bullfighters," he said. And indeed, the new line of accessories—bags and shoes, boots and belts—repeats motifs familiar in de la Renta's earliest designs.

The drama and sexiness of high fashion is not ignored even in the simplest accessory. There is, after 36 years of design, a kind of rebirth for de la Renta in his accessories collection: "As clothes become more minimalist, you can tell who a woman really is by her accessories." And de la Renta's signature formula of casual, feminine, graceful, and comfortable yet elegant clothes prevails. If a design itself is very simple, then the materials used are luxurious. Utilitarian boots, for example, take on an entirely new status with heavy embroidery. If a particular design is complicated, then de la Renta edits the colors or the fabrics to produce a consistently wearable and classic line of clothing and accessories.

In 2001 de la Renta launched a fall collection for Balmain combining his love of the ethnic influence (Spanish-Russian) with hot colors and sleek sophisticated styling. Oscar de la Renta continues to be a major presence in the contemporary fashionable world.

—Kevin Almond; updated by Kathleen Bonann Marshall

DELL'OLIO, Louis

American fashion designer

Born: New York, 23 July 1948. Education: Graduated from Parsons School of Design, 1969. Career: Intern for Norman Norell, 1965; assistant at Teal Traina, 1969–71; designer for Originala's Giorgini

Louis Dell'Olio, fall 1999 fur collection. © Fashion Syndicate Press.

and Ginori divisions, 1971–74; joined Anne Klein as codesigner with Donna Karan, 1974; took over as sole designer for Anne Klein after Karan's departure, 1984; left Anne Klein, replaced by Richard Tyler, 1993; spent time working with CFDA's Fashion Targets Breast Cancer initiative, 1993–96; created Dei Tre collection for Bergdorf Goodman, Neiman Marcus, and Holt Renfrew, 1996; launched outerwear collection, 1997; introduced exclusive collection for QVC, 2000. Awards: Parsons Gold Thimble award, 1969; Coty American Fashion Critics awards (all with Donna Karan), 1977, 1982, and 1984. Address: 435 Ocean Drive, Stamford, CT 06902, U.S.A.

PUBLICATIONS

On DELL'OLIO:

Books

Stegemeyer, Anne, Who's Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.

Louis Dell'Olio, fall 1999 fur collection. © Fashion Syndicate Press.

Articles

- Dougherty, Margot, "Making Anne Klein Click," in Life, November 1982.
- Conant, Jennet, "The Man Behind Anne Klein," in Newsweek, 3 November 1986.
- Gross, Michael, "Louis Who?" in New York, 17 October 1988.
- Morris, Bernadine, "The Dell'Olio Formula: Start with the Classic, Then Add Aggression," in the New York Times, 15 November 1988.
- _____, "From Louis Dell'Olio, Clean Cuts and Colors," in the New York Times, 14 April 1989.
- Capitain, Jenny, "Louis the First," in Vogue, February 1990.
- Staples, Kate, "Louis Dell'Olio: Back in Form," in WWD, 26 June 1991.
- Morris Bernadine, "Dell'Olio's Soft Spin Enlivens Sportswear," in the New York Times, 6 November 1992.
- Rourke, Mary, "Made for the U.S.A. Designer," in the Los Angeles Times, 22 February 1993.
- White, Constance C.R., "Easy Transition is Top Property at Anne Klein," in WWD, 5 May 1993.
- Ozzard, Janet, "Accento Americano," in WWD, 9 August 1995.
- _____, "Dell'Olio's New Gig," in WWD, 10 July 1996.
- Daria, Irene, "Dell'Olio: The Rush to Be Creative," in WWD, 5 January 1997.
- Wilson, Eric, "Dell'Olio Unwraps Outerwear," in WWD, 9 April 1997.
- Ozzard, Janet, "Dell'Olio Fashions Collections for QVC," in WWD, 2 May 2000.

* * *

Louis Dell'Olio is acknowledged as one of the leading American women's sportswear designers, creating wearable and commercial pieces that feature the classic lines typical of sportswear yet manage innovative twists to set them apart. Dell'Olio has achieved the rare distinction of being loved by critics and consumers alike.

Dell'Olio made his name first as codesigner (with Donna Karan) and then as lead designer at Anne Klein, the label launched by the legendary American sportswear designer. After Klein's death in 1974, Karan, who had been her assistant, asked longtime friend Dell'Olio—who had attended Parsons School of Design with her—to become her codesigner at Klein. The partners were just a few years out of Parsons when they took over the firm. Their first collections were not highly regarded; they designed initially by trying to emulate what they imagined Klein would do.

After a few years, the two designers broke away from traditional Klein wares and began to come into their own, designing a series of critically acclaimed collections. Consumers embraced the brand, and sales grew robustly. When Karan left in 1986 to launch her own label, Dell'Olio took over as the sole designer for Anne Klein. Although retailers and the fashion press wondered if the quiet designer would be able to maintain the company's high reputation and sales, their fears were put to rest after the first few collections. Critics proclaimed Dell'Olio's work became stronger over time, and customers must have agreed, because he ultimately took his place as the bestselling American designer. Anne Klein under Dell'Olio grew to a $200-million wholesale brand in sportswear alone, enhanced by another $250 million in sales of licensed products.

As the president of Bergdorf Goodman told the New York Times (15 November 1988), “[Dell’Olio] understands the needs of women in all walks of life. He makes clothes that are fashionably up to date but that a woman can feel she will be able to wear the next year. And his business is growing.” Retailers have always appreciated Dell’Olio’s penchant for listening to their needs. His interest extends to the business side of fashion as much as to the creative side.

Bernardine Morris, writing in the New York Times (6 November 1992), noted Dell’Olio’s ability to create familiar and comfortable apparel, yet at the same time use innovative designs. “Serene and comforting as the show was to watch,” she said of his spring 1993 collection (one of his last for Anne Klein), “the clothes still looked different from what women already have in their wardrobes. But they didn’t look fussy or overdesigned. Just soft, basic shapes that could be combined in different ways, the basic premise of sportswear dressing.”

Dell’Olio’s designs are purposely American in sensibility; he is known for taking European designs and Americanizing them. Many of his collections have a certain masculine quality—such as boxy shoulders on his blazers, always a core item in his sportswear lines—and he has favored apparel that is flattering and make women feel sexy yet fully dressed. These clothes are targeted at upscale working women, with celebrities ranging from Oprah Winfrey to Cher (in her more serious moments). In addition to blazers, other core items include narrow pants, turtleneck sweaters, and wraparound skirts in black, ivory, and neutrals, set off by the occasional burst of color (such as an all-red series that stood out in one of his collections).

Dell’Olio left Anne Klein in 1993 to pursue his own collections, replaced by Richard Tyler, who the company hoped would take the brand into younger, more exciting directions. Dell’Olio had, some criticized, started to have an element of sameness in his clothes each season. Retailers were taken by surprise at the transition, which both Anne Klein executives and Dell’Olio stressed was his decision. Unfortunately for Klein, the departure of Dell’Olio marked a downward slide for the retailer, and Tyler was soon ousted. Dell’Olio, however, began to forge alliances with a range of companies through consulting and licensing agreements. He became a consultant for Italian sportswear manufacturer Marzotto, helping it hone its bridge line, Accento, especially for the U.S. market. He launched a collection called Dei Tre exclusively for Bergdorf Goodman, Neiman Marcus, and the Canadian chain Holt Renfrew, which he designed with the input of the retailers.

Dell’Olio also started to expand into categories outside sportswear. He created a licensed line of outerwear for the Tepper Collection (the contract transferred to Androu when Tepper shut down), in which he took sportswear looks and translated them into moderate-priced stadium jackets, bathrobe coats, and other items under the Louis Dell’Olio Luxe and LDO Studio labels. He also expanded into furs and shearlings with Legar. In 2000, Dell’Olio began an alliance with the television shopping network QVC for an exclusive line of moderate separates and dresses under the Linea by Louis Dell’Olio label. The partners planned four collections a year, with Dell’Olio appearing on QVC to help promote the line.

All of Dell’Olio’s new ventures remained true to his desire to create wearable, consumer-friendly women’s clothes, although they tended to show more of a focus on color than his previous work. His reputation for quality craftsmanship and good fit, built during his 18 years at Anne Klein, remains strong.

—Karen Raugust

DEMEULEMEESTER, Ann

Belgian designer

Born: Kortrijk, Belgium, 29 December 1959. Education: Studied at the Royal Academy of Fine Arts, Antwerp, 1978–81. Family: Married Patrick Robyn; son: Victor. Career: Showed first collection of women’s ready-to-wear, 1981; freelance designer for international ready-to-wear men’s and women’s collections, 1981–87; founded B.V.B.A. “32” company with husband, 1985; has also designed shoes, handbags, sunglasses and accessories since 1987, outerwear since 1989, knitwear since 1991; opened Paris showroom, 1992; opened first store in Antwerp, 1999; one of initial labels in Galeries have agreed, because he ultimately took his place as the bestselling American designer. Anne Klein under Dell'Olio grew to a $200-million wholesale brand in sportswear alone, enhanced by another $250 million in sales of licensed products.

Ann Demeulemeester, fall 2000 collection. © AP/Wide World Photos/Fashion Wire Daily.

As the president of Bergdorf Goodman told the New York Times (15 November 1988), “[Dell’Olio] understands the needs of women in all walks of life. He makes clothes that are fashionably up to date but that a woman can feel she will be able to wear the next year. And his business is growing.” Retailers have always appreciated Dell’Olio’s penchant for listening to their needs. His interest extends to the business side of fashion as much as to the creative side.

Bernardine Morris, writing in the New York Times (6 November 1992), noted Dell’Olio’s ability to create familiar and comfortable apparel, yet at the same time use innovative designs. “Serene and comforting as the show was to watch,” she said of his spring 1993 collection (one of his last for Anne Klein), “the clothes still looked different from what women already have in their wardrobes. But they didn’t look fussy or overdesigned. Just soft, basic shapes that could be combined in different ways, the basic premise of sportswear dressing.”

Dell’Olio’s designs are purposely American in sensibility; he is known for taking European designs and Americanizing them. Many of his collections have a certain masculine quality—such as boxy shoulders on his blazers, always a core item in his sportswear lines—and he has favored apparel that is flattering and make women feel sexy yet fully dressed. These clothes are targeted at upscale working women, with celebrities ranging from Oprah Winfrey to Cher (in her more serious moments). In addition to blazers, other core items include narrow pants, turtleneck sweaters, and wraparound skirts in black, ivory, and neutrals, set off by the occasional burst of color (such as an all-red series that stood out in one of his collections).

Dell’Olio left Anne Klein in 1993 to pursue his own collections, replaced by Richard Tyler, who the company hoped would take the brand into younger, more exciting directions. Dell’Olio had, some criticized, started to have an element of sameness in his clothes each season. Retailers were taken by surprise at the transition, which both Anne Klein executives and Dell’Olio stressed was his decision. Unfortunately for Klein, the departure of Dell’Olio marked a downward slide for the retailer, and Tyler was soon ousted. Dell’Olio, however, began to forge alliances with a range of companies through consulting and licensing agreements. He became a consultant for Italian sportswear manufacturer Marzotto, helping it hone its bridge line, Accento, especially for the U.S. market. He launched a collection called Dei Tre exclusively for Bergdorf Goodman, Neiman Marcus, and the Canadian chain Holt Renfrew, which he designed with the input of the retailers.

Dell’Olio also started to expand into categories outside sportswear. He created a licensed line of outerwear for the Tepper Collection (the contract transferred to Androu when Tepper shut down), in which he took sportswear looks and translated them into moderate-priced stadium jackets, bathrobe coats, and other items under the Louis Dell’Olio Luxe and LDO Studio labels. He also expanded into furs and shearlings with Legar. In 2000, Dell’Olio began an alliance with the television shopping network QVC for an exclusive line of moderate separates and dresses under the Linea by Louis Dell’Olio label. The partners planned four collections a year, with Dell’Olio appearing on QVC to help promote the line.

All of Dell’Olio’s new ventures remained true to his desire to create wearable, consumer-friendly women’s clothes, although they tended to show more of a focus on color than his previous work. His reputation for quality craftsmanship and good fit, built during his 18 years at Anne Klein, remains strong.

—Karen Raugust

DEMEULEMEESTER, Ann

Belgian designer

Born: Kortrijk, Belgium, 29 December 1959. Education: Studied at the Royal Academy of Fine Arts, Antwerp, 1978–81. Family: Married Patrick Robyn; son: Victor. Career: Showed first collection of women’s ready-to-wear, 1981; freelance designer for international ready-to-wear men’s and women’s collections, 1981–87; founded B.V.B.A. “32” company with husband, 1985; has also designed shoes, handbags, sunglasses and accessories since 1987, outerwear since 1989, knitwear since 1991; opened Paris showroom, 1992; opened first store in Antwerp, 1999; one of initial labels in Galeries

Ann Demeulemeester, fall 2000 collection. © AP/Wide World Photos/Fashion Wire Daily.

Lafayette Vibre concept, 2000; introduced bold color into her spring collections, 2000. Exhibitions: La bienale de venise avec Rodney Graham, Anvers, 1993. Awards: Golden Spindle award, Belgium, 1983; Golden T award, Spain, 1992. Address: B.V.B.A. "32," Populeerenlaan 34, B-2020 Antwerp, Belgium.

PUBLICATIONS

On DEMEULEMEESTER:

Articles

- Mower, Sarah, "Six Romp," in The Guardian (London), 12 February 1987.
 Grauman, Brigid, "The Belgium Connection," in Elle (London), October 1987.
 "Ann Demeulemeester en grande," in Le Nouvel Observateur, 15 November 1991.
 Betts, Katherine, "La Nouvelle Vague," in Vogue, September 1992.
 Sepulchre, Cécile, "Ann Demeulemeester," in Journal du Textile, 12 October 1992.
 Dombrowicz, Laurent, and Pascale Renaux, "Ann Demeulemeester, belle et rebelle," in Jardin des Modes, November 1992.

Ann Demeulemeester, fall 2000 collection. © AP/Wide World Photos/Fashion Wire Daily.

Spindler, Amy M., "Three Designers Thrive on Fashion's Unraveled Edge," in New York Times, 15 March 1993.

Mair, Avril, "This is the New Vision," in i-D (London), 11 May 1993.

Spindler, Amy M., "Coming Apart," in New York Times, 25 July 1993.

"Trois créateurs: Ann Demeulemeester," in Arte Magazine, 27 November–3 December 1993.

"La Cote des Createurs: Les 'baroques' sont plébiscités par les boutiques," in Journal du Textile, 28 February 1994.

"The Paris Collections: The Ideas of March: Ann Demeulemeester," in Women's Wear Daily, 17 March 1995.

Spindler, Amy M., "A Mature Mugler, Demeulemeester and Lang," in New York Times, 18 March 1995.

"Tales of Paris," in Women's Wear Daily, 16 October 1998.

Raper, Sarah, "Ann of Antwerp," in Women's Wear Daily, 4 October 1999.

"Tales of Paris," Women's Wear Daily, 3 March 2000.

* * *

Linked to a group of designers to come out of Belgium in the mid-1980s, Ann Demeulemeester's deconstructed style has come into its own as the 1990s have progressed. Her work, with its monochromatic color schemes and matt layering onto the body of flowing columns of fabric, encapsulates the contemporary Zeitgeist.

The impact of this Belgian avant garde designer's pared-down structure, combining rough edges with more traditionally cut suiting, has been comparable to that of Japanese designers Kawakubo and Yamamoto a decade earlier. Both superseded more overtly designed fashions in favor of purer silhouettes combining references to antique clothing with the worn-in patina of their fabrics and a disregard for the more conventional notions of fit.

Demeulemeester's work represents (along with Margiela, Dries Van Noten, et al) a recognizable 1990s approach to clothing and designer style. It overtakes the often directionless attempts to integrate the sportswear styles of the late 1980s into a high-fashion context and the myriad of 1970s reworkings in the early 1990s. Dedicated to this more experimental strain of fashion, Demeulemeester, having won early accolades for her designs while still at college, pays great attention to detail. From the start she used local craftsmen to create her work. In the late 1980s her designs were more attuned to fashionable classic garments. In 1987 short, black, sunray-pleated skirts were shown with crossover braces and crisp white shirts, worn with stark gabardine coats. Even at this stage, however, she showed concern for proportion, constructing skirts and dresses with adjustable waistlines that could be worn high or low, altering the emphasis of the design to suit the figure of the wearer and give a different sense of balance to the overall outfit.

The appeal of designs which are at the cutting edge of fashion and yet ultimately still wearable has ensured Demeulemeester's success, and, as her work has grown in confidence, so have her sales. The strong lines of her signature long coats and dresses are punctuated by more deconstructed styles like the frayed-edged lacy knit top shoe showed in 1993. This, with its shrunken fit, married the resurgent punk ethos of rough, makeshift antifashion to the languorous swing of gothic-inspired floor-skimming coats.

Her autumn-winter collection for 1993 continued in this vein. Shroud-like white dresses with overlong cuffs and black velvet and brocade coats were set against fitted crêpe sheaths, their differing textures giving a sense of shade and light to provide interest and definition to each outfit. The trumpet cuffs and jet crucifixes with which these were teamed gave a religious aspect to the show which was echoed amongst her contemporaries.

Although there will inevitably be a backlash against such austerity, Demeulemeester's work is strong enough to outlive short-term trends and consolidate her name as a designer of avant-garde independent styles, incorporating an artistic use of fabric and texture and an attention to detail.

Demeulemeester's first dedicated store opened in her hometown of Antwerp in 1999 and features both her men's and women's collections. She wanted her first store to be close to home so she could be there as much as possible, rather than opening in a more high-profile location such as New York. The store, housed in a historic building, has an interior design that reflects the fabrics and draping typical of her clothing.

The designer's fashion-forward reputation has placed her in many retail locations specializing in cutting-edge designers. She was one of the initial labels, for example, in the Vibre concept shop launched in 2000 by Paris-based Galeries Lafayette.

Demeulemeester maintains total control over her business. Unlike many other labels, she does not license but rather oversees most production and all creation and distribution in-house. Her operation is self-financed and has grown slowly according to plan. She has been successful internationally, as well, especially in Asia, where Japan, Singapore, South Korea, and Hong Kong together represent one-fifth of total turnover.

Demeulemeester's clothes are often termed minimalist, yet they sometimes feature a certain amount of complexity. In the late 1990s, her twist tank tops and handkerchief-wrap dresses—which typify her love of twisting and asymmetrical silhouettes—came with instructions. She loves a variety of unusual fabrics, such as painter's canvas, parachute nylon, polished leather, washed denim and distressed suede. Her interest in unusual fabrics adds a surprising amount of diversity to all-white or all-black ensembles. She takes simple items such as a t-shirt or slacks and gives them an almost sculptural feel, often through the use of innovative surface treatments. Her accessories designs are also critically acclaimed.

Some critics have commented that Demeulemeester seemed out of sync with trends at the turn of the century, creating similar spiraling, draping, asymmetrically hanging, and often monochromatic clothing year after year. This was one concern with her spring 2000 collection, at which Women's Wear Daily pointed out that one of the few surprises was her bold and bright use of color.

Yet Demeulemeester remains true to her own vision, creating smart clothing independent of fashion trends. And her loyal cadre of customers, including rocker Patti Smith (who has influenced many of her designs), appreciate her simple, wearable, and relaxed apparel, which, despite its practicality, has an aura of cool.

—Rebecca Arnold; updated by Karen Raugust

de PRÉMONVILLE, Myrène

French designer

Born: Pays Basque region of France, 1949. Career: Assistant to Popy Moreni; freelance designer; designer, Prémonville et Dewavrin, from 1983; also freelance designer for Fiorucci; chose Michael

Atchison & Associates, Inc. as the first American agency to represent her designs, 1989; opened first boutique in Paris, 1990; opened New York boutique, 1991; opened Munich boutique, 1992. Address: 52 Boulevard Richard Lenoir, 75001 Paris, France.

PUBLICATIONS

On de PRÉMONVILLE:

Books

Stegemeyer, Anne, Who's Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.

Articles

Bogart, Anne, and Leslie Cochran, "Paris: de Prémonville's Spare Chic Suits Stand Out," in WWD, 17 October 1985.

"The Young French Fashion Fever; in Paris, the Mood is All-Out Flair," in Harper's Bazaar, June 1986.

Joby, Liz, "Designing Women: Myrène de Prémonville," in Vogue (London), July 1987.

"Prémonville Tabs Exclusive Agent for U.S.," in WWD, 14 March 1989.

Voight, Rebecca, "Paris: Moving and Shaking," in WWD, 19 September 1989.

Edelson, Sharon, "Retailers Say Bridge Sales Keep Growing," in WWD, 18 September 1994.

Ozzard, Janet, "Showroom with a View," in WWD, 10 September 1997.

"Vintage Sewing Patterns—1960s to the Present," available online at the Blue Gardenia, www.thebluegardenia.com, 17 July 2001.

* * *

"Great feel, beautiful proportions, fantastic color," declared Myrène de Prémonville stockist Carole Cruvellier, whose Manchester, England, shop, de la Mode, stocks exclusively French designers. "I particularly remember a petrol blue trouser suit, with a wine cuff, that seemed to sum up her meticulous research and use of color," she said. Lucille Lewin of the Whistles shops in London, who backed the opening of Myrène de Prémonville's first British boutique in 1991, enthuses about her superb cut. She believes the clothes have a longevity that makes economic sense to the customer, always flattering, yet never trite; not classic, they are collectable for their quirky individuality.

Myrène de Prémonville began her company in the mid-1980s, with Giles Dewavrin as partner. Backed by a large finance group, the Union Normand Investissement, her first designs were a response to what she felt was not available to women at that time: effervescent, young, tailored suits in bright colors, often with witty contrasting color trims or bright check details; unexpected colored appliqués on bright white, translucent blouses; a huge, painted sunflower detail on a cream georgette mini tunic, teamed with black leggings. She even introduced her own stirrup trousers because, as she said at the time, "No one else's felt comfortable."

There is always a hint of 1950s couture in her work but never heavy or overly structured. She brings a younger, lighter, more modernistic definition to each outfit. The trumpet cuffs and jet crucifixes with which these were teamed gave a religious aspect to the show which was echoed amongst her contemporaries.

Although there will inevitably be a backlash against such austerity, Demeulemeester's work is strong enough to outlive short-term trends and consolidate her name as a designer of avant-garde independent styles, incorporating an artistic use of fabric and texture and an attention to detail.

Demeulemeester's first dedicated store opened in her hometown of Antwerp in 1999 and features both her men's and women's collections. She wanted her first store to be close to home so she could be there as much as possible, rather than opening in a more high-profile location such as New York. The store, housed in a historic building, has an interior design that reflects the fabrics and draping typical of her clothing.

The designer's fashion-forward reputation has placed her in many retail locations specializing in cutting-edge designers. She was one of the initial labels, for example, in the Vibre concept shop launched in 2000 by Paris-based Galeries Lafayette.

Demeulemeester maintains total control over her business. Unlike many other labels, she does not license but rather oversees most production and all creation and distribution in-house. Her operation is self-financed and has grown slowly according to plan. She has been successful internationally, as well, especially in Asia, where Japan, Singapore, South Korea, and Hong Kong together represent one-fifth of total turnover.

Demeulemeester's clothes are often termed minimalist, yet they sometimes feature a certain amount of complexity. In the late 1990s, her twist tank tops and handkerchief-wrap dresses—which typify her love of twisting and asymmetrical silhouettes—came with instructions. She loves a variety of unusual fabrics, such as painter's canvas, parachute nylon, polished leather, washed denim and distressed suede. Her interest in unusual fabrics adds a surprising amount of diversity to all-white or all-black ensembles. She takes simple items such as a t-shirt or slacks and gives them an almost sculptural feel, often through the use of innovative surface treatments. Her accessories designs are also critically acclaimed.

Some critics have commented that Demeulemeester seemed out of sync with trends at the turn of the century, creating similar spiraling, draping, asymmetrically hanging, and often monochromatic clothing year after year. This was one concern with her spring 2000 collection, at which Women's Wear Daily pointed out that one of the few surprises was her bold and bright use of color.

Yet Demeulemeester remains true to her own vision, creating smart clothing independent of fashion trends. And her loyal cadre of customers, including rocker Patti Smith (who has influenced many of her designs), appreciate her simple, wearable, and relaxed apparel, which, despite its practicality, has an aura of cool.

—Rebecca Arnold; updated by Karen Raugust

de PRÉMONVILLE, Myrène

French designer

Born: Pays Basque region of France, 1949. Career: Assistant to Popy Moreni; freelance designer; designer, Prémonville et Dewavrin, from 1983; also freelance designer for Fiorucci; chose Michael

Atchison & Associates, Inc. as the first American agency to represent her designs, 1989; opened first boutique in Paris, 1990; opened New York boutique, 1991; opened Munich boutique, 1992. Address: 52 Boulevard Richard Lenoir, 75001 Paris, France.

PUBLICATIONS

On de PRÉMONVILLE:

Books

Stegemeyer, Anne, Who's Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.

Articles

Bogart, Anne, and Leslie Cochran, "Paris: de Prémonville's Spare Chic Suits Stand Out," in WWD, 17 October 1985.

"The Young French Fashion Fever; in Paris, the Mood is All-Out Flair," in Harper's Bazaar, June 1986.

Joby, Liz, "Designing Women: Myrène de Prémonville," in Vogue (London), July 1987.

"Prémonville Tabs Exclusive Agent for U.S.," in WWD, 14 March 1989.

Voight, Rebecca, "Paris: Moving and Shaking," in WWD, 19 September 1989.

Edelson, Sharon, "Retailers Say Bridge Sales Keep Growing," in WWD, 18 September 1994.

Ozzard, Janet, "Showroom with a View," in WWD, 10 September 1997.

"Vintage Sewing Patterns—1960s to the Present," available online at the Blue Gardenia, www.thebluegardenia.com, 17 July 2001.

* * *

"Great feel, beautiful proportions, fantastic color," declared Myrène de Prémonville stockist Carole Cruvellier, whose Manchester, England, shop, de la Mode, stocks exclusively French designers. "I particularly remember a petrol blue trouser suit, with a wine cuff, that seemed to sum up her meticulous research and use of color," she said. Lucille Lewin of the Whistles shops in London, who backed the opening of Myrène de Prémonville's first British boutique in 1991, enthuses about her superb cut. She believes the clothes have a longevity that makes economic sense to the customer, always flattering, yet never trite; not classic, they are collectable for their quirky individuality.

Myrène de Prémonville began her company in the mid-1980s, with Giles Dewavrin as partner. Backed by a large finance group, the Union Normand Investissement, her first designs were a response to what she felt was not available to women at that time: effervescent, young, tailored suits in bright colors, often with witty contrasting color trims or bright check details; unexpected colored appliqués on bright white, translucent blouses; a huge, painted sunflower detail on a cream georgette mini tunic, teamed with black leggings. She even introduced her own stirrup trousers because, as she said at the time, "No one else's felt comfortable."

There is always a hint of 1950s couture in her work but never heavy or overly structured. She brings a younger, lighter, more modernistic feel to miniskirted frock coats in yellow wool, with Balenciaga-style gathered sleeves. Full skirted jackets with huge belts, reminiscent of Doris Day shirtwaists, and a pastel, deckchair-striped trouser suit looked perfect for a 1950s into 1990s St. Tropez. Very concerned with practicalities of the fashion business, de Prémontville's positions at Hermès, then at Fiorucci, strengthened her appreciation of vivid color and kitsch, both prominently combined in her designs today. She sees her customer as being practical yet artistically and intellectually aware, with a witty sense of fun, very much an extension of her own personality. This also explains why her designs are often a reaction to what she feels her wardrobe lacks.

She believes that a designer's work should evolve, rather than change radically, each season. Gradual alterations in detailing, proportion, and silhouette are the key to de Prémontville's appeal. She has looked to English eccentricity for inspiration, feeling that the French have become opposed to change and somewhat institutionalized in their dress sense. Conclusively it is the suit that emerges as the signature Myrène de Prémontville garment. Sharp, quirky, and geometric, it has been restyled and restructured for the 1980s and 1990s woman.

In March 1989, the de Prémontville firm chose designer and bridge showroom manager Michael Atchison & Associates, Inc. as the first American agency to represent its continental styles. Valued for its wide range of inventive shapes and elegant, feminine lines, the French house banked on Prémontville Studio, a restrained, fundamental suit collection, which debuted in a variety of fabrics. In 1997, Atchison spread the entire collection along with the clothing lines of youthful stylists Donald Deal, Eric Gasking, Eva Chun, and Sylvia Heisel. He anticipated that his appealing 24th-floor studio on Seventh Avenue South overlooking the Hudson River would draw $5 million worth of business from the metropolitan fashion savvy. Of his capture of a stable of young designers, Atchison exulted, "It's great. It means they're successful." He characterized customers for the Myrène de Prémontville look as "young, fashionable, Park Avenue day-into-evening."

The Vogue pattern company honored de Prémontville by including her designs in Vogue Attitudes, a selection of vintage fashions for seamstresses to sew at home. Featured along with Calvin Klein skirts and slacks, a Ralph Lauren skirt and blouse, and a Chloé dress was a de Prémontville jacket and pants outfit, pictured in op-art bold black-on-white structured jacket and understated dark pants. Vogue's Internet archive pictured de Prémontville's red and white hussar jacket as a facet of the 1987 military trend.

—Kevin Almond; updated by Mary Ellen Snodgrass

de RIBES, Jacqueline

French designer

Born: Jacqueline de Beaumont in Paris, 1931. Education: Studied architecture. Family: Married Comte Edouard de Ribes, 1947; children: Elizabeth, Jean. Career: Freelance fashion designer, Paris, from 1982; showed first collection, 1983; jewelry collection introduced, 1984; continued to show designs publicly and privately, 1990s; remained active in charity circuit. Awards: Rodeo Drive award, Los Angeles, 1985.

PUBLICATIONS

On de RIBES:

Books

Nars, François, and André Leon Talley, X-Ray, New York, 1999.
Seren, François-Xavier, Noblesse Oblige: Intimate Portraits of European Nobility, 1985–2000, New York, 2001.

Articles

"Parisienne," in Holiday (Philadelphia), January 1956.
Donovan, Carrie, "Social Graces," in the New York Times Magazine, 10 July 1983.
"Jacqueline de Ribes Style: Allure and Tradition," in Vogue, May 1984.
Morris, Bernadine, "Jacqueline de Ribes Had a Design Suited to Success," in the New York Times, 30 September 1985.
Shapiro, Harriet, "Going from Riches to Rags, Designing Vicomtesse Jacqueline de Ribes Reaps as She Sews: Handsomely," in People Weekly, 16 December 1985.
"Jacqueline de Ribes," in Harper's Bazaar, April 1986.
Connet, Jennet, "The Social Sewing Circle; Those Designing Blue Bloods Get Ever so Haute," in the Newsweek, 30 July 1986.
Morris, Bernadine, "Laurent: Classic Canon, Soberly Restated—Yves Saint Laurent, Patrick Kelly, and Jacqueline de Ribes," in the New York Times, 24 March 1988.
Dryansky, G.Y., "Jacqueline de Ribes Jewelry: Specially for the Upper Crust," in Connoisseur, April 1988.
Bogart, Anne, "Regal Air," in Harper's Bazaar, September 1989.
Menkes, Suzy, "Couture's Grand Ladies," in the Illustrated London News, Spring 1990.
"Jacqueline de Ribes," in Town & Country, September 1995.
Hollander, Anne, "Viva la Haute Couture! Reports of Its Demise Have Been Greatly Exaggerated," available online at Slate.com, www.slate.com, 10 Decemeber 1997.
Menkes, Suzy, "Couture in Euroland: A New Confidence in Gallic Chic," in the International Herald Tribune, 19 January 1999.
Glueck, Grace, "François-Xavier Seren—Noblesse Oblige: Intimate Portraits of European Nobility, 1985–2000 [review], 13 July 2001.

* * *

When the January 1956 Holiday magazine featured Vicomtesse Jacqueline de Ribes in the series "The Most Fashionable Women" she was, at the age of 25, already recognized for her good taste in clothes. Even then she favored line and color over excessive detail. Growing up in privileged surroundings, she had worn couture all of her life, secretly harboring a desire to become a fashion designer herself, an occupation unsuitable for someone of her status.

Throughout her life de Ribes had been making suggestions to the couturiers who dressed her, bringing sketches, making changes, so when she took the plunge and produced a collection for fall 1983, she was using all of her years of exposure to haute couture, synthesizing with it her own carefully developed aesthetic taste. It helped that another society woman, Carolina Herrera, had successfully entered the fashion business two years before.

Known as a great beauty with an aristocratic profile and demeanor, possessed of a tall, long-necked, slender figure, de Ribes designed what she knew best: evening dresses and sophisticated daytime suits.

feel to miniskirted frock coats in yellow wool, with Balenciaga-style gathered sleeves. Full skirted jackets with huge belts, reminiscent of Doris Day shirtwaists, and a pastel, deckchair-striped trouser suit looked perfect for a 1950s into 1990s St. Tropez. Very concerned with practicalities of the fashion business, de Prémontville's positions at Hermès, then at Fiorucci, strengthened her appreciation of vivid color and kitsch, both prominently combined in her designs today. She sees her customer as being practical yet artistically and intellectually aware, with a witty sense of fun, very much an extension of her own personality. This also explains why her designs are often a reaction to what she feels her wardrobe lacks.

She believes that a designer's work should evolve, rather than change radically, each season. Gradual alterations in detailing, proportion, and silhouette are the key to de Prémontville's appeal. She has looked to English eccentricity for inspiration, feeling that the French have become opposed to change and somewhat institutionalized in their dress sense. Conclusively it is the suit that emerges as the signature Myrène de Prémontville garment. Sharp, quirky, and geometric, it has been restyled and restructured for the 1980s and 1990s woman.

In March 1989, the de Prémontville firm chose designer and bridge showroom manager Michael Atchison & Associates, Inc. as the first American agency to represent its continental styles. Valued for its wide range of inventive shapes and elegant, feminine lines, the French house banked on Prémontville Studio, a restrained, fundamental suit collection, which debuted in a variety of fabrics. In 1997, Atchison spread the entire collection along with the clothing lines of youthful stylists Donald Deal, Eric Gasking, Eva Chun, and Sylvia Heisel. He anticipated that his appealing 24th-floor studio on Seventh Avenue South overlooking the Hudson River would draw $5 million worth of business from the metropolitan fashion savvy. Of his capture of a stable of young designers, Atchison exulted, "It's great. It means they're successful." He characterized customers for the Myrène de Prémontville look as "young, fashionable, Park Avenue day-into-evening."

The Vogue pattern company honored de Prémontville by including her designs in Vogue Attitudes, a selection of vintage fashions for seamstresses to sew at home. Featured along with Calvin Klein skirts and slacks, a Ralph Lauren skirt and blouse, and a Chloé dress was a de Prémontville jacket and pants outfit, pictured in op-art bold black-on-white structured jacket and understated dark pants. Vogue's Internet archive pictured de Prémontville's red and white hussar jacket as a facet of the 1987 military trend.

—Kevin Almond; updated by Mary Ellen Snodgrass

de RIBES, Jacqueline

French designer

Born: Jacqueline de Beaumont in Paris, 1931. Education: Studied architecture. Family: Married Comte Edouard de Ribes, 1947; children: Elizabeth, Jean. Career: Freelance fashion designer, Paris, from 1982; showed first collection, 1983; jewelry collection introduced, 1984; continued to show designs publicly and privately, 1990s; remained active in charity circuit. Awards: Rodeo Drive award, Los Angeles, 1985.

PUBLICATIONS

On de RIBES:

Books

Nars, François, and André Leon Talley, X-Ray, New York, 1999.
Seren, François-Xavier, Noblesse Oblige: Intimate Portraits of European Nobility, 1985–2000, New York, 2001.

Articles

"Parisienne," in Holiday (Philadelphia), January 1956.
Donovan, Carrie, "Social Graces," in the New York Times Magazine, 10 July 1983.
"Jacqueline de Ribes Style: Allure and Tradition," in Vogue, May 1984.
Morris, Bernadine, "Jacqueline de Ribes Had a Design Suited to Success," in the New York Times, 30 September 1985.
Shapiro, Harriet, "Going from Riches to Rags, Designing Vicomtesse Jacqueline de Ribes Reaps as She Sews: Handsomely," in People Weekly, 16 December 1985.
"Jacqueline de Ribes," in Harper's Bazaar, April 1986.
Connet, Jennet, "The Social Sewing Circle; Those Designing Blue Bloods Get Ever so Haute," in the Newsweek, 30 July 1986.
Morris, Bernadine, "Laurent: Classic Canon, Soberly Restated—Yves Saint Laurent, Patrick Kelly, and Jacqueline de Ribes," in the New York Times, 24 March 1988.
Dryansky, G.Y., "Jacqueline de Ribes Jewelry: Specially for the Upper Crust," in Connoisseur, April 1988.
Bogart, Anne, "Regal Air," in Harper's Bazaar, September 1989.
Menkes, Suzy, "Couture's Grand Ladies," in the Illustrated London News, Spring 1990.
"Jacqueline de Ribes," in Town & Country, September 1995.
Hollander, Anne, "Viva la Haute Couture! Reports of Its Demise Have Been Greatly Exaggerated," available online at Slate.com, www.slate.com, 10 Decemeber 1997.
Menkes, Suzy, "Couture in Euroland: A New Confidence in Gallic Chic," in the International Herald Tribune, 19 January 1999.
Glueck, Grace, "François-Xavier Seren—Noblesse Oblige: Intimate Portraits of European Nobility, 1985–2000 [review], 13 July 2001.

* * *

When the January 1956 Holiday magazine featured Vicomtesse Jacqueline de Ribes in the series "The Most Fashionable Women" she was, at the age of 25, already recognized for her good taste in clothes. Even then she favored line and color over excessive detail. Growing up in privileged surroundings, she had worn couture all of her life, secretly harboring a desire to become a fashion designer herself, an occupation unsuitable for someone of her status.

Throughout her life de Ribes had been making suggestions to the couturiers who dressed her, bringing sketches, making changes, so when she took the plunge and produced a collection for fall 1983, she was using all of her years of exposure to haute couture, synthesizing with it her own carefully developed aesthetic taste. It helped that another society woman, Carolina Herrera, had successfully entered the fashion business two years before.

Known as a great beauty with an aristocratic profile and demeanor, possessed of a tall, long-necked, slender figure, de Ribes designed what she knew best: evening dresses and sophisticated daytime suits.

The gowns were long, slim, with shoulder interest consisting of dramatic ruffles, drapes, or simple bows. Tailored suits were detailed with black velvet. The clothes were expensive ready-to-wear, each suit or gown priced at thousands of dollars. Clearly de Ribes was designing for herself, and for women with her money and physical elegance. The clothes were well received in Paris and especially by American buyers. Critics did point out that de Ribes's work showed the clear influence of Saint Laurent, Dior, Cardin, and Valentino. She knew, nevertheless, how to create elements to focus on her own special "look."

Consistent with her emphasis on color and line, de Ribes continued to design plain, almost severe, dinner suits in bright pastel satins. Her gowns of unadorned bright or deep colors became the perfect background for her next venture—jewelry. To maintain her own less-is-more philosophy, de Ribes turned to designing jewelry deliberately made of nonprecious materials such as rhinestones, beads, fake pearls, even ceramics. Her clients had adequate supplies of real jewelry; de Ribes' designs were a chunky, modern, dramatic, perfect adornment for her clothes.

Even lace could find an eye-catching use in a slim black de Ribes gown featuring a V-shaped bodice and side insertions of see-through fabric. The highest of compliments was paid to the designer when Carolyne Roehm, another socialite designer of the late 1980s, created a long black evening gown featuring sections of sheer black georgette in a similar fashion. By 1990 de Ribes had softened her look, her evening gowns began to be made of gathered, draped bodices and yards of sherbet-hued chiffon. An even younger look evolved the next year with the introduction of above-the-knee cocktail dresses, with seductive side draping or flouncy layered organza.

In the late 1990s de Ribes traveled to show fashions at charity balls; she remained her own best advertisement. Though she had slowed her pace, she was always impeccably dressed and commanded attention. As a testament to her skills as a designer, former fashion wild child Jean-Paul Gaultier, who had harnessed his bad-boy energy into beautifully tailored collections, not only cited de Ribes as a major inspiration but dedicated his spring/summer 1999 show to her. "I was flattered that he dedicated the show to me," de Ribes told Suzy Menkes of the International Herald Tribune in January 1999. "It was fun, young, elegant, and modern all at the same time—and that's not easy."

Jacqueline de Ribes, as socialite and designer was prominently profiled in two recent books, X-Ray, by photographer François Nars and André Leon Talley (1999) and François-Xavier Seren's Noblesse Oblige: Intimate Portraits of European Nobility, 1985–2000 (2001). Both featured a perfectly coiffed, bejeweled, and flawlessly dressed de Ribes, creating a striking and unforgettable image of the designer.

—Therese Duzinkiewicz Baker; updated by Nelly Rhodes

de SENNEVILLE, Elisabeth

French fashion designer

Born: Paris, 16 October 1946. Education: Studied at Notre Dame des Oiseaux school in Paris. Family: Children: Loup, Zoé. Exhibitions: Elisabeth de Senneville, Musée des Arts Décoratifs, Paris, 1986; Elisabeth de Senneville: une mode hors mode, Musée d'Art et d'Industrie, Roubaix, France; Elisabeth de Senneville, Musée de la Mode, Marseille, 1994. Collections: Musée Galliera, Paris; Musée de la Mode, Paris; Musée de Roubaix; Musée de la Mode de Marseille. Address: 3 rue de Turbego, Paris, France.

PUBLICATIONS

On de SENNEVILLE:

Books

Elisabeth de Senneville: une mode hors mode [monograph], Paris 1994.

Articles

Lafee, Scott, "Geek Chic," in New Scientist, 24 February 2001.

*

I like to see myself as a designer of futurism and technology. Since 1979 I have been designing all my prints with computers and I have introduced futuristic fabrics into fashion, such as holographic material. I always try to think that my clothes can still be worn after the year 2000. I also like to design for children; I make very modern prints and shapes for them. My clothes have often been compared to Chinese clothes because they have simplicity.

—Elisabeth de Senneville

* * *

While Elisabeth de Senneville has been active in French fashion since the 1960s, she came to prominence in the late 1970s and 1980s with her collections of avant-garde contemporary sportswear, defining her design signature, a combination of functionalist and futuristic sensibilities. Her look and inspirations have remained consistent since she founded her own line in 1975. Rather than following trends, de Senneville has been primarily interested in new technological developments and constantly seeks to apply nonapparel industrial processes and materials to her clothes.

Her vivid, often neon or fluorescent colored prints are derived from computer generated images, using video technology and images from the mass media or art history that she appropriates and applies to her clothes. Unconventional and industrial materials she has used include plastic, Tyvek (an extremely strong, nonwoven fireproof material), canvas, knitted copper threads, rubber, and wool mattress padding. Among her most unusual innovations were the creation, in 1981, of plastic clothes imprinted with holograms. While many of her materials have been unusual, the shapes of de Senneville's clothes are often basic and functional, inspired by athletic wear, work clothes such as jumpsuits, or the quilted clothes of the masses of China. Her signature Chinese inspired outerwear jacket is hip-length quilted canvas that snaps up to a bright plastic collar.

The de Senneville customer is young, adventurous, and intelligent. In her stores in Paris, customers can shop for avant-garde books as well as clothes and can see and hear the work of young artists and musicians. The designer has not only had an affinity for contemporary art but has also actively participated in the intellectual discourses of

The gowns were long, slim, with shoulder interest consisting of dramatic ruffles, drapes, or simple bows. Tailored suits were detailed with black velvet. The clothes were expensive ready-to-wear, each suit or gown priced at thousands of dollars. Clearly de Ribes was designing for herself, and for women with her money and physical elegance. The clothes were well received in Paris and especially by American buyers. Critics did point out that de Ribes's work showed the clear influence of Saint Laurent, Dior, Cardin, and Valentino. She knew, nevertheless, how to create elements to focus on her own special "look."

Consistent with her emphasis on color and line, de Ribes continued to design plain, almost severe, dinner suits in bright pastel satins. Her gowns of unadorned bright or deep colors became the perfect background for her next venture—jewelry. To maintain her own less-is-more philosophy, de Ribes turned to designing jewelry deliberately made of nonprecious materials such as rhinestones, beads, fake pearls, even ceramics. Her clients had adequate supplies of real jewelry; de Ribes' designs were a chunky, modern, dramatic, perfect adornment for her clothes.

Even lace could find an eye-catching use in a slim black de Ribes gown featuring a V-shaped bodice and side insertions of see-through fabric. The highest of compliments was paid to the designer when Carolyne Roehm, another socialite designer of the late 1980s, created a long black evening gown featuring sections of sheer black georgette in a similar fashion. By 1990 de Ribes had softened her look, her evening gowns began to be made of gathered, draped bodices and yards of sherbet-hued chiffon. An even younger look evolved the next year with the introduction of above-the-knee cocktail dresses, with seductive side draping or flouncy layered organza.

In the late 1990s de Ribes traveled to show fashions at charity balls; she remained her own best advertisement. Though she had slowed her pace, she was always impeccably dressed and commanded attention. As a testament to her skills as a designer, former fashion wild child Jean-Paul Gaultier, who had harnessed his bad-boy energy into beautifully tailored collections, not only cited de Ribes as a major inspiration but dedicated his spring/summer 1999 show to her. "I was flattered that he dedicated the show to me," de Ribes told Suzy Menkes of the International Herald Tribune in January 1999. "It was fun, young, elegant, and modern all at the same time—and that's not easy."

Jacqueline de Ribes, as socialite and designer was prominently profiled in two recent books, X-Ray, by photographer François Nars and André Leon Talley (1999) and François-Xavier Seren's Noblesse Oblige: Intimate Portraits of European Nobility, 1985–2000 (2001). Both featured a perfectly coiffed, bejeweled, and flawlessly dressed de Ribes, creating a striking and unforgettable image of the designer.

—Therese Duzinkiewicz Baker; updated by Nelly Rhodes

de SENNEVILLE, Elisabeth

French fashion designer

Born: Paris, 16 October 1946. Education: Studied at Notre Dame des Oiseaux school in Paris. Family: Children: Loup, Zoé. Exhibitions: Elisabeth de Senneville, Musée des Arts Décoratifs, Paris, 1986; Elisabeth de Senneville: une mode hors mode, Musée d'Art et d'Industrie, Roubaix, France; Elisabeth de Senneville, Musée de la Mode, Marseille, 1994. Collections: Musée Galliera, Paris; Musée de la Mode, Paris; Musée de Roubaix; Musée de la Mode de Marseille. Address: 3 rue de Turbego, Paris, France.

PUBLICATIONS

On de SENNEVILLE:

Books

Elisabeth de Senneville: une mode hors mode [monograph], Paris 1994.

Articles

Lafee, Scott, "Geek Chic," in New Scientist, 24 February 2001.

*

I like to see myself as a designer of futurism and technology. Since 1979 I have been designing all my prints with computers and I have introduced futuristic fabrics into fashion, such as holographic material. I always try to think that my clothes can still be worn after the year 2000. I also like to design for children; I make very modern prints and shapes for them. My clothes have often been compared to Chinese clothes because they have simplicity.

—Elisabeth de Senneville

* * *

While Elisabeth de Senneville has been active in French fashion since the 1960s, she came to prominence in the late 1970s and 1980s with her collections of avant-garde contemporary sportswear, defining her design signature, a combination of functionalist and futuristic sensibilities. Her look and inspirations have remained consistent since she founded her own line in 1975. Rather than following trends, de Senneville has been primarily interested in new technological developments and constantly seeks to apply nonapparel industrial processes and materials to her clothes.

Her vivid, often neon or fluorescent colored prints are derived from computer generated images, using video technology and images from the mass media or art history that she appropriates and applies to her clothes. Unconventional and industrial materials she has used include plastic, Tyvek (an extremely strong, nonwoven fireproof material), canvas, knitted copper threads, rubber, and wool mattress padding. Among her most unusual innovations were the creation, in 1981, of plastic clothes imprinted with holograms. While many of her materials have been unusual, the shapes of de Senneville's clothes are often basic and functional, inspired by athletic wear, work clothes such as jumpsuits, or the quilted clothes of the masses of China. Her signature Chinese inspired outerwear jacket is hip-length quilted canvas that snaps up to a bright plastic collar.

The de Senneville customer is young, adventurous, and intelligent. In her stores in Paris, customers can shop for avant-garde books as well as clothes and can see and hear the work of young artists and musicians. The designer has not only had an affinity for contemporary art but has also actively participated in the intellectual discourses of current art practice by adopting theoretical techniques such as appropriation and reinterpretation and recycling of images. Her work is not meant, however, for an intellectual élite. She has consistently sought new means of exposing her clothes to a wider audience, through licensing agreements, mail-order, and worldwide distribution arrangements.

In 1994 and 1995, de Senneville celebrated 20 years designing her own collection with an exhibition at the Musée de la Mode de Marseille. The exhibition title, Une mode hors mode (A Fashion Outside Fashion), aptly expressed de Senneville's design point of view which, though always stylish and contemporary, was a distinct manifestation of her individualistic concerns with materials and processes.

While de Senneville had hoped her clothes would have relevance in the 21st century, she was right on target. In 2001 the futuristic designer met the future head on and created clothing with New Age accoutrements. As Scott Lafee of New Scientist (24 February 2001) remarked, "Clothing of the future will be smart, so smart it will organize your day." The de Senneville take on such a proposition was designing dresses with built-in microcapsules with a variety of substances from heat-sensitive dyes (that vary color with body temperature), sunscreen or fragrance. In addition, according to Lafee, "She even has dresses with stripes of moisture-sensitive pigments that change color according to the weather. They turn blue when the sun's out, grey on cloudy days, and pink when it's raining." While such creations may not be everyone's cup of tea, de Senneville most definitely represents the future of fashion designing.

—Alan E. Rosenberg; updated by Nelly Rhodes

DESSÈS, Jean

French designer

Born: Jean Dimitre Verginie, in Alexandria, Egypt, 6 August 1904. Education: Studied law, then design, in Paris. Career: Designer, Mme. Jane in Paris, 1925–37; opened own house in Paris, 1937; launched Jean Dessès Diffusion line in America, 1950; in Paris, opened boutique Les Soeurs Hortenses, 1951, and made-to-measure dress shop, Bazaar, 1953; closed couture house, 1960; closed ready-to-wear house, 1965; freelance designer in Greece, to 1970. Died: 2 August 1970, in Athens, Greece.

PUBLICATIONS

On DESSÈS:

Books

- Bertin, Célia, Paris à la Mode, London, 1956.
- Carter, Ernestine, With Tongue in Chic, London, 1974.
- Lambert, Eleanor, World of Fashion: People, Places, Resources, New York and London, 1976.
- Carter, Ernestine, The Changing World of Fashion: 1900 to the Present, London, 1977.
- Stegemeyer, Anne, Who's Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.

* * *

Jean Dessès belongs to the small group of couturiers, such as Vionnet, Balenciaga, and Grès, whose clothing combines technical skill with sculptural aesthetic. Although he began as a designer for a small couture house in Paris in the 1920s and opened his own house in 1937, it was not until the postwar years of the 1940s and 1950s that his work gained its greatest acclaim.

The hallmarks of his postwar fame are evident in his prewar work. Draped and twisted sashes and bodices, cape or kimono sleeves, a fondness for asymmetry, and ornament derived from the architecture of the garment rather than applied as surface decoration, were all elements of both his day and evening wear in the late 1930s. Magazine coverage during that period suggests that he favored jerseys and crêpes, with the jersey dresses in particular anticipating the draping skill which Dessès would use to such advantage after 1945.

Immediately after the war Dessès began to explore his own heritage for design themes which would best use his cutting expertise. He showed a collection inspired by ancient Egyptian costume in 1946 and returned to this theme in the mid-1950s, while the costume of ancient Greece provided a continuous thread through his work. His design legacy rests primarily on the pleated and draped silk chiffon evening dresses which notably expressed Dessès' historical interests.

Dessès' transition from jersey to chiffon may have been mandated by the fuller silhouettes of the 1940s, or perhaps by the fact that Madame Grès was the acknowledged master of the draped jersey column, but the change set him on a path which made his name. In September 1951 Vogue lauded Dessès' chiffon gowns as the "Fords" of his collection and "good for a lifetime." By 1958 they were termed "classic." The variations on the theme seemed endless, but there are several important common factors. Appearances notwithstanding, the dresses were not always simple Grecian draperies. The understructures were formal and the cuts were complex, with swags, sashes, bows, and scarves twisted and pleated into shapes that seem effortless and defy analysis; in lesser hands they might simply seem contrived. The dresses also show his sensitive, if somewhat conservative, color sense. Cream or ivory, always flattering, are constants, but Dessès often used two or three shades of one hue, or used three different hues, but of equal value, to maintain harmony. It is also worth noting that the garments are impeccably made; every yard of hem in the double- or triple-tiered chiffon skirts has a hand-rolled finish.

Dessès was equally adept with crisp silks, rough tweeds, and fine dress wools, and his most skilful and inventive draping and cutting techniques were often allied with these fabrics. Dropped shoulder lines, raglan or kimono sleeve variations, and draped collars softened voluminous mohair coats and tweed suit jackets. Tucks, godets, and intricate seaming molded crêpe and gabardine dresses to the contours of the figure. Skirt fullness was swept to the back, folded in at the side, or turned into tiers of flounces which spiraled from hem to hip—all through manipulation of the grain in one piece of cloth.

The most successful of his silhouettes, such as the Streamlined and Winged collections of 1949 and 1951, may not have set trends, but they interpreted the trend with elegance. He favored asymmetry and oblique lines, which gave the garments a sense of movement even in repose. Bold, architectural details such as stand-away pockets and cuffs were used like punctuation marks, adding drama and intensity to a silhouette. Dessès made complex but not fussy clothes, and, on occasion, did set the trend in 1950 when he introduced a one-sleeved stole.

current art practice by adopting theoretical techniques such as appropriation and reinterpretation and recycling of images. Her work is not meant, however, for an intellectual élite. She has consistently sought new means of exposing her clothes to a wider audience, through licensing agreements, mail-order, and worldwide distribution arrangements.

In 1994 and 1995, de Senneville celebrated 20 years designing her own collection with an exhibition at the Musée de la Mode de Marseille. The exhibition title, Une mode hors mode (A Fashion Outside Fashion), aptly expressed de Senneville's design point of view which, though always stylish and contemporary, was a distinct manifestation of her individualistic concerns with materials and processes.

While de Senneville had hoped her clothes would have relevance in the 21st century, she was right on target. In 2001 the futuristic designer met the future head on and created clothing with New Age accoutrements. As Scott Lafee of New Scientist (24 February 2001) remarked, "Clothing of the future will be smart, so smart it will organize your day." The de Senneville take on such a proposition was designing dresses with built-in microcapsules with a variety of substances from heat-sensitive dyes (that vary color with body temperature), sunscreen or fragrance. In addition, according to Lafee, "She even has dresses with stripes of moisture-sensitive pigments that change color according to the weather. They turn blue when the sun's out, grey on cloudy days, and pink when it's raining." While such creations may not be everyone's cup of tea, de Senneville most definitely represents the future of fashion designing.

—Alan E. Rosenberg; updated by Nelly Rhodes

DESSÈS, Jean

French designer

Born: Jean Dimitre Verginie, in Alexandria, Egypt, 6 August 1904. Education: Studied law, then design, in Paris. Career: Designer, Mme. Jane in Paris, 1925–37; opened own house in Paris, 1937; launched Jean Dessès Diffusion line in America, 1950; in Paris, opened boutique Les Soeurs Hortenses, 1951, and made-to-measure dress shop, Bazaar, 1953; closed couture house, 1960; closed ready-to-wear house, 1965; freelance designer in Greece, to 1970. Died: 2 August 1970, in Athens, Greece.

PUBLICATIONS

On DESSÈS:

Books

- Bertin, Célia, Paris à la Mode, London, 1956.
- Carter, Ernestine, With Tongue in Chic, London, 1974.
- Lambert, Eleanor, World of Fashion: People, Places, Resources, New York and London, 1976.
- Carter, Ernestine, The Changing World of Fashion: 1900 to the Present, London, 1977.
- Stegemeyer, Anne, Who's Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.

* * *

Jean Dessès belongs to the small group of couturiers, such as Vionnet, Balenciaga, and Grès, whose clothing combines technical skill with sculptural aesthetic. Although he began as a designer for a small couture house in Paris in the 1920s and opened his own house in 1937, it was not until the postwar years of the 1940s and 1950s that his work gained its greatest acclaim.

The hallmarks of his postwar fame are evident in his prewar work. Draped and twisted sashes and bodices, cape or kimono sleeves, a fondness for asymmetry, and ornament derived from the architecture of the garment rather than applied as surface decoration, were all elements of both his day and evening wear in the late 1930s. Magazine coverage during that period suggests that he favored jerseys and crêpes, with the jersey dresses in particular anticipating the draping skill which Dessès would use to such advantage after 1945.

Immediately after the war Dessès began to explore his own heritage for design themes which would best use his cutting expertise. He showed a collection inspired by ancient Egyptian costume in 1946 and returned to this theme in the mid-1950s, while the costume of ancient Greece provided a continuous thread through his work. His design legacy rests primarily on the pleated and draped silk chiffon evening dresses which notably expressed Dessès' historical interests.

Dessès' transition from jersey to chiffon may have been mandated by the fuller silhouettes of the 1940s, or perhaps by the fact that Madame Grès was the acknowledged master of the draped jersey column, but the change set him on a path which made his name. In September 1951 Vogue lauded Dessès' chiffon gowns as the "Fords" of his collection and "good for a lifetime." By 1958 they were termed "classic." The variations on the theme seemed endless, but there are several important common factors. Appearances notwithstanding, the dresses were not always simple Grecian draperies. The understructures were formal and the cuts were complex, with swags, sashes, bows, and scarves twisted and pleated into shapes that seem effortless and defy analysis; in lesser hands they might simply seem contrived. The dresses also show his sensitive, if somewhat conservative, color sense. Cream or ivory, always flattering, are constants, but Dessès often used two or three shades of one hue, or used three different hues, but of equal value, to maintain harmony. It is also worth noting that the garments are impeccably made; every yard of hem in the double-or triple-tiered chiffon skirts has a hand-rolled finish.

Dessès was equally adept with crisp silks, rough tweeds, and fine dress wools, and his most skilful and inventive draping and cutting techniques were often allied with these fabrics. Dropped shoulder lines, raglan or kimono sleeve variations, and draped collars softened voluminous mohair coats and tweed suit jackets. Tucks, godets, and intricate seaming molded crêpe and gabardine dresses to the contours of the figure. Skirt fullness was swept to the back, folded in at the side, or turned into tiers of flounces which spiraled from hem to hip—all through manipulation of the grain in one piece of cloth.

The most successful of his silhouettes, such as the Streamlined and Winged collections of 1949 and 1951, may not have set trends, but they interpreted the trend with elegance. He favored asymmetry and oblique lines, which gave the garments a sense of movement even in repose. Bold, architectural details such as stand-away pockets and cuffs were used like punctuation marks, adding drama and intensity to a silhouette. Dessès made complex but not fussy clothes, and, on occasion, did set the trend in 1950 when he introduced a one-sleeved stole.

Dessès made an easy transition to the 1960s. His stylistic talents were well suited to the cutting possibilities of the stiffer fabrics and simpler silhouettes in vogue at the time. He was also able to devote more of his attention to the ready-to-wear "Jean Dessès Diffusion" line he had started in 1949, and licensed to two U.S. manufacturers—one for suits and one for evening clothes. Dessès closed his couture operation in 1965, apparently due to poor health, and lived in Greece, occasionally designing on a freelance basis until his death in 1970. His influence on fashion has outlived him, however, figuring into the work of Valentino, who was with the Dessès house for several years in the 1950s.

—Madelyn Shaw

DIOR, Christian

French designer

Born: Granville, France, 21 January 1905. Education: Studied political science at École des Sciences Politiques, Paris, 1920–25. Military Service: Served in the French Army, 1927–28, mobilized, 1939–40. Career: Art dealer, 1928–31; freelance designer and sketch artist, 1934–37; assistant designer, Piguet, 1937–39; lived in Provence, 1940–42; designer, Lelong, 1941–46; Maison Dior opened, 1947; Christian Dior-New York opened, 1948; firm continued after death, Yves Saint Laurent took over designs, 1957–60; Marc Bohan signed as designer, 1960–89; Miss Dior boutique opened, 1967; fragrances and cosmetics sold to Moët-Hennessey, 1972; acquired by Agache-Willot; acquired by Bernard Arnault, 1984; went public as Christian Dior SA, 1988; Gianfranco Ferré became head designer, 1989; brought most licensing in-house by 1995; hired John Galliano, 1996; began opening new stores, 1999–2000; owns majority stake in LVMH; fragrances include: Miss Dior, 1947; Diorama, 1949; Diorissima, 1956; Diorling, 1963; Tendre Poison, 1994; Dolce Vita, 1995; Hypnotic Poison, 1998; Higher Dior, 2001. Exhibitions: Christian Dior et le Cinéma, Cinémathèque Francaise, Paris, 1983; Dessins de Dior, Musée des Arts de la Mode, Paris, 1987; Gruau: Modes et publicité, Musée de la Mode et du costume, 1989; Réne Gruau pour Christian Dior, Musée des Beaux Arts, 1990; Christian Dior: The Magic of the Fashion, Powerhouse Museum, 1994; Metropolitan Museum of Art, [retrospective], 1996; John Galliano at Dior, [retrospective], Design Museum of London, 2001–02. Awards: Neiman Marcus award, Dallas, 1947; Remise de la legion d'honneur a Christian Dior, 1950; Parsons School of Design Distinguished Achievement award, New York, 1956; Fashion Industry Foundation award, to the House of Dior, New York, 1990. Died: 24 October 1957, in Montecatini, Italy. Company Address: 30 avenue Montaigne, 75008 Paris, France. Company Website: www.dior.com.

PUBLICATIONS

By DIOR:

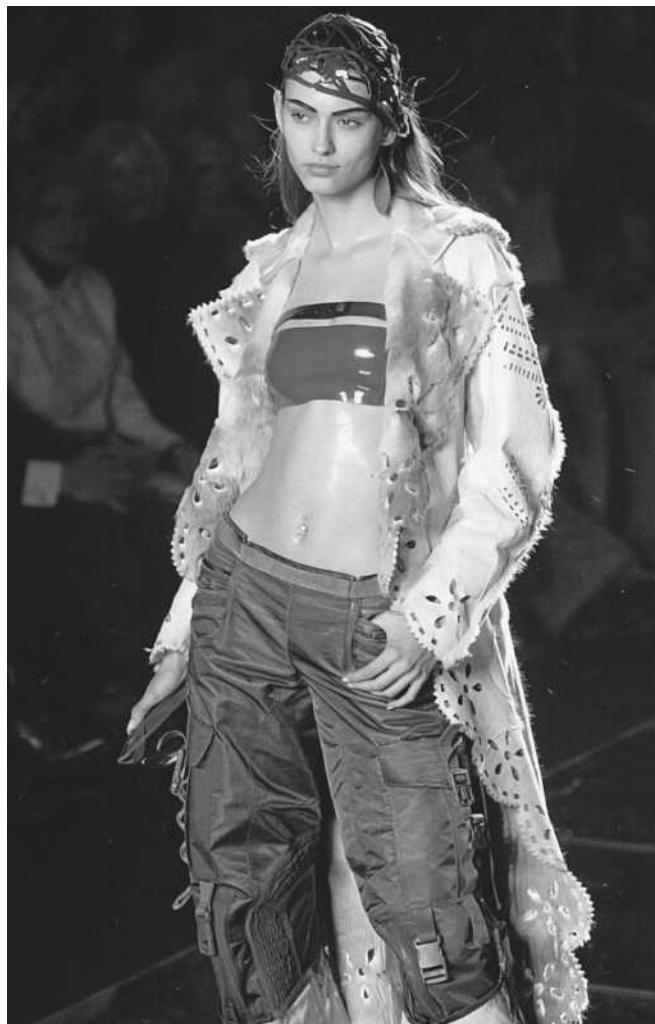

Books

Talking About Fashion, with Alice Chavane and Elie Rabourdin, London, 1954.
Dior by Dior, London, 1957.

On DIOR:

Books

- Lyman, Ruth, ed., Couture: An Illustrated History of the Great Paris Designers and Their Creations, New York, 1972.
- Keenan, Brigid, Dior in Vogue, London, 1981.
- Milbank, Caroline Reynolds, Couture: The Great Designers, New York, 1985.
- Musée des Arts de la Mode, Homage à Christian Dior [exhibition catalogue], Paris, 1986.
- Giroud, Françoise, Dior: Christian Dior 1905–1957, London, 1987.
- Pochna, Marie-France, Christian Dior, Paris, 1994.
- _____, Christian Dior: The Man Who Made the World Look New, London, 1994, 1996.
- Christian Dior: The Magic of Fashion*, Sydney, 1994; London, 2000.
- Cawthorne, Nigel, The New Look: The Dior Revolution, London, 1996.
- _____, Key Moments in Fashion, London, 1998.
- Drosson, Monique, and Lidia Popielska, Christian Dior, Marcel Boussac, 1947–1978, Alsace, 1998.

Christian Dior, fall/winter 2001 ready-to-wear collection designed by John Galliano. © AP/Wide World Photos.

Dessès made an easy transition to the 1960s. His stylistic talents were well suited to the cutting possibilities of the stiffer fabrics and simpler silhouettes in vogue at the time. He was also able to devote more of his attention to the ready-to-wear "Jean Dessès Diffusion" line he had started in 1949, and licensed to two U.S. manufacturers—one for suits and one for evening clothes. Dessès closed his couture operation in 1965, apparently due to poor health, and lived in Greece, occasionally designing on a freelance basis until his death in 1970. His influence on fashion has outlived him, however, figuring into the work of Valentino, who was with the Dessès house for several years in the 1950s.

—Madelyn Shaw

DIOR, Christian

French designer

Born: Granville, France, 21 January 1905. Education: Studied political science at École des Sciences Politiques, Paris, 1920–25. Military Service: Served in the French Army, 1927–28, mobilized, 1939–40. Career: Art dealer, 1928–31; freelance designer and sketch artist, 1934–37; assistant designer, Piguet, 1937–39; lived in Provence, 1940–42; designer, Lelong, 1941–46; Maison Dior opened, 1947; Christian Dior-New York opened, 1948; firm continued after death, Yves Saint Laurent took over designs, 1957–60; Marc Bohan signed as designer, 1960–89; Miss Dior boutique opened, 1967; fragrances and cosmetics sold to Moët-Hennessey, 1972; acquired by Agache-Willot; acquired by Bernard Arnault, 1984; went public as Christian Dior SA, 1988; Gianfranco Ferré became head designer, 1989; brought most licensing in-house by 1995; hired John Galliano, 1996; began opening new stores, 1999–2000; owns majority stake in LVMH; fragrances include: Miss Dior, 1947; Diorama, 1949; Diorissima, 1956; Diorling, 1963; Tendre Poison, 1994; Dolce Vita, 1995; Hypnotic Poison, 1998; Higher Dior, 2001. Exhibitions: Christian Dior et le Cinéma, Cinémathèque Francaise, Paris, 1983; Dessins de Dior, Musée des Arts de la Mode, Paris, 1987; Gruau: Modes et publicité, Musée de la Mode et du costume, 1989; Réne Gruau pour Christian Dior, Musée des Beaux Arts, 1990; Christian Dior: The Magic of the Fashion, Powerhouse Museum, 1994; Metropolitan Museum of Art, [retrospective], 1996; John Galliano at Dior, [retrospective], Design Museum of London, 2001–02. Awards: Neiman Marcus award, Dallas, 1947; Remise de la legion d'honneur a Christian Dior, 1950; Parsons School of Design Distinguished Achievement award, New York, 1956; Fashion Industry Foundation award, to the House of Dior, New York, 1990. Died: 24 October 1957, in Montecatini, Italy. Company Address: 30 avenue Montaigne, 75008 Paris, France. Company Website: www.dior.com.

PUBLICATIONS

By DIOR:

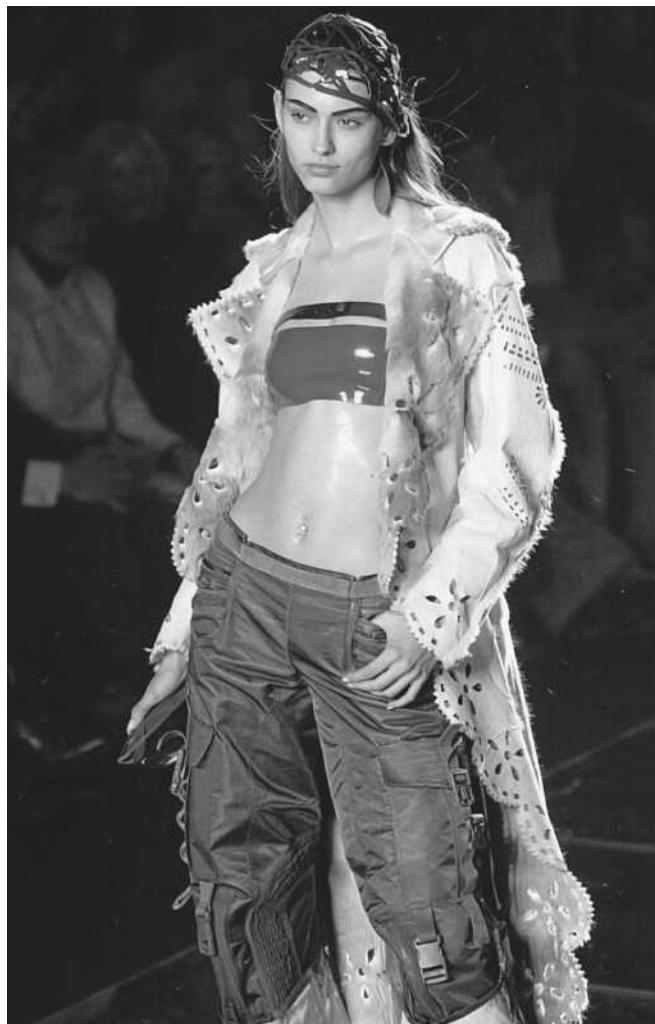

Books

Talking About Fashion, with Alice Chavane and Elie Rabourdin, London, 1954.
Dior by Dior, London, 1957.

On DIOR:

Books

- Lyman, Ruth, ed., Couture: An Illustrated History of the Great Paris Designers and Their Creations, New York, 1972.
- Keenan, Brigid, Dior in Vogue, London, 1981.
- Milbank, Caroline Reynolds, Couture: The Great Designers, New York, 1985.
- Musée des Arts de la Mode, Homage à Christian Dior [exhibition catalogue], Paris, 1986.
- Giroud, Françoise, Dior: Christian Dior 1905–1957, London, 1987.
- Pochna, Marie-France, Christian Dior, Paris, 1994.
- _____, Christian Dior: The Man Who Made the World Look New, London, 1994, 1996.
- Christian Dior: The Magic of Fashion*, Sydney, 1994; London, 2000.
- Cawthorne, Nigel, The New Look: The Dior Revolution, London, 1996.
- _____, Key Moments in Fashion, London, 1998.
- Drosson, Monique, and Lidia Popielska, Christian Dior, Marcel Boussac, 1947–1978, Alsace, 1998.

Christian Dior, fall/winter 2001 ready-to-wear collection designed by John Galliano. © AP/Wide World Photos.

Christian Dior, 1968 collection: wedding gown and long cape with a fur lined hood. © AP/Wide World Photos.

de Réthy, Esmeralda, and Jean-Louis Perreau, Christian Dior and the Founding of His House, London, 2001.

Articles

McCooey, Meriel, "The New Look," in the Sunday Times Magazine (London), 11 August 1968.

"Dior is Dior is Dior," in American Fabrics & Fashions, No. 114 (New York), 1978.

McDowell, Colin, "Dior: The Myth, the Legend and Tragedy," in The Guardian, 12 February 1987.

Buck, Joan Juliet, "Dior's New Look, Then and Now," in Vogue, March 1987.

Bricker, Charles, "Looking Back at the New Look," in Connoisseur (New York), April 1987.

Harbrecht, Ursula, "Hommage à Christian Dior," in Textiles Suisses (Lausanne), May 1987.

Snow, Carmel, "It's Quite a Revolution, Dear Christian; Your Dresses Have Such a New Look," in the Independent, 23 October 1987.

Ingrassia, Michele, with Meggan Dally, "Dior Meets Disney World," in Newsweek, 26 December 1994.

Schiro, Anne-Marie, "Color-Filled Chloé and Rarefied Dior," in the New York Times, 17 March 1995.

"Designing Dior—Who's Next?" in WWD, 16 July 1996.

Mehle, Aileen, "Dior New York Look," in WWD, 11 December 1996.

Duffy, Martha, "The Pope of Fashion: Bernard Arnault...," in Time, 21 April 1997.

Weil, Jennifer, et al., "Arnault's New Agenda for LVMH, Dior Puts Emphasis on Retailing," in WWD, 10 June 1998.

Weisman, Katherine, "Galliano's Open-Dior Policy," in WWD, 3 December 1999.

Rubenstein, Hal, "The Look of Christian Dior," in InStyle, 1 November 2000.

Socha, Miles, "The Galliano Factor: Dior Lays Groundwork for 'Exceptional' 2001," in WWD, 16 January 2001.

"Born Again Christians," in Time International, 19 February 2001.

"Dior Income Rises, Galliano Sales Cited," in WWD, 12 March 2001.

Deeny, Godfrey, "Christian Dior: Too Many Clothes, Not Enough Models," at Fashion Windows, www.fashionwindows.com, 7 July 2001.

Davis, Boyd, "Christian Dior à la America," at Fashion Windows, www.fashionwindows.com, 9 October 2001.

* * *

Although Christian Dior died in 1957, he is perhaps one of the most famous fashion designers of both the 20th and 21st centuries. In the years after the debut of his first collection in 1947 he was a legendary figure and the world press developed an extraordinary love affair with him, increasing their enthusiasm with each new collection. Dior never disappointed them, constantly creating clothes that were newsworthy as well as beautiful.

Dior was middle-aged when he achieved fame. A sensitive and gentle personality, he had previously worked as a fashion illustrator, then as a design assistant for both Robert Piguet and Lucien Lelong in Paris. In 1946 the French textile magnate Marcel Boussac offered to finance the opening of Dior's own couture house and secured the lease on 30 avenue Montaigne, Paris. The first collection was revolutionary, heralded as the "New Look" by the fashion press—Dior himself had christened it the "Corolle Line." It was a composition of rounded shoulders, shapely emphasis of the bust, cinched waist, and curvaceous bell-shaped skirt in luxurious fabric.

The concept of the collection was not new, bearing a striking resemblance to French fashions of the 1860s. Dior himself attributed his inspiration to the pretty, elegant clothes he had remembered his mother wearing to the Deauville races in the 1900s. Even though several other designers had experimented with or predicted the new silhouette, Dior's luxurious version reawakened the world to the importance of Parisian couture. At a standstill during World War II, Paris had lost its way as the world's fashion capital. Dior reestablished it as a center of excellence, creating what Janey Ironside of the Royal College of Art in London described as "a new chance in life, a new love affair."

There were many criticisms of the New Look; feminists have argued it was an attempt to return women to an oppressed, decorative role with its emphasis on the restrictive padding, corset, and crinoline.

Christian Dior, fall/winter 2001 collection designed by Hedi Slimane.
© AP/Wide World Photos.

Others were shocked by the extravagant use of ornament and fabric when clothes were still being rationed. The New Look, however, rapidly became a postwar cultural symbol for what Dior himself described as "Youth, hope, and the future." After creating a furor with his first collection, Dior established himself as a cautious, methodical designer. Subsequent collections were a continuation of the New Look theme of highly constructed clothes. They were christened with names that described their silhouettes, the Zig Zag Line, A Line, Y Line, Arrow Line, etc. All the collections were realized with the finest tailoring and the most sumptuous fabrics: satins, traditional suiting, fine wools, taffetas, and lavish embroideries.

Throughout Dior's ten years of fame, none of his collections failed, either critically or commercially. The only threat to his run of success occurred when Chanel made a fashion comeback in 1954 at the age of 71. Chanel's philosophy—clothes should be relaxed, ageless, dateless, and easy to wear—completely opposed Dior's philosophy. "Fifties Horrors," was how she described male couturiers, deplored them for torturing bodies into ridiculous shapes. Dior's reaction was to introduce his most unstructured collection, the "Lily of the Valley" line was young, fresh, and unsophisticated. Relaxed, casual jackets with pleated skirts and sailor-collared blouses, these Dior clothes were easy and beautiful.

By the time Dior died his name had become synonymous with taste and luxury. The business had an estimated turnover of $20-million annually, a phenomenal figure in those days, thanks in part to Dior's own shrewdness. Dior organized licence agreements to manufacture accessories internationally, and at the time of his death, perfume, furs, scarves, corsetry, knitwear, lingerie, costume jewelry, and shoes were being produced.

Many of Dior's associates have said that his death was timely and that his work and fashion philosophy were entirely suited to his period. It would be interesting to speculate how Dior would have adapted to the excesses of fashion in the 1960s, 1970s and 1980s, because, as his former personal assistant, Madame Raymonde, once said, "If Dior had lived, fashion would not be in the state it is in now." Nor would his business have gone through multiple owners, or his name become so overlicensed its cachet was nearly lost. After years of struggle, the Dior reclaimed its licenses and rebuilt an empire in the capable hands of Bernard Arnault who bought the firm in 1984 from its bankrupt owner, Agache-Willot.

Many top designers have had stints at Dior, including Yves Saint Laurent who took over after Christian's death, followed by Marc Bohan, Gianfranco Ferré, and John Galliano. Galliano's bad-boy image brought much attention to Dior, but his designs have reinvigorated the house and once again brought renown to the Dior name.

—Kevin Almond; updated by Sydonie Benét

DKNY

See KARAN, Donna

DOLCE & GABBANA

Italian ready-to-wear firm

Established: by Domenico Dolce and Stefano Gabbana, 1982. Dolce born in Palermo, Italy, 13 August 1958; Gabbana born in Venice, Italy, 14 November 1962. Both designed in Milan, 1980–82. Company History: First major women's collection, 1985; knitwear collection first shown, 1987; opened showrooms in Milan, 1987, and New York, 1990; introduced lingerie and beachwear, 1989; Dolce & Gabbana Monogriffe shops opened in Tokyo, 1989, Milan, 1990, Hong Kong, 1991, and Milan shop for menswear, 1991; menswear collection first showing, 1990; launched signature fragrance line, 1992; introduced lower-priced D&G line, 1993; consultants to Genny for Complice line, 1990; opened Dolce & Gabbana and D&G stores in New York, 1997; signed licensing deal with Onward Kashiyama to distribute designs in Japan, 1998; opened Dolce and Gabbana nightclub, Postgarage, in Legnano, Italy, 1998; company assumed ownership stakes in two licensees, Dolce Saverio and Marcolin, 1999; split signature line into White Label and Black Label, 1999; launched complementary male and female fragrances, 1999; opened West Coast flagship store in Beverly Hills, California, 2000; launched Light Blue fragrance, 2001. Awards: Woolmark award, 1991. Company Address: Via Santa Cecilia, 7, 20122 Milan, Italy.

Dolce & Gabbana, fall/winter 2001–02 collection. © AP/Wide World Photos.

PUBLICATIONS

By DOLCE & GABBANA:

Books

10 Years of Dolce & Gabbana, New York, 1996.
Dolce & Gabbana: Wildness, Milan, 1997, New York, 1998.

On DOLCE & GABBANA:

Books

Stegemeyer, Anne, Who's Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.
Rossellini, Isabella, Ten Years of Dolce & Gabbana, Munich & New York, 1996.
Sozzani, Franca, Dolce & Gabbana, New York, 1998, London, 1999.
Baudot, François, Fashion: The Twentieth Century, New York, 1999.

Articles

Hume, Marion, "La Dolce Vita," in the Sunday Times (London), 4 March 1990.

with pleated skirts and sailor-collared blouses, these Dior clothes were easy and beautiful.

By the time Dior died his name had become synonymous with taste and luxury. The business had an estimated turnover of $20-million annually, a phenomenal figure in those days, thanks in part to Dior's own shrewdness. Dior organized licence agreements to manufacture accessories internationally, and at the time of his death, perfume, furs, scarves, corsetry, knitwear, lingerie, costume jewelry, and shoes were being produced.

Many of Dior's associates have said that his death was timely and that his work and fashion philosophy were entirely suited to his period. It would be interesting to speculate how Dior would have adapted to the excesses of fashion in the 1960s, 1970s and 1980s, because, as his former personal assistant, Madame Raymonde, once said, "If Dior had lived, fashion would not be in the state it is in now." Nor would his business have gone through multiple owners, or his name become so overlicensed its cachet was nearly lost. After years of struggle, the Dior reclaimed its licenses and rebuilt an empire in the capable hands of Bernard Arnault who bought the firm in 1984 from its bankrupt owner, Agache-Willot.

Many top designers have had stints at Dior, including Yves Saint Laurent who took over after Christian's death, followed by Marc Bohan, Gianfranco Ferré, and John Galliano. Galliano's bad-boy image brought much attention to Dior, but his designs have reinvigorated the house and once again brought renown to the Dior name.

—Kevin Almond; updated by Sydonie Benét

DKNY

See KARAN, Donna

DOLCE & GABBANA

Italian ready-to-wear firm

Established: by Domenico Dolce and Stefano Gabbana, 1982. Dolce born in Palermo, Italy, 13 August 1958; Gabbana born in Venice, Italy, 14 November 1962. Both designed in Milan, 1980–82. Company History: First major women's collection, 1985; knitwear collection first shown, 1987; opened showrooms in Milan, 1987, and New York, 1990; introduced lingerie and beachwear, 1989; Dolce & Gabbana Monogriffe shops opened in Tokyo, 1989, Milan, 1990, Hong Kong, 1991, and Milan shop for menswear, 1991; menswear collection first showing, 1990; launched signature fragrance line, 1992; introduced lower-priced D&G line, 1993; consultants to Genny for Complice line, 1990; opened Dolce & Gabbana and D&G stores in New York, 1997; signed licensing deal with Onward Kashiyama to distribute designs in Japan, 1998; opened Dolce and Gabbana nightclub, Postgarage, in Legnano, Italy, 1998; company assumed ownership stakes in two licensees, Dolce Saverio and Marcolin, 1999; split signature line into White Label and Black Label, 1999; launched complementary male and female fragrances, 1999; opened West Coast flagship store in Beverly Hills, California, 2000; launched Light Blue fragrance, 2001. Awards: Woolmark award, 1991. Company Address: Via Santa Cecilia, 7, 20122 Milan, Italy.

Dolce & Gabbana, fall/winter 2001–02 collection. © AP/Wide World Photos.

PUBLICATIONS

By DOLCE & GABBANA:

Books

10 Years of Dolce & Gabbana, New York, 1996.
Dolce & Gabbana: Wildness, Milan, 1997, New York, 1998.

On DOLCE & GABBANA:

Books

Stegemeyer, Anne, Who's Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.
Rossellini, Isabella, Ten Years of Dolce & Gabbana, Munich & New York, 1996.
Sozzani, Franca, Dolce & Gabbana, New York, 1998, London, 1999.
Baudot, François, Fashion: The Twentieth Century, New York, 1999.

Articles

Hume, Marion, "La Dolce Vita," in the Sunday Times (London), 4 March 1990.

Dolce & Gabbana, fall/winter 2001–02 collection. © AP/Wide World Photos.

- Spindler, Amy M., "Dolce & Gabbana: Salt-of-the-Earth Chic," in DNR, 26 September 1990.
- Hume, Marion, "The Sicilian Connection," in Elle (London), March 1991.
- "Italy Now: Dolce & Gabbana," in DNR, (New York), 14 January 1992.
- "Day of the Dolce," in WWD, 9 March 1992.
- "La Dolce Vita and the Top Gabbana," in WWD, 13 March 1992.
- Costin, Glynnis, "Dolce & Gabbana," in W, 14 May 1992.
- Broome, Geoff, "Dynamic Duo," in International Collections, Spring/Summer 1992.
- Orlean, Susan, "Breaking Away," in Vogue, September 1992.
- Koski, Lorna, "The Mod Couple," in WWD, 16 November 1994.
- Forden, Sara Gay, "Dolce and Gabbana Present Dolce & Gabbana," in DNR, 2 January 1995.
- Menkes, Suzy, "A Manhattan Melody in Italian Shows," in the International Herald Tribune, 7 March 1995.
- "Distinctly Dolce," in Elle (London), April 1995.
- Anniss, Elisa, "Dolce & Gabbana Deliver," in Footwear News, 26 May 1997.

- Kaplan, Don, "New York's Double Dose of Dolce & Gabbana," in DNR, 3 September 1997.
- Ilari, Alessandra, "Animal Instinct," in Footwear News, 15 December 1997.
- Conti, Samantha, "Dolce & Gabbana Acquires Holdings in Two Licensees," in WWD, 10 May 1999.
- Cooperman, Jackie, "D&G Makes Beauty Its Business," in WWD, 30 July 1999.
- Murphy, Robert, "Dolce & Gabbana: Ready to Rise to the Next Level," in DNR, 12 June 2000.
- Young, Kristen, "Dolce & Gabbana's Hollywood Dream Comes True," in DNR, 19 July 2000.
- Rubenstein, Hal, "The Look of Dolce & Gabbana," in In Style, 1 April 2001.
- Jones, Rose Apodoca, "Dolce Hits Hollywood, Solo," in WWD, 1 June 2001.
- Naughton, Julie, "Dolce & Gabbana: Targeting the Young at Heart with Light Blue," in WWD, 6 July 2001.
- Brodie, Honor, "Love Dolce Vita," in In Style, 1 August 2001.

* * *

Since their first womenswear collection in 1985, Dolce & Gabbana have evolved into perhaps the definitive purveyors of sexy clothes for women who want to revel in their voluptuous femininity. They have taken items like satin corset bodies, black hold-up stockings, fishnets, and maribou-trimmed baby dolls out of their previous demimonde existence and put them together in such a way that they have become classy outfits for the new glamorous image of the 1990s, an escape from the pervasive unisex sporty styles.

Loved by fashion magazines and film stars alike, the partnership of Domenico Dolce and Stefano Gabbana revives the Southern Italian sex bomb look, inspired by the films of Roberto Rossellini, Luchino Visconti, and Federico Fellini the pair grew up on, coupled with an adoration of the strongly romantic Mediterranean ideals of Sicily. They can take a large amount of credit for the rise in images of the fashionable woman empowering herself by reclaiming sexual stereotypes and using them to her own benefit.

They brush aside the preoccupations of other Milan-based designers with mix-and-match separates and revamp potent images previously deemed degrading to women—the geisha, the baby doll, the scantily clad starlet—and give them a new lease on life. Confidence and irony are key for Dolce & Gabbana: their women are very much in control, whether in one of their glittering rhinestone-covered bodices—notably chosen by postfeminist icon Madonna to make an impact at the 1991 Cannes Film Festival and subsequently filtered down into every High Street chain—or a slightly more sober but nonetheless sexy stretch velvet Empire cut jacket and leggings.

Although originating from opposite ends of Italy, Dolce and Gabbana's shared interests and influences give a sense of unity to their collections and an instantly recognizable look. Their use of film imagery and obvious love of the fiery beauty of stars like Sophia Loren and Gina Lollobrigida has imbued their advertising with an unforgettablely glamorous style of its own. They combine supermodels with screen stars to create images that ooze an earthy sexuality.

The same key elements of sexiness mixed with traditional elements are applied to the menswear range, first shown in January 1990 and designed to complement Dolce & Gabbana's women. Skilled Sicilian craftswomen and tailors, supervised by Dolce's father, are employed to produce the internationally acclaimed menswear collections espousing a more laid-back, witty approach to the 1990s, after the brasher, more rigid styles of the previous decade. Muted shades of earthy browns are used alongside blacks with flashes of scarlet to produce modern-day versions of Sicilian bandits, with bandannas around their necks, and bikers in tattoo-covered leather jackets, lightened by the leggings used so widely by Dolce & Gabbana. Current fashion influences are often absorbed, the tie-dyed 1970s feel of their 1992 summer collection being a prime example, but there is always a more timeless selection of unstructured suits, often based on a 19th-century high-buttoning tighter-cut style, and knitwear that explores all its textural possibilities to give it a very tactile appeal.

Both Dolce & Gabbana's menswear and womenswear lines have been international bestsellers. Influential and innovative, the clothes express a confident, sexy glamor that, however potent, never overpowers the wearer's personality, making them one of the most important design forces to emerge from Italy in recent years. The partners have been working to expand their business outside of Italy and the rest of Europe, which together account for 70 percent of the company's business as of 2001. In 1998 Dolce & Gabanna signed a deal with Onward Kashiyama to distribute their designs in Japan, and in 2001, they held their first showing outside Milan. Naturally, given the pair's longtime ties to Hollywood, they chose the Los Angeles area as their venue.

The company's retail operations are growing worldwide, with owned and franchised boutiques in place for both the lower-priced D&G and signature Dolce & Gabbana lines throughout Asia, North America, and Europe, as well as in-house boutiques in upscale retail outlets worldwide. About half the company's approximately 50 stores are under the Dolce & Gabbana banner, with the remainder as D&G boutiques. The company entered New York's retail scene in 1997, opening both a flagship Dolce & Gabbana store on the Upper East Side and a D&G shop in SoHo, as well as debuting a West Coast flagship store in Beverly Hills in 2000.

Dolce & Gabbana has also expanded its licensing activity for both the Dolce & Gabbana and D&G brands, having moved into fragrances, eyewear, beachwear, innerwear, home furnishings, and teen collections. In 1999 Dolce & Gabbana took increased control over some of its licensed lines by maintaining a 51-percent ownership position in its signature collection licensee, Dolce Saverio (owned by Dolce's father) and six percent of its eyewear licensee Marcolin.

The company's footwear collection is one of its licensed success stories. Popular especially in the U.S., the Dolce & Gabbana shoe line includes more than 40 designs each year, along with 20 more under the D&G label. The partners believe footwear is not just an accessory but an art object on its own. They advocate free expression in footwear choices, such as wearing a chiffon evening dress with combat boots, as Gabbana told Footwear News in May 1997.

Fragrances are another significant category; the designers added new scents in the late 1990s to appeal to younger consumers, enhancing their already successful fragrance line. D&G Feminine and D&G Masculine were launched in 1999, first in Italy and then in the United States. Light Blue, for 25- to 40-year-olds, debuted in 2001.

Dolce & Gabbana split its signature line into Black and White labels in 1999. The former incorporated the duo's more cutting-edge work, whereas the latter was more basic and casual. The movement toward more casual dressing in the late 1990s favored Dolce & Gabbana's designs at all price points, since no matter how upscale, their clothing has always retained a certain degree of comfort and casualness. Combining luxury and comfort is an ongoing hallmark of Dolce & Gabbana collections.

Dolce & Gabbana has continued, as throughout its history, to be influenced by Hollywood and to spread the word about its line by outfitting Hollywood celebrities. In addition to maintaining their longtime relationship with Madonna (for whom they created costumes and sets for performances and albums in 2000), the duo has outfitted the likes of Mary J. Blige and Whitney Houston for appearances and performances. In some cases, Dolce & Gabbana designs for musicians and actors influence their direction in subsequent collections, when they incorporate some of the pieces and themes from music tours with which they have been involved.

Throughout the late 1990s and early 2000s, the designers maintained their focus on fun, sexy clothes for men and women, featuring animal prints, vibrant colors, high-tech and experimental fabrics, and innerwear-inspired items. They favor unusual combinations of styles and materials, dubbed "the corsets-and-pinstripes look" by Time International in March 1999. Dolce and Gabbana told Women's Wear Daily in the fall of 1999 that their goal was to achieve a mood of "comfortable elegance," an apt description of the sensibility typical of a Dolce & Gabbana collection.

—Rebecca Arnold; updated by Karen Raugust

DOLCI, Flora

See MANDELLI, Mariuccia

DOMÍNGUEZ, Adolfo

Spanish designer

Born: Orense, Spain, 1950. Education: Graduated with degree in philosophy, Universidad Santiago de Compostela, 1968; studied cinematography and aesthetics in Paris and London. Career: Formed men's ready-to-wear company, early 1970s; first presentation of work, Madrid, 1981; added women's line, opened first Domínguez shops, 1980s; with Jesús, Javier, María-José, Kerme, and Ada Domínguez, established Adolfo Domínguez, S.A., Vigo; introduced first womenswear collection, 1983; designed jewelry, accessories, shoes, handbags; introduced Domínguez Basico bridge line, 1987; introduced perfume, 1990s; also designs Jeans line of casual sportswear; licensing and distribution agreement in Japan with company Taka-Q; company went public, 1997. Address: Polígono San Ciprián de Vinas, Apartado 1160, 32080 Orense, Spain. Website: www.adolfo-dominguez.com.

PUBLICATIONS

On DOMÍNGUEZ:

Articles

Coad, Emma Dent, "Flamenco, Fabrics and Fun," in Design (London), January 1988.

Burns, Tom, "Europe: Bolsa to Try On Domínguez," in the Financial Times, 4 March 1997.

to produce the internationally acclaimed menswear collections espousing a more laid-back, witty approach to the 1990s, after the brasher, more rigid styles of the previous decade. Muted shades of earthy browns are used alongside blacks with flashes of scarlet to produce modern-day versions of Sicilian bandits, with bandannas around their necks, and bikers in tattoo-covered leather jackets, lightened by the leggings used so widely by Dolce & Gabbana. Current fashion influences are often absorbed, the tie-dyed 1970s feel of their 1992 summer collection being a prime example, but there is always a more timeless selection of unstructured suits, often based on a 19th-century high-buttoning tighter-cut style, and knitwear that explores all its textural possibilities to give it a very tactile appeal.

Both Dolce & Gabbana's menswear and womenswear lines have been international bestsellers. Influential and innovative, the clothes express a confident, sexy glamor that, however potent, never overpowers the wearer's personality, making them one of the most important design forces to emerge from Italy in recent years. The partners have been working to expand their business outside of Italy and the rest of Europe, which together account for 70 percent of the company's business as of 2001. In 1998 Dolce & Gabanna signed a deal with Onward Kashiyama to distribute their designs in Japan, and in 2001, they held their first showing outside Milan. Naturally, given the pair's longtime ties to Hollywood, they chose the Los Angeles area as their venue.

The company's retail operations are growing worldwide, with owned and franchised boutiques in place for both the lower-priced D&G and signature Dolce & Gabbana lines throughout Asia, North America, and Europe, as well as in-house boutiques in upscale retail outlets worldwide. About half the company's approximately 50 stores are under the Dolce & Gabbana banner, with the remainder as D&G boutiques. The company entered New York's retail scene in 1997, opening both a flagship Dolce & Gabbana store on the Upper East Side and a D&G shop in SoHo, as well as debuting a West Coast flagship store in Beverly Hills in 2000.

Dolce & Gabbana has also expanded its licensing activity for both the Dolce & Gabbana and D&G brands, having moved into fragrances, eyewear, beachwear, innerwear, home furnishings, and teen collections. In 1999 Dolce & Gabbana took increased control over some of its licensed lines by maintaining a 51-percent ownership position in its signature collection licensee, Dolce Saverio (owned by Dolce's father) and six percent of its eyewear licensee Marcolin.

The company's footwear collection is one of its licensed success stories. Popular especially in the U.S., the Dolce & Gabbana shoe line includes more than 40 designs each year, along with 20 more under the D&G label. The partners believe footwear is not just an accessory but an art object on its own. They advocate free expression in footwear choices, such as wearing a chiffon evening dress with combat boots, as Gabbana told Footwear News in May 1997.

Fragrances are another significant category; the designers added new scents in the late 1990s to appeal to younger consumers, enhancing their already successful fragrance line. D&G Feminine and D&G Masculine were launched in 1999, first in Italy and then in the United States. Light Blue, for 25- to 40-year-olds, debuted in 2001.

Dolce & Gabbana split its signature line into Black and White labels in 1999. The former incorporated the duo's more cutting-edge work, whereas the latter was more basic and casual. The movement toward more casual dressing in the late 1990s favored Dolce & Gabbana's designs at all price points, since no matter how upscale, their clothing has always retained a certain degree of comfort and casualness. Combining luxury and comfort is an ongoing hallmark of Dolce & Gabbana collections.

Dolce & Gabbana has continued, as throughout its history, to be influenced by Hollywood and to spread the word about its line by outfitting Hollywood celebrities. In addition to maintaining their longtime relationship with Madonna (for whom they created costumes and sets for performances and albums in 2000), the duo has outfitted the likes of Mary J. Blige and Whitney Houston for appearances and performances. In some cases, Dolce & Gabbana designs for musicians and actors influence their direction in subsequent collections, when they incorporate some of the pieces and themes from music tours with which they have been involved.

Throughout the late 1990s and early 2000s, the designers maintained their focus on fun, sexy clothes for men and women, featuring animal prints, vibrant colors, high-tech and experimental fabrics, and innerwear-inspired items. They favor unusual combinations of styles and materials, dubbed "the corsets-and-pinstripes look" by Time International in March 1999. Dolce and Gabbana told Women's Wear Daily in the fall of 1999 that their goal was to achieve a mood of "comfortable elegance," an apt description of the sensibility typical of a Dolce & Gabbana collection.

—Rebecca Arnold; updated by Karen Raugust

DOLCI, Flora

See MANDELLI, Mariuccia

DOMÍNGUEZ, Adolfo

Spanish designer

Born: Orense, Spain, 1950. Education: Graduated with degree in philosophy, Universidad Santiago de Compostela, 1968; studied cinematography and aesthetics in Paris and London. Career: Formed men's ready-to-wear company, early 1970s; first presentation of work, Madrid, 1981; added women's line, opened first Domínguez shops, 1980s; with Jesús, Javier, María-José, Kerme, and Ada Domínguez, established Adolfo Domínguez, S.A., Vigo; introduced first womenswear collection, 1983; designed jewelry, accessories, shoes, handbags; introduced Domínguez Basico bridge line, 1987; introduced perfume, 1990s; also designs Jeans line of casual sportswear; licensing and distribution agreement in Japan with company Taka-Q; company went public, 1997. Address: Polígono San Ciprián de Vinas, Apartado 1160, 32080 Orense, Spain. Website: www.adolfo-dominguez.com.

PUBLICATIONS

On DOMÍNGUEZ:

Articles

Coad, Emma Dent, "Flamenco, Fabrics and Fun," in Design (London), January 1988.

Burns, Tom, "Europe: Bolsa to Try On Domínguez," in the Financial Times, 4 March 1997.

- Burns, Tom, "Europe: Domínguez Sets Bolsa Record," in the Financial Times, 13 March 1997.
- McColl, Pat, "Ready-to-Wear Labels from Spain Quietly Infiltrate Paris," in the International Herald Tribune, 17 October 1997.
- Dam, Julie K. L., and A. Coruna, "Simply Galician," in Time, 17 November 1997.
- Nash, Elizabeth, "Forget Paris and Milan—Fashion's Cutting Edge is in Rural Spain," in the Independent Sunday (London), 12 April 1998.
- "Spanish Retailers Aim to Increase Presence on British High Street," from the London Evening Standard in Knight-Ridder/Tribune Business News, 19 October 1999.
- Burns, Tom, "Cortfiel Bids for Spanish Rival," in the Financial Times, 15 March 2001.
- Vitzthum, Carla, "Cortfiel Launches Takeover Bid for Rival Firm Adolfo Domínguez," in the Wall Street Journal, 15 March 2001.
- "Spaniards for the 21st Century: Adolfo Domínguez," available online at Freelance Spain, www.spainview.com, 23 July 2001.

* * *

Working from his native Galicia, Adolfo Domínguez represents the new wave of post-Franco Spanish design. His international corporation has helped to widen the influence of Spanish fashion around the world. The Domínguez family business grew in 30 years from a small manufacturer of ready-to-wear men's clothing to a fashion house with more than 140 owned and franchised outlets in 11 countries worldwide, including shops in Spain, London, Paris, and Hong Kong. The rapid expansion of the business from the early 1970s was founded on the decision to emphasize design and image for the wealthy, urban consumers of the new Spain and also for a sophisticated international clientèle.

The opening of the first Domínguez shop in Madrid marked the beginning in Spain of such chic establishments, presenting an appropriate ambience to support the image of the clothes on sale. The Madrid shop was quickly followed by another in Barcelona, and eight more opened from the home market. With Spain's entry into the European Union, shops were established in London and Paris. The appearance of Domínguez's women's collections in the early 1980s helped to ensure his status in the international fashion world, and markets were consolidated in the U.S. and Japan, where a manufacturing operation was subsequently established. The company went public in 1997 on the Spanish stock market Bolsa with thrilling results. The initial public offering of stocks, representing 70 percent of the company's holdings, set a record for the Bolsa with demand for the shares at more than 50 times the supply.

The success on the stock market, at least in the short run, prompted strong growth in the Domínguez chain, but the surge could not be sustained. The Wall Street Journal concluded that operating costs skyrocketed when "Mr. Domínguez embarked on an expansion spree, opening up stores in Asia and Europe without building up the proper industrial and logistic support to underpin the move." Troubles on the business front, however, did not affect Domínguez's fashion sense.

His intellectual and cosmopolitan approach to design reflects Domínguez's Parisian education in literature and philosophy. He likens fashion to industrial design, describing it as a response to need. Similarly, he rejects the willfulness of much designer clothing and couture, asserting instead the designer's responsibility to the user. Domínguez's clothing is purposeful in the modernist idiom, providing a solution to a particular problem, and a solution that will stand the test of time. He has little use for originality for its own sake, preferring to create quality, classic pieces.

Domínguez's Apollonian view of design as an activity also extends to his sense of the human figure and his treatment of the form through tailoring. He concentrates on elegant contour rather than overt body consciousness; he accentuates stature and elegance of proportion to allure, rather than revealing flesh or emphasizing obvious sexual characteristics. He makes use of classic drapery patterns in his garments for women. His unstructured cuts emphasize the drape of fine materials and the traditional Spanish skill of soft tailoring.

Through his ranges of high-quality menswear and womenswear, a lower-cost Basico line and Jeans, a casual line, Domínguez has developed a reputation for producing unpretentious and comfortable-looking garments of the highest quality in materials and construction. A characteristic of Domínguez designs is the elimination of superfluous detail. His clothes are not ornamented by applied decoration, and surface patterning is rare, yet austerity is relieved by soft drapery and the subtlety of colors. Domínguez's rich, earthy palette of colors is reminiscent of the landscape of his native Galicia.

The Domínguez shops designed by Santiago Seara and Alfredo Freixedo, like the clothes sold in them, reflect a classic, modern simplicity, discreetly detailed and finished in high-quality materials. Both the shops and the fashions mirror the elegant minimalism that has proven so successful for the designer. Domínguez's work presented the sophisticated face of the new Spanish design to both a recently liberated and affluent home market and to an increasingly appreciative world market. His name is synonymous with minimalist perfection of form, material, and construction.

—Gregory Votolato; updated by Carrie Snyder

DOROTHÉE BIS

French fashion house

Founded: by Jacqueline (designer) and Elie (manufacturer) Jacobson in 1962. Company History: Became known for casual knitwear; opened first Dorothée boutique in Paris, 1958; first Jacqueline Jacobson collection shown and opening of Dorothée Bis boutique, 1962; boutiques found in Henri Bendel and Bloomingdale's, New York; Jacqueline served as set designer for film The Weekend, 2000. Exhibition: VizonShow, Istanbul, 1994. Company Address: 17 rue de Sevres, 75006 Paris, France.

PUBLICATIONS

On DOROTHÉE BIS:

Articles

- Snead, Elizabeth, "In Paris, Short Cuts to the '60s," in USA Today, 18 October 1990.
 "Paris Now," in Women's Wear Daily, 19 October 1990.
 Parola, Robert, "Sportscast," in DNR, 25 August 1993.
 Parola, Robert, and Catherine Salfino, "Reports," in DNR, 25 August 1993.
 Israel, Betsy, "Flash: The Return of Disco Style," in Elle, February 1995.

- Burns, Tom, "Europe: Domínguez Sets Bolsa Record," in the Financial Times, 13 March 1997.
- McColl, Pat, "Ready-to-Wear Labels from Spain Quietly Infiltrate Paris," in the International Herald Tribune, 17 October 1997.
- Dam, Julie K. L., and A. Coruna, "Simply Galician," in Time, 17 November 1997.
- Nash, Elizabeth, "Forget Paris and Milan—Fashion's Cutting Edge is in Rural Spain," in the Independent Sunday (London), 12 April 1998.
- "Spanish Retailers Aim to Increase Presence on British High Street," from the London Evening Standard in Knight-Ridder/Tribune Business News, 19 October 1999.
- Burns, Tom, "Cortfiel Bids for Spanish Rival," in the Financial Times, 15 March 2001.
- Vitzthum, Carla, "Cortfiel Launches Takeover Bid for Rival Firm Adolfo Domínguez," in the Wall Street Journal, 15 March 2001.
- "Spaniards for the 21st Century: Adolfo Domínguez," available online at Freelance Spain, www.spainview.com, 23 July 2001.

* * *

Working from his native Galicia, Adolfo Domínguez represents the new wave of post-Franco Spanish design. His international corporation has helped to widen the influence of Spanish fashion around the world. The Domínguez family business grew in 30 years from a small manufacturer of ready-to-wear men's clothing to a fashion house with more than 140 owned and franchised outlets in 11 countries worldwide, including shops in Spain, London, Paris, and Hong Kong. The rapid expansion of the business from the early 1970s was founded on the decision to emphasize design and image for the wealthy, urban consumers of the new Spain and also for a sophisticated international clientèle.

The opening of the first Domínguez shop in Madrid marked the beginning in Spain of such chic establishments, presenting an appropriate ambience to support the image of the clothes on sale. The Madrid shop was quickly followed by another in Barcelona, and eight more opened from the home market. With Spain's entry into the European Union, shops were established in London and Paris. The appearance of Domínguez's women's collections in the early 1980s helped to ensure his status in the international fashion world, and markets were consolidated in the U.S. and Japan, where a manufacturing operation was subsequently established. The company went public in 1997 on the Spanish stock market Bolsa with thrilling results. The initial public offering of stocks, representing 70 percent of the company's holdings, set a record for the Bolsa with demand for the shares at more than 50 times the supply.

The success on the stock market, at least in the short run, prompted strong growth in the Domínguez chain, but the surge could not be sustained. The Wall Street Journal concluded that operating costs skyrocketed when "Mr. Domínguez embarked on an expansion spree, opening up stores in Asia and Europe without building up the proper industrial and logistic support to underpin the move." Troubles on the business front, however, did not affect Domínguez's fashion sense.

His intellectual and cosmopolitan approach to design reflects Domínguez's Parisian education in literature and philosophy. He likens fashion to industrial design, describing it as a response to need. Similarly, he rejects the willfulness of much designer clothing and couture, asserting instead the designer's responsibility to the user. Domínguez's clothing is purposeful in the modernist idiom, providing a solution to a particular problem, and a solution that will stand the test of time. He has little use for originality for its own sake, preferring to create quality, classic pieces.

Domínguez's Apollonian view of design as an activity also extends to his sense of the human figure and his treatment of the form through tailoring. He concentrates on elegant contour rather than overt body consciousness; he accentuates stature and elegance of proportion to allure, rather than revealing flesh or emphasizing obvious sexual characteristics. He makes use of classic drapery patterns in his garments for women. His unstructured cuts emphasize the drape of fine materials and the traditional Spanish skill of soft tailoring.

Through his ranges of high-quality menswear and womenswear, a lower-cost Basico line and Jeans, a casual line, Domínguez has developed a reputation for producing unpretentious and comfortable-looking garments of the highest quality in materials and construction. A characteristic of Domínguez designs is the elimination of superfluous detail. His clothes are not ornamented by applied decoration, and surface patterning is rare, yet austerity is relieved by soft drapery and the subtlety of colors. Domínguez's rich, earthy palette of colors is reminiscent of the landscape of his native Galicia.

The Domínguez shops designed by Santiago Seara and Alfredo Freixedo, like the clothes sold in them, reflect a classic, modern simplicity, discreetly detailed and finished in high-quality materials. Both the shops and the fashions mirror the elegant minimalism that has proven so successful for the designer. Domínguez's work presented the sophisticated face of the new Spanish design to both a recently liberated and affluent home market and to an increasingly appreciative world market. His name is synonymous with minimalist perfection of form, material, and construction.

—Gregory Votolato; updated by Carrie Snyder

DOROTHÉE BIS

French fashion house

Founded: by Jacqueline (designer) and Elie (manufacturer) Jacobson in 1962. Company History: Became known for casual knitwear; opened first Dorothée boutique in Paris, 1958; first Jacqueline Jacobson collection shown and opening of Dorothée Bis boutique, 1962; boutiques found in Henri Bendel and Bloomingdale's, New York; Jacqueline served as set designer for film The Weekend, 2000. Exhibition: VizonShow, Istanbul, 1994. Company Address: 17 rue de Sevres, 75006 Paris, France.

PUBLICATIONS

On DOROTHÉE BIS:

Articles

- Snead, Elizabeth, "In Paris, Short Cuts to the '60s," in USA Today, 18 October 1990.
 "Paris Now," in Women's Wear Daily, 19 October 1990.
 Parola, Robert, "Sportscast," in DNR, 25 August 1993.
 Parola, Robert, and Catherine Salfino, "Reports," in DNR, 25 August 1993.
 Israel, Betsy, "Flash: The Return of Disco Style," in Elle, February 1995.

* * *

Dorothée Bis, the Paris ready-to-wear house, was founded in 1962 by Jacqueline and Elie Jacobson and quickly and firmly established its now long-standing reputation for unusually stylish and wearable contemporary sportswear, particularly for knits of every variety and description. The jargon of a 1978 Macy's New York advertisement for the firm's clothes sums up the Dorothée Bis look: "Easy fashion with all-over chic appeal. The kind of clothes that you know look right. Anytime, anywhere."

The original boutique, Dorothée, was opened in 1958 by Elie Jacobson. Four years later, along with wife Jacqueline, they opened Dorothée Bis, a new concept in clothing boutiques that catered to young people and employed young people who wore the same clothes as the shoppers. Since then, the firm has been presenting clothes that manifest contemporary trends in a sophisticated and wearable way. Dorothée Bis was among the first houses to present styles such as the long and skinny maxi look in knit coats and vests in the late 1960s, the peasant look in the early 1970s, the layered look in the mid-1970s, and the graphic color block look of the late 1970s and early 1980s. Generally, these looks were presented in a particularly Parisian way, as total ensembles (as opposed to the American idea of mix-and-match), with coordinating accessories—such as a knit dress and coat shown with a hand-knit shawl and beret in the same yarn with matching belt, bag, and fashion jewelry. Materials came from as far away as Nepal, India, and China.

Bernardine Morris, writing for the New York Times, described Dorothée Bis as one of "the quintessential Paris ready-to-wear houses aiming at the young swinging crowd who prefer to change their style every season if not oftener." Indeed, in 1969 and 1970, while the hemline debate was fought by other designers, Jacobson satisfied her customers' shifting desires by giving them the mini, the midi, and the maxi, all in the same collection. By 1972, those debating skirt lengths had reached a momentary consensus at mid-knee, leaving the design agenda open for a new focus on silhouette.

Freed from the hemline discourse, with its implied bourgeois conflict between "appropriateness" and fashion, Jacobson continued enthusiastically to develop her concept of dressing in layers, a look that reflected women's growing liberation and consciousness. The feminist theory of the day proposed that as women entered the workforce in rapidly expanding numbers, and in a wide variety of career options, they would no longer need to seduce men to obtain financial support and would therefore no longer be compelled to wear seductive, figure-revealing clothes. Dorothée Bis' layered look evolved from the skinny knits of 1972–73 to the ethnic layers of the mid-1970s and culminated in the extreme and voluminous layers of 1976–77, in which a typical outfit might consist of a boldly patterned cardigan coat over a belted, striped tunic dress, over a full gathered skirt, over wide-legged or sweat-style trousers, with a knit scarf and hat to match. Although seemingly cumbersome, the look's appeal lay in its ease and comfort and in Jacobson's ability to give it all a Parisian stylishness.

In the 1980s, with the rise of conservatism in culture and politics, there was a return to conventionally body-revealing fashions. Many women began to feel that in their adherence to orthodox feminism, they had abdicated the power inherent in their sexuality, and sought to regain that sense of power through their dress. Dorothée Bis was right in step with this trend with a new focus on dresses, especially in the firm's signature knits. A typical Dorothée Bis outfit of the period, a navy-and-white striped wool knit two-piece dress with deep V-neckline and padded shoulders, was described in a Macy's 1986 advertisement as evidence of "a new body emphasis...curve conscious and deserving of its stripes."

Also during the 1980s, the company created a sports line called Dorotennis, and Christophe Lemaire, who served his apprenticeship under the tutelage of Thierry Mugler and worked later for Yves Saint Laurent and Michel Klein, joined the company as a collaborative designer. He eventually would move on to Jean Patou, where he worked with Christian Lacroix. Klein himself also spent 17 years working with the Dorothée Bis firm. Others who worked with the French firm included K. Jacques, who created models and window designs in the 1950s, and Agnès B., who served as a designer, press attaché, and buyer before 1965.

The company has numerous boutiques throughout France, each with a life-sized rag doll sitting in a chair somewhere on the premises. With the firm's emphasis on its highly adaptable and appealing signature knits, Dorothée Bis has been able to remain at the forefront of stylish and realistic fashion for nearly 40 years.

—Alan E. Rosenberg; updated by Daryl F. Mallett

DUKE, Randolph

American designer

Born: Las Vegas, Nevada. Education: Scholarship to study music, University of Southern California, turned to theatre and making costumes; graduated from the Fashion Institute of Design and Merchandising, Los Angeles. Career: Began designing swimwear, 1978; worked for Jantzen, then became swimwear designer for Anne Cole, California, 1982; left Anne Cole, 1984; designed the Viewpoint by Gottex swimwear line, 1984; opened Randolph Duke, Inc., and unveiled his first collection, 1986; developed a sportswear line under his own name, New York, 1987–92; debuted his first men's line, Duke Men, 1990; dissolved his company, 1990; signed a contract with 168, Inc. for a swimwear line, 1990; launched first jewelry collection, 1991; reorganized sportswear line under the name Randolph Duke, 1993–95; named creative designer, Halston International under the Signature Collection and Halston Lifestyle, 1996; began designing formal wear, 1996; debuted his formal evening wear, 1997; left Halston, 1998; opened store and began designing in Los Angeles, 1999; debuted the Randolph Duke Resort Collection, 2000. Address: 260 West 39th Street, New York, NY 10018, USA.

PUBLICATIONS

On DUKE:

Books

Stegemeyer, Anne, Who's Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.

* * *

Dorothée Bis, the Paris ready-to-wear house, was founded in 1962 by Jacqueline and Elie Jacobson and quickly and firmly established its now long-standing reputation for unusually stylish and wearable contemporary sportswear, particularly for knits of every variety and description. The jargon of a 1978 Macy's New York advertisement for the firm's clothes sums up the Dorothée Bis look: "Easy fashion with all-over chic appeal. The kind of clothes that you know look right. Anytime, anywhere."

The original boutique, Dorothée, was opened in 1958 by Elie Jacobson. Four years later, along with wife Jacqueline, they opened Dorothée Bis, a new concept in clothing boutiques that catered to young people and employed young people who wore the same clothes as the shoppers. Since then, the firm has been presenting clothes that manifest contemporary trends in a sophisticated and wearable way. Dorothée Bis was among the first houses to present styles such as the long and skinny maxi look in knit coats and vests in the late 1960s, the peasant look in the early 1970s, the layered look in the mid-1970s, and the graphic color block look of the late 1970s and early 1980s. Generally, these looks were presented in a particularly Parisian way, as total ensembles (as opposed to the American idea of mix-and-match), with coordinating accessories—such as a knit dress and coat shown with a hand-knit shawl and beret in the same yarn with matching belt, bag, and fashion jewelry. Materials came from as far away as Nepal, India, and China.

Bernardine Morris, writing for the New York Times, described Dorothée Bis as one of "the quintessential Paris ready-to-wear houses aiming at the young swinging crowd who prefer to change their style every season if not oftener." Indeed, in 1969 and 1970, while the hemline debate was fought by other designers, Jacobson satisfied her customers' shifting desires by giving them the mini, the midi, and the maxi, all in the same collection. By 1972, those debating skirt lengths had reached a momentary consensus at mid-knee, leaving the design agenda open for a new focus on silhouette.

Freed from the hemline discourse, with its implied bourgeois conflict between "appropriateness" and fashion, Jacobson continued enthusiastically to develop her concept of dressing in layers, a look that reflected women's growing liberation and consciousness. The feminist theory of the day proposed that as women entered the workforce in rapidly expanding numbers, and in a wide variety of career options, they would no longer need to seduce men to obtain financial support and would therefore no longer be compelled to wear seductive, figure-revealing clothes. Dorothée Bis' layered look evolved from the skinny knits of 1972–73 to the ethnic layers of the mid-1970s and culminated in the extreme and voluminous layers of 1976–77, in which a typical outfit might consist of a boldly patterned cardigan coat over a belted, striped tunic dress, over a full gathered skirt, over wide-legged or sweat-style trousers, with a knit scarf and hat to match. Although seemingly cumbersome, the look's appeal lay in its ease and comfort and in Jacobson's ability to give it all a Parisian stylishness.

In the 1980s, with the rise of conservatism in culture and politics, there was a return to conventionally body-revealing fashions. Many women began to feel that in their adherence to orthodox feminism, they had abdicated the power inherent in their sexuality, and sought to regain that sense of power through their dress. Dorothée Bis was right in step with this trend with a new focus on dresses, especially in the firm's signature knits. A typical Dorothée Bis outfit of the period, a navy-and-white striped wool knit two-piece dress with deep V-neckline and padded shoulders, was described in a Macy's 1986 advertisement as evidence of "a new body emphasis...curve conscious and deserving of its stripes."

Also during the 1980s, the company created a sports line called Dorotennis, and Christophe Lemaire, who served his apprenticeship under the tutelage of Thierry Mugler and worked later for Yves Saint Laurent and Michel Klein, joined the company as a collaborative designer. He eventually would move on to Jean Patou, where he worked with Christian Lacroix. Klein himself also spent 17 years working with the Dorothée Bis firm. Others who worked with the French firm included K. Jacques, who created models and window designs in the 1950s, and Agnès B., who served as a designer, press attaché, and buyer before 1965.

The company has numerous boutiques throughout France, each with a life-sized rag doll sitting in a chair somewhere on the premises. With the firm's emphasis on its highly adaptable and appealing signature knits, Dorothée Bis has been able to remain at the forefront of stylish and realistic fashion for nearly 40 years.

—Alan E. Rosenberg; updated by Daryl F. Mallett

DUKE, Randolph

American designer

Born: Las Vegas, Nevada. Education: Scholarship to study music, University of Southern California, turned to theatre and making costumes; graduated from the Fashion Institute of Design and Merchandising, Los Angeles. Career: Began designing swimwear, 1978; worked for Jantzen, then became swimwear designer for Anne Cole, California, 1982; left Anne Cole, 1984; designed the Viewpoint by Gottex swimwear line, 1984; opened Randolph Duke, Inc., and unveiled his first collection, 1986; developed a sportswear line under his own name, New York, 1987–92; debuted his first men's line, Duke Men, 1990; dissolved his company, 1990; signed a contract with 168, Inc. for a swimwear line, 1990; launched first jewelry collection, 1991; reorganized sportswear line under the name Randolph Duke, 1993–95; named creative designer, Halston International under the Signature Collection and Halston Lifestyle, 1996; began designing formal wear, 1996; debuted his formal evening wear, 1997; left Halston, 1998; opened store and began designing in Los Angeles, 1999; debuted the Randolph Duke Resort Collection, 2000. Address: 260 West 39th Street, New York, NY 10018, USA.

PUBLICATIONS

On DUKE:

Books

Stegemeyer, Anne, Who's Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.

Randolph Duke, spring 2001 collection: jet-beaded chiffon evening gown. © AP/Wide World Photos.

Articles

- Green, Wendy, and Melissa Fedor, "New York: Coming Attractions," in WW, 11 May 1987.
 "Noms de Bloom: Five Designers Ripe for Recognition," in Chicago Tribune, 10 September 1989.
 "Designers Travel from Las Vegas to Old Pompeii," in WW, 3 November 1989.
 "One Part Bach, Two Parts Vegas," in People, Spring 1990.
 "Randolph Duke," in DNR, 6 April 1990.
 Lockwood, Lisa, "Duke Dissolves Firm, Gets New Backer," in WW, 30 May 1990.
 Hartlein, Robert, "New Laps for Randolph Duke," in WW, 11 July 1990.
 Newman, Jill, "Randolph Duke Takes on Jewelry," in WW, 1 March 1991.
 "WW Quizzes Designers on the Upcoming Collections," in WW, 4 April 1991.
 "Great Expectations," in WW, 12 June 1991.

- Lockwood, Lisa, "Randolph Duke's Designer Sportswear Business Closed," in WW, 17 November 1992.
 White, Constance, "Randolph Duke's Triple Play," in WW, 7 July 1993.
 Fiedelholtz, Sara, "Duke Introducing Signature Beach, Swim Line," in WW, 18 August 1993.
 Levine, Lisbeth, "Everything Old is New Again," in Chicago Tribune, 15 April 1997.
 Dominguez, Juliette, "Urbane Renewal," in People, 4 May 1998.
 D'Innocenzo, Anne, "Duke Said Poised to Leave Halston," WW, 7 July 1998.
 "Duke Rejoining Anne Cole," in WW, 19 October 1998.
 "Finishing Touches," in WW, 22 February 1999.
 "Duke to Bring Celebrity Flair to Symphony League Show," in Journal Sentinel, 2 June 2000.
 Young, Kristin, "Trunk Show Hits," in WW, 5 July 2000.
 "Much Ado About Dazzle," in WW, 21 September 2000.
 McCants, Leonard, "Halston Sets Designer for Fall," in WW, 14 November 2000.
 Davis, Boyd, "Randolph Duke," online at FashionWindows.com, Inc., 27 January 2001.

Randolph Duke, 2001: leather paillette evening gown with fox cuff designed as an option for an Academy Award® nominee. (Jewelry designed by Tony Duquette.) © AP/Wide World Photos.

* * *

Randolph Duke came to realize the fame of being “the Duke of Stars” after he made his formal eveningwear debut during fall 1997. Hollywood embraced his styles and designs with marked enthusiasm and admiration; among the likes of his Hollywood followers are Sharon Stone and Celine Dion. Duke progressed from swimwear to sportswear to evening wear, a progression that came naturally for a designer who has claimed that change itself is his inspiration; this particular need is what made him Hollywood’s designer of choice in the late 1990s and the beginning of the 21st century.

Duke began his career designing simple yet stylish swimwear. He worked as swimwear designer for Anne Cole in 1982 and stayed until he ventured off on his own, creating for his own label from 1987 to 1992. His designs were vibrant, young, colorful, and full of innovative fabric use. Though he had shifted from swimwear to clothing design, Duke returned to swimwear in from 1993 to 1995, again giving the garments fresh, lively looks.

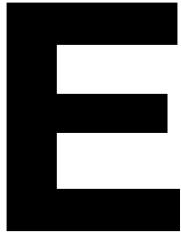

The transition from swimwear to sportswear seemed a natural step for Duke. When he joined Halston International in 1996, he continued his fashion style from his years of producing collections for his own label. The aim was to reach working women with a fashion sense who were also functioning on a limited budget. In 1997, he enlivened the Halston show at the New York Historical Society with a collection of cashmere tube tops and sexy, fitted evening dresses. Jackets for spring came in either a fitted, cropped style or a multipocketed safari design, along with four or five colors with coordinating prints.

During his years of creating sportswear collections under his own name, Duke’s designs were bold, simple, tailored in contrasting stitching, and included supple knit pieces to round out his line. Almost all fabrics were domestic and the result was a charming, trendy sportswear collection full of life. Included in a hip 1989 line was a bright yellow motorcycle jacket, sharp suits, and an array of wet-weather wear including raincoats.

In 1998 Duke opened a store in Los Angeles and successfully began creating his own line of formal eveningwear. He introduced the future of fashion with circular shapes and red snapper-skin sandals. His gowns made a bold statement in 1999, starting with a dark velvet dress with braided shoulder straps and a long slip in mohair over beaded tulle. Moving back into sportswear in 2000, Duke presented a resort collection with a selection of blouses, including one in taffeta with two drawstrings down the center that, when pulled, rose up to show the midriff. The collection also introduced a t-shirt emblazoned with rhinestones, sequined ombre pants in lavender, sequined ombre short skirts with matching cashmere twinsets, and a beaded sarong skirt.

Being the Duke of Stars, Randolph Duke found himself increasingly catering to Hollywood clientele. His spring 2001 collection was composed predominantly of elegant eveningwear. His designs have become highly visible at awards ceremonies, such as the Academy Awards®, with award-winners Hilary Swank (in a bronze ball gown) and Marcia Gay Harden (in ruby silk satin) in 2000 and 2001 respectively. Duke’s designs, whether for high profile clients or not, continue to be bold, direct, elegant, and of star quality.

—Kimbally A. Medeiros

EDDIE BAUER

American sportswear and lifestyle company

Founded: in 1920 by Eddie Bauer, in Seattle, WA. Company History: Patented quilted goose down jacket, 1936; developed B-9 Flight Parka, 1942; Bauer sold company to partner William Niemi, 1968; company sold to General Mills, 1971; Ford produced first Eddie Bauer Edition vehicle, 1983; Spiegel purchases company, 1988; 100th store opening, 1989; formed partnerships with Lane Company for furniture, 1997; Giant Bicycle, Signature Eyewear, and Cosco, Inc., all 1998; stores in all 50 states, 2000. Company Address: 15010 NE 36th Street, Redmond, WA 98052, USA. Company Website: www.eddiebauer.com.

PUBLICATIONS

On EDDIE BAUER:

Books

Spector, Robert, The Legend of Eddie Bauer, New York, 1995.

Articles

“Eddie Bauer Makes Employees’ Health Its Business,” in Hospitals & Health Networks (Chicago) 70, 1996.

Faust, Leslie, “At Eddie Bauer You Can Work and Have a Life,” in Personnel Journal (Costa Mesa, CA) 76, 1997.

Van Yoder, Steven, “Retailers Target Hidden Costs of On-the-Job Injuries,” in Stores (New York), December 1999.

Cuneo, Alice Z., “Eddie Bauer Gets Update to Battle Dwindling Sales,” in Advertising Age, 14 August 2000.

“Eddie Bauer Launches Website,” in Home Textiles Today, 11 September 2000.

Cole, Wendy, “SUV Strollers,” in Time, 29 January 2001.

Sloane, Carole, “Eddie Bauer Home Plans New Stores, Catalogue Growth” in Home Textiles Today, 12 March 2001.

*

The Eddie Bauer Creed: To give you such outstanding quality, value, service and guarantee that we may be worthy of your high esteem.

The Eddie Bauer Guarantee: Every item we sell will give you complete satisfaction or you may return it for a full refund.

—Eddie Bauer, 1920

* * *

It is possible to live an entirely Eddie Bauer existence. Whether dressing for work or leisure, Eddie Bauer has you covered. Literally. With few exceptions, nearly everything in a casual or business casual wardrobe is available for men, women, and children. The company’s Lifestyle division offers selections from the sheets on your bed (and the bed itself) to bathroom shower curtains, towels, and accessories; furnishings (even wallpaper) for your living room, home office, and children’s rooms, to the outdoor furniture on the deck. Parents might purchase a stroller, car seat, or a full line of camping gear, including tents, sleeping bags, packs, as well as outdoor and beach furniture.

Eddie Bauer luggage allows you to travel in style while visiting an Eddie Bauer store in every state of the U.S., and in Germany and Japan. A collaboration with Signature Eyewear offers sunglasses for driving your Eddie Bauer Edition Ford Explorer or Expedition or cycling away on an Eddie Bauer bike. Eddie Bauer corrective glasses might be in order when sitting down in front of your Eddie Bauer Special Edition Compaq Presario notebook computer. All the better for shopping online at, you guessed it, www.eddiebauer.com. Eddie Bauer will help you match an outfit, figure out your size, and remind you of your anniversary. While doing all this, Eddie Bauer supports education, gives to the community, empowers women, sponsors the U.S. Canoe and Kayak Team, PGA and LPGA players, an Iditarod musher, and Eddie Bauer/Global ReLeaf, the Eddie Bauer Tree Project.

Unlike companies named for fictitious characters, Eddie Bauer was the founding father of the successful company bearing his name. Established in 1920 in Seattle, Washington, 21-year-old Bauer opened Eddie Bauer’s Sport Shop in the back of a local hunting and fishing store. A great lover of the outdoors, Bauer offered high-quality gear at good prices. His commitment to his customers evolved into the creed and guarantee still honored today. While hunting in the 1930s, an unexpected winter rainstorm waterlogged his woolen clothing and led him to develop a protective outerwear garment. The Skyliner, the first American quilted goose down-insulated jacket, was patented in 1936. It was so successful that Bauer was commissioned in 1942 by the U.S. Army Air Corps to develop the B-9 flight parka. More than 50,000 jackets were manufactured for World War II airmen flying at high altitudes.

Astute at business, Bauer added women’s clothing about the same time as the Skyliner. He issued a mail order catalogue in 1945 and began to outfit scientific and exploratory expeditions in the 1950s. Bauer retired in 1968, selling the business to his partner, William Niemi, who sold it to General Mills in 1971. The company shifted its focus from expedition gear and apparel to casual clothing and expanded to 61 stores and $250 million in sales between 1971 and 1988.

Spiegel purchased Eddie Bauer in 1988 and continued the aggressive growth and product development that would result in a huge variety of Eddie Bauer merchandise. The first Eddie Bauer Ford was manufactured in 1984, and in 1997 and 1998, the Lane Company signed on to produce Eddie Bauer Home; Giant Bicycle to produce bikes; Signature Eyewear for eyewear; and the company partnered with Cosco, Inc. to expand Baby by Bauer. An additional 300 stores opened by 1996, catalogues and stores were introduced in both Germany and Japan, size ranges were expanded, and a Web presence was introduced.

As a company, Eddie Bauer has a corporate conscience. Its employees' health and well-being are of genuine concern, and proactive health measures are embraced. The company offers many philanthropic opportunities, from education to community volunteerism. In 1995, Eddie Bauer joined with American Forest to establish the Eddie Bauer/Global ReLeaf project to help restore fire-ravaged forestlands. The project is more than halfway toward completing its goal of planting 2.5 million trees.

The success of Eddie Bauer lies in its ability to provide dependably comfortable, affordable, well-made clothing. Shopping is a pleasant experience, whether in the store, by catalogue, or online, and customer service is alive and well. The casual styles are reflective of an ever relaxing American lifestyle, with a nod toward the company's rugged roots.

—Christina Lindholm

EISEN, Mark

South African fashion designer

Born: Cape Town, South Africa, 27 September 1958. Education: Attended University of Southern California, B.S., 1982. Career: Founded own design firm in Los Angeles, 1982; moved to New York, 1993; launched Urchin and Urchin Knits apparel lines (later combined and renamed Urchin Mark Eisen), 1996; signed licensing pact with World Gym for uniforms, 1996; designed interior of GM car for charity, 1997; signed licensing agreements for Mark Eisen Studio, 1997; moved headquarters from Los Angeles to New York, 1998; launched bridge knitwear line, Eisen, 1999; formed partnership with Italian firm Sportswear Company SpA for Mark Eisen Collection, 2000; footwear licensing deal with Lerre, 2000. Awards: Alumni of the Year, University of Southern California Business School, 1988.

PUBLICATIONS

On EISEN:

Articles

- McNamara, Michael, "Synthetic Chic," in WWD, 30 August 1994.
- "Mark Eisen Sets Launch of Contemporary Label," in WWD, 9 February 1996.
- "New York: On the Runways," in WWD, 1 April 1996.
- Socha, Miles, "World Gym," in DNR, 2 October 1996.
- "Eisen Works Out," in WWD, 10 October 1996.
- D'Innocenzo, Anne, "Brand Strategies are Paying Off," in WWD, 4 December 1996.
- Muir, Lucie, "Fibers Mix it Up at Prato," in WWD, 11 March 1997.
- Monget, Karen, "Commitment's in Fashion," in WWD, 6 October 1997.
- "Up & Down the Fashion Food Chain," in WWD, 5 November 1997.

Mark Eisen, fall 1997 collection. © AP/Wide World Photos.

D'Innocenzo, Anne, "Eisen's New Moves," in WWD, 8 October 1997.

Winter, Drew, "Interiors Become Extroverts," in the Ward's Auto World, November 1997.

D'Innocenzo, Anne, "Young, Contemporary Styles Take Center Stage," in WWD, 25 February 1998.

"And the Beat Goes On," in WWD, 31 March 1998.

Lee, Georgia, "Urchin Betting on Knits Line," in the WWD, 22 April 1998.

"Eisen Plans Bridge Line for Fall 1999," in WWD, 2 November 1998.

Socha, Miles, "Mark Eisen Merges with Italian Producer," in WWD, 31 January 2000.

Daswani, Kavita, "Seventh on Sixth Gets New Global Groups," in WWD, 9 April 2000.

Socha, Miles, "Face of Africa Showcases Africa," in Africa News Service, 25 April 2000.

Bressler, Karen, "Mark Eisen: Making His Mark," available online at Fashion Windows, www.fashionwindows.com, 2000.

* * *

Mark Eisen began his illustrious design career at the University of Southern California, where he was earning a degree in business. He variety of Eddie Bauer merchandise. The first Eddie Bauer Ford was manufactured in 1984, and in 1997 and 1998, the Lane Company signed on to produce Eddie Bauer Home; Giant Bicycle to produce bikes; Signature Eyewear for eyewear; and the company partnered with Cosco, Inc. to expand Baby by Bauer. An additional 300 stores opened by 1996, catalogues and stores were introduced in both Germany and Japan, size ranges were expanded, and a Web presence was introduced.

As a company, Eddie Bauer has a corporate conscience. Its employees' health and well-being are of genuine concern, and proactive health measures are embraced. The company offers many philanthropic opportunities, from education to community volunteerism. In 1995, Eddie Bauer joined with American Forest to establish the Eddie Bauer/Global ReLeaf project to help restore fire-ravaged forestlands. The project is more than halfway toward completing its goal of planting 2.5 million trees.

The success of Eddie Bauer lies in its ability to provide dependably comfortable, affordable, well-made clothing. Shopping is a pleasant experience, whether in the store, by catalogue, or online, and customer service is alive and well. The casual styles are reflective of an ever relaxing American lifestyle, with a nod toward the company's rugged roots.

—Christina Lindholm

EISEN, Mark

South African fashion designer

Born: Cape Town, South Africa, 27 September 1958. Education: Attended University of Southern California, B.S., 1982. Career: Founded own design firm in Los Angeles, 1982; moved to New York, 1993; launched Urchin and Urchin Knits apparel lines (later combined and renamed Urchin Mark Eisen), 1996; signed licensing pact with World Gym for uniforms, 1996; designed interior of GM car for charity, 1997; signed licensing agreements for Mark Eisen Studio, 1997; moved headquarters from Los Angeles to New York, 1998; launched bridge knitwear line, Eisen, 1999; formed partnership with Italian firm Sportswear Company SpA for Mark Eisen Collection, 2000; footwear licensing deal with Lerre, 2000. Awards: Alumni of the Year, University of Southern California Business School, 1988.

PUBLICATIONS

On EISEN:

Articles

- McNamara, Michael, "Synthetic Chic," in WWD, 30 August 1994.
- "Mark Eisen Sets Launch of Contemporary Label," in WWD, 9 February 1996.
- "New York: On the Runways," in WWD, 1 April 1996.
- Socha, Miles, "World Gym," in DNR, 2 October 1996.
- "Eisen Works Out," in WWD, 10 October 1996.
- D'Innocenzo, Anne, "Brand Strategies are Paying Off," in WWD, 4 December 1996.
- Muir, Lucie, "Fibers Mix it Up at Prato," in WWD, 11 March 1997.
- Monget, Karen, "Commitment's in Fashion," in WWD, 6 October 1997.
- "Up & Down the Fashion Food Chain," in WWD, 5 November 1997.

Mark Eisen, fall 1997 collection. © AP/Wide World Photos.

D'Innocenzo, Anne, "Eisen's New Moves," in WWD, 8 October 1997.

Winter, Drew, "Interiors Become Extroverts," in the Ward's Auto World, November 1997.

D'Innocenzo, Anne, "Young, Contemporary Styles Take Center Stage," in WWD, 25 February 1998.

"And the Beat Goes On," in WWD, 31 March 1998.

Lee, Georgia, "Urchin Betting on Knits Line," in the WWD, 22 April 1998.

"Eisen Plans Bridge Line for Fall 1999," in WWD, 2 November 1998.

Socha, Miles, "Mark Eisen Merges with Italian Producer," in WWD, 31 January 2000.

Daswani, Kavita, "Seventh on Sixth Gets New Global Groups," in WWD, 9 April 2000.

Socha, Miles, "Face of Africa Showcases Africa," in Africa News Service, 25 April 2000.

Bressler, Karen, "Mark Eisen: Making His Mark," available online at Fashion Windows, www.fashionwindows.com, 2000.

* * *

Mark Eisen began his illustrious design career at the University of Southern California, where he was earning a degree in business. He designed a stylish gold-and-red helmet celebrating the school's famed Trojans football team and was soon selling them by the thousands. His first press coverage was a brief mention in Newsweek praising his entrepreneurial spirit. The fledgling designer went on to create a name for himself, first as the purveyor of spare, elegant minimalism then as the king of high-tech chic.

Mark Eisen, fall 1997 collection: stretch jacket with a faux fur collar and wide leg pants. © AP/Wide World Photos.

Despite his evident success, Eisen is never complacent. He admitted to Karen Bressler, of the Fashion Live website, he has a superstitious routine he follows before each major showing. "The night before a show," he says, "I eat in the same restaurant with the same people at the same table in the same seat and order the same thing, crab meat and thin pasta. I used to carry a friend's pearls in my pocket on the runway, but then I heard that pearls could be bad luck." From his success, however, it appears he has little to be concerned about. High-profile celebrities have turned into diehard fans, and his creations continue to garner positive press from fashion critics and fellow designers alike.

Womenswear in the hands of Eisen is elegant and well cut, made from the finest fabrics. Eisen is unabashedly smitten with textiles and has enjoyed combining opposites for surprising results. He likes mixing Lycra in with more delicate fabrics for its ability to retain its shape, and has used a myriad of luxurious fabrics like silk, sateen wool, cashmere, mohair, alpaca, angora, and suede in his designs. His collections in 1994 and 1995 featured what became an early trademark—minimalist chic—with tailored suits and simple dresses in dark hues of black, charcoal, and chocolate browns, while throwing in a few splashy neon separates to brighten the range. After several minimal collections, Eisen turned to synthetics, such as resortwear collections using acetate, rayon, and even polyurethane. Eisen's fascination with textiles is always evident, concocting high-tech fabrications as laminated chiffon, linen coated with resin, rayon crêpe, and nylon blends.

In early 1996 the designer launched two new labels, Urchin and Urchin Knits (later combined and renamed Urchin Mark Eisen). Eisen declared to Women's Wear Daily (9 February 1996) that Urchin, a sporty ready-to-wear collection, would "be affordable, fun and functional, as opposed to trendy." Colors were deep earth tones, with brown, beige, and black, as well several variations in blue: navy, indigo, turquoise, and sky blue. The Urchin Knits line, comprised of cardigans, tunics, twinsets, and trousers, used silks, cashmere, crêpe, lambswool, and cotton, with Lycra mixed in for fit and flexibility.

Eisen segued into designing uniforms through a licensing agreement with the famed Santa Monica-based World Gym in fall 1996. Both trainers and staff at the health club operator's New York City locations were given stylish and sporty activewear separates, with the range eventually reaching all of World Gym's 400 sports complexes worldwide. Additionally, the activewear, under the Mark Eisen for World Gym label, was sold in World Gym clubs around the world, beginning in 1997.

To help combat breast cancer, Eisen and fellow designers Nicole Miller, Todd Oldham, Anna Sui, and Richard Tyler joined General Motors and the Council of Fashion Designers of America (CFDA) for the ConceptCure program. The designers teamed up to work on the interior of GM cars, which were then auctioned off to raise funds for the Nina Hyde Center for breast cancer awareness. Richard Ruzzin, director of interior character for Chevrolet told Ward's Auto World (November 1997), "These fashion designers used color, texture, and material in ways we never dreamed possible with our products." Like the famed Eddie Bauer designer Fords, the vehicles had plenty of style and raised over $700,000 for the cause.

In an effort to take his name and designs global, Eisen hired Brad Saltzman, formerly of Adrienne Vittadini, to become president and CEO of his firm. Eisen remained chairman and still handled all design responsibilities. Commenting to Women's Wear Daily (8 October 1997) on the arrival Saltzman, Eisen said, "I have searched for over three years for a partner who shared my same vision and goals. I am most excited to be able to hand the business side of the company to Brad and to have my primary focus on design. We are now poised to explode the business both domestically and internationally through multiple categories."

Licensing agreements reflecting the global plan included Nissho Iwai Corporation and Ichida Company to produce and distribute the Mark Eisen Studio collection, which had ceased production in the U.S. for some time. The Mark Eisen Collection, the firm's strongest line, was poised for licensing in Europe and throughout Asia in 1998. The newer line, Urchin Mark Eisen, had experienced swift growth and was already in 350 U.S. high-end department stores such as Bloomingdale's, Barneys, Bergdorf Goodman, and Henri Bendel. Eisen and Saltzman hoped to increase U.S. retail locations to more than 500, and to find a new licensing partner for the better Mark Eisen Collection.

For fall 1999 came a new bridge knitwear line, simply titled Eisen. Targeted to women, aged 30 to 50, the range was intended to offer a stylish and less expensive alternative to misses. Next, in 2000, came a new suitor for the Mark Eisen Collection, a partnership with Sports-wear Company SpA, once a unit of GFT and backer behind the C.P. Company, to manufacture and distribute the range internationally. Eisen also entered into a licensing deal with Lerre, a Naples-based footwear manufacturer, for an upscale footwear collection.

Returning to his roots, the South African-born Eisen helped sponsor the African Designs Fashion Competition in 2000, a contest for new African designers to win a three-month internship with Eisen and a chance to show their designs at New York's Fashion Week for the summer 2002 season. Eisen also served as a juror at the Seventh on Sixth global design forum, which brought in design teams from Hong Kong, Africa, and Portugal. While Mark Eisen's creations firmly reflect American design sensibilities, he has not forgotten the difficulties of his countrymen and women. With designers of all ethnic origins blooming in South Africa, Eisen is well positioned to bring what he calls the "cross-global reality" of African designs to America and beyond.

—Owen James

ELBAZ, Alber

Israeli American fashion designer

Born: Casablanca, Morocco, 1961. Education: Graduated from Shenkar College of Textile Technology and Fashion, Tel Aviv, Israel, circa 1988; studied with Geoffrey Beene, New York, circa 1989–96. Career: Creative director, Guy Laroche, 1996–98; designer, Yves Saint Laurent Couture, Rive Gauche collections, Gucci Group N.V., 1998–2000; designed for Krizia SpA, 2000; signed on as creative director/designer, Lanvin, 2001. Awards: American Committee for Shenkar College, Israel, Alumni award, 2001.

PUBLICATIONS

On ELBAZ:

Articles

Phelps, Nicole, "The New Guy at Laroche," in WWD, 2 July 1997. Klensch, Elsa, "New Designer Modernizes Laroche Line," available online at CNN.com, 18 August 1997.

Bellafante, Ginia, "Tired of Chic Simple? Welcome to the New Romance," in Time, 6 April 1998.

Menkes, Suzy, "A New Generation in Ready-to-Wear: Alber Elbaz Gets Aboard at YSL," in the International Herald Tribune, 9 June 1998.

Yanowitch, Lee, "Israeli Designer to Produce Yves Saint Laurent Line," in Jewish Bulletin of Northern California, 17 July 1998.

Silva, Horacio, "Chic Happens," in Hint Fashion Magazine, 7 October 1998.

Patterson, Suzy, "Spring is Abloom on Paris Runways, and the View is Beautiful, Elegant," in SouthCoast Today, 21 October 1998.

Steifel-Kristensen, Tom, "Individuality Rules in Paris," available online at Furs.com, fall 1999/2000.

Raper, Sarah, and Samantha Conti, "Gucci Takeover of YSL May Have hit a Snag," in WWD, 11 October 1999.

Conti, Samantha, et al, "Gucci Acquires YSL," in WWD, 16 November 1999.

Menkes, Suzy, "His Last Collection for Saint Laurent is a Smash," in the International Herald Tribune, 29 February 2000.

Deeny, Godfrey, "Krizia Top: Alber Elbaz Ravishes in His Third Act," in Fashion Wire Daily, 5 October 2000.

Menkes, Suzy, "A Few Vivacious Voices Hit the High Notes in Milan," in the International Herald Tribune, 7 October 2000.

O'Brian, Heather, "A Bitter Parting Between Alber Elbaz and Krizia," in Fashion Wire Daily, 30 November 2000.

"Shenkar College Honors Three Prestigious Alumni," in WWD, 17 April 2001.

"Fashion Scoops (Alber Elbaz)," in WWD, 11 October 2001.

* * *

Alber Elbaz was born in 1961 in Casablanca, Morocco, to a Jewish family. He was raised in Israel, where he graduated from the Shenkar College of Textile Technology and Fashion. Later he moved to New York, where he spent seven years training with Geoffrey Beene, described by critics and other designers as "one of the few American designers who follows the rules and tenets of true couture."

In June 1996 Elbaz was hired by the venerable French design house, Guy Laroche. Although a graduate of a top-rate fashion school and a protégé of Beene's, Elbaz was still an unknown in the couture world at the time when Laroche's president, Ralph Toledano, hired him. Toledano had been duly impressed by Elbaz's sketches, drawn while on a recent vacation. Toledano found the designs breathtakingly feminine, and liked the designer's personal style as well. "When he came to see me," Toledano told Arts/Fashion magazine (6 April 1998), "he had on red shoes and a red jacket. The guy knew how to capture your attention."

Elbaz brought luxurious skirt suits, pink-and-white dresses of layered tulle, billowy-sleeved jackets, and Capri pantsuits, all accented in strips of fur, lines of sequins, or wild pink and pink-toned colors to Laroche at a time when the fashion industry had spent a decade slowing down and moving away from loud outrageousness and toward austere, sensible, classy clothes. "Maybe, if we can find it in our hearts, we should reserve a small 'Thank You' to Titanic for making women so hungry to look feminine right now. The era depicted in the movie was, after all, the era of languid dress," Richard Martin, curator at the Metropolitan Museum of Art's Costume Institute, wrote in Arts/Fashion, in April 1998.

In 1998 Elbaz was spirited away from Laroche with an offer from Yves Saint Laurent Couture. The legendary Saint Laurent, after 32 years of designing, had decided it was time for a change. At his direction, Pierre Berge, president of YSL Couture, hired the 37-year-old Elbaz to take over for the Rive Gauche ready-to-wear line. "For me, this isn't a career move, but the realization of my life's dream," Elbaz said in a press release from YSL. But it was not an easy move for the young designer; he was anguished over his departure from than 500, and to find a new licensing partner for the better Mark Eisen Collection.

For fall 1999 came a new bridge knitwear line, simply titled Eisen. Targeted to women, aged 30 to 50, the range was intended to offer a stylish and less expensive alternative to misses. Next, in 2000, came a new suitor for the Mark Eisen Collection, a partnership with Sports-wear Company SpA, once a unit of GFT and backer behind the C.P. Company, to manufacture and distribute the range internationally. Eisen also entered into a licensing deal with Lerre, a Naples-based footwear manufacturer, for an upscale footwear collection.

Returning to his roots, the South African-born Eisen helped sponsor the African Designs Fashion Competition in 2000, a contest for new African designers to win a three-month internship with Eisen and a chance to show their designs at New York's Fashion Week for the summer 2002 season. Eisen also served as a juror at the Seventh on Sixth global design forum, which brought in design teams from Hong Kong, Africa, and Portugal. While Mark Eisen's creations firmly reflect American design sensibilities, he has not forgotten the difficulties of his countrymen and women. With designers of all ethnic origins blooming in South Africa, Eisen is well positioned to bring what he calls the "cross-global reality" of African designs to America and beyond.

—Owen James

ELBAZ, Alber

Israeli American fashion designer

Born: Casablanca, Morocco, 1961. Education: Graduated from Shenkar College of Textile Technology and Fashion, Tel Aviv, Israel, circa 1988; studied with Geoffrey Beene, New York, circa 1989–96. Career: Creative director, Guy Laroche, 1996–98; designer, Yves Saint Laurent Couture, Rive Gauche collections, Gucci Group N.V., 1998–2000; designed for Krizia SpA, 2000; signed on as creative director/designer, Lanvin, 2001. Awards: American Committee for Shenkar College, Israel, Alumni award, 2001.

PUBLICATIONS

On ELBAZ:

Articles

Phelps, Nicole, "The New Guy at Laroche," in WWD, 2 July 1997. Klensch, Elsa, "New Designer Modernizes Laroche Line," available online at CNN.com, 18 August 1997.

Bellafante, Ginia, "Tired of Chic Simple? Welcome to the New Romance," in Time, 6 April 1998.

Menkes, Suzy, "A New Generation in Ready-to-Wear: Alber Elbaz Gets Aboard at YSL," in the International Herald Tribune, 9 June 1998.

Yanowitch, Lee, "Israeli Designer to Produce Yves Saint Laurent Line," in Jewish Bulletin of Northern California, 17 July 1998.

Silva, Horacio, "Chic Happens," in Hint Fashion Magazine, 7 October 1998.

Patterson, Suzy, "Spring is Abloom on Paris Runways, and the View is Beautiful, Elegant," in SouthCoast Today, 21 October 1998.

Steifel-Kristensen, Tom, "Individuality Rules in Paris," available online at Furs.com, fall 1999/2000.

Raper, Sarah, and Samantha Conti, "Gucci Takeover of YSL May Have hit a Snag," in WWD, 11 October 1999.

Conti, Samantha, et al, "Gucci Acquires YSL," in WWD, 16 November 1999.

Menkes, Suzy, "His Last Collection for Saint Laurent is a Smash," in the International Herald Tribune, 29 February 2000.

Deeny, Godfrey, "Krizia Top: Alber Elbaz Ravishes in His Third Act," in Fashion Wire Daily, 5 October 2000.

Menkes, Suzy, "A Few Vivacious Voices Hit the High Notes in Milan," in the International Herald Tribune, 7 October 2000.

O'Brian, Heather, "A Bitter Parting Between Alber Elbaz and Krizia," in Fashion Wire Daily, 30 November 2000.

"Shenkar College Honors Three Prestigious Alumni," in WWD, 17 April 2001.

"Fashion Scoops (Alber Elbaz)," in WWD, 11 October 2001.

* * *

Alber Elbaz was born in 1961 in Casablanca, Morocco, to a Jewish family. He was raised in Israel, where he graduated from the Shenkar College of Textile Technology and Fashion. Later he moved to New York, where he spent seven years training with Geoffrey Beene, described by critics and other designers as "one of the few American designers who follows the rules and tenets of true couture."

In June 1996 Elbaz was hired by the venerable French design house, Guy Laroche. Although a graduate of a top-rate fashion school and a protégé of Beene's, Elbaz was still an unknown in the couture world at the time when Laroche's president, Ralph Toledano, hired him. Toledano had been duly impressed by Elbaz's sketches, drawn while on a recent vacation. Toledano found the designs breathtakingly feminine, and liked the designer's personal style as well. "When he came to see me," Toledano told Arts/Fashion magazine (6 April 1998), "he had on red shoes and a red jacket. The guy knew how to capture your attention."

Elbaz brought luxurious skirt suits, pink-and-white dresses of layered tulle, billowy-sleeved jackets, and Capri pantsuits, all accented in strips of fur, lines of sequins, or wild pink and pink-toned colors to Laroche at a time when the fashion industry had spent a decade slowing down and moving away from loud outrageousness and toward austere, sensible, classy clothes. "Maybe, if we can find it in our hearts, we should reserve a small 'Thank You' to Titanic for making women so hungry to look feminine right now. The era depicted in the movie was, after all, the era of languid dress," Richard Martin, curator at the Metropolitan Museum of Art's Costume Institute, wrote in Arts/Fashion, in April 1998.

In 1998 Elbaz was spirited away from Laroche with an offer from Yves Saint Laurent Couture. The legendary Saint Laurent, after 32 years of designing, had decided it was time for a change. At his direction, Pierre Berge, president of YSL Couture, hired the 37-year-old Elbaz to take over for the Rive Gauche ready-to-wear line. "For me, this isn't a career move, but the realization of my life's dream," Elbaz said in a press release from YSL. But it was not an easy move for the young designer; he was anguished over his departure from Laroche and Toledano, who was proud of Elbaz's success yet sorry to see him go.

Bringing Elbaz on board had been the second big change at YSL in as many years. Berge had already hired Hedi Slimane as YSL's menswear designer in 1996, a move that had bolstered sales in that arena. The appointment left many in the fashion world wondering how it would all work out. Saint Laurent had been designing blazers, pantsuits, shorts, lady's suits, and the safari look for more matronly clients, searching for elegant businesswear and streamlined eveningwear. Elbaz, on the other hand, designed silk-pouch dresses, halter tops with droopy, hanging necklines, riots of deep green, light yellow, blue, gray, red, and purple colors, featuring fabrics like taffeta, jerseys, tulle, tweed, and fox fur-lined sleeves.

Yet buyers and critics at Elbaz's first show for YSL in early 1999 responded enthusiastically to this new look in a venerable couture house. "Alber Elbaz is...the spirit of YSL; but the technique of Elbaz...is bringing the house into the new millennium," said Kal Ruttenstein of Bloomingdale's after Elbaz's opening show for YSL. Glowing reviews aside, corporate shenanigans came into play in 2000 after YSL was acquired by the Gucci Group. The fall YSL women's ready-to-wear showing in Paris would be Elbaz's final collection for the firm. "Alber Elbaz has made an important contribution to the history of Yves Saint Laurent Rive Gauche," Domenico DeSole, president and CEO of Gucci, said in a press release. Gucci Group's creative director and chief designer, Tom Ford, was assuming all design responsibilities for the burgeoning fashion empire.

Elbaz moved on to Krizia, where he designed a beautiful, well received African-influenced collection for their Krizia Top line, featuring feathers, chunky jewelry, sporty tailoring, wrapped satin blouses, and suede skirts, in rich African colors such as earth brown, clay red, and tan, with tribal markings as patterns. But his tenure there would only last a scant three months before a bitter parting over artistic differences between Elbaz and Mariuccia Mandelli. He was replaced there by Belgian designer Jean-Paul Knott.

Elbaz, however, landed on his feet. In 2001 he signed with Lanvin (recently bought from Revlon by Harmonie SA) as creative director for its women's ready-to-wear and accessories lines. His first collection debuted in March for fall 2002.

—Daryl F. Mallett

ELLIS, Perry

American designer

Born: Perry Edwin Ellis in Portsmouth, Virginia, 30 March 1940. Education: Bachelor of Arts, business, College of William and Mary, Williamsburg, Virginia, 1961; Master of Arts, retailing, New York University, New York City, 1963. Family: Had child with Barbara Gallagher, Tyler Alexandra. Military Service: Served in the U.S. Coast Guard, 1961–62. Career: Sportswear buyer, Miller & Rhodes department stores, Virginia, 1963–67; design director, John Meyer of Norwich, 1967–74; vice-president, sportswear division, 1974, and designer, Vera sportswear for Manhattan Industries, 1975–76; designer with own Portfolio label, Manhattan Industries, 1976–78;

Perry Ellis, spring 2001 collection: wool/viscose crepe jacket and pants with a cotton dress shirt. © Reuters NewMedia Inc./CORBIS.

president/designer, Perry Ellis Sportswear, Inc., 1978–86; Perry Ellis International menswear line launched, 1980; Portfolio label, lower priced sportswear revived, 1984; fragrance collection launched, 1985; company went public, 1993; womenswear discontinued, 1993; Perry Ellis America for men line introduced, 1996; announced new bridge line, 1998; firm acquired by Supreme International, 1999; reintroduced womenswear, 2000; discontinued women's sportswear, 2001; acquired Bugle Boy, 2001. Exhibitions: Fashion Institute of Technology, 2000. Awards: Coty American Fashion Critics award, 1979, 1980, 1981, 1983, 1984; Neiman Marcus award, Dallas, 1979; Council of Fashion Designers of America award, 1981, 1982, 1983; Cutty Sark award, 1983, 1984; Council of Fashion Designers of America Perry Ellis award established in memoriam, 1986; California Men's Apparel Guild Hall of Fame award, 1993. Died: 30 May Laroche and Toledano, who was proud of Elbaz's success yet sorry to see him go.

Bringing Elbaz on board had been the second big change at YSL in as many years. Berge had already hired Hedi Slimane as YSL's menswear designer in 1996, a move that had bolstered sales in that arena. The appointment left many in the fashion world wondering how it would all work out. Saint Laurent had been designing blazers, pantsuits, shorts, lady's suits, and the safari look for more matronly clients, searching for elegant businesswear and streamlined eveningwear. Elbaz, on the other hand, designed silk-pouch dresses, halter tops with droopy, hanging necklines, riots of deep green, light yellow, blue, gray, red, and purple colors, featuring fabrics like taffeta, jerseys, tulle, tweed, and fox fur-lined sleeves.

Yet buyers and critics at Elbaz's first show for YSL in early 1999 responded enthusiastically to this new look in a venerable couture house. "Alber Elbaz is...the spirit of YSL; but the technique of Elbaz...is bringing the house into the new millennium," said Kal Ruttenstein of Bloomingdale's after Elbaz's opening show for YSL. Glowing reviews aside, corporate shenanigans came into play in 2000 after YSL was acquired by the Gucci Group. The fall YSL women's ready-to-wear showing in Paris would be Elbaz's final collection for the firm. "Alber Elbaz has made an important contribution to the history of Yves Saint Laurent Rive Gauche," Domenico DeSole, president and CEO of Gucci, said in a press release. Gucci Group's creative director and chief designer, Tom Ford, was assuming all design responsibilities for the burgeoning fashion empire.

Elbaz moved on to Krizia, where he designed a beautiful, well received African-influenced collection for their Krizia Top line, featuring feathers, chunky jewelry, sporty tailoring, wrapped satin blouses, and suede skirts, in rich African colors such as earth brown, clay red, and tan, with tribal markings as patterns. But his tenure there would only last a scant three months before a bitter parting over artistic differences between Elbaz and Mariuccia Mandelli. He was replaced there by Belgian designer Jean-Paul Knott.

Elbaz, however, landed on his feet. In 2001 he signed with Lanvin (recently bought from Revlon by Harmonie SA) as creative director for its women's ready-to-wear and accessories lines. His first collection debuted in March for fall 2002.

—Daryl F. Mallett

ELLIS, Perry

American designer

Born: Perry Edwin Ellis in Portsmouth, Virginia, 30 March 1940. Education: Bachelor of Arts, business, College of William and Mary, Williamsburg, Virginia, 1961; Master of Arts, retailing, New York University, New York City, 1963. Family: Had child with Barbara Gallagher, Tyler Alexandra. Military Service: Served in the U.S. Coast Guard, 1961–62. Career: Sportswear buyer, Miller & Rhodes department stores, Virginia, 1963–67; design director, John Meyer of Norwich, 1967–74; vice-president, sportswear division, 1974, and designer, Vera sportswear for Manhattan Industries, 1975–76; designer with own Portfolio label, Manhattan Industries, 1976–78;

Perry Ellis, spring 2001 collection: wool/viscose crepe jacket and pants with a cotton dress shirt. © Reuters NewMedia Inc./CORBIS.

president/designer, Perry Ellis Sportswear, Inc., 1978–86; Perry Ellis International menswear line launched, 1980; Portfolio label, lower priced sportswear revived, 1984; fragrance collection launched, 1985; company went public, 1993; womenswear discontinued, 1993; Perry Ellis America for men line introduced, 1996; announced new bridge line, 1998; firm acquired by Supreme International, 1999; reintroduced womenswear, 2000; discontinued women's sportswear, 2001; acquired Bugle Boy, 2001. Exhibitions: Fashion Institute of Technology, 2000. Awards: Coty American Fashion Critics award, 1979, 1980, 1981, 1983, 1984; Neiman Marcus award, Dallas, 1979; Council of Fashion Designers of America award, 1981, 1982, 1983; Cutty Sark award, 1983, 1984; Council of Fashion Designers of America Perry Ellis award established in memoriam, 1986; California Men's Apparel Guild Hall of Fame award, 1993. Died: 30 May 1986, in New York City. Company Address: 575 Seventh Avenue, New York, New York 10018, USA. Company Website: www.perry-ellis.com.

PUBLICATIONS

On ELLIS:

Books

- Morris, Bernadine, and Barbara Walz, The Fashion Makers, New York, 1978.
- Diamonstein, Barbaralee, Fashion: The Inside Story, New York, 1985.
- Milbank, Caroline Rennolds, Couture: The Great Designers, New York, 1985.
- Perschitz, Lois, ed., W, The Designing Life, New York, 1987.
- Moor, Johnathan, Perry Ellis, New York, 1988.
- Milbank, Caroline Rennolds, New York Fashion: The Evolution of American Style, New York, 1989.

Perry Ellis, spring 2001 collection: cotton double-faced top coat, cotton ribbed sweater and wrinkled cotton flat front pants. © Reuters NewMedia Inc./CORBIS.

Stegemeyer, Anne, Who's Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.

Articles

- Morrisoe, Patricia, "The Death and Life of Perry Ellis," in New York, 11 August 1986.
- Fressola, Peter, "Perry Ellis," in DNR, 13 April 1987.
- Parola, Robert, "At Ellis: Discord on Design and Direction," in DNR, 24 July 1992.
- Larson, Soren, "Parlux Set to Chase American Dream," in WWD, 2 February 1996.
- Williams, Stan, "Perry's Parry," in DNR, 31 January 1997.
- _____, "Keeping Perry's Image Positive," in WWD, 23 February 1998.
- Lohrer, Robert, "Supreme to Acquire Perry Ellis," in WWD, 29 January 1999.
- D'Innocenzo, Anne, "A Perry Ellis Revival," in WWD, 23 December 1999.
- "In Miami, Perry Ellis Reigns Supreme," in DNR, 4 February 2000.
- "Perry Ellis to Acquire Bugle Boy," in WWD, 9 February 2001.
- Wilson, Eric, and Antonia Sardone, "After One Season, Perry Ellis Yanks Women's Sportswear Line," in WWD, 6 April 2001.

* * *

The house of Perry Ellis has seen more than its share of tumultuous times. From the early days things had never been particularly easy, with Ellis continuously battling over finances with his parent company, Manhattan Industries. Problems with stability continued after Ellis' death in 1986, when Robert McDonald assumed the helm of Perry Ellis International, only to die four years later.

Then came Salant's $100-million takeover of Manhattan Industries and its subsequent bankruptcy filing. Obstacles with direction, especially within the menswear divisions, to the disjointed running of Perry Ellis International (PEI) in the mid-1990s, continued the company's disarray. After several top management changes, PEI finally seemed to stabilize, and once again received notice for the fashions bearing the Ellis label, including the launch of a new bridge line for 1999. Yet before plans were finalized on the bridge line, Salant went bankrupt again, and Supreme International came forward to buy the beleaguered Ellis kingdom. Supreme then took the Ellis moniker, establishing the Perry Ellis International Corporation.

Perry Ellis was known as a flirtatious, fun-loving man with a great sense of humor. According to Claudia Thomas, former chair of Perry Ellis International, it is hard to characterize Ellis, except to describe him as whimsical. There was, however, an air of seriousness about him when it came to creating and fulfilling his objectives, as reflected in his personal philosophy of "never enough." Yet it was the playful side of his personality most reflected in his fashions. When his company arrived on the scene in the 1970s, it was a time of increasing emphasis on American designers and designer name merchandise. Ellis did his best to create a mystique about himself and his lifestyle that would attract fans.

The Perry Ellis look began as a casual, relaxed style exclusively American in feeling and sportswear-like in its practicality. It was so playful and comfortable, in fact, models at his shows would skip down the catwalk. As Ellis matured as a designer, his clothing occasionally took on a more serious tone, but even his most formidable collections were considered easy-dressing by fashion industry standards.

Inspiration came in many forms—California, artist Sonia Delaunay, movies or Broadway shows (like Chariots of Fire or Dream Girls)—all retained the casual ease for which Americans are known internationally and the sense of proportion and freedom from fashion conformity which became the hallmark of Perry Ellis. The company's subsequent womenswear designer, Marc Jacobs, and menswear design director, Andrew Corrigan, appeared to create their collections with the feeling Ellis had tried to instill into a consumer's mind when buying clothing.

Ellis once said, "Always provide the clothes needed for daily life. Never be afraid to take risks and, most importantly, never take the clothes you wear too seriously." Through all the transitions and the fickle nature of fashion, Perry Ellis menswear—and at times its womenswear—remained relatively consistent and true to the tenets and goals espoused by Ellis himself.

—Lisa Marsh; updated by Owen James

EMANUEL, David and Elizabeth

British designers

Born: David—Bridgend, Wales, 17 November 1952; Elizabeth—born Elizabeth Weiner in London, 5 July 1953. Education: David—Attended Cardiff School of Art, Wales, 1972–75, and Harrow School of Art, Middlesex, 1974–75. Elizabeth—Attended Harrow School of Art, 1974–75. Both David and Elizabeth studied fashion in postgraduate courses at the Royal College of Art, 1976–77. Family: Married in 1976 (divorced 1990); children: Oliver and Eloise. Joint Career: Partners and directors of Emanuel, in London, 1977–90; created ready-to-wear line 1977–79; designed custom clothing only, 1979–90; fellows, Chartered Society of Designers, London, 1984; ballet and stage production designers, from 1985; established The Emanuel Shop, Beauchamp Place, London, 1987–90; collections also sold at Harrods and Harvey Nichols, London, and Bergdorf Goodman, Henri Bendell, and Neiman Marcus, New York; partnership dissolved, 1990. Individual Careers: David—Formed David Emanuel Couture, autumn 1990; fellow, the Society of Industrial Artists and Designers; designed wedding dress for actress Catherine Zeta-Jones, 2000; began monthly fashion column in Nurse2Nurse magazine, 2001. Elizabeth—Launched Elizabeth Emanuel Couture fashion label, 1991; designed complete range of Virgin Airways uniforms and accessories, 1991; established Sew Forth Productions, 1993; launched wedding dress line for Bridal Fashions, London, 1994; designed costumes for Ballet Rambert, London Contemporary Dance Theatre, and Royal Ballet productions, London, 1990–94, and for musical theatre production of Jean de Florette, London, 1994–95; designed costumes for films, television, music videos, ad campaigns, and dance productions, mid- to late 1990s; designed flight attendant uniforms for Britannia

Airlines, 1999. Addresses: David Emanuel Couture, Lanesborough Hotel, Lanesborough Place, London, SW 1X 7TA, England; Elizabeth Emanuel, Sew Forth Productions, 26 Chiltern Street, London, W1M 1PF, England.

PUBLICATIONS

By the EMANUELS:

Books

Style for All Seasons, London, 1983, 1984.

Articles

"Getting Going: David and Elizabeth Emanuel," in Designer, July 1981.

"Eyewitness in Manchester," in Manchester Online, 1 February 1999. David—Nurse2Nurse magazine, August 2001 and forward.

On the EMANUELS:

Books

Stegemeyer, Anne, Who's Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.

Articles

Morris, B., "Couple's Design: Fit for a Queen," in the New York Times Biographical Service, November 1981.

Lynn, Frances, "The Amazing Emanuels," in Women's Journal (London), October 1983.

"New London Look: Lush, Plush," in Chicago Tribune, 20 March 1985.

Staniland, Kay, "The Wedding Dresses of H.R.H. the Princess of Wales and H.R.H. the Duchess of York," in Costume (London), 1987.

"Royal Treatment: Some of Britain's Top Designers have Taken Up Residence in London's Beauchamp Place," in Chicago Tribune, 10 February 1988.

Fairley, Josephine, "The 10-Year Stitch," in the Sunday Express Magazine (London), 27 November 1988.

"The Emanuel Gallery," in Vogue (London), December 1988.

Dutt, Robin, "The Emanuels," in Clothes Show (London), April 1989.

Fernand, Deirdre, "Framing a Fashion Career Move," in the Sunday Times (London), 7 January 1990.

Lee, Vinny, "Cream Sequence," in Sunday Express Magazine (London), 31 March 1991.

* * *

The romantic renaissance revival came to life in the early 1980s in the music world and in films. Nowhere, however, was it more apparent than in certain fashion circles. The announcement of the engagement of Charles, Prince of Wales, to Lady Diana Spencer playful and comfortable, in fact, models at his shows would skip down the catwalk. As Ellis matured as a designer, his clothing occasionally took on a more serious tone, but even his most formidable collections were considered easy-dressing by fashion industry standards.

Inspiration came in many forms—California, artist Sonia Delaunay, movies or Broadway shows (like Chariots of Fire or Dream Girls)—all retained the casual ease for which Americans are known internationally and the sense of proportion and freedom from fashion conformity which became the hallmark of Perry Ellis. The company's subsequent womenswear designer, Marc Jacobs, and menswear design director, Andrew Corrigan, appeared to create their collections with the feeling Ellis had tried to instill into a consumer's mind when buying clothing.

Ellis once said, "Always provide the clothes needed for daily life. Never be afraid to take risks and, most importantly, never take the clothes you wear too seriously." Through all the transitions and the fickle nature of fashion, Perry Ellis menswear—and at times its womenswear—remained relatively consistent and true to the tenets and goals espoused by Ellis himself.

—Lisa Marsh; updated by Owen James

EMANUEL, David and Elizabeth

British designers

Born: David—Bridgend, Wales, 17 November 1952; Elizabeth—born Elizabeth Weiner in London, 5 July 1953. Education: David—Attended Cardiff School of Art, Wales, 1972–75, and Harrow School of Art, Middlesex, 1974–75. Elizabeth—Attended Harrow School of Art, 1974–75. Both David and Elizabeth studied fashion in postgraduate courses at the Royal College of Art, 1976–77. Family: Married in 1976 (divorced 1990); children: Oliver and Eloise. Joint Career: Partners and directors of Emanuel, in London, 1977–90; created ready-to-wear line 1977–79; designed custom clothing only, 1979–90; fellows, Chartered Society of Designers, London, 1984; ballet and stage production designers, from 1985; established The Emanuel Shop, Beauchamp Place, London, 1987–90; collections also sold at Harrods and Harvey Nichols, London, and Bergdorf Goodman, Henri Bendell, and Neiman Marcus, New York; partnership dissolved, 1990. Individual Careers: David—Formed David Emanuel Couture, autumn 1990; fellow, the Society of Industrial Artists and Designers; designed wedding dress for actress Catherine Zeta-Jones, 2000; began monthly fashion column in Nurse2Nurse magazine, 2001. Elizabeth—Launched Elizabeth Emanuel Couture fashion label, 1991; designed complete range of Virgin Airways uniforms and accessories, 1991; established Sew Forth Productions, 1993; launched wedding dress line for Bridal Fashions, London, 1994; designed costumes for Ballet Rambert, London Contemporary Dance Theatre, and Royal Ballet productions, London, 1990–94, and for musical theatre production of Jean de Florette, London, 1994–95; designed costumes for films, television, music videos, ad campaigns, and dance productions, mid- to late 1990s; designed flight attendant uniforms for Britannia

Airlines, 1999. Addresses: David Emanuel Couture, Lanesborough Hotel, Lanesborough Place, London, SW 1X 7TA, England; Elizabeth Emanuel, Sew Forth Productions, 26 Chiltern Street, London, W1M 1PF, England.

PUBLICATIONS

By the EMANUELS:

Books

Style for All Seasons, London, 1983, 1984.

Articles

"Getting Going: David and Elizabeth Emanuel," in Designer, July 1981.

"Eyewitness in Manchester," in Manchester Online, 1 February 1999. David—Nurse2Nurse magazine, August 2001 and forward.

On the EMANUELS:

Books

Stegemeyer, Anne, Who's Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.

Articles

Morris, B., "Couple's Design: Fit for a Queen," in the New York Times Biographical Service, November 1981.

Lynn, Frances, "The Amazing Emanuels," in Women's Journal (London), October 1983.

"New London Look: Lush, Plush," in Chicago Tribune, 20 March 1985.

Staniland, Kay, "The Wedding Dresses of H.R.H. the Princess of Wales and H.R.H. the Duchess of York," in Costume (London), 1987.

"Royal Treatment: Some of Britain's Top Designers have Taken Up Residence in London's Beauchamp Place," in Chicago Tribune, 10 February 1988.

Fairley, Josephine, "The 10-Year Stitch," in the Sunday Express Magazine (London), 27 November 1988.

"The Emanuel Gallery," in Vogue (London), December 1988.

Dutt, Robin, "The Emanuels," in Clothes Show (London), April 1989.

Fernand, Deirdre, "Framing a Fashion Career Move," in the Sunday Times (London), 7 January 1990.

Lee, Vinny, "Cream Sequence," in Sunday Express Magazine (London), 31 March 1991.

* * *

The romantic renaissance revival came to life in the early 1980s in the music world and in films. Nowhere, however, was it more apparent than in certain fashion circles. The announcement of the engagement of Charles, Prince of Wales, to Lady Diana Spencer made this an even bigger trend than it would normally have been. Lady Diana's penchant for ruffles created a need for this type of apparel, as she was already becoming a woman many wanted to emulate fashionwise.

It is appropriate the future princess chose the design team of David and Elizabeth Emanuel to create her wedding dress, because romance was the underlying theme to all of their clothing. Ruffles were the rule for the Emanuels, used on everything from gowns to pant suits and even swimwear. The duo, the only married couple to be accepted at the Royal College of Art, had operated their dressmaking shop in London since 1977, and in 1979 they took the unusual step of closing their ready-to-wear business to concentrate on the made-to-order business.

Although it was the ivory silk taffeta and tulle wedding dress worn by Diana in 1981 that brought the Emanuels international fame, they had a firmly entrenched business catering to what Americans would call the "carriage trade." It also enabled the Emanuels to enter into licensing agreements for items such as linens, sunglasses, and perfume.

Princess Anne and Princess Michael of Kent have both worn Emanuel designs for portraits. Her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent joined these women and the Princess of Wales in their love of the Emanuels' work. Each dress was created specifically for the intended client, taking into account the occasion where it would be worn, and the style of the wearer. Then a suitable reference in art was determined, and work progressed from there. Creations by artists from Botticelli to Renoir and Degas were used as influences, as were photographs of some of the more romantic women in history. The garments seen on Greta Garbo in Camille, Vivien Leigh in Gone with the Wind, and Marlene Dietrich in The Scarlet Empress were all recreated to some degree.

In this respect, David and Elizabeth were more stylists than designers, recreating a mood or image. They usually reinterpreted a design, however, rather than copied it—adding a fresh dimension through fabric or hidden detail. A wedding dress, for example, had subtly glittering mother-of-pearl sequins for a woman who was marrying in a dark church. The sequins picked up the light, allowing the bride to glow luminously. The veil for the Princess of Wales incorporated just such a sequin design, drawing attention to the bride. David and Elizabeth Emanuel were nothing if not retrospectively romantic, and all of their creations consciously reflected this trend.

Though Elizabeth and David divorced both personally and professionally in 1990, each continued in the couture businesses since their split. Both outfit numerous celebrities and are celebrities in their own right, particularly in the United Kingdom. They continue to separately design the wedding dresses for which they were best known during their partnership. Elizabeth has designed costumes for several ballet and dance companies, as well as for plays, movies, television series, music videos, and advertising campaigns. In 1997, she held a trunk show of her wedding dresses at Saks Fifth Avenue in New York, with her trip to the U.S. coinciding with the auction of the Princess of Wales' belongings at Christie's. As a result of this timing and the heightened interest in Princess Diana—Elizabeth appeared on many U.S. television programs, expanding her international reputation.

At the same time she was receiving such acclaim as the creator of Princess Diana's wedding gown, Elizabeth designed the wedding dress worn by actress Elizabeth Hurley in Estée Lauder's advertising campaign for the fragrance Beautiful. Elizabeth also designed the uniforms for Britannia Charter Airlines' flight attendants, which debuted in 1999. Additionally, Elizabeth's couture designs were embraced by celebrities including Joan Collins, Faye Dunaway, Twiggy, Drew Barrymore, and many other actresses, as well as members of the royal family.

As for David, his most highly publicized fashion design in recent years, at least in terms of worldwide renown, was the wedding gown worn by actress Catherine Zeta-Jones in her marriage to Michael Douglas in a ceremony at New York's Plaza Hotel in 2001. Zeta-Jones hails from David's native Wales.

In addition to his couture work, David has been active in a number of other endeavors. He writes a monthly column on fashion for the UK monthly trade magazine Nurse2Nurse and appeared on numerous television shows, including a program called OOPS! on which he was part of a celebrity panel discussing topics such as raising teenagers. He has also experimented in interior design, creating the honeymoon suite at the small Sheene Mill Hotel in the United Kingdom.

—Lisa Marsh; updated by Karen Raugust

EMARY, John

See AQUASCUTUM, LTD.

EMILIA, Reggie

See MARINA RINALDI, SrL

ENGLISH ECCENTRICS

British textile design and fashion company

Founded: by Helen and Judy Littman, 1982; Helen Littman born in Brighton, Sussex, 1955; studied at Brighton and Hove High School for Girls, 1966–72; Eastbourne College of Art and Design, 1972–74; Camberwell School of Arts and Crafts, 1974–77; founded Personal Items design company with Judy Littman, 1979. Company History: Began printing under name English Eccentrics, 1982; English Eccentrics made a limited company, 1984; opened Fulham Road, London, shop, 1987; first catwalk show, London, 1985; designed scarves for Royal Academy, London, 1989; Royal Pavilion, Harvey Nichols, and Girl Guides Association, 1990; designed scarf and clothing for Joseph, London, 1990; Exhibitions: Mad Dogs and Englishmen, Young Designer Show, London, October 1983; London Goes to Tokyo, Hanae Mori Building, Tokyo, November 1984; Innovators in Fashion, Pitti Palace, Florence, October 1985; British Design, Vienna, 1986; British Scarves, London, 1987; British Design, New Traditions, Boymans Museum, Rotterdam, 1989; British Design, Tokyo, 1990; British Design 1790–1990, Costa Mesa, California, 1990; Collecting made this an even bigger trend than it would normally have been. Lady Diana's penchant for ruffles created a need for this type of apparel, as she was already becoming a woman many wanted to emulate fashionwise.

It is appropriate the future princess chose the design team of David and Elizabeth Emanuel to create her wedding dress, because romance was the underlying theme to all of their clothing. Ruffles were the rule for the Emanuels, used on everything from gowns to pant suits and even swimwear. The duo, the only married couple to be accepted at the Royal College of Art, had operated their dressmaking shop in London since 1977, and in 1979 they took the unusual step of closing their ready-to-wear business to concentrate on the made-to-order business.

Although it was the ivory silk taffeta and tulle wedding dress worn by Diana in 1981 that brought the Emanuels international fame, they had a firmly entrenched business catering to what Americans would call the "carriage trade." It also enabled the Emanuels to enter into licensing agreements for items such as linens, sunglasses, and perfume.

Princess Anne and Princess Michael of Kent have both worn Emanuel designs for portraits. Her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent joined these women and the Princess of Wales in their love of the Emanuels' work. Each dress was created specifically for the intended client, taking into account the occasion where it would be worn, and the style of the wearer. Then a suitable reference in art was determined, and work progressed from there. Creations by artists from Botticelli to Renoir and Degas were used as influences, as were photographs of some of the more romantic women in history. The garments seen on Greta Garbo in Camille, Vivien Leigh in Gone with the Wind, and Marlene Dietrich in The Scarlet Empress were all recreated to some degree.

In this respect, David and Elizabeth were more stylists than designers, recreating a mood or image. They usually reinterpreted a design, however, rather than copied it—adding a fresh dimension through fabric or hidden detail. A wedding dress, for example, had subtly glittering mother-of-pearl sequins for a woman who was marrying in a dark church. The sequins picked up the light, allowing the bride to glow luminously. The veil for the Princess of Wales incorporated just such a sequin design, drawing attention to the bride. David and Elizabeth Emanuel were nothing if not retrospectively romantic, and all of their creations consciously reflected this trend.

Though Elizabeth and David divorced both personally and professionally in 1990, each continued in the couture businesses since their split. Both outfit numerous celebrities and are celebrities in their own right, particularly in the United Kingdom. They continue to separately design the wedding dresses for which they were best known during their partnership. Elizabeth has designed costumes for several ballet and dance companies, as well as for plays, movies, television series, music videos, and advertising campaigns. In 1997, she held a trunk show of her wedding dresses at Saks Fifth Avenue in New York, with her trip to the U.S. coinciding with the auction of the Princess of Wales' belongings at Christie's. As a result of this timing and the heightened interest in Princess Diana—Elizabeth appeared on many U.S. television programs, expanding her international reputation.

At the same time she was receiving such acclaim as the creator of Princess Diana's wedding gown, Elizabeth designed the wedding dress worn by actress Elizabeth Hurley in Estée Lauder's advertising campaign for the fragrance Beautiful. Elizabeth also designed the uniforms for Britannia Charter Airlines' flight attendants, which debuted in 1999. Additionally, Elizabeth's couture designs were embraced by celebrities including Joan Collins, Faye Dunaway, Twiggy, Drew Barrymore, and many other actresses, as well as members of the royal family.

As for David, his most highly publicized fashion design in recent years, at least in terms of worldwide renown, was the wedding gown worn by actress Catherine Zeta-Jones in her marriage to Michael Douglas in a ceremony at New York's Plaza Hotel in 2001. Zeta-Jones hails from David's native Wales.

In addition to his couture work, David has been active in a number of other endeavors. He writes a monthly column on fashion for the UK monthly trade magazine Nurse2Nurse and appeared on numerous television shows, including a program called OOPS! on which he was part of a celebrity panel discussing topics such as raising teenagers. He has also experimented in interior design, creating the honeymoon suite at the small Sheene Mill Hotel in the United Kingdom.

—Lisa Marsh; updated by Karen Raugust

EMARY, John

See AQUASCUTUM, LTD.

EMILIA, Reggie

See MARINA RINALDI, SrL

ENGLISH ECCENTRICS

British textile design and fashion company

Founded: by Helen and Judy Littman, 1982; Helen Littman born in Brighton, Sussex, 1955; studied at Brighton and Hove High School for Girls, 1966–72; Eastbourne College of Art and Design, 1972–74; Camberwell School of Arts and Crafts, 1974–77; founded Personal Items design company with Judy Littman, 1979. Company History: Began printing under name English Eccentrics, 1982; English Eccentrics made a limited company, 1984; opened Fulham Road, London, shop, 1987; first catwalk show, London, 1985; designed scarves for Royal Academy, London, 1989; Royal Pavilion, Harvey Nichols, and Girl Guides Association, 1990; designed scarf and clothing for Joseph, London, 1990; Exhibitions: Mad Dogs and Englishmen, Young Designer Show, London, October 1983; London Goes to Tokyo, Hanae Mori Building, Tokyo, November 1984; Innovators in Fashion, Pitti Palace, Florence, October 1985; British Design, Vienna, 1986; British Scarves, London, 1987; British Design, New Traditions, Boymans Museum, Rotterdam, 1989; British Design, Tokyo, 1990; British Design 1790–1990, Costa Mesa, California, 1990; Collecting for the Future, Victoria & Albert Museum, London 1990. Awards: Avant Garde Designer Preis, Munich, 1986. Company Address: 9/10 Charlotte Road, London EC2A 3DH, England.

PUBLICATIONS

On ENGLISH ECCENTRICS:

Books

- Johnson, L., ed., The Fashion Year, London 1985.
McDermott, Catherine, ed., English Eccentrics: The Textile Designs of Helen Littman, San Francisco, 1993.

Articles

- "Fabricated Fashion," in You magazine of the Mail on Sunday (London), 10 July 1983.
Brampton, Sally, "Still Crazy," in the Observer (London), 24 March 1985.
"English Eccentrics," in DNR, 25 March 1985.
Polan, Brenda, "Eccentric Fantasy," in The Guardian, 20 June 1985.
Thorpe, Brendan, "English Eccentrics in Retail Adventure," in Design Week (London), 7 August 1987.
Bain, Sally, "British Designers Preview," in Draper's Record (London), 5 March 1988.
Weibe, Susanne, "Beyond the Louvre," in WWD, 8 October 1991.
Fitzmaurice, Arabella, "Appearing in Print," in the Sunday Times (London), March 1992.
Gattemayer, Michela, "English Eccentrics: Moda Souvenir," in Elle (Italy), March 1992.
Menkes, Suzy, "From Cultural Symbols to Fabric Designs," in the International Herald Tribune, March 1992.
McHugh, Fionnuala, "Material Success," in the Telegraph Magazine (London), 14 March 1992.
Feron, Francesca, "The Eclectic Eccentrics Whose Designs Got to Your Head," in the Glasgow Herald, May 1992.
Davis, Maggie, "Fashion Notebook One," in the Observer, 9 November 1997.
Moin, David, "Saks Showcases British Style," in WWD, 26 August 1998.
"English Eccentrics," in Footwear News, 3 January 2000.
"From Ralph Lauren to Chanel: Crystals Line the Runways," in PR Newswire, 18 September 2000.
"Final Word on Fall, available online at Fashion Planet, www.fashion-planet.com, 29 September 2001.

*

I believe that all women have their own beauty and that striving to look like the stereotyped images in our media can undermine this. However, I feel there is no reason why we should not enjoy using beauty products and I think dressing well is a great pleasure. We dress to enhance our appearance, and my aim in designing is that the clothes and accessories we produce are fun to wear and help to make any woman look wonderful be she overweight, over eighty, or a fashion model. I am always conscious of the body as the final showplace for my designs.

—Helen Littman

* * *

Named after Edith Sitwell's book of the same title, English Eccentrics established an international reputation for its distinct printed textiles since they were first sold at a stall in London's Kensington Market in 1984. The company was founded in 1982 by sisters Helen and Judy Littman when they began printing their designs onto fabric on the floor of their studio in Wapping. Helen Littman, the creative inspiration behind the company, trained as a textile designer at Camberwell School of Art, while Judy, who studied painting, controlled the business and promotions side.

The Littman sisters and their quirky company name were timed perfectly with the emergence of London as the most happening fashion center during the early 1980s, when the likes of John Galliano, Katharine Hamnett, and Vivienne Westwood were beginning to make their mark in international fashion. English Eccentrics was also mentioned in the famous article published by Women's Wear Daily (New York), when it announced in 1983 that "London Swings Again."

English Eccentrics is recognized for its use of extravagantly rich combinations of color and unusual trompe l'oeil designs inspired by a myriad of subjects, including travel, ecology, architecture, costume, and nature, which are translated onto the highest quality silks. Helen credits much of her inspiration from what she calls her own "Grand Tour," which was in fact a series of short trips abroad during which she used a sketchbook and a camera to record ideas for future designs. It is, however, the way in which Littman uses the ideas that is the key to her success as a designer.

Littman acknowledges "obvious cultural piracy is boring" and thus reworks each idea in a thoroughly modern way. Littman's treatment of her inspiration is clearly illustrated by what has become one of English Eccentric's best-known designs, called Hands. On a visit to Manhattan, Littman was surprised by the number of palmistry parlors she saw, which she found completely at odds with her personal image of the powerful city. For the design, Littman combined a handprint with elements taken from New York graffiti and palmistry diagrams. Its spiral border pattern was inspired by Gustav Klimt's painting the Tree of Life. The result is an abstract pattern printed in five colorways for scarf squares and which was also adapted for giftwrap paper as well as designs for hosiery.

The special qualities of silk have proved to be the ideal fabric medium for English Eccentrics because it enables very intense, vibrant colors as well as softer muted shades to be printed in accurate detail. Another feature of Littman's designs is that all printing is done by hand with acid dyes rather than pigment colors, which do not have the same qualities of clarity. Between 1984 and 1988, English Eccentrics also produced 10 clothing collections and translated their designs onto stationery, furnishing fabrics, and packaging.

The ensuing financial climate of the late 1980s, however, forced the company to tailor these activities, and the Littmans began to concentrate solely upon producing the silk scarf squares for which they were best recognized. These designs were also used to create a small range of classic garments such as shirts and waistcoats that incorporated the square scarf into their design. The company introduced devore velvet into their collection for winter 1993 with great success—their devore tunic became one of the season's key garments, worn by fashion editors, buyers, and film stars alike. The same season, English Eccentrics also enlarged the scarf range to include more than 60 colors, fabrics, and styles.

In 1991, Catherine McDermott, author of definitive works on Gianni Versace and Vivienne Westwood, edited English Eccentrics: The Textile Designs of Helen Littman, a lavishly illustrated, richly colored compendium of Helen and Judy Littman's prints reprising myth-based designs over the past decade. The vibrant patterns suit ties, shirts, jackets, shawls, dresses, and silk scarves, have appealed to a wide range of buyers, including Mick Jagger, Paul McCartney, and Prince. For the book blurb, Littman explained the importance of travel, the women's peace movement, and environmental issues to her creativity, with which the design group Carroll, Dempsey & Thirkell permeated the text.

To Susan Weibe of Women's Wear Daily, Helen Littman elaborated on her label's individualism, "Our signature is our color sense and our imagery, which is unusual." For spring 1991, English Eccentrics showcased Elements of the Portman Vase at the British Museum for a tapestry appeal reflecting the painted imagery and abstractions of Cy Twombly, the Virginia-born contemporary artist. On exhibition in the Quai Branly tent at Paris sur Mode near the Eiffel Tower rather than the standard location at the Louvre, the English Eccentrics collection featured prices ranging from $30 to $400. Buyers from the U.S. could find Littman prints at Barneys, Henri Bendel, and Bergdorf Goodman.

For spring-summer 1994, English Eccentrics introduced its first ready-to-wear collection since 1988, which included sarong skirts, trousers, shirts, and jackets in plain linens, silks, and devore velvet combined with pieces featuring the season's new print designs on silk. Unlike many of their designer counterparts who achieved notoriety during the early years of the 1980s, English Eccentrics has managed to build upon its success while remaining firmly based in Britain. They export all over the world from England, which is, after all, the only proper base for a company of that name.

On-target choices have kept English Eccentrics current and hot. In fall 1998, Littman was showing clingy little-girl looks in button-up cardigans with scoop necks and circlets of glitter at above-the-wrist sleeves. For fall 2000, the design group incorporated a sprinkling of Swarovski crystals. Of the ideas that impact her work, Littman commented that she likes the hobo look for hand-printed dresses and chooses simple designs because—simply—she can't sew.

—Catherine Woram; updated by Mary Ellen Snodgrass

ERMENEGILDO ZEGNA GROUP

Italian design firm and retailer

Founded: in 1910 by Ermengildo Zegna (1892–1966) in Trivero, Biellese Alps, Italy. Company History: Business turned over to sons, Aldo and Angelo, who expanded into ready-to-wear clothing, menswear line, 1960s; opened branches in Spain, France, Germany, Austria, U.S., Japan, and United Kingdom; group-controlled production units opened in Spain and Switzerland, 1968; specializes in men's ready-to-wear; first U.S. boutique, 1989; fragrance, Zegna; opened Beijing flagship, 1991; E.Z. line, designed by Kim Herring, launched 1993; Oasi Zegna, land recovery program, Trivero, 1993; opened first outlet store, New York, 1997; opened first store in India, 1999; acquired Angora womenswear, launched Zegna Sport, and began online selling, 1999; formed partnership with Armani, 2000. Exhibitions: Made in Italy, Pier 84, New York, 1988; Wool Bicentennial, Barcelona, 1990; The Meandering Pattern in Brocades and Silk, Milan, 1990–91; and at the Fashion Institute of Technology, New York, 1992. Collections: The Power House Museum, Sydney; Museo della Scienza e della Tecnica, Milan. Awards: Cavaliere del Lavoro (to Ermengildo Zegna), 1930. Company Address: 5 Via Forcella, 20144 Milan, Italy. Company Website: www.zegnaermengildo.com.

PUBLICATIONS

On ERMENEGILDO ZEGNA GROUP:

Books

- Storie e favole di moda*, Italy, 1982.
- Giacomoni, Silvia, The Italian Look Reflected, Italy, 1984.
- Canali, Renato, La Panoramica Zegna, Italy, 1985.
- Enciclopedia della moda*, Milan, 1989.
- Villarosa, R., and Angelini, G., Homo elegans, Milan, 1990.
- The Meandering Pattern in Brocaded Silks, 1745–1775*, [exhibition catalogue], Milan, 1990.
- Chaille, F., La grande histoire de la cravatte, France, 1994.
- Martin, Richard, and Harold Koda, Two by Two: Metropolitan Museum of Art, New York, 1996.

Articles

- "Fuori la stoffa, ragazzi," in Panorama (Milan), 24 May 1992.
- "Der Kaschmir-Clan," in Stern (Germany), September 1992.
- "Zegna alla Conquista della Cina," in La Stampa (Turin), 7 July 1993.
- "La seconda conquista dell'America," in L'indipendente, 26 November 1993.
- Siow, Doreen, "High Price Can be a Strong Suit," in the Sunday Times (London), 13 December 1993.
- "Ecology: The Best Strategy," in Newsweek, 31 January 1994.
- "La ricerca Zegna sui materiali," in Il Sole 24 Ore (Italy), 15 March 1994.
- Dubini, Laura, "La génération verte," in Jardin des Modes (Paris), April 1994.
- Gellers, Stan, "There's Hard Business Sense Behind the Soft Suit," in DNR, 25 April 1994.
- Bow, Josphine J., "China Acquires a Small Taste of Italy," in DNR, 16 May 1994.
- "Zegna quota 500 miliardi nel 1994," in Il Sole 24 Ore (Italy), 17 May 1994.
- Levine, Joshua, "Armani's Counterpart," in Forbes, 4 July 1994.
- Gellars, Stan, "Zegna Built its $85M U.S. Business by Using Americana Marketing," in DNR, 20 December 1995.

they were best recognized. These designs were also used to create a small range of classic garments such as shirts and waistcoats that incorporated the square scarf into their design. The company introduced devore velvet into their collection for winter 1993 with great success—their devore tunic became one of the season's key garments, worn by fashion editors, buyers, and film stars alike. The same season, English Eccentrics also enlarged the scarf range to include more than 60 colors, fabrics, and styles.

In 1991, Catherine McDermott, author of definitive works on Gianni Versace and Vivienne Westwood, edited English Eccentrics: The Textile Designs of Helen Littman, a lavishly illustrated, richly colored compendium of Helen and Judy Littman's prints reprising myth-based designs over the past decade. The vibrant patterns suit ties, shirts, jackets, shawls, dresses, and silk scarves, have appealed to a wide range of buyers, including Mick Jagger, Paul McCartney, and Prince. For the book blurb, Littman explained the importance of travel, the women's peace movement, and environmental issues to her creativity, with which the design group Carroll, Dempsey & Thirkell permeated the text.

To Susan Weibe of Women's Wear Daily, Helen Littman elaborated on her label's individualism, "Our signature is our color sense and our imagery, which is unusual." For spring 1991, English Eccentrics showcased Elements of the Portman Vase at the British Museum for a tapestry appeal reflecting the painted imagery and abstractions of Cy Twombly, the Virginia-born contemporary artist. On exhibition in the Quai Branly tent at Paris sur Mode near the Eiffel Tower rather than the standard location at the Louvre, the English Eccentrics collection featured prices ranging from $30 to $400. Buyers from the U.S. could find Littman prints at Barneys, Henri Bendel, and Bergdorf Goodman.

For spring-summer 1994, English Eccentrics introduced its first ready-to-wear collection since 1988, which included sarong skirts, trousers, shirts, and jackets in plain linens, silks, and devore velvet combined with pieces featuring the season's new print designs on silk. Unlike many of their designer counterparts who achieved notoriety during the early years of the 1980s, English Eccentrics has managed to build upon its success while remaining firmly based in Britain. They export all over the world from England, which is, after all, the only proper base for a company of that name.

On-target choices have kept English Eccentrics current and hot. In fall 1998, Littman was showing clingy little-girl looks in button-up cardigans with scoop necks and circlets of glitter at above-the-wrist sleeves. For fall 2000, the design group incorporated a sprinkling of Swarovski crystals. Of the ideas that impact her work, Littman commented that she likes the hobo look for hand-printed dresses and chooses simple designs because—simply—she can't sew.

—Catherine Woram; updated by Mary Ellen Snodgrass

ERMENEGILDO ZEGNA GROUP

Italian design firm and retailer

Founded: in 1910 by Ermengildo Zegna (1892–1966) in Trivero, Biellese Alps, Italy. Company History: Business turned over to sons, Aldo and Angelo, who expanded into ready-to-wear clothing, menswear line, 1960s; opened branches in Spain, France, Germany, Austria, U.S., Japan, and United Kingdom; group-controlled production units opened in Spain and Switzerland, 1968; specializes in men's ready-to-wear; first U.S. boutique, 1989; fragrance, Zegna; opened Beijing flagship, 1991; E.Z. line, designed by Kim Herring, launched 1993; Oasi Zegna, land recovery program, Trivero, 1993; opened first outlet store, New York, 1997; opened first store in India, 1999; acquired Angora womenswear, launched Zegna Sport, and began online selling, 1999; formed partnership with Armani, 2000. Exhibitions: Made in Italy, Pier 84, New York, 1988; Wool Bicentennial, Barcelona, 1990; The Meandering Pattern in Brocades and Silk, Milan, 1990–91; and at the Fashion Institute of Technology, New York, 1992. Collections: The Power House Museum, Sydney; Museo della Scienza e della Tecnica, Milan. Awards: Cavaliere del Lavoro (to Ermengildo Zegna), 1930. Company Address: 5 Via Forcella, 20144 Milan, Italy. Company Website: www.zegnaermengildo.com.

PUBLICATIONS

On ERMENEGILDO ZEGNA GROUP:

Books

- Storie e favole di moda*, Italy, 1982.
- Giacomoni, Silvia, The Italian Look Reflected, Italy, 1984.
- Canali, Renato, La Panoramica Zegna, Italy, 1985.
- Encyclopedie della moda*, Milan, 1989.
- Villarosa, R., and Angelini, G., Homo elegans, Milan, 1990.
- The Meandering Pattern in Brocaded Silks, 1745–1775*, [exhibition catalogue], Milan, 1990.
- Chaille, F., La grande histoire de la cravatte, France, 1994.
- Martin, Richard, and Harold Koda, Two by Two: Metropolitan Museum of Art, New York, 1996.

Articles

- "Fuori la stoffa, ragazzi," in Panorama (Milan), 24 May 1992.
- "Der Kaschmir-Clan," in Stern (Germany), September 1992.
- "Zegna alla Conquista della Cina," in La Stampa (Turin), 7 July 1993.
- "La seconda conquista dell'America," in L'indipendente, 26 November 1993.
- Siow, Doreen, "High Price Can be a Strong Suit," in the Sunday Times (London), 13 December 1993.
- "Ecology: The Best Strategy," in Newsweek, 31 January 1994.
- "La ricerca Zegna sui materiali," in Il Sole 24 Ore (Italy), 15 March 1994.
- Dubini, Laura, "La génération verte," in Jardin des Modes (Paris), April 1994.
- Gellers, Stan, "There's Hard Business Sense Behind the Soft Suit," in DNR, 25 April 1994.
- Bow, Josphine J., "China Acquires a Small Taste of Italy," in DNR, 16 May 1994.
- "Zegna quota 500 miliardi nel 1994," in Il Sole 24 Ore (Italy), 17 May 1994.
- Levine, Joshua, "Armani's Counterpart," in Forbes, 4 July 1994.
- Gellars, Stan, "Zegna Built its $85M U.S. Business by Using Americana Marketing," in DNR, 20 December 1995.

- Palmieri, Jean E., "Zegna Sets Florida, Hawaii Stores," in DNR, 3 June 1996.
- Gellars, Stan, "Zegna Finds a New Outlet for Its Fashion," in DNR, 14 April 1997.
- Kline, Maureen, "Chic Executives Go for Zegna," in the Wall Street Journal, 27 August 1998.
- Betts, Paul, "A Range of Ties for All Occasions," in the Financial Times, 23 September 1998.
- Conti, Samantha, "Zegna to Buy Lanerie Agnona," in WWD, 14 January 1999.
- Sman, Katherine, "Zegna Licensed to Make Ungaro Signature Collection," in DNR, 15 January 1999.
- Zargani, Luisa, "Armani and Zegna Form Joint Venture," in WWD, 25 July 2000.
- Daswani, Kavita, "Indian Men Beginning to Embrace High Fashion...Zegna Stores Appeal to Newly Fashion-Conscious Customer," in DNR, 21 February 2001.
- "Zegna Vision Lives On," in the New Straits Times, 2 April 2001.

*

Ermenegildo Zegna was founded in 1910 as a company which created and produced woolen fabrics. Our philosophy has always been based on quality and the search for excellence.

What makes Zegna unique is that it is the only company of its type in the world specialized in the direct purchase of natural raw materials on their markets of origin, with a totally verticalized creative and production cycle going from raw materials to cloths, clothing and accessories, which are internationally distributed through Zegna's salespoints and other selected menswear shops.

Finally, Zegna is also characterized by its sensitivity and respect for the environment. As early as 1930, Ermenegildo Zegna established and financed a vast project for the reclamation of the mountain overlooking Trivero, the village in the Alpine foothills of Biella where Zegna's headquarters are located. Following in the footsteps of the company's founder, the younger generations of the family have created "Oasi Zegna," a project designed to protect nature over an area of about 100 square kilometres.

—Ermenegildo Zegna Group

* * *

"Our typical client believes in understated classic styles," says Gildo Zegna, grandson of the family firm's founder. "That's why they like Ermenegildo Zegna." Ermenegildo Zegna Group is not a brand of radical fashion statements; on the contrary, very classic tailoring, rich and supple fabrics, and obsessive attention to detail make Zegna the Rolls Royce of menswear, an image the firm is quick to reinforce.

The company's marketing and advertising copy describes wool spun into strands so fine one kilo stretches 150,000 metres, hand-sewn buttons, and the hand-pressing of each jacket before leaving the factory. The latter, it was said, took 45 minutes, but then suit prices are high. Zegna built a reputation on catering only to the richest of businessmen, well-established celebrities, and the world's royalty; only near the end of the 20th century did the firm expand into less exclusive apparel.

Zegna clothes are quintessentially English, from the suits of a world-class banker to the casualwear of a world-beating yachtsman or horsemaster. The fabrics are Italian, made for lightweight softness and presoaked in the waters of the Italian Alps, whose mineral-free quality has been sought after by Italian cloth merchants since the Middle Ages. The craftsmanship is Swiss—accurate, precise, always correct, while colors change year on year. Winter 1993 was brick, brown, tobacco, evergreen, billiard green, emerald; winter 1994 was eye-blue, cobalt, stone grey, tobacco, some red, more browns. Raw materials come from the world over—wool from Australia, cashmere from China, mohair from South Africa. Although most upmarket menswear producers use similar resources and methods, Zegna takes its selection a few steps further—for example, the firm's preferred cashmere is that of a Chinese goat, aged between three and five years. It then becomes understood the creators at Zegna are not just professionals but inspired visionaries of men's clothing.

Much of Zegna's strength lies in its manufacturing process. The company is vertically integrated, buying its own raw materials, making its own fabrics, designing its clothes, and running its own boutiques. The firm has always been forward-looking, yet steeped in tradition; it uses the most advanced databases to maintain and update customer measurements, purchases, and personal details, and uses CAD (computer-aided design) programs to adjust patterns. Wool fabrics, however, were still handwashed and suits still finished by hand.

Zegna is, however, successful in a highly competitive sector. The 1994 market for men's suits costing over $1,000 was considered one million units per year; Zegna sold 300,000 such suits during the year, capturing 30-percent of the market. To maintain and grow in this sector, their marketing has been subtle—like sponsoring a yacht race in Portofino, Italy, with no loud banners or posters, just models walking through the crowd wearing Zegna blazers with the small white EZ logo. Then there are the seat covers for Saab 9000 cars, where Saab salesmen were drilled in the virtues and qualities of Zegna fabrics so they would pass the information on to buyers. Zegna has also mailed sample swatches and possible combinations of jackets, ties, and shirts to their best customers.

In the middle and later 1990s, Zegna expanded into new markets with soft suits, the casual cut, and mix-and-match coordinates which were popular in the U.S., France, and Italy. Specifically for the U.S. market, Zegna designed sportswear to compete with Hugo Boss, Giorgio Armani, and Calvin Klein—shirts, slacks, and sports and outerwear jackets aimed at the 35-plus market. To complete a man's wardrobe, Zegna also makes natural cotton undergarments, high quality corporate gifts, and a signature fragrance.

Perhaps Zegna's most important strength is the tightknit family behind the company; the children of founder Ermenegildo Zegna as well as many of his grandchildren and great-grandchildren have roles within the firm. There was no indication such a reliance on home-grown talent led to stagnation, although outsiders also played major roles in the firm, especially in America. By 1996 there were five freestanding Zegna stores in the U.S., with the latest shops opening in Hawaii and Florida. Zegna also ventured into lower-priced goods with its first outlet store, in a large mall in Central Valley, New York, in 1997. Surrounded by such high-end designers as Christian Dior, Tommy Hilfiger, Ralph Lauren, Brooks Brothers, and Barneys, the firm was in exceedingly good company.

Ermenegildo Zegna menswear is internationally known for its high quality and exquisite fabrics. Rapidly approaching its centennial, the firm has kept abreast of the times, from launching a website and introducing sportswear, to forging alliances with other menswear leaders like Armani and Ungaro. The family-run empire has a growing global presence in Europe, as well as two dozen shops in China, and its second store opening in the virtually untapped menswear market in India.

—Sally Anne Melia; updated by Sydonie Benét

ERREUNO SCM SPA

Italian ready-to-wear firm

Founded: by Ermanno Ronchi (born 28 May 1947) and Graziella Ronchi Pezzutto (born 24 November 1945) in Milan, 1971. Company History: Added Donnaerre line of women's clothes, 1981;

Erreuno SCM SpA, fall/winter 2001–02 collection: suit with fox fur sleeves. © AP/Wide World Photos.

Erreuno Uomo line, 1985; Erreuno Jeans collection, 1986; Graziella Ronchi Cocktail line, 1986; Erreuno Golf lines, 1989; Erreuno J line, designed by Michael Kors, introduced in U.S., 1990; launched first fragrance, 1994; signed with Guaber Group to license fragrances, 1995; second fragrance launched with fall ready-to-wear line, 1996; Guglielmo Capone hired as stylist. Company Address: Via Bensi 6, 20152 Milan, Italy.

PUBLICATIONS

On ERREUNO:

Articles

- Haber, Holly, "Erreuno J Makes U.S. Debut in Dallas," in WWD, 15 August 1990.
"Cosmoprof Exhibit Fragrance Launches," in Cosmetics International, 10 May 1994.
Barone, Amy B., "Eurocosmesi's Worldwide Plan," in WWD, 9 June 1995.

Erreuno SCM SpA, fall/winter 2001–02 collection. © AP/Wide World Photos.

Ermenegildo Zegna menswear is internationally known for its high quality and exquisite fabrics. Rapidly approaching its centennial, the firm has kept abreast of the times, from launching a website and introducing sportswear, to forging alliances with other menswear leaders like Armani and Ungaro. The family-run empire has a growing global presence in Europe, as well as two dozen shops in China, and its second store opening in the virtually untapped menswear market in India.

—Sally Anne Melia; updated by Sydonie Benét

ERREUNO SCM SPA

Italian ready-to-wear firm

Founded: by Ermanno Ronchi (born 28 May 1947) and Graziella Ronchi Pezzutto (born 24 November 1945) in Milan, 1971. Company History: Added Donnaerre line of women's clothes, 1981;

Erreuno SCM SpA, fall/winter 2001–02 collection: suit with fox fur sleeves. © AP/Wide World Photos.

Erreuno Uomo line, 1985; Erreuno Jeans collection, 1986; Graziella Ronchi Cocktail line, 1986; Erreuno Golf lines, 1989; Erreuno J line, designed by Michael Kors, introduced in U.S., 1990; launched first fragrance, 1994; signed with Guaber Group to license fragrances, 1995; second fragrance launched with fall ready-to-wear line, 1996; Guglielmo Capone hired as stylist. Company Address: Via Bensi 6, 20152 Milan, Italy.

PUBLICATIONS

On ERREUNO:

Articles

- Haber, Holly, "Erreuno J Makes U.S. Debut in Dallas," in WWD, 15 August 1990.
"Cosmoprof Exhibit Fragrance Launches," in Cosmetics International, 10 May 1994.
Barone, Amy B., "Eurocosmesi's Worldwide Plan," in WWD, 9 June 1995.

Erreuno SCM SpA, fall/winter 2001–02 collection. © AP/Wide World Photos.

- Muir, Lucie, "Italian Designers Bring Body Conscious Looks Center Stage for Spring/Summer 1997 with High-Tech Fabrics," in WWD, 18 September 1996.
- Dichter, Peter, "Vegetable, Mineral, Celebrity: Is Name Alone Enough to Sell a Fragrance?" in Global Cosmetic Industry, October 2000.

* * *

Erreuno is the brainchild of Ermanno and Graziella Ronchi, who established the company in Milan in 1971. The company name is a combination of the pronunciation of the first letter of the Ronchi name R (Erre) and Uno, the Italian word for one, chosen because it was the couple's first business venture.

The Ronchis wanted to create something influential and significant in the Italian fashion world, to establish a company that provided top quality ready-to-wear designs for the smart, modern, and discerning woman. Extremely positive in their approach, their success has been the result of hard work, commitment, and teamwork. Ermanno handles all the administrative and financial side of the business while Graziella oversees design and marketing.

Fabric is of prime importance in any Erreuno collection. Designing often appears to be a grouping together of expensive fibers, textures, plaids, prints, mattes, and shines, then coordinating these into wearable, sporty, classic clothes. Graziella Ronchi places great emphasis on fabric research and over two-thirds of the fabrics are developed in the firm's Milan studios. Great care is given to the choice of fabrics used in each collection to ensure that, when made into garments and styled together, they give a strong visual impact and provide versatility of choice for a wide variety of women.

Never at the cutting edge of designer fashion, Erreuno instead evolves its own particular style each season. A feeling for softness combined with architectural design is reflected in each individual garment and, when incorporated as part of an outfit, adds its own contribution to the finished look. Erreuno's initial success was in the design and manufacture of skirts. The range expanded and developed to include complete womenswear outfits and in 1975 led to a seasonal ready-to-wear collection, shown twice a year in Milan. Since then the company has steadily evolved to incorporate many other goods: leathers, wallets, foulards, key pouches, bags, hats, and gloves. Sold in worldwide boutiques, the products give customers the opportunity to coordinate an Erreuno outfit with top quality accessories, adding greater credence to the company's marketing strategy.

Erreuno collections provide a refreshing presence on the Milan catwalks. Perched midway between the extremes of Dolce & Gabbana's expensive vamps and Giorgio Armani's exquisite classicism, the Erreuno look is one of neutrality. A softly tailored tiny-check suit is teamed with a belted, collarless blouson, an oversize ankle-length, belted mackintosh is teamed with shorts, subtly playing on long and short, or an understated mix of stripes in an outfit comprised of four different types of stripe. Color for Erreuno is soft and discerning; the beiges, browns, creams, lilacs, off-whites, or warm greys are never loud or unflattering.

In the mid-1990s the Ronchis segued into fragrance, with their first scent for women aptly named Erreuno. Although many fashion firms were producing fragrances, Erreuno differed in that the floral scent was not licensed but created in-house under the supervision of Graziella. The Ronchis decided to pursue further fragrances, however, forming Erreuno Parfums and signed a licensing agreement with the Guaber Group in 1995. A second women's fragrance debuted with the firm's ready-to-wear collection in the fall of 1996.

The expression and imagination of Ermanno and Graziella Ronchi, combined with their flair for design, marketing, and manufacturing, have found the perfect complement in their company. Erreuno and its major lines, Erreuno, Donna Erre and Miss Erreuno, play a pivotal role in Italian fashion, whether through strong showings in Milan or the special identity the firm's clothes create for women.

—Kevin Almond

ESCADA

German fashion house

Founded: by Wolfgang and Margarethe Ley (died 1992) in Munich, 1976. Company History: Expanded throughout Germany, then into U.S., 1982; company went public, 1986; began opening retail stores

Escada, spring/summer 2001 collection. © AP/Wide World Photos.

- Muir, Lucie, "Italian Designers Bring Body Conscious Looks Center Stage for Spring/Summer 1997 with High-Tech Fabrics," in WWD, 18 September 1996.
- Dichter, Peter, "Vegetable, Mineral, Celebrity: Is Name Alone Enough to Sell a Fragrance?" in Global Cosmetic Industry, October 2000.

* * *

Erreuno is the brainchild of Ermanno and Graziella Ronchi, who established the company in Milan in 1971. The company name is a combination of the pronunciation of the first letter of the Ronchi name R (Erre) and Uno, the Italian word for one, chosen because it was the couple's first business venture.

The Ronchis wanted to create something influential and significant in the Italian fashion world, to establish a company that provided top quality ready-to-wear designs for the smart, modern, and discerning woman. Extremely positive in their approach, their success has been the result of hard work, commitment, and teamwork. Ermanno handles all the administrative and financial side of the business while Graziella oversees design and marketing.

Fabric is of prime importance in any Erreuno collection. Designing often appears to be a grouping together of expensive fibers, textures, plaids, prints, mattes, and shines, then coordinating these into wearable, sporty, classic clothes. Graziella Ronchi places great emphasis on fabric research and over two-thirds of the fabrics are developed in the firm's Milan studios. Great care is given to the choice of fabrics used in each collection to ensure that, when made into garments and styled together, they give a strong visual impact and provide versatility of choice for a wide variety of women.

Never at the cutting edge of designer fashion, Erreuno instead evolves its own particular style each season. A feeling for softness combined with architectural design is reflected in each individual garment and, when incorporated as part of an outfit, adds its own contribution to the finished look. Erreuno's initial success was in the design and manufacture of skirts. The range expanded and developed to include complete womenswear outfits and in 1975 led to a seasonal ready-to-wear collection, shown twice a year in Milan. Since then the company has steadily evolved to incorporate many other goods: leathers, wallets, foulards, key pouches, bags, hats, and gloves. Sold in worldwide boutiques, the products give customers the opportunity to coordinate an Erreuno outfit with top quality accessories, adding greater credence to the company's marketing strategy.

Erreuno collections provide a refreshing presence on the Milan catwalks. Perched midway between the extremes of Dolce & Gabbana's expensive vamps and Giorgio Armani's exquisite classicism, the Erreuno look is one of neutrality. A softly tailored tiny-check suit is teamed with a belted, collarless blouson, an oversize ankle-length, belted mackintosh is teamed with shorts, subtly playing on long and short, or an understated mix of stripes in an outfit comprised of four different types of stripe. Color for Erreuno is soft and discerning; the beiges, browns, creams, lilacs, off-whites, or warm greys are never loud or unflattering.

In the mid-1990s the Ronchis segued into fragrance, with their first scent for women aptly named Erreuno. Although many fashion firms were producing fragrances, Erreuno differed in that the floral scent was not licensed but created in-house under the supervision of Graziella. The Ronchis decided to pursue further fragrances, however, forming Erreuno Parfums and signed a licensing agreement with the Guaber Group in 1995. A second women's fragrance debuted with the firm's ready-to-wear collection in the fall of 1996.

The expression and imagination of Ermanno and Graziella Ronchi, combined with their flair for design, marketing, and manufacturing, have found the perfect complement in their company. Erreuno and its major lines, Erreuno, Donna Erre and Miss Erreuno, play a pivotal role in Italian fashion, whether through strong showings in Milan or the special identity the firm's clothes create for women.

—Kevin Almond

ESCADA

German fashion house

Founded: by Wolfgang and Margarethe Ley (died 1992) in Munich, 1976. Company History: Expanded throughout Germany, then into U.S., 1982; company went public, 1986; began opening retail stores in Europe and U.S., from 1987; granted license for Nino Cerruti womenswear, 1989; Escada leather goods, from 1990, and Apriori bridge line, from 1991; purchased U.S.-based St. John Knits, 1991; formed cosmetics division, Escada Beauté, 1991; Michael Stolzenburg succeeded Ley as designer, 1992–94; St. John Knits sold, 1993; Todd Oldham named creative consultant, 1995; debut of first Escada Couture collection, 1995; Escada Sport formed, 1996; acquired Parfums Gres, 1998; Escada Golf line launched, 1999; company reorganized, 2000; Dinh Vang Co. Ltd. named exclusive distributor for brand in Vietnam, 2001; partnered with SECON Group to buy Louis Féraud, 2001; fragrances include Escada Margaretha Ley introduced in U.S., 1990, in Germany and UK, 1991; Escada Pour Homme, 1993; Chiffon Sorbet (seasonal scent—summer), 1993; En Fleur, 1997; Grain de Folie, 1998; Collection (seasonal—winter) and Sunny Frutti (seasonal—summer), 1998; Casual Friday for men, 1999; Loving Bouquet (summer), 1999; Lily Chic (summer) 2000; Tropical Punch (summer) 2001; Sentiment, 2001; lines include Laurèl, Primera, and Kemper/Cerruti brands. Awards: Dallas Fashion award, Best Designer Sportswear, 1986; Fragrance Foundation award, 1990; Dallas Fashion award, for Fashion Excellence, 1998; Wolfgang Ley awarded the Officer's Cross of the Order of Merit (1st Class), Federal Republic of Germany, 1999. Company Address: Margaretha-Ley-Ring 1 D-85609 Aschheim bei München, Germany. Company Website: www.escada.com.

Escada, spring/summer 2001 collection. © AP/Wide World Photos.

PUBLICATIONS

On ESCADA:

Articles

- Shiro, Anne-Marie, "Black Ties Come Out to Herald a New Boutique (Escada in New York)," in the New York Times, 24 November 1991.
- Agins, Teri, "Despite the Recession, High Fashion Escada Expands World-Wide," in the Wall Street Journal, 15 April 1992.
- "Swede Success," in Woman's Journal (London), May 1992.
- "Margarethe Ley, Cofounder of Escada AG Dead at 56," in WWD, 8 June 1992.
- Shiro, Anne-Marie, "Margaretha Ley, Sportswear Designer and Merchant, Dies," in the New York Times, 9 June 1992.
- Geran, Monica, "Escada (Design of New York Flagship Store)," in Interior Design, July 1992.
- White, Constance C.R., "Escada Evolves," in WWD, 4 November 1992.
- Drier, Melissa, "Escada Sport: Going Casual," in WWD, 2 March 1994.
- Lender, Heidi, "Escada's New Era," in WWD, 21 December 1994.
- Spindler, Amy, "Eyes on Escada," in the New York Times, 10 January 1995.
- Aykroyd, Bettina, "Escada Beauté: Growth Through Acquisition and Innovation," in Soap & Cosmetics Specialties, January 1998.
- Manan, Dazman, "Escada Finds Sweet Success," in the New Straits Times, 6 May 1999.
- Rubenstein, Hal, "The Look of Escada," in In Style, 1 January 2001.
- "Fascinating Escada," in Siagon Times Magazine, 30 September 2001.

Escada, spring/summer 2001 collection. © AP/Wide World Photos.

* * *

The Escada group was founded in 1976 near Munich, Germany, by Wolfgang and Margarethe Ley. The company took its name from an Irish thoroughbred racehorse and both Leys were betting on their enterprise to win. The group designs, produces, and distributes high quality women's fashion, marketed worldwide to leading fashion stores and proprietary boutiques. Apart from Escada by Margarethe Ley, which included apparel, luggage, fragrance, and accessories, the group's other labels have included Cerruti 1881, Crisca, Kemper, Laurel, Apriori, Seasons, Natalie Acatrini, Marie Gray, Schneberger, and St. John (sold in 1993).

Margarethe Ley was the chief designer for the group until her death in 1992. She strongly adhered to the belief that a designer must never rely solely on creative talent to be a success; creativity must be balanced by a strong market appeal. Ley created a highly distinctive identity for Escada—clean, slick, and sophisticated. She also pioneered the development of exciting new fabric combinations and color schemes when so many other designers were solidly into black.

When Ley died, she was succeeded by Michael Stolzenburg who brought a younger, more modern perspective to the company. Taking his influence from daily life, he believed the balance of a collection relied on the mix of tried and true design and fresh new ideas. He was backed by a strong team of designers, chiefly from British and German fashion schools. During this time Escada also spearheaded an unusual fragrance turn, producing the company's first "seasonal" scent. The earliest concoction, Chiffon Sorbet, was a summer fragrance and had been marketed only through the summer months in 1993. The seasonal gambit garnered attention, yet 1994 brought the untimely death of Stolzenburg. The firm turned to Todd Oldham to serve as the company's creative consultant in 1994, the same year Escada Sport was launched. Oldham's creations were enthusiastically received, and in 1995 both Escada Knit and Classic Elements became available in the company's wide spectrum of colors and fabrics.

In the late 1990s Escada launched an eyewear collection with Airess, its first major licensing deal, then followed with a slew of accessories including jewelry, lingerie, shoes, scarves, and ties. New fragrances, both traditional and the experimental seasonal scents, were also introduced including the Escada Sport trio (Sport Spirit, Feeling Free, and Country Weekend, 1997), En Fleur (1997, and later brought out in a compact design in 1999), Casual Friday (1999), Loving Bouquet (a seasonal installment, 1999), and Sentiment (2001).

In the early 2000s Escada had over 375 boutiques worldwide, including new boutiques in Paris and Kuala Lumpur, and was relocating its New York flagship store to larger digs on Fifth Avenue. The luxury retailer was considered the world's largest ready-to-wear producer with some 1,500 different styles available each year, and to increase its marketshare further, Escada entered into a joint venture in the summer of 2001 with the SECON Group, each buying a 45-percent stake in Louis Féraud. The entrepreneurial spirit of founders Wolfgang and Margarethe Ley is alive and well in the enduring success of Escada.

—Kevin Almond; updated by Nelly Rhodes

ESPRIT HOLDINGS, INC.

American fashion design company

Cofounded: as Plain Jane Dress Company by Susie and Doug Tompkins and Jane Tise in San Francisco, 1968; the Tompkins became sole owners, 1975; couple divorced, 1989; shares sold to Susie Tompkins, 1990; company incorporated and name changed to Esprit de Corp., 1970; Company History: Worldwide sales reached more than $1 billion by 1987; Esprit Men designed in Dusseldorf and launched in Europe, 1989; Ecollection, environmentally friendly line using organic fabrics and low impact fibers, launched, 1992; ready-to-wear in Japan, 1993; 240 retail stores worldwide by 1994; Susie Tompkins line discontinued, 1995; creditors take over, Tompkins replaced by Jay Margolis, 1996; joint venture with China Resources Enterprises, 1997; celebrated 30th anniversary and launched DKNY toddler and infant line, 1998; lost DKNY children's license to Oxford Industries, 2000; Margolis departed and Joe Hein took the reins, 2000; debuted Esprit Scents and Senses line of fragrances, 2001; signed licensing deals for sleepwear, outerwear and swimsuits, 2001. Company Address: 900 Minnesota Street, San Francisco, CA 94107, U.S.A. Company Website: www.esprit.com.

PUBLICATIONS

On ESPRIT:

Articles

- Sudjic, Deyan, "Esprit: The Singular Multiple," in Blueprint (London), June 1987.
- Benson, Heidi, "Reinventing Esprit," in the San Francisco Focus, February 1991.
- McGrath, Ellie, "Esprit, the Sequel," in Working Woman, September 1991.
- White, Constance C.R., "Tompkins Gets Her Line," in WWD, 2 March 1992.
- Zinn, Laura, "Will Politically Correct Sell Sweaters?" in Business Week, 16 March 1992.
- Lawson, Skippy, "Esprit and the Rain Forests," in WWD, 29 April 1992.
- White, Constance C.R., "Susie Tompkins: Crossing a New Bridge," WWD, 10 March 1993.
- "Susie's New Spirit," in W, 10 May 1993.
- Stodder, Gayle Sato, "A Perfect Fit," in Entrepreneurial Woman (New York), Summer 1993.
- Ozzard, Janet, "Jay Margolis Heading Esprit, Opting Out of Deal on Tracy," in WWD, 9 January 1996.
- Underwood, Elaine, "Reinventing Esprit's Core," in Brandweek, 13 May 1996.
- White, Constance C.R., "Esprit Shifts Its Focus," in the New York Times, 4 February 1997.
- "Esprit Slates DKNY Line for Infants," in WWD, 11 June 1998.
- Hofman, Mike, "Susie and Doug Tompkins," in Inc., September 1998.
- Lockwood, Lisa, "Margolis to Exit Esprit," in WWD, 9 September 1999.
- Carlsen, Clifford, "Revlon Exec to Lead the Troops at Esprit de Corp.," in the San Francisco Business Times, 3 December 1999.
- "Karan Switches License for DKNY Kids to Oxford," in WWD, 7 March 2000.
- Drier, Melissa, "Lancaster Launches Esprit Scent Sextet," in WWD, 20 October 2000.
- "Esprit Set for Return to UK," in UK Retail Report, December 2000.
- "Hochman's Esprit Deal," in WWD, 16 July 2001.

*

When we started the Plain Jane Dress Company in 1968, we never dreamed it would develop into the worldwide organization now known as Esprit, with operations in [dozens of] countries. "Esprit de Corp.," our official corporate name, was intended to inspire the spirit of the organization and evoke a sense of cooperation, camaraderie, and community.

When we started Esprit we had no previous experience whatsoever in the fashion business...what business skills we might have possessed came from being in the mountain climbing equipment industry for a brief time, where any reference to fashion was an anathema. The idea of fashion, image, and image-making was far from our minds. It relied on the mix of tried and true design and fresh new ideas. He was backed by a strong team of designers, chiefly from British and German fashion schools. During this time Escada also spearheaded an unusual fragrance turn, producing the company's first "seasonal" scent. The earliest concoction, Chiffon Sorbet, was a summer fragrance and had been marketed only through the summer months in 1993. The seasonal gambit garnered attention, yet 1994 brought the untimely death of Stolzenburg. The firm turned to Todd Oldham to serve as the company's creative consultant in 1994, the same year Escada Sport was launched. Oldham's creations were enthusiastically received, and in 1995 both Escada Knit and Classic Elements became available in the company's wide spectrum of colors and fabrics.

In the late 1990s Escada launched an eyewear collection with Airess, its first major licensing deal, then followed with a slew of accessories including jewelry, lingerie, shoes, scarves, and ties. New fragrances, both traditional and the experimental seasonal scents, were also introduced including the Escada Sport trio (Sport Spirit, Feeling Free, and Country Weekend, 1997), En Fleur (1997, and later brought out in a compact design in 1999), Casual Friday (1999), Loving Bouquet (a seasonal installment, 1999), and Sentiment (2001).

In the early 2000s Escada had over 375 boutiques worldwide, including new boutiques in Paris and Kuala Lumpur, and was relocating its New York flagship store to larger digs on Fifth Avenue. The luxury retailer was considered the world's largest ready-to-wear producer with some 1,500 different styles available each year, and to increase its marketshare further, Escada entered into a joint venture in the summer of 2001 with the SECON Group, each buying a 45-percent stake in Louis Féraud. The entrepreneurial spirit of founders Wolfgang and Margarethe Ley is alive and well in the enduring success of Escada.

—Kevin Almond; updated by Nelly Rhodes

ESPRIT HOLDINGS, INC.

American fashion design company

Cofounded: as Plain Jane Dress Company by Susie and Doug Tompkins and Jane Tise in San Francisco, 1968; the Tompkins became sole owners, 1975; couple divorced, 1989; shares sold to Susie Tompkins, 1990; company incorporated and name changed to Esprit de Corp., 1970; Company History: Worldwide sales reached more than $1 billion by 1987; Esprit Men designed in Dusseldorf and launched in Europe, 1989; Ecollection, environmentally friendly line using organic fabrics and low impact fibers, launched, 1992; ready-to-wear in Japan, 1993; 240 retail stores worldwide by 1994; Susie Tompkins line discontinued, 1995; creditors take over, Tompkins replaced by Jay Margolis, 1996; joint venture with China Resources Enterprises, 1997; celebrated 30th anniversary and launched DKNY toddler and infant line, 1998; lost DKNY children's license to Oxford Industries, 2000; Margolis departed and Joe Hein took the reins, 2000; debuted Esprit Scents and Senses line of fragrances, 2001; signed licensing deals for sleepwear, outerwear and swimsuits, 2001. Company Address: 900 Minnesota Street, San Francisco, CA 94107, U.S.A. Company Website: www.esprit.com.

PUBLICATIONS

On ESPRIT:

Articles

- Sudjic, Deyan, "Esprit: The Singular Multiple," in Blueprint (London), June 1987.
- Benson, Heidi, "Reinventing Esprit," in the San Francisco Focus, February 1991.
- McGrath, Ellie, "Esprit, the Sequel," in Working Woman, September 1991.
- White, Constance C.R., "Tompkins Gets Her Line," in WWD, 2 March 1992.
- Zinn, Laura, "Will Politically Correct Sell Sweaters?" in Business Week, 16 March 1992.
- Lawson, Skippy, "Esprit and the Rain Forests," in WWD, 29 April 1992.
- White, Constance C.R., "Susie Tompkins: Crossing a New Bridge," WWD, 10 March 1993.
- "Susie's New Spirit," in W, 10 May 1993.
- Stodder, Gayle Sato, "A Perfect Fit," in Entrepreneurial Woman (New York), Summer 1993.
- Ozzard, Janet, "Jay Margolis Heading Esprit, Opting Out of Deal on Tracy," in WWD, 9 January 1996.
- Underwood, Elaine, "Reinventing Esprit's Core," in Brandweek, 13 May 1996.
- White, Constance C.R., "Esprit Shifts Its Focus," in the New York Times, 4 February 1997.
- "Esprit Slates DKNY Line for Infants," in WWD, 11 June 1998.
- Hofman, Mike, "Susie and Doug Tompkins," in Inc., September 1998.
- Lockwood, Lisa, "Margolis to Exit Esprit," in WWD, 9 September 1999.
- Carlsen, Clifford, "Revlon Exec to Lead the Troops at Esprit de Corp.," in the San Francisco Business Times, 3 December 1999.
- "Karan Switches License for DKNY Kids to Oxford," in WWD, 7 March 2000.
- Drier, Melissa, "Lancaster Launches Esprit Scent Sextet," in WWD, 20 October 2000.
- "Esprit Set for Return to UK," in UK Retail Report, December 2000.
- "Hochman's Esprit Deal," in WWD, 16 July 2001.

*

When we started the Plain Jane Dress Company in 1968, we never dreamed it would develop into the worldwide organization now known as Esprit, with operations in [dozens of] countries. "Esprit de Corp.," our official corporate name, was intended to inspire the spirit of the organization and evoke a sense of cooperation, camaraderie, and community.

When we started Esprit we had no previous experience whatsoever in the fashion business...what business skills we might have possessed came from being in the mountain climbing equipment industry for a brief time, where any reference to fashion was an anathema. The idea of fashion, image, and image-making was far from our minds. It was not, in fact, until 12 years after the founding of the company that any attempt to form an image and create a context for the product was made. In 1980 a radical shift in direction was undertaken. A mixed bag of seven different trade names was consolidated under one name, Esprit, and a new logo along with new labels, tags, packaging, and strong fashion photography was created.

As in all things that start modestly and by amateurs, progress, growth, expansion, and refinements come in steps and stages. Experience is gathered on the job and a process begins and evolves. Likewise, success leads to more opportunities, mistakes, improvements, and avoidance of repeating past errors, or hopefully so!

Today, Esprit designs, manufactures, and distributes product lines four seasons per year, including infant, toddler, kids, womenswear, menswear, footwear, accessories, bath and bed, eyewear, and watches. Because clothing is one of our most basic means of self expression, the fashion industry lends itself toward the communication of values, and offers us the challenge and opportunity to interpret the ongoing changes throughout the world. Our corporate mission statement is: "Be informed. Be involved. Make a difference." It may seem like an idealistic and unusual guiding philosophy for an international fashion company, but Esprit has never been "business as usual."

—Esprit

* * *

The Esprit label graces clothing, shoes, accessories—anything a woman can wear with comfort both at work and at play. As W magazine put it, Esprit is "part of that huge, growing category of well-priced clothes that range from the street-smart style of DKNY and CK Calvin Klein to the career-oriented mood of Ellen Tracy and Anne Klein II." Perhaps the most distinguishing features of Esprit fashions are what the clothing are not—Esprit labels may never appear on the clingy cocktail dress, the stifling "power suit," or the crippling high-heeled pump. Instead, a typical Esprit outfit shows a looser-fitting rayon vest or tunic over wide-legged pants or perhaps a flowing, calf-length skirt made of soft cotton.

According to the journal View on Colour, Esprit "has come to epitomize the Northern California lifestyle, an informative mix of a sunny climate, bold colors, outdoor sports, eternal youth, and social values. Esprit's saucy sportswear...encouraged (if not triggered) the worldwide sportswear boom." This success was the result of the personal vision of Esprit de Corp. cofounder Susie Tompkins, who got her start, along with partner Jane Tise, in her native San Francisco selling homemade frocks under the name Plain Jane in 1968. For its first several years, the line was especially popular with teenagers. Eventually, however, the clothing represented both youthful style and career-minded fashion that might be found in grown-up settings, such as the casual office.

In the early 1980s, a poor business decision over shopping venues nearly caused the downfall of Esprit de Corp. Though it had its best success as a subsection of other retail outlets the company attempted to expand its base into individual outlets. This put Esprit into direct competition with such names as Gap and The Limited. By the time Esprit had extricated itself from this marketing notion, the fashion line had, according to industry expert Allan Millstein, "missed the market for five years. They missed 20 seasons...[meaning] they lost half a generation of kids."

Between 1975 and 1987, Esprit's worldwide sales approached $1 billion. But by 1987, after Tompkins and her husband/business partner Doug Tompkins disagreed on the company's direction, sales dropped. Doug offered to buy the company from under Susie; she considered the proposal until a meeting with another fashion entrepreneur, Bruce Katz of Rockport Shoes, persuaded her to stay with the company she had founded. So the designer elected to buy out Doug instead, enlisting the financial support of Katz and several others. The estranged Doug and Susie met to work out the future of Esprit. They came to the decision that Susie would buy back the company, and Doug would bow out to the tune of $125 million.

Under Tompkins' direction, the company initiated the Ecollection line of clothing in the spring of 1992—"a big step, even for trendsetting Esprit," according to View on Colour. The Ecollection fashions were notable for being produced in the most environmentally friendly way possible. Ecollection wasn't the only Esprit subsection, however, since the 1970s the company has initiated several product lines. Besides the regular Esprit-branded products, there are Esprit Footwear and Accessories, Esprit Kids, and the Susie Tompkins signature line which was considered more sophisticated and aimed at working women older than 25 (line discontinued in 1995).

In the field of marketing, Esprit worked hard to keep its brand name in chain department stores like T.J. Maxx and in various company-owned venues. Franchises ranged in location from Hawaii to Puerto Rico, and Esprit maintained outlet stores throughout the United States. In March of 1993 Tompkins outlined Esprit's future for Women's Wear Daily, stating that the firm wanted to "Develop business with existing customers as well as with existing stores...Esprit, like the entire junior market, is in the process of reevaluating the customer today, and I'm continuing to pursue this marketplace with consideration of the roots and culture of this company."

Tompkins also stressed Esprit wasn't "trendy," as she stated in a San Francisco Focus article. "We don't have to be doing what everybody else is doing. We just have to do our style, which is a kind of eclecticism and an integrity of design. Mixing old things with new things; having a really nice way of presenting color." Unfortunately for Tompkins and Esprit, however, was the company's slide into trouble in the mid- and late 1990s. Tompkins left the company after creditors took control, and Jay Margolis, formerly of Tommy Hilfiger, was brought in to save the ailing retailer in 1996.

Margolis succeeded in revitalizing Esprit's image and bringing the firm back to profitability through a slew of shrewd marketing deals. Declining to renew his contract, he left in late 1999 was replaced by Joe Heid, a former Revlon executive. Heid focused less on licenses and more on Esprit's own brands, telling Clifford Carlsen of the San Francisco Business Times (3 December 1999), "We need to grow Esprit, and the avenues are limitless." Heid reintroduced the company in the UK by opening two large stores in 2000, even though only two years earlier nine Esprit outlets had been shuttered. Additionally, Heid initiated a $10-million advertising campaign in home base San Francisco, signed licensing deals for sleepwear, outerwear, and swimsuits for women and girls, and launched a line of bath and body products, called Esprit Scents and Senses, in its two biggest markets, Germany and Hong Kong.

—Susan Salter; updated by Owen James

ESTEREL, Jacques

French designer

Born: Charles Martin, 1918. Education: Studied engineering. Career: Writer and composer; couture house, Creations Jacques Esterel established, 1953, filed suit against Yves Saint Laurent, 1979; suit resolved in his favor, 1985. Died: 1974.

PUBLICATIONS

On ESTEREL:

Articles

"L'univers de Jacques Esterel," in Jardin des Arts (Paris) May/June 1973.

"YSL is Fined for Being a Copycat," in the Chicago Tribune, 17 July 1985.

* * *

Couturier Jacques Esterel liked to refer to himself as a "Parisian craftsman of dresses and songs." And in fact he was an entertainer as well as a designer, writing several plays and songs for the guitar in addition to running his many boutiques in France and throughout Europe. He brought his theatrical side into his clothing design, creating amusing novelties and employing outrageous styles and props, so much so that many of his admirers and critics considered him more of a showman than a serious couturier.

Jacques Esterel, 1966 collection: "Playtime 1," a beachshift ensemble with "Happy Glasses." © AP/Wide World Photos.

Esterel, whose real name was Charles Martin, was the son of a French industrialist and was originally educated as an engineer. He established his couture house, Jacques Esterel, in 1953. The first years were especially successful as Esterel contributed to a playful fashion spirit, illustrated by the "Vichy" bridal gown which he designed for French actress Brigitte Bardot. Esterel built up an international reputation for his couture house, traveling the world to promote his collections, even appearing behind the Iron Curtain when the Soviet Union was off-limits to Westerners. But Esterel always remained true to his love of the stage and his background as an engineer, claiming that the 72 patents he held on machine tools allowed him to support his fashion design career.

There was something of the carnival performer in Esterel's attitude toward fashion. His designs were often extremely fanciful—and often ridiculed by the fashion press. It was as if couture for Esterel was more about exploring his own sense of whimsical creativity rather than about designing clothes. In 1963 his show included tweed hats with small black veils and umbrellas with built-in lights. Prior to the 1964 show he declared that several of his top models would appear with shaved heads "to give a new importance to a woman's face." His 1965 collection was called "confused and complicated," and included striped bathing suits with long skintight legs described as looking like "something out of a Mack Sennett movie."

Esterel was not simply a jester at the court of fashion, however, he was often in the forefront of fashion trends in the 1960s and 1970s, taking au courant looks from stylish young "Mods and Rockers" on the streets and translating them into haute couture. His 1965 designs for men included a plaid suit with a kilt and a salmon-colored Nehru jacket in corduroy, worn over high yoked pants with zippers on front and back. For women he created dramatic evening wear, including an ensemble of overblouse, floor-length skirt and great hooded evening cape of matching velour.

Esterel's lively intelligence saw no creative boundaries, whether he was designing a garment, writing a song, making his own store fixtures, or sharing his vision with other designers. In the early 1970s Esterel created his most well-known and talked-about collection, the "unisex" line, presenting clothes designed for both men and women. Ever the iconoclast, his first foray into the U.S. found him opening a couture shop in the New York suburbs, far from the fashion industry center in New York City. And the high-spirited, uninhibited house of Esterel attracted and fostered young talents, including future stars Anne Marie Beretta and Jean-Paul Gaultier.

Esterel's unfortunate and sudden death in 1974 did not signal the end of the house of Esterel. His widow and daughter strove to continue his spirit of fashion adventure, overseeing Creations Jacques Esterel. Throughout the 1980s the company was involved in several highly-publicized lawsuits in regard to trademark infringement against Yves Saint Laurent (for a design Esterel called the Petit Marquis and YSL called the Toreador) and also over the disputed purchase of the venerable house of Madame Alix Grés. The trademark suit, originally dismissed from criminal court, was refiled in civil court and resolved in favor of the Esterels in 1985. Yves Saint Laurent, roundly considered the most respected house in Paris haute couture, was fined $11,000 and required to pay a $1,100 fine for every suit made from the plagiarized Petit Marquis design. Because of the messy legal wranglings, Creations Jacques Esterel was dropped from the Fashion Creators Union and banned from showing collections as a grand couturier in Paris for several years.

Jacques Esterel, 1966 collections: "Mironton" (left), a Scottish-style plaid kilt ensemble, and "False Brother" (right), a vinyl pantsuit with zipped jacket ensemble. © AP/Wide World Photos.

—Kathleen Paton; updated by Nelly Rhodes

ESTÉVEZ, Luis

Cuban/American designer

Born: Luis Estévez de Galvez in Havana, Cuba, 5 December 1930. Education: Studied architecture, University of Havana, and fashion design, Traphagen School, New York. Career: Window display designer, Lord & Taylor; design assistant, House of Patou, Paris,

Jacques Esterel, 1966 collections: "Mironton" (left), a Scottish-style plaid kilt ensemble, and "False Brother" (right), a vinyl pantsuit with zipped jacket ensemble. © AP/Wide World Photos.

in favor of the Esterels in 1985. Yves Saint Laurent, roundly considered the most respected house in Paris haute couture, was fined $11,000 and required to pay a $1,100 fine for every suit made from the plagiarized Petit Marquis design. Because of the messy legal wranglings, Creations Jacques Esterel was dropped from the Fashion Creators Union and banned from showing collections as a grand couturier in Paris for several years.

—Kathleen Paton; updated by Nelly Rhodes

ESTÉVEZ, Luis

Cuban/American designer

Born: Luis Estévez de Galvez in Havana, Cuba, 5 December 1930. Education: Studied architecture, University of Havana, and fashion design, Traphagen School, New York. Career: Window display designer, Lord & Taylor; design assistant, House of Patou, Paris, 1953–55; began designing menswear, 1967; founder/designer, Grenelle, 1955–68; designer, Radley Furs, 1959–68; swimwear designer, Estévez for Sea Darlings and Resort Sports, 1960s–1977; menswear designer, St. Joseph Knitting Mills, France, 1967–73, moved to California, 1968; designer, Somper Furs, 1968–72; menswear designer, JayMar Ruby, 1972–73; designer, Universal Studios, 1969–1970s; designer, Eva Gabor collections, 1972–74, and Luis Estévez International line for Gabor, 1974–77; designer, Estévez for Neal and other freelance work; founder/designer, Estévez Enterprises, 1977–present; operated Estévez boutique on Melrose Avenue in Los Angeles, 1986–92; relocated to Florida, 1992–95; Estévez design studio/boutique, Santa Barbara, 1996–97; LEG Bridge line, from 1997. Exhibitions: Showcased collection during theater productions of Hello Dolly, 1964 and Hair, Los Angeles, 1969; gowns displayed in the Smithsonian Institute, Washington, D.C., and Gerald R. Ford Museum in Grand Rapids, Michigan. Awards: Coty American Fashion Critics award, 1956; Burdines Sunshine award (FL), 1957; Chicago Gold Coast award; Bambergers Golden Scissors award, 1962; Tommy award, 1988; Hispanic Designers, Inc. lifetime achievement award, 1990.

PUBLICATIONS

On ESTÉVEZ:

Books

Morris, Bernadine, and Barbara Walz, The Fashion Makers, New York, 1978.

Milbank, Caroline Rennolds, New York Fashion: The Evolution of American Style, New York, 1989.

Articles

“A Success Story in Necklines: Luis Estévez is a One-Year Wonder,” in Life, 2 April 1956.

“A Cuban Way of Styles,” in Life, 5 May 1958.

“Return of the Leg,” in Newsweek, 21 June 1965.

Ginsberg, Steve, “Another Comeback for Luis Estévez,” in WWD, 17 October 1989.

Romano-Benner, Norma, “Shaping the 1990s,” in America, September/October 1990.

Vannett, Kasey, “He Likes Black Velvet,” in Hispanic, January/February 1991.

Farr, Louise, “LEG Man,” in WWD, 8 July 1997.

*

I'm most grateful to God for the gift of an energetic talent and my parents for exposing me to significant style—living life to the fullest and showing me the living discipline that helped me do all I've done.

—Luis Estévez

* * *

Throughout his career, Luis Estévez has produced elegant and restrained eveningwear for prestigious Californian clients, including Merle Oberon and Betty Ford. His style has been well suited to the Californian lifestyle, with its emphasis on wealth, luxury, and success.

Born to a privileged background in Cuba in 1930, Estévez studied architecture in Havana but switched to fashion after spending a summer job as a window dresser for Lord & Taylor department store in New York. After study at the Traphagen School of Fashion, New York, he left for Paris and found work at the house of Jean Patou for two years. This experience in Parisian couture was to influence his creative approach to design for the rest of his life.

By 1955, Estévez was designing under his own name, for a company called Grenelle-Estévez. Specializing in evening and cocktailwear, with occasional forays into daywear, Estévez was an immediate success. Sales reached $3 million in his first year of business alone, and Life magazine dubbed him “The One-Year Wonder.” In 1956, he was the youngest designer honored with the Coty American Fashion Critics award. Estévez's clothes had an exclusive, individual look but were made from reasonably priced fabrics, selling well in the higher brackets of the mass market. He attributed much of his inspiration to his wife, who liked to dress in sexy but tasteful clothes with sharp and uncluttered silhouettes.

In the 1950s and 1960s Estévez clothes were distinguished by dramatic, theatrical showings, usually along a set theme. The Night and Day collection and gala, at the Waldorf Astoria, was dedicated to Cole Porter; the Broadway cast of Hello Dolly was featured prominently in his 1964 collection; and Estévez took over the Great Hall of the Met for his 1965 Fly Me to the Moon collection. His clothing was further distinguished by individual craftsmanship as well: cutout neck designs, unusual angles like Os or Vs or in the shape of daisy petals, the edges of the fabric appearing jagged.

Frequent use was made of stark black and white and of full, rustling skirts, or narrow lines with floating back panels. He also introduced less fitting clothes in the form of barrel-shaped ottoman coats and dresses in two versions; one with a narrow skirt, the other with a puffball skirt. Evening jumpsuits were late 1960s innovations, as was a foray into menswear which featured horizontally tucked evening shirts. He was fond of designing around a strong theme, as in his ethnic-African inspired collection of 1959, featuring oversize tiger and zebra stripe prints. Estévez was also known for his imaginative use of accessories and designed swimwear and furs on a freelance basis for other companies.

After moving to California in 1968, Estévez became well established in West Coast fashion and society. He developed a clientèle of well-known women, including Lana Turner, Rosalind Russell, and Nancy Reagan. Actress Eva Gabor commissioned his talents as a glamorous eveningwear designer for her own label Eva Gabor Collections. This venture was so successful that in 1974 he signed a contract with her parent firm to design a line called Luis Estévez International. In 1977 he formed his own company to concentrate on the couture market. He served this loyal clients at his successful Melrose Avenue boutique in Los Angeles and later his design studio/boutique in Montecito. Although less celebrated than in the 1950s and 1960s, his reliability and expertise were well respected by clients, who eagerly poured themselves into his sensual black velvet dresses and embroidered sheaths. Estévez retired from fashion design in 1997, but he remains active in community affairs and is writing a book about his life. Estévez has received many awards and tributes for contributions to fashion as well as his civic activities.

Throughout his career, Luis Estévez's designs celebrated the glamor he cultivated in his personal life. The 1950s remain his favorite period of fashion because women looked feminine and life was beautiful. He believed, and still does, that clothing should flatter the person wearing it—otherwise fashion is more like a costume and not worth designing.

In February 2001, in commenting on his life in fashion design, Estévez said: "As I review my career, the first thing that comes to mind are my many fashion firsts and my talent's built-in drive and dedication to doing things as they had never been done before—all without fear of failure." Indeed, Estévez did go where designers had never gone before—heralding the future of fashion shows with bold, dramatic extravaganzas, the likes of which are rarely seen today. Though new, hip designers like Viktor & Rolf could be considered heirs to Estévez's lavish style, his dedication and singular designs remain unique.

—Kevin Almond; updated by Janette Goff Dixon and Sydonie Benét

ETTEDGUI, Joseph

British retailer and fashion entrepreneur

Born: in Casablanca, 1938; immigrated to England, 1965. Family: Married twice; two children. Career: Hairdresser, Joseph Salon 33, London, 1969–72; proprietor, Coco boutique, 1974; established chain of shops including Joseph, from 1977, Joseph Tricot and Joseph pour la Maison, from 1985; Joseph pour la Ville, from 1986; and Joseph Bis; Joseph Parfum de Jour introduced, 1985; opened Joe's Café restaurant, 1985; launched Joseph Denim; opened Paris boutique, 1993; celebrated 25th anniversary in retailing, 1996; redesigned all stores, 1997; sold majority interest in Joseph to Albert Frere and LVMH, 1999; opened new Paris store, 2001. Awards: Woman magazine award, London, 1985; Knitwear Designer of the Year award, 1990, 1992; Contemporary Collection award, Rover British Fashion Awards, 2000. Address: 88 Peterborough Road, London SW6 3HH, England. Website: www.Joseph.co.uk.

Joseph Ettedgui, fall 1998 collection. © Fashion Syndicate Press.

PUBLICATIONS

On ETTEDGUI:

Books

- Roberts, Michael, Joseph Tricot, London, 1986.
 Coleridge, Nicholas, The Fashion Conspiracy, London, 1988.
 Manser, José, Eva Jircina, and Joseph Ettedgui, The Joseph Shop: London, 1983–1989, New York & London, 1991.
 Hoppen, Kelly, with foreword by Joseph Ettedgui, In Touch: Texture in Design, San Diego, 2000.

Articles

- Cleave, Maureen, "Makers of Modern Fashion: Joseph," in the Observer Magazine (London), 5 October 1980.
 Miller, Sarah, "Joseph: Where Fashion Meets Design," in Blueprint (London), June 1984.
 White, Lesley, "Saint Joseph," in The Face (London), June 1984.
 Brampton, Sally, "Still Crazy," in the Observer, 24 March 1985.
 Miller, Sarah, "Stainless Reputation," in Elle (London), 29 September 1985.
 Appleyard, Bryan, "Coordinated Style of a Clone Prince," in the Times (London), 4 June 1986.
 Verdier, Rosy, "Joseph: Un homme de mode," in L'Officiel (Paris), August 1986.
 Jaffe, Michele, "Ragtrade to Riches: My First Million: Joseph," in the Observer Magazine, 25 October 1987.
 "Joe's Public," in Fashion Weekly (London), 7 January 1988.
 De Gramont, Laurie, "Joseph le lutin," in Vogue (Paris), September 1988.
 Filmer, Denny, "The Story of Joseph," in Cosmopolitan (London), December 1988.
 Gandee, Charles, "The Merchant of Style," in House & Garden (New York), April 1989.
 Brampton, Sally, "Joe Cool," in Elle (London), October 1989.
 Fallon, James, "Driving Fashion His Own Way (Joseph Ettedgui)," in WWD, 29 January 1997.
 McColl, Pat, "Tracing Avenue Montaigne's Slow Evolution to a Must Mecca for the Elite," in the International Herald Tribune, 15 March 1997.
 Fallon, James, "Ettedgui's New Store...," in DNR, 31 March 1997.
 ———, "Heere's Joseph," in DNR, 8 December 1997.
 "Transforming Tradition," in WWD, 23 February 1999.
 Fallon, James, and Katherine Weisman, "LVMH's Joseph Connection," in WWD, 23 September 1999.
 Menkes, Suzy, "Offstage Action Steals the Show," in the International Herald Tribune, 28 September 1999.
 "Designer Wins Fashion Accolade," available online at BBC News, www.bbc.co.uk, 19 February 2000.

In February 2001, in commenting on his life in fashion design, Estévez said: "As I review my career, the first thing that comes to mind are my many fashion firsts and my talent's built-in drive and dedication to doing things as they had never been done before—all without fear of failure." Indeed, Estévez did go where designers had never gone before—heralding the future of fashion shows with bold, dramatic extravaganzas, the likes of which are rarely seen today. Though new, hip designers like Viktor & Rolf could be considered heirs to Estévez's lavish style, his dedication and singular designs remain unique.

—Kevin Almond; updated by Janette Goff Dixon and Sydonie Benét

ETTEDGUI, Joseph

British retailer and fashion entrepreneur

Born: in Casablanca, 1938; immigrated to England, 1965. Family: Married twice; two children. Career: Hairdresser, Joseph Salon 33, London, 1969–72; proprietor, Coco boutique, 1974; established chain of shops including Joseph, from 1977, Joseph Tricot and Joseph pour la Maison, from 1985; Joseph pour la Ville, from 1986; and Joseph Bis; Joseph Parfum de Jour introduced, 1985; opened Joe's Café restaurant, 1985; launched Joseph Denim; opened Paris boutique, 1993; celebrated 25th anniversary in retailing, 1996; redesigned all stores, 1997; sold majority interest in Joseph to Albert Frere and LVMH, 1999; opened new Paris store, 2001. Awards: Woman magazine award, London, 1985; Knitwear Designer of the Year award, 1990, 1992; Contemporary Collection award, Rover British Fashion Awards, 2000. Address: 88 Peterborough Road, London SW6 3HH, England. Website: www.Joseph.co.uk.

Joseph Ettedgui, fall 1998 collection. © Fashion Syndicate Press.

PUBLICATIONS

On ETTEDGUI:

Books

- Roberts, Michael, Joseph Tricot, London, 1986.
 Coleridge, Nicholas, The Fashion Conspiracy, London, 1988.
 Manser, José, Eva Jiricna, and Joseph Ettedgui, The Joseph Shop: London, 1983–1989, New York & London, 1991.
 Hoppen, Kelly, with foreword by Joseph Ettedgui, In Touch: Texture in Design, San Diego, 2000.

Articles

- Cleave, Maureen, "Makers of Modern Fashion: Joseph," in the Observer Magazine (London), 5 October 1980.
 Miller, Sarah, "Joseph: Where Fashion Meets Design," in Blueprint (London), June 1984.
 White, Lesley, "Saint Joseph," in The Face (London), June 1984.
 Brampton, Sally, "Still Crazy," in the Observer, 24 March 1985.
 Miller, Sarah, "Stainless Reputation," in Elle (London), 29 September 1985.
 Appleyard, Bryan, "Coordinated Style of a Clone Prince," in the Times (London), 4 June 1986.
 Verdier, Rosy, "Joseph: Un homme de mode," in L'Officiel (Paris), August 1986.
 Jaffe, Michele, "Ragtrade to Riches: My First Million: Joseph," in the Observer Magazine, 25 October 1987.
 "Joe's Public," in Fashion Weekly (London), 7 January 1988.
 De Gramont, Laurie, "Joseph le lutin," in Vogue (Paris), September 1988.
 Filmer, Denny, "The Story of Joseph," in Cosmopolitan (London), December 1988.
 Gandee, Charles, "The Merchant of Style," in House & Garden (New York), April 1989.
 Brampton, Sally, "Joe Cool," in Elle (London), October 1989.
 Fallon, James, "Driving Fashion His Own Way (Joseph Ettedgui)," in WWD, 29 January 1997.
 McColl, Pat, "Tracing Avenue Montaigne's Slow Evolution to a Must Mecca for the Elite," in the International Herald Tribune, 15 March 1997.
 Fallon, James, "Ettedgui's New Store...," in DNR, 31 March 1997.
 ———, "Heere's Joseph," in DNR, 8 December 1997.
 "Transforming Tradition," in WWD, 23 February 1999.
 Fallon, James, and Katherine Weisman, "LVMH's Joseph Connection," in WWD, 23 September 1999.
 Menkes, Suzy, "Offstage Action Steals the Show," in the International Herald Tribune, 28 September 1999.
 "Designer Wins Fashion Accolade," available online at BBC News, www.bbc.co.uk, 19 February 2000.

Trocme, Suzanne, "Joseph's Technicolor Dream Shop," in Interior Design, April 2001.

* * *

A love of precision and a good eye for detail underpin Joseph Ettedgui's skills as an entrepreneur, enabling him to build up a group of shops which bring together a selection of the best and most innovative contemporary designer fashions alongside his own strong self-named lines, all aimed at a modern and confident clientèle.

The endless black and chrome of his London stores defined the stark monochromatic obsession of the 1980s and spawned endless concrete-floored imitators, eager to espouse the same sense of sophisticated style but unable to match his unfaltering mix of carefully chosen labels. Wise enough not to buy entire collections, he selected only the most streamlined and well designed pieces. His constant search for perfection, combined with convincingly structured in-store and window displays, brought many designers to the fore. So influential is Ettedgui's choice of names that his favor can raise a designer's status overnight. Having overseen the careers of many, including Kenzo, Katharine Hamnett, Franco Moschino, John Galliano, and Bodymap, he continues to purvey a mixture of new and established names.

The omnipresent black Ettedgui favored during the 1980s spread throughout the fashion world, as endless stretch-fit Azzedine Alaïa dresses hung from his rails, mingling with the bold suiting that ruled the decade. His power as a buyer is huge, backing avant-garde designers and hand-picking new talents who often found such support or retail space difficult to secure. The slick image of the Joseph emporia was underlined by the stark black and white minimalism of the shops; yet in 1997 the designer completely rehauled his stores to make them less sterile, more comfortable, and even fun. Fun? As Ettedgui explained to Women's Wear Daily (29 January 1997), "Stores provide too much stability today. You have to give customers the element of surprise, because shops should be like a stage that changes every three months."

Ettedgui's own Joseph lines, which slowly gained in popularity, have always complemented the other labels he sells. They provide classic garments to be mixed with other designer wear, or constitute carefully designed and coordinated outfits themselves. Joseph pour la Ville provides smart suiting and witty, easy to wear casuals. Alongside the bright, bold, striped trouser suits with shiny gilt buttons he produced in 1989 were more relaxed and feminine sheer georgette skirts and multicolored waistcoats, the subtle shades of which added a twist to the more pervasive dark hues. His ranges always contain clothes for every occasion, directed at the sophisticated metropolitan. The silhouette is usually well defined, to enhance the wearer with its simple chic, like the matte violet and beige column dresses side split to the waist for the evening in 1991, with three buttons at the top of each slash adding definition to the plain line.

Running alongside these classic garments is the Joseph Tricot collection, filled with thick rib woolens to layer with softer leggings and strikingly patterned cardigans and tube skirts, as well as subtletoned wrap tops and fine jersey t-shirts. In 1987 chunky cream cardigans with little gold buttons were given bold black decoration, one of his perennial basic designs. These complemented more fashion-led shapes and yarns, like the claret chenille belted jackets of 1992 and the huge rose off-the-shoulder jumper with wide foldover collar shown in 1991.

In 1996 and 1997 new Joseph stores opened in New York (bringing the total to three) along with a second London store. The new London shop was Ettedgui's first freestanding menswear shop; additional men's-only stores were slated to follow in major U.S. cities like Boston, Chicago, and Miami. Then in early 1999 Ettedgui bought a controlling interest in Connolly Luxury Goods, which specialized in custom leather. His wife, Isabella, was the firm's designer. Ettedgui commented on the Connolly acquisition to Women's Wear Daily (23 February 1999), stating, "I've been retailing for a long time, and the Connolly type of luxury is what interests me now.... Fashion today is about beautiful things, very understated."

In late 1999 Ettedgui and his brothers Franklin and Maurice surprised many by selling a 54-percent stake in the Joseph brand to Belgian financier Albert Frere, and a minority interest to luxury giant LVMH. A few months later, Cherie Blair, wife of British Prime Minister Tony Blair, presented Ettedgui with the Contemporary Collection award. The recognition and accolades were long overdue for the designer, who had been shaping fashion for nearly three decades.

Joseph Ettedgui, designer, retailer, and entrepreneur, is widely recognized in the fashion world for his profound contributions not only to apparel, but to the atmosphere in which apparel is bought and sold. His ability to act as a catalyst, bringing together the work of innovative designers as well as classic ensembles—many from his own designs—has provided a unique environment for both men and women seeking clothing and accessories for not only occasions for but for an entire lifestyle.

—Rebecca Arnold; updated by Brian Louwers and Nelly Rhodes

F

FABIANI, Alberto

Italian designer

Born: Tivoli, Italy, circa 1910. Family: Two marriages; second to Duchessa Simonetta Colonna di Cesaro, 1952. Career: Apprenticed to Paris tailor, circa 1930s; took over his parents' Italian couture house and thrived in the 1940s and 1950s; formed Simonetta et Fabiani, 1962; returned to solo designing, 1960s; retired, 1974.

PUBLICATIONS

On FABIANI:

Books

- Fairchild's Dictionary of Fashion*, New York, 1988.
20th Century Fashion: The Complete Sourcebook, London, 1993.
Stegemeyer, Anne, Who's Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.
Callan, Georgina O'Hara, The Thames and Hudson Dictionary of Fashion and Fashion Designers, New York, 1998.

Articles

- Robertson, Nan, "Happily Wed Pair Compete for Rome's Fashion Trade," in the New York Times, 19 October 1955.
Emerson, Gloria, "Husband-and-Wife Team," in the New York Times, 21 July 1961.
Morris, Bernadine, "Despite Dire Predictions, the Couture Carries On," in the New York Times, 19 July 1973.

* * *

Alberto Fabiani, born around 1910 in Tivoli, Italy, was the son of couturiers. His parents had launched a fashion house in Rome in 1909. Fabiani was further exposed to fashion through an apprenticeship with an Italian tailor, a family friend, in Paris, where he worked from age 18 to 21. He returned to Italy and, five years later, took over his parents' business, renaming it under his own label. His quickly became one of the top couture houses in Italy.

Fabiani is best known for his uncluttered tailoring and conservative designs, whether creating one of his famed chemises, a sheath dress, poncho coat, long tunic top, or even a fur. Over the years, he became known as "the surgeon of suits and coats," a term coined by Nan Robertson in the New York Times in 1955. Several years later, in July 1961, Gloria Emerson of the New York Times pointed out that fashion editors had called Fabiani's designs "a quiet marvel of architecture."

Fabiani was among the designers who led something of an Italian renaissance during the 1950s. Italian designers, including his parents, had previously looked to Paris for inspiration, but during the 1950s, they began to trust their own Italian sensibility. Fabiani was emblematic of this movement and became one of the best-known Italian designer labels, recognized not only in Italy but increasingly throughout Europe and the United States.

In North America, however, Fabiani was outshone, at least in terms of publicity, by his second wife, the Duchessa Simonetta Colonna di Cesaro, later Simonetta Visconti, known professionally as Simonetta. They met at a fashion show in 1949, after both were well established as designers—Simonetta had risen to the top tier of Italian designers during the 1940s—and were married in 1952. The two had a child together, as well as one each from previous marriages.

Alberto Fabiani, spring/summer 1963 collection: two-piece evening dress with the top embroidered in rhinestones and gold, and silver-colored fringe. © AP/Wide World Photos.

Fabiani and Simonetta were often the subject of fashion industry gossip over what they discussed at home, since they were two of the top fashion houses in Italy and fierce competitors. They always maintained that they did not discuss the particulars of their lines with each other but simply reviewed trends together before beginning each collection, taking a look at each other's work for the first time during runway show dress rehearsals each season.

Fabiani became known in the U.S. and around the world for his clean lines, his quality tailoring, and his conservative yet imaginative women's clothes, whereas Simonetta's reputation was established through the creation of highly feminine sportswear and cocktail dresses intended for a young female customer. The two had contrasting personalities as well: Fabiani was reserved while Simonetta was very outgoing.

Although they adamantly denied they would ever combine their two houses, the couple did try to do so briefly in 1962, forming Simonetta et Fabiani in Paris. The effort was a success at first but failed quickly, and Fabiani returned to Italy without Simonetta. (Two years later, she retired from designing and established a leper colony in India.) He returned to designing alone, regaining his status as one of the leading couturiers in his home country. He created not only apparel, specializing in suits and dresses, but accessories as well.

Fabiani's designs were timeless. He was in touch with the current trends each season, but his pieces were classics that always came back into fashion. And despite his conservatism, he was also an innovator, creating new trends—especially during the 1950s—such as the cocoon silhouette (fitted in front, loose in back) and pleated column dresses. His tent coats, introduced in 1960, made a particular splash. Many of these innovations were disliked at first but were eventually embraced by consumers, retail buyers, and critics alike. In fact, Fabiani's designs were some of the couture pieces most emulated by American retailers in the 1950s and 1960s. Fabiani retired in 1974.

—Karen Raugust

FABRICE

American fashion designer

Born: Fabrice Simon in Port au Prince, Haiti, 29 January 1951; moved to the U.S., 1964. Education: Studied textile design and fashion illustration, Fashion Institute of Technology, New York, 1969–70. Career: Freelance textile designer, 1971–76; formed own company producing hand-painted and beaded gowns, 1976; menswear line introduced, 1985; abandoned designing for painting, 1990s; abstract paintings exhibited in New York and Palm Beach, 1997. Awards: Coty American Fashion Critics award, 1981. Died: 29 July 1998, in New York.

PUBLICATIONS

On FABRICE:

Books

Milbank, Caroline Rennolds, New York Fashion: The Evolution of American Style, New York, 1989.

Articles

- Wihlborg, Lee Wohlfers, "Style," in People (New York), 25 April 1983.
- Milbank, Caroline Rennolds, "Fabrice," in Interview (New York), December 1986.
- "Famed Fashion Designer Fabrice, 47, Succumbs in New York," in Jet, 24 August 1998.
- "Fashion Designer Fabrice Simon Dies at the Age of 47," in People Weekly, 24 August 1998.

* * *

Since founding his company in 1976, Haitian-born Fabrice was known primarily for eveningwear targeted to the high end of the custom and ready-to-wear markets. He trained as a textile designer. When he turned from textile to fashion design in 1975, not surprisingly he began to work in hand-painted fabrics. His first significant sale was a small number of gowns purchased by the New York specialty shop Henri Bendel. Bendel's was instrumental in establishing the career of many young designers. This was the heyday of Bendel's "open house," where the store's buyers set aside a weekly time to view, sometimes to purchase, work from unknown artists. Typically, these unknowns lacked major financial backing and production resources. More than a few of them were also producing hand-painted silks in limited quantity. It was a labor intensive but otherwise relatively inexpensive way to enter the world of fashion.

Fabrice sought to distinguish his product from others and to expand his market. He found the way when he discovered a selection of beaded motifs originating in Haiti. Fabrice commissioned Haitian beaders and embroiderers to execute his designs, beginning in 1979. Although he still worked with hand-painted fabrics throughout his short career, he is best remembered for his distinctive beaded gowns.

Fabrice's work reflected a contemporary approach to the ancient craft of beading. His gowns were imbued with a modern sensibility, designed from within a frame of reference suggesting a response and asking for a second look. His beaded squiggles invite comparison with the paintings of Joan Miró and with the graffiti found on public buildings. On a dark ground, his abstract designs seem suspended in space, like the lights of a far off bridge at night. More easily read patterns also startle and amuse when worked in bugle beads. Imagine, for example, a beaded gown patterned like an argyle sock, or one inspired by a woven ikat. Fabrice's references included cobwebs and comic strips; he acknowledged trendy street styles without ignoring past traditions.

In his formal menswear collections, Fabrice offered alternatives to the traditional black tie ensemble. He showed silk t-shirts for evening, pairing them with houndstooth or floral damask dinner jackets, or with unstructured smoking jackets for an even more relaxed look. Acknowledging the street influence on his work, Fabrice introduced a bridge collection in 1992 called Graffiti. His nylon, rayon, and Lycra Spandex dresses in stinging colors with contrasting insets or appliqués were sleek and colorful wearable graphics. In his ready-to-wear and in his custom clothes, Fabrice's wit always complemented his artistry.

The extent of Fabrice's fashion reign was brief; he made a major splash and then gave up dressmaking for painting. Though his boldly colorful abstracts received some critical praise, he will be remembered for the flashy beaded gowns wore by a bevy of celebrities,

Fabiani and Simonetta were often the subject of fashion industry gossip over what they discussed at home, since they were two of the top fashion houses in Italy and fierce competitors. They always maintained that they did not discuss the particulars of their lines with each other but simply reviewed trends together before beginning each collection, taking a look at each other's work for the first time during runway show dress rehearsals each season.

Fabiani became known in the U.S. and around the world for his clean lines, his quality tailoring, and his conservative yet imaginative women's clothes, whereas Simonetta's reputation was established through the creation of highly feminine sportswear and cocktail dresses intended for a young female customer. The two had contrasting personalities as well: Fabiani was reserved while Simonetta was very outgoing.

Although they adamantly denied they would ever combine their two houses, the couple did try to do so briefly in 1962, forming Simonetta et Fabiani in Paris. The effort was a success at first but failed quickly, and Fabiani returned to Italy without Simonetta. (Two years later, she retired from designing and established a leper colony in India.) He returned to designing alone, regaining his status as one of the leading couturiers in his home country. He created not only apparel, specializing in suits and dresses, but accessories as well.

Fabiani's designs were timeless. He was in touch with the current trends each season, but his pieces were classics that always came back into fashion. And despite his conservatism, he was also an innovator, creating new trends—especially during the 1950s—such as the cocoon silhouette (fitted in front, loose in back) and pleated column dresses. His tent coats, introduced in 1960, made a particular splash. Many of these innovations were disliked at first but were eventually embraced by consumers, retail buyers, and critics alike. In fact, Fabiani's designs were some of the couture pieces most emulated by American retailers in the 1950s and 1960s. Fabiani retired in 1974.

—Karen Raugust

FABRICE

American fashion designer

Born: Fabrice Simon in Port au Prince, Haiti, 29 January 1951; moved to the U.S., 1964. Education: Studied textile design and fashion illustration, Fashion Institute of Technology, New York, 1969–70. Career: Freelance textile designer, 1971–76; formed own company producing hand-painted and beaded gowns, 1976; menswear line introduced, 1985; abandoned designing for painting, 1990s; abstract paintings exhibited in New York and Palm Beach, 1997. Awards: Coty American Fashion Critics award, 1981. Died: 29 July 1998, in New York.

PUBLICATIONS

On FABRICE:

Books

Milbank, Caroline Rennolds, New York Fashion: The Evolution of American Style, New York, 1989.

Articles

- Wihlborg, Lee Wohlfers, "Style," in People (New York), 25 April 1983.
- Milbank, Caroline Rennolds, "Fabrice," in Interview (New York), December 1986.
- "Famed Fashion Designer Fabrice, 47, Succumbs in New York," in Jet, 24 August 1998.
- "Fashion Designer Fabrice Simon Dies at the Age of 47," in People Weekly, 24 August 1998.

* * *

Since founding his company in 1976, Haitian-born Fabrice was known primarily for eveningwear targeted to the high end of the custom and ready-to-wear markets. He trained as a textile designer. When he turned from textile to fashion design in 1975, not surprisingly he began to work in hand-painted fabrics. His first significant sale was a small number of gowns purchased by the New York specialty shop Henri Bendel. Bendel's was instrumental in establishing the career of many young designers. This was the heyday of Bendel's "open house," where the store's buyers set aside a weekly time to view, sometimes to purchase, work from unknown artists. Typically, these unknowns lacked major financial backing and production resources. More than a few of them were also producing hand-painted silks in limited quantity. It was a labor intensive but otherwise relatively inexpensive way to enter the world of fashion.

Fabrice sought to distinguish his product from others and to expand his market. He found the way when he discovered a selection of beaded motifs originating in Haiti. Fabrice commissioned Haitian beaders and embroiderers to execute his designs, beginning in 1979. Although he still worked with hand-painted fabrics throughout his short career, he is best remembered for his distinctive beaded gowns.

Fabrice's work reflected a contemporary approach to the ancient craft of beading. His gowns were imbued with a modern sensibility, designed from within a frame of reference suggesting a response and asking for a second look. His beaded squiggles invite comparison with the paintings of Joan Miró and with the graffiti found on public buildings. On a dark ground, his abstract designs seem suspended in space, like the lights of a far off bridge at night. More easily read patterns also startle and amuse when worked in bugle beads. Imagine, for example, a beaded gown patterned like an argyle sock, or one inspired by a woven ikat. Fabrice's references included cobwebs and comic strips; he acknowledged trendy street styles without ignoring past traditions.

In his formal menswear collections, Fabrice offered alternatives to the traditional black tie ensemble. He showed silk t-shirts for evening, pairing them with houndstooth or floral damask dinner jackets, or with unstructured smoking jackets for an even more relaxed look. Acknowledging the street influence on his work, Fabrice introduced a bridge collection in 1992 called Graffiti. His nylon, rayon, and Lycra Spandex dresses in stinging colors with contrasting insets or appliqués were sleek and colorful wearable graphics. In his ready-to-wear and in his custom clothes, Fabrice's wit always complemented his artistry.

The extent of Fabrice's fashion reign was brief; he made a major splash and then gave up dressmaking for painting. Though his boldly colorful abstracts received some critical praise, he will be remembered for the flashy beaded gowns wore by a bevy of celebrities, including Iman, Madonna, Natalie Cole, Whitney Houston, Ivana Trump, Shirley MacClaine, and Kathleen Turner. In July of 1998, at the age of 47, Fabrice succumbed to AIDS in New York City.

—Whitney Blausen; updated by Nelly Rhodes

FAINBLOOM, Abe and Bill

See CHAMPION

FARHI, Nicole

British designer

Born: France, 25 July 1946. Education: Studied fashion illustration at Studio Bercot, Paris. Family: Longtime companion of Stephen

Nicole Farhi, winter 2001 collection: beaded evening dress. © AFP/CORBIS.

Marks, daughter: Candice; married David Hare, 1993. Career: Freelance designer for Pierre D'Alby, Bianchini-Férier, Elle, Marie-Claire, 1966–circa 1973; designer, French Connection, from 1973; introduced own label to coincide with first Nicole Farhi boutique, 1983; opened freestanding shops, London and New York, 1984, Norway, 1987; menswear collection introduced, 1989; opened flagship new York City store, complete with restaurant and bar, 1999. Awards: British Fashion award, 1989; British Design Council award, 1991. Address: 16 Fouberts Place, London W1V 1HH, England.

PUBLICATIONS

On FARHI:

Books

Stegemeyer, Anne, Who's Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.

Articles

Bloomfield, Judy, "Nicole Farhi Strengthens U.S. Connection," in WWD, 28 September 1988.

"Din Adds Spice to French Dressing," in Design Weekly (London), 14 July 1989.

Martin, Rosie, "So Farhi, So Good," in Vogue (London), April 1991.

Honan, Corinna, "Why Do So Many British Women Dress Like Tarts? Top Designer Nicole Farhi Reveals Her Contempt for Modern Fashions," in the Daily Mail (London), 2 October 1992.

Fearon, Francesca, "Goodbye to the Changing Seasons," in the Herald (Glasgow), 11 November 1992.

Dempster, Nigel, "Farhi's New Hare-Style," in the Daily Mail (London), 9 February 1993.

Young, Lucie, "Design Notebook: Who's the Coolest of Them All?" in the New York Times, 19 August 1999.

Deegan, Carol, "Five Questions: Nicole Farhi," in the Associated Press, 4 February 2000.

*

My clothes are for women like me who are active, either because they work or simply live life to the fullest. The designs are understated but with tremendous style...never boring...and even when it is a fun garment, I like to keep the shape very simple.

—Nicole Farhi

* * *

Nicole Farhi was born in France of Turkish parents and trained in Paris to be a fashion illustrator, working first for Parisian fashion magazines illustrating the haute couture collections in Paris. When she was 20, she made the transition to fashion design because she was asked to design dresses by such magazines as Marie-Claire and Elle, which were sold as patterns for their readers. She then met Stephen

Fabiani and Simonetta were often the subject of fashion industry gossip over what they discussed at home, since they were two of the top fashion houses in Italy and fierce competitors. They always maintained that they did not discuss the particulars of their lines with each other but simply reviewed trends together before beginning each collection, taking a look at each other's work for the first time during runway show dress rehearsals each season.

Fabiani became known in the U.S. and around the world for his clean lines, his quality tailoring, and his conservative yet imaginative women's clothes, whereas Simonetta's reputation was established through the creation of highly feminine sportswear and cocktail dresses intended for a young female customer. The two had contrasting personalities as well: Fabiani was reserved while Simonetta was very outgoing.

Although they adamantly denied they would ever combine their two houses, the couple did try to do so briefly in 1962, forming Simonetta et Fabiani in Paris. The effort was a success at first but failed quickly, and Fabiani returned to Italy without Simonetta. (Two years later, she retired from designing and established a leper colony in India.) He returned to designing alone, regaining his status as one of the leading couturiers in his home country. He created not only apparel, specializing in suits and dresses, but accessories as well.

Fabiani's designs were timeless. He was in touch with the current trends each season, but his pieces were classics that always came back into fashion. And despite his conservatism, he was also an innovator, creating new trends—especially during the 1950s—such as the cocoon silhouette (fitted in front, loose in back) and pleated column dresses. His tent coats, introduced in 1960, made a particular splash. Many of these innovations were disliked at first but were eventually embraced by consumers, retail buyers, and critics alike. In fact, Fabiani's designs were some of the couture pieces most emulated by American retailers in the 1950s and 1960s. Fabiani retired in 1974.

—Karen Raugust

FABRICE

American fashion designer

Born: Fabrice Simon in Port au Prince, Haiti, 29 January 1951; moved to the U.S., 1964. Education: Studied textile design and fashion illustration, Fashion Institute of Technology, New York, 1969–70. Career: Freelance textile designer, 1971–76; formed own company producing hand-painted and beaded gowns, 1976; menswear line introduced, 1985; abandoned designing for painting, 1990s; abstract paintings exhibited in New York and Palm Beach, 1997. Awards: Coty American Fashion Critics award, 1981. Died: 29 July 1998, in New York.

PUBLICATIONS

On FABRICE:

Books

Milbank, Caroline Rennolds, New York Fashion: The Evolution of American Style, New York, 1989.

Articles

- Wihlborg, Lee Wohlfers, "Style," in People (New York), 25 April 1983.
- Milbank, Caroline Rennolds, "Fabrice," in Interview (New York), December 1986.
- "Famed Fashion Designer Fabrice, 47, Succumbs in New York," in Jet, 24 August 1998.
- "Fashion Designer Fabrice Simon Dies at the Age of 47," in People Weekly, 24 August 1998.

* * *

Since founding his company in 1976, Haitian-born Fabrice was known primarily for eveningwear targeted to the high end of the custom and ready-to-wear markets. He trained as a textile designer. When he turned from textile to fashion design in 1975, not surprisingly he began to work in hand-painted fabrics. His first significant sale was a small number of gowns purchased by the New York specialty shop Henri Bendel. Bendel's was instrumental in establishing the career of many young designers. This was the heyday of Bendel's "open house," where the store's buyers set aside a weekly time to view, sometimes to purchase, work from unknown artists. Typically, these unknowns lacked major financial backing and production resources. More than a few of them were also producing hand-painted silks in limited quantity. It was a labor intensive but otherwise relatively inexpensive way to enter the world of fashion.

Fabrice sought to distinguish his product from others and to expand his market. He found the way when he discovered a selection of beaded motifs originating in Haiti. Fabrice commissioned Haitian beaders and embroiderers to execute his designs, beginning in 1979. Although he still worked with hand-painted fabrics throughout his short career, he is best remembered for his distinctive beaded gowns.

Fabrice's work reflected a contemporary approach to the ancient craft of beading. His gowns were imbued with a modern sensibility, designed from within a frame of reference suggesting a response and asking for a second look. His beaded squiggles invite comparison with the paintings of Joan Miró and with the graffiti found on public buildings. On a dark ground, his abstract designs seem suspended in space, like the lights of a far off bridge at night. More easily read patterns also startle and amuse when worked in bugle beads. Imagine, for example, a beaded gown patterned like an argyle sock, or one inspired by a woven ikat. Fabrice's references included cobwebs and comic strips; he acknowledged trendy street styles without ignoring past traditions.

In his formal menswear collections, Fabrice offered alternatives to the traditional black tie ensemble. He showed silk t-shirts for evening, pairing them with houndstooth or floral damask dinner jackets, or with unstructured smoking jackets for an even more relaxed look. Acknowledging the street influence on his work, Fabrice introduced a bridge collection in 1992 called Graffiti. His nylon, rayon, and Lycra Spandex dresses in stinging colors with contrasting insets or appliqués were sleek and colorful wearable graphics. In his ready-to-wear and in his custom clothes, Fabrice's wit always complemented his artistry.

The extent of Fabrice's fashion reign was brief; he made a major splash and then gave up dressmaking for painting. Though his boldly colorful abstracts received some critical praise, he will be remembered for the flashy beaded gowns wore by a bevy of celebrities, including Iman, Madonna, Natalie Cole, Whitney Houston, Ivana Trump, Shirley MacClaine, and Kathleen Turner. In July of 1998, at the age of 47, Fabrice succumbed to AIDS in New York City.

—Whitney Blausen; updated by Nelly Rhodes

FAINBLOOM, Abe and Bill

See CHAMPION

FARHI, Nicole

British designer

Born: France, 25 July 1946. Education: Studied fashion illustration at Studio Bercot, Paris. Family: Longtime companion of Stephen

Nicole Farhi, winter 2001 collection: beaded evening dress. © AFP/CORBIS.

Marks, daughter: Candice; married David Hare, 1993. Career: Freelance designer for Pierre D'Alby, Bianchini-Férier, Elle, Marie-Claire, 1966–circa 1973; designer, French Connection, from 1973; introduced own label to coincide with first Nicole Farhi boutique, 1983; opened freestanding shops, London and New York, 1984, Norway, 1987; menswear collection introduced, 1989; opened flagship new York City store, complete with restaurant and bar, 1999. Awards: British Fashion award, 1989; British Design Council award, 1991. Address: 16 Fouberts Place, London W1V 1HH, England.

PUBLICATIONS

On FARHI:

Books

Stegemeyer, Anne, Who's Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.

Articles

Bloomfield, Judy, "Nicole Farhi Strengthens U.S. Connection," in WWD, 28 September 1988.

"Din Adds Spice to French Dressing," in Design Weekly (London), 14 July 1989.

Martin, Rosie, "So Farhi, So Good," in Vogue (London), April 1991.

Honan, Corinna, "Why Do So Many British Women Dress Like Tarts? Top Designer Nicole Farhi Reveals Her Contempt for Modern Fashions," in the Daily Mail (London), 2 October 1992.

Fearon, Francesca, "Goodbye to the Changing Seasons," in the Herald (Glasgow), 11 November 1992.

Dempster, Nigel, "Farhi's New Hare-Style," in the Daily Mail (London), 9 February 1993.

Young, Lucie, "Design Notebook: Who's the Coolest of Them All?" in the New York Times, 19 August 1999.

Deegan, Carol, "Five Questions: Nicole Farhi," in the Associated Press, 4 February 2000.

*

My clothes are for women like me who are active, either because they work or simply live life to the fullest. The designs are understated but with tremendous style...never boring...and even when it is a fun garment, I like to keep the shape very simple.

—Nicole Farhi

* * *

Nicole Farhi was born in France of Turkish parents and trained in Paris to be a fashion illustrator, working first for Parisian fashion magazines illustrating the haute couture collections in Paris. When she was 20, she made the transition to fashion design because she was asked to design dresses by such magazines as Marie-Claire and Elle, which were sold as patterns for their readers. She then met Stephen including Iman, Madonna, Natalie Cole, Whitney Houston, Ivana Trump, Shirley MacClaine, and Kathleen Turner. In July of 1998, at the age of 47, Fabrice succumbed to AIDS in New York City.

—Whitney Blausen; updated by Nelly Rhodes

FAINBLOOM, Abe and Bill

See CHAMPION

FARHI, Nicole

British designer

Born: France, 25 July 1946. Education: Studied fashion illustration at Studio Bercot, Paris. Family: Longtime companion of Stephen

Nicole Farhi, winter 2001 collection: beaded evening dress. © AFP/CORBIS.

Marks, daughter: Candice; married David Hare, 1993. Career: Freelance designer for Pierre D'Alby, Bianchini-Férier, Elle, Marie-Claire, 1966–circa 1973; designer, French Connection, from 1973; introduced own label to coincide with first Nicole Farhi boutique, 1983; opened freestanding shops, London and New York, 1984, Norway, 1987; menswear collection introduced, 1989; opened flagship new York City store, complete with restaurant and bar, 1999. Awards: British Fashion award, 1989; British Design Council award, 1991. Address: 16 Fouberts Place, London W1V 1HH, England.

PUBLICATIONS

On FARHI:

Books

Stegemeyer, Anne, Who's Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.

Articles

Bloomfield, Judy, "Nicole Farhi Strengthens U.S. Connection," in WWD, 28 September 1988.

"Din Adds Spice to French Dressing," in Design Weekly (London), 14 July 1989.

Martin, Rosie, "So Farhi, So Good," in Vogue (London), April 1991.

Honan, Corinna, "Why Do So Many British Women Dress Like Tarts? Top Designer Nicole Farhi Reveals Her Contempt for Modern Fashions," in the Daily Mail (London), 2 October 1992.

Fearon, Francesca, "Goodbye to the Changing Seasons," in the Herald (Glasgow), 11 November 1992.

Dempster, Nigel, "Farhi's New Hare-Style," in the Daily Mail (London), 9 February 1993.

Young, Lucie, "Design Notebook: Who's the Coolest of Them All?" in the New York Times, 19 August 1999.

Deegan, Carol, "Five Questions: Nicole Farhi," in the Associated Press, 4 February 2000.

*

My clothes are for women like me who are active, either because they work or simply live life to the fullest. The designs are understated but with tremendous style...never boring...and even when it is a fun garment, I like to keep the shape very simple.

—Nicole Farhi

* * *

Nicole Farhi was born in France of Turkish parents and trained in Paris to be a fashion illustrator, working first for Parisian fashion magazines illustrating the haute couture collections in Paris. When she was 20, she made the transition to fashion design because she was asked to design dresses by such magazines as Marie-Claire and Elle, which were sold as patterns for their readers. She then met Stephen

Nicole Farhi, autumn/winter 2001 collection. © Reuters NewMedia Inc./CORBIS.

Marks and began designing for the company that soon became French Connection. "We went to India," she relates, "sourcing fabrics and designing textiles. This was 1973–74 and there was a demand for Eastern fabrics and embroidery." By 1983, when French Connection was floated on the London Stock Exchange, Farhi launched a company under her own name, backed by the now considerable resources of the larger label. In 1984, she wrote, "The clothes I was designing for French Connection were too constricting for me. They were very successful, but I wanted to design unstructured clothes for women."

Unstructured design is a distinctive feature of Farhi's work, as is the importance of understatement, attention to detail, and subtle colors and textures: "My collections over the years have become more and more feminine...altogether softer, using layers of color and texture. I think a woman should express her sexuality...not in a blatant way, but subtly—perhaps just by using fabric that is pleasing to the touch." In winter 1989, Farhi launched her first collection for men, a move welcomed as a new development in British menswear.

As Farhi explained at the time, "Many of the fabrics and shapes I had used for women in the past had been quite simple and 'masculine,' so it was not too difficult to make the transition."

Both women's and men's collections express Farhi's Europe-based design philosophy. "Nowadays the way we live means less of a partition between day and evening clothes.... They need to be relaxed in the day yet sophisticated enough for the evening. We must mix them to suit ourselves. At last there is no dictation."

There are a total of eight London Nicole Farhi shops, including those in Covent Garden, Knightsbridge, Hampstead, and the original at St. Christopher's Place, as well as concessionary outlets in many major stores throughout the UK, Europe, Japan, and Hong Kong. In 1989, Farhi won the British Classics category at the British Fashion awards and in 1991 was awarded the British Design Council award for Design Excellence for her spring/summer 1991 collection, the first time in five years the award had been given to a fashion designer.

Business boomed for Farhi in the 1990s. In September 1999, she launched a 20,000-square-foot flagship store in New York City, showcasing her signature clothing plus antique furniture and flea market treasures from Europe, South America, and Madagascar. The 1901 building, once the Copa Cabana nightclub, is home not only to Farhi's menwear and womenswear, but home collection and to Nicole's Restaurant and Bar.

Farhi ended a long romantic relationship, which produced daughter Candice, with business partner Stephen Marks in the late 1980s, although the two have continued to work together. In February 1993, Farhi married playwright David Hare, who wrote the film Damage and has directed at Britain's National Theatre.

Even as she reigned as one of Britain's most successful designers, collecting an estimated £50 million ($80 million) in 1998 and dressing movie stars such as Judi Dench, Jeremy Northam, and Mary Elizabeth Mastrantonio, Farhi has remained low key, driving a 25-year-old Volkswagen Beetle and attending high-brow events wearing jeans. Her attitude toward the fashion industry is similarly practical: "I want to stop this nonsense of people saying there is a 'revolution' in hemlines or whatever," she told Corinna Honan of London's Daily Mail. "My advice is—ignore what the fashion magazines are saying. I wear jackets and sweaters that are 10 years old; I'm not worried about what people think. There are pieces in my collection that have been the same for five years."

—Doreen Ehrlich; updated by Lisa Groshong

FASSETT, Kaffe

American knitwear designer working in London

Born: San Francisco, California, 7 December 1937. Education: Museum of Fine Arts School, Boston. Career: Moved to Britain, 1964; created knitting patterns for Women's Home Industries, Browns of London, and Rowan Yarns of Yorkshire; knitting stores opened, mid-1980s; television series Glorious Colour, for British Channel 4, 1988; flowing coats and shawls showcased in Stockhold ballet, 1990; produced video, Kaffe's Colour Quest, 1998; queue opened in Liberty's Department store, London, 1999; radio series, A Stitch in Time, for Britain's Radio 4, 1999. Awards: Chelsea Flower Show, for garden design for Hilliers Garden Centres, 1998. Exhibitions: Kaffe Fassett at the V&A, Victoria and Albert Museum, London, 1988; Art and Industry Museum, Stockholm, 1990; paintings, Catto Gallery,

Nicole Farhi, autumn/winter 2001 collection. © Reuters NewMedia Inc./CORBIS.

Marks and began designing for the company that soon became French Connection. "We went to India," she relates, "sourcing fabrics and designing textiles. This was 1973–74 and there was a demand for Eastern fabrics and embroidery." By 1983, when French Connection was floated on the London Stock Exchange, Farhi launched a company under her own name, backed by the now considerable resources of the larger label. In 1984, she wrote, "The clothes I was designing for French Connection were too constricting for me. They were very successful, but I wanted to design unstructured clothes for women."

Unstructured design is a distinctive feature of Farhi's work, as is the importance of understatement, attention to detail, and subtle colors and textures: "My collections over the years have become more and more feminine...altogether softer, using layers of color and texture. I think a woman should express her sexuality...not in a blatant way, but subtly—perhaps just by using fabric that is pleasing to the touch." In winter 1989, Farhi launched her first collection for men, a move welcomed as a new development in British menswear.

As Farhi explained at the time, "Many of the fabrics and shapes I had used for women in the past had been quite simple and 'masculine,' so it was not too difficult to make the transition."

Both women's and men's collections express Farhi's Europe-based design philosophy. "Nowadays the way we live means less of a partition between day and evening clothes.... They need to be relaxed in the day yet sophisticated enough for the evening. We must mix them to suit ourselves. At last there is no dictation."

There are a total of eight London Nicole Farhi shops, including those in Covent Garden, Knightsbridge, Hampstead, and the original at St. Christopher's Place, as well as concessionary outlets in many major stores throughout the UK, Europe, Japan, and Hong Kong. In 1989, Farhi won the British Classics category at the British Fashion awards and in 1991 was awarded the British Design Council award for Design Excellence for her spring/summer 1991 collection, the first time in five years the award had been given to a fashion designer.

Business boomed for Farhi in the 1990s. In September 1999, she launched a 20,000-square-foot flagship store in New York City, showcasing her signature clothing plus antique furniture and flea market treasures from Europe, South America, and Madagascar. The 1901 building, once the Copa Cabana nightclub, is home not only to Farhi's menwear and womenswear, but home collection and to Nicole's Restaurant and Bar.

Farhi ended a long romantic relationship, which produced daughter Candice, with business partner Stephen Marks in the late 1980s, although the two have continued to work together. In February 1993, Farhi married playwright David Hare, who wrote the film Damage and has directed at Britain's National Theatre.

Even as she reigned as one of Britain's most successful designers, collecting an estimated £50 million ($80 million) in 1998 and dressing movie stars such as Judi Dench, Jeremy Northam, and Mary Elizabeth Mastrantonio, Farhi has remained low key, driving a 25-year-old Volkswagen Beetle and attending high-brow events wearing jeans. Her attitude toward the fashion industry is similarly practical: "I want to stop this nonsense of people saying there is a 'revolution' in hemlines or whatever," she told Corinna Honan of London's Daily Mail. "My advice is—ignore what the fashion magazines are saying. I wear jackets and sweaters that are 10 years old; I'm not worried about what people think. There are pieces in my collection that have been the same for five years."

—Doreen Ehrlich; updated by Lisa Groshong

FASSETT, Kaffe

American knitwear designer working in London

Born: San Francisco, California, 7 December 1937. Education: Museum of Fine Arts School, Boston. Career: Moved to Britain, 1964; created knitting patterns for Women's Home Industries, Browns of London, and Rowan Yarns of Yorkshire; knitting stores opened, mid-1980s; television series Glorious Colour, for British Channel 4, 1988; flowing coats and shawls showcased in Stockhold ballet, 1990; produced video, Kaffe's Colour Quest, 1998; queue opened in Liberty's Department store, London, 1999; radio series, A Stitch in Time, for Britain's Radio 4, 1999. Awards: Chelsea Flower Show, for garden design for Hilliers Garden Centres, 1998. Exhibitions: Kaffe Fassett at the V&A, Victoria and Albert Museum, London, 1988; Art and Industry Museum, Stockholm, 1990; paintings, Catto Gallery, London, 1997, 1999; quilt exhibit, Japan World Quilt Fair, 1998; needlepoints, wall hangings, rugs, displayed at the Luise Ross Gallery, 1999. Address: c/o Ebury Press, 20 Vaux-Hall Bridge Road, London, SW1V 2SA, England. Website: www.kaffefassett.com.

PUBLICATIONS

By FASSETT:

Books

- Glorious Knitting*, London, 1985.
Glorious Needlepoint, London, 1987.
Kaffe Fassett at the V&A (exhibition catalogue), London, 1988; published as Glorious Colour, New York.
Family Album, with Zoë Hunt, London, 1989.
Glorious Inspiration, London, 1991.
Kaffe's Classics, London, 1993.
Glorious Interiors: Needlepoint, Knitting and Decorative Design Projects for Your Home, Boston, 1995.
Glorious Patchwork: More Than 25 Glorious Quilt Designs, New York, 1997.
Welcome Home: Kaffe Fassett, Bothell, WA, 1999.
Mosaics, Inspiration and Original Projects for Interiors and Exteriors, with Candace Bahouth, Newtown, CT, 1999.
Kaffe Fassett's Glorious Inspiration for Needlepoint and Knitting, New York, 2000.
Kaffe Fassett's Glorious Color for Needlepoint and Knitting, New York, 2000.
Passionate Patchwork, Newtown, CT, 2001.

On FASSETT:

Books

- Sutton, Alan, British Craft Textiles, London, 1985.
Mably, Brandon, Brilliant Knits: 25 Colorful Contemporary Designs from the Kaffe Fassett Studio, Boston, 2001.

Articles

- Coleman, Marigold, in Crafts (London), March/April 1975.
“Craftsmen of Quality,” Crafts Advisory Committee, 1976.
Green, William, “Kaffe Fassett, the Colour Man,” in Vogue (London), April 1980.
Innes, Jocasta, in Cosmopolitan (London), January 1984.
Polan, Brenda, in The Guardian (London), 21 March 1985.
Schneebeli, Heini, “Observatory,” in the Observer (London), 9 November 1986.
Roberts, Glenys, in the Sunday Telegraph Magazine (London), 15 February 1987.
Kendall, Ena, “A Room of My Own,” in the Observer Magazine (London), January 1988.
Interview, in New Pins and Needles (London), May 1988.
Hilliard, Elizabeth, “A  in the Life of Kaffe Fassett,” in the Evening Standard (London), 16 November 1988.
Campbell, Sylvia, “Kaffe Fassett: Fiber Artist,” in Needlepoint Plus (California), May/June 1989.
Molesworth, Melanie, “Table Manners,” in Woman’s Journal (London), January 1990.

- Smith, Roberta, “Art in Review: Kaffe Fassett and Steve Lovi—‘Two About Color,’” in the New York Times, 17 December 1999.
Koplos, Janet, “Kaffe Fassett and Steve Lovi and Luise Ross,” in Art in America, June 2000.

* * *

Kaffe Fassett was born in 1937 in San Francisco. His family moved to the former home of the Aga Khan and Rita Hayworth in the wild and rocky Big Sur region of California. An unconventional childhood in an artistic household fostered a creative talent in the young Fassett, and days spent at a school run by followers of the Indian guru Krishnamurti were also to be a lasting influence. A scholarship took him to study at the Museum of Fine Arts School in Boston, but Fassett stayed only briefly and left to make his way as a society painter. Arriving in Britain in this capacity on a three-month vacation in 1964, he met the newly graduated fashion student Bill Gibb. He accompanied Gibb on a trip to Scotland and fell in love with the colors of the landscape and the Shetland wools. A woman on the train home taught him how to knit, and he says, “that is all I’ve done in 20 years.”

His first waistcoat sold for £100 in 1969 and earned a full page in Vogue. Thus began “a wonderful obsession,” which was to ensure him a place in fashion history. “I think knitting is just mysteriously, incredibly magic. I mean who would ever think that you could just take two sticks and rub them together with a bit of thread in between and out would come this incredible tapestry of colour?”

Abandoning his paints but still with the painter’s eye, he set about using yarns to explore the world of color. He designs organically, learning techniques when necessary. He has never been interested in rules or in a variety of stitches and claims to have arrived at nonangst knitting. He abhors the hard-and-fast rules that have kept hand-knitters enslaved for so long. Fassett uses only stocking stitch and rib. “I wanted to make it elegant so there was no point in trying anything fancy which immediately goes wrong when you drop a stitch. If you make a mistake according to my method, it can be a positive benefit.” He works with as many as 150 colors in a garment—“anything worth doing is worth overdoing,” he claims. After a brief spell working in machine knits with dress designers—notably Bill Gibb—Fassett turned his back on the machine. The intricacy of pattern he sought was incompatible with the industrial process.

Fassett works impulsively and intuitively and at an astonishing pace. Using circular needles he sits cross-legged, barefoot, on his bed, the design emerging line by line. He seldom uses a graph. For him, color and pattern are paramount, styling very much secondary. “The colouring is totally instinctive, a gut thing.” He worships color, uses it with great abandon and total assurance, seeing it everywhere, even in the most inauspicious surroundings. He advocates “if in doubt, add twenty more.”

His inspiration comes from the world of ethnic decorative arts: Turkish kilims, Islamic tiles, Chinese pots, Spanish brocades. For him, knitting garments is about patterns, not pictures. He doesn’t feel that large pictorial sweaters are really flattering to wear. Repeats and stylization render the figurative more appropriate for knitwear. Decoration follows through the entire garment, often using a contrasting tartan or stripe on the back. Favorite themes—circles, spots, squares—recur, transformed by a change in scale or color.

As well as individual commissions, he began to design for Women’s Home Industries and for Browns, who made up the patterns and sent them out to home knitters. His early work used mainly small repeat geometric motifs inspired by oriental rugs. Next there were grand romantic coats like the Romeo and Juliet coat inspired by the Nureyev ballet, with extravagant gathered shoulders and floor-sweeping skirts in stripes of mohair and bouclé with a tight jewelled bodice. A commission from the Aberdeen Art Gallery produced the huge “map coat,” a landscape extravaganza.

Of enduring appeal have been his ballooning coats: large, simply cut, T-shaped garments gathered at mid-calf into horizontally striped ribs—loose, enveloping shapes sized to fit anyone. They are vast canvases for oversize geometric patterns or stylized Chinese pots or autumn leaves—more than garments, more three-dimensional works of art, but very much intended to be worn, to swirl, to drape, to cling around the figure. He makes giant triangular shawls resplendent with a dazzling variety of dots and spots inspired by the Roman glass at the Victoria and Albert Museum, London. In October 1988, the ultimate accolade in craft circles came with his exhibition at the Victoria and Albert Museum. It was the first by a contemporary textile designer.

High fashion has been influenced by Kaffe Fassett. At the London Fashion Week in 1985, in collaboration with Bill Gibb, he produced “simply-cut, richly-coloured, knitted suits and throws,” and closed “with a series of fairy-tale exercises in the baroque, the beaded and the burnished”—all in “the glowing richness of Kaffe Fassett’s colours.” Bill Gibb’s huge American Indian style coat-sweaters came from Fassett’s American past.

Missoni, the renowned Italian designers, invited Fassett to Milan to design knitwear for them. Fassett generously left the Italian fashion house with years of ideas. In 1990 in Stockholm, a ballet featuring flowing Fassett coats and shawls was staged at the Art and Industry Museum for the opening of his exhibition there. The queues were so long that the opening had to be restaged three times, and 107,000 people attended. A 1998 exhibit of quilts from Fassett’s book Patchwork at Tokyo’s Japan World Quilt Fair drew 120,000 spectators. In 1997 and 1999, Fassett exhibited his paintings at London’s Catto Gallery. He mounted a New York City show at the Luise Ross Gallery in 1999, displaying needlepoints, wall hangings, lampshades, rugs, waistcoats, and other designs. “For many of us, any one of these creations would be more than enough,” noted Roberta Smith of the New York Times. “But to see them massed together is to glimpse a grand obsession expressed with consummate exquisite control, hedonistic flair and historic sophistication.” Collectors of Fassett’s work include such luminaries as Barbra Streisand, Lauren Bacall, Ali McGraw, Helen Frankenthaler, and Princess Michael of Kent.

Extensive lecture tours and workshops have brought Fassett’s message to millions of people the world over. Students have described these talks as “electrifying.” He also starred in a series on color on British television in 1988. Ten years later, he released a video called Kaffe’s Colour Quest, which explored the influence of travel on Fassett’s design and color inspiration. In 1999, he recorded a radio series entitled A Stitch in Time for Britain’s Radio 4.

Fassett freely shares all he knows with the hand-knitting public and has tirelessly campaigned to awaken the unexplored potential he believes lies in everyone. To that end, he was asked by the international charity Oxfam to give marketing and design advice to weaving villages in India and Guatemala. He performed similar work in South Africa.

His first book, Glorious Knitting (London, 1985), sold 180,000 copies, and a string of knitting shops opened in its wake. London’s

Liberty’s Department Store opened a concession featuring Fassett’s one-of-a-kind designs and products in 1999. Fassett’s eleventh book, Passionate Patchwork, was published in 2001.

In recent years, Fassett has turned some of his attention to more unusual projects. In 1998, he won a medal in the Chelsea Flower Show for a garden design for Hilliers Garden Centres. Several performance groups have commissioned Fassett’s designs, including Britain’s Northern Ballet Theatre and the Royal Shakespeare Company.

—Elian McCready; updated by Lisa Groshong

FATH, Jacques

French designer

Born: Lafitte, France, 12 September 1912. Education: Studied bookkeeping and law, Commercial Institute, Vincennes, France. Family: Married Geneviève Boucher de la Bruyère, 1939; son: Philippe. Military Service: Completed required military service and served again in the artillery during World War II. Career: Bookkeeper, then trader at the Paris Bourse, 1930–32; showed first collection, Paris, 1937; reopened salon, 1940; designed ready-to-wear collection for American manufacturer Joseph Halpert, 1948; formed own company in the U.S., 1951; developed ready-to-wear collection in Paris, 1954, including Fath scarves and hosiery; business sold, 1957; fragrance license bought back from L’Oreal, 1992; Tom Van Lingen hired as designer, 1992; relaunched several fragrances, from 1993; company bought by Groupe Emanuelle Khanh, 1997; Elena Nazarhoff replaced Van Lingen as artistic director, 1997; Nazarhoff fired and Octavio Pizarro hired, 1998; fragrances include: Green Water, reissued 1993; Fath de Fath, 1957 and 1995; Yin and Yang, 2000. Exhibitions: Jacques Fath Crédation-Couture des Années 50 (retrospective), Palais Galleria, Paris, 1993. Awards: Neiman Marcus award, Dallas, 1949. Died: 13 November 1954, in Paris.

PUBLICATIONS

On FATH:

Books

- Bertin, Célia, Paris à la Mode, London, 1956.
- Ballard, Bettina, In My Fashion, New York, 1960.
- Oster, André, “Jacques Fath Recalled,” in Ruth Lynam, ed., Couture: An Illustrated History of the Great Paris Designers and Their Creations, New York, 1972.
- Milbank, Caroline Rennolds, Couture: The Great Designers, New York, 1985.
- Veillon, Dominique, La mode sous l’occupation, Paris, 1990.
- Guillaume, Valérie, Jacques Fath (exhibition catalogue), Paris, 1993.
- Stegemeyer, Anne, Who’s Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.

geometric motifs inspired by oriental rugs. Next there were grand romantic coats like the Romeo and Juliet coat inspired by the Nureyev ballet, with extravagant gathered shoulders and floor-sweeping skirts in stripes of mohair and bouclé with a tight jewelled bodice. A commission from the Aberdeen Art Gallery produced the huge “map coat,” a landscape extravaganza.

Of enduring appeal have been his ballooning coats: large, simply cut, T-shaped garments gathered at mid-calf into horizontally striped ribs—loose, enveloping shapes sized to fit anyone. They are vast canvases for oversize geometric patterns or stylized Chinese pots or autumn leaves—more than garments, more three-dimensional works of art, but very much intended to be worn, to swirl, to drape, to cling around the figure. He makes giant triangular shawls resplendent with a dazzling variety of dots and spots inspired by the Roman glass at the Victoria and Albert Museum, London. In October 1988, the ultimate accolade in craft circles came with his exhibition at the Victoria and Albert Museum. It was the first by a contemporary textile designer.

High fashion has been influenced by Kaffe Fassett. At the London Fashion Week in 1985, in collaboration with Bill Gibb, he produced “simply-cut, richly-coloured, knitted suits and throws,” and closed “with a series of fairy-tale exercises in the baroque, the beaded and the burnished”—all in “the glowing richness of Kaffe Fassett’s colours.” Bill Gibb’s huge American Indian style coat-sweaters came from Fassett’s American past.

Missoni, the renowned Italian designers, invited Fassett to Milan to design knitwear for them. Fassett generously left the Italian fashion house with years of ideas. In 1990 in Stockholm, a ballet featuring flowing Fassett coats and shawls was staged at the Art and Industry Museum for the opening of his exhibition there. The queues were so long that the opening had to be restaged three times, and 107,000 people attended. A 1998 exhibit of quilts from Fassett’s book Patchwork at Tokyo’s Japan World Quilt Fair drew 120,000 spectators. In 1997 and 1999, Fassett exhibited his paintings at London’s Catto Gallery. He mounted a New York City show at the Luise Ross Gallery in 1999, displaying needlepoints, wall hangings, lampshades, rugs, waistcoats, and other designs. “For many of us, any one of these creations would be more than enough,” noted Roberta Smith of the New York Times. “But to see them massed together is to glimpse a grand obsession expressed with consummate exquisite control, hedonistic flair and historic sophistication.” Collectors of Fassett’s work include such luminaries as Barbra Streisand, Lauren Bacall, Ali McGraw, Helen Frankenthaler, and Princess Michael of Kent.

Extensive lecture tours and workshops have brought Fassett’s message to millions of people the world over. Students have described these talks as “electrifying.” He also starred in a series on color on British television in 1988. Ten years later, he released a video called Kaffe’s Colour Quest, which explored the influence of travel on Fassett’s design and color inspiration. In 1999, he recorded a radio series entitled A Stitch in Time for Britain’s Radio 4.

Fassett freely shares all he knows with the hand-knitting public and has tirelessly campaigned to awaken the unexplored potential he believes lies in everyone. To that end, he was asked by the international charity Oxfam to give marketing and design advice to weaving villages in India and Guatemala. He performed similar work in South Africa.

His first book, Glorious Knitting (London, 1985), sold 180,000 copies, and a string of knitting shops opened in its wake. London’s

Liberty’s Department Store opened a concession featuring Fassett’s one-of-a-kind designs and products in 1999. Fassett’s eleventh book, Passionate Patchwork, was published in 2001.

In recent years, Fassett has turned some of his attention to more unusual projects. In 1998, he won a medal in the Chelsea Flower Show for a garden design for Hilliers Garden Centres. Several performance groups have commissioned Fassett’s designs, including Britain’s Northern Ballet Theatre and the Royal Shakespeare Company.

—Elian McCready; updated by Lisa Groshong

FATH, Jacques

French designer

Born: Lafitte, France, 12 September 1912. Education: Studied bookkeeping and law, Commercial Institute, Vincennes, France. Family: Married Geneviève Boucher de la Bruyère, 1939; son: Philippe. Military Service: Completed required military service and served again in the artillery during World War II. Career: Bookkeeper, then trader at the Paris Bourse, 1930–32; showed first collection, Paris, 1937; reopened salon, 1940; designed ready-to-wear collection for American manufacturer Joseph Halpert, 1948; formed own company in the U.S., 1951; developed ready-to-wear collection in Paris, 1954, including Fath scarves and hosiery; business sold, 1957; fragrance license bought back from L’Oreal, 1992; Tom Van Lingen hired as designer, 1992; relaunched several fragrances, from 1993; company bought by Groupe Emanuelle Khanh, 1997; Elena Nazarhoff replaced Van Lingen as artistic director, 1997; Nazarhoff fired and Octavio Pizarro hired, 1998; fragrances include: Green Water, reissued 1993; Fath de Fath, 1957 and 1995; Yin and Yang, 2000. Exhibitions: Jacques Fath Crédation-Couture des Années 50 (retrospective), Palais Galleria, Paris, 1993. Awards: Neiman Marcus award, Dallas, 1949. Died: 13 November 1954, in Paris.

PUBLICATIONS

On FATH:

Books

- Bertin, Célia, Paris à la Mode, London, 1956.
- Ballard, Bettina, In My Fashion, New York, 1960.
- Oster, André, “Jacques Fath Recalled,” in Ruth Lynam, ed., Couture: An Illustrated History of the Great Paris Designers and Their Creations, New York, 1972.
- Milbank, Caroline Rennolds, Couture: The Great Designers, New York, 1985.
- Veillon, Dominique, La mode sous l’occupation, Paris, 1990.
- Guillaume, Valérie, Jacques Fath (exhibition catalogue), Paris, 1993.
- Stegemeyer, Anne, Who’s Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.

Jacques Fath adjusting one of his ball gowns, 1951. © Genevieve Naylor/CORBIS.

Articles

- Coughlan, Robert, "Designer for Americans: Jacques Fath of Paris Sells U.S. Women Wearable Glamour," in Life Magazine (New York), October 1949.
"Jacques Fath," in Current Biography (New York), April 1951.
Roberts, Eleanor, "Fath Brings Paris Chi-Chi to Boston," in the Boston Post, 18 December 1953.
Obituary, in the New York Times, 14 November 1954.

"Page After Page of the Good and the Controversial in the World of Fashion," in the Chicago Tribune, 11 December 1991.

Deeny, Godfrey, "A Revival of the House that Jacques Built," in WWD, 26 February 1992.

Stern, Suzanne Pierrette, "Memories of a Parisian Seamstress: Tales and Techniques from the Workrooms of Couturier Jacques Fath," in Threads (Newtown, Connecticut), April/May 1992.

Milbank, Caroline Rennolds, "Jacques Fath: The Mercurial Host at Corbeville and Paris," in Architectural Digest, October 1994.

Jacques Fath, fall/winter 1954 collection: "S"-line suit in wool with an ermine cape collar and velvet ribbons. © Bettmann/CORBIS.

Weisman, Katherine, "The Renewal of Jacques Fath," in WWD, 25 May 1995.

Larson, Soren, "Giving the Jacques Fath Fragrances a New Life," in WWD, 8 September 1995.

"Khanh Acquires House of Fath," in WWD, 17 March 1997.

Wilson, Eric, "Fath Dismisses RTW Designer Elena Nazar," in WWD, 24 November 1997.

"Opposites Attract," in Soap Perfumery & Cosmetics, January 2000.

* * *

Jacques Fath had a short career—from 1937 until his death in 1954—and after he died his name fell into obscurity. In contrast to his great contemporaries, Christian Dior and Cristobal Balenciaga, Fath has been largely forgotten, but he deserves to be rediscovered as a talented creator.

Fath was born in 1912 into a Protestant family of Flemish and Alsatian origin. His great-grandmother had been a dressmaker to the empress Eugène and, from an early age, he showed an interest in designing clothes. He also toyed with the idea of becoming an actor, a craving he later indulged in private theatricals and costume parties.

Fath had "the showy elegance of a character from a Cocteau play and the charm of an enfant terrible," recalled Célia Bertin in Paris à la Mode, in London, in 1956. But fashion editors like Bettina Ballard and Carmel Snow (of Harper's Bazaar) tended to dismiss Fath as "a good-looking child prodigy...with slightly theatrical fashion ideas not worthy of the hallowed pages of Vogue or Harper's Bazaar."

Fath's career was interrupted by the outbreak of World War II. Taken prisoner in 1940, he was, however, soon back in Paris, where he reopened his couture house with his wife Geneviève. A book on fashion during the Nazi Occupation noted that scruples of conscience did not embarrass Fath, who was closely associated with various Franco-German groups and whose clientèle consisted heavily of Germans, wealthy collaborators, and black marketeers. Unlike Chanel, however, whose reputation as a Nazi sympathizer temporarily injured her postwar career, Fath's image emerged intact, and after the war, his international career took off.

His glove-fitted dresses glorified the female form, and some have said Fath even inspired Dior's New Look. Certainly, Fath designed some of the sexiest and most glamorous dresses to come out of Paris. The typical Fath dress featured a fitted bodice that molded a slender waistline and emphasized the swelling curves of bosom and hips. Sleeve and collar treatments were important to Fath, and he favored irregular necklines that drew attention to the breasts. Skirts were either very slim or very full, characterized perhaps by a whirlpool of pleats or interesting draped effects.

If Dior and Balenciaga were known for the architectural beauty of their designs, Fath's style was praised for its glamor and vivacity. He often used diagonal lines, asymmetrical drapery, and floating panels to give a sense of movement. Nor was he afraid of color, even using such daring combinations as bright blue and green. (He himself liked to wear a red tartan jacket.) Whereas Dior's career was characterized by striking shifts of silhouette (the A-line, the H-line, etc.), Fath maintained an unwavering fidelity to the female form divine, focusing on sexy lines and novel decorative details, such as rows of nonfunctional buttons. Fath's style of wearable glamor had a wide appeal, and in 1948 he signed an agreement with the American manufacturer, Joseph Halpert. Henceforth, in addition to his own couture collections, Fath produced a low-priced American line as well.

Fath was increasingly regarded as the "heir apparent to Dior's throne." As Life Magazine said in 1949: "Dior is still generally acknowledged to be the head man, so to speak, of the fashion world, but Fath has recently had a spectacular rise in prestige, and it now seems likely that the next look to confront and impoverish the U.S. male will be the Fath look." Carmel Snow, editor of Harper's Bazaar, revised her earlier opinion of Fath, declaring, "He makes you look like you have sex appeal—and believe me, that's important."

Fath himself had tremendous personal appeal, with his blond wavy hair and slender physique (a 28-inch waist, claimed one source). He was also very much a social personality: he and his pretty wife loved throwing lavish and imaginative parties, which had the pleasant side-effect of providing excellent publicity. "An atmosphere of glitter, chic, and perfumed excitement permeates both his personal and business affairs," observed Life magazine in October 1949. Yet behind the scenes, Fath was struggling with illness. Only a year before his death in 1954, the American press had hailed him as the "fabulous young French designer who...is out to make every woman look like a great beauty." This promise was tragically cut short; Fath died of leukemia at the age of 42.

Though the Fath house languished for some time, the firm was revived by new designer Tom Van Lingen, who came aboard in 1992, and the relaunch of several of the firm's early fragrances. In 1997, Groupe Emanuelle Khanh and its subsidiary, Jean-Louis Scherrer, bought the fashion house and installed Elena Nazaroff as its ready-to-wear designer, replacing Van Lingen. Yet Nazaroff was fired after one season and Fendi hired Octavio Pizarro, who had designed his own label in Chile before working at Jean-Louis Scherrer with Bernard Perris. Two new complementary fragrances, his-and-hers fragrances, Yin and Yang were released in 2000.

—Valerie Steele

FENDI

Italian design firm

Established: as a leather and fur workshop by Adele Casagrande (1897–1978), Rome, 1918; renamed Fendi with her marriage to Edoardo Fendi, 1925 (died, 1954); current principals include daughters Paola, Anna, Franca, Carla, Alda, their husbands, and children.

Fendi, autumn/winter 2001–02 ready-to-wear collection. © AFP/CORBIS.

Company History: Firm designs leather and fur clothing, accessories, ready-to-wear, knitwear, beachwear, eyewear, watches, and more; Selleria handbags and accessories launched, 1925; Karl Lagerfeld began collaborating on designs, 1962; introduced first fragrance, 1988; launched bridge line, 1990; licensed jewelry line, 1991; signed licensing deal with Japan's Naigai Co. Ltd., 1994; Selleria accessories line reintroduced, 1996; buyout from Prada and LVMH, 1999; flagship store opened in Paris, 2001; initial public offering planned, 2002; fragrances include Fendi Uomo, 1988; Fendi Classic, reissued; Theorema and Life Essence, 1998. Awards: National Italian American Foundation award to Paola Fendi, 1990. Company Address: Fendi Paola e S.Ile S.A.S., Via Borgognona 7, 00187 Rome, Italy.

PUBLICATIONS

On FENDI:

Books

- Mulassano, Adriana, Moda e Modi, Milan, 1980.
 Alfonsi, Maria-Vittoria, Leaders in Fashion: I Grandi Personaggi Della Moda, Bologna, 1983.
 Giocomoni, Silvia, The Italian Look Reflected, Milan, 1984.
 Soli, Pia, Il Geno Antipatico, Venice, 1984.
 Stegemeyer, Anne, Who's Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.

Articles

- Schiavi, Maria, "Che Cosa Di Chi: Fendi," in Vogue (Milan), October 1984.
 "Da Fendi: Lusso, Classe e Successo," in Linea Italiana (Milan), No. 157, 1985.
 Acquarone, Lele, "Le Incredibili Pellicce Fendi," in Vogue (Milan), September 1985.
 "La Grande Moda di Fendi," in Vogue (Milan), September 1986.
 "Fendi: Stupore Nel Lusso," in Donna (Milan), July/August 1987.
 Bachrach, Judy, "The Roman Empire," in Savvy, December 1987.
 Barron, Pattie, "La Famiglia Fendi," in Cosmopolitan (London), September 1988.
 "Fendi Furs: Karl Goes on a Tear," in WWD, 17 March 1992.
 Forden, Sara Gay, "Fast Forward at Fendi," in WWD, 24 January 1994.
 "Some Russians in New York Meet Winter in All-Out Style," in the New York Times, 26 February 1995.
 Taliabue, John, "Gucci's Shares Rise on a Report of Progress in Its Bid for Fendi," in the New York Times, 10 September 1999.
 Kamm, Thomas, and Deborah Ball, "LVMH, Prada Ready Joint Bid to Win Control of Designer Fendi," in the Wall Street Journal, 30 September 1999.
 Tagliabue, John, "Fendi Gets Better Offer," in the New York Times, 1 October 1999.
 Kamm, Thomas, and Deborah Ball, "LVMH, Prada Open Purse Strings to Bag Fendi," in the Wall Street Journal, 13 October 1999.
 Taliabue, John, "French-Italian Alliance Takes Controlling Stake in Fendi," in the New York Times, 13 October 1999.
 Agins, Teri, "All the Trimmings," in the Wall Street Journal, 23 November 1999.
 "Offering Seen for Fendi," in the New York Times, 24 November 1999.
 Socha, Miles, "Fendi Family," in W, February 2000.

and the relaunch of several of the firm's early fragrances. In 1997, Groupe Emanuelle Khanh and its subsidiary, Jean-Louis Scherrer, bought the fashion house and installed Elena Nazaroff as its ready-to-wear designer, replacing Van Lingen. Yet Nazaroff was fired after one season and Fendi hired Octavio Pizarro, who had designed his own label in Chile before working at Jean-Louis Scherrer with Bernard Perris. Two new complementary fragrances, his-and-hers fragrances, Yin and Yang were released in 2000.

—Valerie Steele

FENDI

Italian design firm

Established: as a leather and fur workshop by Adele Casagrande (1897–1978), Rome, 1918; renamed Fendi with her marriage to Edoardo Fendi, 1925 (died, 1954); current principals include daughters Paola, Anna, Franca, Carla, Alda, their husbands, and children.

Fendi, autumn/winter 2001–02 ready-to-wear collection. © AFP/CORBIS.

Company History: Firm designs leather and fur clothing, accessories, ready-to-wear, knitwear, beachwear, eyewear, watches, and more; Selleria handbags and accessories launched, 1925; Karl Lagerfeld began collaborating on designs, 1962; introduced first fragrance, 1988; launched bridge line, 1990; licensed jewelry line, 1991; signed licensing deal with Japan's Naigai Co. Ltd., 1994; Selleria accessories line reintroduced, 1996; buyout from Prada and LVMH, 1999; flagship store opened in Paris, 2001; initial public offering planned, 2002; fragrances include Fendi Uomo, 1988; Fendi Classic, reissued; Theorema and Life Essence, 1998. Awards: National Italian American Foundation award to Paola Fendi, 1990. Company Address: Fendi Paola e S.Ile S.A.S., Via Borgognona 7, 00187 Rome, Italy.

PUBLICATIONS

On FENDI:

Books

- Mulassano, Adriana, Moda e Modi, Milan, 1980.
 Alfonsi, Maria-Vittoria, Leaders in Fashion: I Grandi Personaggi Della Moda, Bologna, 1983.
 Giocomoni, Silvia, The Italian Look Reflected, Milan, 1984.
 Soli, Pia, Il Geno Antipatico, Venice, 1984.
 Stegemeyer, Anne, Who's Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.

Articles

- Schiavi, Maria, "Che Cosa Di Chi: Fendi," in Vogue (Milan), October 1984.
 "Da Fendi: Lusso, Classe e Successo," in Linea Italiana (Milan), No. 157, 1985.
 Acquarone, Lele, "Le Incredibili Pellicce Fendi," in Vogue (Milan), September 1985.
 "La Grande Moda di Fendi," in Vogue (Milan), September 1986.
 "Fendi: Stupore Nel Lusso," in Donna (Milan), July/August 1987.
 Bachrach, Judy, "The Roman Empire," in Savvy, December 1987.
 Barron, Pattie, "La Famiglia Fendi," in Cosmopolitan (London), September 1988.
 "Fendi Furs: Karl Goes on a Tear," in WWD, 17 March 1992.
 Forden, Sara Gay, "Fast Forward at Fendi," in WWD, 24 January 1994.
 "Some Russians in New York Meet Winter in All-Out Style," in the New York Times, 26 February 1995.
 Taliabue, John, "Gucci's Shares Rise on a Report of Progress in Its Bid for Fendi," in the New York Times, 10 September 1999.
 Kamm, Thomas, and Deborah Ball, "LVMH, Prada Ready Joint Bid to Win Control of Designer Fendi," in the Wall Street Journal, 30 September 1999.
 Tagliabue, John, "Fendi Gets Better Offer," in the New York Times, 1 October 1999.
 Kamm, Thomas, and Deborah Ball, "LVMH, Prada Open Purse Strings to Bag Fendi," in the Wall Street Journal, 13 October 1999.
 Taliabue, John, "French-Italian Alliance Takes Controlling Stake in Fendi," in the New York Times, 13 October 1999.
 Agins, Teri, "All the Trimmings," in the Wall Street Journal, 23 November 1999.
 "Offering Seen for Fendi," in the New York Times, 24 November 1999.
 Socha, Miles, "Fendi Family," in W, February 2000.

- Conti, Samantha, "Prada, LVMH Said Mulling a Jil Sander-Fendi Trade," in WWD, 28 February 2000.
- "Bag-ettes," in Ladies Home Journal, May 2000.
- Scrambles, Mary Tannen, "Follow That Fur!" in Harper's Bazaar, September 2000.
- Murphy, Robert, "Retail Reignites in the City of Light," in WWD, 2 October 2000.
- "The Unclutchables," in Entertainment Weekly, 12 January 2001.
- "Fendi Opens Paris Flagship With Focus on Accessories," in WWD, 7 March 2001.
- Colavita, Courtney, "Luigi Formilli, Executive, Husband of Franca Fendi," [obituary] in WWD, 27 August 2001.

* * *

Like many Italian firms producing luxury goods, the Fendi company is a family dynasty owing a great deal of its success to the strong blood links comprising an intrinsic part of the business. Fendi is unique in that it has been run not by male members of the family (of which there are none, except by marriage) but by five sisters, daughters of Adele and Edoardo Fendi, who became involved in the business after the death of their father in 1954. Fendi originally specialized in producing high-quality furs and leather goods on the Via del Plebiscito in Rome in 1925. It was at this point that the firm moved toward a more high-fashion profile, with the first Fendi fashion show staged in 1955.

Although Fendi produces a ready-to-wear sports line, the name is probably best known in the fashion arena for its dramatic fur collections, which have been designed by Karl Lagerfeld since 1962. It has been the company's relationship with Lagerfeld that brought the Fendi name to the attention of the fashion press, where it has since remained. Lagerfeld was also responsible for designing the double-F griffe that is almost as well recognized among the fashion cognoscenti as the double-C and double-G symbols of Chanel and Gucci.

Lagerfeld's innovative treatment of fur was both witty and, at times, shocking and has kept the Fendi company at the forefront of this particular field. In Lagerfeld's capable hands, real fur took on the appearance of fake fur; having been perforated with thousands of tiny holes to make the coats lighter to wear and printed to look like damask and other similar fabrics. Denim coats have been lined with mink by Lagerfeld, who also employed unorthodox animal skins such as squirrel and ferret in his creations. More recently, Lagerfeld covered an entire fur coat with woven mesh and created completely reversible fur coats as his stand against the antifur movement, which created great problems for the trade. Another design he produced for autumn-winter 1993–94 consisted of a small zipped bag that unfolded into a calf-length fur coat.

Whatever one's personal beliefs regarding the wearing of animal furs, the partnership of Karl Lagerfeld and Fendi undoubtedly broke barriers in the field of fur design. In Italy, fur sales have continued to constitute a major part of the company's business—where the Fendi sisters claim to have changed the age-old tradition of fur as being a status symbol to being a covetable high-fashion garment.

Like many luxury goods companies, Fendi has capitalized upon its name with the usual plethora of accessories, gloves, lighters, pens, glasses, and fragrances that have become a natural progression for a well-recognized label. The new millennium found Fendi at the forefront of fashion buzz after the 1999 buyout by Prada-LVMH. A year later, insider undercurrent predicted a shift of Jil Sander from Prada to Fendi following the resignation of Prada chief Patrizio Bertelli in January. The extended Fendi family posed for photos in Rome in February to announce plans to go public by 2002.

Amid money talk, collectors of chicery clutched Fendi's next-to-nothing baguette purse, which found its way under the elbows of the glitterati and started an avalanche of knockoffs. Showrooms were filled with women ogling Fendi's sheared mink, a new breath of luxury. In August 2000, the death of Luigi Formilli, husband of Franca Fendi, shook the Fendi fashion house. He had dedicated himself for four decades to production and distribution of the company's fashion and leather goods. His energetic promotion helped establish Fendi at Bergdorf Goodman, Henri Bendel, Neiman Marcus, and Saks Fifth Avenue. At the time, two of his and Franca's three sons, Guido and Andrea, were working at Fendi, while daughter Federica directed the Fendissime line.

Fendi moved steadily into challenging opportunities, including Japan, near-virgin territory for Italian luxe. In March 2001 the company opened its first freestanding store, a 6,000-square-foot Paris headquarters at 24 Rue François Premier. While reestablishing Paris as fashion's luxury capital, the new store bolstered brand recognition with a full line of accessories, shoes, luggage, ready-to-wear, and a fur line heavily tinged with mink. To Women's Wear Daily, president Carla Fendi confided, "This first store is a very significant step for Fendi. Paris is a very important place. Its creativity is very stimulating because it is home to fashion labels from all over the world with a well-informed public."

Fendi, autumn/winter 2001–02 collection: broadtail shift under a knitted fur jacket designed by Karl Lagerfeld. © AP/Wide World Photos.

—Catherine Woram; updated by Mary Ellen Snodgrass

FENG, Han

Chinese designer

Born: Hangzhou, China. Education: Graduated from Zhejiang Art Academy, Southeast China. Career: Began career designing scarves in the U.S., in the 1980s; first full-line collection, 1995; created costumes for performance pieces "Helix" and "Gandhara," 1995–98; moved into home furnishings, mid-1990s. Awards: Honored by the Asian American Federation of New York, 1995. Address: 333 West 39th Street, New York, NY, 10018, USA.

Han Feng, fall/winter 2000 collection. © AFP/CORBIS.

PUBLICATIONS

On FENG:

Books

Gumpert, Lynn and Richard Martin, Material Dreams (exhibition catalogue), New York, 1995.

Articles

Goodman, Wendy, "Living with Style: Hang Feng Comes Round the World to Spin Heavenly Tales in Silk," in House and Garden (New York), June 1993.

Enfield, Susan, "Meditative Pose," in Avenue (New York), September 1993.

Spindler, Amy M., "Bringing New Life (and Bamboo Bra Tops) to the Party," in the New York Times, 3 November 1993.

Staples, Kate, "Feng's Fashion: Smooth as Silk," in Departures (New York), March/April 1994.

"New York: Han Feng," in WWD, 7 November 1994.

Schiros, Anne-Marie, "Designed for Retailers and Real Women," in the New York Times, 5 April 1995.

Louie, Elaine, "Cool, Summery and in the City," in the New York Times, 31 July 1997.

Schiros, Anne-Marie, "Finding Motifs On Other Shores," in the New York Times, 6 November 1997.

Klensch, Elsa, "Exotic Cross-Continent Clothes Cover Feng For Fall," on CNN, 30 November 1998.

Ma, Fiona, and Heather Harlan, "Fusion Fashion," in Asian Week, 25 March 1999.

Klensch, Elsa, "Feng Lets Fashion Flow," on CNN, 18 June 1999.

Givhan, Robin, "N.Y. Collections Sway Their Hips to a Latin Beat," in the Washington Post, 14 September 1999.

* * *

Amy Spindler, writing in the New York Times, compared Han Feng's clothing to her contemporaries, stating, "she offers a few lines of the poetry of Romeo Gigli and Issey Miyake, but for much lower prices." Spindler rightly perceives the affinities of the gossamer-pleated yet practical clothing and accessories Feng designs, but it may be that a touch of poetry is just the levitating apparition we need in the midst of practical clothing. Feng creates unremittingly real clothing, wearable and practical, but with a concise, haiku-like hint of the historicist romance conveyed by Gigli and of the Cubist authority suggested by Miyake. There is something about Feng's inventiveness that is so radical a disposition for clothing that, like Miyake's pleats, it will either be a significant historical interlude in reform dress (for an avant-garde margin of the population) or a revolution in the way in which all people dress.

One wonders, however if clothing is the ultimate or exclusive goal of a designer who, growing up in Hangzhou, China, a great silk city, has become a devotee of the extraordinary organic materials that yield even more possibilities of organic shapes. A graduate of the Zhejiang Art Academy, Feng approaches her work as an artist. She began her work in the U.S. in the 1980s creating scarves, and the effect of the clothing is still a wondrous wrapping and veiling uncommon in the company opened its first freestanding store, a 6,000-square-foot Paris headquarters at 24 Rue François Premier. While reestablishing Paris as fashion's luxury capital, the new store bolstered brand recognition with a full line of accessories, shoes, luggage, ready-to-wear, and a fur line heavily tinged with mink. To Women's Wear Daily, president Carla Fendi confided, "This first store is a very significant step for Fendi. Paris is a very important place. Its creativity is very stimulating because it is home to fashion labels from all over the world with a well-informed public."

—Catherine Woram; updated by Mary Ellen Snodgrass

FENG, Han

Chinese designer

Born: Hangzhou, China. Education: Graduated from Zhejiang Art Academy, Southeast China. Career: Began career designing scarves in the U.S., in the 1980s; first full-line collection, 1995; created costumes for performance pieces "Helix" and "Gandhara," 1995–98; moved into home furnishings, mid-1990s. Awards: Honored by the Asian American Federation of New York, 1995. Address: 333 West 39th Street, New York, NY, 10018, USA.

Han Feng, fall/winter 2000 collection. © AFP/CORBIS.

PUBLICATIONS

On FENG:

Books

Gumpert, Lynn and Richard Martin, Material Dreams (exhibition catalogue), New York, 1995.

Articles

Goodman, Wendy, "Living with Style: Hang Feng Comes Round the World to Spin Heavenly Tales in Silk," in House and Garden (New York), June 1993.

Enfield, Susan, "Meditative Pose," in Avenue (New York), September 1993.

Spindler, Amy M., "Bringing New Life (and Bamboo Bra Tops) to the Party," in the New York Times, 3 November 1993.

Staples, Kate, "Feng's Fashion: Smooth as Silk," in Departures (New York), March/April 1994.

"New York: Han Feng," in WWD, 7 November 1994.

Schiros, Anne-Marie, "Designed for Retailers and Real Women," in the New York Times, 5 April 1995.

Louie, Elaine, "Cool, Summery and in the City," in the New York Times, 31 July 1997.

Schiros, Anne-Marie, "Finding Motifs On Other Shores," in the New York Times, 6 November 1997.

Klensch, Elsa, "Exotic Cross-Continent Clothes Cover Feng For Fall," on CNN, 30 November 1998.

Ma, Fiona, and Heather Harlan, "Fusion Fashion," in Asian Week, 25 March 1999.

Klensch, Elsa, "Feng Lets Fashion Flow," on CNN, 18 June 1999.

Givhan, Robin, "N.Y. Collections Sway Their Hips to a Latin Beat," in the Washington Post, 14 September 1999.

* * *

Amy Spindler, writing in the New York Times, compared Han Feng's clothing to her contemporaries, stating, "she offers a few lines of the poetry of Romeo Gigli and Issey Miyake, but for much lower prices." Spindler rightly perceives the affinities of the gossamer-pleated yet practical clothing and accessories Feng designs, but it may be that a touch of poetry is just the levitating apparition we need in the midst of practical clothing. Feng creates unremittingly real clothing, wearable and practical, but with a concise, haiku-like hint of the historicist romance conveyed by Gigli and of the Cubist authority suggested by Miyake. There is something about Feng's inventiveness that is so radical a disposition for clothing that, like Miyake's pleats, it will either be a significant historical interlude in reform dress (for an avant-garde margin of the population) or a revolution in the way in which all people dress.

One wonders, however if clothing is the ultimate or exclusive goal of a designer who, growing up in Hangzhou, China, a great silk city, has become a devotee of the extraordinary organic materials that yield even more possibilities of organic shapes. A graduate of the Zhejiang Art Academy, Feng approaches her work as an artist. She began her work in the U.S. in the 1980s creating scarves, and the effect of the clothing is still a wondrous wrapping and veiling uncommon in the tailored West. Her clothing wraps the body as the clouds enclose a mountain; her “smoke rings” are wraps of the kind made by Charles James and Halston, allowing a gentle helix of cloth to fit from hand to hand and sheathe the shoulders in an arch out of nature.

Han Feng, fall/winter 2000 collection. © AFP/CORBIS.

In as much as Feng is using materials Wendy Goodman described as, “magic out of silk” (House and Garden New York, June 1993) the organic compositions are only reinforced by the pliant materials, diaphanous delicacy, and classic shapes, often defying clothing as ceremony. She all but ignores tailoring and, in fact, uses many of the same experiments in textiles for her home furnishings. Not bothering with tailoring and instead assembling the garment as a light sculpture on the body, Feng fulfills the most predicted expectations in the West of design from the East. Spindler notes, “Her most beautiful dresses were of organza, which was gathered in little puffs, as if filled with helium. Han Feng’s vision is so romantic that the clothes look dreamily feminine even when draped over the tattooed form of the auto mechanic-cum-model Jenny Shimizu.” Feng offers soft shells of body wrap and comfort that return us to the most primitive, pretailored sensibility for dress.

In delving into clothing at the fundamental principle of wrapping, Feng is offering an alternative to the evolved forms of Western dress. It was unlikely that a relatively young, unknown designer had the opportunity to transform so thoroughly and effectively the principles of fashion, yet Feng’s work has the visionary impact to cast a wide and important influence. Even in apparel, pleated, weightless ringlets do not seem to be the stuff of insurrection, but in this case they were an anticipation of clothing for the 21st century. It is not surprising that Feng’s work was prominently featured in the Museum of Modern Art’s Christmas catalogue in 1994.

Critics considered 1995 to be a breakthrough year for Feng. She presented her first true full-line collection, consisting of fitted items such as tailored suits, coats, and furs, as well as her trademark accordion-pleated scarves and dresses. She continued to play with shape and texture, integrating curves into seams, collars, and backs. In terms of fabric, her eye was still set on silk, whether silk velvet, silk and wool blends, silk satin, or silk organza. With her broader line, Feng was able to attract a more diverse roster of buyers than before. Retailers such as Dayton-Hudson, Brown’s in London, and Isetan in Malaysia and Singapore joined the upscale department stores and boutiques already carrying her designs.

In the mid- and late 1990s, Feng expanded into items for the home, including table linens, bed covers, pillows, and other soft goods. She also moved beyond the realm of products, creating costumes for the performance pieces “Helix” (1995) and “Gandhara” (1998), commissioned by the Kennedy Center for the Performing Arts. The pieces’ theme of East meets West was perfectly suited to Feng’s style.

Each season, Feng’s runway shows illustrate an evolving sophistication. In her fall/winter 1998 collection, she was inspired by the story of a love affair between a fabric trader and a young women along the silk road to China. Woolen coats, strapless dresses, fox shawls, and velvet jackets incorporated reds and burgundies, sometimes combined with pinks and greens, and accessorized by iridescent pleated scarves. In 1999 her focus was on the neckline; one item was a high-collared Chairman Mao jacket accented with a chinchilla scarf. Roses and rosette patterns were a theme throughout the collection, carrying from a rose-patterned long gray chiffon skirt with a pleated ruffle to evening wear featuring velvet pants, skirts, and coats with rosette smocking.

Feng’s spring/summer 2001 collection highlighted her signature accordion-pleated skirts and crinkled silk blouses, printed with Impressionistic floral patterns. An asymmetrical, sculptural silk tube dress was pleated into a single sleeve and seemed to show the influence of Miyake. Despite Feng’s evolution as a designer, the scarves for which she originally became known remain a central element; in this collection, pleated scarves featured woven ribbon inserts in blue, yellow, turquoise, and lilac.

In all her collections, Feng’s designs are about fabrics and textures, pairing an American sensibility with Chinese and Japanese textiles and silhouettes. Her narrow skirts, wide pants, column dresses, and asymmetrical sweaters highlight her own distinctive style, dependent on light and balance but not on changing trends. Uneven hems and asymmetric cuts are her signature, as much as her pleating and origami-styled folds. Her palette combines colors in subtle ways, highlighted in items mixing burgundy with fuchsia or combining several shades of light green, enhanced by printed patterns. Her main focus is often reds, from geranium to cerise, with a secondary love of greens and blues from chartreuse and lime to lapis and turquoise. Han Feng keeps her customer at the forefront, always designing for the career woman who wants to be comfortable yet beautiful.

—Richard Martin; updated by Karen Raugust

FENN WRIGHT MANSON

British fashion house

Founded: by Trevor Wright, Colin Fenn, and Glynn Manson in London, 1974. Company History: American subsidiary formed in New York, 1977; Glynn Manson departed, 1984; acquired by Cygne Designs, 1994; branded UK unit sold to Colin Fenn, 1995. Company Addresses: Moray House, 23–31 Great Tichfield St., London W1P 7FE, England; 500 Seventh Avenue, New York, NY 10018, U.S.A. Company Website: www.fwm.co.uk or www.fennwrightmanson.com.

PUBLICATIONS

On FENN WRIGHT MANSON:

Articles

“Cygne Inks Deal to Buy Fenn Wright and Manson,” in DNR, 14 December 1993.

“Cygne Designs Buys Fenn Wright and Manson,” in WWD, 8 April 1994.

Green, Roy E., “Cygne Designs, Inc. Announces Record Fourth Quarter and Year-End Results,” in Business Wire, 14 April 1994.

“Cygne to Buy Hong Kong Intimate Apparel Maker,” in WWD, 5 August 1994.

Furman, Phyllis, “Apparel Maker’s Star Waxing with Purchase,” in Crain’s New York Business, 8 August 1994.

“Cygne Designs Inc. Agrees to Sell UK Subsidiary of its Fenn, Wright & Manson Unit,” in the Wall Street Journal, 30 March 1995.

“Cygne Sued by Holder on Fenn Buy,” in WWD, 20 December 1995.

“Cygne, Holders Settle Suit,” in WWD, 15 January 1997.

Alexander, Hilary, “Soft, Slinky and Back in Style,” available online at the Telegraph Network, www.portal.telegraph.co.uk, 2001.

* * *

The Fenn Wright Manson (FWM) Group was founded in 1974 by Trevor Wright, Colin Fenn, and Glynn Manson, as a British-based company operating from London. Initially, all sales were to the UK market, and production was wholly in Hong Kong. The company designs, manufactures, and sells both women’s and men’s clothing, with by far the largest part of the business generated through the women’s divisions.

An international market has been established since 1976, in which year the company also formed a buying office to oversee and control its production requirements in the Far East. The firm established its own American subsidiary in 1977, and began trading in the U.S. in 1978. The firm sells to the high-end department stores internationally, the better specialty chains, and independent specialty stores. Sales in the U.S. accounted for most of FWMs volume, and a large proportion of these sales were made through the operation of retail outlets, situated in outlet malls on the East Coast. The company also had a showroom at the Dallas Mart which operated only during show weeks.

Fenn Wright Manson womenswear draws on the themes of timeless classics, stylish and functional sportswear, and refined tailoring.

The combination of styles creates a feeling of warmth, comfort, and easy dressing. Collections in the 1990s featured longer lines, with softer tailoring, uncluttered shapes, and clean layers in soft and earthy colors: cream, mushroom, camel, tobacco, and chocolate. A variety of fabrics and knits include lambswool, angora, wool, cotton, as well as leather and Lycra. In addition, there were sandwashed silk shirts available in 30 different colors, and silk twill, as well as needlecord and cotton poplin shirts taking on the guise of the classic denim shirt, with top stitching detail and billow pockets.

The middle and later 1990s ushered in a host of problems for FWM. In April 1994 the firm was acquired by Cygne Designs, Inc., a producer of womenswear sold mostly to the Ann Taylor and Limited chains. Within months of the buy, Cygne bought GJM International Ltd., the Hong Kong-based intimate apparel manufacturer founded by Glynn Manson (who left FWM in 1984). It was an odd coupling of past and present, and Cygne executives believed the three firms represented all major segments of women’s apparel, from GJM’s lingerie to FWM’s sportswear and classic separates. The marriage of brands, however, was not a happy one; poor sales in womenswear in 1995, especially FWM’s mainstay silk, turned the union sour. Cygne spun off Fenn Wright Manson’s UK branded unit back to founder Colin Fenn, slashed jobs at FWM’s Hong Kong and U.S. divisions, and sold GJM to Warnaco in 1996.

Despite the corporate imbroglios, FWM survived and will always be known for its wearable fashion with an emphasis on quality and value. Its sweaters, silks, and sportswear are a hallmark of British fashion sensibility, and available not only from well known retailers Nicholsons and Gray & Osbourn, but from several new Fenn Wright Manson stores as well.

—Doreen Ehrlich; updated by Owen James

FÉRAUD, Louis

French designer, painter, and author

Born: Arles, France, 13 February 1920. Family: Married Zizi (Alice) Boivin, 1947 (divorced, 1963); married Mia Fonssagrièves, 1964 (divorced, 1972); children: Dominique (also known as Kiki). Military Service: Served as lieutenant in the French Resistance. Career: Opened first couture boutique in Cannes, 1955; moved to Paris, entered ready-to-wear, 1956; first menswear line launched, 1975; costumer designer for films and television; perfumes Justine, introduced, 1965, Corrida, 1975; Fantasque introduced (and later licensed to Avon Products), 1980, Fer (also licensed to Avon, but under the name Féraud pour Homme), 1982; Jour de Féraud/Vivage, introduced, 1984; sportswear line introduced, 1989; New York flagship store opened, 1990; accessories line introduced, 1992; retired, giving control of business to daughter Kiki and former wife Zizi, 1995; ready-to-wear division sold to Secon; remaining business units sold to Secon, 1999; Yvan Mispelaere hired as designer, 2000. Exhibitions: Exhibition of paintings in Paris, 1988, 1989, 1992, 1993, 1994, and in Japan, 1989; Gallery Urban, New York, 1990. Awards: Légion d’Honneur; Golden Thimble Award, 1984; Dé d’Or Award, 1978, 1984. Died: 28 December 1999, in Paris. Company Address: 88, Frabourg Saint-Honoré, 75008, Paris, France.

FENN WRIGHT MANSON

British fashion house

Founded: by Trevor Wright, Colin Fenn, and Glynn Manson in London, 1974. Company History: American subsidiary formed in New York, 1977; Glynn Manson departed, 1984; acquired by Cygne Designs, 1994; branded UK unit sold to Colin Fenn, 1995. Company Addresses: Moray House, 23–31 Great Tichfield St., London W1P 7FE, England; 500 Seventh Avenue, New York, NY 10018, U.S.A. Company Website: www.fwm.co.uk or www.fennwrightmanson.com.

PUBLICATIONS

On FENN WRIGHT MANSON:

Articles

“Cygne Inks Deal to Buy Fenn Wright and Manson,” in DNR, 14 December 1993.

“Cygne Designs Buys Fenn Wright and Manson,” in WWD, 8 April 1994.

Green, Roy E., “Cygne Designs, Inc. Announces Record Fourth Quarter and Year-End Results,” in Business Wire, 14 April 1994.

“Cygne to Buy Hong Kong Intimate Apparel Maker,” in WWD, 5 August 1994.

Furman, Phyllis, “Apparel Maker’s Star Waxing with Purchase,” in Crain’s New York Business, 8 August 1994.

“Cygne Designs Inc. Agrees to Sell UK Subsidiary of its Fenn, Wright & Manson Unit,” in the Wall Street Journal, 30 March 1995.

“Cygne Sued by Holder on Fenn Buy,” in WWD, 20 December 1995.

“Cygne, Holders Settle Suit,” in WWD, 15 January 1997.

Alexander, Hilary, “Soft, Slinky and Back in Style,” available online at the Telegraph Network, www.portal.telegraph.co.uk, 2001.

* * *

The Fenn Wright Manson (FWM) Group was founded in 1974 by Trevor Wright, Colin Fenn, and Glynn Manson, as a British-based company operating from London. Initially, all sales were to the UK market, and production was wholly in Hong Kong. The company designs, manufactures, and sells both women’s and men’s clothing, with by far the largest part of the business generated through the women’s divisions.

An international market has been established since 1976, in which year the company also formed a buying office to oversee and control its production requirements in the Far East. The firm established its own American subsidiary in 1977, and began trading in the U.S. in 1978. The firm sells to the high-end department stores internationally, the better specialty chains, and independent specialty stores. Sales in the U.S. accounted for most of FWMs volume, and a large proportion of these sales were made through the operation of retail outlets, situated in outlet malls on the East Coast. The company also had a showroom at the Dallas Mart which operated only during show weeks.

Fenn Wright Manson womenswear draws on the themes of timeless classics, stylish and functional sportswear, and refined tailoring.

The combination of styles creates a feeling of warmth, comfort, and easy dressing. Collections in the 1990s featured longer lines, with softer tailoring, uncluttered shapes, and clean layers in soft and earthy colors: cream, mushroom, camel, tobacco, and chocolate. A variety of fabrics and knits include lambswool, angora, wool, cotton, as well as leather and Lycra. In addition, there were sandwashed silk shirts available in 30 different colors, and silk twill, as well as needlecord and cotton poplin shirts taking on the guise of the classic denim shirt, with top stitching detail and billow pockets.

The middle and later 1990s ushered in a host of problems for FWM. In April 1994 the firm was acquired by Cygne Designs, Inc., a producer of womenswear sold mostly to the Ann Taylor and Limited chains. Within months of the buy, Cygne bought GJM International Ltd., the Hong Kong-based intimate apparel manufacturer founded by Glynn Manson (who left FWM in 1984). It was an odd coupling of past and present, and Cygne executives believed the three firms represented all major segments of women’s apparel, from GJM’s lingerie to FWM’s sportswear and classic separates. The marriage of brands, however, was not a happy one; poor sales in womenswear in 1995, especially FWM’s mainstay silk, turned the union sour. Cygne spun off Fenn Wright Manson’s UK branded unit back to founder Colin Fenn, slashed jobs at FWM’s Hong Kong and U.S. divisions, and sold GJM to Warnaco in 1996.

Despite the corporate imbroglios, FWM survived and will always be known for its wearable fashion with an emphasis on quality and value. Its sweaters, silks, and sportswear are a hallmark of British fashion sensibility, and available not only from well known retailers Nicholsons and Gray & Osbourn, but from several new Fenn Wright Manson stores as well.

—Doreen Ehrlich; updated by Owen James

FÉRAUD, Louis

French designer, painter, and author

Born: Arles, France, 13 February 1920. Family: Married Zizi (Alice) Boivin, 1947 (divorced, 1963); married Mia Fonssagrièves, 1964 (divorced, 1972); children: Dominique (also known as Kiki). Military Service: Served as lieutenant in the French Resistance. Career:

Opened first couture boutique in Cannes, 1955; moved to Paris, entered ready-to-wear, 1956; first menswear line launched, 1975; costumer designer for films and television; perfumes Justine, introduced, 1965, Corrida, 1975; Fantasque introduced (and later licensed to Avon Products), 1980, Fer (also licensed to Avon, but under the name Féraud pour Homme), 1982; Jour de Féraud/Vivage, introduced, 1984; sportswear line introduced, 1989; New York flagship store opened, 1990; accessories line introduced, 1992; retired, giving control of business to daughter Kiki and former wife Zizi, 1995; ready-to-wear division sold to Secon; remaining business units sold to Secon, 1999; Yvan Mispelaere hired as designer, 2000. Exhibitions: Exhibition of paintings in Paris, 1988, 1989, 1992, 1993, 1994, and in Japan, 1989; Gallery Urban, New York, 1990. Awards: Légion d’Honneur; Golden Thimble Award, 1984; Dé d’Or Award, 1978, 1984. Died: 28 December 1999, in Paris. Company Address: 88, Frabourg Saint-Honoré, 75008, Paris, France.

Louis Féraud, autumn/winter 1999–2000 haute couture collection. © AFP/CORBIS.

PUBLICATIONS

By FÉRAUD:

Books

- “L’été du pingouin (The Penguin’s Summer), Paris, 1978.
Louis Féraud, Paris, 1985.
Memoir, *L’hiver des fous (The Winter of Fools)*, Paris, 1986.

On FÉRAUD:

Articles

- Hunter, Catherine Ellis, “Avon Embraces the Designer Fragrance,” in Drug & Cosmetic Industry, September 1984.
“Louis Féraud l’atout coeur,” in L’Officiel (Paris), September 1984.
“Louis Féraud, mille facettes,” unpaginated feature in L’Officiel (Paris), September 1985.
“Louis Féraud: le chic,” in Vogue (New York), April 1986.

- Smithers, T. S., "Fast Times with Louis Féraud," in WWD, 20 October 1986.
- "Louis Féraud: pour fêter l'Espagne," in L'Officiel (Paris), March 1987.
- Guernsey, Diane, "The Other Féraud," in Town and Country (New York), October 1990.
- Petkanas, Christopher, "French Accents," in Harper's Bazaar (New York), February 1991.
- Bowles, Hamish, "Louis the Fun King," Harpers & Queen, December 1991.
- "Feraud, Bardot's Discoverer, Dies in Paris at Age of 79," in the Chicago Tribune, 28 December 1999.
- Riding, Alan, "Louis Feraud is Dead at 79; Prominent Fashion Designer," in the New York Times, 29 December 1999.
- Brady, James, "The Designer Who Loved Women," in Crain's New York Business, 10 January 2000.

* * *

It has been said of Louis Féraud that he was a man who loves women. Indeed, he described himself as "Louis Féraud who adores women, Louis Féraud who admires women." This devotion no doubt inspired the former French Resistance lieutenant to pursue a career in the rarefied worlds of French haute couture and ready-to-wear.

Féraud designed for a seductive woman who lived in harmony with life and herself, a woman looking for comfort and freedom. He was fascinated by the different personalities of women and how this inspired him to create different moods and themes. For women, he said, "Fashion is an opportunity to be chic, to conspire between reality and desire."

Féraud created glamorous, luxurious clothes at ready-to-wear prices; he also designed for couture. Among his celebrity clients were Joan Collins, for whom he designed some of the clothes worn in the television series Dynasty and Madame Mitterand, wife of the former French President. His collections were divided between the prêt-à-porter Louis Féraud Paris collections and the less expensive Louis Féraud set.

A strong team backed up the Féraud business, originally led by Féraud himself and consisting of nearly a dozen international designers, color specialists, and stylists who worked together to form what he described as a weather forecast that predicts trends. In addition to the suits and dresses for Dynasty, Féraud designed for the television series Dallas, for film, and for starlets Brigitte Bardot, Paulette Goddard, Kim Novak, Catherine Deneuve, Mireille Mathieu, and Sabina Anzema. Yet when asked if given the chance to design clothes for women from another era, and which era that would be, Féraud declared: "Tomorrow. I am often seriously asked what fashion will be doing next year. I am like an art medium for these people, who has the ability to look into the future."

Féraud listed painting as being amongst his passions; it inspired him to develop color in his work. "Colors are fantasies of light," he claimed. "However, all colors are diffused in black, memories of the sun, the indispensable, and the perfect that is beauty." He selected specific color ranges each season, but declared himself unaffected by fashion trends. "The only thing that we must know in our business is what doesn't exist as yet." Color specs were developed within the design team, which also created new ideas for fabric trims.

When asked how, out of the French Resistance in World War II, he emerged one of the leading fashion designers of the world, Féraud replied: "Fashion does not separate people but holds them together. One can also describe fashion as the meeting place out of love."

In the mid-1990s Féraud turned the business over to his daughter, Dominique (known as Kiki), and his former wife, Zizi, who had remained his partner after their divorce. Kiki, like her father, was a designer, though the younger Féraud favored more detailed and ornate designs than the elder. In 1997 the Féraud ready-to-wear division was sold to Dutch textile group Secon. Three years later, in the fall of 1999, Secon acquired the remaining Féraud assets. Louie Féraud, designer, painter, and author, died in December 1999 at the age of 79.

—Kevin Almond; updated by Nelly Rhodes

FÉRIER, M.

See BIANCHINI-FÉRIER

FERRAGAMO, Salvatore

Italian footwear designer

Born: Bonito, near Naples, Italy, June 1898; immigrated to the U.S., 1914. Family: Married Wanda Miletta, 1949; children: Fiamma (died, 1998), Giovanna, Ferruccio, Fulvia, Leonardo, Massimo. Career: Apprentice shoemaker, Bonito, 1907–12; with brothers, opened shoemaking and shoe repair shop, Santa Barbara, California and also created footwear for the American Film Company, 1914–23; relocated to Hollywood, 1923–27; returned to Italy, established business in Florence, from 1929; bankrupted in 1933; back in business by late 1930s; firm continued after this death, with each child overseeing a slice of the firm; Fiamma took over shoe designing and showed her first collection, 1961; built new stores in Beverly Hills, New York, Paris, Chicago, Las Vegas, San Francisco, 1995–2000; bought Emanuel Ungaro, 1996; first fragrance, Salvatore Ferragamo Pour Femme, 1998; Salvatore Ferragamo Pour Homme, 1999; redesigned SoHo store, 2001. Exhibitions: Salvatore Ferragamo 1898–1960 [retrospective], Palazzo Strozzi, Florence, 1985; The Art of the Shoe [retrospective], Los Angeles County Museum, 1992; established the Salvatore Ferragamo Museum, Florence, Italy, 1995. Awards: Neiman Marcus award, 1947; Footwear News Hall of Fame award, 1988 [Fiamma Ferragamo]. Died: 7 August 1960, in Fiumetto, Italy. Company Address: Salvatore Ferragamo SpA, Palazzo Feroni, Via Tornabuoni 2, 50123 Florence, Italy. Company Website: www.salvatoreferragamo.it.

PUBLICATIONS

By FERRAGAMO:

Books

Shoemaker of Dreams: The Autobiography of Salvatore Ferragamo, London, 1957.

- Smithers, T. S., "Fast Times with Louis Féraud," in WWD, 20 October 1986.
- "Louis Féraud: pour fêter l'Espagne," in L'Officiel (Paris), March 1987.
- Guernsey, Diane, "The Other Féraud," in Town and Country (New York), October 1990.
- Petkanas, Christopher, "French Accents," in Harper's Bazaar (New York), February 1991.
- Bowles, Hamish, "Louis the Fun King," Harpers & Queen, December 1991.
- "Feraud, Bardot's Discoverer, Dies in Paris at Age of 79," in the Chicago Tribune, 28 December 1999.
- Riding, Alan, "Louis Feraud is Dead at 79; Prominent Fashion Designer," in the New York Times, 29 December 1999.
- Brady, James, "The Designer Who Loved Women," in Crain's New York Business, 10 January 2000.

* * *

It has been said of Louis Féraud that he was a man who loves women. Indeed, he described himself as "Louis Féraud who adores women, Louis Féraud who admires women." This devotion no doubt inspired the former French Resistance lieutenant to pursue a career in the rarefied worlds of French haute couture and ready-to-wear.

Féraud designed for a seductive woman who lived in harmony with life and herself, a woman looking for comfort and freedom. He was fascinated by the different personalities of women and how this inspired him to create different moods and themes. For women, he said, "Fashion is an opportunity to be chic, to conspire between reality and desire."

Féraud created glamorous, luxurious clothes at ready-to-wear prices; he also designed for couture. Among his celebrity clients were Joan Collins, for whom he designed some of the clothes worn in the television series Dynasty and Madame Mitterand, wife of the former French President. His collections were divided between the prêt-à-porter Louis Féraud Paris collections and the less expensive Louis Féraud set.

A strong team backed up the Féraud business, originally led by Féraud himself and consisting of nearly a dozen international designers, color specialists, and stylists who worked together to form what he described as a weather forecast that predicts trends. In addition to the suits and dresses for Dynasty, Féraud designed for the television series Dallas, for film, and for starlets Brigitte Bardot, Paulette Goddard, Kim Novak, Catherine Deneuve, Mireille Mathieu, and Sabina Anzema. Yet when asked if given the chance to design clothes for women from another era, and which era that would be, Féraud declared: "Tomorrow. I am often seriously asked what fashion will be doing next year. I am like an art medium for these people, who has the ability to look into the future."

Féraud listed painting as being amongst his passions; it inspired him to develop color in his work. "Colors are fantasies of light," he claimed. "However, all colors are diffused in black, memories of the sun, the indispensable, and the perfect that is beauty." He selected specific color ranges each season, but declared himself unaffected by fashion trends. "The only thing that we must know in our business is what doesn't exist as yet." Color specs were developed within the design team, which also created new ideas for fabric trims.

When asked how, out of the French Resistance in World War II, he emerged one of the leading fashion designers of the world, Féraud replied: "Fashion does not separate people but holds them together. One can also describe fashion as the meeting place out of love."

In the mid-1990s Féraud turned the business over to his daughter, Dominique (known as Kiki), and his former wife, Zizi, who had remained his partner after their divorce. Kiki, like her father, was a designer, though the younger Féraud favored more detailed and ornate designs than the elder. In 1997 the Féraud ready-to-wear division was sold to Dutch textile group Secon. Three years later, in the fall of 1999, Secon acquired the remaining Féraud assets. Louie Féraud, designer, painter, and author, died in December 1999 at the age of 79.

—Kevin Almond; updated by Nelly Rhodes

FÉRIER, M.

See BIANCHINI-FÉRIER

FERRAGAMO, Salvatore

Italian footwear designer

Born: Bonito, near Naples, Italy, June 1898; immigrated to the U.S., 1914. Family: Married Wanda Miletta, 1949; children: Fiamma (died, 1998), Giovanna, Ferruccio, Fulvia, Leonardo, Massimo. Career: Apprentice shoemaker, Bonito, 1907–12; with brothers, opened shoemaking and shoe repair shop, Santa Barbara, California and also created footwear for the American Film Company, 1914–23; relocated to Hollywood, 1923–27; returned to Italy, established business in Florence, from 1929; bankrupted in 1933; back in business by late 1930s; firm continued after this death, with each child overseeing a slice of the firm; Fiamma took over shoe designing and showed her first collection, 1961; built new stores in Beverly Hills, New York, Paris, Chicago, Las Vegas, San Francisco, 1995–2000; bought Emanuel Ungaro, 1996; first fragrance, Salvatore Ferragamo Pour Femme, 1998; Salvatore Ferragamo Pour Homme, 1999; redesigned SoHo store, 2001. Exhibitions: Salvatore Ferragamo 1898–1960 [retrospective], Palazzo Strozzi, Florence, 1985; The Art of the Shoe [retrospective], Los Angeles County Museum, 1992; established the Salvatore Ferragamo Museum, Florence, Italy, 1995. Awards: Neiman Marcus award, 1947; Footwear News Hall of Fame award, 1988 [Fiamma Ferragamo]. Died: 7 August 1960, in Fiumetto, Italy. Company Address: Salvatore Ferragamo SpA, Palazzo Feroni, Via Tornabuoni 2, 50123 Florence, Italy. Company Website: www.salvatoreferragamo.it.

PUBLICATIONS

By FERRAGAMO:

Books

Shoemaker of Dreams: The Autobiography of Salvatore Ferragamo, London, 1957.

Salvatore Ferragamo, spring/summer 2001 ready-to-wear collection: leather ensemble. © Reuters NewMedia Inc./CORBIS.

On FERRAGAMO:

Books

- Swann, June, Shoes, London, 1982.
- Alfonsi, Maria-Vittoria, Leaders in Fashion: I grandi personaggi della moda, Bologna, 1983.
- Palazzo Strozzi, I protagonisti della moda: Salvatore Ferragamo (1898–1960) [exhibition catalogue], Florence, 1985.
- McDowell, Colin, Shoes: Fashion and Fantasy, New York, 1989.
- Almansi, Guido, et al., Salvatore Ferragamo, Milan, 1990.
- Ricci, Stefania, Edward Maeder, et al., eds., Salvatore Ferragamo: The Art of the Shoe, New York, 1992.
- Ricci, Stefania, Salvatore Ferragamo Museum, Milan, 1995.
- _____, Cinderella: The Shoe Rediscovered, Milan, 1998.
- Baudot, François, Ferragamo, New York & Paris, 2001.

Articles

- Infantino, Vivian, "Salvatore Ferragamo (1898–1960): A Retrospective," in Footwear News (New York), July 1985.
- "The Flourishing Fashions of the Ferragamo Family of Florence," in Vogue (Paris), October 1985.
- Harlow, Vanessa, "Sole Obsession," in the Observer (London), 27 September 1987.
- Morrison, Patricia, "Feet Were Ferragamo's World," in the Daily Telegraph (London), 2 November 1987.
- McDowell, Colin, "Wanda Ferragamo: A Woman of Destiny," in Women's Journal (London), December 1987.
- Hope, Emma, "Designed to Last," in Design (London), January 1988.
- "Salvatore Ferragamo: The Art of the Shoe, 1927–1960," in the Arts Review (London), 15 January 1988.
- McKenzie, Janet, "Shoemaker of Dreams," in Studio International (London), No. 1020, 1988.
- Horovitz, Bruce, "Well-heeled Controversy," in the Los Angeles Times, 24 April 1992.
- Stengel, Richard, "The Shoes of the Master," in Time, 4 May 1992.
- Baber, Bonnie, et al., "The Design Masters," in Footwear News, 17 April 1995.
- "Ferragamo Acquires the House of Ungaro," in WWD, 3 July 1996.
- Barret, Amy, "Ferragamo's Growth Tests Family Values," in the Wall Street Journal, 10 July 1997.
- Zargani, Luisa, "Fiamma Ferragamo Dies at 57," in WWD, 1 October 1998.
- "Fiamma Ferragamo," [obituary] in the Economist, 10 October 1998.
- Moin, David, "Reinvented Ferragamo Rides Luxe Boom," in WWD, 11 April 2000.
- Edelson, Sharon, "Ferragamo's New Attitude," in WWD, 25 May 2000.
- Moin, David, "Ferragamo, Refined," in WWD, 10 October 2001.

* * *

A master craftsman, Salvatore Ferragamo was known as one of the world's most innovative shoe designers, transforming the look and fit of the shoe. He broke away from conventional footwear designs, exploring not only innovative design, but also the technical structure of the shoe.

Ferragamo acquired the basic skills of shoe production while apprenticed to the local village cobbler in Bonito. Ambitious for success, he emigrated from his home town in Naples to America, where he studied mass production in shoe design. The years in the U.S. assisted him in fully understanding the technical procedures implemented in manufacturing his unique design. Owing to his excellent grounding in shoe design exploration and study, Ferragamo fully understood all the technical aspects of shoe production, the anatomy, and the balance of the foot. Eventually he set up in business in Santa Barbara, California, where his original, inventive designs caught the regard of many famous customers. Private commissions came from celebrities including Sophia Loren, Gloria Swanson, the Duchess of Windsor, and Audrey Hepburn.

Initially a designer and creator of handmade one-off shoes for individual customers, Ferragamo introduced the possibility of creating shoes that were exotic and beautiful, yet supportive to the foot and ankle. Function and comfort, together with an understanding of good design, were the essential elements behind his success. The Ferragamo name is synonymous with style, glamour, ingenuity, and quality. Ferragamo diverged from the restrictions of conventional shoe design and manufacture, exploring the realms of fantasy and creating footwear well advanced of contemporary classic designs. He produced shoes for every occasion; ankle boots, moccasins, laced shoes, Oxford brogues, stilettos, shoes for evening and daywear, including classic traditional styles.

Salvatore Ferragamo, spring/summer 2001 collection. © AP/Wide World Photos.

The shortage of leather and quality skins during the war years encouraged Ferragamo to explore new materials, continually searching beyond the realms of traditional materials for aesthetically attractive alternatives. Cork, crochet, crocheted cellophane, plaited raffia, rubber, fish skins, felt, and hemp were successful if unconventional alternatives. His designs were brilliant in concept and craftsmanship, creating many unique and outrageous styles. He was inspired by past fashions, cultures, Hollywood, oriental clothing and classical styling. He created over 20,000 styles in his lifetime and registered 350 patents, including oriental mules with a unique pointed toe, patented by Ferragamo at the end of the 1930s. From the late 1930s his amusing, ambitious, and extreme designs involved the use of perforated leathers, raffia checks, elasticated silk yarns, appliquéd motifs, needlepoint lace, sequined fabrics and patchwork.

In 1938 he launched the platform shoe which reemerged in varying forms ever since. His "invisible shoe," created in 1947, was produced with clear nylon uppers and a black suede heel and Ferragamo produced many variations on this design. His innate sense of color extended from traditional browns and beiges to vivid contrasting colors of ornate richness. The technical knowledge attained while developing new dyeing techniques assisted him in combining technical knowledge with his creative color flair.

In 1927 Ferragamo returned to Italy, setting up a workshop in Florence, a city which was to become the fashion center of Italy. He continued to produce custom-made shoes, many of his customers' individual lasts still being in existence today, maintained in collections in Feroni. Using modern production methods his made-to-measure shoes had quality, durability, and style. He was modern in his approach to design, taking advantage of new technology to improve his output, without jeopardizing standards. Through ambition and ingenuity his productivity and creativity improved greatly, leading to the industrialization of his work for mass production yet Ferragamo maintained high standards by overseeing all aspects of production. The mass produced shoes were manufactured under the label Ferrina Shoes, produced in England.

After his death in 1960 his family continued to the firm and in addition to producing quality shoes branched out into accessories and designer apparel. Wife Wanda ran the firm; daughter Fiamma, who had worked by her father's side from when she was a teenager, took over designing and producing the shoes; Giovanna initiated women's ready-to-wear; Ferruccio was at his mother's side and helped run the company; Fulvia handled all accessories bearing the firm's name; Leonardo oversaw marketing and introduced Ferragamo to Asia; Massimo headed the burgeoning North American operations. Despite its successful expansion, the Ferragamo name remains world renowned for its shoes. Fiamma's creations, as beautiful and unique as those of her father, are still the Ferragamo's principal selling point in boutiques in the U.S. and throughout Europe and the Far East.

In 1998 the Ferragamos were bowed by the loss of 57-year-old Fiamma after a lengthy battle with breast cancer. Widely credited with ensuring the family firm's future with her shoe designs, she claimed to have learned everything from her father. In an interview in Footwear News (17 April 1995), she discussed how far the family business had come since Salvatore's death. "I'm sure he would be very pleased, not only for the success, development, and growth of the company.... I think he would be very happy to see his dreams fulfilled, but also that we are keeping shoes the main part of his business."

The Ferragamo clan persevered after Fiamma's untimely death, a year in which they ventured into fragrance with the firm's first fragrance, Salvatore Ferragamo Pour Femme, in 1998 which was followed by a complementary male scent, Salvatore Ferragamo Pour Homme, in 1999. Several new flagship Ferragamo stores had also opened during the last several years in pivotal markets such as New York, Beverly Hills, Chicago, and Las Vegas.

The legacy of Salvatore Ferragamo is alive and well in Italy, and the rest of the world—where "Ferragamo" means innovation, beauty, and quality.

—Carol Mary Brown; updated by Owen James

FERRÉ, Gianfranco

Italian designer

Born: Legnano, Italy, 15 August 1944. Education: Graduated in architecture from Politecnico, Milan, 1969. Career: Freelance jewelry and accessory designer, Milan, 1969–73; designer, Baila, Milan, 1974; launched own label for womenwear with partner Franco Mattioli, Milan, 1978; introduced secondary Oaks by Ferré line, 1978; debut of menwear collection, 1982; fragrances introduced, 1984; watches, 1985; eyewear and bath line (men), 1986; launched haute couture collection, 1986–88; introduced furs, 1987; signed agreement with Marzotto for the Studio 000.1 by Ferré lines for men and women, 1987; named artistic director, House of Dior, 1989; feminine fragrance, Ferré by Ferré, 1991; introduced household linens collection, 1992; took 000.1 diffusion line to the U.S., 1995; Gieeffe bridge line and men's jeans collection debuted, 1996; Gieeffe unisex fragrance launched, 1996; women's jeans line introduced, 1997; opened two London stores and new HQ in Milan, 1998; firm sold to Gruppo Tonino Perna, 2000; began custom tailoring, 2000; opened first U.S. Ferré Jeans store, Miami, 2001; new atelier and Ferré couture collection, 2002; initial public offering planned, 2003. Exhibitions: Italian Re-Evolution, La Jolla Museum of Art, California, 1982; Intimate Architecture: Contemporary Clothing Design, Massachusetts Institute of Technology, Cambridge, 1982; Design Italian Society in the Eighties, La Jolla Museum of Contemporary Art, 1982; Creators of Italian Fashion 1920–80, Osaka and Tokyo, 1983; Il Genio Antipatico: Creatività e tecnologia della Moda Italiana 1951–1983 (The Unpleasant Genius: Creativity and Technology of Italian Fashion 1951–1983), Rome, 1984; Tartan: A Grand Celebration of the Tradition of Tartan, Fashion Institute of Technology, 1988; Momenti del design italiano nell'industria e nella moda, Seoul, 1990; Japonism in Fashion, National Museum of Modern Art, 1994. Awards: Tiberio d'Oro award, 1976; Best Stylist of the Year award by Asahi Shimbun and Women's Wear Daily, 1983; Modepreis for women's fashions, Monaco, 1985; Cutty Sark Men's Fashion award, New York, 1985; Medal of Civic Merit, Milan, 1985; named Commendatore dell'Ordine al Merito della Repubblica Italiana, 1986; Dé d'Or prize for first haute couture collection for Dior, 1989; named "Milanese of the Year" by the Famiglia Meneghina, 1989; I Grandi Protagonisti prize from the Italian Furs Association, 1990; Lorenzo il Magnifico award from the Medicane Academy, Florence, 1990; Occhio d'Oro prize, 1983, 1983/84, 1985, 1986/87, 1987/88, 1989; Il Fiorino d'Oro award, 1991; Pitti Immagine Uomo award, 1993. Address: Via della Spiga 19a, 20121 Milan, Italy.

Gianfranco Ferré, fall/winter 2001–02 collection: silver sequined top and mini skirt under a fur-trimmed leather coat. © AP/Wide World Photos.

PUBLICATIONS

By FERRÉ:

Books

Lettres à un jeune couturier, Paris, 1995.

Articles

"Le ragioni del sentimento," in L'Uomo Vogue (Milan), October 1987.

On FERRÉ:

Books

Mulassano, Adriana, I mass-modà: Fatti e personaggi dell'Italian Look, Florence, 1979.

Sartogo, Piero, ed., Italian Re-Evolution [exhibition catalogue], La Jolla, California, 1982.

Alfonsi, Maria-Vittoria, Leaders in Fashion: I grandi personaggi della moda, Bologna, 1983.

Giacomoni, Silvia, The Italian Look Reflected, Milan, 1984.

Soli, Pia, ed., Il genio antipatico [exhibition catalogue], Milan, 1984.

Perschetz, Lois, ed., W, The Designing Life, New York, 1987.

Aragno Giordani, ed., Moda Italia [exhibition catalogue], Milan, 1988.

Howell, Georgina, Sultans of Style: Thirty Years of Fashion and Passion 1960–90, London, 1990.

_____, In Vogue, London, 1992.

Ferri, Edgard, Ferré, Milan, 1995.

Stegemeyer, Anne, Who's Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.

Ferré, Giusi, Gianfranco Ferré: Itinerario, Milan, 1998, 1999.

Ferré, Giusi, and Samuele Mazza, Gianfranco Ferré, Corte Madera, CA, 1998.

Articles

- “The New Architectural Approach to Fashion,” in Vogue, June 1982.
 “Gianfranco Ferré: Expanding His Research,” in WWD, 5 April 1986.
 “Roma alta moda: Gianfranco Ferré,” in Vogue (Milan), September 1987.
 Smith, Liz, “Architect of New Classics,” in the Times (London), 8 December 1987.
 “Gianfranco Ferré: Dà alla donna forma e slancio,” in Vogue (Milan), January 1988.
 Howell, Georgina, “Gianfranco Ferré, the Nonconformist,” in Vogue, July 1988.
 “Ferré and Gigli, Architects of Modern Style,” in Elle (London), October 1988.
 “Gianfranco Ferré,” in Donna (Milan), March 1989.
 Menkes, Suzy, “The Italian Connection,” in the Sunday Express Magazine (London), 11 June 1989.
 Smith, Liz, “My Fair Ferré,” in the Times (London), 25 July 1989.
 Baudet, François, “Gianfranco Ferré,” in Vogue (Paris), August 1989.
 Menkes, Suzy, “Ferré Strikes Gold,” in the Illustrated London News (London), Autumn 1989.
 Kleers, Paul, “Ferré in Focus,” in GQ, March 1990.
 Mayle, Peter, “Ferré’s a Jolly Good Fellow,” in GQ, September 1990.
 Boriou, Gisella, “Gianfranco Ferré: I Am a Mix of Sensitivity and Concreteness,” in Donna, November 1990.
 Forden, Sara Gay, “Frankly Ferré,” in DNR, 21 June 1993.
 Aspesi, Natalia, “Le Donne di Ferre,” in Il Venerdì di Repubblica, April 1994.
 Carloni, Maria Vittoria, “Bello & Brutto: Lo Stile Secondo Ferré,” in Panorama, June 1994.
 Blanchard, Tamsin, “New-Look Dior Fails to Suit 1990s Woman,” in the Independent 11 October 1994.
 Forden, Sara Gay, “It’s Time (Italian Fashion Designer Gianfranco Ferré),” in DNR, 31 January 1995.
 Spindler, Amy M., “Armani and Ferré: A Study in Contrast, in the New York Times, 11 March 1995.
 Forden, Sara Gay, “Ferré’s New Jeans Line...,” in DNR, 17 July 1996.
 Socha, Miles, “Ferré Plans Multitiered Line of Men’s Accessories,” in DNR, 6 September 1996.
 “Ferré Sets Up U.S. Division, Names a Head,” in WWD, 5 June 1997.
 Forden, Sara Gay, “Gianfranco Ferré Joins Ranks of Designers with Itch for an IPO,” in WWD, 15 September 1997.
 “Gianfranco Ferré,” in WWD, 24 February 1998.
 Conti, Samantha, “Mattioli Sells Part of His Ferré Stake,” in WWD, 23 December 1999.
 —, “Ferré Tries His Hand at Sartorial Line,” in DNR, 22 March 2000.
 —, “GTP Acquires Ferré,” in WWD, 22 December 2000.
 “Ferré New Owners Consider Stock Listing,” in WWD, 15 March 2001.

*

Fashion is a reality connected with the changes of our society, of which it is an attentive interpreter. Artistic trends, new expressive languages, individualistic or mass behaviour and any other event which marks our society or determines its choices also determines trends or, at least, [change in] fashion. A fashion designer has to be an attentive interpreter of these events; has to be able to prophecy, without forgetting the realities of industry and commerce.

Gianfranco Ferré, fall/winter 2001–02 collection. © AP/Wide World Photos.

My role as a fashion designer comes from a complex process, where creativity and imagination play an important role, but are supported by a firm rational analysis.

—Gianfranco Ferré

* * *

Gianfranco Ferré has been dubbed by Women’s Wear Daily as the “Frank Lloyd Wright of Italian Fashion.” Trained initially as an architect, his work bears many references to this early discipline. He draws up a plan for each collection based on a philosophy that his customer wants functional, classic yet powerful clothes, constructed in the highest quality materials. The clothes are then created with a distinct eye for dramatic proportion and purity of line.

There is nothing understated about Ferré womenswear. His minimalist approach has often made opulent, theatrical statements on the catwalk, recalling the film star glamor projected by Anita Ekberg in the film La Dolce Vita. The clothes reflect a glamorous, fantasy dressing, combined with architectural symmetry. Ferré often exaggerates proportions in tailoring and dressmaking; classic shirt shapes often have extreme cuffs or collars, coats and jackets are defined by silhouette. An extravagant use of luxury fabrics like fur on dresses or long evening coats, leather, and taffeta often in the distinctive, stark colors of red, black, white or gold reinforce this definition of modern elegance.

Ferré menswear collections are less extravagant, based on tradition but designed with his characteristic modernist approach. He sees his customer as a man who appreciates traditional cloth and a classic line. Ferré has developed new tailoring techniques to create a more relaxed, expansive shape for men, a reaction to the hard-edged lines so prevalent in 1980s power dressing. Ferré often looks to London for inspiration, believing the British capital is a key point in the world of fashion. As he explained to journalist Liz Smith, "There is an in-bred eccentricity in London which allows clothes to be worn in original and completely modern proportions."

Ferré has a reputation for being a realist, with a practical approach to projects—working with everything in his head from market requirements, manufacturing schedules, financial limitations, and development of themes, to advertising. Brought up in a secure family environment, his mother instilled him with an obsessive sense of duty and responsibility; she was strict when it came to homework and passing exams. This level-headed approach even caused him to react with economic sense to Diana Vreeland's famous fashion quote, "Pink is the navy blue of India," made during the course of a conversation with Ferré. He replied judiciously, "Naturally pink is the navy blue of India because it's the cheapest of all dyes."

In 1989 Ferré was appointed designer for Dior, to supply the house with an image for the 1990s. His first collection introduced a refined, sober, and strict collection inspired by Cecil Beaton's black-and-white Ascot scene from the film My Fair Lady, a theme revisited in 1996 with the launch of a men's jeans collection. The new Ferré Jeans line, all in black and white, came in casual separates of three styles—basic, athletic, and beach wear. Ferré commented to Sara Gay Forden of the Daily News Record (17 July 1996), "This is not your standard, classic jeans line... This is a forward-looking collection for the future generation."

Ferré further forged ahead in 1996 with the debut of the Gieffeffe unisex fragrance, along with the Gieffeffe bridge collection priced to battle DKNY and Calvin Klein's CK for the hearts and dollars of hipster youth. The first Gieffeffe store opened as well, in Florence, Italy, with a second shop planned for Milan in 1997 and several more elsewhere in Europe. The Ferré Jeans line for women was also introduced in 1997, along with the formation of the Gianfranco Ferré USA to oversee the firm's increasing interests in America. Additionally, Ferré signed an agreement with Japanese conglomerate Mitzuno to open over a dozen shops in Japan, and to segue into producing golf apparel and equipment.

In 1998 the Ferré empire celebrated its 20th anniversary, considered going public, and tweaked its image. Stores in New York and Rome were renovated, two London shops opened, a new Milan headquarters was unveiled, and offices and showroom for its recently-created U.S. subsidiary opened on Fifth Avenue in New York. Yet the year proved far from jubilant when Ferré's longtime partner Franco Mattioli decided to retire and sell his 49-percent stake in the company. The news caused a contentious rift between the partners, and in 1999 Mattioli sold 21-percent of his holdings to Gruppo Tonino Perna (GTP), corporate parent of the IT Holding fashion group.

Gianfranco Ferré, after much negotiation, finally decided to sell all but 10-percent of the company bearing his name. Under the December 2000 agreement, GTP received 90-percent of the firm, and Ferré not only maintained creative control, but gained an atelier in Milan and a new couture line set to debut in 2002. The couture collection was a natural extension for Ferré, who had begun creating custom-made suits for a limited number of clients earlier in the year. Like Ferré a few years before them, the executives of GTP announced plans for an initial public offering scheduled for sometime in 2003.

Gianfranco Ferré is easily identifiable as an Italian designer; his clothes are well-shaped, confident, and powerfully feminine or masculine. Through his own label collections, he has developed such hallmarks as the crisp white shirt with stand-up collar or in his signature color, red. The Ferré product, whether it be prêt-à-porter or leather goods, glasses, furs, or shoes, has become synonymous with precision and elegance, an identity which he believes has greatly increased the cachet of "made in Italy."

—Kevin Almond; updated by Owen James

FERRETTI, Alberta

Italian designer

Born: Cattolica, Italy. Family: Two sons from an earlier marriage; companion, Giuseppe Campanella. Career: Opened own boutique at the age of 18, established the company Aeffe with her brother, Massimo Ferretti, opened Palazzo Viviani, a four-star hotel, 1994; signed fragrance deal with Proctor and Gamble, 2000. Address: Aeffe, Via delle Querce, 51, 47842 S. Giovanni In Marignano, Italy. Website: www.aeffe.com.

PUBLICATIONS

On FERRETTI:

Articles

- "Stepping Out: Ferretti at BG," in WWD, 17 September 1997.
- Castro, Peter, "Italian Dressing" in People, 26 January 1998.
- Sischy, Ingrid, "Ferretti-to-Wear," in Interview Magazine, October 1998.
- Schiros, Anne-Marie, "In Italy, Alluring Ideas Are Blossoming," in the New York Times, 5 March 1999.
- Lavin, Cheryl, "A Vision in White," in the Chicago Tribune, 16 May 1999.
- Tien, Ellen, "For Brides Who Stroll a Sandy Aisle," in the New York Times, 4 June 2000.
- "Whatever Gets You Through the Day and Night," in WWD, 10 October 2000.
- "Ferretti Signs with P&G," in WWD, 27 October 2000.
- Norwich, William, "The Latest Temptations of Uma," in the New York Times Magazine, Fall 2000.
- "The Philosophy of Philosophy," available online at www.philosophy.it, 6 June 2001.

the catwalk, recalling the film star glamor projected by Anita Ekberg in the film La Dolce Vita. The clothes reflect a glamorous, fantasy dressing, combined with architectural symmetry. Ferré often exaggerates proportions in tailoring and dressmaking; classic shirt shapes often have extreme cuffs or collars, coats and jackets are defined by silhouette. An extravagant use of luxury fabrics like fur on dresses or long evening coats, leather, and taffeta often in the distinctive, stark colors of red, black, white or gold reinforce this definition of modern elegance.

Ferré menswear collections are less extravagant, based on tradition but designed with his characteristic modernist approach. He sees his customer as a man who appreciates traditional cloth and a classic line. Ferré has developed new tailoring techniques to create a more relaxed, expansive shape for men, a reaction to the hard-edged lines so prevalent in 1980s power dressing. Ferré often looks to London for inspiration, believing the British capital is a key point in the world of fashion. As he explained to journalist Liz Smith, "There is an in-bred eccentricity in London which allows clothes to be worn in original and completely modern proportions."

Ferré has a reputation for being a realist, with a practical approach to projects—working with everything in his head from market requirements, manufacturing schedules, financial limitations, and development of themes, to advertising. Brought up in a secure family environment, his mother instilled him with an obsessive sense of duty and responsibility; she was strict when it came to homework and passing exams. This level-headed approach even caused him to react with economic sense to Diana Vreeland's famous fashion quote, "Pink is the navy blue of India," made during the course of a conversation with Ferré. He replied judiciously, "Naturally pink is the navy blue of India because it's the cheapest of all dyes."

In 1989 Ferré was appointed designer for Dior, to supply the house with an image for the 1990s. His first collection introduced a refined, sober, and strict collection inspired by Cecil Beaton's black-and-white Ascot scene from the film My Fair Lady, a theme revisited in 1996 with the launch of a men's jeans collection. The new Ferré Jeans line, all in black and white, came in casual separates of three styles—basic, athletic, and beach wear. Ferré commented to Sara Gay Forden of the Daily News Record (17 July 1996), "This is not your standard, classic jeans line... This is a forward-looking collection for the future generation."

Ferré further forged ahead in 1996 with the debut of the Gieffeffe unisex fragrance, along with the Gieffeffe bridge collection priced to battle DKNY and Calvin Klein's CK for the hearts and dollars of hipster youth. The first Gieffeffe store opened as well, in Florence, Italy, with a second shop planned for Milan in 1997 and several more elsewhere in Europe. The Ferré Jeans line for women was also introduced in 1997, along with the formation of the Gianfranco Ferré USA to oversee the firm's increasing interests in America. Additionally, Ferré signed an agreement with Japanese conglomerate Mitzuno to open over a dozen shops in Japan, and to segue into producing golf apparel and equipment.

In 1998 the Ferré empire celebrated its 20th anniversary, considered going public, and tweaked its image. Stores in New York and Rome were renovated, two London shops opened, a new Milan headquarters was unveiled, and offices and showroom for its recently-created U.S. subsidiary opened on Fifth Avenue in New York. Yet the year proved far from jubilant when Ferré's longtime partner Franco Mattioli decided to retire and sell his 49-percent stake in the company. The news caused a contentious rift between the partners, and in 1999 Mattioli sold 21-percent of his holdings to Gruppo Tonino Perna (GTP), corporate parent of the IT Holding fashion group.

Gianfranco Ferré, after much negotiation, finally decided to sell all but 10-percent of the company bearing his name. Under the December 2000 agreement, GTP received 90-percent of the firm, and Ferré not only maintained creative control, but gained an atelier in Milan and a new couture line set to debut in 2002. The couture collection was a natural extension for Ferré, who had begun creating custom-made suits for a limited number of clients earlier in the year. Like Ferré a few years before them, the executives of GTP announced plans for an initial public offering scheduled for sometime in 2003.

Gianfranco Ferré is easily identifiable as an Italian designer; his clothes are well-shaped, confident, and powerfully feminine or masculine. Through his own label collections, he has developed such hallmarks as the crisp white shirt with stand-up collar or in his signature color, red. The Ferré product, whether it be prêt-à-porter or leather goods, glasses, furs, or shoes, has become synonymous with precision and elegance, an identity which he believes has greatly increased the cachet of "made in Italy."

—Kevin Almond; updated by Owen James

FERRETTI, Alberta

Italian designer

Born: Cattolica, Italy. Family: Two sons from an earlier marriage; companion, Giuseppe Campanella. Career: Opened own boutique at the age of 18, established the company Aeffe with her brother, Massimo Ferretti, opened Palazzo Viviani, a four-star hotel, 1994; signed fragrance deal with Proctor and Gamble, 2000. Address: Aeffe, Via delle Querce, 51, 47842 S. Giovanni In Marignano, Italy. Website: www.aeffe.com.

PUBLICATIONS

On FERRETTI:

Articles

- "Stepping Out: Ferretti at BG," in WWD, 17 September 1997.
- Castro, Peter, "Italian Dressing" in People, 26 January 1998.
- Sischy, Ingrid, "Ferretti-to-Wear," in Interview Magazine, October 1998.
- Schiros, Anne-Marie, "In Italy, Alluring Ideas Are Blossoming," in the New York Times, 5 March 1999.
- Lavin, Cheryl, "A Vision in White," in the Chicago Tribune, 16 May 1999.
- Tien, Ellen, "For Brides Who Stroll a Sandy Aisle," in the New York Times, 4 June 2000.
- "Whatever Gets You Through the Day and Night," in WWD, 10 October 2000.
- "Ferretti Signs with P&G," in WWD, 27 October 2000.
- Norwich, William, "The Latest Temptations of Uma," in the New York Times Magazine, Fall 2000.
- "The Philosophy of Philosophy," available online at www.philosophy.it, 6 June 2001.

Alberta Ferretti, spring/summer 2002 ready-to-wear collection: chiffon dress. © AFP/CORBIS.

* * *

In the town of Montegridolfo, Italy, sits a 23-room castle 20 miles inland from the Adriatic Sea. It is here that designer Alberta Ferretti has tried her hand at the hotel business. She has turned this medieval structure into Palazzo Viviana, a modern four-star hotel that opened to the public in 1994. The castle exudes a medieval charm combined with a modern feel, the embodiment of which can also be found in Ferretti's clothing design. Soft, romantic allure, combined with clean, structured lines, impart a composed, subtly sexy feel to her work.

Growing up along the coast of the Adriatic Sea in the small hamlet of Cattolica, Italy, Ferretti spent her girlhood among a myriad of fabrics and clothing designs displayed throughout her mother's dress shop. Perhaps inspired by her mother's work, and certainly her surroundings, 18-year-old Ferretti dropped out of high school and opened her own boutique. Offering mainly other designers in the beginning, she went on to carry Versace, Krizia, and Armani clothing within a few years. The grand scale launch of her own design collection stemmed from an auspicious beginning. When a salesman entered Ferretti's boutique, he noticed some of her pieces hanging throughout the store. Commenting that the designs should be offered in more locations, he inadvertently started Ferretti down a more promising career path. By taking the sage advice of the salesman, the Ferretti name was officially launched into the design world.

Today, the apparel of Alberta Ferretti can be seen on several of Hollywood's comeliest personalities. Nicole Kidman, Uma Thurman, Julia Roberts, and Andie MacDowell are all subscribers of Ferretti's whimsical yet sleekly contrived raiments. People (October 1998) reported actress Andie MacDowell as saying, "Alberta's clothes are feminine, soft and romantic, but at the same time chic and elegant." With such a winning combination, Ferretti has come a long way in a short time. No longer the youthful entrepreneur of a small boutique, Alberta, together with her brother, Massimo Ferretti, now own the design company Aeffe.

Catering to the diversity of women's tastes and trends, Aeffe produces and distributes designwear not only of the Ferretti name but others as well, including Rifat Ozbek, Narciso Rodriguez, and Jean Paul Gaultier. Cheryl Lavin of Fashion Magazine (16 May 1999) said of Ferretti, "The Alberta Ferretti dress, a slim sheath with folded pleats, separated by rows of tucking, is as stylized as a column at the Parthenon." Ferretti's trademark, the little dress, has as many possibilities as a blank sheet of paper. Seizing an opportunity, she has succeeded in capturing everything from a soft allure or subtle romanticism to a quietly arousing feel in a continuously impressive array of proffered dresses. She seizes a feminine, womanly appeal without being too girlish in design.

Of Ferretti, the 10 October 2000 issue of Women's Wear Daily stated, "Softly, ever so softly, that's Alberta Ferretti's motto for spring. She showed full skirts, boxy jackets and simple belted knits, all in china blue, tan and tangerine, and let the colors speak for themselves. The shapes brought a hint of Courrèges classics to mind, while top stitching gave lightweight coats in suede and in cotton a quiet charm of their own... Ferretti didn't skimp on the filmy dresses she does so well...they came tucked, knotted, appliqued with flowers, decorated with tiny strips of fluttering chiffon or bands of ruffles, inset with sheer chiffon and layered." Season after season, Ferretti has managed to stay on top of the growing demand for something new, without losing her hallmark touch.

Anne-Marie Schiro of the New York Times (5 March 1999) also reported on Ferretti's dresses: "Pretty, rather than glamorous, is the word for Alberta Ferretti's evening dresses, in colors like rose, wine, yellow, cream or brown velvet forming geometric or mazelike patterns on tulle. With high waistlines and uneven hems, the clothes have a youthful femininity that was more ingenue than movie star.... She is one of the Italian designers who snuggle comfortably and tastefully into fashion's current decorative mood." Expanding upon her gown creations, Ferretti has also succeeded in the realm of matrimonial vogue. Ellen Tien of the New York Times, writing in June 2000 reported that "at Intermix, whimsical brides have all but bought out Alberta Ferretti's freeform white taffeta strapless dress with space-age silver bugle beads, square rhinestones and oversize white sequins."

Stressing individuality, one of Ferretti's successful clothing lines, "Philosophy," actually has an Alberta Ferretti philosophy to go with it: "You are you. Free in a world taking shape in harmony with the New Age. Universal symbols of Conscience, Peace, Love energize and transform the traditional concepts of Earth, Sex, Money. An interior being that must be immediately visible throughout the total style, from clothes to accessories to interior décor. Whoever encounters you must grasp your spirit on the spot. No mediation. Immediacy calls the shots; it sparks your personal uniqueness."

Alberta Ferretti, spring/summer 2001 ready-to-wear collection: from the "Philosophy" line. © Reuters NewMedia Inc./CORBIS.

Although Ferretti seems to have a definite flair for fashion, she also has an eye for business. According to Women's Wear Daily in October 2000, Ferretti will be launching a Ferretti fragrance line with the fragrance division of Proctor & Gamble. Capturing her own imagination and dreams, combined with dedication and hard work, Ferretti reached great heights from modest beginnings.

—Sandra Schroeder

FEZZA, Andrew

American designer

Born: New Haven, Connecticut, 1955. Education: Graduated from Boston College, 1976; traveled in Europe, summer, 1976; studied at the Fashion Institute of Technology, New York, 1976–77. Family: Married Marilyn Cousa, 1985; two children. Career: Assistant designer for womenswear, Schrader Sport, New York, 1977–78; freelance designer, selling to Camouflage and other New York

menswear stores, 1977–78; formed own company, Andrew Fezza Ltd., 1979; designer, Firma by Andrew Fezza for Gruppo GFT from 1986; designer, Andrew Fezza Company, joint venture with Gruppo GFT, from 1990; maintained Assets by Andrew Fezza boutique to 1991; launched leather collection, 1996; formed joint venture with George Weintraub & Sons, New York, 1997; signed license agreement with Supreme International for sportswear line, 1998; new licensing deal for neckware and belts with Aron Group, 2000; signed with Farash & Robbins for watches, 2001; also licenses hosiery, outerwear, other smaller accessories and produces tuxedos. Awards: Chrysler Stargazer award, 1981; Cutty Sark award, 1982, 1984, 1985; Coty American Fashion Critics award, 1984. Address: 300 Park Avenue, New York, NY 10022 USA. Website: www.andrewfezzatux.com.

PUBLICATIONS

On FEZZA:

Articles

- Buckley, Richard, "Andrew Fezza," in DNR, 27 December 1982.
 Fressola, Peter, "Andrew Fezza," in DNR, 25 November 1987.
 Trachtenberg, Jeffrey A., "Designers are Made as Well as Born," in Forbes, 11 July 1988.
 Morrisroe, Patricia, "Almost Famous: Turning Andrew Fezza into the 'American Armani,'" in New York, 24 October 1988.
 Sterne, H., "Fezza's New Point of Hue," in GQ, September 1989.
 "Something Wild," in GQ, July 1990.
 "What's Coming Up: Men's Style," in the New York Times Magazine, 29 December 1991.
 Parola, Robert, "Andrew Fezza," in DNR, 25 March 1992.
 Rubiner, Michael, and Patti O'Brien, "Out of the Shadows...Into the Night," in Rolling Stone, 29 October 1992.
 Aquino, John, and Thomas Iannaccone, "The Collections," in DNR, 28 January 1994.
 "Combos: Getting it Together," in DNR, 31 March 1994.
 "Assets by Andrew Fezza," in DNR, 13 July 1994.
 "New York Collections," in DNR, 10 February 1995.
 Walsh, Peter, and Catherine Salfino, "Sportscast," in DNR, 15 March 1995.
 MacIntosh, Jeanne, "State of the Union Ad-Dress," in DNR, 27 March 1995.
 Gellers, Stan, "The Suit Strikes Back," in DNR, 10 April 1995.
 ———, "Designers Put Muscle Behind Power Suits," in DNR, 27 April 1995.
 "Assets by Andrew Fezza," in DNR, 19 July 1995.
 "Knot Options," in DNR, 27 October 1995.
 Socha, Miles, "Sportscast," in DNR, 13 March 1996.
 Gellers, Stan, "Sartorial Suits Hit Executive Row," in DNR, 22 July 1996.
 ———, "Weintraub Gets Master License for Andrew Fezza," in DNR, 24 September 1997.
 ———, "Fezza Seeks to Fly in the Fast Lane...," in DNR, 10 December 1997.
 Marlow, Michael, "Licensing Drives Business at Vegas Show—Supreme Does Deals with Fezza...," in DNR, 23 February 1998.
 Gellers, Stan, "George Weintraub's Specialty Designers at a Price (Andrew Fezza)," in DNR, 16 December 1998.
 "Fezza Licenses Belts and Ties to Aron," in DNR, 30 June 2000.
 Askin, Ellen, "Licensing Deals," in DNR, 4 June 2001.

Alberta Ferretti, spring/summer 2001 ready-to-wear collection: from the "Philosophy" line. © Reuters NewMedia Inc./CORBIS.

Although Ferretti seems to have a definite flair for fashion, she also has an eye for business. According to Women's Wear Daily in October 2000, Ferretti will be launching a Ferretti fragrance line with the fragrance division of Proctor & Gamble. Capturing her own imagination and dreams, combined with dedication and hard work, Ferretti reached great heights from modest beginnings.

—Sandra Schroeder

FEZZA, Andrew

American designer

Born: New Haven, Connecticut, 1955. Education: Graduated from Boston College, 1976; traveled in Europe, summer, 1976; studied at the Fashion Institute of Technology, New York, 1976–77. Family: Married Marilyn Cousa, 1985; two children. Career: Assistant designer for womenswear, Schrader Sport, New York, 1977–78; freelance designer, selling to Camouflage and other New York

menswear stores, 1977–78; formed own company, Andrew Fezza Ltd., 1979; designer, Firma by Andrew Fezza for Gruppo GFT from 1986; designer, Andrew Fezza Company, joint venture with Gruppo GFT, from 1990; maintained Assets by Andrew Fezza boutique to 1991; launched leather collection, 1996; formed joint venture with George Weintraub & Sons, New York, 1997; signed license agreement with Supreme International for sportswear line, 1998; new licensing deal for neckware and belts with Aron Group, 2000; signed with Farash & Robbins for watches, 2001; also licenses hosiery, outerwear, other smaller accessories and produces tuxedos. Awards: Chrysler Stargazer award, 1981; Cutty Sark award, 1982, 1984, 1985; Coty American Fashion Critics award, 1984. Address: 300 Park Avenue, New York, NY 10022 USA. Website: www.andrewfezzatux.com.

PUBLICATIONS

On FEZZA:

Articles

- Buckley, Richard, "Andrew Fezza," in DNR, 27 December 1982.
 Fressola, Peter, "Andrew Fezza," in DNR, 25 November 1987.
 Trachtenberg, Jeffrey A., "Designers are Made as Well as Born," in Forbes, 11 July 1988.
 Morrisroe, Patricia, "Almost Famous: Turning Andrew Fezza into the 'American Armani,'" in New York, 24 October 1988.
 Sterne, H., "Fezza's New Point of Hue," in GQ, September 1989.
 "Something Wild," in GQ, July 1990.
 "What's Coming Up: Men's Style," in the New York Times Magazine, 29 December 1991.
 Parola, Robert, "Andrew Fezza," in DNR, 25 March 1992.
 Rubiner, Michael, and Patti O'Brien, "Out of the Shadows...Into the Night," in Rolling Stone, 29 October 1992.
 Aquino, John, and Thomas Iannaccone, "The Collections," in DNR, 28 January 1994.
 "Combos: Getting it Together," in DNR, 31 March 1994.
 "Assets by Andrew Fezza," in DNR, 13 July 1994.
 "New York Collections," in DNR, 10 February 1995.
 Walsh, Peter, and Catherine Salfino, "Sportscast," in DNR, 15 March 1995.
 MacIntosh, Jeanne, "State of the Union Ad-Dress," in DNR, 27 March 1995.
 Gellers, Stan, "The Suit Strikes Back," in DNR, 10 April 1995.
 ———, "Designers Put Muscle Behind Power Suits," in DNR, 27 April 1995.
 "Assets by Andrew Fezza," in DNR, 19 July 1995.
 "Knot Options," in DNR, 27 October 1995.
 Socha, Miles, "Sportscast," in DNR, 13 March 1996.
 Gellers, Stan, "Sartorial Suits Hit Executive Row," in DNR, 22 July 1996.
 ———, "Weintraub Gets Master License for Andrew Fezza," in DNR, 24 September 1997.
 ———, "Fezza Seeks to Fly in the Fast Lane...," in DNR, 10 December 1997.
 Marlow, Michael, "Licensing Drives Business at Vegas Show—Supreme Does Deals with Fezza...," in DNR, 23 February 1998.
 Gellers, Stan, "George Weintraub's Specialty Designers at a Price (Andrew Fezza)," in DNR, 16 December 1998.
 "Fezza Licenses Belts and Ties to Aron," in DNR, 30 June 2000.
 Askin, Ellen, "Licensing Deals," in DNR, 4 June 2001.

* * *

Andrew Fezza's designs are based around unchanging elements that have characterized his men's clothing throughout changing labels and businesses. Relaxed drape, soft silhouette in all garments, but never at a loss of proportion, are combined with an interest in unusual materials, whether in leather or fabric, luxurious richness in fabric more often associated with womenswear, and mellifluous color harmony in individual collections, always including neutrals and earthbound tones. Respect for American sportswear is challenged and complemented by a sensibility that is not provincially American or traditional, often with influences from Italy.

In such intensity of conviction and integrity of sensibility, Fezza is unusual in menswear (although he trained for and has designed womenswear, he is traditionally a menswear designer) and has inevitably been called an American Armani, so sincere and sustained are his design objectives. Menswear is seldom thought of as a profession for purists with distinct aesthetic marks, given the market-driven practicality of the field, but Fezza has flourished with an uncompromising crusade for male attire. He suffers, however, from the Armani characterization. So reminiscent is his style of the Milanese master that some have chosen, especially after he entered into production agreements in 1990 with Gruppo GFT, to call Fezza a "poor man's Armani."

Almost all advanced menswear designers in the 1990s were displacing collars, mutating jackets into longer and softer shapes, and watching the textile industry for both innovation and the most sumptuous materials. Similarly, Fezza created tailored clothing with the unconstructed effects of the Armani-inspired contemporary jacket, for casual living as well as the conventional office, but so have almost all other menswear designers of the past decade. But looking at Fezza's tuxedos, one is definitely reminded of Armani's style.

Fezza's aesthetic, however close at times to Armani's, is nonetheless his own. That he began in knitwear and leather, as Armani had some five or six years earlier, is partly a matter of how designers can get started in small-scale production and partly an example of parallelism, but not of derivativeness. Points of differentiation include Fezza's deep colors, consistent in his collections, his reliance on sportswear, and a keen sense of comfort for the American male body, large and athletic.

Fezza brings his own style to each achievement, beginning with his first sweaters, made freelance and delivered by hand to Camouflage when still working in womenswear at Schrader Sport, soon after graduating from the Fashion Institute of Technology in New York. Subsequently, his leathers, of which the Daily News Record wrote in 1981, "Andrew Fezza is a leather innovator. In his approach to color, silhouette, and texture, Fezza has consistently broadened the scope of American leather design, which is rapidly catching up with the European market," generated excitement and esteem for their directional colors, embossed treatments, and knowledgeable shapings; unconventional for leather, but not extreme.

Fezza likewise brought a lifetime interest in luxurious textiles and the traditional designs of textiles into menswear, often making a garment seem even softer and more costly by virtue of the fabric. Even his earliest collections, in the early 1980s, brought together linens, cotton, silk-wool blends, and knits with leather and suede. Arguably, Fezza brings elements of womenswear sensibility to menswear with such emphases as proportion and luxury in textiles. In such a characteristic, he indicated the great shift in menswear in the 1980s and 1990s.

Few menswear designers possess Fezza's unity and clarity of vision. Business shifts, which might have diverted or deflected most other designers in the big business climate of menswear, have not deterred him. In his second decade as a still-young designer, Fezza pursued the relaxed new look, acknowledging Europe but affirming America. When he says he entered the menswear business because he was uninspired when looking for clothing for himself, he anticipates some characteristics of his designs: so purposeful they are elegant, so unassuming they become the nonchalance of high style in menswear, and so luxuriously casual they fit the lifestyles of men in the 1980s, 1990s and beyond.

Fezza deliberately avoided, with one or two exceptions in the early 1980s (with some justice, Melissa Drier in Daily News Record attacked his spring 1984 collection as overworked), any of the excesses of menswear, with extraneous detailing or extreme proportions, but he insisted upon clothing with texture and an interest in color and shape. A 1983 press kit for Fezza reported, "Andrew's unique hand with fabric, shape, and color reflects a designing mind that is both thoughtful and provocative, without surrendering to fashion 'trends,' either here or in Europe. But from the beginning, Andrew Fezza's trademark has been his individuality." In this instance, a press kit is true. In the fixed and fascinating domain of menswear, Andrew Fezza has offered a highly consistent and individual aesthetic in the last decades of the 20th century, dressing such stars as Del Amitri guitarist Iain Harvie.

In the mid-1990s, Fezza joined Donna Karan, Joseph Abboud, and Ralph Lauren designing power suits for businessmen, as well as working in the sportswear segment, going so far as to hire Ceppos Consultants to represent him in his worldwide marketing efforts. He also designed specialty wear such as a wool houndstooth sport coat, and Perry Ellis International licensed the Andrew Fezza name for its line of sportswear in the 1990s, adding it to their already existing Perry Ellis and Mondo di Marco lines. In 1996 Fezza segued into leather, the next year he created the Andrew Fezza New York line of sportswear and dress shirts for sale in the U.S., Canada, and Mexico.

Fezza's nod to the 21st century is a website, in which the designer and his work are described. "During his almost twenty-year career as a menswear designer, Fezza has artfully combined a European sensibility toward style and quality with an unerring understanding of the active and casual lifestyles of the American sportswear customer. The sportswear and dress shirts reflect Andrew's unique talent, his recognizable way with color and fabric, and his ability to create complete, impactful collections. Without surrendering to trends, the designs convey a modern sensibility that stakes out its own distinctive territory in the marketplace." With all of his work throughout the last two-plus decades, Andrew Fezza has become synonymous with sophisticated yet affordable design.

—Richard Martin; updated by Daryl F. Mallett and Owen James

FIELDEN, David

British fashion designer

Career: Studied theatre design, then choreographer, Ballet Rambert, in France; choreographed for Ballet Theatre Contemporain; returned to London, specialized in fashion, concentrating on bridalwear and eveningwear. Address: 15 Lots Road, London SW10 0QD, UK.

* * *

Andrew Fezza's designs are based around unchanging elements that have characterized his men's clothing throughout changing labels and businesses. Relaxed drape, soft silhouette in all garments, but never at a loss of proportion, are combined with an interest in unusual materials, whether in leather or fabric, luxurious richness in fabric more often associated with womenswear, and mellifluous color harmony in individual collections, always including neutrals and earthbound tones. Respect for American sportswear is challenged and complemented by a sensibility that is not provincially American or traditional, often with influences from Italy.

In such intensity of conviction and integrity of sensibility, Fezza is unusual in menswear (although he trained for and has designed womenswear, he is traditionally a menswear designer) and has inevitably been called an American Armani, so sincere and sustained are his design objectives. Menswear is seldom thought of as a profession for purists with distinct aesthetic marks, given the market-driven practicality of the field, but Fezza has flourished with an uncompromising crusade for male attire. He suffers, however, from the Armani characterization. So reminiscent is his style of the Milanese master that some have chosen, especially after he entered into production agreements in 1990 with Gruppo GFT, to call Fezza a "poor man's Armani."

Almost all advanced menswear designers in the 1990s were displacing collars, mutating jackets into longer and softer shapes, and watching the textile industry for both innovation and the most sumptuous materials. Similarly, Fezza created tailored clothing with the unconstructed effects of the Armani-inspired contemporary jacket, for casual living as well as the conventional office, but so have almost all other menswear designers of the past decade. But looking at Fezza's tuxedos, one is definitely reminded of Armani's style.

Fezza's aesthetic, however close at times to Armani's, is nonetheless his own. That he began in knitwear and leather, as Armani had some five or six years earlier, is partly a matter of how designers can get started in small-scale production and partly an example of parallelism, but not of derivativeness. Points of differentiation include Fezza's deep colors, consistent in his collections, his reliance on sportswear, and a keen sense of comfort for the American male body, large and athletic.

Fezza brings his own style to each achievement, beginning with his first sweaters, made freelance and delivered by hand to Camouflage when still working in womenswear at Schrader Sport, soon after graduating from the Fashion Institute of Technology in New York. Subsequently, his leathers, of which the Daily News Record wrote in 1981, "Andrew Fezza is a leather innovator. In his approach to color, silhouette, and texture, Fezza has consistently broadened the scope of American leather design, which is rapidly catching up with the European market," generated excitement and esteem for their directional colors, embossed treatments, and knowledgeable shapings; unconventional for leather, but not extreme.

Fezza likewise brought a lifetime interest in luxurious textiles and the traditional designs of textiles into menswear, often making a garment seem even softer and more costly by virtue of the fabric. Even his earliest collections, in the early 1980s, brought together linens, cotton, silk-wool blends, and knits with leather and suede. Arguably, Fezza brings elements of womenswear sensibility to menswear with such emphases as proportion and luxury in textiles. In such a characteristic, he indicated the great shift in menswear in the 1980s and 1990s.

Few menswear designers possess Fezza's unity and clarity of vision. Business shifts, which might have diverted or deflected most other designers in the big business climate of menswear, have not deterred him. In his second decade as a still-young designer, Fezza pursued the relaxed new look, acknowledging Europe but affirming America. When he says he entered the menswear business because he was uninspired when looking for clothing for himself, he anticipates some characteristics of his designs: so purposeful they are elegant, so unassuming they become the nonchalance of high style in menswear, and so luxuriously casual they fit the lifestyles of men in the 1980s, 1990s and beyond.

Fezza deliberately avoided, with one or two exceptions in the early 1980s (with some justice, Melissa Drier in Daily News Record attacked his spring 1984 collection as overworked), any of the excesses of menswear, with extraneous detailing or extreme proportions, but he insisted upon clothing with texture and an interest in color and shape. A 1983 press kit for Fezza reported, "Andrew's unique hand with fabric, shape, and color reflects a designing mind that is both thoughtful and provocative, without surrendering to fashion 'trends,' either here or in Europe. But from the beginning, Andrew Fezza's trademark has been his individuality." In this instance, a press kit is true. In the fixed and fascinating domain of menswear, Andrew Fezza has offered a highly consistent and individual aesthetic in the last decades of the 20th century, dressing such stars as Del Amitri guitarist Iain Harvie.

In the mid-1990s, Fezza joined Donna Karan, Joseph Abboud, and Ralph Lauren designing power suits for businessmen, as well as working in the sportswear segment, going so far as to hire Ceppos Consultants to represent him in his worldwide marketing efforts. He also designed specialty wear such as a wool houndstooth sport coat, and Perry Ellis International licensed the Andrew Fezza name for its line of sportswear in the 1990s, adding it to their already existing Perry Ellis and Mondo di Marco lines. In 1996 Fezza segued into leather, the next year he created the Andrew Fezza New York line of sportswear and dress shirts for sale in the U.S., Canada, and Mexico.

Fezza's nod to the 21st century is a website, in which the designer and his work are described. "During his almost twenty-year career as a menswear designer, Fezza has artfully combined a European sensibility toward style and quality with an unerring understanding of the active and casual lifestyles of the American sportswear customer. The sportswear and dress shirts reflect Andrew's unique talent, his recognizable way with color and fabric, and his ability to create complete, impactful collections. Without surrendering to trends, the designs convey a modern sensibility that stakes out its own distinctive territory in the marketplace." With all of his work throughout the last two-plus decades, Andrew Fezza has become synonymous with sophisticated yet affordable design.

—Richard Martin; updated by Daryl F. Mallett and Owen James

FIELDEN, David

British fashion designer

Career: Studied theatre design, then choreographer, Ballet Rambert, in France; choreographed for Ballet Theatre Contemporain; returned to London, specialized in fashion, concentrating on bridalwear and eveningwear. Address: 15 Lots Road, London SW10 0QD, UK.

PUBLICATIONSOn FIELDEN:*Articles

"Fielden's Body English," in WWD, 12 June 1991.

Fallon, James, "British Waiting for the Rebound (Women's Clothing Industry Emerges Slowly from Recession)," in WWD, 16 February 1994.

"It's Show Time," in WWD, 23 February 1999.

* * *

David Fielden is a small British fashion company producing ladies' eveningwear and bridalwear, mainly ready-to-wear, although some pieces are made to measure. Fielden's designs are similar to those produced by Catherine Walker or Caroline Charles in London, but are perhaps less understated and sophisticated, more brash, bold, and glitzy.

Fielden uses a lot of traditional eveningwear fabrics in his collections, such as crêpe, velvet, chiffon, and georgette. Embroidered fabrics, fabrics using bugle beads, sequins, and fake stones are popular as is lace, especially imported from France. For a small company the collections are unusually large; the winter collection for 1993, for instance, contained over 130 pieces. This is advantageous from a selling point because many different themes and styles can be covered, catering to various different customers. Smart navy and white ballgowns head straight for Saks Fifth Avenue, while short, brightly colored halter neck dresses with net petticoats head for Italy.

Fielden built up a loyal band of followers when he had a shop on London's King's Road in the 1980s. After the shop closed, the clothes were sold through a number of distinctive stores throughout Britain such as Harrods in London, À La Mode, and Pollyanna with an international clientèle. Boutiques from Italy, Germany, the U.S., Hong Kong, and Saudi Arabia all place orders.

A typical Fielden customer is a woman who needs a large amount of occasion wear in her wardrobe. She is not particularly fashion-conscious but is involved in county or society events and an avid reader of society style bibles like Harper's & Queen and The Tatler. She probably aspires to buying a Valentino or an Yves Saint Laurent, but cannot quite afford it.

Fielden is often nominated for a glamour award by the British Fashion Council, acknowledging his undoubted contribution to this area of fashion. Popular styles include long, simple and elegant vest top dresses in velvet, enhanced by beaded belts; sharply tailored double-breasted coat dresses with satin lapels or velvet tuxedo-style jackets; short, sexy cocktail dresses with revealing back and side slits, and the romantic glamor evoked by embroidered, full-skirted, tulle and taffeta ball dresses with matching stoles. Fielden is also noted for the recurrent use of brightly colored satins in his eveningwear.

Fielden himself is the sole owner of his company. He oversees the production and design and is at the end of the day financially responsible. This is probably one reason why the company is so small and has not expanded into lucrative licensing areas like perfume and accessories. Fielden's decisions affect the entire business and a wrong move by him could close the company. Fielden has a definitive niche within British fashion, producing distinctive clothes that often compete with the best of Italian and French eveningwear. The irony is the clothes emerge from a culture that is still similar to a cottage industry. Teams of outworker specialists work on production, while the company itself is streamlined to be a small, cost effective unit. This is probably one of the strengths of British fashion and companies like David Fielden can acknowledge credit for this strength, from the 1980s through the remainder of the 20th century.

Fielden designs have continued to be classic, understated, and elegant. American buyers, too, became more aware of Fielden's eveningwear, some from visiting his London shop, others from viewing his collections, like the dresses shown in Milan in 1999. Though not as world-renowned as many designers, David Fielden may be the best-kept secret of British occasionwear.

—Kevin Almond; updated by Nelly Rhodes

FIORUCCI, Elio

Italian designer and manufacturer

Born: Milan, 10 June 1935. Career: Founder, Fiorucci shoes, Milan, 1962–67; director, Fiorucci fashion shop, Galleria Passerella, Milan, selling clothes by Ossie Clark, Zandra Rhodes, and others, from 1967; began wholesale production of jeans, fashion, and home accessories, 1970; founder, Fiorucci SpA, 1974, and Fiorucci Inc., New York, 1976; opened first American boutique, New York, 1976; founder, Technical Design School, Milan, 1977; opened boutiques in Boston and Los Angeles, 1978; opened stores throughout Europe, U.S., Japan, and Southeast Asia, from 1978; management of label ceded to Carrera, 1989; signed eyewear license with Swan International Optical, 1995; brand relaunched in U.S. with Bennini, Inc., 1997; contributor to Donna magazine, Milan. Exhibition: Italian Re-Evolution, La Jolla Museum of Art, California, 1982. Address: Fiorucci SpA, Galleria Passerella 2, 20122 Milan, Italy. Website: www.fiorucci.com.

PUBLICATIONSOn FIORUCCI:*Books

- Mulassano, Adriana, I Mass-modà: Fatti e Personaggi dell'Italian Look, Florence, 1979.
 Babitz, Eve, Fiorucci: The Book, Milan, 1980.
 Malossi, Giannino, Liberi Tutti: 20 Anni di Moda Spettacolo, Milan, 1987.
 Connikie, Yvonne, Fashions of a Decade: The 1960s, London, 1990.

Articles

- Neustatter, Angela, "Clown Prince," in the Guardian (London), 9 August 1978.
 Besemer, H. C., "Fiorucci," in Novum Gebrauchsgraphik (Munich), No. 7, 1981.
 Jones, Terry, "Mr. Fiorucci: 20 Years of Global Pollution," in I-D (London), September 1987.
 Mills, Simon, "Elio Fiorucci, 52, Comes of Age," in the Observer (London), 3 January 1988.
 Alden, Tim, "The Key to the Door," in Fashion Weekly (London), 19 May 1988.

PUBLICATIONSOn FIELDEN:*Articles

"Fielden's Body English," in WWD, 12 June 1991.

Fallon, James, "British Waiting for the Rebound (Women's Clothing Industry Emerges Slowly from Recession)," in WWD, 16 February 1994.

"It's Show Time," in WWD, 23 February 1999.

* * *

David Fielden is a small British fashion company producing ladies' eveningwear and bridalwear, mainly ready-to-wear, although some pieces are made to measure. Fielden's designs are similar to those produced by Catherine Walker or Caroline Charles in London, but are perhaps less understated and sophisticated, more brash, bold, and glitzy.

Fielden uses a lot of traditional eveningwear fabrics in his collections, such as crêpe, velvet, chiffon, and georgette. Embroidered fabrics, fabrics using bugle beads, sequins, and fake stones are popular as is lace, especially imported from France. For a small company the collections are unusually large; the winter collection for 1993, for instance, contained over 130 pieces. This is advantageous from a selling point because many different themes and styles can be covered, catering to various different customers. Smart navy and white ballgowns head straight for Saks Fifth Avenue, while short, brightly colored halter neck dresses with net petticoats head for Italy.

Fielden built up a loyal band of followers when he had a shop on London's King's Road in the 1980s. After the shop closed, the clothes were sold through a number of distinctive stores throughout Britain such as Harrods in London, À La Mode, and Pollyanna with an international clientèle. Boutiques from Italy, Germany, the U.S., Hong Kong, and Saudi Arabia all place orders.

A typical Fielden customer is a woman who needs a large amount of occasion wear in her wardrobe. She is not particularly fashion-conscious but is involved in county or society events and an avid reader of society style bibles like Harper's & Queen and The Tatler. She probably aspires to buying a Valentino or an Yves Saint Laurent, but cannot quite afford it.

Fielden is often nominated for a glamour award by the British Fashion Council, acknowledging his undoubted contribution to this area of fashion. Popular styles include long, simple and elegant vest top dresses in velvet, enhanced by beaded belts; sharply tailored double-breasted coat dresses with satin lapels or velvet tuxedo-style jackets; short, sexy cocktail dresses with revealing back and side slits, and the romantic glamor evoked by embroidered, full-skirted, tulle and taffeta ball dresses with matching stoles. Fielden is also noted for the recurrent use of brightly colored satins in his eveningwear.

Fielden himself is the sole owner of his company. He oversees the production and design and is at the end of the day financially responsible. This is probably one reason why the company is so small and has not expanded into lucrative licensing areas like perfume and accessories. Fielden's decisions affect the entire business and a wrong move by him could close the company. Fielden has a definitive niche within British fashion, producing distinctive clothes that often compete with the best of Italian and French eveningwear. The irony is the clothes emerge from a culture that is still similar to a cottage industry. Teams of outworker specialists work on production, while the company itself is streamlined to be a small, cost effective unit. This is probably one of the strengths of British fashion and companies like David Fielden can acknowledge credit for this strength, from the 1980s through the remainder of the 20th century.

Fielden designs have continued to be classic, understated, and elegant. American buyers, too, became more aware of Fielden's eveningwear, some from visiting his London shop, others from viewing his collections, like the dresses shown in Milan in 1999. Though not as world-renowned as many designers, David Fielden may be the best-kept secret of British occasionwear.

—Kevin Almond; updated by Nelly Rhodes

FIORUCCI, Elio

Italian designer and manufacturer

Born: Milan, 10 June 1935. Career: Founder, Fiorucci shoes, Milan, 1962–67; director, Fiorucci fashion shop, Galleria Passerella, Milan, selling clothes by Ossie Clark, Zandra Rhodes, and others, from 1967; began wholesale production of jeans, fashion, and home accessories, 1970; founder, Fiorucci SpA, 1974, and Fiorucci Inc., New York, 1976; opened first American boutique, New York, 1976; founder, Technical Design School, Milan, 1977; opened boutiques in Boston and Los Angeles, 1978; opened stores throughout Europe, U.S., Japan, and Southeast Asia, from 1978; management of label ceded to Carrera, 1989; signed eyewear license with Swan International Optical, 1995; brand relaunched in U.S. with Bennini, Inc., 1997; contributor to Donna magazine, Milan. Exhibition: Italian Re-Evolution, La Jolla Museum of Art, California, 1982. Address: Fiorucci SpA, Galleria Passerella 2, 20122 Milan, Italy. Website: www.fiorucci.com.

PUBLICATIONSOn FIORUCCI:*Books

- Mulassano, Adriana, I Mass-modà: Fatti e Personaggi dell'Italian Look, Florence, 1979.
 Babitz, Eve, Fiorucci: The Book, Milan, 1980.
 Malossi, Giannino, Liberi Tutti: 20 Anni di Moda Spettacolo, Milan, 1987.
 Connikie, Yvonne, Fashions of a Decade: The 1960s, London, 1990.

Articles

- Neustatter, Angela, "Clown Prince," in the Guardian (London), 9 August 1978.
 Besemer, H. C., "Fiorucci," in Novum Gebrauchsgraphik (Munich), No. 7, 1981.
 Jones, Terry, "Mr. Fiorucci: 20 Years of Global Pollution," in I-D (London), September 1987.
 Mills, Simon, "Elio Fiorucci, 52, Comes of Age," in the Observer (London), 3 January 1988.
 Alden, Tim, "The Key to the Door," in Fashion Weekly (London), 19 May 1988.

- Tredre, Roger, "Fiorucci: Going Places Again," in Fashion Weekly (London), 28 July 1988.
- Morozzi, Cristina, "Orfani di un Mito," in Moda (Milan), August/September 1988.
- "Carrera to Get Control of Fiorucci Biz," in the DNR, 14 April 1989.
- "Elio Fiorucci Jail Sentence is Suspended," in WWD, 23 January 1996.
- D'Innocenzo, Anne, "Cashing in on the 1970s Retro Rage," in WWD, 20 November 1997.
- Redecker, Cynthia, "Fiorucci's Foray into the Mall," in WWD, 29 April 1999.
- Cardona, Mercedes, "Fiorucci Dances Back onto Scene," in Advertising Age, 31 May 1999.
- Haber, Holly, and Rusty Williamson, "Seventies Brands Seeking a New Groove," in WWD, 24 June 1999.
- Johnston, Robert, "Fiorucci: Where Have They Gone?" in the Sunday Times (London), 19 September 1999.
- Kletter, Melanie, "Fiorucci's New Forays," in WWD, 6 July 2000.
- "Elio Fiorucci," available online at www.designboom.com, 6 June 2001.
- "Fiorucci is Coming to New York," available online at www.fiorucci.com, 6 June 2001.
- "Vogue: The Fashion Designer Database—Fiorucci, Elio," online at handbag.com, 6 June 2001.
- "Fashion Houses: Fiorucci," online at www.made-in-italy.com, 6 June 2001.

* * *

Visitors to Milan, Italy, during the late 1960s could not fail to notice a constant crowd trying to enter a narrow-fronted shop in the center of the city. The birth of Elio Fiorucci's boutique caused consternation among the elders and delight among their offspring. Those who traveled the European city circuit in pursuit of fashion and footwear inspiration now ensured that this was one retailer who could not be missed.

Visiting manufacturers and designers fought over the limited stock with local customers. Italy, the accepted home of stylish clothing, had seen nothing like it. It was Fiorucci, more than any other single entrepreneur of the time, who possibly created a worldwide market for the youth culture that first expressed itself in music, then in clothing. In the mid-1960s young people were creating and dictating the fashions they wanted to wear. The skill of Fiorucci, who had his finger on the pulse and brought it into reality, created the visual dreams and recognized the aspirations of this new and hitherto untapped market.

Fiorucci had inherited a shoe store from his father. In 1967, at the age of 32, he added miniskirts brought from what was then "swinging" London. Designs by Ossie Clark, Zandra Rhodes, and other young English talents soon followed, and the store was gradually enlarged to accommodate a vast range of assorted items. From this embryonic beginning grew a world-famous chain of boutiques, culminating in outlets in New York, Boston, Beverly Hills, Rio de Janeiro, Tokyo, Hong Kong, Zurich, and London. Conceived for the youth culture, the stores were constantly filled with new ideas and exciting styles. The atmosphere was unique and the presentation always witty and original. Shopping for clothes was suddenly a different and stimulating experience. The sales assistants were teenagers, too, who helped customers put together the latest looks in fashion clothing, accessories, and even makeup.

Fiorucci was a constant traveler, collecting ideas from around the world, including the original hippie woven bags from Morocco that became so synonymous with the spirit of flower power. A team of designers translated ideas, always seeming to capture the moment—recycling the themes of the 1950s with plastic shoes in riotous colors, fluorescent socks, or graffiti t-shirts. Possibly best remembered of all were the tightly cut, streamlined jeans, which established Fiorucci as a label in the marketplace for many years. At one time, they even replaced Levi's as the most desirable and fashionable shape of the moment.

After this huge success, however, the company fell on hard times in the late 1980s. By 1989 profits had fizzled, and Fiorucci filed for bankruptcy and handed over the management of the label to Carrera, an Italian sportswear manufacturer. Further troubles came when he and five others who had been on the board were accused of bankruptcy fraud and falsifying company reports, to which he pleaded guilty to avoid a long and expensive trial. He has maintained his innocence, however, and stated he was not in control of the company when the alleged abuses took place. Despite the difficulties, Fiorucci stayed involved with clothing design as the company's creative director.

The Fiorucci brand has changed hands multiple times, but was poised to make a comeback in the U.S. in the late 1990s. Bennini Inc., which operated the brand in the U.S., made several unsuccessful attempts to market the clothing through large department store chains and in mall outlets. The company then opened its own megastore on Broadway in New York City with approximately 20 percent of its clothing being Fiorucci, and the remainder coming from other designers.

The company's mark on Italy, on the other hand, has continued to be impressive. Its most popular store, a 1,600-square-meter building sprawled over three levels in Piazza San Babila in Milan opened in 1993 and claimed 7,000 customers daily, with more on holidays. A primary factor in the overwhelming traffic is Fiorucci's uncommon publicity campaigns, such as the 1995 live Wonderbra display or the 1999 live filming of an MTV show on the premises.

Elio Fiorucci, meanwhile, has tried his hand in communications since 1980, producing with Rizzoli USA the film New York Beat and in 1981 cofounding the magazine I-D (Instant Design).

One of the Fiorucci brand's greatest strengths and the reason for its place in fashion history was its ability to control all aspects of advertising, packaging, store design, and merchandising in a clever and original way. It should not be forgotten that Elio Fiorucci was the first to establish what has subsequently become an indispensable part of so many success stories, a Total Concept. His designs strike a balance between nostalgia and the future, transforming the ordinary into hot new fashions with just a few tweaks to the look. He is able to observe a group of teenagers, extract the latest trend, and emerge with a bestselling accessory or item of clothing in the price range of young buyers.

—Angela Pattison; updated by Carrie Snyder

FISHER, Donald and Doris

See THE GAP

FLETT, John

British designer

Born: 28 September 1963. Education: Received diploma in fashion, Worthing Polytechnic, West Sussex; graduated from St Martin's College of Art, 1985. Career: Formed own business, selling to Joseph Ettegui, London, and Bergdorf Goodman, New York, 1985–89; assistant designer, Claude Montana, Paris, and Enrico Coveri, Florence, 1989–91. Died: 18 January 1991, in Florence, Italy.

PUBLICATIONS

On FLETT:

Articles

- “Alright John?,” in the Sunday Express Magazine (London), 3 August 1986.
- “Flett in Business Split,” in Fashion Weekly (London), 16 February 1989.
- Obituary, “John Flett,” in the Daily Telegraph (London), 28 January 1991.
- “Style Victim,” in The Independent on Sunday (London), 3 February 1991.

* * *

The story of John Flett is a short and sad one; an extreme example of the good and bad aspects of the British fashion industry. Flett graduated in 1985 from St Martin's College of Art, London, in a blaze of glory. His first collection was bought by Joseph Ettegui for his Joseph shops in London and there was a prestigious order from Bergdorf Goodman in New York. By 1988 he was showing on the international catwalk at the British Designer Show, in company with John Galliano (a friend from St Martin's), Jasper Conran, and Betty Jackson. By 1989 money had run out and Flett parted company with his backer, Miles Gill. Short-lived positions followed, first as assistant to Claude Montana at Lanvin in Paris, then in the studio of the Enrico Coveri house in Florence, Italy. While at Coveri, Flett was approached by Zuccoli who proposed to sign him as their rainwear and knitwear designer, with the promise of his own label to come. Before signing, John Flett was found dead of a heart attack in his hotel room in Florence. He was but 27 years old.

Many of Flett's friends and contemporaries attributed his premature death to the strain of dealing with Britain's inadequate fashion system. Renowned for having the best fashion schools in the world, excellent breeding grounds for creative talent, British industry, at the ground level of production and mass market manufacture, is at a loss to know how to capitalize on this talent, employing merchandisers and selectors, who copy designs in the shops, rather than a designer to originate. As a result, many British fashion graduates have left to find work abroad. The Italian and French fashion industry are subsidized by governments who understand how to direct creativity towards financial gain.

Described as “wickedly talented” by Galliano, much of Flett's skill was in his cutting, intricate and inventive, with which he developed clothes that seemed to cling to the body. In fact, many of his garments were difficult to understand on the hanger and needed to be worn to be appreciated. Galliano declared that Flett could run up the “sexiest frocks in town,” but this seems to generalize his often complex and avant-garde approach.

In his critically successful autumn/winter 1988–89 show, Flett presented sophisticated, opulent fabrics cut into lean, elongated shapes. Another success was a white transparent pleat dress that seemed to coil itself around the body like an asymmetric floral display. He wanted to redefine the much abused fashion adjective “chic” to designate an updated modernity.

Flett was an avid socialite during his time in London and participated in the thriving avant-garde club scene. Contemporaries like the designers of Bodymap and performance artists Leigh Bowery and Trojan combined to create a flourishing atmosphere for designers, models, photographers, and artists to meet and relax, at their Thursday night club Taboo. Flett quickly gained a reputation as a wild boy who partied every night. He worked as hard as he played, however, recalled a friend who described his energy capacity as “enormous.”

In an interview with fashion journalist Sally Brampton, Galliano recalled how Flett seldom allowed his creative temperament to affect his sound business acumen. “He had a passion for the business side of fashion as well as the creative,” Galliano stated. This, perhaps, makes an even more tragic symbol of Flett, an original design talent whom fate and circumstances did not allow to realize his potential.

—Kevin Almond

FLUSSER, Alan

American designer

Education: Studied at the University of Pennsylvania, Fashion Institute of Technology, and Parsons School of Design, New York. Family: Married Marilese Flusser; children: Morgan, Kaitlin. Career: Head designer, Pierre Cardin Relax Sportwear (six years); designer, Van Heusen Company, New York; formed own company; hosiery line introduced 1980; women's sweater collection introduced, 1983; custom tailored collection introduced, 1985; East 52nd Street shop opened, New York, 1987; Wall Street shop opened, New York, and Washington, D.C., shop opened, 1989; company reorganized, sold to Copley of Canada, 1993. Awards: Coty American Fashion Critics award, 1983; Cutty Sark award.

PUBLICATIONS

By FLUSSER:

Books

- Making the Man, the Insider's Guide to Buying and Wearing Men's Clothes*, New York, 1981.
- Clothes and the Man: The Principles of Fine Men's Dress*, New York, 1985, 1987, 1989.
- Style and the Man*, New York, 1996.

FLETT, John

British designer

Born: 28 September 1963. Education: Received diploma in fashion, Worthing Polytechnic, West Sussex; graduated from St Martin's College of Art, 1985. Career: Formed own business, selling to Joseph Ettegui, London, and Bergdorf Goodman, New York, 1985–89; assistant designer, Claude Montana, Paris, and Enrico Coveri, Florence, 1989–91. Died: 18 January 1991, in Florence, Italy.

PUBLICATIONS

On FLETT:

Articles

- “Alright John?,” in the Sunday Express Magazine (London), 3 August 1986.
- “Flett in Business Split,” in Fashion Weekly (London), 16 February 1989.
- Obituary, “John Flett,” in the Daily Telegraph (London), 28 January 1991.
- “Style Victim,” in The Independent on Sunday (London), 3 February 1991.

* * *

The story of John Flett is a short and sad one; an extreme example of the good and bad aspects of the British fashion industry. Flett graduated in 1985 from St Martin's College of Art, London, in a blaze of glory. His first collection was bought by Joseph Ettegui for his Joseph shops in London and there was a prestigious order from Bergdorf Goodman in New York. By 1988 he was showing on the international catwalk at the British Designer Show, in company with John Galliano (a friend from St Martin's), Jasper Conran, and Betty Jackson. By 1989 money had run out and Flett parted company with his backer, Miles Gill. Short-lived positions followed, first as assistant to Claude Montana at Lanvin in Paris, then in the studio of the Enrico Coveri house in Florence, Italy. While at Coveri, Flett was approached by Zuccoli who proposed to sign him as their rainwear and knitwear designer, with the promise of his own label to come. Before signing, John Flett was found dead of a heart attack in his hotel room in Florence. He was but 27 years old.

Many of Flett's friends and contemporaries attributed his premature death to the strain of dealing with Britain's inadequate fashion system. Renowned for having the best fashion schools in the world, excellent breeding grounds for creative talent, British industry, at the ground level of production and mass market manufacture, is at a loss to know how to capitalize on this talent, employing merchandisers and selectors, who copy designs in the shops, rather than a designer to originate. As a result, many British fashion graduates have left to find work abroad. The Italian and French fashion industry are subsidized by governments who understand how to direct creativity towards financial gain.

Described as “wickedly talented” by Galliano, much of Flett's skill was in his cutting, intricate and inventive, with which he developed clothes that seemed to cling to the body. In fact, many of his garments were difficult to understand on the hanger and needed to be worn to be appreciated. Galliano declared that Flett could run up the “sexiest frocks in town,” but this seems to generalize his often complex and avant-garde approach.

In his critically successful autumn/winter 1988–89 show, Flett presented sophisticated, opulent fabrics cut into lean, elongated shapes. Another success was a white transparent pleat dress that seemed to coil itself around the body like an asymmetric floral display. He wanted to redefine the much abused fashion adjective “chic” to designate an updated modernity.

Flett was an avid socialite during his time in London and participated in the thriving avant-garde club scene. Contemporaries like the designers of Bodymap and performance artists Leigh Bowery and Trojan combined to create a flourishing atmosphere for designers, models, photographers, and artists to meet and relax, at their Thursday night club Taboo. Flett quickly gained a reputation as a wild boy who partied every night. He worked as hard as he played, however, recalled a friend who described his energy capacity as “enormous.”

In an interview with fashion journalist Sally Brampton, Galliano recalled how Flett seldom allowed his creative temperament to affect his sound business acumen. “He had a passion for the business side of fashion as well as the creative,” Galliano stated. This, perhaps, makes an even more tragic symbol of Flett, an original design talent whom fate and circumstances did not allow to realize his potential.

—Kevin Almond

FLUSSER, Alan

American designer

Education: Studied at the University of Pennsylvania, Fashion Institute of Technology, and Parsons School of Design, New York. Family: Married Marilese Flusser; children: Morgan, Kaitlin. Career: Head designer, Pierre Cardin Relax Sportwear (six years); designer, Van Heusen Company, New York; formed own company; hosiery line introduced 1980; women's sweater collection introduced, 1983; custom tailored collection introduced, 1985; East 52nd Street shop opened, New York, 1987; Wall Street shop opened, New York, and Washington, D.C., shop opened, 1989; company reorganized, sold to Copley of Canada, 1993. Awards: Coty American Fashion Critics award, 1983; Cutty Sark award.

PUBLICATIONS

By FLUSSER:

Books

- Making the Man, the Insider's Guide to Buying and Wearing Men's Clothes*, New York, 1981.
- Clothes and the Man: The Principles of Fine Men's Dress*, New York, 1985, 1987, 1989.
- Style and the Man*, New York, 1996.

Permanent Fashion: The Art of Fine Men's Dress, New York, forthcoming.

Articles

"Hints on Hats," in the New York Times Magazine, 16 September 1990.

On FLUSSER:

Articles

"Men Will Find a Fashion Coup at Penneys," in Chicago Tribune, 28 August 1985.

Boyer, G. Bruce, "The Compleat Outfitter," in Town and Country (New York), November 1989.

Sterba, James P., "Style: Father of the [ED] Look," in the Wall Street Journal (New York), 18 May 1990.

"Mr. Right: If He's Good-Looking, Elegantly Dressed and Socially Sensitive, He Must Be an Alan Flusser Man," in Chicago Tribune, 22 April 1992.

Levine, Lisbeth, "To Dress Well...Designer Alan Flusser [Says] Just Follow Some Basic Rules," in Chicago Tribune, 24 October 1996.

"At Home with: Alan Flusser, Where 'Bespoke' is Spoken Fluently," in the New York Times, 30 January 1997.

Swanson, James L., "Impeccable Fit Custom Tailored or Made to Measure: The Ultimate Suit Makes a Comeback," in Chicago Tribune, 12 September 1999.

* * *

There is a certain relaxed elegance about the way Alan Flusser designs and styles his tailored clothing. His sartorial skill is best known to those outside the fashion industry through his costuming work for Michael Douglas in the movie Wall Street. Flusser's Gordon Gekko dressed with the excessiveness of the 1980s. His wide, bead-striped single-breasted suits with peak lapels and turned-back roll-back cuffs showed that he was a man of style, yet not one to follow the rules. Shirts continued the look with bold, heavy, and wide stripes, extra long spread white collars, French cuffs, braces, and ties. To flaunt oneself in this fashion was pure arrogance, not unlike the character Douglas played (remember, Gekko was the originator of the tenet "greed is good").

The commonly known Flusser style, however, is a more understated elegance. His influences run the gamut from the Duke of Windsor to the glamorous gentlemen of film in the 1930s and 1940s—including Douglas Fairbanks Jr. and Cary Grant—and stemmed from Flusser's own father, a successful industrial realtor in northern New Jersey, who had suits custom made by Brooks Brothers and shoes and shirts made in London.

Flusser's career as a fashion influence started when he was still in college at the University of Pennsylvania in Philadelphia. He was following his father's lead, already having his clothing custom-made at Brooks Brothers, and friends, recognizing the style Flusser refers to as "relaxed elegance," would come to him for wardrobe advice. Advising his friends on what was appropriate was not enough for Flusser—he wanted to influence the direction of style and elegance as well.

The archetypal Flusser suit comes from his custom-made business. The environment of his shop is not unlike that of an old-world gentleman's club, and it is from there that the relaxed elegance is derived. A man coming in for a suit can choose between a ready-to-wear suit or one custom made to his size and specifications. It is the latter choice that allows Flusser to create what he is known for. The customer chooses a fabric from a finely edited group of swatches, followed by the style of the suit. Flusser generally tries to be on the scene, supervising and offering helpful suggestions, almost as if he were still advising his college friends.

Then begins the lengthy process of sewing and fitting the garment. More often than not, by the time a Flusser suit is finished, the customer has decided that he must also be fully outfitted with Flusser accoutrements. Flusser ties, shirts, braces, and pocket squares are as exquisitely made and as stylish as the suits they will accessorize.

It is unfortunate that Flusser's attempt to introduce a line of sportswear, in fall 1992, failed. The offerings included tweed sports coats and trousers, rich cashmere sweaters, roomy car coats, and field jackets worthy of any gentleman farmer. The styling of the collection evoked weekends at the country estate. A victim of the economic climate, it offered the wearer of Flusser's formal suits a more casual alternative.

A brush with bankruptcy in 1993 resulted in the consolidation of Flusser's three custom shops into one location at Saks Fifth Avenue in New York. Along with Copley Apparel of Canada, Flusser operates a wholesale men's business retailed in 50 stores in the United States. Several Japanese companies currently hold licenses to produce and market products under the Alan Flusser label.

Flusser continues to advocate for his traditionalist style. His designs were again in the public eye when he provided a wardrobe for television host Bob Costas during the 1992 and 1996 summer Olympics, and he regularly contributed a fashion column to Men's Health Magazine. The successful publication of several books of sartorial advice have firmly established Flusser as a respected authority on not only menswear but also on the civilized manner the man wearing the clothing must possess. The man wearing Flusser's traditionalist designs chooses much more than the cut of his collars and lapels, he chooses a lifestyle.

—Lisa Marsh; updated by Megan Stacy

FOGARTY, Anne

American designer

Born: Anne Whitney in Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania, 2 February 1919. Education: Attended Allegheny College, Meadville, Pennsylvania, 1936–37; studied drama at Carnegie Institute of Technology, Pittsburgh, 1937–38; studied design at East Hartman School of Design, 1939. Family: Married Thomas E. Fogarty, 1940 (divorced); married Richard Kollmar (widowed, 1971); married Wade O'Hara (divorced); children: Taf, Missy. Career: Worked as a fit model and copywriter in New York; designer for Sheila Lynn, New York; fashion stylist, Dorland International, New York, 1947–48; fashion designer, Youth Guild, New York, 1948–50, and with Margot Dresses Inc., New Permanent Fashion: The Art of Fine Men's Dress, New York, forthcoming.

Articles

"Hints on Hats," in the New York Times Magazine, 16 September 1990.

On FLUSSER:

Articles

"Men Will Find a Fashion Coup at Penneys," in Chicago Tribune, 28 August 1985.

Boyer, G. Bruce, "The Compleat Outfitter," in Town and Country (New York), November 1989.

Sterba, James P., "Style: Father of the [ED] Look," in the Wall Street Journal (New York), 18 May 1990.

"Mr. Right: If He's Good-Looking, Elegantly Dressed and Socially Sensitive, He Must Be an Alan Flusser Man," in Chicago Tribune, 22 April 1992.

Levine, Lisbeth, "To Dress Well...Designer Alan Flusser [Says] Just Follow Some Basic Rules," in Chicago Tribune, 24 October 1996.

"At Home with: Alan Flusser, Where 'Bespoke' is Spoken Fluently," in the New York Times, 30 January 1997.

Swanson, James L., "Impeccable Fit Custom Tailored or Made to Measure: The Ultimate Suit Makes a Comeback," in Chicago Tribune, 12 September 1999.

* * *

There is a certain relaxed elegance about the way Alan Flusser designs and styles his tailored clothing. His sartorial skill is best known to those outside the fashion industry through his costuming work for Michael Douglas in the movie Wall Street. Flusser's Gordon Gekko dressed with the excessiveness of the 1980s. His wide, bead-striped single-breasted suits with peak lapels and turned-back roll-back cuffs showed that he was a man of style, yet not one to follow the rules. Shirts continued the look with bold, heavy, and wide stripes, extra long spread white collars, French cuffs, braces, and ties. To flaunt oneself in this fashion was pure arrogance, not unlike the character Douglas played (remember, Gekko was the originator of the tenet "greed is good").

The commonly known Flusser style, however, is a more understated elegance. His influences run the gamut from the Duke of Windsor to the glamorous gentlemen of film in the 1930s and 1940s—including Douglas Fairbanks Jr. and Cary Grant—and stemmed from Flusser's own father, a successful industrial realtor in northern New Jersey, who had suits custom made by Brooks Brothers and shoes and shirts made in London.

Flusser's career as a fashion influence started when he was still in college at the University of Pennsylvania in Philadelphia. He was following his father's lead, already having his clothing custom-made at Brooks Brothers, and friends, recognizing the style Flusser refers to as "relaxed elegance," would come to him for wardrobe advice. Advising his friends on what was appropriate was not enough for Flusser—he wanted to influence the direction of style and elegance as well.

The archetypal Flusser suit comes from his custom-made business. The environment of his shop is not unlike that of an old-world gentleman's club, and it is from there that the relaxed elegance is derived. A man coming in for a suit can choose between a ready-to-wear suit or one custom made to his size and specifications. It is the latter choice that allows Flusser to create what he is known for. The customer chooses a fabric from a finely edited group of swatches, followed by the style of the suit. Flusser generally tries to be on the scene, supervising and offering helpful suggestions, almost as if he were still advising his college friends.

Then begins the lengthy process of sewing and fitting the garment. More often than not, by the time a Flusser suit is finished, the customer has decided that he must also be fully outfitted with Flusser accoutrements. Flusser ties, shirts, braces, and pocket squares are as exquisitely made and as stylish as the suits they will accessorize.

It is unfortunate that Flusser's attempt to introduce a line of sportswear, in fall 1992, failed. The offerings included tweed sports coats and trousers, rich cashmere sweaters, roomy car coats, and field jackets worthy of any gentleman farmer. The styling of the collection evoked weekends at the country estate. A victim of the economic climate, it offered the wearer of Flusser's formal suits a more casual alternative.

A brush with bankruptcy in 1993 resulted in the consolidation of Flusser's three custom shops into one location at Saks Fifth Avenue in New York. Along with Copley Apparel of Canada, Flusser operates a wholesale men's business retailed in 50 stores in the United States. Several Japanese companies currently hold licenses to produce and market products under the Alan Flusser label.

Flusser continues to advocate for his traditionalist style. His designs were again in the public eye when he provided a wardrobe for television host Bob Costas during the 1992 and 1996 summer Olympics, and he regularly contributed a fashion column to Men's Health Magazine. The successful publication of several books of sartorial advice have firmly established Flusser as a respected authority on not only menswear but also on the civilized manner the man wearing the clothing must possess. The man wearing Flusser's traditionalist designs chooses much more than the cut of his collars and lapels, he chooses a lifestyle.

—Lisa Marsh; updated by Megan Stacy

FOGARTY, Anne

American designer

Born: Anne Whitney in Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania, 2 February 1919. Education: Attended Allegheny College, Meadville, Pennsylvania, 1936–37; studied drama at Carnegie Institute of Technology, Pittsburgh, 1937–38; studied design at East Hartman School of Design, 1939. Family: Married Thomas E. Fogarty, 1940 (divorced); married Richard Kollmar (widowed, 1971); married Wade O'Hara (divorced); children: Taf, Missy. Career: Worked as a fit model and copywriter in New York; designer for Sheila Lynn, New York; fashion stylist, Dorland International, New York, 1947–48; fashion designer, Youth Guild, New York, 1948–50, and with Margot Dresses Inc., New Anne Fogarty, spring 1967: linen culotte ensemble. © AP/Wide World Photos.

York, 1950–57; designer, Saks Fifth Avenue, 1957–62; managed own business, Anne Fogarty, Inc., New York, 1962–74; lines included Anne Fogarty Boutique, Clothes Circuit, Collector's Items; closed business, circa 1974; freelance designer to 1980; final collection designed for Shariella Fashion, 1980. Awards: Coty American Fashion Critics award, 1951; Neiman Marcus award, 1952; Philadelphia Fashion Group citation, 1953; International Silk Association award, 1955; National Cotton Fashion award, 1957. Died: 15 January 1980, in New York.

PUBLICATIONS

By FOGARTY:

Books

Wife Dressing: The Fine Art of Being a Well-Dressed Wife, New York, 1959.

On FOGARTY:

Books

Williams, Beryl, Young Faces in Fashion, Philadelphia, 1956.

Roshco, Bernard, The Rag Race, New York, 1963.

Milbank, Caroline Rennolds, New York Fashion: The Evolution of American Style, New York, 1989.

Stegemeyer, Anne, Who's Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.

Articles

"Fogarty Was Ahead of Dior," in Life, 31 August 1953.

"Anne Fogarty," in Current Biography (New York), October 1958.

"Anne Fogarty," [obituary] in the New York Times, 16 January 1980.

"Anne Fogarty," [obituary] in Current Biography (New York), March 1980.

Buck, Genevieve, "All Dressed Up and a Place to Go: Film Cos- tumer's Lincoln Avenue Store Brings Back a Trendy Time," in Chicago Tribune, 15 December 1994.

* * *

Anne Whitney Fogarty designed the American look, creating clothes that were youthful, simple and stylish. Although Fogarty studied drama at the Carnegie Institute of Technology in Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania, her real love was for the costumes she wore. Moving to New York she worked as a fitting-model for Harvey Berin while looking for acting parts. When she received an acting job, Berin encouraged her to think about becoming a stylist instead, and in 1948 Fogarty began designing clothes for the Youth Guild. Youth Guild's market was teenagers, who were perfect for the narrow waist and full skirts of the "New Look," a style Fogarty used.

In 1950 Fogarty began designing junior-sized clothing for Margot, Inc. She still favored the "paper-doll" silhouette for both day and evening wear, with its full skirt, narrow waist, and fitted bodice. To help create the shape, she adopted the idea of crinoline skirts from the Edwardian age. These stiffened petticoats made of nylon net, frilled or trimmed in lace, helped hold out the skirt and Fogarty encouraged wearing two at a time to enhance the silhouette. She herself had an 18-inch waist.

Fogarty wrote a book called Wife Dressing in 1959, a guide for "the fine art of being a well-dressed wife with provocative notes for the patient husband who pays the bills." In the book she recognized that women led varied lives working, as students, wives, and mothers, and encouraged women to find their own style and color—recommending an understated, natural look that did not slavishly follow the fashion of the day.

Fogarty continued to design for Margot, Inc., and eventually for Saks Fifth Avenue. In 1962 she opened her own business, Anne Fogarty, Inc., and added misses' sizes to her line of clothes. Although she began with full skirts, and fitted bodices, she adapted her designs to suit the times. After the paper-doll silhouette came the tea cozy dress in which the full skirt fell from a dropped, rather than natural waist. She used a narrow silhouette without fullness, the Empire line, with its emphasis on the bust line, and she introduced the "camise," a chemise which fell from a high yoke. Fogarty designed separates and long dresses, quilted skirts over hot pants, and mini skirts. She produced designs in a peasant style, blouses with ruffles, long skirts with ruffled hems, and ethnic styling. Whatever the silhouette or fashion type, her interpretation was youthful, with details like puffed sleeves and round collars.

Fogarty produced different design collections under the names of A.F. Boutique, Clothes Circuit, and Collector's Items. In 1950 she was selected as one of the Young Women of the Year by Mademoiselle magazine. In 1951 she received a Coty award for dresses and in 1952 the Neiman Marcus award.

Anne Fogarty, fall 1964 collection: wool dress with a satin pull-through bow under a raccoon fur cape coat. © AP/Wide World Photos.

Although she closed her own business in the 1970s, Fogarty continued to design. She finished a collection for Shariella Fashion in 1981, just months before her death in January 1981. During her career Fogarty worked with a variety of silhouettes and fabrics, in a broad range of sizes. She was a prolific designer who was able to adjust to a changing market, responding with designs that typified the all-American look.

—Nancy House

FOLEY, Brigid

British knitwear designer

Born: Yorkshire, England, 9 December 1948. Education: Studied at Sheffield College of Art, 1967–68; Nottingham College of Art, BA with Honors, Fashion and Design, 1968–71. Family: Married Kevin Keegan, photographer, 1973; children: Shelley, Peter, Jennifer. Career: While at art college began knitting and supplying shops with own designs; part-time lecturer, Plymouth College of Art, specializing in knitwear, 1971; designed, manufactured, and supplied shops with knitwear; joined Carr Jones designer group, London, 1973; first showed at London collections, 1975; went on to exhibit at international prêt-à-porter shows, including Milan, Paris, New York; introduced first hand-knits into collection, 1980; first Brigid Foley shop opened, Tavistock, Devon, 1991; second shop opened, Exeter, 1994. Address: Greenway, Harrowbeer Lane, Yelverton PL20 6DY, Devon, England.

*

I like women to look elegant and feminine. From classic simple shapes, my clothes are often adorned in some way to make them special for the woman who wears them. One of my specialities is luxurious handknitted sweaters and jackets. Texture and colour play a large part in the intricate hand embroidery applied. My work has a typically English look about it, many of my designs are inspired from nature—flowers, wildlife, poppy fields, the Devon countryside where I live and work in. Other sources of inspiration are paintings, tapestries and Persian carpets.

I chose knitwear as my medium because it is such a challenge, creating the entire article deciding on the colours, the texture, the weight and softness of the fibres, choosing the embroidery threads, seeing the sweater or jacket emerge stage by stage, after such a lot of painstaking handwork. I take great pride in endeavouring to reproduce each design as closely to the original as possible. I am very proud of the people who work for me—such skill, patience and dedication.

Fashion today is gloriously diverse with no direct style imposed; such a variety of shapes, lengths, colours are available. Women can choose a style for themselves. Of my designs I would say they are classic, timeless, wearable, comfortable and appealing. I like to think they are clothes to enjoy and treasure.

—Brigid Foley

* * *

Brigid Foley's first designs were mainly for sweaters for a young age group. She experimented with knitting machines, mixing geometric patterns with stripes and plains. After joining the Carr Jones designer group in 1973, a more feminine style emerged, with calf-length flowing skirts, fitted to the hips and swirling around the hemline with inset panels of different texture or color matched to sweaters with soft cowl necklines, and accompanied by plaited knitted belts in tones of the suit. These suits were among the first of their kind, attractive, feminine, comfortable, and easy to wear.

In 1975 Foley was invited to join the London Collections and exhibited at the London fashion shows each season, building on her growing success by exhibiting later at the Paris Prêt-à-Porter, and in New York, Dusseldorf, and Copenhagen. The colors of the collections at this time were mainly soft, and often marled as several different fine yarns would be used through the machine at once. A distinctive feature was the gored skirt, where the swing of the skirt was emphasized by the different shades used in the gores. The ranges varied from heavier, sometimes tweedier suits for autumn, fine knits with a sheen and hints of gold for cocktail wear, and fine lacy knits for the spring. Commenting on her work, Foley explained, "fully fashioned knitwear is a very exciting medium. You start with nothing but was selected as one of the Young Women of the Year by Mademoiselle magazine. In 1951 she received a Coty award for dresses and in 1952 the Neiman Marcus award.

Anne Fogarty, fall 1964 collection: wool dress with a satin pull-through bow under a raccoon fur cape coat. © AP/Wide World Photos.

Although she closed her own business in the 1970s, Fogarty continued to design. She finished a collection for Shariella Fashion in 1981, just months before her death in January 1981. During her career Fogarty worked with a variety of silhouettes and fabrics, in a broad range of sizes. She was a prolific designer who was able to adjust to a changing market, responding with designs that typified the all-American look.

—Nancy House

FOLEY, Brigid

British knitwear designer

Born: Yorkshire, England, 9 December 1948. Education: Studied at Sheffield College of Art, 1967–68; Nottingham College of Art, BA with Honors, Fashion and Design, 1968–71. Family: Married Kevin Keegan, photographer, 1973; children: Shelley, Peter, Jennifer. Career: While at art college began knitting and supplying shops with own designs; part-time lecturer, Plymouth College of Art, specializing in knitwear, 1971; designed, manufactured, and supplied shops with knitwear; joined Carr Jones designer group, London, 1973; first showed at London collections, 1975; went on to exhibit at international prêt-à-porter shows, including Milan, Paris, New York; introduced first hand-knits into collection, 1980; first Brigid Foley shop opened, Tavistock, Devon, 1991; second shop opened, Exeter, 1994. Address: Greenway, Harrowbeer Lane, Yelverton PL20 6DY, Devon, England.

*

I like women to look elegant and feminine. From classic simple shapes, my clothes are often adorned in some way to make them special for the woman who wears them. One of my specialities is luxurious handknitted sweaters and jackets. Texture and colour play a large part in the intricate hand embroidery applied. My work has a typically English look about it, many of my designs are inspired from nature—flowers, wildlife, poppy fields, the Devon countryside where I live and work in. Other sources of inspiration are paintings, tapestries and Persian carpets.

I chose knitwear as my medium because it is such a challenge, creating the entire article deciding on the colours, the texture, the weight and softness of the fibres, choosing the embroidery threads, seeing the sweater or jacket emerge stage by stage, after such a lot of painstaking handwork. I take great pride in endeavouring to reproduce each design as closely to the original as possible. I am very proud of the people who work for me—such skill, patience and dedication.

Fashion today is gloriously diverse with no direct style imposed; such a variety of shapes, lengths, colours are available. Women can choose a style for themselves. Of my designs I would say they are classic, timeless, wearable, comfortable and appealing. I like to think they are clothes to enjoy and treasure.

—Brigid Foley

* * *

Brigid Foley's first designs were mainly for sweaters for a young age group. She experimented with knitting machines, mixing geometric patterns with stripes and plains. After joining the Carr Jones designer group in 1973, a more feminine style emerged, with calf-length flowing skirts, fitted to the hips and swirling around the hemline with inset panels of different texture or color matched to sweaters with soft cowl necklines, and accompanied by plaited knitted belts in tones of the suit. These suits were among the first of their kind, attractive, feminine, comfortable, and easy to wear.

In 1975 Foley was invited to join the London Collections and exhibited at the London fashion shows each season, building on her growing success by exhibiting later at the Paris Prêt-à-Porter, and in New York, Dusseldorf, and Copenhagen. The colors of the collections at this time were mainly soft, and often marled as several different fine yarns would be used through the machine at once. A distinctive feature was the gored skirt, where the swing of the skirt was emphasized by the different shades used in the gores. The ranges varied from heavier, sometimes tweedier suits for autumn, fine knits with a sheen and hints of gold for cocktail wear, and fine lacy knits for the spring. Commenting on her work, Foley explained, "fully fashioned knitwear is a very exciting medium. You start with nothing but cones of yarn, and mix textures, colour, and mathematical skill to shape into lovely flattering outfits. These can suit many different shapes, ages, and types of women."

By 1980 Foley had brought a selection of hand-knits into the collection. Finding mohair a good medium, she introduced a range of soft fluffy sweaters highlighted with hand embroidery. Most notable were the designs featuring wildlife—one called "Hedgehog" was still selling decades later. Other designs featured wild flowers and landscapes, some of which were beautifully embroidered with a wide range of textured yarns and silks, bringing them to life.

Foley lives in a village in the middle of Dartmoor, Devon, and considers the distinctive Dartmoor landscape to be a constant source of inspiration for her designs. Recurring hand-knit designs included a range of landscape-inspired themes such as cornfields and meadows, as well as other wildlife scenes drawn from the countryside, including rabbits and hedgehogs. Her designs are considered to be very English and stocked by retailers worldwide, as well as at Brigid Foley shops in Devon, one in the traditional market town of Tavistock, opened in the early 1990s and another which opened three years later in the cathedral city of Exeter.

—Doreen Ehrlich

FONTANA

Italian fashion house

Founded: in Rome, 1944, by sisters Zoë (1911–78), Micol (born 1913), and Giovanna (born 1915) Fontana. Company History: Sisters began working in their mother's tailoring business; Zoë and Micol worked in Milan, early 1930s; Zoë moved to Paris after her marriage, returning to Italy, to work for Zecca in Rome, 1937; created accessories division, Valextra, 1937; Micol and Giovanna moved to Rome, 1940; Zoë, Micol, and Giovanna opened Fontana studio in Palazzo Orsini, Rome, 1943, designing and producing gowns for the Roman aristocracy and many film stars; first catwalk presentation of Italian Alta Moda, Florence 1951; studio moved to present address, 1957; designed first ready-to-wear collection, 1960; incorporated as Sorelle Fontana Alta Moda SrL by Micol Fontana, Rome, 1985; sold Valextra to French firm Andrelux, 1985; designed for films, from 1950s to 1995. Exhibitions: retrospective, University of Parma, 1984; evening dresses, Venice, 1985; Castel Sant'Angelo Museum, Rome, 1985; Munich, March 1986. Collections: Metropolitan Museum of New York; Metropolitan Museum of San Francisco; Museo Fortuny, Venice. Awards: Silver Scissors award, Pittsburgh Fashion Group, 1956; Silver Mask award, Rome, 1960; Fontana sisters named Cavaliere della Repubblica, Rome, 1965; Fashion Oscar award, St Vincent, 1968; Stella di Michelangelo award, Rome, 1985; Polifemo prize, Sperlonga, Italy, 1985; Minerva prize, Rome, 1985; Attraction 1986 prize, Italy; Europe Plate, 1987; Europe Gold Plate, 1988. Company Address: Via San Sebastianello 6, 00187 Rome, Italy.

PUBLICATIONS

By FONTANA:

Books

Fontana, Micol, Specchio a tre luci, Rome, 1992.

Fontana, spring/summer 1968 collection: wool plaid waistcoat over matching Bermuda wool shorts and a crêpe silk blouse. © AP/Wide World Photos.

On FONTANA:

Books

Bianchino, Gloria and Rossana Bossaglia, Sorelle Fontana, Parma, 1984.

Alta Moda: grandi abiti da sera anni cinquanta-sessanta, Venice, 1984.

Cinquant'anni di moda: Sorelle Fontana, [exhibition catalogue], Parma, 1985.

Villa, Nora, Le regine della moda, Milan, 1985.

Steele, Valerie, Women of Fashion, New York, 1991.

Stegemeyer, Anne, Who's Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.

Articles

Da Riz, Oscar, "La via della seta parte da Roma e arriva in Cina," in Paese Sera (Rome), 20 June 1980.

"Le Sorelle Fontana hanno aperto la via alle grandi griffe," in Sole 24 Ore (Milan), 17 May 1988.

cones of yarn, and mix textures, colour, and mathematical skill to shape into lovely flattering outfits. These can suit many different shapes, ages, and types of women."

By 1980 Foley had brought a selection of hand-knits into the collection. Finding mohair a good medium, she introduced a range of soft fluffy sweaters highlighted with hand embroidery. Most notable were the designs featuring wildlife—one called "Hedgehog" was still selling decades later. Other designs featured wild flowers and landscapes, some of which were beautifully embroidered with a wide range of textured yarns and silks, bringing them to life.

Foley lives in a village in the middle of Dartmoor, Devon, and considers the distinctive Dartmoor landscape to be a constant source of inspiration for her designs. Recurring hand-knit designs included a range of landscape-inspired themes such as cornfields and meadows, as well as other wildlife scenes drawn from the countryside, including rabbits and hedgehogs. Her designs are considered to be very English and stocked by retailers worldwide, as well as at Brigid Foley shops in Devon, one in the traditional market town of Tavistock, opened in the early 1990s and another which opened three years later in the cathedral city of Exeter.

—Doreen Ehrlich

FONTANA

Italian fashion house

Founded: in Rome, 1944, by sisters Zoë (1911–78), Micol (born 1913), and Giovanna (born 1915) Fontana. Company History: Sisters began working in their mother's tailoring business; Zoë and Micol worked in Milan, early 1930s; Zoë moved to Paris after her marriage, returning to Italy, to work for Zecca in Rome, 1937; created accessories division, Valextra, 1937; Micol and Giovanna moved to Rome, 1940; Zoë, Micol, and Giovanna opened Fontana studio in Palazzo Orsini, Rome, 1943, designing and producing gowns for the Roman aristocracy and many film stars; first catwalk presentation of Italian Alta Moda, Florence 1951; studio moved to present address, 1957; designed first ready-to-wear collection, 1960; incorporated as Sorelle Fontana Alta Moda SrL by Micol Fontana, Rome, 1985; sold Valextra to French firm Andrelux, 1985; designed for films, from 1950s to 1995. Exhibitions: retrospective, University of Parma, 1984; evening dresses, Venice, 1985; Castel Sant'Angelo Museum, Rome, 1985; Munich, March 1986. Collections: Metropolitan Museum of New York; Metropolitan Museum of San Francisco; Museo Fortuny, Venice. Awards: Silver Scissors award, Pittsburgh Fashion Group, 1956; Silver Mask award, Rome, 1960; Fontana sisters named Cavaliere della Repubblica, Rome, 1965; Fashion Oscar award, St Vincent, 1968; Stella di Michelangelo award, Rome, 1985; Polifemo prize, Sperlonga, Italy, 1985; Minerva prize, Rome, 1985; Attraction 1986 prize, Italy; Europe Plate, 1987; Europe Gold Plate, 1988. Company Address: Via San Sebastianello 6, 00187 Rome, Italy.

PUBLICATIONS

By FONTANA:

Books

Fontana, Micol, Specchio a tre luci, Rome, 1992.

Fontana, spring/summer 1968 collection: wool plaid waistcoat over matching Bermuda wool shorts and a crêpe silk blouse. © AP/Wide World Photos.

On FONTANA:

Books

Bianchino, Gloria and Rossana Bossaglia, Sorelle Fontana, Parma, 1984.

Alta Moda: grandi abiti da sera anni cinquanta-sessanta, Venice, 1984.

Cinquant'anni di moda: Sorelle Fontana, [exhibition catalogue], Parma, 1985.

Villa, Nora, Le regine della moda, Milan, 1985.

Steele, Valerie, Women of Fashion, New York, 1991.

Stegemeyer, Anne, Who's Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.

Articles

Da Riz, Oscar, "La via della seta parte da Roma e arriva in Cina," in Paese Sera (Rome), 20 June 1980.

"Le Sorelle Fontana hanno aperto la via alle grandi griffe," in Sole 24 Ore (Milan), 17 May 1988.

- Mendia, Fabiana, "Via Zoë Fontana: Una strada da indossare," in Il Messaggero (Rome), 12 July 1988.
- Pilolli, Carla, "Il matrimonio torna di moda," in Il Messaggero (Rome), 5 December 1990.
- Pertica, Domenico, "Bianco vince: Micol Fontana, la regina dell'abito da sposa," in Paese Sera (Rome), 4 July 1991.
- Tiezzi, Monica, "Quel successo appeso a un filo," in Gazzetta di Parma (Parma, Italy), 12 February 1992.
- Conti, Samantha, "The Italian Conquerors," in WWD, 28 September 1998.
- _____, "Fifty Years of Fashion," in WWD, 22 February 2000.
- _____, "Lights, Camera, Fashion—The Marriage of Fashion and Films...," in WWD, 22 February 2000.
- _____, "First and Always—The Italians See Themselves as Pioneers at Luxury Branding...," in WWD, 30 May 2000.
- Colavita, Courtney, "Italy's Golden Moment," in WWD, 2 March 2001.

* * *

Fontana created fantasy dresses, wedding gowns, ball gowns, and possessed an aura of glamor. In the 1950s, in particular, the Fontana style was a rich excess and ideal of the sumptuous dress. For the client, these were the most flattering kinds of party dresses cognizant of the New Look, buoyant in full skirts, and attentive to the bust. To the observer, theatrical high-style 1950s style was crystallized in the internationally known clientèle including Linda Christian (her wedding dress to marry Tyrone Power), Audrey Hepburn, and preeminently Ava Gardner.

Gardner was the perfect Fontana client and model—unabashedly and voluptuously sexy and known for alluring and elegant dressing. Gardner wore Fontana for film roles in The Barefoot Contessa (1954), The Sun Also Rises (1957), and On the Beach (1959). While American film had its own specialty costume designers such as Edith Head and Travis Banton, postwar Rome reigned its status as a glamor capital by the conflation of life and film. Sisters Zoë, Micol, and Giovanna Fontana had begun their business in 1936, but seized the public imagination when American films were made on location in Italy using their designs and, to a lesser degree, with the Italian film industry. The popular international appeal of the Power/Christian wedding and Ava Gardner's paparazzi-trailing fame brought vast worldwide visibility and recognition.

If waning Hollywood found its ideal Trevi Fountain wardrobe in Fontana, Fontana came to America with the demure but unequivocally rich lace wedding dress designed for the 1956 wedding of Margaret Truman, daughter of the ex-President of the United States, and Clifton Daniel, New York Times journalist and editor. Longtime celebrity Margaret Truman Daniel, famous as the apple of her father's eye and as a television performer, put the good-girl seal of approval on Fontana for America that Gardner's sultry looks, Elizabeth Taylor's buxom beauty, or Loretta Young's dream-girl radiance had been unable to provide. For Americans, Roman grace and opulence were, in many ways, more accessible than the couture of Paris.

By the late 1950s, the strong silhouettes of Balenciaga and Dior (under Yves Saint Laurent) were so immediately and carelessly processed into American clothing that Roman dress, with its conspicuous extravagance of lace and taffeta and luxuriance, seemed ineffably richer than Paris design. The preference of the Fontana sisters for wedding dresses, eveningwear, and full-skirted cocktail dresses through the 1950s and 1960s, made their style seem especially colorful, a kind of pre-La Dolce Vita for Americans covetous of Italian flair.

The Fontana sisters were so much a part of the Italian postwar renaissance that Rome designated a street Via Zoë Fontana. Later works by Fontana assumed the more tubular silhouettes of the 1960s and 1970s and some similarity to Princess Irene Galitzine, but the definitive work of the Fontana sisters remained the bust-enhanced, narrow-waisted, full-skirted resplendence of their style in the 1950s. Their extravagance walked a fine line between vulgarity and richness, one to which Americans felt a keen affinity. The Fontanas created a Roman Empire of postwar fashion; they enjoyed an influential and unforgettable decade of style sovereignty.

While the glory days of the Fontana sisters ended decades ago (Zoë died in 1978), Sorelle Fontana has remained a fixture of Italian fashion. In an article chronicling the rise and fall and rise of Italian style, Micol reminisced to Women's Wear Daily (28 September 1998) about the firm's precarious 1944 startup, "We could still hear the bombs going off on the beaches when we moved into our first atelier in Rome. But that didn't matter, it was our dream to own an atelier."

The Fontanas, along with several other Italian firms, brought their own sensibility to fashion. In a 2000 profile of Italian couture and ready-to-wear, Micol commented to Women's Wear Daily (22 February 2000) about why Italian clothing caught on: "We broke away from the French—we were more informal, our fashion was more linear and more practical.... The Americans," she further explained, "were instrumental in shaping our attitude toward fashion. They were practical and needed clothing they could live in, and we were ready to deliver."

—Richard Martin and Nelly Rhodes

FONTICOLI, Nazareno

See BRIONI

FORD, Tom

American designer

Born: Austin, Texas, 27 August 1961. Education: Studied at New York University, Parsons School of Design both in New York and Paris. Career: Started working on the creative staff of Cathy Hardwick, 1986; joined Chloé for a brief period, then Perry Ellis as a design director, 1988; went to Gucci, 1990; named creative director, 1994; resigned with Gucci for five years, 1998; Gucci buys Yves Saint Laurent, 1999; named creative director, Yves Saint Laurent Couture and Yves St. Laurent perfumes, 2000; wowed critics with second YSL collection, 2001. Awards: VH-1 Fashion and Music Awards, Future Best New Designer, 1995; Council of Fashion Designers of America, International Designer of the Year, 1996; International Designer of the Year, Fashion Editors Club Japan, 1996; VH-1 Fashion and Music Awards, Menswear and Womenswear Designer of the Year, 1996; People magazine, among Most Beautiful People, 1997; VH-1 Fashion and Music Awards Womenswear Designer of the Year, 1999; VH-1 Fashion and Music Awards Elle Style Icon award, 1999; Council of Fashion Designers of America (CFDA), Designer of the Year award, 2000; nominated, CFDA Womenswear

- Mendia, Fabiana, "Via Zoë Fontana: Una strada da indossare," in Il Messaggero (Rome), 12 July 1988.
- Pilolli, Carla, "Il matrimonio torna di moda," in Il Messaggero (Rome), 5 December 1990.
- Pertica, Domenico, "Bianco vince: Micol Fontana, la regina dell'abito da sposa," in Paese Sera (Rome), 4 July 1991.
- Tiezzi, Monica, "Quel successo appeso a un filo," in Gazzetta di Parma (Parma, Italy), 12 February 1992.
- Conti, Samantha, "The Italian Conquerors," in WWD, 28 September 1998.
- _____, "Fifty Years of Fashion," in WWD, 22 February 2000.
- _____, "Lights, Camera, Fashion—The Marriage of Fashion and Films...," in WWD, 22 February 2000.
- _____, "First and Always—The Italians See Themselves as Pioneers at Luxury Branding...," in WWD, 30 May 2000.
- Colavita, Courtney, "Italy's Golden Moment," in WWD, 2 March 2001.

* * *

Fontana created fantasy dresses, wedding gowns, ball gowns, and possessed an aura of glamor. In the 1950s, in particular, the Fontana style was a rich excess and ideal of the sumptuous dress. For the client, these were the most flattering kinds of party dresses cognizant of the New Look, buoyant in full skirts, and attentive to the bust. To the observer, theatrical high-style 1950s style was crystallized in the internationally known clientèle including Linda Christian (her wedding dress to marry Tyrone Power), Audrey Hepburn, and preeminently Ava Gardner.

Gardner was the perfect Fontana client and model—unabashedly and voluptuously sexy and known for alluring and elegant dressing. Gardner wore Fontana for film roles in The Barefoot Contessa (1954), The Sun Also Rises (1957), and On the Beach (1959). While American film had its own specialty costume designers such as Edith Head and Travis Banton, postwar Rome reigned its status as a glamor capital by the conflation of life and film. Sisters Zoë, Micol, and Giovanna Fontana had begun their business in 1936, but seized the public imagination when American films were made on location in Italy using their designs and, to a lesser degree, with the Italian film industry. The popular international appeal of the Power/Christian wedding and Ava Gardner's paparazzi-trailing fame brought vast worldwide visibility and recognition.

If waning Hollywood found its ideal Trevi Fountain wardrobe in Fontana, Fontana came to America with the demure but unequivocally rich lace wedding dress designed for the 1956 wedding of Margaret Truman, daughter of the ex-President of the United States, and Clifton Daniel, New York Times journalist and editor. Longtime celebrity Margaret Truman Daniel, famous as the apple of her father's eye and as a television performer, put the good-girl seal of approval on Fontana for America that Gardner's sultry looks, Elizabeth Taylor's buxom beauty, or Loretta Young's dream-girl radiance had been unable to provide. For Americans, Roman grace and opulence were, in many ways, more accessible than the couture of Paris.

By the late 1950s, the strong silhouettes of Balenciaga and Dior (under Yves Saint Laurent) were so immediately and carelessly processed into American clothing that Roman dress, with its conspicuous extravagance of lace and taffeta and luxuriance, seemed ineffably richer than Paris design. The preference of the Fontana sisters for wedding dresses, eveningwear, and full-skirted cocktail dresses through the 1950s and 1960s, made their style seem especially colorful, a kind of pre-La Dolce Vita for Americans covetous of Italian flair.

The Fontana sisters were so much a part of the Italian postwar renaissance that Rome designated a street Via Zoë Fontana. Later works by Fontana assumed the more tubular silhouettes of the 1960s and 1970s and some similarity to Princess Irene Galitzine, but the definitive work of the Fontana sisters remained the bust-enhanced, narrow-waisted, full-skirted resplendence of their style in the 1950s. Their extravagance walked a fine line between vulgarity and richness, one to which Americans felt a keen affinity. The Fontanas created a Roman Empire of postwar fashion; they enjoyed an influential and unforgettable decade of style sovereignty.

While the glory days of the Fontana sisters ended decades ago (Zoë died in 1978), Sorelle Fontana has remained a fixture of Italian fashion. In an article chronicling the rise and fall and rise of Italian style, Micol reminisced to Women's Wear Daily (28 September 1998) about the firm's precarious 1944 startup, "We could still hear the bombs going off on the beaches when we moved into our first atelier in Rome. But that didn't matter, it was our dream to own an atelier."

The Fontanas, along with several other Italian firms, brought their own sensibility to fashion. In a 2000 profile of Italian couture and ready-to-wear, Micol commented to Women's Wear Daily (22 February 2000) about why Italian clothing caught on: "We broke away from the French—we were more informal, our fashion was more linear and more practical.... The Americans," she further explained, "were instrumental in shaping our attitude toward fashion. They were practical and needed clothing they could live in, and we were ready to deliver."

—Richard Martin and Nelly Rhodes

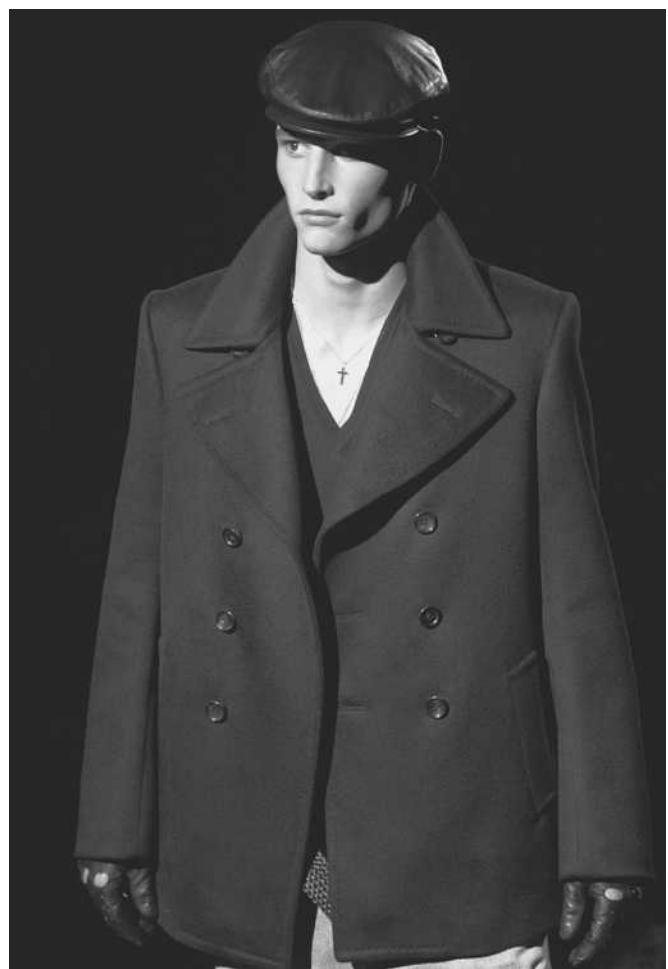

FONTICOLI, Nazareno

See BRIONI

FORD, Tom

American designer

Born: Austin, Texas, 27 August 1961. Education: Studied at New York University, Parsons School of Design both in New York and Paris. Career: Started working on the creative staff of Cathy Hardwick, 1986; joined Chloé for a brief period, then Perry Ellis as a design director, 1988; went to Gucci, 1990; named creative director, 1994; resigned with Gucci for five years, 1998; Gucci buys Yves Saint Laurent, 1999; named creative director, Yves Saint Laurent Couture and Yves St. Laurent perfumes, 2000; wowed critics with second YSL collection, 2001. Awards: VH-1 Fashion and Music Awards, Future Best New Designer, 1995; Council of Fashion Designers of America, International Designer of the Year, 1996; International Designer of the Year, Fashion Editors Club Japan, 1996; VH-1 Fashion and Music Awards, Menswear and Womenswear Designer of the Year, 1996; People magazine, among Most Beautiful People, 1997; VH-1 Fashion and Music Awards Womenswear Designer of the Year, 1999; VH-1 Fashion and Music Awards Elle Style Icon award, 1999; Council of Fashion Designers of America (CFDA), Designer of the Year award, 2000; nominated, CFDA Womenswear

Tom Ford, designed for Gucci's fall/winter 2001 collection. © AP/Wide World Photos.

Designer of the Year, 2001; Commitment to Life award, AIDS Project Los Angeles. Address: Gucci Group N.V., Rembrandt Tower, 1 Amstelplein, 1096 HA Amsterdam, Netherlands.

PUBLICATIONS

On FORD:

Books

Forden, Sara Gay, The House of Gucci, New York, 2000.

Articles

Infantino, Vivian, "Ford Drives Gucci into Faster Fashion Lane," in Footwear News, 14 November 1994.

_____, "Tom Ford: The Driving Force Behind Gucci's Revved-Up Performance," in Footwear News, 4 December 1995.

Middleton, William, "Ford Mulls Addition of Own Line, But Says He's Staying at Gucci," in WWD, 14 March 1996.

Hirschberg, Lynn, "Next. Next. Next? Tom Ford Has Made Gucci Chic Again....," in the New York Times Magazine, 7 April 1996.

"Ford Signs for Five More Years at Gucci," in WWD, 29 September 1998.

Wilson, Jennifer, "What Drives Gucci's Tom Ford?" in Los Angeles Magazine, 1999.

Gordon, Maryellen, "Tom Ford: Before Gucci Was a Glimmer in His Eye," in WWD, 13 September 1999.

"Ford's Design Galaxy," in WWD, 18 January 2000.

Socha, Miles, "Ford's YSL: Full Steam Ahead," WWD, 12 January 2001.

Fallon, James, "Tom Ford," in WWD, 5 June 2001.

Luscombe, Belinda, "Tom Ford: An American in Paris and London...," in Time, 9 July 2001.

* * *

Tom Ford has earned a reputation for his strong, sexy designs. "Sex is something I think about all the time," he commented to Los Angeles Magazine. "Is that sexy? Is she sexy? Sex is not a new thing but everything comes down to interaction with other people." Since 1995, his clothes and accessories have been on the pretentious fashion wave; his sensuous styles are in demand around the world.

As an American designer who works and designs for the Gucci empire in Europe, Ford visualizes the moment of fashion over and over again. Each time he is more successful than the last. He sleeps for only four or five hours a night and turns out two collections per season, Gucci and YSL. Very few people can keep up with his frantic pace and maintain a fashion following, yet Ford won't be nailed down to one look or one couture house. He has the vision to change just as moment changes and is one of the few designers who understands the ambiguous mind of the consumer. With each passing collection, Ford seems to grow and understand not only the fashion industry but the fashion consumer who embraces his fashions.

Ford moved to New York when he was a teenager. He started his postsecondary education at New York University studying art history, later he studied architecture at Parsons School of Design in New York and then completed his studies at the Parsons School of Design in Paris. He began his career as part of the creative staff with designer Cathy Hardwick in 1986. Two years later, he moved to Perry Ellis, then in 1990 joined the Gucci Group N.V. as a womenswear designer in Milan. Gucci originally wanted to fire him because he was too trendy; two years passed and Ford was promoted to design director. His foresight into fashion trends helped him become the creative director of Gucci in 1994.

Ford became responsible for the design of all Gucci product lines, from clothing to fragrance, advertising campaigns, store design, and the Group's corporate image. At the time Gucci was a struggling brand as a result of family disputes, yet Ford built Gucci into a megabrand producing and distributing high-quality goods throughout the world in company-owned stores, franchises, boutiques, department stores, and specialty stores. In the early 2000s, there were approximately 180 Gucci stores worldwide.

Gucci acquired Yves Saint Laurent and Sergio Rossi at the beginning of 2000. As if being design director wasn't enough, Ford took on the role of creative director of Yves Saint Laurent Couture. He works with the overall image of YSL, helping to position the brand in the marketplace. As a designer, he has set a certain standard for modern style and is beloved by the press, who dubbed him the "King of Cool." In his 1999 collection, Ford used Las Vegas and Cher as sources of inspiration for his clothes. In a 1999 article in Los Angeles magazine,

Tom Ford, designed for the house of Yves Saint Laurent's spring/summer 2001 ready-to-wear collection. © AFP/CORBIS.

Ford was quoted as saying, "I like to make [my designs] a little tacky. Push them so they're a little too much. When things are too perfect, they're kind of dull."

Ford has been viewed by some in the fashion industry as too commercial. His reply is "Commercial is a compliment. It means people will buy it." He was further quoted in a July 2001 Time magazine profile as saying, "I'm always perplexed by people wanting to divide this into business and fashion. My job is to create something amazing that sells; I don't think you can divorce the two." Ford is a designer with vision of what people want and what they will buy. He is truly one of the most exciting and successful designers of the last decade, dressing such famous people as Sting, Tom Hanks, and Jennifer Lopez. He designs for urban men and women, and in his Gucci runway show for fall 2001, he was one of the few designers who sent models out wearing clothes most clients would actually wear—like cargo pants and olive-colored suits. As he told Time, for him, "Fashion doesn't stop at clothes; fashion is everything—art, music, furniture design, graphic design, hair, makeup, architecture, the way cars look—all those things go together to make a moment in time, and that's what excites me."

—Donna W. Reamy

FORTUNY (Y MADRAZO), Mariano

Spanish designer

Born: Granada, Spain, 1871. Family: Married Henriette Negrin, 1918. Career: Produced Knossos printed scarves from 1906; produced Delphos gowns, 1907–52; Delphos robe patented, 1909; method for pleating and undulating fabric patented, 1909; methods for printing fabrics patented, 1909, 1910; 18 other patents received, 1901–33; opened showroom for sale of textiles and clothing, Venice, 1909; established Società Anonima Fortuny, factory for printed textiles, 1919; opened shops in Paris and Milan, 1920; also an inventor, stage designer, painter, and photographer. Exhibitions: Mariano Fortuny y Madrazo [drawings and paintings], Galeria Dedalo, Milan, 1935, Galerie Hector Brame, Paris, 1934; Exposition Fortuny y Marsal y Fortuny y Madrazo [etchings], Biblioteca Nacional, Madrid, 1952; A Remembrance of Mariano Fortuny, Los Angeles County Museum, 1967–68; Mariano Fortuny (1871–1949), Musée Historique des Tissus, Lyons, and Brighton Museum, 1980, Fashion Institute of Technology, New York, 1981, and Art Institute of Chicago, 1982; Chicago International Antiques Show (featuring Fortuny gowns from the Martin Kamer Ltd. collection of New York), 1988. Died: 2 May 1949, in Venice.

PUBLICATIONS

By FORTUNY:

Books

Éclairage scénique: Système Fortuny, Paris, 1904.
Fortuny 1838–1874, Bologna, 1933.

On FORTUNY:

Books

- Deschodt, Anne Marie, Mariano Fortuny: Un magicien de Venise, Paris, 1979.
- Brighton Museum, Mariano Fortuny (1871–1949) [exhibition catalogue], Brighton, 1980.
- de Osma, Guillermo, Mariano Fortuny: His Life and Work, London, 1980, 1994.
- Fashion Institute of Technology, Fortuny [exhibition catalogue], New York, 1981.
- Milbank, Caroline Rennolds, Couture: The Great Designers, New York, 1985.
- Mint Museum of Art, Fortuny: Robed in Riches, [exhibition catalogue], Charlotte, N.C., 1992.
- Skrebneski, Victor, and Laura Jacobs, The Art of Haute Couture, New York, 1995.
- Stegemeyer, Anne, Who's Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.
- Desveaux, Delphine, Mariano Fortuny, 1871–1949, London, 1998.
- Deschodt, Anne Marie, and Doretta Davanzo Poli, Fortuny, New York, 2001.

Articles

"The Beauty of Fortuny is Brought to America," in Vogue, 15 May 1923.

Tom Ford, designed for the house of Yves Saint Laurent's spring/summer 2001 ready-to-wear collection. © AFP/CORBIS.

Ford was quoted as saying, "I like to make [my designs] a little tacky. Push them so they're a little too much. When things are too perfect, they're kind of dull."

Ford has been viewed by some in the fashion industry as too commercial. His reply is "Commercial is a compliment. It means people will buy it." He was further quoted in a July 2001 Time magazine profile as saying, "I'm always perplexed by people wanting to divide this into business and fashion. My job is to create something amazing that sells; I don't think you can divorce the two." Ford is a designer with vision of what people want and what they will buy. He is truly one of the most exciting and successful designers of the last decade, dressing such famous people as Sting, Tom Hanks, and Jennifer Lopez. He designs for urban men and women, and in his Gucci runway show for fall 2001, he was one of the few designers who sent models out wearing clothes most clients would actually wear—like cargo pants and olive-colored suits. As he told Time, for him, "Fashion doesn't stop at clothes; fashion is everything—art, music, furniture design, graphic design, hair, makeup, architecture, the way cars look—all those things go together to make a moment in time, and that's what excites me."

—Donna W. Reamy

FORTUNY (Y MADRAZO), Mariano

Spanish designer

Born: Granada, Spain, 1871. Family: Married Henriette Negrin, 1918. Career: Produced Knossos printed scarves from 1906; produced Delphos gowns, 1907–52; Delphos robe patented, 1909; method for pleating and undulating fabric patented, 1909; methods for printing fabrics patented, 1909, 1910; 18 other patents received, 1901–33; opened showroom for sale of textiles and clothing, Venice, 1909; established Società Anonima Fortuny, factory for printed textiles, 1919; opened shops in Paris and Milan, 1920; also an inventor, stage designer, painter, and photographer. Exhibitions: Mariano Fortuny y Madrazo [drawings and paintings], Galeria Dedalo, Milan, 1935, Galerie Hector Brame, Paris, 1934; Exposition Fortuny y Marsal y Fortuny y Madrazo [etchings], Biblioteca Nacional, Madrid, 1952; A Remembrance of Mariano Fortuny, Los Angeles County Museum, 1967–68; Mariano Fortuny (1871–1949), Musée Historique des Tissus, Lyons, and Brighton Museum, 1980, Fashion Institute of Technology, New York, 1981, and Art Institute of Chicago, 1982; Chicago International Antiques Show (featuring Fortuny gowns from the Martin Kamer Ltd. collection of New York), 1988. Died: 2 May 1949, in Venice.

PUBLICATIONS

By FORTUNY:

Books

Éclairage scénique: Système Fortuny, Paris, 1904.
Fortuny 1838–1874, Bologna, 1933.

On FORTUNY:

Books

Deschodt, Anne Marie, Mariano Fortuny: Un magicien de Venise, Paris, 1979.
Brighton Museum, Mariano Fortuny (1871–1949) [exhibition catalogue], Brighton, 1980.
de Osma, Guillermo, Mariano Fortuny: His Life and Work, London, 1980, 1994.
Fashion Institute of Technology, Fortuny [exhibition catalogue], New York, 1981.
Milbank, Caroline Rennolds, Couture: The Great Designers, New York, 1985.
Mint Museum of Art, Fortuny: Robed in Riches, [exhibition catalogue], Charlotte, N.C., 1992.
Skrebneski, Victor, and Laura Jacobs, The Art of Haute Couture, New York, 1995.
Stegemeyer, Anne, Who's Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.
Desveaux, Delphine, Mariano Fortuny, 1871–1949, London, 1998.
Deschodt, Anne Marie, and Doretta Davanzo Poli, Fortuny, New York, 2001.

Articles

"The Beauty of Fortuny is Brought to America," in Vogue, 15 May 1923.

- “Mariano Fortuny,” in La renaissance de l’art Français et des industries de luxe, June 1924.
- Malaguzzi Valeri, Francesco, “Le stoffe Fortuny,” in Cronache d’arte, Volume 4, 1925.
- “Fortuny of Venice,” in the Nomad, April 1928.
- de Cardona, Maria, “Mariano Fortuny y Madrazo,” in Arte Español, Spring 1950.
- Sheppard, Eugenia, “The Fortuny Dress,” in the New York Herald Tribune, 10 September 1962.
- Hale, Sheila, “Fragments from the Fortuny Rainbow,” in the Daily Telegraph Magazine (London), 27 October 1972.
- Quennell, J.M., “Precious Stuff: Fortuny,” in Vogue (London), December 1972.
- Minola de Gallotti, Mariana, “El Museo Fortuny de Venecia,” in Goya, September/October 1975.
- Deschodt, Anne Marie, “Seeking Your Fortuny,” in the Sunday Times Magazine (London), 23 July 1978.
- Blasi, Bruno, “Con la firma di Fortuny,” in Panorama (Italy), 22 August 1978.
- Abercrombie, Stanley, “Palazzo Fortuny: A Venetian Palace, Now the Museum of the Work of Master Textile Designer Mariano Fortuny,” in Architectural Digest, October 1984.
- “Fame and Fortuny at Navy Pier Show,” in Chicago Tribune, 2 October 1988.
- Tosca, Marco, “Fortuny,” in Vogue (Milan), July/August 1989.
- Lydon, Mary, “Pli selon pli: Proust and Fortuny,” in the Romantic Review, November 1990.
- Collier, Peter, “Le Manteau de Fortuny,” in French Studies, January 1991.
- Farrell, Sarah, “In the Footsteps of Fortuny, Rich Venetian Fabrics,” in the New York Times, 28 July 1991.
- Smith, Roberta, “An Eye for Art to Dress a Room,” in the New York Times, 18 August 2000.

* * *

Mariano Fortuny was an artistic genius with an insatiable curiosity; this led him to pursue a variety of disciplines, which evolved through an interesting series of interconnections. Always a painter, he turned to etching, sculpture, photography, lighting design, theatre direction, set design, architecture, and costume design, ultimately to be a creator of magnificent fabrics and clothing.

Through painting Fortuny learned the subtle uses of color that enabled him to produce unequalled silks and velvets from which he made exquisite gowns. Fortuny’s work as a fabric and dress designer was determined by a combination of external and internal influences: externally by Modernism and the English Aesthetic movement, during the early part of the 1900s, as well as Greek and Venetian antiquity; internally by a love inherited from his father of everything Arabic and Asian. During all these creative experiences he maintained a keen artistic sense and the mind of an inventor.

Fashion, as we know it, did not interest Fortuny and he rejected commercial fashion and couture houses. First and foremost a painter who happened to create stage scenery and lighting effects, as well as clothes, Fortuny’s initiation with fabrics and fashion was through costumes for the theatre designed in conjunction with his revolutionary lighting techniques. His first textile creations, known as the “Knossos scarves,” were silk veils, printed with geometric motifs (inspired by Cycladic art) which were made in any number of variations until the 1930s. These scarves were, essentially, a type of clothing—rectangular pieces of cloth that could be wrapped, tied, and used in a variety of ways—always allowing for freedom of individual expression and movement. His sole interest was the woman herself and her personal attributes, to which he had no wish to add any ornamentation. These simple scarves allowed Fortuny to combine form and fabric as they adapted easily into every kind of shape, from jackets to skirts, and tunics.

Fortuny’s most famous garment was the Delphos gown. It was a revolution for the corseted woman of 1907 in that it was of pleated silk, simply cut, and hung loosely from the shoulders. Fortuny regarded his new concept of dress as an invention, and patented it in 1909. The dress was modern and original and numerous variations were produced—some with short sleeves, some with long, wide sleeves tied at the wrist, and others that were sleeveless.

The original Delphos gowns had batwing sleeves and usually had wide bateau necklines and always, no matter what the shape, a cord to allow for shoulder adjustments. They were invariably finished with small Venetian glass beads with a dual purpose: not only did the beads serve as ornamentation, they also weighed the dress down, allowing it to cling to the contours of the body rather than float. The pleats of the Delphos were achieved through Fortuny’s secret, patented invention. However unconventional for the time, these dresses were extremely popular for at-home women entertaining and considered primarily tea dresses. It was not until the 1920s that women dared to popularize them as clothing acceptable to be worn outside the home. Fortuny’s techniques were simple but effective. Today the Delphos dress has pleats that are as tight and crisp as when they were new. Storing them as rolled and twisted balls makes them convenient for travel and eliminates the need for ironing.

In addition to his work in silk, Fortuny began printing on velvet, first with block prints followed by the development of a stencil method that was a precursor of the rotary silk screen. The velvet found its use in dresses, jackets, capes, and cloaks to cover the Delphos gowns, as well as home furnishing fabrics, still available today. Since his work in silk and velvet never radically changed into anything different, it is almost impossible to establish a chronology of his garments.

To Mariano Fortuny fashion was art, an unchanging fashion outside the world of fashion. Although many of his contemporaries were innovative designers, their designs were created for a specific time and season with built-in obsolescence. By contrast, Fortuny’s clothes are timeless. The elegant simplicity, perfection of cut, and unusual sensuality of color is where their beauty lies. Perfectly integrating these elements and placing them on the female figure makes a Fortuny garment a work of art—and as such they are in demand by museums and private collectors alike, often fetching as much as $40,000 per gown at auctions.

—Roberta H. Gruber; updated by Owen James

FOWLER, Grahame

See TIMNEY FOWLER LTD.

FRASER, Graham

See WORKERS FOR FREEDOM

FREIS, Diane

American fashion designer

Born: Los Angeles, California. Education: Studied Fine Arts at the University of California at Los Angeles. Career: Opened first boutique, Hong Kong, 1978; established own design and manufacturing studio, 1982; launched diffusion line, Freis Spirit, 1994; signed licensing agreement with Guryich International for distribution of imported line throughout North America, 1999. Awards: Governor's award for industry for export, Hong Kong, 1993. Address: 12/F, World Interests Building, 8 Tsun Yip Lane, Kwun Tong, Hong Kong, China. Website: www.dianefreis.com.

PUBLICATIONS

On FREIS:

Articles

- Block, Elizabeth J., "After a Rough Start, Designer Diane Freis Hopped Aboard the Orient Express to Success," in People, 18 July 1983.
- Rourke, Mary, "Designer Diane Freis Oriented to Pace of Hong Kong," in the Los Angeles Times, 19 June 1987.
- Wallace, Charles P., "A Rags and Riches Tale in Hong Kong," in the Los Angeles Times, 5 February 1991.
- "Diane Freis, Designer and Company Profile," online at the company website (see above).
- Lee, Georgia, Julia Fellers, and Rebecca Kleinman, "New Lines," in WWD, 11 August 1999.

* * *

Diane Freis is one of the few Hong Kong-based designers to have gained an international reputation. Hers is a typical Hong Kong success story, based on hard work and determination. Since arriving in the territory in 1973, she built a commercially successful brand name that became a role model for Hong Kong manufacturing.

The Freis signature is represented by multicolored prints applied to one-size, easy-care dresses, primarily designed in polyester georgette. Noncrushable and easy-to-pack, they have presented a travel solution for higher income, more mature women in search of a glamorous and feminine look. The fashion philosophy is pragmatic: Freis stresses the importance "of making a one-size dress that allows the freedom of fit in our daily schedules of health programmes one day and over-indulgence the next." With their hallmark elasticated waists and shirring, the dresses covered imperfections but would never be called dowdy. The prints were usually exotic, the designs included pretty florals, dramatic geometrics, bold stripes, and plaids, with embroidery and beading as particular features of the look. Besides her traditional georgette, Freis has used silk, cotton, and wool coordinates, hand-knits for casual daywear, and chiffon and taffeta for grand evening ensembles.

Freis' eye for color and design can be attributed to her fine arts education at the University of California in her native Los Angeles. While a student, her sideline was to create elaborately beaded jackets, which she sold to celebrities such as Diana Ross. It was a search for new, exotic materials and skilled embroiderers that first attracted her to the Far East. In Hong Kong she found the fabrics and workmanship that contributed to her distinctive fashion identity.

In 1978 Freis opened her first fashion boutique in Hong Kong; by 1986 she had six more. But her influence did not remain in the local market. International buyers from Europe and the United States soon took her work overseas. In the U.S., her dresses came to adorn the bodies of society women who shopped at the likes of Neiman Marcus in Dallas or Bergdorf Goodman in New York. Suited more to the European figure than to the Asian, today the label can be found in over 20 countries. Her success has been based on locating a market niche, not by following international fashion trends. Falling somewhere between haute couture and prêt-à-porter, the designs have been produced in limited editions: no more than 10 of any one design are distributed around the world. Basic shapes remain consistent; the variety is provided by new fabric designs and combinations. To retain exclusivity, the company set up its own print design studio and manufacturing base in 1982. In recognition of her commercial achievement for Hong Kong, Freis was awarded the Governor's award for Industry for Export in 1993.

Despite its established success, the company continued to develop new ranges and to target new markets. Freis' easy-flowing garments have gradually gained some structure via shoulder pads, more tucking, and fitted pleat detail. In recognition of changing lifestyles, Freis Spirit was launched in spring 1994 as a diffusion line aimed mainly in the Southeast Asian market. Featuring a pared-down silhouette and more subdued designs, the collection offered mix-and-match coordinates in quality fabrics to a younger market.

Headquartered in Hong Kong, Freis continues to focus on her trademark polyester georgette dresses in bright patterns and solids. She has expanded from a focus on dresses and skirts to a broader line comprising suits and eveningwear. She is now able to clothe a woman during her workday career, at night in formal attire, or in casual situations, although she remains best known for her flexible, easy-fit, all-over-printed dresses. The designer's daywear business is divided into knitwear, classic polyester silk dresses and blouses, basic coordinates, and printed stretch tops, and her eveningwear line consists of beaded gowns, special occasion wear, beaded and embroidered jackets, camisoles, and scarves.

Freis has traditionally appealed to a more mature consumer but has extended her market into more youthful customers with her "young classics" line, consisting of tanks, chemise-and-jacket combinations and coverups, which Women's Wear Daily described as "sleek" in August 1999. A line of all-black polyester and silk tanks, dresses, and pants coordinate with all the products in her daywear and eveningwear lines, from beaded jackets to printed skirts.

Freis has also expanded geographically from her roots in the Asian market. She maintains a distribution network not only in Hong Kong, Taiwan, Malaysia, and Australia, but in the U.S., South Africa, and the Middle East. In 1999 Freis signed a licensing agreement with Guryich International, a Canadian company, for distribution in North America of a broad collection imported from Hong Kong. The line incorporates the one-size-fits-all polyester print dresses for which she is still best known but also includes 50 items from all facets of her line.

—Hazel Clark; updated by Karen Raugust.

FRENCH CONNECTION

British fashion house

Founded: in London by Stephen Marks, 1969. Company History: Introduced French Connection label, 1972; launched menswear collection, 1976; hired Nicole Farhi as designer, from 1978; introduced Nicole Farhi label, 1983; launched “fcuk” marketing campaign in Britain, 1997; debuted same campaign in U.S., 1999; expanded into lifestyle products through licensing, late 1990s and early 2000s; created first television/cinema advertising, 2000; acquired mail order company, Toast, 2000; opened San Francisco-based U.S. flagship, its 50th U.S. store, 2001; purchased all of its U.S. operations, 2001. Company Address: 60 Great Portland Street, London W1N 5AJ, England. Company Website: www.fcukinkybugger.com.

PUBLICATIONS

On FRENCH CONNECTION:

Articles

- Bloomfield, Judy, “Nicole Farhi Strengthens U.S. Connection,” in WWWD, 28 September 1988.
- Gordon, Maryellen, “French Connection’s Broadway Debut,” in WWWD, 14 April 1993.
- Fallon, James, “French Connection Clicks in U.S.,” in WWWD, 8 January 1997.
- _____, “French Connection Profits Climb...,” in DNR, 5 April 1999.
- Cowen, Matthew, “TBWA Plans to Promote fcuk to a Wider Audience,” in Campaign (UK), 1 September 2000.
- Fallon, James, “French Connection to Buy Entire U.S. Business,” in DNR, 21 February 2001.
- Benady, David, “FCUK America,” in Marketing Week, 22 March 2001.
- Jardine, Alexandra, “Style Offensive,” in Marketing (UK), 5 April 2001.
- Young, Kristin, “French Connection United Kingdom Opening Flagship in San Francisco,” in WWWD, 16 July 2001.

* * *

French Connection was founded in 1969 by Stephen Marks with a range of tailored upmarket womenswear in traditional materials marketed under his own name. Marks recognized the need for a less expensive but carefully conceived womenswear collection for a broader market. Marks introduced the French Connection label in 1972 and four years later showed its first menswear collection.

The firm was one of the first British companies to address the market for well-designed, accessible men’s casualwear, and soon expanded into both formal and informal clothes for men, women, and children. The childrenswear range, for children aged six to 16, began as a scaled-down version of the primary French Connection womenswear and menswear collections, using the same designs, fabrics, and sources of manufacture and including everything from t-shirts to tailored clothing. The lion’s share of revenue, however, remained the menswear division which grew exponentially since its origination.

French Connection design studios were based at the company’s headquarters at Bow, East London, and led by Nicole Farhi, who trained in Paris and worked for many major French and Italian companies before joining the firm in 1978. She was the designer in charge of the company’s entire range, as well as having her own label. French Connection’s design philosophy, in its own words, was to “always give its product that extra fashion content and value,” for clothes “remarkable for their comfort and reliability, their continuing anticipation of fashion trends in fabrics, shape, lengths, and styles and their attention to detail.”

Womenswear and menswear collections were produced in several annual collections, for summer and winter as well as mid-season ranges in between. These collections represented some 1,000 new designs each year, in a wide variety of fabrics, cuts, and styles from formal clothes to leisurewear. A summer collection for women, for example, might include the extremes of straps and Lycra in a salute to minimalism, while also featuring elegantly classic navy and white prints. A winter menswear collection “translates a look of understated distinction,” while including “untraditional fabrics, colorful cables, and crunchy winter whites with primitive embroidery.”

After nearly failing in the late 1980s, French Connection was once again one of the hottest and fastest growing brands in Britain during the late 1990s and early 2000s, thanks in large part to its controversial and suggestive marketing campaign, and subsequent rebranding under the “fcuk” logo. Thought the letters did represent the firm’s initials (French Connection UK), it was controversial due to its use by porn purveyors on the Internet to get around censors.

Although the company creates apparel and accessories loved by young consumers, its growth was attributed to an aggressive marketing campaign, launched in 1997 using posters, print ads, and publicity to reach young consumers with slogans based on the new logo. The ads, as well as the company’s website, attracted the notice of the UK’s Advertising Standards Authority, resulting in some censorship, but more than enough publicity to make up for it. The campaign was so successful French Connection decided to rebrand itself under the “fcuk” name, creating packaging, hangtags, and store designs reflecting the logo and minimizing the French Connection name. As of 2001, the company had 60 stores in the England as well as 2,000 other outlets in the UK; its Oxford Street store in London boasted a banner with the words “the world’s biggest fcuk.”

French Connection has expanded through licensing into a wide variety of accessories and apparel as well as into other products such as home furnishings, footwear, health and beauty products, condoms, and alcoholic drinks. All are closely tied to the risqué corporate image, marketed under subbrands such as fcuk spirit, fcuk at home, fcuk spa, and fcuk vision. The goal is to become a lifestyle brand rather than simply a fashion retailer, as executives told In-Store Marketing in November 2000.

French Connection maintains its highest profile in the UK but has expanded across the world, especially into the U.S. market. It had been present in America for nearly 20 years, but its recognition factor was raised significantly when the “fcuk” advertising campaign came to the country in 1999. The advertising generated similar controversy in the U.S. as it did in the UK—albeit to a lesser extent—such as when New York cabbies refused to drive with the posters on their roofs and Mayor Rudolph Giuliani vocally protested the slogans.

French Connection launched a flagship store in San Francisco, patterned after its London flagship, in 2001, bringing the total number of stores to 50 in the U.S. and 150 around the world. After less-than-rosy results in its U.S. operations in the late 1990s and early 2000s, the firm purchased the remainder of its U.S. business (it had previously owned half) in February 2001, and prepared for a major expansion effort. In 2001, fcuk began its first nonprint advertising campaign, with its controversial positioning maintained, but in a slightly more subliminal way. According to Marketing (21 June 2001), the ads showed a couple kissing and whispering to each other with words beginning in "f, c, u" and "k." The woman's head then moves down the man's chest until it is invisible under the frame of the screen, and the man says, "FC you kinky bugger." The ad ends with a fcuk-logoed condom. The ad ran in cinemas in the UK because it was rejected for television; in the U.S., it ran on cable networks such as MTV.

The company's controversy-based strategy seemed to be working, as sales and earnings rose at a pace of 20 percent annually for several years, despite a lagging retail marketplace. The Nicole Farhi label also continues to be strong and the firm segued into mail order by purchasing a direct response company, Toast, which focused on home furnishings and women's apparel. Although marketing spurred French Connection's growth, its apparel and other products have kept customers coming back.

—Doreen Ehrlich; updated by Karen Raugust

FREUD, Bella

British designer

Born: London, 17 April 1961. Education: Attended Michael Hall School, Forest Row, East Sussex. Left school at 16 to work as shop

Bella Freud in ca. 1980–90. © Mike Laye/CORBIS.

assistant to Vivienne Westwood, London, 1977. Studied at Accademia di Costume e di Moda, Rome, and tailoring at the Istituto Mariotti, Rome. Career: Design assistant to Vivienne Westwood, circa 1980–83; launched own label, 1989; showed collection for first time at London Designer Show, October 1991; capsule collection for Stirling Cooper, Bella Freud for Stirling Cooper, 1994; consultant designer to Dewhurst, manufacturers for Marks and Spencer Plc, 1994. Exhibitions: Court Couture exhibition, Kensington Palace, London, 1991. Collections: Victoria and Albert Museum, London. Awards: British Fashion Council Innovative Design New Generation award, 1991. Address: 21 St. Charles Square, London W10 6EF, England.

PUBLICATIONS

On FREUD:

Articles

- Casadio, Mariuccia, "Bella Freud," in Interview (New York), August 1991.
 Baker, Lindsay, "Freud's World of Dreams," in The Guardian (London), 16 September 1991.
 Tredre, Roger, "The Fears and Dreams of Bella Freud," in The Independent (London), 10 October 1991.
 Brampton, Sally, "Joined by the Hip," in the Times Magazine (London), 28 December 1991.
 Lender, Heidi, "A Freudian Clip," in Women's Wear Daily (New York), 8 January 1992.
 Ferguson, Stephanie, "Living with Labels," in the Sunday Times Magazine (London), 5 April 1992.
 Woram, Catherine, "Freudian Analysis," in Australian Collections Magazine, Autumn/Winter 1992.
 Harris, Martyn, "The Art of Not Coming Apart at the Seams," in the Daily Telegraph (London), 8 October 1992.
 Kay, Karen, "Me and My Style by Bella Freud," in the Daily Mirror (London), 20 October 1993.
 Armstrong, Lisa, "Safe Sex," in Vogue (London), February 1994.
 Watson, Shane, "Freud's Kinky Years in Morocco," 31 January 1999, from the website (www.kwfc.com).
 "Ring My Bella," from the Vogue Daily website, (www.vogue.co.uk).

* * *

Bella Freud is known for her whimsical designs which include somewhat kitschy elements, colorful knitwear, and modern tailoring. Essentially, her designs are recognizably British, but as one of Freud's friends described, "Chanel gone kinky." Bella, the great-granddaughter of psychoanalyst Sigmund Freud and the daughter of painter Lucien Freud (who designed her logo), is now part of the London fashion establishment.

Freud's involvement with British fashion began in 1977 when, at the age of 16, she was offered a job by Vivienne Westwood at her World's End shop, then called Seditionaries. Freud decided to study fashion in Rome and left Westwood's shop for Italy where for the next three years she studied fashion at the Accademia di Costume e di Moda, tailoring at the Istituto Mariotti, and designed shoes for private clients in her spare time. Freud completed her fashion training under Vivienne Westwood (who is held in high regard for her tailoring technique) where she worked as an assistant in the Westwood design studio for four years.

effort. In 2001, fcuk began its first nonprint advertising campaign, with its controversial positioning maintained, but in a slightly more subliminal way. According to Marketing (21 June 2001), the ads showed a couple kissing and whispering to each other with words beginning in “f, c, u” and “k.” The woman’s head then moves down the man’s chest until it is invisible under the frame of the screen, and the man says, “FC you kinky bugger.” The ad ends with a fcuk-logoed condom. The ad ran in cinemas in the UK because it was rejected for television; in the U.S., it ran on cable networks such as MTV.

The company’s controversy-based strategy seemed to be working, as sales and earnings rose at a pace of 20 percent annually for several years, despite a lagging retail marketplace. The Nicole Farhi label also continues to be strong and the firm segued into mail order by purchasing a direct response company, Toast, which focused on home furnishings and women’s apparel. Although marketing spurred French Connection’s growth, its apparel and other products have kept customers coming back.

—Doreen Ehrlich; updated by Karen Raugust

FREUD, Bella

British designer

Born: London, 17 April 1961. Education: Attended Michael Hall School, Forest Row, East Sussex. Left school at 16 to work as shop

Bella Freud in ca. 1980–90. © Mike Laye/CORBIS.

assistant to Vivienne Westwood, London, 1977. Studied at Accademia di Costume e di Moda, Rome, and tailoring at the Istituto Mariotti, Rome. Career: Design assistant to Vivienne Westwood, circa 1980–83; launched own label, 1989; showed collection for first time at London Designer Show, October 1991; capsule collection for Stirling Cooper, Bella Freud for Stirling Cooper, 1994; consultant designer to Dewhurst, manufacturers for Marks and Spencer Plc, 1994. Exhibitions: Court Couture exhibition, Kensington Palace, London, 1991. Collections: Victoria and Albert Museum, London. Awards: British Fashion Council Innovative Design New Generation award, 1991. Address: 21 St. Charles Square, London W10 6EF, England.

PUBLICATIONS

On FREUD:

Articles

- Casadio, Mariuccia, “Bella Freud,” in Interview (New York), August 1991.
 Baker, Lindsay, “Freud’s World of Dreams,” in The Guardian (London), 16 September 1991.
 Tredre, Roger, “The Fears and Dreams of Bella Freud,” in The Independent (London), 10 October 1991.
 Brampton, Sally, “Joined by the Hip,” in the Times Magazine (London), 28 December 1991.
 Lender, Heidi, “A Freudian Clip,” in Women’s Wear Daily (New York), 8 January 1992.
 Ferguson, Stephanie, “Living with Labels,” in the Sunday Times Magazine (London), 5 April 1992.
 Woram, Catherine, “Freudian Analysis,” in Australian Collections Magazine, Autumn/Winter 1992.
 Harris, Martyn, “The Art of Not Coming Apart at the Seams,” in the Daily Telegraph (London), 8 October 1992.
 Kay, Karen, “Me and My Style by Bella Freud,” in the Daily Mirror (London), 20 October 1993.
 Armstrong, Lisa, “Safe Sex,” in Vogue (London), February 1994.
 Watson, Shane, “Freud’s Kinky Years in Morocco,” 31 January 1999, from the website (www.kwfc.com).
 “Ring My Bella,” from the Vogue Daily website, (www.vogue.co.uk).

* * *

Bella Freud is known for her whimsical designs which include somewhat kitschy elements, colorful knitwear, and modern tailoring. Essentially, her designs are recognizably British, but as one of Freud’s friends described, “Chanel gone kinky.” Bella, the great-granddaughter of psychoanalyst Sigmund Freud and the daughter of painter Lucien Freud (who designed her logo), is now part of the London fashion establishment.

Freud’s involvement with British fashion began in 1977 when, at the age of 16, she was offered a job by Vivienne Westwood at her World’s End shop, then called Seditionaries. Freud decided to study fashion in Rome and left Westwood’s shop for Italy where for the next three years she studied fashion at the Accademia di Costume e di Moda, tailoring at the Istituto Mariotti, and designed shoes for private clients in her spare time. Freud completed her fashion training under Vivienne Westwood (who is held in high regard for her tailoring technique) where she worked as an assistant in the Westwood design studio for four years.

It was in 1989 that Freud decided the time was right to launch her own label—a move many thought was foolhardy—with Britain in the midst of recession. Freud presented her first collection for fall/winter 1991 in March 1990, which consisted of tailored knitwear and accessories. Her “violin case” bags, typical of her slightly quirky style, were photographed by Vogue magazine in New York. The following season the designer added tailored pieces to the collection which were manufactured for her in Italy. Knitwear continued to play an important role in Freud’s collections and became a Freudian hallmark, along with the bags and shoes which made up the total Freud look. Success and recognition came in October 1991, when she launched a collection at the London Designer Show exhibition for the first time, the very same month she was named Young Innovative Fashion Designer of the Year at the British Fashion Awards ceremony.

Freud’s designs are an interesting combination of tailored pieces which have a somewhat prim air about them, teamed with short skirts and ultra-high-heeled shoes—blending an air of innocence with provocative appeal. The designer cites the Edwardian period as being a major source of inspiration, with its formal silhouette and what Freud describes as its “suppressed-looking” style. Other important influences include designers Coco Chanel and Yves Saint Laurent and, not surprisingly, her mentor Vivienne Westwood. Westwood’s influence is evident in Freud’s decidedly English-styled tailoring, although it is somewhat less structured, which Freud admits she owes to the Italian influence during her fashion training: “Their tailoring is much more extravagant—and sexy—whereas English tailoring is much plainer.” Eveningwear by Freud is more glamorous and has included floor-length satin sheaths and crêpe gowns with maribou cuffs in a distinctive 1940s-style air. Freud’s little day dresses, which come in both stretch fabrics and as more tailored shapes, also possess the same balance of formality and quietly provocative sex appeal.

For spring/summer 1993 Freud introduced a range of denim pieces which included a jeans-style dress, jacket, and trousers, and these soon became an established part of each collection, produced in different designs and colored denims. Freud also works closely with milliner Philip Treacy who has designed the hats for her collections. Fashion journalist Lisa Armstrong, writing for the February 1994 issue of London Vogue, succinctly described Freud’s style as being “...a bit like Sharon Stone wearing a St. Trinian’s uniform designed by a Paris couturier.”

Freud is typical of the new breed of young British designers who emerged during the 1990s; they concentrated upon building their businesses at a slower, more carefully-planned rate than their predecessors who, in the early 1980s, came and went at an alarming rate. Freud set up her business in what she described as a “humble way” and gradually built up a reputation that established her as a recognized name in British fashion.

In 2000 Freud became the fashion designer for Jaeger, a century-old label known for its reliably traditional clothing often associated with wealthy countrywomen and school teachers. Jaeger hired Freud to update its image and since Freud has always relied on traditional English fabrics and tailoring, the outcome should be interesting. Imagine Jaeger hiring a designer whose clients have included Madonna, Jerry Hall, and Courtney Love! According to Pat Burnett, Jaeger’s chief executive, “Freud will add a bit of wit, fun and frippery.”

In addition to using traditional British styles, Freud has also relied on the elements and style of dress that she was accustomed to while growing up in Morocco. As a child, she was “mad about uniforms” and even wanted her mother to dress in a kaftan with a veil “like all the other mothers.” She became aware of the importance of clothes and wanted her own clothes “to be like armor,” to make her feel like she could “forget about myself.” Yet as an adult, in dealing with fashion, Freud contends that “when you look fantastic then you can stop worrying.” Fans of Freud can learn more about her childhood in the video Hideous Kinky, a film based on her sister Esther Freud’s fictionalized account of their early life in Marrakesh.

—Catherine Woram; updated by Christine Miner Minderovic

FUJIWARA, Giuliano

Japanese designer working in Italy

Education: Studied law and oriental literature at Chuo University, and design at Bunka College of Fashion, Tokyo. Career: Designer, Van Jacket, Japan; immigrated to Italy, 1976; designer, Barbas, beginning 1976; designer, Giuliano Fujiwara, Srl, from 1986; women’s collection introduced, 1988. Address: Via della Spiga 2, 20121 Milan, Italy.

Giuliano Fujiwara, spring/summer 2001 collection. © AP/Wide World Photos.

It was in 1989 that Freud decided the time was right to launch her own label—a move many thought was foolhardy—with Britain in the midst of recession. Freud presented her first collection for fall/winter 1991 in March 1990, which consisted of tailored knitwear and accessories. Her “violin case” bags, typical of her slightly quirky style, were photographed by Vogue magazine in New York. The following season the designer added tailored pieces to the collection which were manufactured for her in Italy. Knitwear continued to play an important role in Freud’s collections and became a Freudian hallmark, along with the bags and shoes which made up the total Freud look. Success and recognition came in October 1991, when she launched a collection at the London Designer Show exhibition for the first time, the very same month she was named Young Innovative Fashion Designer of the Year at the British Fashion Awards ceremony.

Freud’s designs are an interesting combination of tailored pieces which have a somewhat prim air about them, teamed with short skirts and ultra-high-heeled shoes—blending an air of innocence with provocative appeal. The designer cites the Edwardian period as being a major source of inspiration, with its formal silhouette and what Freud describes as its “suppressed-looking” style. Other important influences include designers Coco Chanel and Yves Saint Laurent and, not surprisingly, her mentor Vivienne Westwood. Westwood’s influence is evident in Freud’s decidedly English-styled tailoring, although it is somewhat less structured, which Freud admits she owes to the Italian influence during her fashion training: “Their tailoring is much more extravagant—and sexy—whereas English tailoring is much plainer.” Eveningwear by Freud is more glamorous and has included floor-length satin sheaths and crêpe gowns with maribou cuffs in a distinctive 1940s-style air. Freud’s little day dresses, which come in both stretch fabrics and as more tailored shapes, also possess the same balance of formality and quietly provocative sex appeal.

For spring/summer 1993 Freud introduced a range of denim pieces which included a jeans-style dress, jacket, and trousers, and these soon became an established part of each collection, produced in different designs and colored denims. Freud also works closely with milliner Philip Treacy who has designed the hats for her collections. Fashion journalist Lisa Armstrong, writing for the February 1994 issue of London Vogue, succinctly described Freud’s style as being “...a bit like Sharon Stone wearing a St. Trinian’s uniform designed by a Paris couturier.”

Freud is typical of the new breed of young British designers who emerged during the 1990s; they concentrated upon building their businesses at a slower, more carefully-planned rate than their predecessors who, in the early 1980s, came and went at an alarming rate. Freud set up her business in what she described as a “humble way” and gradually built up a reputation that established her as a recognized name in British fashion.

In 2000 Freud became the fashion designer for Jaeger, a century-old label known for its reliably traditional clothing often associated with wealthy countrywomen and school teachers. Jaeger hired Freud to update its image and since Freud has always relied on traditional English fabrics and tailoring, the outcome should be interesting. Imagine Jaeger hiring a designer whose clients have included Madonna, Jerry Hall, and Courtney Love! According to Pat Burnett, Jaeger’s chief executive, “Freud will add a bit of wit, fun and frippery.”

In addition to using traditional British styles, Freud has also relied on the elements and style of dress that she was accustomed to while growing up in Morocco. As a child, she was “mad about uniforms” and even wanted her mother to dress in a kaftan with a veil “like all the other mothers.” She became aware of the importance of clothes and wanted her own clothes “to be like armor,” to make her feel like she could “forget about myself.” Yet as an adult, in dealing with fashion, Freud contends that “when you look fantastic then you can stop worrying.” Fans of Freud can learn more about her childhood in the video Hideous Kinky, a film based on her sister Esther Freud’s fictionalized account of their early life in Marrakesh.

—Catherine Woram; updated by Christine Miner Minderovic

FUJIWARA, Giuliano

Japanese designer working in Italy

Education: Studied law and oriental literature at Chuo University, and design at Bunka College of Fashion, Tokyo. Career: Designer, Van Jacket, Japan; immigrated to Italy, 1976; designer, Barbas, beginning 1976; designer, Giuliano Fujiwara, Srl, from 1986; women’s collection introduced, 1988. Address: Via della Spiga 2, 20121 Milan, Italy.

Giuliano Fujiwara, spring/summer 2001 collection. © AP/Wide World Photos.

PUBLICATIONSOn FUJIWARA:*Articles

- Lobrano, Alexander, "East Meets West in Giuliano Fujiwara," magazine supplement to the Daily News Record (DNR), 29 June 1987.
- Fressola, Peter, and Alexander Lobrano, "Italian Collections Fall/Winter 1988," in DNR, 20 January 1988.
- "Italian Collections Spring/Summer 1989," in DNR, 13 July 1988.
- Lobrano, Alexander, "Milan Sets Stage for 1990s Code," in DNR, 7 July 1989.
- "Giuliano Fujiwara," online at FirstView, www.firstview.com, 9 June 2001.

* * *

It is paradoxical for Giuliano Fujiwara to be based in Milan, working as a part of the Italian fashion design community. Characteristically Japanese, Fujiwara seems antithetical to everything Italian. He is introverted while Italians are generally extroverted. He understates while Italians exaggerate. He is reserved while Italians are expressive. Nevertheless, he seems comfortable in Milan where he has lived and worked since 1976, first as a designer for Barbas and then creating his own line of menswear. "If I stayed in Japan," Fujiwara muses, "my work might have followed the direction of Comme des Garçons and Yohji Yamamoto." Presumably he is talking about the Japanese fashion environment, which encourages avant-garde approaches to menswear.

The Fujiwara style is a curious mixture of American Ivy League, Japanese stark simplicity, and Italian sensitivity in fabrication and workmanship. Take a typical Fujiwara jacket: it has many similarities to the traditional American style—a straight-cut body, the high button stance, small lapels, the jacket length shorter than the Savile Row prototype. "The Ivy League style was my first love. I loved the way JFK looked," he says, remembering his college days when he organized a group to study the manner of dressing. His first job was with a company called Van Jacket. Although it has long been defunct, Van was a catalyst in propagating the Ivy League look in post-World War II Japan, and its influence is felt even today, as in Fujiwara's case.

"Traditional menswear is restricted with numerous rules. My clothes are based on the classic look, but I have eliminated inflexible rules," says Fujiwara. Such a method, however, is not Fujiwara's monopoly. Rather, it is the basic principle for most Milanese designers, with Giorgio Armani being the most notable example. What distinguishes the Fujiwara look from the others is its stoic cleanliness and serene simplicity. To paraphrase, his clothes are disciplined and refined, but lack carnal sexiness. Fujiwara readily agrees; he hates macho images, such as exposed hairy chests and brash exhibition of the male body. When he shows coarsely knit sweaters or open-neck shirts, his models always wear t-shirts under them. Nor does he like slouchy looks: his trousers are always cut at the top of the shoes, or above. He is quite definite about the choice of colors, too, eschewing dayglo brights or ice cream pastels.

These likes and dislikes reflect his concept of masculinity which derives from his nostalgia for old Japan. "I like the image of men from the Meiji and Taisho periods (1862–1926)," says Fujiwara. "They were slightly rough around the edges and gutsy and robust inside." These men, however, were taught not to show inner feelings and weaknesses, and excessive concern for one's appearance was looked down upon as a sign of shallowness or femininity. "At the same time," Fujiwara continues, "I also like the certain roguish charm of Italian men."

Since he launched his own business in 1986, Fujiwara's silhouette has changed little, but his clothes are refreshed each season with innovative details. Intricate inlays and patchwork, oddly placed extra pockets, decorative stitching and pipings, and many other clever ideas are delights for Fujiwara fans who are rather limited in number at this writing. "It takes much longer to build business on your convictions than on trendy fashions. But unless you stick to your guns, I see no reason to be in this business," he says, and he counts stubbornness as one of the essential qualities of a designer.

In January 1988, Fujiwara began experimenting with three- and four-button sport and suit coats cut full for the athletic build and military posture, but overplayed styling with hoods, toggles, and bows. For spring/summer 1989, he caught the pacesetter's eye with unusual details for Europe—tweed and pleated center vents on suit coats, precisely tailored cutaway jackets, bell bottoms, and decorative belts, lapels, plackets, and yokes. Long on variation, his focus on boxy short jackets as well as trim and longer styles took the yawn out of menswear. Full-chested topcoats reaching to the knee brought kudos from the out-of-the-ordinary buyer. He made the greatest hit with a three-button suit in straw-toned lined, a red-laced suit lapel, body defining back seams, and jersey motorcycle jackets.

Fujiwara's 1990s nostalgia brought back the wide-wale seersucker jackets, but failed to dim his Eurasian charm after twelve years's residency in Italy. His Ivy League sack suits in male monochrome beige, sage, charcoal, and navy stuck to the plain-Jane American lines of the Kennedy years marked by a few quirks, notably, tab-waist short-sleeve shirts and a jacket with lapel zipper. Still looking to the past in 2001, he let black set an ascetic tone and mood in sleek leather and structured basics. For a change, he tied a scarf at the waist of his waterproof Transylvanian cloak. His choice for winter 2002 was a body-conscious layered look with glossy leather gloves and belts to define waistbands.

—Yoko Hamada; updated by Mary Ellen Snodgrass

FURSTENBERG, Diane Von

See VON FURSTENBERG, Diane

G

GABBANA, Stefano

See DOLCE & GABBANA

GALANOS, James

American designer

Born: Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, 20 September 1924. Education: Studied at the Traphagen School of Fashion, New York, 1942–43.

James Galanos, 1964 collection: brocade evening dress with a gold mesh top and matching brocade coat. © AP/Wide World Photos.

Career: General assistant, Hattie Carnegie, New York, 1944–45; sketch artist for Jean Louis, Columbia Pictures, Hollywood, 1946–47; apprentice designer, Robert Piguet, Paris, 1947–48; designer, Davidow, New York, 1948–49; designer, Galanos Originals, from 1951; first showing, New York, 1952; licenses include Parfums Galanos, 1980, and Galanos Furs, introduced in 1984; retired, late 1990s. Exhibitions: Galanos Retrospective, 1952–74, Costume Council of the Los Angeles County Museum of Art, 1975; Galanos—25 Years, Fashion Institute of Technology, New York, 1976; Los Angeles County Museum of Art, 1997 (retrospective); Smithsonian Institution; Metropolitan Museum; Brooklyn Museum; Philadelphia Museum; Ohio State University; Dallas Museum of Art. Awards: Coty American Fashion Critics award, 1954, 1956; Neiman Marcus award, Dallas, 1954; Filene's Young Talent Design award, Boston, 1958; Cotton Fashion award, 1958; Coty American Hall of Fame award, 1959; Sunday Times International Fashion award, London, 1965; Council of Fashion Designers of America Lifetime Achievement award, 1985; Stanley award, 1986; inducted, Fashion Walk of Fame, Seventh Avenue, New York, 2001. Address: 2254 South Sepulveda Boulevard, Los Angeles, CA 90064, USA.

PUBLICATIONS

On GALANOS:

Books

- Bender, Marylin, The Beautiful People, New York, 1967.
Waltz, Barbara, and Bernadine Morris, The Fashion Makers, New York, 1978.
Diamonstein, Barbaralee, Fashion: The Inside Story, New York, 1985.
Milbank, Caroline Rennolds, Couture: The Great Designers, New York, 1985.
———, New York Fashion: The Evolution of American Style, New York, 1989.
Stegemeyer, Anne, Who's Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.

Articles

- Donovan, Carrie, "Good as Gold Clothes," in the New York Times, 23 November 1980.
Morrow, Suzanne Stark, "The World of James Galanos," in Architectural Digest, October 1981.
Talley, André Leon, "A Certain Quality: Galanos," in Vogue (New York), April 1985.
Batterberry, Ariane and Michael, "The Loner," in Connoisseur (New York), May 1985.
Milbank, Caroline Rennolds, "James Galanos: Disciplined Elegance in the Hollywood Hills," in Architectural Digest, September 1988.

- Morris, Bernadine, "By Galanos, the Simplest of Splendors," in the New York Times, 27 February 1990.
- "A Galanos...Why is It Worth It?" in Harper's Bazaar, June 1991.
- Morris, Bernadine, "Galanos Has the Last Word for Fall," in the New York Times, 24 August 1993.
- Hainey, Bruce, "James Galanos: Art Exhibit," in Artforum, September 1997.
- Givhan, Robin, "Saluting Fashion's Ageless Wonders," in the Washington Post, 20 July 2001.

* * *

Dedication to excellence, in craftsmanship and design, was the foundation of James Galanos' career. The quality of workmanship found in his clothing is unsurpassed in America today. It may seem a contradiction that his sophisticated, mature, and elegant clothing was designed and produced in southern California, traditionally the land of sportswear. But Galanos was satisfied to remain where he began his business in 1951, a continent away from New York and the center of the American fashion industry.

Galanos knew what he wanted to do early in life and pursued his dream to design school, an internship in Paris, and several design positions with companies in New York. When the opportunity arose for him to open his own company, he created a small collection, which was immediately ordered by Saks Fifth Avenue. From this first collection his clothing has been admired for its particularly high quality, especially considering it was ready-to-wear, not custom-made. His chiffon dresses in particular made his reputation in the early 1950s, with their yards of meticulously hand-rolled edges.

Galanos gathered some of the most talented craftspersons available in his workrooms; many were trained in Europe or in the costume studios of Hollywood. If his work is compared to that of anyone else, it is compared to French haute couture. His business was more comparable to a couture house than a ready-to-wear manufacturer; there was an astonishing amount of hand work in each garment and all of his famous beadwork and embroidery is done by his staff. Galanos always chose fabrics and trimmings personally during trips to Europe. He lined dresses with silks that other designers used for dresses themselves; and was always a firm believer in the importance of hidden details, such as exquisite silk linings. These details made a difference in the feel of the clothes on the body and the hang of the fabric, and his clients all over the world were happy to pay for them.

Many of the world's most socially prominent women were Galanos customers. In the 1980s, he made national headlines as one of First Lady Nancy Reagan's favorite designers. The fact that Mrs. Reagan wore a 14-year-old Galanos to her first state dinner at the White House attests to the timelessness and durability not only of his workmanship, but more importantly, of his design. This type of occurrence was commonplace among his faithful customers.

His silhouette remained narrow with a fluid ease and Galanos continued to refine his shapes until his retirement in the late 1990s. If his design stylings changed in 50 years of business, they became more simple and refined. Not one to be satisfied with past success, Galanos relished the challenge of creating the perfect black dress. But despite his fondness for black in design, he was also known for his brilliant and unusual combinations of darker shades. His masterful handling of chiffon and lace tended toward the softly tailored, staying away from excess fullness of any kind. Galanos was not necessarily synchronized with the rest of the fashion world; if the themes of his collections bore similarities to others from year to year, it was coincidental.

Galanos preferred to work somewhat in isolation, both geographically and ideologically. His goal was to make the most elegant clothing possible for a select group of the world's most sophisticated women. The number of women who he considers truly elegant became smaller than it was when his career began, but he certainly succeeded in his goal of providing the clothing they required. Even before his retirement, Galanos designs were collected by his customers like other objects of artistic value, and have been well represented in museum collections around the United States.

In the 21st century, James Galanos and his contributions to fashion continue to be revered. He was inducted into Seventh Avenue's Fashion Walk of Fame in New York City in July of 2001. The plaques, embedded in Seventh Avenue, like Hollywood's tribute to the stars, were awarded to Galanos, Donna Karan, Oscar de la Renta, and Pauline Trigère. Bonnie Cashin, Giorgio di Sant' Angelo, Anne Klein, and Charles James were also honored with Seventh Avenue plaques, posthumously.

—Melinda L. Watt; updated by Owen James

GALITZINE, Irene

Russian designer working in Rome

Born: Tiflis, Russia, 1916. Education: Studied art and design in Rome. Family: Married Silvio Medici. Career: Assistant, Fontana, circa 1945–48; established own import business, Rome, 1949; first collection, 1959; business closed 1968; worked as freelance designer, 1968–70; designer for own business, reopened as Princess Galitzine, from 1970. Awards: Filene award for new talent, Boston, 1959; Designer of the Year award, Italy, 1962; Sunday Times International Fashion award, 1965; Isabella d'Este award, Italy, 1965.

PUBLICATIONS

On GALITZINE:

Books

- Lambert, Eleanor, World of Fashion: People, Places, Resources, New York & London, 1976.
- Soli, Pia, Il genio antipatico (exhibition catalogue), Venice, 1984.
- Villa, Nora, Le regine della moda, Milan, 1985.
- Stegemeyer, Anne, Who's Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.

- Morris, Bernadine, "By Galanos, the Simplest of Splendors," in the New York Times, 27 February 1990.
- "A Galanos...Why is It Worth It?" in Harper's Bazaar, June 1991.
- Morris, Bernadine, "Galanos Has the Last Word for Fall," in the New York Times, 24 August 1993.
- Hainey, Bruce, "James Galanos: Art Exhibit," in Artforum, September 1997.
- Givhan, Robin, "Saluting Fashion's Ageless Wonders," in the Washington Post, 20 July 2001.

* * *

Dedication to excellence, in craftsmanship and design, was the foundation of James Galanos' career. The quality of workmanship found in his clothing is unsurpassed in America today. It may seem a contradiction that his sophisticated, mature, and elegant clothing was designed and produced in southern California, traditionally the land of sportswear. But Galanos was satisfied to remain where he began his business in 1951, a continent away from New York and the center of the American fashion industry.

Galanos knew what he wanted to do early in life and pursued his dream to design school, an internship in Paris, and several design positions with companies in New York. When the opportunity arose for him to open his own company, he created a small collection, which was immediately ordered by Saks Fifth Avenue. From this first collection his clothing has been admired for its particularly high quality, especially considering it was ready-to-wear, not custom-made. His chiffon dresses in particular made his reputation in the early 1950s, with their yards of meticulously hand-rolled edges.

Galanos gathered some of the most talented craftspersons available in his workrooms; many were trained in Europe or in the costume studios of Hollywood. If his work is compared to that of anyone else, it is compared to French haute couture. His business was more comparable to a couture house than a ready-to-wear manufacturer; there was an astonishing amount of hand work in each garment and all of his famous beadwork and embroidery is done by his staff. Galanos always chose fabrics and trimmings personally during trips to Europe. He lined dresses with silks that other designers used for dresses themselves; and was always a firm believer in the importance of hidden details, such as exquisite silk linings. These details made a difference in the feel of the clothes on the body and the hang of the fabric, and his clients all over the world were happy to pay for them.

Many of the world's most socially prominent women were Galanos customers. In the 1980s, he made national headlines as one of First Lady Nancy Reagan's favorite designers. The fact that Mrs. Reagan wore a 14-year-old Galanos to her first state dinner at the White House attests to the timelessness and durability not only of his workmanship, but more importantly, of his design. This type of occurrence was commonplace among his faithful customers.

His silhouette remained narrow with a fluid ease and Galanos continued to refine his shapes until his retirement in the late 1990s. If his design stylings changed in 50 years of business, they became more simple and refined. Not one to be satisfied with past success, Galanos relished the challenge of creating the perfect black dress. But despite his fondness for black in design, he was also known for his brilliant and unusual combinations of darker shades. His masterful handling of chiffon and lace tended toward the softly tailored, staying away from excess fullness of any kind. Galanos was not necessarily synchronized with the rest of the fashion world; if the themes of his collections bore similarities to others from year to year, it was coincidental.

Galanos preferred to work somewhat in isolation, both geographically and ideologically. His goal was to make the most elegant clothing possible for a select group of the world's most sophisticated women. The number of women who he considers truly elegant became smaller than it was when his career began, but he certainly succeeded in his goal of providing the clothing they required. Even before his retirement, Galanos designs were collected by his customers like other objects of artistic value, and have been well represented in museum collections around the United States.

In the 21st century, James Galanos and his contributions to fashion continue to be revered. He was inducted into Seventh Avenue's Fashion Walk of Fame in New York City in July of 2001. The plaques, embedded in Seventh Avenue, like Hollywood's tribute to the stars, were awarded to Galanos, Donna Karan, Oscar de la Renta, and Pauline Trigère. Bonnie Cashin, Giorgio di Sant' Angelo, Anne Klein, and Charles James were also honored with Seventh Avenue plaques, posthumously.

—Melinda L. Watt; updated by Owen James

GALITZINE, Irene

Russian designer working in Rome

Born: Tiflis, Russia, 1916. Education: Studied art and design in Rome. Family: Married Silvio Medici. Career: Assistant, Fontana, circa 1945–48; established own import business, Rome, 1949; first collection, 1959; business closed 1968; worked as freelance designer, 1968–70; designer for own business, reopened as Princess Galitzine, from 1970. Awards: Filene award for new talent, Boston, 1959; Designer of the Year award, Italy, 1962; Sunday Times International Fashion award, 1965; Isabella d'Este award, Italy, 1965.

PUBLICATIONS

On GALITZINE:

Books

- Lambert, Eleanor, World of Fashion: People, Places, Resources, New York & London, 1976.
- Soli, Pia, Il genio antipatico (exhibition catalogue), Venice, 1984.
- Villa, Nora, Le regine della moda, Milan, 1985.
- Stegemeyer, Anne, Who's Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.

Irene Galitzine, spring 1962 collection: silk gown with a chiffon cape in a pattern designed by her. © Bettmann/CORBIS.

Articles

- “Galitzine seta e lustrine: tutto scivola,” in Vogue (Milan), September 1984.
“Roma Alta Moda: Irene Galitzine,” in Vogue (Milan), September 1985.
Colen, Bruce, and Massimo Listri, “Princess Irene Galitzine: Rich Patterns in the Heart of Rome,” in Architectural Digest (Los Angeles), September 1988.

* * *

Nathaniel Hawthorne and Henry James were Americans who dreamed of Italy; after World War II, the dream was a film, Three Coins in a Fountain, eventually superseded by the Italian-made La Dolce Vita. Italian freedom and innate style held romance; Italian nobility in the fashion and beauty industries such as Emilio Pucci, Princess Marcella Borghese, and Princess Irene Galitzine were fairytale heroes.

In the 1950s and 1960s (launching her business in 1949), Princess Irene Galitzine exemplified Roman high style and the princely life. Diana Vreeland, then of Harper's Bazaar, dubbed Galitzine's full, liquid trousers for at-home leisure (introduced to a standing ovation at the Palazzo Pitti fashion showing in 1960) “palazzo pajamas” and every aura of Renaissance and romantic (and erotic) Italy flooded the American imagination. Galitzine's palazzo pajamas were, in fact, not wholly an invention, but they became in Galitzine's countless versions of uncompromising luxury a silken reverie.

The silks of Italy were a factor, but Galitzine was especially inventive in the elaboration of the palazzo pajamas, bringing to the leisure trousers expressions of alta moda embellishment. She treated the drapey silks as a scrim for attached necklaces in the manner of Mainbocher and created other illusions of encrusted ornament and articulated hems and sleeves with beads in a manner reminiscent of Fortuny's Murano bead edges, but even more of Renaissance paintings. Even with the comfort and casualness of palazzo pajamas, the wearer seemed to step out of a lustrous, bejewelled world of Renaissance art. Similarly, her decoration of hems, collars, and cuffs articulated countless Pierrots (often with long tops over either palazzo trousers or narrow trousers).

Irene Galitzine, spring/summer 1969 ready-to-wear collection: orange polka-dot minidress. © AP/Wide World Photos.

Galitzine used applied effects not only to establish the grandeur of what might otherwise lapse into a too casual mode, but also to apply a countervailing weight to the almost fly-away big cutting of her styles. Weight and the illusion of weight was an effective punctuation of the clothing. Likewise, in her signature toga top over trousers, the elaborate fibula at the shoulder not only secures, but gives a solid balance to the loose drape.

Roman grandeur led rather dramatically, in the 1960s, to the Cardin-like futurism in Galitzine's work. A quilted vinyl jumpsuit with matching helmet on the cover of the May 1966 Harper's Bazaar is of Brave New World anticipation, but continues to observe Galitzine's dress rationalism. In the same era, she was converting her palazzo pajamas into ensembles with Empire-waisted tops and boxy jackets in reinforcement of the new geometry. In fact, her clothing had always understood lifestyle and the reductivism of the 1960s. After a brief hiatus in the late 1960s, Galitzine reopened to show for spring/summer 1970. In this collection, she used bold graphics for trousers and dresses to be worn with sleeveless tunics, again a device that could seem to step out of a Renaissance painting or step forward into fantasies of outer space.

For a fashion designer able to trace her Russian ancestry back to Catherine the Great and insistent on her Russian style even as much as her Roman, Galitzine became the epitome of Roman style. "I've always tried to design new outlines that feel good on the body.... I don't care for clothes that you have to think about after you've put them on. No elegant woman ever looks ill at ease." Galitzine's formula for easy and comfortable dressing managed to combine the avowed comfort of the clothing with an unmistakable pomp of Roman refinement and the abiding presence of Italian Renaissance luster.

Always adding to the aura of Galitzine's design was her remarkable client list, the best of Italy and an international clientèle who discovered Italian clothing in the 1950s and 1960s. Architectural Digest, in a September 1988 article, remembered Eleanor Lambert remarking of a Galitzine show, "The audience is snob, not mob." Yet, the supreme evidence is Galitzine's clothing: luxurious, inventive, high-style casualness with grace.

—Richard Martin

GALLIANO, John

British designer

Born: Gibraltar, Spain, 1960. Education: Studied design at St. Martin's School of Art, London. Career: Graduation collection, Les Incroyables, sold to Brown's; freelance designer, establishing John Galliano fashion house, London, from 1984; designer for haute couture and ready-to-wear at Givenchy 1995–96; designer for haute couture and ready-to-wear at Christian Dior, from 1996; opened own shop in Bergdorf Goodman store, 1997; licensed fur line, 1998; opened shop in Saks Fifth Avenue, 2000; launched watch collection, 2001. Exhibitions: John Galliano at Dior, [retrospective], Design Museum of London, 2001–02. Awards: British Designer of Year award 1986, 1994, 1995; Bath Costume Museum Dress of the Year award, 1987; Telva award, Spain, 1995; International Fashion Group, Master of Fashion, 1997; Designer of the Year, Council of Fashion of America, 1998. Address: 60 Rue d'Avron, 75020 Paris, France. Website: www.dior.com.

PUBLICATIONS

On GALLIANO:

Books

Coleridge, Nicholas, The Fashion Conspiracy, London, 1988.

McDowell, Colin, Galliano, New York, 1997.

Watson, Linda, Vogue Twentieth Century Fashion: 100 Years of Style by Decade and Designer, London, 1999.

Articles

Brampton, Sally, "Capital Collections: John Galliano," in Elle (London), March 1987.

Irene Galitzine, spring/summer 1969 ready-to-wear collection: or-gandy minidress. © AP/Wide World Photos.

wearer seemed to step out of a lustrous, bejewelled world of Renaissance art. Similarly, her decoration of hems, collars, and cuffs articulated countless Pierrots (often with long tops over either palazzo trousers or narrow trousers).

Galitzine used applied effects not only to establish the grandeur of what might otherwise lapse into a too casual mode, but also to apply a countervailing weight to the almost fly-away big cutting of her styles. Weight and the illusion of weight was an effective punctuation of the clothing. Likewise, in her signature toga top over trousers, the elaborate fibula at the shoulder not only secures, but gives a solid balance to the loose drape.

Roman grandeur led rather dramatically, in the 1960s, to the Cardin-like futurism in Galitzine's work. A quilted vinyl jumpsuit with matching helmet on the cover of the May 1966 Harper's Bazaar is of Brave New World anticipation, but continues to observe Galitzine's dress rationalism. In the same era, she was converting her palazzo pajamas into ensembles with Empire-waisted tops and boxy jackets in reinforcement of the new geometry. In fact, her clothing had always understood lifestyle and the reductivism of the 1960s. After a brief hiatus in the late 1960s, Galitzine reopened to show for spring/summer 1970. In this collection, she used bold graphics for trousers and dresses to be worn with sleeveless tunics, again a device that could seem to step out of a Renaissance painting or step forward into fantasies of outer space.

For a fashion designer able to trace her Russian ancestry back to Catherine the Great and insistent on her Russian style even as much as her Roman, Galitzine became the epitome of Roman style. "I've always tried to design new outlines that feel good on the body.... I don't care for clothes that you have to think about after you've put them on. No elegant woman ever looks ill at ease." Galitzine's formula for easy and comfortable dressing managed to combine the avowed comfort of the clothing with an unmistakable pomp of Roman refinement and the abiding presence of Italian Renaissance luster.

Always adding to the aura of Galitzine's design was her remarkable client list, the best of Italy and an international clientèle who discovered Italian clothing in the 1950s and 1960s. Architectural Digest, in a September 1988 article, remembered Eleanor Lambert remarking of a Galitzine show, "The audience is snob, not mob." Yet, the supreme evidence is Galitzine's clothing: luxurious, inventive, high-style casualness with grace.

—Richard Martin

GALLIANO, John

British designer

Born: Gibraltar, Spain, 1960. Education: Studied design at St. Martin's School of Art, London. Career: Graduation collection, Les Incroyables, sold to Brown's; freelance designer, establishing John Galliano fashion house, London, from 1984; designer for haute couture and ready-to-wear at Givenchy 1995–96; designer for haute couture and ready-to-wear at Christian Dior, from 1996; opened own shop in Bergdorf Goodman store, 1997; licensed fur line, 1998; opened shop in Saks Fifth Avenue, 2000; launched watch collection, 2001. Exhibitions: John Galliano at Dior, [retrospective], Design Museum of London, 2001–02. Awards: British Designer of Year award 1986, 1994, 1995; Bath Costume Museum Dress of the Year award, 1987; Telva award, Spain, 1995; International Fashion Group, Master of Fashion, 1997; Designer of the Year, Council of Fashion of America, 1998. Address: 60 Rue d'Avron, 75020 Paris, France. Website: www.dior.com.

PUBLICATIONS

On GALLIANO:

Books

Coleridge, Nicholas, The Fashion Conspiracy, London, 1988.

McDowell, Colin, Galliano, New York, 1997.

Watson, Linda, Vogue Twentieth Century Fashion: 100 Years of Style by Decade and Designer, London, 1999.

Articles

Brampton, Sally, "Capital Collections: John Galliano," in Elle (London), March 1987.

John Galliano, designed for the house of Christian Dior's fall/winter 2000–01 haute couture collection. © AFP/CORBIS.

- Menkes, Suzy, "Jasper and John," in the Independent (London), 9 October 1987.
- Rumbold, Judy, "A Steal for Galliano," in The Guardian (London), 14 October 1987.
- Mower, Sarah, "London Follows Galliano," in The Observer (London), 18 October 1987.
- Coleman, Alix, "Viva Galliano!" in the Sunday Express Magazine (London), 8 November 1987.
- Filmer, Deny, "Designer Focus: John Galliano," in Cosmopolitan (London), February 1988.
- Jobey, Liz, "John Galliano: Romantic Hero," in Vogue (London), February 1988.
- Brampton, Sally, "The Great Galliano," in Elle (London), March 1988.
- Irvine, Susan, "Galliano and Co.," in Harrods Magazine, Spring 1988.
- Gasperini, Nicoletta, "John Galliano's Golden Year," in Donna (Milan), April 1988.
- Collin, Matthew, "The Boy Wonder: An Interview with John Galliano," in i-D (London), November 1989.
- Rumbold, Judy, "Galliano Leaps onto Centre Stage," in The Guardian, 26 February 1990.

- Dickson, Elizabeth, "A Life in the Day of John Galliano," in the Sunday Times Magazine, 1 March 1992.
- Billen, Andrew, "Galliano: Can He Really Cut It?" in The Observer Magazine, 28 February 1993.
- Reed, Julia, "Incurable Romantic," in Vogue, March 1993.
- Ingrassia, Michele, with Meggan Dally, "Dior Meets Disney World," in Newsweek, 26 December 1994.
- Mauriès, Patrick, "Ma Poulette, Quel Style," in Vogue (Paris), February 1995.
- "Sei Grande, Grande, Grande.../Nobody Does It Better," in Moda In (Modena), January–March 1995.
- Spindler, Amy M., "Four Who Have No Use for Trends," in the New York Times, 20 March 1995.
- Menkes, Suzy, "Show, Not Clothes, Becomes the Message," in the International Herald Tribune, 20 March 1995.
- Kerwin, Jessica, "Galliano in Gotham," in WWD, 23 May 1995.
- Weisman, Katherine, and Janet Ozzard, "The Galloping Galliano," in WWD, 9 September 1996.
- "Galliano Shop Bows with Bergdorf Gala," in WWD, 11 December 1997.
- "Galliano Sets Fur Line Debut," in WWD, 4 May 1998.
- Weisman, Katherine, "Galliano's Open-Dior Policy," in WWD, 3 December 1999.
- Dowd, Maureen, "Haute Homeless," in the New York Times, 23 January 2000.
- Givhan, Robin, "In Paris, Clothes Aren't Everything," in the Washington Post, 14 October 2000.
- Rubenstein, Hal, "The Look of Christian Dior," in In Style, 1 November 2000.
- Socha, Miles, "The Galliano Factor: Dior Lays Groundwork for 'Exceptional' 2001," in WWD, 16 January 2001.
- "Born Again Christians," in Time International, 19 February 2001.
- Sischy, Ingrid, "Inside Paris Fashion: John Galliano," in Interview, October 2001.

* * *

Experimental and innovative, John Galliano has become internationally renowned as one of Britain's most exciting designers, acclaimed from the start for his brilliance in cut and magpie-like ability to take inspiration from diverse sources to create a completely new look. Although his clothes are often difficult to understand when on the hanger—with collars that seem to be bows or halter necks that actually fit over the shoulders—they are frequently ahead of the current fashion trends and eventually filter down the clothing chain to the High Street, as well as being picked up by other designers. A favorite among fashion aficionados, Galliano was spotted as soon as his first student collection was completed and has continued to develop since, despite repeated problems with backers who have hampered his career.

As part of a new breed of avant-garde British designers, Galliano led the way in the mid-1980s with his historically influenced designs. This fascination for period detail and adaptation of traditional styles into highly contemporary pieces has continued throughout his work. Studying surviving garments in museums to learn about construction methods and different ways to cut and drape fabric to create new shapes inspired his innovative 18th-century Incroyables collection for his degree showing. He suffused this knowledge with other diverse influences to produce collections always exciting and different. His great belief in the necessity to push fashion forward by learning from the past—coupled with his skill at balancing his designs with modern ideals—has earned him the reputation of a prodigy.

John Galliano, designed for the house of Christian Dior's spring/summer 2001 haute couture collection. © AFP/CORBIS.

Every outfit is thought out to the last detail, producing a series of completely accessorized looks as Galliano constantly strives for perfection. His love of bias cut gives added fluidity to the asymmetrical hemlines of many of his designs, with a taste of 18th-century dandism thrown in, always with a surprise twist—often in his use of fabric, another area where Galliano loves to experiment and challenge. In one collection, he presented Napoleon-style jackets in bright neoprene, in another, devoré velvet bias-cut dresses clinging to the body, giving the element of sexiness that pervades his work. His love of shock gave us the camped-up glamour of his “underwear as outerwear,” with satin knickers worn with feathered bras and leather caps, tapping the trend for drag in the London clubs.

With Galliano’s Girl and, perhaps to an even greater extent, the largely denim and Lycra-based line Galliano Genes, the designer demonstrated his ability to redefine existing subcultures to develop clothes for the younger, funkier sisters of his mainline buyers. Produced at a cheaper cost by using less exclusive fabrics, these designs are nonetheless inventive. Three-way jackets can be worn with attached waistcoats outside or inside, and there are other basic items more commercially viable, confronting occasional claims from his critics that his work is too avant-garde and less popular than other European names.

The sheer breadth of vision in Galliano’s designs, which frequently rethink form and shape, and the great inventiveness of his cut have surely ensured his reputation as one of the best of British designers. The research he does before forming a collection—bringing together influences and details from the French Revolution to Afghan bankers to Paul Poiret—and his experimentation with fabrics demonstrate his dedication to pushing fashion and dress forward, yielding excitement and surprise in every collection.

Galliano stunned the fashion world in 1995 when he was named designer for Givenchy and became the first British designer appointed to lead an established French fashion house. In addition to designing for both haute couture and ready-to-wear at Givenchy, Galliano continued to show designs under his own label. By October 1996, the LVMH group moved Galliano to its crown jewel and appointed Galliano designer for haute couture and ready-to-wear collections at Christian Dior. Critics questioned whether Galliano’s maverick reputation would appeal to Dior’s established clientèle, but the designer arrived with the energy to shake up the haute couture world, which was showing signs of losing the interest, and sales, of its customers. In his spring/summer 1997 collection, Galliano took classic Dior themes and spun them together with exotic African Masai tribal forms to create silk evening dresses accented with colorful beaded choker necklaces. The collection presented a younger image yet remained glamorous and refined, definitely worthy of the Dior name.

Galliano’s collections have never failed to enchant, or shock, audiences. Each has expressed a theme complete with historic personalities and forces that have inspired Galliano’s creations for the season. Edwardian elegance, the surrealist movement, the Soviet or Red Guard, the movie The Matrix, or classic English sportsmen have all been at play in Galliano collections. His push for a more contemporary, sexier image has proven at times to be a difficult and frightening change at Dior.

In addition to his extravagant romanticism and love of the bias-cut gown, Galliano still retained much of his British bad boy flair. He drew public ire when the homeless theme in his spring 2000 collection included models in newspapers carrying empty liquor bottles and, in the following year’s spring collection, when runway models were accompanied by blared vulgar lyrics offering women for sale. Even his critics acknowledge Galliano has brought excitement and fun to haute couture, and customer interest may be his best vindication—by 2001 Dior sales had doubled since the arrival of Galliano four years earlier. The ever-inventive Galliano will continue to hold the fashion world’s attention and certainly keep it guessing for years to come.

—Rebecca Arnold; updated by Janette Goff Dixon

THE GAP

American apparel and accessories company

Founded: by Donald and Doris Fisher as a jeans retailer in San Francisco in 1969. Company History: Company expanded into great belief in the necessity to push fashion forward by learning from the past—coupled with his skill at balancing his designs with modern ideals—has earned him the reputation of a prodigy.

John Galliano, designed for the house of Christian Dior's spring/summer 2001 haute couture collection. © AFP/CORBIS.

Every outfit is thought out to the last detail, producing a series of completely accessorized looks as Galliano constantly strives for perfection. His love of bias cut gives added fluidity to the asymmetrical hemlines of many of his designs, with a taste of 18th-century dandism thrown in, always with a surprise twist—often in his use of fabric, another area where Galliano loves to experiment and challenge. In one collection, he presented Napoleon-style jackets in bright neoprene, in another, devoré velvet bias-cut dresses clinging to the body, giving the element of sexiness that pervades his work. His love of shock gave us the camped-up glamour of his “underwear as outerwear,” with satin knickers worn with feathered bras and leather caps, tapping the trend for drag in the London clubs.

With Galliano’s Girl and, perhaps to an even greater extent, the largely denim and Lycra-based line Galliano Genes, the designer demonstrated his ability to redefine existing subcultures to develop clothes for the younger, funkier sisters of his mainline buyers. Produced at a cheaper cost by using less exclusive fabrics, these designs are nonetheless inventive. Three-way jackets can be worn with attached waistcoats outside or inside, and there are other basic items more commercially viable, confronting occasional claims from his critics that his work is too avant-garde and less popular than other European names.

The sheer breadth of vision in Galliano’s designs, which frequently rethink form and shape, and the great inventiveness of his cut have surely ensured his reputation as one of the best of British designers. The research he does before forming a collection—bringing together influences and details from the French Revolution to Afghan bankers to Paul Poiret—and his experimentation with fabrics demonstrate his dedication to pushing fashion and dress forward, yielding excitement and surprise in every collection.

Galliano stunned the fashion world in 1995 when he was named designer for Givenchy and became the first British designer appointed to lead an established French fashion house. In addition to designing for both haute couture and ready-to-wear at Givenchy, Galliano continued to show designs under his own label. By October 1996, the LVMH group moved Galliano to its crown jewel and appointed Galliano designer for haute couture and ready-to-wear collections at Christian Dior. Critics questioned whether Galliano’s maverick reputation would appeal to Dior’s established clientèle, but the designer arrived with the energy to shake up the haute couture world, which was showing signs of losing the interest, and sales, of its customers. In his spring/summer 1997 collection, Galliano took classic Dior themes and spun them together with exotic African Masai tribal forms to create silk evening dresses accented with colorful beaded choker necklaces. The collection presented a younger image yet remained glamorous and refined, definitely worthy of the Dior name.

Galliano’s collections have never failed to enchant, or shock, audiences. Each has expressed a theme complete with historic personalities and forces that have inspired Galliano’s creations for the season. Edwardian elegance, the surrealist movement, the Soviet or Red Guard, the movie The Matrix, or classic English sportsmen have all been at play in Galliano collections. His push for a more contemporary, sexier image has proven at times to be a difficult and frightening change at Dior.

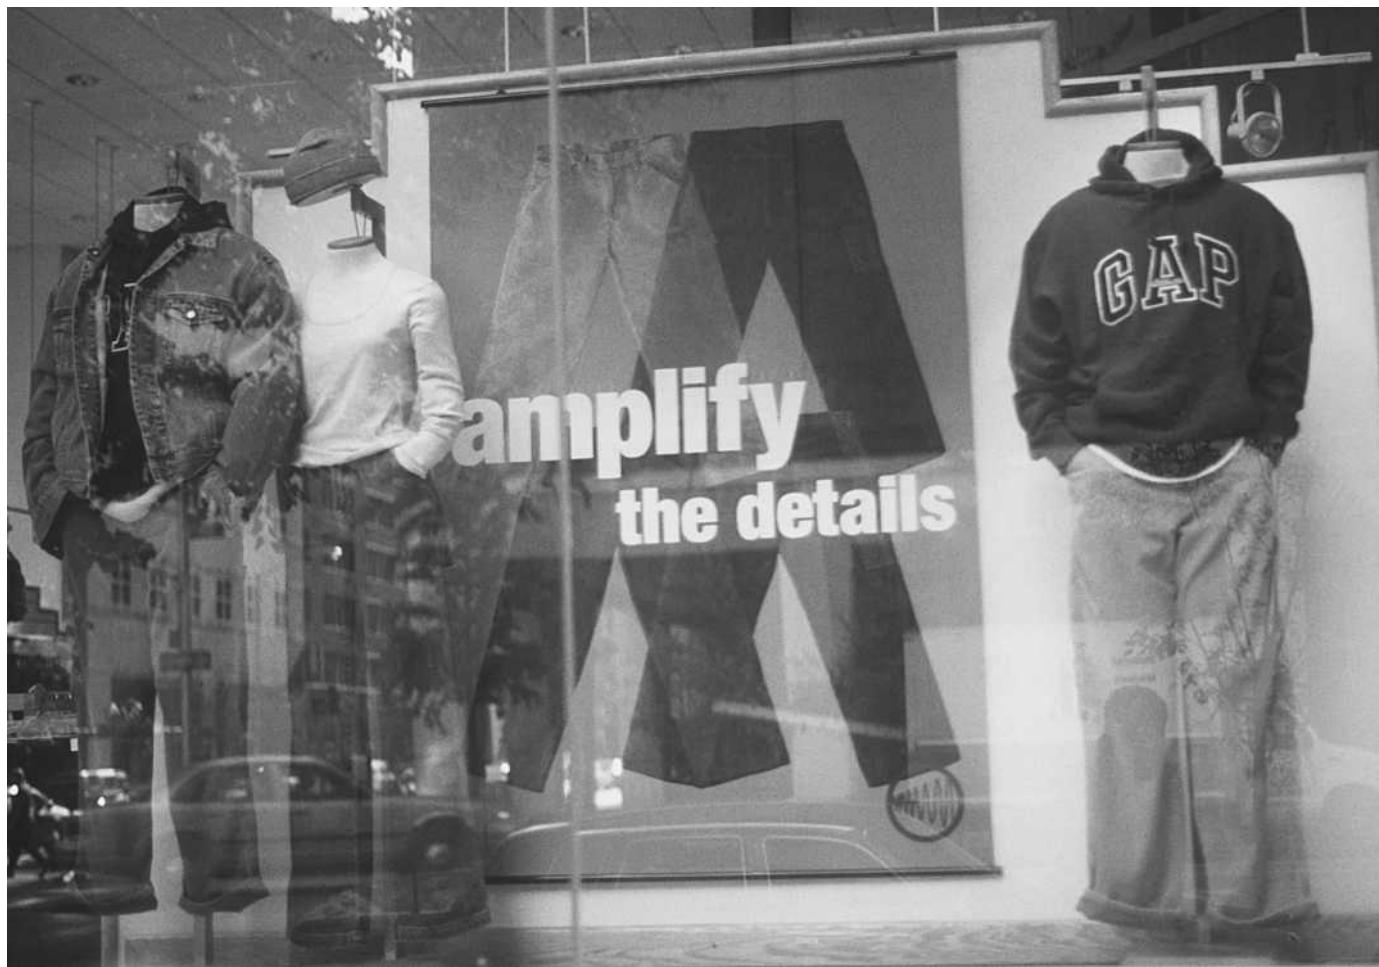

In addition to his extravagant romanticism and love of the bias-cut gown, Galliano still retained much of his British bad boy flair. He drew public ire when the homeless theme in his spring 2000 collection included models in newspapers carrying empty liquor bottles and, in the following year’s spring collection, when runway models were accompanied by blared vulgar lyrics offering women for sale. Even his critics acknowledge Galliano has brought excitement and fun to haute couture, and customer interest may be his best vindication—by 2001 Dior sales had doubled since the arrival of Galliano four years earlier. The ever-inventive Galliano will continue to hold the fashion world’s attention and certainly keep it guessing for years to come.

—Rebecca Arnold; updated by Janette Goff Dixon

THE GAP

American apparel and accessories company

Founded: by Donald and Doris Fisher as a jeans retailer in San Francisco in 1969. Company History: Company expanded into separates for men and women, and added proprietary brands, throughout the 1970s; went public on NYSE, 1976; added retail stores throughout the U.S. and abroad; purchased Banana Republic chain, 1983; GapKids introduced, 1986; BabyGap, 1989; GapShoes, 1993; Old Navy Clothing Company launched, 1994; bath and body products introduced, 1994; BodyGap established, 1998; reached 2,600 stores and sales of $9 billion, 1999; flagship Paris store opened, 1999; flagship London store, opened 2001; added sizing for larger women, 2001. Awards: Sales and Marketing Management Marketing Achievement award, 1991; American Choreography awards, Governor's award (for the support of dance), 2000. Company Address: 1 Harrison Street, San Francisco, California, 94105, USA. Company Website: www.gap.com.

Display window from a Gap store, fall 1998. © Fashion Syndicate Press.

PUBLICATIONS

On THE GAP:

Books

Hoover, Gary, et al., Hoover's Handbook of American Business 1994, Austin, TX, 1993.

Pederson, Jay P. (ed.), International Directory of Company Histories, Detroit, MI, 1996.

Articles

Forman, Ellen, "Widening The Gap," in DNR, 26 May 1987.

Conant, Jennet, "The Age of McFashion: Specialty Stores are Selling Prepackaged Style for Busy Shoppers," in Newsweek, 28 September 1987.

Callagher, Sue, and Ros Ormiston, "Filling The Gap," in Fashion Weekly (London), 16 November 1989.

Van Meter, Jonathan, "Fast Fashion," in Vogue, June 1990.

Kantrowitz, Barbara, "Now You Can Crawl into The Gap," in Newsweek, 29 October 1990.

"Ready, Set, Gap!" in Harper's Bazaar, February 1991.

Pogoda, Dianne M., and Thomas Ciampi, "Growing The Gap," in WWD, 6 January 1992.

Kahn, Alice, "Filling Every Gap...," in the New York Times 23 August 1992.

Tyrer, Kathy, "Back to Basics: Gap Too Hip for Its Britches in the Value-Oriented 1990s," in Adweek Western Advertising News, 9 November 1992.

Ozzard, Janet, "Is The Gap Losing Its Fashion Edge?" in WWD, 9 June 1993.

The Gap store on Sixth Avenue, New York City, winter 2000. © AP/Wide World Photos.

Mitchell, Russel, "The Gap Dolls Itself Up," in Business Week, 21 March 1994.

Strom, Stephanie, "How Gap Inc. Spells Revenge," in the New York Times, 24 April 1994.

"Who's Who in the American Sportswear Market 1995," in Sportswear International (New York), Vol. 13, May 1994.

Duff, Christina, "'Bobby Short Wore Khakis'—Who is He and Who Cares?" in the Wall Street Journal, 16 February 1995.

Caminiti, Susan, "Will Old Navy Fill The Gap?" in Fortune, 18 March 1996.

Bensimon, Giles, "How They Learned to Stop Worrying and Love The Gap," in Elle, April 1996.

Barboza, David, "The Gap Brings Wall Street a Casual Friday," in the New York Times, 27 September 1997.

Moomey, Kelly, "Banana Republic vs. The Gap vs. Old Navy," in Consumer Reports, May 1998.

"The Jean Pool," in Forbes, 11 October 1999.

"Mend that Gap," in Time, 14 February 2000.

Kaufman, Leslie, "Sales at Gap and Limited Spur Fears of Slow Season," in the New York Times, 30 November 2000.

"Gap Goes After Larger-Size Women," in Marketing to Women: Addressing Women and Women's Sensibilities, May 2001.

* * *

At a time when the disenfranchised youth of America threatened much of the status quo, a new store aptly named "The Gap" opened in San Francisco. It was 1969 and Donald Fisher, a successful real estate developer, had an idea to capitalize on the growing "generation gap," by offering young people what they wanted—blue jeans and music. While jeans made by the venerable Levi Strauss & Company could be found in local department stores, size and availability were restricted and the antiestablishment youth was unlikely to shop there. Fisher, along with his wife Doris, decided to fill this void in a hip, fully-stocked atmosphere.

The Fishers parlayed cool tunes and low-priced Levi's jeans into a chain of stores in California, then the remainder of the U.S. and eventually abroad. By continually changing its clothing (which had grown from just Levi's to shirts, skirts, shorts, jackets, and other casual separates) to keep up with the evolving trends of baby boomers, The Gap became a hip hangout for jeans lovers from 18 to 49 years of age. By the early 1970s Gap introduced its own labeled apparel and the company went public in 1976. Despite ups and downs in the ensuing years, The Gap remained a firm purveyor of style for the casually dressed crowd.

In the late 1980s Millard "Mickey" Drexler, formerly of Ann Taylor, revamped the Gap organization. From the ground up, Drexler recreated the company, ridding stores of all nonproprietary brands, bringing in a team of designers to produce casual apparel from natural fibers for men and women, then children (GapKids debuted in 1986, BabyGap in 1989). The Gap had begun print and media advertising in earnest, not only attracting new customers, but changing its image along the way. The Fishers had also acquired another California-based company, Banana Republic, and opened the first international Gap store in London.

In the 1990s BabyGap grew into a major retailer, Banana Republic experienced a welcome resurgence in popularity, and a new lower-priced franchise called Old Navy Clothing Company became an immediate success. In 1996 several titans of fashion, including Giorgio Armani, Nino Cerruti, Carolina Herrera, Todd Oldham, and Cynthia Rowley, paid tribute to the clothier in the April issue of Elle magazine, all wearing Gap apparel. There were now hundreds of Gap stores dotting Europe and increasingly renowned print and television advertising for both Gap and Old Navy. As the 20th century closed and the 21st arrived, the Fishers had retired but retained a healthy stake in the now-legendary clothing empire. The second generation of Fishers, three sons, worked in some capacity in the family business, while Mickey Drexler continued to reign in the executive suite. In nearly every metropolitan area was a Gap, GapKids, BabyGap, Banana Republic, or Old Navy store, or a combination storefront featuring both adult and children's clothing.

Shrewd marketing, tight control, exceptional quality, and consistency in an ever-evolving and inconsistent marketplace has kept The Gap, Inc. at the forefront of the apparel and accessories industry. There's Banana Republic for the higher-end market, Gap for the middle road, and Old Navy for lower-priced dressing with style and panache. With sales topping $11 billion by 2000, the Gap's empire seemed boundless; further evidence of the company's continuing acuity was its expansion into cyberspace, with a very popular website.

—Nelly Rhodes

GARAVANI, Valentino

See VALENTINO

GARRATT, Sandra

American designer

Born: Sandra Harrower in Milwaukee, Wisconsin, 16 December 1951, to British parents. Education: Graduated from Fashion Institute of Design and Merchandising, Los Angeles, 1975. Family: Married Michael Garratt in 1977; one son: Wesley. Career: Design assistant to Ossie Clark, London, 1971–73; design assistant to Bob Mackie, Los Angeles, 1974–75; textile research/design assistant, Holly Harp, San Francisco, 1975; first design assistant, Dinallo, Beverly Hills, California, 1975; textile designer, Mary McFadden, New York, 1976; window and showroom display designer, Halston, New York, 1976; first design assistant, Zoran, New York, 1976; illustrator, Giorgio di Sant'Angelo, New York, 1976–77; textile design, CMS Spectrum, New York, 1976–77; director, Texas Developmental Group, Dallas, 1978–80; director and designer, Units, Dallas, 1981–86, sold to JCPenney, 1986; artistic/creative director responsible for all aspects of design including textile, packaging, marketing, fashion shows and videos, Multiples, Dallas, Texas 1987–89; designer, New Gotham and Moda Vida collections, Greaten Corporation, Los Angeles, 1990; director and designer, New Tee, Inc., original line of 100-percent organic materials 1992–98; director and designer, Sandra Garratt Design 1994–98; head designer for new divisions, Spiegel Catalogue, 2000—. Exhibitions: Scott Theatre, Ft. Worth, Texas, 1980; 500X Gallery, Dallas, Texas, 1981; Milam St. Gallery, Houston, Texas, 1982; Wadsworth Atheneum Museum, Hartford, Connecticut, 1989; Musée des Arts décoratifs, Paris, 1990; Natural History Museum, Los Angeles, 1990. Awards: Bob Mackie award for Outstanding Achievement in Design, Los Angeles, 1976; Female Entrepreneur of the Year, 1988. Address: 4501 Broadway, Suite 2G, New York City, New York, 10040, USA.

PUBLICATIONS

On GARRATT:

Books

Milbank, Caroline R., New York Fashion: The Evolution of American Style, New York, 1989.

Articles

"Sandra Garratt Jumps into the Dallas Designer Game," in the Dallas Morning News (Texas), 4 April 1979.

Anderson, K., "Close to the Edge," in the Dallas Morning News (Texas), 31 October 1979.

Brobston, Tracy, "Five Easy Pieces," in the Dallas Morning News (Texas), 28 July 1982.

Ennis, M., "The Empress' New Clothes," in Texas Monthly (Texas), September 1982.

Zimmerman, A., "Bits and Pieces," in Dallas City Magazine, (Texas), 11 May 1986.

Herold, L., "Picking Up the Pieces," in the Dallas Morning News (Texas), 1 February 1987.

_____, "A Designer Is Reborn," in the Dallas Morning News (Texas), 6 January 1988.

"Sandra Garratt," in Detour (Texas), April 1988.

Herold, L., "No Hang-Ups," in Texas Business (Texas), June 1988.

Shapiro, H., "Style: Success Comes in Many Forms for Mix and Match Designer Sandra Garratt," in People (New York), 20 June 1988.

Mangelsdorf, M., "Dressed for Success," in Inc. (Boston), August 1988.

Hockswender, Woody, "Modular Clothes: Count the Ways," in the New York Times, 18 October 1988.

Mitchell, C., "Riches from Rags," in the Wall Street Journal, 20 March 1989.

Haber, Holly, "New Tee Shop Aims to Reap Budding 'Green' Awareness," in Women's Wear Daily, 2 July 1992.

In the late 1980s Millard "Mickey" Drexler, formerly of Ann Taylor, revamped the Gap organization. From the ground up, Drexler recreated the company, ridding stores of all nonproprietary brands, bringing in a team of designers to produce casual apparel from natural fibers for men and women, then children (GapKids debuted in 1986, BabyGap in 1989). The Gap had begun print and media advertising in earnest, not only attracting new customers, but changing its image along the way. The Fishers had also acquired another California-based company, Banana Republic, and opened the first international Gap store in London.

In the 1990s BabyGap grew into a major retailer, Banana Republic experienced a welcome resurgence in popularity, and a new lower-priced franchise called Old Navy Clothing Company became an immediate success. In 1996 several titans of fashion, including Giorgio Armani, Nino Cerruti, Carolina Herrera, Todd Oldham, and Cynthia Rowley, paid tribute to the clothier in the April issue of Elle magazine, all wearing Gap apparel. There were now hundreds of Gap stores dotting Europe and increasingly renowned print and television advertising for both Gap and Old Navy. As the 20th century closed and the 21st arrived, the Fishers had retired but retained a healthy stake in the now-legendary clothing empire. The second generation of Fishers, three sons, worked in some capacity in the family business, while Mickey Drexler continued to reign in the executive suite. In nearly every metropolitan area was a Gap, GapKids, BabyGap, Banana Republic, or Old Navy store, or a combination storefront featuring both adult and children's clothing.

Shrewd marketing, tight control, exceptional quality, and consistency in an ever-evolving and inconsistent marketplace has kept The Gap, Inc. at the forefront of the apparel and accessories industry. There's Banana Republic for the higher-end market, Gap for the middle road, and Old Navy for lower-priced dressing with style and panache. With sales topping $11 billion by 2000, the Gap's empire seemed boundless; further evidence of the company's continuing acuity was its expansion into cyberspace, with a very popular website.

—Nelly Rhodes

GARAVANI, Valentino

See VALENTINO

GARRATT, Sandra

American designer

Born: Sandra Harrower in Milwaukee, Wisconsin, 16 December 1951, to British parents. Education: Graduated from Fashion Institute of Design and Merchandising, Los Angeles, 1975. Family: Married Michael Garratt in 1977; one son: Wesley. Career: Design assistant to Ossie Clark, London, 1971–73; design assistant to Bob Mackie, Los Angeles, 1974–75; textile research/design assistant, Holly Harp, San Francisco, 1975; first design assistant, Dinallo, Beverly Hills, California, 1975; textile designer, Mary McFadden, New York, 1976; window and showroom display designer, Halston, New York, 1976; first design assistant, Zoran, New York, 1976; illustrator, Giorgio di Sant'Angelo, New York, 1976–77; textile design, CMS Spectrum, New York, 1976–77; director, Texas Developmental Group, Dallas, 1978–80; director and designer, Units, Dallas, 1981–86, sold to JCPenney, 1986; artistic/creative director responsible for all aspects of design including textile, packaging, marketing, fashion shows and videos, Multiples, Dallas, Texas 1987–89; designer, New Gotham and Moda Vida collections, Greaten Corporation, Los Angeles, 1990; director and designer, New Tee, Inc., original line of 100-percent organic materials 1992–98; director and designer, Sandra Garratt Design 1994–98; head designer for new divisions, Spiegel Catalogue, 2000—. Exhibitions: Scott Theatre, Ft. Worth, Texas, 1980; 500X Gallery, Dallas, Texas, 1981; Milam St. Gallery, Houston, Texas, 1982; Wadsworth Atheneum Museum, Hartford, Connecticut, 1989; Musée des Arts décoratifs, Paris, 1990; Natural History Museum, Los Angeles, 1990. Awards: Bob Mackie award for Outstanding Achievement in Design, Los Angeles, 1976; Female Entrepreneur of the Year, 1988. Address: 4501 Broadway, Suite 2G, New York City, New York, 10040, USA.

PUBLICATIONS

On GARRATT:

Books

Milbank, Caroline R., New York Fashion: The Evolution of American Style, New York, 1989.

Articles

"Sandra Garratt Jumps into the Dallas Designer Game," in the Dallas Morning News (Texas), 4 April 1979.

Anderson, K., "Close to the Edge," in the Dallas Morning News (Texas), 31 October 1979.

Brobston, Tracy, "Five Easy Pieces," in the Dallas Morning News (Texas), 28 July 1982.

Ennis, M., "The Empress' New Clothes," in Texas Monthly (Texas), September 1982.

Zimmerman, A., "Bits and Pieces," in Dallas City Magazine, (Texas), 11 May 1986.

Herold, L., "Picking Up the Pieces," in the Dallas Morning News (Texas), 1 February 1987.

_____, "A Designer Is Reborn," in the Dallas Morning News (Texas), 6 January 1988.

"Sandra Garratt," in Detour (Texas), April 1988.

Herold, L., "No Hang-Ups," in Texas Business (Texas), June 1988.

Shapiro, H., "Style: Success Comes in Many Forms for Mix and Match Designer Sandra Garratt," in People (New York), 20 June 1988.

Mangelsdorf, M., "Dressed for Success," in Inc. (Boston), August 1988.

Hockswender, Woody, "Modular Clothes: Count the Ways," in the New York Times, 18 October 1988.

Mitchell, C., "Riches from Rags," in the Wall Street Journal, 20 March 1989.

Haber, Holly, "New Tee Shop Aims to Reap Budding 'Green' Awareness," in Women's Wear Daily, 2 July 1992.

_____, "Garratt Reinvents Herself," in Women's Wear Daily, 11 January 1994.

_____, "Sandra Garratt Ready to Go Nationwide," in Women's Wear Daily, 19 October 1994.

*

I see my original modular concept as a classic—like Levi's 501 jeans. The empty-canvas-like appearance begs for personal touches. I'm taking a flat, square architectural design in a soft, knit fabric, which makes it pliable, then putting it on a three-dimensional form so there are contradictions. It stirs up dynamics. Stiff clothes lack body awareness. Through my designs, I offer people a tiny opportunity at self-expression which everyone craves.

Both Jean Muir and Zandra Rhodes have influenced me throughout my career but my favourite designer of all times is Paul Poiret. He really created a new approach for all of 20th-century fashion. Other inspirations that can be seen in my work come from Rudi Gernreich, who was also trained as a dancer, and Giorgio di Sant'Angelo. Working with Halston in the 1970s gave me a new direction. Halston offered a basic way of dressing that seemed suited to Americans. His clothes were realistic in the sense that they worked for you instead of your having to adopt the characteristics of the clothes.

I think people relate to jeans and simple t-shirts because they are functional and authentic. The challenge is to offer good design in an average price range for people. It is easy to work with beautiful, fancy fabrics but not easy to create things that work out of simple, pure materials. This is why working with organically produced fabrics is a great challenge for me and is where I want to focus my designer energies for the rest of my career.

—Sandra Garratt

* * *

Sandra Garratt's career evolved from an early interest in dance and costume design. Forced to abandon the ballet studies that took her to Canada and Europe, Garratt ended up in London as a design assistant to Ossie Clark during the early 1970s. Returning to the U.S. in 1973, Garratt worked on elaborate clothing out of luxury fabrics as a design student at the Fashion Institute of Design and Merchandising in Los Angeles. As a senior, she was asked to design a line contrary to her then-baroque interest in costume dressing. She created a collection of slim skirts and bright tunics out of silk, which became the basis for her career.

After a series of design positions in New York, where she was influenced by Halston and Giorgio di Sant'Angelo, Garratt moved to Dallas, Texas. In 1978 her lifestyle as a busy working mother made her realize millions of women like herself were struggling with increasing demands on their time and resources. Most available clothing failed to address these issues so she began to cultivate ideas based on her senior show. Garratt pioneered the concept of modular one-size-fits-all cotton knits in basic shapes: t-shirts, leggings, tunics, bandeaux, and bikinis. The interchangeable, mix-and-match pieces were eventually called Units. Garratt marketed Units as "modular clothing for the masses expressing individuality through apparent uniformity."

Units were affordable, could be worn alone or layered, and made customers feel both casual and fashionable. The early 1980s were swept by an aerobics and jogging craze and Units offered an appealing, comfortable alternative to sweatsuits and workout clothes. Garratt's early interest in dance contributed to her ability to respond to a woman's need for comfort and flexibility in her wardrobe. She eventually sold her interest in Units in 1987 after a dispute with her financial partners. Units, which was later purchased by JC Penney, operated as a chain of stores in shopping malls.

Another company, called Multiples, was launched in 1987 with Garratt at the design helm. Described as a "system of dressing," Multiples was a collection of 20 knit separates sold in more than 350 department stores nationwide. Garratt monitored the production by the Jerrell company and helped market and promote the line vigorously. Multiples were more sophisticated shapes than previous forms designed by Garratt; cut out of square pattern pieces, the knit jackets often echoed the Japanese design concepts pervasive in fashion of the late 1980s. Multiples offered a versatile group of tunics, skirts, jumpsuits, leggings, and tubular accessories that could be worn as a scarf, cowl, belt, etc. The boxy shapes were sold folded in practical plastic bags at a low price to a huge cross-section of women.

Multiples could be casual or sophisticated depending on the mood of the wearer. Claire McCordell, an American designer during the 1940s and early 1950s, designed comfortable jersey knits similar to Multiples but her timing was unfortunate. Garratt, who also formulated her own ideas ahead of the market, was fortunate enough to be in step throughout the 1980s. Since 1989 Garratt discontinued her relationship with the Jerrell company and Multiples.

Garratt also took time to explore her other love: romantic dressing. She introduced a line of one-of-a-kind, hand-sewn original confections of lace, tulle, and taffeta referred to as "Viennese pastry" dresses during the early 1980s. While not sold specifically as a separate line, these designs were carried by specialist stores and had a devoted following.

Garratt opened a New Tee store in Dallas in 1992. Organic cotton t-shirts with a variety of silk-screened graphics and nontoxic dyes were a favorite of her customers. When the store closed in 1993, she continued to sell her 45-piece collection of simple, comfortable styles in specialty stores and to serve her private customers from a shop adjoining her studio. In 1994 she introduced two collections she called "lifestyle dressing" because the clothing could dress women for the office, an evening out, or a cruise. Her new signature label, Sandra Garratt Design, featured softly-tailored cotton and linen separates, cotton gauze pieces, and bias-cut dresses in silk charmeuse and silk shantung.

The newer label, Sandra Garratt Design, continued to reflect Garratt's concern for the environment, but was not strictly organic. She did, however, introduce an expansion of her New Tee business, which was lower priced and offered organic cotton styles in body-hugging dresses and leggings, big jackets, blouses, and pajama pants. Garratt closed both companies in late 1998 when her financial partners abruptly left the company. She designed on a freelance basis and did consulting work until she joined Spiegel Catalogue in August 2000. As head designer for new divisions, she is guiding the direction of new design for the company. The first of her collections, called "Transforming the Body," is scheduled for an August 2001 launch. Other lines will include casual clothing with the dressier feel of a Californian boutique.

—Myra Walker; updated by Janette Goff Dixon

GAULTIER, Jean-Paul

French designer

Born: Arcueil, France, 24 April 1952. Education: Educated at the École Communale, the Collège d'Enseignement, and at the Lycée d'Arcueil, to 1969. Career: Design assistant, Pierre Cardin, 1972–74; also worked for Esterel and Patou; designer, Cardin (U.S.) Collection, working in the Philippines, 1974–75; designer, Majago, Paris, 1976–78; founder, Jean Paul Gaultier S.A., from 1978; menswear line introduced, 1984; Junior Gaultier line introduced, 1987; furniture line introduced, 1992; licenses include jewelry, from 1988, perfumes, from 1991, and jeans, from 1992; created controversy with line

Jean-Paul Gaultier, spring/summer 2001 haute couture collection:
satin bustier. © AFP/CORBIS.

inspired by male Hasidic Jewish apparel, 1993; opened his own couture house, 1997; created costumes for several films, 1980s and 1990s; stake in his company acquired by Hermès, 1999; renewed fragrance license, 2000. Awards: Fashion Oscar award, Paris, 1987. Address: 70 Galerie Vivienne, 75002 Paris, France. Website: www.jpgaultier.fr.

PUBLICATIONS

By GAULTIER:

Books

À nous deux la mode, Paris 1990.

On GAULTIER:

Articles

- "An Audience with Jean-Paul," in Fashion Weekly (London), 11 December 1986.
- Drier, Deborah, "The Defiant Ones," in Art in America (New York), September 1987.
- Arroyuelo, Janvier, "Gaultier: Tongue in Chic," in Vogue (New York), August 1988.
- "Alaia e Gaultier, due stilisti a confronto," in Vogue (Milan), October 1988.
- Duka, John, "Gaultier," in Vogue (New York), January 1989.
- Martin, Richard, "An Oxymoronic Jacket by Jean-Paul Gaultier," Textile and Text, 13 March 1990.
- Mower, Sarah, "Gaultier, Comic Genius," in Metropolitan Home, February 1991.
- Howell, Georgina, "The Maestro of Mayhem," in Vogue (New York), March 1991.
- Spindler, Amy, "Jean-Paul Gaultier: France's Homeboy," in the Daily News Record (New York), 22 July 1991.
- Martin, Richard, "Machismo in Trapunto: Jean-Paul Gaultier's 1991 Physique Sweater," Textile and Text, 14 March 1992.
- Yarbrough, Jeff, "Jean-Paul Gaultier: Fashion's Main Man," in The Advocate (USA), 17 November 1992.
- Weldon, Fay, "Jean Paul the First," in Tatler (London), March 1995.
- Spindler, Amy M., "Four Who Have No Use for Trends," in the New York Times, 20 March 1995.
- Menkes Suzy, "Show, Not Clothes, Becomes the Message," in International Herald Tribune (Paris), 20 March 1995.
- Thomas, Dana, "The French Connection," in New York Times Magazine, 25 October 1998.
- "Jean-Paul Gaultier," in Current Biography Yearbook, 1999.
- Murphy, Robert, "Gaultier Goes Global," in Daily News Record, 10 January 1999.
- "A Man for All Seasons," in Travel Retailer International, January 2000.
- Naughton, Julie, "Gaultier: Bridging the Gender Gap," in Women's Wear Daily, 17 January 2000.

* * *

By injecting kitsch into couture, Jean-Paul Gaultier has redefined the traditionally elegant trappings of Paris fashion. He is a playful, good-natured iconoclast, glamorizing street style and cleaning it up for haute couture. By turns surreal but never completely bizarre,

"Transforming the Body," is scheduled for an August 2001 launch. Other lines will include casual clothing with the dressier feel of a Californian boutique.

—Myra Walker; updated by Janette Goff Dixon

GAULTIER, Jean-Paul

French designer

Born: Arcueil, France, 24 April 1952. Education: Educated at the École Communale, the Collège d'Enseignement, and at the Lycée d'Arcueil, to 1969. Career: Design assistant, Pierre Cardin, 1972–74; also worked for Esterel and Patou; designer, Cardin (U.S.) Collection, working in the Philippines, 1974–75; designer, Majago, Paris, 1976–78; founder, Jean Paul Gaultier S.A., from 1978; menswear line introduced, 1984; Junior Gaultier line introduced, 1987; furniture line introduced, 1992; licenses include jewelry, from 1988, perfumes, from 1991, and jeans, from 1992; created controversy with line

Jean-Paul Gaultier, spring/summer 2001 haute couture collection:
satin bustier. © AFP/CORBIS.

inspired by male Hasidic Jewish apparel, 1993; opened his own couture house, 1997; created costumes for several films, 1980s and 1990s; stake in his company acquired by Hermès, 1999; renewed fragrance license, 2000. Awards: Fashion Oscar award, Paris, 1987. Address: 70 Galerie Vivienne, 75002 Paris, France. Website: www.jpgaultier.fr.

PUBLICATIONS

By GAULTIER:

Books

À nous deux la mode, Paris 1990.

On GAULTIER:

Articles

- "An Audience with Jean-Paul," in Fashion Weekly (London), 11 December 1986.
- Drier, Deborah, "The Defiant Ones," in Art in America (New York), September 1987.
- Arroyuelo, Janvier, "Gaultier: Tongue in Chic," in Vogue (New York), August 1988.
- "Alaia e Gaultier, due stilisti a confronto," in Vogue (Milan), October 1988.
- Duka, John, "Gaultier," in Vogue (New York), January 1989.
- Martin, Richard, "An Oxymoronic Jacket by Jean-Paul Gaultier," Textile and Text, 13 March 1990.
- Mower, Sarah, "Gaultier, Comic Genius," in Metropolitan Home, February 1991.
- Howell, Georgina, "The Maestro of Mayhem," in Vogue (New York), March 1991.
- Spindler, Amy, "Jean-Paul Gaultier: France's Homeboy," in the Daily News Record (New York), 22 July 1991.
- Martin, Richard, "Machismo in Trapunto: Jean-Paul Gaultier's 1991 Physique Sweater," Textile and Text, 14 March 1992.
- Yarbrough, Jeff, "Jean-Paul Gaultier: Fashion's Main Man," in The Advocate (USA), 17 November 1992.
- Weldon, Fay, "Jean Paul the First," in Tatler (London), March 1995.
- Spindler, Amy M., "Four Who Have No Use for Trends," in the New York Times, 20 March 1995.
- Menkes Suzy, "Show, Not Clothes, Becomes the Message," in International Herald Tribune (Paris), 20 March 1995.
- Thomas, Dana, "The French Connection," in New York Times Magazine, 25 October 1998.
- "Jean-Paul Gaultier," in Current Biography Yearbook, 1999.
- Murphy, Robert, "Gaultier Goes Global," in Daily News Record, 10 January 1999.
- "A Man for All Seasons," in Travel Retailer International, January 2000.
- Naughton, Julie, "Gaultier: Bridging the Gender Gap," in Women's Wear Daily, 17 January 2000.

* * *

By injecting kitsch into couture, Jean-Paul Gaultier has redefined the traditionally elegant trappings of Paris fashion. He is a playful, good-natured iconoclast, glamorizing street style and cleaning it up for haute couture. By turns surreal but never completely bizarre, rebellious but always wearable, he has produced seductive, witty clothes which redefine notions of taste and elegance in dress.

Jean-Paul Gaultier, fall/winter 2001 collection. © AP/Wide World Photos.

Gaultier's eclectic source material, inherited from punk via the fleamarket, and an astute sense of the origins of style mean his clothes make constant historic and literary references, as opposed to the cool modernism of contemporaries such as Issey Miyake, displayed in his use of heraldic motifs in the late 1980s or a collection based on Toulouse-Lautrec in 1991.

Gaultier challenges orthodox notions of the presentation of gender through both male and female dress and ignores the stereotypical femininity normally paraded on the catwalks of traditional Parisian haute couture. During his employment at Jean Patou, Gaultier recognized how most couturiers ignored the female form at the expense of the construction of a particular line. He was, on one occasion, horrified to see a model having to wear heavy bandages to suppress her breasts in order for the dress she was modelling to hang properly. This impulse eventually culminated in a controversial series of negotiations of the corset, stemming from his interest in the exaggerated definition of the female form it produced. In the 1980s he redefined this usually private, hidden garment, whose traditional function is to provide a structure from which to hang the more important outerwear, by recreating it as outerwear itself. One of these, the Corset Dress of 1982, commented astutely on femininity, constructing the breast less as a soft malleable object of passive attraction and more as an object of power, a female weapon, whilst at the same time alluding to the comically stitched bras of the 1950s sweater girl—a particularly tacky glamor. These ideas achieved mass attention when Gaultier designed the costumes for Madonna's Blonde Ambition tour in 1990.

By 1984 Gaultier had decided to move more directly into menswear. Through personal experience he could find nothing he really wanted, particularly in terms of sizing, and even unstructured Armani jackets seemed too small. He noticed that men had been buying his women's jackets because of the unusual fabrics and cut, so he began his seminal reworking of the pinstriped suit for both men and women. He displayed a traditional male wardrobe by redesigning such classics as the navy blazer and Fair Isle jumper and dismantling clichés of masculine styling by producing skirts, corsets, and tutus for men. During one notorious catwalk show, female models smoked pipes and men paraded in transparent lace skirts. This acknowledgement of male narcissism and interest in the creation of erotic clothing for men, as shown in the Man-Object Collection of 1982, influenced designers such as Gianni Versace into the early and mid-1990s.

Gaultier is perhaps best associated with the rise of popular interest in designer clothing in the mid-1980s. His redefinitions of traditional male tailoring made his clothes instantly recognizable amongst so-called fashion victims in most of the major European capitals, using details such as metal tips on collars and extended shoulder lines. Structured, fitted garments like jackets were reworked, being cut long and slim over the hips to mid-thigh to give an hourglass shape to the wearer's physique.

Gaultier has always been interested in new developments in fabric and intrigued by the design possibilities of modern artificial fibers, and is known for using unconventional fibers like neoprene. He uses fabrics outside of their usual context, such as chiffon for dungarees, resulting in a utilitarian garment being produced out of a delicate material traditionally associated with eveningwear. This juggling with expected practice directs him to produce items such as a willow-patterned printed textile incorporating the head of Mickey Mouse, and Aran sweaters elongated into dresses with the woollen bobbles taking the place of nipples.

Gaultier rebels against the old school of Parisian couture but, because of his years of training within its system under Pierre Cardin, Jacques Esterel, and Jean Patou, he is a master craftsman. However avant-garde his collections may seem, they are always founded in a technical brilliance-based inventive tailoring and are able to convince because of the technique. While his kitschy designs in the late 1980s and early 1990s gave Gaultier a reputation as the enfant terrible of fashion, his fall 1998 collection—which featured beaded fisherman's sweaters and formal tartan skirts—was one of many that wowed critics by being innovative yet wearable and elegant. Gaultier has noted that the 1990 AIDS death of his lover and business partner influenced his designs by making them simpler and more sober, with less aggression and toughness. After a time, however, he decided his designs were becoming too classic and he went back to making the sexy, irreverent clothing he had been known for.

Gaultier's interest in pulling together diverse cultures has continued, with his fall 1993 line being one of the most controversial examples, inspired by the traditional apparel of male Hasidic Jews.

Other collections in the 1990s were influenced by the dress of Mongolia, the punk subculture of London, and Eskimo culture, among others. Mixed in were departures such as a 1996 tribute to Pierre Cardin and a 2000 line inspired by the 1970s television series The Love Boat. Gaultier admits he watches television constantly, sometimes several programs at a time, to gain inspiration.

Gaultier's profile has been raised by his work as a costume designer for films such as Peter Greenaway's The Cook, the Thief, His Wife and Her Lover (1989), Pedro Almodovar's Kika (1993) and Luc Besson's The Fifth Element (1997). He has also hosted a comedy series, EuroTrash, on British television and created a line of furniture which included a two-person chair on wheels and a dresser constructed from luggage.

Gaultier opened his own couture house in 1997, becoming just the second designer in three decades to create couture under his own label. Some of his most creative and praised collections have occurred since that time. From a strapless, feather-enhanced denim ball gown to a seashell- bodiced dress with a feather-covered skirt, he has won a reputation for apparel combining outrageous features with high-quality tailoring and detailing.

French classic luxury goods company Hermès purchased a 35 percent stake in Gaultier's operation for $23.1 million in 1999, a seemingly odd-couple pairing that caught the industry by surprise. The infusion of cash will help Gaultier expand his retail operation, take control of some of his licensing operations, such as jewelry, expand into new categories such as timepieces and footwear, and boost his international business.

In 2000 Gaultier renewed his fragrance and cosmetics license with Shiseido and Beauté Prestige International, a longtime alliance known for its daring packaging. BPI launched Gaultier's Fragile fragrance in 2000 with a highly publicized snow globe package featuring a tiny figure dressed in Gaultier couture. Meanwhile, the designer expanded his licensee list with the additions of companies such as Wolford, an Austrian luxury hosiery firm.

Despite positive critical reviews and a high profile, Gaultier's revenues have been lower than many other couture labels; the Hermès stake may cause this to change. But what will not change is Gaultier's attention to hand-crafting and singular details, his gender- and culture-crossing designs, and his sense of fun.

—Caroline Cox; updated by Karen Raugust

GENNY HOLDING SPA

Italian ready-to-wear manufacturer

Founded: in Ancona by Arnoldo and Donatella Girombelli in 1961. Company History: Lines include Genny Moda, Compline, Byblos (introduced 1973, became independent company, 1983), Malisy (to 1993), Montana Donna and Montana Uomo (to early 1990s); underwent restructuring, 1992–94; Genny Ono eveningwear line launched, 1994; Richard Tyler replaced Byblos longtime designers Cleaver and Varty, 1997; signed John Bartlett to produce his menswear line and a new women's collection, 1997; Martine Sitbon and Sandy Dalal signed to take over Byblos designs, 2001; other designers have included Gianni Versace, Claude Montana, Dolce & Gabbana, Guy Paulin, and Rebecca Moses. Company Address: Via della Spiga 30, Milan, Italy. Company Website: www.gennymoda.com.

Genny Holding SpA, fall/winter 2001–02 collection: leather halter ensemble. © AP/Wide World Photos.

PUBLICATIONS

On GENNY:

Articles

- “Armonie a confronto,” in Linea Italiana, October 1984.
- Griggs, Barbara, “Lo stile Donatella,” in Vogue (Milan), October 1988.
- Rolfe, Gail, “The Winning Genny,” in the Daily Mail (London), 6 March 1991.
- Smith, Liz, “Polished Touch to Milan Line,” in the Times (London), 6 March 1991.
- “Snappy Dressing Italian-Style,” in the Daily Mail, 12 March 1992.
- Gordon, MaryEllen, “Varty, Cleaver in New York: High Spirits,” in WWD, 16 September 1992.
- Levine, Joshua, “Italy’s First Lady of the Factory,” in Forbes, 28 September 1992.

Other collections in the 1990s were influenced by the dress of Mongolia, the punk subculture of London, and Eskimo culture, among others. Mixed in were departures such as a 1996 tribute to Pierre Cardin and a 2000 line inspired by the 1970s television series The Love Boat. Gaultier admits he watches television constantly, sometimes several programs at a time, to gain inspiration.

Gaultier's profile has been raised by his work as a costume designer for films such as Peter Greenaway's The Cook, the Thief, His Wife and Her Lover (1989), Pedro Almodovar's Kika (1993) and Luc Besson's The Fifth Element (1997). He has also hosted a comedy series, EuroTrash, on British television and created a line of furniture which included a two-person chair on wheels and a dresser constructed from luggage.

Gaultier opened his own couture house in 1997, becoming just the second designer in three decades to create couture under his own label. Some of his most creative and praised collections have occurred since that time. From a strapless, feather-enhanced denim ball gown to a seashell- bodiced dress with a feather-covered skirt, he has won a reputation for apparel combining outrageous features with high-quality tailoring and detailing.

French classic luxury goods company Hermès purchased a 35 percent stake in Gaultier's operation for $23.1 million in 1999, a seemingly odd-couple pairing that caught the industry by surprise. The infusion of cash will help Gaultier expand his retail operation, take control of some of his licensing operations, such as jewelry, expand into new categories such as timepieces and footwear, and boost his international business.

In 2000 Gaultier renewed his fragrance and cosmetics license with Shiseido and Beauté Prestige International, a longtime alliance known for its daring packaging. BPI launched Gaultier's Fragile fragrance in 2000 with a highly publicized snow globe package featuring a tiny figure dressed in Gaultier couture. Meanwhile, the designer expanded his licensee list with the additions of companies such as Wolford, an Austrian luxury hosiery firm.

Despite positive critical reviews and a high profile, Gaultier's revenues have been lower than many other couture labels; the Hermès stake may cause this to change. But what will not change is Gaultier's attention to hand-crafting and singular details, his gender- and culture-crossing designs, and his sense of fun.

—Caroline Cox; updated by Karen Raugust

GENNY HOLDING SPA

Italian ready-to-wear manufacturer

Founded: in Ancona by Arnoldo and Donatella Girombelli in 1961. Company History: Lines include Genny Moda, Compline, Byblos (introduced 1973, became independent company, 1983), Malisy (to 1993), Montana Donna and Montana Uomo (to early 1990s); underwent restructuring, 1992–94; Genny Ono eveningwear line launched, 1994; Richard Tyler replaced Byblos longtime designers Cleaver and Varty, 1997; signed John Bartlett to produce his menswear line and a new women's collection, 1997; Martine Sitbon and Sandy Dalal signed to take over Byblos designs, 2001; other designers have included Gianni Versace, Claude Montana, Dolce & Gabbana, Guy Paulin, and Rebecca Moses. Company Address: Via della Spiga 30, Milan, Italy. Company Website: www.gennymoda.com.

Genny Holding SpA, fall/winter 2001–02 collection: leather halter ensemble. © AP/Wide World Photos.

PUBLICATIONS

On GENNY:

Articles

- “Armonie a confronto,” in Linea Italiana, October 1984.
- Griggs, Barbara, “Lo stile Donatella,” in Vogue (Milan), October 1988.
- Rolfe, Gail, “The Winning Genny,” in the Daily Mail (London), 6 March 1991.
- Smith, Liz, “Polished Touch to Milan Line,” in the Times (London), 6 March 1991.
- “Snappy Dressing Italian-Style,” in the Daily Mail, 12 March 1992.
- Gordon, MaryEllen, “Varty, Cleaver in New York: High Spirits,” in WWD, 16 September 1992.
- Levine, Joshua, “Italy’s First Lady of the Factory,” in Forbes, 28 September 1992.

- Forden, Sara Gay, "Versace, Genny, to End 19 Years Together with Spring Collection," in WWD, 23 July 1993.
- Gordon, Maryellen, "Genny's New Look a Hit at Saks," in WWD, 25 May 1994.
- Weaver, William, et al., "Donatella Girombelli: Romantic Rooms on the Italian Coast," in Architectural Digest, October 1994.
- Ozzard, Janet, "Byblos Boys Out After 15 Years, as Milan Firm Appoints Richard Tyler," in WWD, 12 November 1996.
- "Genny to Make Bartlett Line," in WWD, 13 January 1997.
- "Byblos Appoints Martine Sitbon as Women's Creative Director," in WWD, 19 March 2001.
- Brown, Wendell, "Byblos Names Sandy Dalal Creative Director," in DNR, 21 March 2001.
- "Genny, Steele Talking," in WWD, 26 March 2001.

* * *

Named after their first-born child, Genny was the brainchild of Arnaldo and Donatella Girombelli, who founded the company in 1961. Genny Holding SpA then became one of Italy's foremost fashion companies, designing, manufacturing, and distributing its own ranges including Genny, Genny Due, Complice, Byblos, and others. From relatively humble origins as a small clothing factory based in Ancona, Italy, the company was operating at an industrial scale by 1968. During the 1970s it experienced rapid growth when its founder made radical changes in the company structure, steering it towards a more fashionable product in terms of garment styling. These changes did not, however, alter the company's original commitment to the production of high quality, predominantly tailored garments. As an early protagonist of the "Made in Italy" label, Genny assumed a leading role during the 1970s when the Italian fashion industry took its first steps toward becoming a serious competitor with French ready-to-wear fashion.

Genny is typical of a number of Italian fashion companies manufacturing high fashion lines designed for them by leading names in the industry, yet launched under the company's own label. Fashion writer Colin McDowell has described this very successful, as well as lucrative, format as a form of "moonlighting." Considerable financial reward, coupled with the high quality of the Italian ready-to-wear product, has meant there was no shortage of well-known designers willing to supply their creative talent for such companies. Genny's earliest working relationship with an outside designer was with the young, virtually unknown Gianni Versace who designed his first collection for Genny in 1974. Versace was also responsible for designing the early Byblos collections, a younger range introduced in 1973 to complement the classic Genny image.

After the death of Arnaldo Girombelli in 1980, his wife, Donatella, assumed a leading role in the company and chaired its board of directors. Described by fashion retail entrepreneur Roberto Devorik as "a rare catalyst for design talent," Donatella Girombelli continued her husband's policy of employing top designers to create lines for the Genny labels, and have included a who's who of top designers like Stefano Dolce, Domenico Gabbana, Alan Cleaver, and Keith Varty.

The position of Genny and its other labels were not quite cutting edge, nor dramatically avant-garde or barrier-breaking, but rather top quality ready-to-wear clothing with a strong design element. This style was what led to the company's widespread success in the international market. By the mid-1990s Genny produced over two million items under its different labels, which were distributed worldwide through the company's nearly two dozen freestanding boutiques and in better department stores in the U.S., Middle East, Europe, and Japan. A growing number of carefully controlled licensing agreements encompassed such products as eyewear, fragrances, bridalwear, leather handbags, belts, and shoes sold worldwide.

Satin evening gown by Genny Holding SpA, modeled on the Spanish Steps in Rome during the "Donna sotto le stelle" ("Women Under the Stars") fashion gala, 1999. © AP/Wide World Photos.

Heading into the later 1990s, Genny had undergone restructuring from top to bottom. New designers were brought in and others let go; among the new faces were Americans Rebecca Moses and Richard Tyler, the longtime Byblos design team of Cleaver and Varty was gone, and Donatella Girombelli focused on a more American feel for Genny's womenwear. Commenting to Women's Wear Daily, Girombelli said she aimed for a "succinct combination of straightforward American sportswear and Italian flair." Next came John Bartlett, who signed with the Italian firm in 1997 to produce his existing menswear designs as well as to create a new womenswear line.

In the new century, Genny and its varied holdings seemed to have a revolving door with designers. The latest were Martine Sitbon and Sandy Dalal at Byblos, and Giombelli had approached Lawrence Steele to sign on as a consultant to freshen the Genny labels. Yet despite Genny Holding's frequent overhauls and team changes, it continues to be a well known and widely respected Italian fashion firm.

—Catherine Woram; updated by Nelly Rhodes

GEORGES RECH

French design company

Company History: Georges Rech designer collection established in Paris, 1960; Synonyme separates division established, 1973; Unanyme division of coordinated knitwear and woven separates established, 1981; Georges Rech Group accessories division founded, 1983; licensing department established, 1983; Georges Rech Homme men's ready-to-wear established, 1987; joined Courtaulds as part of textile division, London, 1989; renamed Courtaulds Textiles Plc., 1990; initiated licensing agreement in Thailand, 1993; turnaround after several years of low sales, 1997; Courtaulds acquired by Sara Lee Corp., 2000; franchised or wholly-owned Georges Rech boutiques around the world, including Paris, London, Brussels, Montreal, and Hong Kong; Unanyme distributed through 45 stores in France; group lines also found in many multibrand retailers throughout the world.
Company Address: 112 rue Reaumur, 75002 Paris, France.

PUBLICATIONS

On GEORGES RECH:

Articles

- Mower, Sara, "Anglo-French Mix of Aggression and Chic," in The Independent (London), 23 November 1989.
 Nicholson, Kathleen, "Private Labels Finding a Welcome in Areas Where Designers Live," in WWD, 14 August 1997.
 Kibazo, Joel, "Courtaulds Soars on U.S. Bid," in the Financial Times, 15 February 2000.
 Fallon, James, "Sara Lee Will Buy Courtaulds for $237.8 Million," in WWD, 27 March 2000.
 "So Rech, So Global: The Georges Rech Spring-Summer Collection Goes Down Well," in the Bangkok Post, 11 April 2001.
 "Fiercely Feminine Rech," in the New Straits Times, 14 May 2001.

* * *

When asked once to sum up his style philosophy, French ready-to-wear designer Georges Rech replied with a single word, "Balance." His fashion house aimed to create a synthesis of ideas, designing not for any one woman or type of person, but for an ever-changing, contemporary ideal. His simple, relaxed, well-made, and affordable coats, suits, dresses, and separates projected an easy-going accessibility, without compromising on creativity or style, and his name became synonymous with casual chic. As Rech put it early in his career, "Sportswear corresponds to the way people live. I don't like to shut a woman up in fabric."

Rech first emerged in the 1960s as one of the pioneers of Parisian ready-to-wear for women. He became known as a leading French manufacturer of tailored coats and suits, before branching out into raincoats. The early coat and suit collections were rather structured and masculine in feeling, but into the 1970s his styles broadened and loosened, with easy jackets over trousers, bloused windbreakers, billowing dresses, and both short and long skirts. Rech was interested in bringing the comfort of leisure wear and sportswear into focus at a time when the fashion majority still upheld notions of clothing propriety, whether it was dressing for city/country, or day/evening. He looked to the youth movements of his day for inspiration, noticing how the young defied adult conventions in their clothing, and he began to experiment with work and leisure fabrics for daytime. He declared denim was the "perfect" fabric, and transformed the humble, working class cloth into several sophisticated and urbane looks, such as a short, black-and-white striped denim pantsuit with witty elbow patches.

In 1973 Rech created Synonyme, a collection of coordinating basic separates. The line was an immediate success, gaining special notice for an elegant black panne velvet sweatshirt over black crepe flare-leg pants. Rech also designed a bestselling "sweatshirt dress" for day, and adapted other sportswear styles in his loosely-draped Qiana top and skirt for evening. One observer referred to these dressing up/dressing down crossover ideas in fabric and cut as "le Style Americaine," and the designer's clever takes on casual sportswear were indeed well-received in the U.S. when he opened a boutique there in 1978.

The Unanyme junior line, combining knitwear with woven and tailored pieces was premiered in 1981, emphasizing lower-priced compatible separates that could be freely mixed and matched. The next expansion was into a line of accessories, and then came the establishment of Georges Rech Homme, creating for men the clean-cut yet stylish look for which Rech's womenswear had become known. The fourth arm of the house remained the high-end Georges Rech designer line offering structured sophisticated coats, suits, and dresses for women, with a timeless style independent of ephemeral fashion trends. Though each group had a separate identity, the pieces designed for each division continued to embody the basic Rech philosophy of creativity mitigated by realism and wearability.

The company was bought out in 1989 by Courtaulds Textiles of London, and Georges Rech relinquished his personal interest in the house. Since then Daniele Jagot, who worked for the company for over 20 years, took over designing the Georges Rech top-range label, while Fumihiko Harada designed the Synonyme line. By the mid-1990s the label had little flash and sales were far from robust, in part due to a depressed market. The brand made a comeback in 1996 when designer clothing sales rallied in Europe and stayed in the black for several years, prompting expansion. The Georges Rech name became more prevalent in France, with 40 stores in the country (more than a dozen new outlets opened in 1998 alone), the same year parent company Courtauld bought Claremont Garments to augment its apparel division.

By the new century Courtauld was locked in battle with the U.S.-based Sara Lee Corporation over a hostile takeover attempt. To bolster its funds, Courtauld sold several units and put Georges Rech up for sale as well. Despite its efforts, however, Courtauld succumbed and became part of Sara Lee's Branded Apparel Group, which consisted of a slew of apparel, undergarment, and hosiery companies worldwide. Given the similarities in the two firm's business segments, industry analysts believed the acquisition was a good fit for both sides.

The Georges Rech brand for women in 2001 remained feminine and beautiful, still designed by the founder's one-time assistant Jagot. Covering the label's growing success in the Far East, the New Straits Times characterized a recent Jagot collection as "Masculine Sandy Dalal at Byblos, and Giombelli had approached Lawrence Steele to sign on as a consultant to freshen the Genny labels. Yet despite Genny Holding's frequent overhauls and team changes, it continues to be a well known and widely respected Italian fashion firm.

—Catherine Woram; updated by Nelly Rhodes

GEORGES RECH

French design company

Company History: Georges Rech designer collection established in Paris, 1960; Synonyme separates division established, 1973; Unanyme division of coordinated knitwear and woven separates established, 1981; Georges Rech Group accessories division founded, 1983; licensing department established, 1983; Georges Rech Homme men's ready-to-wear established, 1987; joined Courtaulds as part of textile division, London, 1989; renamed Courtaulds Textiles Plc., 1990; initiated licensing agreement in Thailand, 1993; turnaround after several years of low sales, 1997; Courtaulds acquired by Sara Lee Corp., 2000; franchised or wholly-owned Georges Rech boutiques around the world, including Paris, London, Brussels, Montreal, and Hong Kong; Unanyme distributed through 45 stores in France; group lines also found in many multibrand retailers throughout the world.
Company Address: 112 rue Reaumur, 75002 Paris, France.

PUBLICATIONS

On GEORGES RECH:

Articles

- Mower, Sara, "Anglo-French Mix of Aggression and Chic," in The Independent (London), 23 November 1989.
 Nicholson, Kathleen, "Private Labels Finding a Welcome in Areas Where Designers Live," in WWD, 14 August 1997.
 Kibazo, Joel, "Courtaulds Soars on U.S. Bid," in the Financial Times, 15 February 2000.
 Fallon, James, "Sara Lee Will Buy Courtaulds for $237.8 Million," in WWD, 27 March 2000.
 "So Rech, So Global: The Georges Rech Spring-Summer Collection Goes Down Well," in the Bangkok Post, 11 April 2001.
 "Fiercely Feminine Rech," in the New Straits Times, 14 May 2001.

* * *

When asked once to sum up his style philosophy, French ready-to-wear designer Georges Rech replied with a single word, "Balance." His fashion house aimed to create a synthesis of ideas, designing not for any one woman or type of person, but for an ever-changing, contemporary ideal. His simple, relaxed, well-made, and affordable coats, suits, dresses, and separates projected an easy-going accessibility, without compromising on creativity or style, and his name became synonymous with casual chic. As Rech put it early in his career, "Sportswear corresponds to the way people live. I don't like to shut a woman up in fabric."

Rech first emerged in the 1960s as one of the pioneers of Parisian ready-to-wear for women. He became known as a leading French manufacturer of tailored coats and suits, before branching out into raincoats. The early coat and suit collections were rather structured and masculine in feeling, but into the 1970s his styles broadened and loosened, with easy jackets over trousers, bloused windbreakers, billowing dresses, and both short and long skirts. Rech was interested in bringing the comfort of leisure wear and sportswear into focus at a time when the fashion majority still upheld notions of clothing propriety, whether it was dressing for city/country, or day/evening. He looked to the youth movements of his day for inspiration, noticing how the young defied adult conventions in their clothing, and he began to experiment with work and leisure fabrics for daytime. He declared denim was the "perfect" fabric, and transformed the humble, working class cloth into several sophisticated and urbane looks, such as a short, black-and-white striped denim pantsuit with witty elbow patches.

In 1973 Rech created Synonyme, a collection of coordinating basic separates. The line was an immediate success, gaining special notice for an elegant black panne velvet sweatshirt over black crepe flare-leg pants. Rech also designed a bestselling "sweatshirt dress" for day, and adapted other sportswear styles in his loosely-draped Qiana top and skirt for evening. One observer referred to these dressing up/dressing down crossover ideas in fabric and cut as "le Style Americaine," and the designer's clever takes on casual sportswear were indeed well-received in the U.S. when he opened a boutique there in 1978.

The Unanyme junior line, combining knitwear with woven and tailored pieces was premiered in 1981, emphasizing lower-priced compatible separates that could be freely mixed and matched. The next expansion was into a line of accessories, and then came the establishment of Georges Rech Homme, creating for men the clean-cut yet stylish look for which Rech's womenswear had become known. The fourth arm of the house remained the high-end Georges Rech designer line offering structured sophisticated coats, suits, and dresses for women, with a timeless style independent of ephemeral fashion trends. Though each group had a separate identity, the pieces designed for each division continued to embody the basic Rech philosophy of creativity mitigated by realism and wearability.

The company was bought out in 1989 by Courtaulds Textiles of London, and Georges Rech relinquished his personal interest in the house. Since then Daniele Jagot, who worked for the company for over 20 years, took over designing the Georges Rech top-range label, while Fumihiko Harada designed the Synonyme line. By the mid-1990s the label had little flash and sales were far from robust, in part due to a depressed market. The brand made a comeback in 1996 when designer clothing sales rallied in Europe and stayed in the black for several years, prompting expansion. The Georges Rech name became more prevalent in France, with 40 stores in the country (more than a dozen new outlets opened in 1998 alone), the same year parent company Courtauld bought Claremont Garments to augment its apparel division.

By the new century Courtauld was locked in battle with the U.S.-based Sara Lee Corporation over a hostile takeover attempt. To bolster its funds, Courtauld sold several units and put Georges Rech up for sale as well. Despite its efforts, however, Courtauld succumbed and became part of Sara Lee's Branded Apparel Group, which consisted of a slew of apparel, undergarment, and hosiery companies worldwide. Given the similarities in the two firm's business segments, industry analysts believed the acquisition was a good fit for both sides.

The Georges Rech brand for women in 2001 remained feminine and beautiful, still designed by the founder's one-time assistant Jagot. Covering the label's growing success in the Far East, the New Straits Times characterized a recent Jagot collection as "Masculine styles in unforgettably female forms with a strong and sexy mood, animal stripes look wild on rock-chic suits while ribbon corset dresses flirt with naughty-but-nice eveningwear theme.” The Bangkok Post (11 April 2001) similarly enthused, “Suits—the brand’s field of unrivalled expertise and its springboard to fame—were offered in a variety of forms, from the classic, impeccable male costume to the feminine low-neckline and skirt ensemble to trouser suits. Splendid materials and prints, as well as sophisticated details, were the leitmotif of the show.”

—Kathleen Paton; updated by Sydonie Benét

GERNREICH, Rudi

American designer

Born: Vienna, 8 August 1922. Immigrated to the United States, 1938, naturalized, 1943. Education: Studied at Los Angeles City College,

Rudi Gernreich, 1966 collection: ensemble in a cheetah print that includes coat, blouse, skirt, stockings, shoes, underwear, and helmet. © AP/Wide World Photos.

1938–41; Los Angeles Art Center School, 1941–42. Career: Dancer, costume designer, Lester Horton Company, 1942–48; fabric salesman, Hoffman company, and freelance clothing designer, Los Angeles and New York, 1948–51; designer, William Bass Inc., Beverly Hills, 1951–59; swimwear designer, Westwood Knitting Mills, Los Angeles, 1953–59; shoe designer, Genesco Corp., 1958–60; founder, GR Designs, Los Angeles, 1960–64; designer, Rudi Gernreich Inc., 1964–68; designs featured in first fashion videotape, Basic Black, 1966; designed furnishings for Fortress and Knoll International, 1970–71; lingerie for Lily of France, 1975; cosmetics for Redken, 1976; also designed knitwear for Harmon Knitwear, kitchen accessories, ceramic bathroom accessories, and costumes for Bella Lewitzky Dance Company. Exhibitions: Two Modern Artists of Dress: Elizabeth Hawes and Rudi Gernreich, Fashion Institute of Technology, New York, 1967; Fashion Will Go Out of Fashion, retrospective, Kunstlerhaus Graz, Austria, 2000. Awards: Sports Illustrated Designer of the Year award, 1956; Wool Knit Association award, 1960; Coty American Fashion Critics award, 1960, 1963, 1966, 1967; Neiman Marcus award, Dallas, 1961; Sporting Look award, 1963; Sunday Times International Fashion award, London, 1965; Filene’s Design award, Boston, 1966; inducted to Coty American Fashion Critics Hall of Fame, 1967; Knitted Textile Association award, 1975; Council of Fashion Designers of America Special Tribute, 1985. Died: 21 April 1985, in Los Angeles.

PUBLICATIONS

On GERNREICH:

Books

- Bender, Marylin, The Beautiful People, New York, 1967.
 Morris, Bernadine, and Barbara Walz, The Fashion Makers, New York, 1978.
 Faure, Jacques, editor, Rudi Gernreich: A Retrospective, 1922–1985, Los Angeles, 1985.
 Milbank, Caroline Rennolds, New York Fashion: The Evolution of American Style, New York, 1989.
 Loebenthal, Joel, Radical Rags: Fashions of the Sixties, New York, 1990.
 Moffitt, Peggy, and William Claxton, The Rudi Gernreich Book, New York, 1991, 1999; London, 1992.
 Stegemeyer, Anne, Who's Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.
 Moffitt, Peggy, Rudi Gernreich, New York, 1999.

Articles

- Steinem, G., “Gernreich’s Progress; or, Eve Unbound,” in the New York Times Magazine, 31 January 1965.
 “Rudi Gernreich,” in Current Biography (New York), December 1968.
 “Fashion Will Go Out of Fashion,” interview, in Forbes (New York), 15 September 1970.
 Guerin, T., “Rudi Gernreich,” in Interview (New York), May 1973.
 “Head on Fashion,” interview, in Holiday (New York), June 1975.
 Lockwood, C., “The World of Rudi Gernreich,” in Architectural Digest (Los Angeles), October 1980.
 Kalter, S., “Remember Those Topless Swimsuits?” in People Weekly, 25 May 1981.
 Obituary in Newsweek, 6 May 1985.

styles in unforgettably female forms with a strong and sexy mood, animal stripes look wild on rock-chic suits while ribbon corset dresses flirt with naughty-but-nice eveningwear theme.” The Bangkok Post (11 April 2001) similarly enthused, “Suits—the brand’s field of unrivalled expertise and its springboard to fame—were offered in a variety of forms, from the classic, impeccable male costume to the feminine low-neckline and skirt ensemble to trouser suits. Splendid materials and prints, as well as sophisticated details, were the leitmotif of the show.”

—Kathleen Paton; updated by Sydonie Benét

GERNREICH, Rudi

American designer

Born: Vienna, 8 August 1922. Immigrated to the United States, 1938, naturalized, 1943. Education: Studied at Los Angeles City College,

Rudi Gernreich, 1966 collection: ensemble in a cheetah print that includes coat, blouse, skirt, stockings, shoes, underwear, and helmet. © AP/Wide World Photos.

1938–41; Los Angeles Art Center School, 1941–42. Career: Dancer, costume designer, Lester Horton Company, 1942–48; fabric salesman, Hoffman company, and freelance clothing designer, Los Angeles and New York, 1948–51; designer, William Bass Inc., Beverly Hills, 1951–59; swimwear designer, Westwood Knitting Mills, Los Angeles, 1953–59; shoe designer, Genesco Corp., 1958–60; founder, GR Designs, Los Angeles, 1960–64; designer, Rudi Gernreich Inc., 1964–68; designs featured in first fashion videotape, Basic Black, 1966; designed furnishings for Fortress and Knoll International, 1970–71; lingerie for Lily of France, 1975; cosmetics for Redken, 1976; also designed knitwear for Harmon Knitwear, kitchen accessories, ceramic bathroom accessories, and costumes for Bella Lewitzky Dance Company. Exhibitions: Two Modern Artists of Dress: Elizabeth Hawes and Rudi Gernreich, Fashion Institute of Technology, New York, 1967; Fashion Will Go Out of Fashion, retrospective, Kunstlerhaus Graz, Austria, 2000. Awards: Sports Illustrated Designer of the Year award, 1956; Wool Knit Association award, 1960; Coty American Fashion Critics award, 1960, 1963, 1966, 1967; Neiman Marcus award, Dallas, 1961; Sporting Look award, 1963; Sunday Times International Fashion award, London, 1965; Filene’s Design award, Boston, 1966; inducted to Coty American Fashion Critics Hall of Fame, 1967; Knitted Textile Association award, 1975; Council of Fashion Designers of America Special Tribute, 1985. Died: 21 April 1985, in Los Angeles.

PUBLICATIONS

On GERNREICH:

Books

- Bender, Marylin, The Beautiful People, New York, 1967.
 Morris, Bernadine, and Barbara Walz, The Fashion Makers, New York, 1978.
 Faure, Jacques, editor, Rudi Gernreich: A Retrospective, 1922–1985, Los Angeles, 1985.
 Milbank, Caroline Rennolds, New York Fashion: The Evolution of American Style, New York, 1989.
 Loebenthal, Joel, Radical Rags: Fashions of the Sixties, New York, 1990.
 Moffitt, Peggy, and William Claxton, The Rudi Gernreich Book, New York, 1991, 1999; London, 1992.
 Stegemeyer, Anne, Who's Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.
 Moffitt, Peggy, Rudi Gernreich, New York, 1999.

Articles

- Steinem, G., “Gernreich’s Progress; or, Eve Unbound,” in the New York Times Magazine, 31 January 1965.
 “Rudi Gernreich,” in Current Biography (New York), December 1968.
 “Fashion Will Go Out of Fashion,” interview, in Forbes (New York), 15 September 1970.
 Guerin, T., “Rudi Gernreich,” in Interview (New York), May 1973.
 “Head on Fashion,” interview, in Holiday (New York), June 1975.
 Lockwood, C., “The World of Rudi Gernreich,” in Architectural Digest (Los Angeles), October 1980.
 Kalter, S., “Remember Those Topless Swimsuits?” in People Weekly, 25 May 1981.
 Obituary in Newsweek, 6 May 1985.

Rudi Gernreich, 1966 collection: jersey shifts with matching tights and feathered helmets in peacock (left) and a pheasant (right) patterns. (Mule shoes by Capezio.) © AP/Wide World Photos.

"Rudi Gernreich," obituary, in Current Biography (New York), June 1985.

Timmons, Stuart, "Designer Rudi Gernreich Stayed in the Fashion Closet," in The Advocate, 25 September 1990.

Shields, Jody, "Rudi Gernreich was a Designer Ahead of His Time," in Vogue, December 1991.

Armstrong, Lisa, "Peggy and Rudi Go Topless," in The Independent on Sunday Review (London), 2 February 1992.

O'Brien, Glenn, "Back to the Future," in Artforum, September 2000.

* * *

Son of a hosiery manufacturer, born into an intellectual Viennese family in the 1920s, Rudi Gernreich was to become one of the most revolutionary designers of the 20th century. After fleeing the Nazis in the late 1930s he settled in Los Angeles, becoming an American citizen in 1943. Perhaps because of this geographic detachment from the centers of fashion and the fact that he refused to show in Paris,

Gernreich is a name not spoken in the same breath as Balenciaga, Dior, or even Courrèges, although Gernreich had just as much influence on women's appearance, especially during the 1960s and 1970s.

Gernreich studied dance before entering the world of fashion and, using as inspiration the practice clothes of dancers, particularly leotards and tights, he produced pared down body-clothes in the 1960s, aimed at what seemed to be the new woman of the era. To cater to this popular construction of femininity, Gernreich attempted to produce a new version of women's clothing, freed of all constraints.

Influenced by Bauhaus functionalism, Gernreich conceived a body-based dressing with coordinated underwear, celebrating the unfettered movement of the body based on his early involvement with Lester Horton's modern dance troupe. This interest in liberating the body from the limitations of clothing surfaced in his early swimwear designs of 1952 in which he eliminated the complicated boned and underpinned interior construction that had been obligatory in the 1950s. He revived the knitted swimsuit or "maillot" of the 1920s, which he elasticized to follow the shape of the body. These experiments were continued in his knitted tube dresses of 1953.

Gernreich was interested less in the details and decorations of clothes and more in how they looked in motion. In the 1950s he was designing relaxed, comfortable clothes fabricated out of wool, jersey, and other malleable materials, usually in solid colors or geometric shapes and checks. During the next decade he went on to use unusual fabrics and bold color disharmonies such as orange and blue or red and purple.

In the early 1960s Gernreich opened a Seventh Avenue showroom in New York where he showed his popular designs for Harmon knitwear and his own more expensive line of experimental garments. During the decade he acquired a reputation for being the most radical designer in America; his designs included the jacket with one notched and one rounded lapel, tuxedos made of white satin, and the topless bathing suit of 1964, which reflected the new vogue for topless sunbathing.

Gernreich's freeing of the breasts was a social statement, somehow part of the emancipation of women, and a portent of the unfettering of the breast by the women's movement in the 1970s. Gernreich invented the "no bra" bra in 1964, a soft nylon bra with no padding or boning in which breasts assumed their natural shape, rather than being molded into an aesthetic ideal. He went on to overtly display his sympathy for women's liberation with his 1971 collection of military safari clothes accessorized with dogtags and machine guns.

Gernreich was also responsible for developing the concept of unisex, believing that as women achieved more freedom in the 1960s, male dress would emerge from the aesthetic exile into which it had been cast in the 19th century. He conceived interchangeable clothes for men and women such as floor-length kaftans or white knit bell-bottomed trousers and matching black and white midriff tops, and even, in 1975, Y-front underwear for women. Other designs included the first chiffon t-shirt dress, see-through blouses, coordinated outfits of dresses, handbags, hats, and stockings, mini dresses inset with clear vinyl stripes, and the thong bathing suit, cut high to expose the buttocks. He experimented constantly with the potentials of different materials using cutouts, vinyl, and plastic, and mixing patterns such as checks with dots.

His clothing was part of a whole design philosophy which encompassed the designing of furniture, kitchen accessories, rugs, and quilts—even, in 1982, gourmet soups. His notion of freeing the body was taken to its logical extreme in his last design statement, the pubikini, which appeared in 1982, revealing the model's dyed and shaped pubic hair.

—Caroline Cox

GHOST

British fashion house

Founded: in 1984 by Tanya Sarne. Company History: Opened London shop, 1994; opened flagship London store, 1997; launched G2 collection, 1997; opened boutiques in Paris, Los Angeles, and Amsterdam, 1998; signed licensing agreement with Oliver Goldsmith for eyewear, 1998; introduced shoe and knitwear lines, 1999; launched signature fragrance Ghost, 2000; planned second women's fragrance, 2001–02. Awards: British Apparel Export award, 1992. Company Address: The Chapel, 263 Kensal Rd., London W10 5DB, England.

Ghost, fall 2001 collection. © AP/Wide World Photos/Fashion Wire Daily.

PUBLICATIONS

On GHOST:

Books

Stegemeyer, Anne, Who's Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.

Articles

Fallon, James, "Ghost: Getting the U.S. Spirit," in WWD, 11 January 1993.

Spindler, Amy M., "Color It with Silver and Spice," in the New York Times, 4 November 1993.

"New York Update—Ghost," in WWD, 11 April 1994.

Orlean, Susan, "The Talk of the Town: Fashion Designers Uptown and Downtown Get Ready for This Week's Shows in Bryant Park," in the New Yorker, 7 November 1994.

Fallon, James, "Ghost readies Trendy G2 for Spring-Summer 1997," in WWD, 20 August 1996.

———, "Ghost Focuses on Growth," in WWD, 18 June 1998.

Hammond, Teena, "L.A.'s a Ghost Town," in WWD, 24 June 1998.

which he elasticized to follow the shape of the body. These experiments were continued in his knitted tube dresses of 1953.

Gernreich was interested less in the details and decorations of clothes and more in how they looked in motion. In the 1950s he was designing relaxed, comfortable clothes fabricated out of wool, jersey, and other malleable materials, usually in solid colors or geometric shapes and checks. During the next decade he went on to use unusual fabrics and bold color disharmonies such as orange and blue or red and purple.

In the early 1960s Gernreich opened a Seventh Avenue showroom in New York where he showed his popular designs for Harmon knitwear and his own more expensive line of experimental garments. During the decade he acquired a reputation for being the most radical designer in America; his designs included the jacket with one notched and one rounded lapel, tuxedos made of white satin, and the topless bathing suit of 1964, which reflected the new vogue for topless sunbathing.

Gernreich's freeing of the breasts was a social statement, somehow part of the emancipation of women, and a portent of the unfettering of the breast by the women's movement in the 1970s. Gernreich invented the "no bra" bra in 1964, a soft nylon bra with no padding or boning in which breasts assumed their natural shape, rather than being molded into an aesthetic ideal. He went on to overtly display his sympathy for women's liberation with his 1971 collection of military safari clothes accessorized with dogtags and machine guns.

Gernreich was also responsible for developing the concept of unisex, believing that as women achieved more freedom in the 1960s, male dress would emerge from the aesthetic exile into which it had been cast in the 19th century. He conceived interchangeable clothes for men and women such as floor-length kaftans or white knit bell-bottomed trousers and matching black and white midriff tops, and even, in 1975, Y-front underwear for women. Other designs included the first chiffon t-shirt dress, see-through blouses, coordinated outfits of dresses, handbags, hats, and stockings, mini dresses inset with clear vinyl stripes, and the thong bathing suit, cut high to expose the buttocks. He experimented constantly with the potentials of different materials using cutouts, vinyl, and plastic, and mixing patterns such as checks with dots.

His clothing was part of a whole design philosophy which encompassed the designing of furniture, kitchen accessories, rugs, and quilts—even, in 1982, gourmet soups. His notion of freeing the body was taken to its logical extreme in his last design statement, the pubikini, which appeared in 1982, revealing the model's dyed and shaped pubic hair.

—Caroline Cox

GHOST

British fashion house

Founded: in 1984 by Tanya Sarne. Company History: Opened London shop, 1994; opened flagship London store, 1997; launched G2 collection, 1997; opened boutiques in Paris, Los Angeles, and Amsterdam, 1998; signed licensing agreement with Oliver Goldsmith for eyewear, 1998; introduced shoe and knitwear lines, 1999; launched signature fragrance Ghost, 2000; planned second women's fragrance, 2001–02. Awards: British Apparel Export award, 1992. Company Address: The Chapel, 263 Kensal Rd., London W10 5DB, England.

Ghost, fall 2001 collection. © AP/Wide World Photos/Fashion Wire Daily.

PUBLICATIONS

On GHOST:

Books

Stegemeyer, Anne, Who's Who in Fashion, Third Edition, New York, 1996.

Articles

Fallon, James, "Ghost: Getting the U.S. Spirit," in WWD, 11 January 1993.

Spindler, Amy M., "Color It with Silver and Spice," in the New York Times, 4 November 1993.

"New York Update—Ghost," in WWD, 11 April 1994.

Orlean, Susan, "The Talk of the Town: Fashion Designers Uptown and Downtown Get Ready for This Week's Shows in Bryant Park," in the New Yorker, 7 November 1994.

Fallon, James, "Ghost readies Trendy G2 for Spring-Summer 1997," in WWD, 20 August 1996.

———, "Ghost Focuses on Growth," in WWD, 18 June 1998.

Hammond, Teena, "L.A.'s a Ghost Town," in WWD, 24 June 1998.

"Ghost—Fashion Designer Tanya Sarne," in WWD, 29 September 1998.

Watson, Shane, "Tanya Boards the Ghost Train," from London Life, available online at www.thisislondon.co.uk, 1999.

"Ghost Story," in Soap, Perfumery & Cosmetics, February 2000.

"Fashion Marches On," in WWD, 23 February 2001.

* * *

The British label Ghost was founded in 1984 by Tanya Sarne and has since become a firmly established name in the fashion industry. The company's signature use of flowing fabric, with its softly crinkled look cut in loose, flowing shapes, forms the basis of each collection. Ghost designs are not usually viewed as the cutting edge of fashion; this was particularly true during the power-dressing period of the 1980s, when strict tailoring and padded shoulders were a major element in fashion. A label such as Ghost offered an individual and alternative way of dressing.

Fabrics are the hallmark of each Ghost collection and almost all of them are woven from viscose yarns derived from specially-grown soft wools with a fluid, crêpe-like texture. An intricate process of washing, shrinking, and dyeing is applied to each garment, which is constructed from the unfinished material or "grey cloth" and dyed at the final stage. These "grey cloth" garments are cut several sizes bigger to allow for the ensuing process of shrinking that occurs when the viscose is boiled to the consistency of vintage crêpe fabric.

The traditional dyeing and shrinking process employed by Ghost is rarely used in production today, due to its cost and the fact that it is extremely time-consuming. Another feature of Ghost design is its richly varied use of color, which can achieve great depth on the viscose fabric and changes each season from softest pastels and pale powdery shades to rich autumnal and spicy tones. The signature fabric is also treated with surface decoration such as embroidery, cutwork, and broderie anglaise lace effects. Due to the soft, fluid nature of the fabric, Ghost was initially perceived as being primarily summerwear. Over the years, however, new fabrics have been introduced, such as in the autumn-winter collections which have included quilted satin, velours, and mohair wool mixes.

